House of Commons Debates

OFFICIAL REPORT

Monday, March 12, 1923

The House met at three o'clock.

RETURNS—ORDERS IN COUNCIL

Mr. MEIGHEN: In connection with the returns brought down in answer to motions for papers, I would suggest to the government that instead of referring to an order in council by number, the subject matter be given, which I think has been the usual practice. Then hon. members will know in answer to whose motion the return is made.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. HOEY: I should like to ask the Prime Minister if it is the intention of the government to bring down and submit to the House at this session amendments to the Dominion Elections Act. I understand that certain amendments have been suggested by the Chief Electoral Officer, and there is also the matter of the single transferable vote endorsed by this House some weeks ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In this matter the government will wait to see what further suggestions may be made to the House before reaching a decision. There is a committee on redistribution, which will have to report to the House. Up to the present time it has not been thought advisable to bring in any amendments, but during the course of the session if it should seem to be advisable the matter will be taken under consideration.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS — COAL SUPPLY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am informed that the Canadian National Railways are refusing to take the run of the mine coal from any small companies in Maccan and River Hebert districts and that this means that some eight hundred men are thrown out of work, and these districts are being ruined. Has the government any information with regard to the withdrawal of orders from these districts?

Mr. GRAHAM: The matter is under consideration at the present time. Time may be given in order to install certain screens that will help out the difficulty. That matter is now being considered by the Vice President.

PRIVATE BILLS

THIRD READINGS

Bill No. 5, respecting certain patents of Charles A Channell.—Mr. German.

Bill No. 19, respecting certain patents of Albert Manvers.—Mr. Jacobs.

Bill No. 25, respecting a certain patent of Arthur R. Wilfley.—Mr. Chevrier.

Bill No. 27.—respecting a patent of Hans M. Olsen and Esther Maud Butcher.—Sir Henry Drayton.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS

Bill No. 14, to incorporate La Banque Rurale.—Mr. Parent.

Bill No. 18, respecting the Dominion Fire Insurance Company.—Mr. Ryckman.

LA SOCIETE DES ARTISANS CANADIENS FRANÇAIS

On motion of Mr. Hanson the House went into committee on Bill No. 26, to amend the act incorporating "La Société des Artisans Canadiens Français."—Mr. Seguin.—Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

On Section 4—General Convention.

Mr. CALDWELL: I cannot help thinking we are passing these sections without very much consideration. For example, I notice that in this section it is proposed to strike out the words "a majority of." I think this should be explained.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: An increase of protection is it not?

Mr. CALDWELL: We want to be sure of that.

Mr. HANSON: This bill was before the Banking and Commerce committee and all the sections were carefully considered. I can assure the hon. member the change referred to is in the way of increasing the protection to the society.

Mr. CALDWELL: That is all I want to know.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): Will the hon. member give us a summary showing what the general purpose of the bill is?

Mr. HANSON: The bill changes the method of government of the society, and re-enacts in a proper form the French sections which, I understand, have been improperly translated in the original bill. The powers of the society are also increased.

Section agreed to, bill reported, read the third time and passed.

HUDSON BAY RAILWAY

MOTION OF MR. ANDREW KNOX FOR CONSIDERATION OF SENATE REPORT

Mr. ANDREW KNOX (Prince Albert) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government of Canada give further consideration to the report of the Senate committee on the Hudson Bay railway with a view to safeguarding the investment of public moneys made in the construction of that portion of the work completed to date and that the government recognize the priority of this undertaking with reference to other transportation projects started subsequent to the Hudson Bay railway.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in moving this resolution, which is seconded by the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird), I wish to say that we have no apologies to make. The resolution should be its own justification, because the matter has been before the people of Canada for the last forty years and has been discussed annually from every angle. I admit that some of the more enthusiastic supporters of the scheme may have painted the picture in colours that would not stand the acid test; on the other hand, we know that its opponents have in many cases tried to enlarge the difficulties. No great project has ever been carried through without the overcoming of difficulties. In the observations I intend to make I shall try to be fair and to lay the facts dispassionately before the House.

The Hudson Bay railway project has been investigated time and time again, and as the result of the various investigations held, both the old historic political parties have endorsed the scheme. Nothing has ever been brought forward to prove that it is not feasible or not workable. For the benefit of any hon. members who may not have heard the discussions of previous years, I should like, by way of introduction, to draw attention to a few facts in connection with the project.

Work on the Hudson Bay railway was started by the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1910. The present Acting-Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) turned the first sod at that time, and I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that it would give us a great deal of satisfaction if before the end of the present season we could see the same hon. gentlemen drive the last spike. When Sir Robert Borden assumed office in 1911 he and his party again investigated the scheme, and the result was that they also were convinced of the feasibility of the work and the advisibility of carrying it on. Work proceeded slowly during the war years up to 1918, when, without any apparent reason, except possibly that of necessity for economy, the work was stopped, and during the past four years or more nothing has been done.

The railway consists of 424 miles from the Saskatchewan river at The Pas right to the bay. The grading has been done to the bay, but there still remain 92 miles of steel to be laid, and it is for the purpose of asking the government to proceed to lay that 92 miles of steel and to bring the road up to the necessary standard that we are pressing for a reconsideration of the matter.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Is any part of that line in operation to-day?

Mr. KNOX: Yes, a part of it is in operation, but only once every two weeks. I have not the exact mileage—

Mr. GRAHAM: Two hundred and fourteen.

Mr. KNOX: Two hundred and fourteen miles; a train goes out every two weeks. The amount of money expended on the road up to the time the work was stopped was something like $14,000,000, and on the terminal at Port Nelson, nearly $6,000,000. It was shown on the evidence of the Deputy Minister of Railways, Mr. Bell, before the Senate committee which sat in 1920, that the balance of the $25,000,000 which had been estimated as the amount necessary to complete the whole work, would actually have completed it, terminals and all.

It is not my intention to discuss at great length on this occasion the feasibility of the project, because that has been established time and time again. The report of the Senate committee, in which the view was expressed that the project was feasible and would likely be profitable, was placed on Hansard by myself last year; I do not therefore, care to take up the time of the House now by going into it further. I would like, though, before leaving the question of the feasibility of the scheme, to read a short extract from a speech delivered by Sir James Lougheed in the Senate on May 15, 1918. He said:

> I have no doubt that when that road is completed, as completed it will be, it will be found of inestimable advantage to the development of that western country.

Further on he said:

> Permit me to say that so far as the carriage of materials is concerned, construction work has not been proceeded with seriously since 1914, but in that year no less than 36 passages through the straits, through the bay, and through the estuary were successfully made, over 20,000 tons of freight for the construction of that road being carried. The ships which navigated the straits were not built for the ice traffic they were simply tramp steamers without any special constructive features for this particular navigation; yet during that year those ships, not at all adapted for the navigation of the waters in that Hudson straits, made no less than 36 passages. It seems to me that should be unanswerable evidence of this fact.

I would also like to read a short extract from a speech delivered by the late Hon. Frank Cochrane, who was Minister of Railways in the government of Sir Robert Borden. After making a personal inspection of the proposed route, this is what he had to say:

> I have every faith in the scheme and I will push the Hudson Bay road for all I am worth. We intend to make this a good road—we have a four-tenth grade; we are using 80-pound rails. I believe the Hudson Bay route will mean much to the West in the way of lower freight rates.

If the Solicitor General (Mr. McKenzie) were here I would call his attention particularly to this:

> Just consider how much cheaper iron, steel and coal, for instance, from Sydney, N.S. would be shipped to the prairie. It would be the greatest advantage to the East and I believe eastern opposition is dying out. We found the bay free from ice, in fact the only ice we saw to amount to anything were the bergs near Belle Isle where all the Atlantic steamers encounter them. The straits are very wide and with the aid of wireless I believe can be kept open for a long period. The early settlement in the North West was made through Hudson bay and straits and what sailing vessels have done steamships can accomplish with much more ease.

I think I am justified in dismissing that side of the argument. Taking it for granted that the feasibility of the undertaking has been demonstrated, and nothing to the contrary having been established, I think we can dismiss the argument in that respect. What I want to impress upon the House is the absolute necessity for more outlets.

Mr. CLARK: How many months of the year would the route be open?

Mr. KNOX: The senate committee state, from the evidence laid before them, that they consider that the route could be kept open four months of the year, and, with up-to-date appliances, probably much longer.

Mr. CLARK: What are these months?

Mr. KNOX: I believe they are July, August, September and October. And I would point out that these are the months during which it would be most beneficial to the western provinces for the route to be open, because it is during this period that the grass-fed cattle, which we hope we shall now be able to ship to the British markets in view of the removal of the embargo, would be ready for shipment overseas. And with the route open during these four months, we should have had during the past season two clear months for the shipment of grain. Grain was going to Port Arthur about the first of September, and if the route were open for these four months that have been mentioned, it will be seen that in the past season we could have had two clear months in which to ship grain. But we believe the route could be kept open much longer than that.

It will be observed that in the resolution I ask that the government shall:

—recognise the priority of this undertaking with reference to other transportation projects started subsequent to the Hudson Bay Railway.

Now it has been suggested to me that some people have interpreted this request to apply to branch lines. I wish to point out at once that I had no reference whatever to branch lines when wording this resolution, because I realize quite well that there are some branch lines in the West that are an absolute necessity at the present time; and I may say that there are some that are urgently needed in the constituency I represent. Although there are no better districts in the West than those which these branch lines would serve, at the same time I must say that unless these people obtain the necessary railway connection they will be compelled to pull up stakes and leave. I have in mind the line running north-east from Prince Albert to Paddockwood, and the line extending from Melfort north-easterly. Let me emphasize the fact that there is no opposition between the branch lines and Hudson Bay line; they are both necessary. And there is no more relationship between these two classes of railways than there is between the branch lines and Welland canal or some of the other big projects which have been started and which are consuming a great amount of money without giving any adequate return. As a matter of fact, the Hudson Bay railway is not in the same position as these other undertakings, for the building of this railway was provided for by the sale of western lands which were especially earmarked for that purpose. The road was intended to be built from the sale of these lands. Whether the proceeds will be enough to complete the project I cannot say, but I know that enough has been raised up to the present practically to cover all expenditures; and we believe that the amount still to be obtained from these sales will pretty nearly provide all that will be required to complete the road. I think that those who try to drag the branch lines into the discussion might just as well come out in their true colours and show themselves as being opposed to the scheme, because there is no connection whatever between the building of branch lines and the completion of this railway.

I have no quarrel with the Vancouver route, because I know that what we want to-day are more outlets. It is imperative that the West especially should have more outlets than it has at present. The cost of getting our produce on the markets of the world is consuming the profits which formerly probably went to the producers. It is therefore absolutely essential that we should get more outlets. I want to say here that in spite of all we are passing through to-day I have every confidence that the West—and when I say the West I include British Columbia—has ahead of it such a future that it will be absolutely necessary to provide more outlets for its products. We know the congested state of the grain route last fall, and we hope that we shall be able in some measure to relieve that condition. It requires no great stretch of imagination on my part to foresee the time when the Pacific ports will not only be used as outlets for our own produce but will be utilized in connection with the trade from the Orient, which will be landed there and transhipped to the port of Nelson and thence across the ocean, thus effecting a saving in both time and expense in getting shipments from the Orient to European ports. The strongest argument in favour of the Hudson bay route in preference to any other is the short railway haul, which is necessarily the cheap haul, and in that connection I might give some of the distances. The distance from Winnipeg to Port Nelson is 892 miles as against a distance from Winnipeg to Montreal of 1,422, which shows a saving of 530 miles. Brandon is 870 miles from Nelson and 1,555 from Montreal, or a difference of 685 miles. Regina is 694 miles from Nelson, via Sturgis—the line is not yet quite completed—and to Montreal it is 1,780 miles, a saving of 1,086. Medicine Hat is 996 miles from Nelson and 2,082 from Montreal, a saving of 1,086 miles. Calgary is 1,176 miles from Nelson and 2,262 from Montreal, a saving of 1,086 miles. Edmonton is 1,038 miles from Nelson and 2,247 from Montreal, a saving of 1,209 miles. Battleford is 766 miles from Port Nelson and 1,994 from Montreal, a saving of 1,228 miles. Saskatoon is 736 miles from Port Nelson and 1,924 from Montreal, a saving of 1,188 miles. Prince Albert is 670 miles from Port Nelson, and 1,958 from Montreal, a saving of 1,288 miles. The fertile Swan river valley in Manitoba and other good wheat producing areas are still nearer to Port Nelson.

Mr. MANION: In regard to these figures, of course my hon. friend will admit that the distance to Montreal is less from a practical standpoint, due to the fact that much of the route is by water in the summer season?

Mr. KNOX: Yes, Mr. Speaker; but I think my hon. friend will admit that the distances to Nelson which I have shown are in nearly all cases less than the distances to Fort William and Port Arthur. However, even if they were the same to these respective points, it would enable us to eliminate the carrying charges on grain from Fort William to Montreal, which, during the past year, have been particularly heavy. The transhipping charges as well would be saved.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Is there a net saving in freight rates by way of Hudson bay as compared with any other route?

Mr. KNOX: If the freight rates are the same per mile as they are by any other route—and I see no reason why they should be higher—there certainly must be a great saving.

The ruling grade on this road is particularly good—only four-tenths. Besides this favourable feature, the natural watershed of the prairies is towards the bay, so the route would be practically all down grade, but in any case there is nothing worse than a four-tenth grade, and, with 80-pound steel, we have one of the best roads for carrying grain that can be found on the continent.

Mr. EULER: Would the hon. member contend that the shipping charges after reaching Port Nelson or Fort Churchill are as low as those from Montreal?

Mr. KNOX: We have really nothing to go on at the present time, but we see no reason why there should be any difference. We fully expect there would be a higher insurance rate at the beginning, but the elimination of so much rail transportation would far more than offset this extra expense.

Now, as to the sentiment in the West in regard to the completion of this road. I need only point out that the legislatures of Manitoba and Saskatchewan after fully debating the matter have both passed resolutions urging that the Dominion government complete this work. The organized farmers—the United Farmers and Frain Growers' associations—in all three of the prairie provinces have passed similar resolutions. I have copies of resolutions passed by many boards of trade in the West, by the Associated Boards of Trade of Saskatchewan and by numerous other organizations. There can be no question about the sentiment in the West in relation to the completion of the Hudson Bay railway.

I could quote many extracts from western papers, but I do not think it necessary to do so. In fact I am confident that before the debate closes the House will be convinced that the West means business in this matter. In proof of that statement I would point to the resentment which was expressed in the West when the order was given last fall to lift one hundred miles of rail from this road. Happily that order was countermanded. I should like, however, to read two short extracts from eastern papers which go to show that even in the East the importance of this railway is not overlooked. The Toronto Star some six weeks ago contained the following editorial:

> More grain last year poured into Port Arthur and Fort William by rail, and poured out of there by boat than ever before. But the cost per bushel to the western farmer of getting his wheat from his front gate to the docks at Liverpool is regarded by him as a handicap almost fatal to his hope of success.
>
> The West wants and needs cheaper access to Europe with her grain. How is it to be had? Competition with grain from everywhere fixes the price of Canadian wheat at Liverpool; the railways and boats fix the price of hauling the grain to Liverpool; the producer of the grain gets what's left. It isn't enough. What the western grain growers see in this Hudson Bay route is that in shipping their grain to Europe they can cut out the long haul from Fort William to Montreal and place their farms as near tidewater as the farms of their competitors in Australia, Argentine and southern Russia.
>
> Isn't it too splendid a possibility to be left untried, or abandoned when so nearly completed? The West is growing insistent about this enterprise and eastern Canada must consider it seriously. Canada has not at Montreal a large enough spout for the trade she has to pour out and will have to pour out in the future.

The other extract is from the Port Arthur News Chronicle, and I would particularly draw the attention of my hon. friend for Fort William (Mr. Manion) to the following:

> In ordering the stripping of the road of rails and material the government has flown into the face of the West. It is not surprising that the West looks with suspicion and fear upon the attitude the government has adopted towards the Hudson Bay road. Whether we believe the road will prove a failure or success is beside the question. The whole matter may be concentrated into the statement that the West wants the Hudson Bay Railway and will never be satisfied until it gets it. Give them what they want. It will not break Canada, the few millions that are required, and it will do more to remove western suspicions of eastern motives than anything else in the world.

If this only were the result it would be worth far more than all the completion of the road will cost. The eastern provinces can form no conception of how fierce is the demand of the west for the Hudson Bay Railway. That road must be completed and an appropriation of the necessary funds for that purpose should be made at the forthcoming session of parliament.

Mr. MANION: If I may interrupt my hon. friend for a moment—I do not wish him to think that I am opposing the completion of this railway; I was merely trying to elucidate the point regarding comparative distances.

Mr. KNOX: I quite understand that, Mr. Speaker, I also have a short quotation from an Old Country paper, the Monthly Trade Review of London. This appeared in its issue of November, 1917—not of recent date, it is true, but it is interesting as indicating the view taken in England:

At the moment, when the Canadian government is pressing forward the completion of the new railway from The Pas to Port Nelson on Hudson's bay as a new outlet for the gigantic wheat fields of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, it is opportune to focus attention on an undertaking which will need every encouragement and support from the home government.

Canada's prairies to-day are the crucible of the nations, the imperial granary, the nearest and most prolific wheat-producing areas of the empire. What, therefore, can be done to ensure that they shall be developed for enormously increased supplies remunerative to the Canadian farmer and making the Briton's bread at home secure and more reasonable in price?

The most direct and practical answer is, develop transportation—transportation on the railways and lakes of Canada and transportation from Dominion ports to the ports of the United Kingdom. The completion of the state railway from The Pas to Port Nelson on Hudson bay and the establishment of a line of grain-carrying and other ships by the Hudson strait route is the beginning, therefore, of a movement of enormous importance, both to Canada and to the United Kingdom.

It is evident from this, Mr. Speaker, that the people of the Old Land are not unmindful of the importance of the wheat-growing provinces of the Dominion and realize that they are within much easier reach of tide-water and much nearer the Old Land than the present route would suggest.

A few days ago the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Evans) instanced the cost of transporting a steer from Saskatoon to Liverpool—$51 and some cents. Since then I have been making a little investigation, and I find that the portion of that amount which would be attributable to the rail haul from Saskatoon to Montreal would be something like $18. Applying that to the rail haul from Saskatoon to Nelson, at the same rate there would be a saving of something like $12. But that is not all. The shrinkage on such a rail haul amounts to at least five per cent. The average shrinkage between Winnipeg and Montreal is between three and five per cent, and the longer the haul the greater the shrinkage. The shrinkage, therefore, between Saskatoon to Montreal is easily five per cent. Now, five per cent is a very important item in connection with the price which the farmer would receive, and adding that to the saving on the rail haul which I have just mentioned, we can easily see that there would be a great saving if we could cut off something like twelve or thirteen hundred miles of rail haul. If we could save only $10 per head on these cattle to the farmer who produced them, I want to emphasize that that would mean the difference between success and failure to the stock industry of the West to-day. We in the West have been urged to go into mixed farming; it has been said that we cannot possibly succeed by continuing with grain alone. Now that the embargo has been lifted I see a great opportunity for bringing the stock industry into something like the condition we had some years ago, but unless something of this nature can be done the stock industry is doomed in the West. I have no hesitation in saying that, and I have a right to know because I am interested along that line myself.

Along with the shipment of our beef, we have also our dairy products, and a number of other products which will benefit very, very largely if we can make this route work out as we believe it will work out.

There is one other point I would like to make, and it is this. The Ontario government at the present time is projecting a line of railway to the southern extremity of James bay. We in the West are determinedly looking forward to the completion of the Hudson bay lines, thereby giving us connection with that great Canadian sea at the other side. When these are both accomplished facts, we shall have something more in common with the East, and I believe that is urgently needed at the present time. We also look forward to the development of great natural resources in that country, a development which I believe would justify the completion of the road even if the route to the Old Country was never opened up. The resources of that north country are something wonderful. We have assurances of that from every man who has gone up there, and we look forward to the development of these great resources.

Speaking on this subject last year I expressed myself as somewhat doubtful if the proper selection had been made of the port, but since that time I have convinced myself that the port of Nelson will supply all the necessary requirements of a shipping port. I was confirmed in this view by a conversation which I had with a gentleman who was in charge of the machinery for several years while working at the bay. This man informed me that there would be ample room and ample protection for the shipping there and for the ships which would lie at the harbour. The harbour was being constructed alongside the main channel, and he said that it would be a crime to abandon the work which had already been done, and which was still standing up well. Consequently I am convinced that the government should carry on the work which has been in progress there. As I pointed out before, there is 80-pound steel on the road, and the grade is four-tenths.

To sum up, I would just like to say that this project has been found feasible after repeated investigations, and nothing has ever transpired to prove it otherwise. The people of the prairies claim the completion of this road as their right and as a national enterprise. Money was provided for it by the sale of lands in the West especially set aside for that purpose. We believe there is no great opposition to the road except possibly among a few doubting Thomases and those who may be directly interested. Conditions demand that if we can get a shorter and a cheaper route to the European markets we must take advantage of it, and this fact is all the more emphasized since the tariff barrier has been increased between us and the United States market. We believe that with an increase in the British preference, coupled with this shorter and cheaper route, much of the handicap imposed upon us by the American tariff would disappear, and that a better, brighter day would dawn for the western provinces and incidentally for the whole of Canada.

Mr. T. W. BIRD (Nelson): It is usual for the opponents of the Hudson Bay railway to magnify the usual difficulties of the engineer and the navigator into insuperable obstacles. I am reminded of an incident which occurred during the original survey of the railway. The engineers came to a soft place that required considerable filling. Of course, the engineers took it as part of their ordinary day's work, but a certain eastern journal, which I think is still hostile to the project, immediately announced that the engineers had come to a standstill before a bottomless bog. The matter was taken up in this House, and it was found that the bottomless bog had no existence except in the mind of the editor of that journal.

Before I go on to deal with the feasibility of the route, which I think is a very important, in fact, a crucial matter, I want to say a few words as to the question of expediency as it has been applied to this matter. We of the West, Mr. Speaker, have sometimes had an uneasy feeling that we have been bamboozled by this plea of expediency. Up to 1917 it was thought expedient by two successive governments which to all appearances entered upon this enterprise with the feeling that they were doing so in the national interest—up to that time I say two successive governments spent over $20,000,000 upon the enterprise. Then suddenly in 1918 it was thought expedient to close down the whole thing, and from that time onward it was thought expedient to neglect the work done, to allow it to deteriorate and decay; and to crown everything, it was found expedient last fall to add human devices of demolition to those of nature, and to make an attempt to blot the whole thing out of the remembrance of man. During all that time yearly expenditures were made, amounting to tens of millions of dollars, upon other projects which had not one whit more claim than the Hudson Bay railway had. One is disposed to exclaim: "Oh expediency what wrongs have been committed in thy name!" and we of the West feel that there is a good deal of explanation to be made on that score. So much for the plea for expediency.

What has been the actual condition in regard to this matter financially? The hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Knox) has referred to this. The impression that the construction of the Hudson Bay railway up to date has run the country into a debt of something like twenty millions, with enormous interest charges, is, of course, totally false. I think it is well understood in the House here, that every cent that went into construction was paid out of current revenue, and that current revenue was amply reimbursed by the provision which the hon. member (Mr. Knox) has referred to—that is the setting aside of certain lands, certain homesteads and preemptions. So the plea of economy can only apply to the small amount it would have taken to complete the route; and I think it can scarcely be denied that four or five millions, or six millions, would have been ample to have placed the Hudson bay route in a condition that would have allowed of an operation of at least an experimental kind.

Therefore, the amount of saving that has been accomplished amounts to that four or five million dollars spread over two or three years; and when you set that over against the amount of deterioration that has taken place in four or five years one fails to see where the saving comes in. There is an old saying that "a dollar saved is a dollar earned"; but in this case a dollar "saved" was a dollar wasted.

Now, let me deal more particularly with the question of feasibility, for I know that in the minds of certain members there is some doubt as to the feasibility of this route, although it is a matter that has been discussed for a good many years. I want to say that the sources of what may be termed exact knowledge concerning the feasibility of the Hudson bay route consist of the reports of the several expeditions that have been sent out by successive governments. A vast amount of money has been spent, at one time and another, in sending out competent people, properly equipped, to ascertain the truth about this route. It is no use contending that the governments—the Liberal government and the Conservative government—undertook this thing for purely political reasons, and went into it blindly and inadvisedly, because there is evidence that is readily accessible to show that all the material facts were at hand, and those facts are very well set forth in these reports. Now the more important of these reports are: the Gordon report of 1884-5-6, the Wakeham report of 1897, and the reports of of the Hydrographic surveys under Captain Anderson, and others, from 1910 to 1914. I know that attempts have been made, at times, to discredit these reports. Partisan zeal has sometimes led people to try to discredit these reports, but I say that any candid student of them must admit their great value, and, I would add, to a certain extent their finality. The evidence which they give is cumulative and progressively convincing, and you cannot get away from it. They vary as regards details but on essential points they pretty nearly all agree. I think they may be taken as being trustworthy, and practically nearly all that you need to consult—I think they may be said to be a compendium of all that can be said for or against this route. Another thing I might interject is this—that these reports have an added value because they contain, embedded within them, all the available unofficial evidence, evidence that has been gleaned for a long period from sea captains, from Hudson's Bay Company officials, and from others that are qualified to speak. All this evidence is to be found in these reports.

Now, having carefully studied these reports the conclusion I have come to—and I hope my bias in favour of this route has not in any way interfered with my judgment; I do not think it has—is that, as was stated a few moments ago, the months of reasonably safe navigation are July, August, September and October. Indeed, in some favourable years you may add part of June and a part of November to that period. The opening and the closing of the straits for navigation depends upon the Arctic stream of ice, coming from Baffin's bay, which closes the eastern entrance to the straits from the latter part of November to early in July. In the early part of July, usually in the first week of that month, the ice opens out and permits steamers to enter, and the date of that opening is fairly constant. Reports that extend away back for two hundred years show that the first week of July is a fairly constant date for the opening of the straits. Sometimes, indeed, steamers can go in there in the middle of June and instances of this having been done can be quoted. The closing of the straits is also pretty constant and takes place every year about the last week in November, although sometimes the closing is extended to December, and in some cases the beginning of January, on one or two occasions in fact the straits might have been cleared in the first week in January. These are the facts concerning the navigation of the straits, and although I believe that on the west end of the straits the Fox channel ice is a factor, yet from the evidence given it cannot be said that the Fox channel ice governs the navigation of the straits. Whatever you prove of the eastern end of the straits applies to the western end also. In establishing this, one does not contend that the route is such that it will not require a certain amount of adaptation on our part. The difficulties are great of their kind, but they are not at all insuperable. They can be overcome. They have been overcome and are being overcome. The reports of Captain Anderson of the Hydrographic survey prove that with every successive season of investigation something of value is discovered concerning the navigation of the straits, and perhaps the most instructive thing is this: that in 1911 when the Minto went into the straits it had a very difficult passage and suffered considerable damage, but in 1912 under similar conditions the Minto, benefiting from its previous season's experience, went in and made the passage with the greatest of success. Another matter that is very instructive is the experiences of different steamers in the same season and at the same time. These experiences which are in documentary form can be examined and are very instructive. For instance at one time the Acadia was hopelessly stuck in the ice between Mansell island and Coats island, and yet practically at the same time the Bonaventure found a passage five miles wide at the same place. In the eastern end of the straits Captain Anderson—I think it was in 1914—was badly stuck in the ice, and at exactly the same time there was a fleet of five ships, including the Sheba which is an ordinary unprotected tramp steamer, went through unscathed. So that you see these incidents prove that with every season of navigation something new is learned, and the conviction that comes to one is that continued investigation with its accumulated experience, and with the advantage of modern methods, the navigation of those straits will be increasingly safe and practicable.

Perhaps I may be allowed to refer to the Senate report of three years ago. Now I will admit the weakness of that report from an argumentative point of view. It has its limitations. That has to be conceded, but I think it was an honest attempt to co-ordinate all existing evidence on material points. One of the things I might refer to briefly is the fact that it confirms unequivocally the opinion that has prevailed for over a generation that the straits are navigable for at least four months of the year, and the only point on which it is inconclusive is that respecting the comparative merits of the two ports. I want to interject a word here to show this much disputed question of the comparative merits of the two ports is not such that it need retard the completion of the Hudson bay route. The choice that exists between them is not very important. Take, for instance, the initial cost. There are some figures in existence that were given by the present hon. Minister of Defence (Mr. Graham), I think in 1909 or 1910, showing the comparative estimates for these two ports. The estimate for Churchill was over $4,000,000 more than the estimate for Nelson; that is, for the initial expenditure. Then with regard to operation, does it not seem reasonable that the additional mileage that would be required at Churchill would cost at least as much as the dredging that would be necessary from year to year at Port Nelson?

As to the question of terminals, we have been told on official authority that development at Churchill on a small experimental scale would be no more favourable than at Nelson, and at Port Nelson, development on a big scale would be distinctly favourable. I would not have hon. members forget also that $6,000,000 had been spent on Nelson harbour, that the railway had been headed in that direction and is nearly completed to Nelson. As to navigation of these ports, I may say that it is a delicate matter for a layman to deal with. One does not even begin to understand the technical words used, but I think it is self evident that, from the point of view of natural accessibility, Churchill has the advantage. Nature meant it for a port. But then the difficulties that are associated with Nelson are not insuperable, and by no means formidable. Before any survey was made it was not difficult for a skilled mariner to approach the port, and an accurate survey exists to-day. It has been properly charted, and with the addition of the necessary buoys and beacons, and perhaps radial stations, the accessibility of Nelson will be beyond the shadow of a doubt. Without expressing any personal bias in either direction, I simply want to point out that the choice between these two ports is not such that it need retard the completion of the Hudson Bay railway.

I would like to say a word as to the desirability and urgency of this route. I do not know whether I should detain the House by giving some idea as to the enormous natural wealth that exists in the country bordering on the Hudson Bay railway, but in a brief way, without giving many figures, or reading many quotations, I think I can convey to the House some idea as to the natural wealth that does exist there, which certainly some day will be a contributing factor to any railway that runs into that region. Taking the country that is already traversed by the Hudson Bay railway, beginning at Mile 82, we find that wonderful country called The Pas mineral belt. It commences a few miles west of Mile 82 and stretches to the Saskatchewan border. In that district there have been invested in the last few years over $2,000,000. At one period during the war $2,000,000 worth of copper was taken out of one mine under most difficult conditions. The area called The Pas mineral belt is rich not only in copper but in gold, and has big promise for the future.

Then, if you proceed to Mile 130, you enter that large area—I think it is 10,000 square miles—of valuable agricultural land—good clay land that is capable of producing and ripening wheat. That alone is a consideration that ought to have influence. Then, proceeding from that valuable agricultural area toward the bay, the railway actually parallels—indeed, twice crosses—the Nelson river with its wonderful water-power potentialities. At the very place where the railway crosses the Nelson river, Kettle rapids, there is a possibility of developing over 1,000,000 horse-power. That northern country is perhaps richer than any other place in Canada in that respect, with possibly one or two exceptions.

Mr. GOOD: What about the development of water-power in the winter time at those places?

Mr. BIRD: I would remind the hon. gentleman that the Nelson is a mighty river; it is one of the biggest in the world, and has a very strong current. While I have not investigated the matter in detail, I believe the government reports refer to minimum flow in connection with this potential power development. I suppose that means that it is the flow all the year round.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): May I interpose an answer to the question? I was talking with Sir Adam Beck less than two weeks ago, and he tells me that it would be possible to generate over 4,000,000 horse-power on that slope to Hudson bay. That power can be used for the mining country to the north all the year round, as well as for the railway.

Mr. BIRD: I have seen the total available horse-power in the north of Manitoba estimated as over 6,000,000; I think the government report gives it at about $3,000,000. All that power is adjacent to the Hudson Bay railway and may be utilized at points where the railway crosses the river. In addition to these major resources there are minor ones, such as fur, fish, and possibly pulp, which will in a smaller way be contributing factors to the traffic that will some day maintain the Hudson Bay railway.

When we get beyond the railway we have the Hudson bay. Although the extent of the resources of the bay itself is somewhat problematical, it is the only means of access to an area in Canada comprising over 2,000,000 square miles—an area the extent of which almost baffles the imagination. I say that the Hudson Bay is the only means of access to this vast territory which everywhere shows signs of being richly mineralized. This is not imagination; it is not especially got up for the purpose of debate. To prove that, I will read my only quotation; it is from Dr. Corless, President of the Canadian Institute of Mining and Metallurgy, an utterance he made only last year. He said:

> We can well afford to stand off for a few moments in order to try to estimate the probable significance to mining of the enormous region surrounding Hudson bay, with an area of 2,000,000 square miles, occupying considerably over one-half the entire surface of Canada.

I will summarize by saying that Dr. Corless emphasizes the fact that not 10 per cent of this area has been investigated and that only a small proportion of that 10 per cent has been thoroughly investigated. But the result of the investigations made goes to prove that this vast area is very similar to the area in northern Ontario that has already produced such vast wealth for this country. Further on he says:

> Fortunately, enough is known to make reasonably certain that the broad average formations of the less known parts will closely resemble those of the part already more fully examined. In the only parts where any detailed geological examination and prospecting have been carried out there have already been discovered fabulously rich deposits of iron, nickel, gold and silver containing many thousands of millions (billions) of dollars in gross value of these metals.

If anyone desires further information respecting the character of that country I would commend to his perusal a publication issued by the Department of the Interior in 1914, entitled The Unexploited West. It would make all of us better Canadians if we knew that this vast country, equal, as Dr. Corless says, to one-half the total area of Canada, and often represented on our maps by a blank, is not totally devoid of use, but is full of splendid possibilities. And the only key to that area is the Hudson Bay railway.

I would like for a moment to divert my remarks to the accumulated traditions that have gathered around this route during centuries of adventure and of trade. From the splendid old sea-dogs of Queen Bess right down to the modern Yankee whaler, there have been those who from one motive or another have been prepared to brave the obstacles of this route. In those days it was not only the play writer who was of such stuff as dreams are made of, but every bluff sea-master who went down to the sea, sometimes to do grim business, was animated with vision. It is often difficult to know which to admire most, their splendid seamanship or their visionary power. Such men as Frobisher and Davis and Hudson dreamed of Cathay and the route thither, and dreaming of it were able to accomplish things that they could not otherwise have accomplished. Those northern waters had a fascination for them; they played upon their imaginations in such a way that unconsciously they began the process by which Canada has become what it is to-day. We would not know Canada as it is now had it not been for the vision of those brave men of old. The spirit of those olden times speaks to us now;

It has been enshrined imperishably in story by such men as Hakluyt and to-day it is voiced in thrilling song by such men as Sir Henry Newbolt, from whom we had the privilege of a visit the other day. Sir Henry Newbolt is Britain's finest interpreter of the spirit of those early days; through his verse it seems to call to us like a "far bell a-ringing," imploring us not to become urbanized and sophisticated, not to allow ourselves to suffer the blight of soul in which vision perishes and heroic effort languishes.

Coming down to a later time, we find this route associated with traders who for generations enriched themselves through its natural wealth and associated with their prowess was the vigorous contention of the nations of Europe.

I would pause here just to express my appreciation of the decision arrived at by the Department of Interior to preserve for all time to come Fort Prince of Wales on the shores of Hudson bay. There it stands and will continue to stand, we hope, for all time as mute evidence of what this bay and this region meant to minds of the eighteenth century. Surely a route which the ill-equipped Elizabethan seamen conquered, which has enriched generations of traders, and for which nations have contended, has something for the imagination of the Canadian of to-day.

Returning again to the urgency of this route I want to say that for the West it is primarily a matter of transportation. The western farmer has slowly realized that the profits of his toil from year to year are fated to be continually precarious; and that fact has worked upon the mind of the western farmer and the residents of the West generally. The western farmer has felt himself in recent years constantly ground between the upper and nether millstones of high cost of production and high cost of marketing. With respect to the high cost of production, he scarcely knows to-day whether the fiscal system, against which he has protested so many years, or the financial system is his greatest enemy. If he has as much success in attacking the financial system as he has had in attacking the fiscal system a great deal of sympathy is coming to him. With respect to marketing, last session something like a gleam of hope came into the breast of the western farmer, although I am afraid it was almost entirely illusory. He asked the Dominion government for a wheat board and it was granted him, but granted him grudgingly and with much opposition, and, I am afraid, in such a way that it will never be of any use to him. And then as to transportation, he did get some satisfaction, but he had the chagrin last season of seeing the advantage filched from him by the predatory interests of the Great Lakes. Now, it is this hopeless fight in order to stabilize the products of his toil that has worked upon the mind of the western farmer; and it explains to a large extent the phenomenal revival of interest in Hudson bay which took place last winter. The farmer realizes that this fight is almost hopeless, and the Hudson Bay railway fascinates him because he thinks, and rightly I believe, that it offers at least a partial remedy for the malady of distance from which he suffers. And distance to the western farmer is a malady. It is a blight, just as much as the rust on his wheat is a blight, just as much as foot and mouth disease would be in his cattle; and a few million dollars that the Dominion government might expend in removing this blight would bring a benefit not only to western Canada, but to the entire Dominion.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): Has the hon. member considered what effect the opening of this route would have on the Canadian National railways?

Mr. BIRD: Well, I have not; other considerations have had precedence in my mind; and having watched the writhings of the western farmer upon the grill of economic conditions during the last few years I think his case has a right to have precedence over the National railways. I believe a way could be found to solve the problem of the National railways, but in the meantime I think the western farmer has a right to go ahead and deliver himself in the most speedy manner he can. The western farmer has come to the point where he sees in the Hudson Bay railway a gleam of hope denied him in other quarters, and the reason is that the Hudson Bay railway brings his farm, his cattle and his grain just one thousand miles nearer to his market. I have read somewhere that the Parisian truck farmer, when he goes from one farm to another, takes his soil with him. He digs it up and carries it away to the new farm. Suppose the western farmers of Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta could dig up that wonderful soil of theirs and transport it one thousand miles nearer Liverpool, imagine what that would mean to them. You will see, then, why they insist on this thing. In conclusion, let me refer to another aspect of the question which is not quite so tangible as those I have dealt with, but which is just as important, and that is the psychological effect that the completion of the Hudson Bay railway would have on the western farmer. We have heard recently some talk about the discontent of the West in comparison with the contentment of the East. I imagine that the placidity of eastern conditions has been somewhat exaggerated; and I am convinced also that the discontent of the West has been misinterpreted. I think that trivial causes have been alleged to explain that discontent. But the real causes are not trivial; they go to the very roots of western life. The fact is that the West, like every other spot on earth, has been endowed by Providence with certain advantages and certain disadvantages. And this is what has happened. Under the pretext of a national policy, in the name of Canada, we have ruthlessly cut through natural conditions, emphasizing in every case the disadvantage and nullifying the advantage. That is what we have done in the name of a national policy. Shut out absolutely from its natural outlet to the south; its outlet to the east preyed upon by the bold, bad, barons of the "Big Sea-waters", and its only outlet to the north too often made the sport of political caprice, you cannot expect the West to be content under conditions of that kind. No intelligent and vigorous people ever have been content under such conditions. The West suffers from its isolation and it knows it. Buried, so to speak, in the depths of a continent,—people who live in the East cannot realize what this means—and with no outlet to the outside world except such precarious ones as are controlled by other people, how can you expect the West to be content? The sentiment which an isolated people develops towards its natural outlets is the most potent sentiment that can actuate any people; and to tamper with it, to make it a political question, to refuse it in the supposed interest of any other section of Canada, is almost utter recreancy to the best interests of the Dominion as a whole.

We often hear—at least I have heard more often during the past year than ever before—irresponsible talk about separation. There is a stirring in the tops of the mulberry trees which our statesmen would do well to note before it becomes a tornado. Now if this irresponsible talk be folly, it is only surpassed by one other folly—the constant refusal of this spontaneous and universal aspiration of the West. I repeat, its refusal under any pretext whatsoever is a species of folly that surpasses even the folly that I have mentioned almost under my breath.

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I am sure we have listened with a great deal of interest to the excellent speeches of both the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Knox) and the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) with regard to the possibilities and the feasibility of the Hudson bay route. Before dealing with the question I should like to say that as far as I am personally concerned I have a great deal of sympathy with the aspirations of the western people. On one subject which is very close to our hearts —the tariff—I think I would go almost as far as they would. I realize too the handicaps under which they suffer by having to bring their grain and other farm products such a long distance by rail to reach the European markets. We in the Maritime provinces suffer just the same in that we are kept out of our great market to the south, with the result that any goods we might find an outlet for in Quebec, Ontario or the western provinces we cannot very well sell on account of the high freight rates. So in any remarks I shall make I want my friends to understand that my sympathies are entirely with the West, and if I thought for one moment that this Hudson bay route was feasible I would support the resolution.

Now, Sir, it seems to me that this matter may be dealt with in three phases. The first is, whether it is feasible to build the line of railway from The Pas to the terminal at Hudson bay. I think everything any government can do should be done for the people of northern Manitoba. If, as the hon. member for Nelson says, there are great possibilities of development in that part of the province, and if it is demonstrated to the satisfaction of the railway authorities, of parliament and of the government, that it would be wise for the line to be completed, then I think the work should be undertaken. But I cannot deal with this phase of the question satisfactorily because I do not know very much about it.

The second phase I should like to discuss is the feasibility or otherwise of the water route from the terminals at Port Nelson to Europe. As the hon. members have both said, a great deal has been written in the past two years in regard to this route. The hon. member for Nelson quoted what Captain Anderson, who was out there for several years, wrote with regard to the Hudson bay and strait. I have under my hand his various reports from 1911 to 1915, and I intend to deal with them in a few minutes. The hon. member for Nelson said that some years this route was navigable for four or five months of the year, and he added that during that period whilst one vessel could not get in for a long time another vessel came in a day or two afterwards without any difficulty. If the hon. member had had the slight experience I had in the ice fields for about two seasons he would understand exactly what that meant. In my opinion it was a very poor argument in support of his case because it proved that the bay was full of ice at the time both these steamers attempted to get in. While one was jammed in the ice, the other vessel, perhaps on account of pressure of wind from a certain direction making a lead in the ice, was enabled to get through. I have under my hand some photographs taken of Hudson bay, showing ice conditions there, from 1911 to 1915, and if any hon. gentleman thinks that the Hudson bay route is feasible for ordinary steamers, then after looking at these photographs I am confident he will change his opinion. In every one of these photographs where the Minto, the Acadia, the Bonaventure and the Boethic are trying to get through the ice, it will be observed that this ice is not merely five or six inches thick, but extends to a thickness of ten or twelve feet, and it is impossible for any steamers to get through such a solid obstruction without a great deal of difficulty.

Mr. KNOX: Has the hon. member never seen conditions of the same kind in the straits of Belle Isle?

Mr. DUFF: Yes. If my hon. friend and I could this afternoon travel by aeroplane to the Isle-au-Bois, in the straits of Belle Isle we would find the channel completely blocked with ice. If we went down to Quebec this afternoon we would find there that although the lower reaches of the St. Lawrence right down to the straits are blocked with ice, at Quebec it is possible for any vessel to get part way to Montreal by working her way through what is known as drift ice. So although a ship may be able to navigate a way through the ice flows, out in the mouth of the strait near Button island and cape Chidley practically throughout the whole year the ice blocks that strait. It is quite true that after a southwestern gale when the wind blows at a high velocity for four or five days the ice is shoved away over to the northeastern side, and if a vessel arrives at that particuliar time she is able to work her way into Hudson strait and reach the bay.

My hon. friend from Nelson said that if this railway was completed and the terminals built the farmers of the West would be a thousand miles nearer their market than they are at the present time. That is quite true so far as distance is concerned but he forgot to take into consideration the fact that even if steamers were able to get into the bay and take aboard their cargoes they would be two or three days longer navigating out past cape Chidley, even if there was little or no ice. The captains would not navigate their ships after dark fearing ice conditions. Consequently there would be so much more time taken in navigating the passage which would offset the saving in distance. I might say that the photographs to which I referred were taken during the months of July and August, right in the height of the season when if this route was at all feasible there would be no ice in the bay or the strait yet every one of these photographs shows a heavy field of ice covering practically the whole of the bay.

The hon. member for Nelson said that if they could get the railway built to Hudson bay and the terminals constructed a route would be established between Hudson bay and Europe which would be a great thing for the western country. I do not think it would make very much difference. If parliament and the government decided to complete this road and make a test of this route, what would we have to do? In the first place, after the railway had reached Port Nelson, which it has been acknowledged here is better than Fort Churchill for the purpose of terminal facilities, it would be necessary to construct there docks and terminals. I am told by men with whom I have talked, and who have worked in Hudson bay for several seasons on the dredges, that it is practically impossible to get proper dockage facilities at that place, and for several reasons. The first reason is that although $6,000,000 has been spent practically all on dredging at Port Nelson, yet to-day there is very little if any more water there than there was when the dredging started. It is also a well-known fact that it would be necessary to build miles of terminals, not miles in width but in length, because the water at Port Nelson where the railway is supposed to end is very shallow. The result is that perhaps miles of dockage would require to be constructed. That would take a large sum of money.

But even when these docks were constructed I am told that the current coming down the Nelson river is so strong and the velocity of the wind in Hudson bay so high most of the time, that it would be practically impossible to hold these vessels to the dock for loading and unloading except in very unusual weather for that part of the country. My hon. friend perhaps knows himself that in Hudson bay we hardly ever get summer breezes. The wind blows at a terrific rate of speed practically every day, and what with the strong current coming down the Nelson river and the wind and undertow from the northwest blowing across these docks where the steamers would lie, it would be almost impossible, I am told, to hold them at the docks for loading.

But supposing all these difficulties were overcome. What next do we have to contend with? I think everybody will agree with me that the ordinary cargo steamer would not be suitable for this route on account of the ice conditions. A special kind of ship would have to be constructed and especially strengthened from the bow to the fore rigging and perhaps further aft. These steamers, of course would cost very much more than the ordinary tramp steamer or cargo boat and as they would only be able to operate in Hudson bay, as my hon. friend himself says, for four months at most during the summer, what would they do during the other eight months of the year? They would not be practical business carriers for this reason: They would cost about twice as much as the ordinary boat to build, and when they went into competition with other steamers on other routes after they had finished their charters on the Hudson bay route for four months, in order to pay dividends and even make expenses they would have to get higher freight rates than competing boats. It would be impossible to let these boats after only four months on the Hudson bay route lie up for the rest of the year. It is hard enough now for people in the shipping business to make both ends meet with their boats running twelve months in the year instead of only four. Consequently, I say that unless my hon. friends expect the government to build these steamers and spend large sums of money in building proper dockage facilities no shipping man is going to invest in boats which would have to be specially constructed for the Hudson bay route.

If the government did construct these boats, or if shipping men did, what would be the result then? I think every hon. gentleman will agree with me that no boats are going into a dangerous business, no steamers would go over this route unless when their charters were made with their agents or with the railway companies, they were guaranteed a higher freight rate than if the Hudson bay were all clear of ice and they could go in and out night as well as day without any difficulty. Consequently, special steamers having to be constructed, operating only four months in the year and demanding a higher freight rate, the insurance companies also asking a higher freight rate both on the steamer and cargo, my hon. friends would find that instead of getting lower freight rates than at the present time the freight rate on the Hudson bay route would be much higher than the rate via Quebec, Montreal, St. John or Halifax.

I think it is unnecessary for me to say much more. The hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) has referred to what Captain Anderson had to say about this route. I do not wish to weary the House by quoting at length, but I hold in my hand Captain Anderson's report for the year 1914, and I shall give a few extracts to show what he thinks of the feasibility of the Hudson bay route. He says:

> After clearing the ice about Belle Isle, the course followed was from 75 to 100 miles off shore and little or no ice was seen until we hauled in for cape Chidley, on Sunday the 19th.

That is the 19th of July. Cape Chidley is the cape outside of Hudson bay.

> At 3 a.m. light winter ice was entered and passed through without difficulty until 7 a.m., when about 90 miles southeast from cape Chidley and 60 miles off shore, heavy winter and Arctic ice was entered, making progress slow and hazardous. Later in the day, the rudder received damage by coming in contact with a large pan while "backing up" and the ship was hove to for repairs.

Backing up means that when the steamer cannot get through the ice she has to back up in the water behind her and go ahead a second time.

Mr. SHAW: What was the name of that boat?

Mr. DUFF: The Acadia, but I can also quote from the experiences of the Bœthic, the Minto and the Bonaventure. It goes on:

> It was found that the rudder stock had been twisted, necessitating the removal of the quadrant and cutting a new key slot. This operation took the remainder of the day and the night.
>
> The ice fields appeared very extensive, no open water being visible from the mast-head. The steamer Bonaventure, chartered by the Department of Railways and Canals for carrying supplies to the Hudson bay terminus at Port Nelson, was picked up by wireless and reported that she was icebound about 25 miles southest of the Button island.

The Bonaventure was icebound about twenty-five miles away from the other steamer, showing conclusively that this was a very extensive field of ice covering practically the whole of Hudson bay.

Mr. HOEY: You mean Hudson strait.

Mr. DUFF: The water outside Hudson bay.

Mr. BANCROFT: The location the hon. member is speaking of is Hudson strait, which is a good many miles from the bay.

Mr. DUFF: How can you get into the bay unless you pass through the strait?

Mr. BANCROFT: I did not understand the hon. gentleman was arguing that.

Mr. DUFF: I do not quite understand what my hon. friend is driving at. I am saying that the ice conditions were such that these steamers were jammed there for a considerable time, whether it was in the Hudson bay or the Hudson strait.

Mr. FORKE: It is the strait.

Mr. DUFF: What difference does it make? The steamer must pass through the strait before it gets to the bay.

Mr. IRVINE: Unless it comes in on the railroad.

Mr. DUFF: I did not quite catch my hon. friend's remark. Captain Anderson goes on:

On the following morning, Monday, 20th July, a move was attempted, but with little success, as it was not safe to try and force a passage in such heavy ice and so closely packed.

Mr. MARTELL: Was not the steamer Bonaventure that is referred to formerly a Newfoundland sealing boat specially constructed for ice conditions?

Mr. DUFF: It belonged to the Newfoundland sealing fleet and was sold to the Department of Railways and Canals for the special purpose of trying to get into Hudson bay. Here is another extract:

From this date until the 30th of the month—July—the ship was more or less hemmed in by the ice pack, which apparently extended to the land. Though able to make an occasional move of a few miles, there was little gain as the southerly Arctic current would carry the ship back again.

The general position was about forty miles off shore and sixty miles S.E. of cape Chidley. During a gale from the south-east, considerable swell entered the ice pack and made a very uncomfortable berth with huge pans of ice bumping and scraping against the sides of the ship, however, we finally succeeded in securing the ship to a large pan in such a way as to afford protection to the propeller and rudder.

Although no serious mishap took place, minor damages were received. A leak developed in the forepeak tank, necessitating pumping out frequently, and the shell plates were much dented especially at the turn of the bow, breaking connection inside and causing leaks, but we were lucky enough to get them stopped up.

I need not read any more but I may be—

Mr. MILLAR: Would my hon. friend give the summing up of Captain Anderson?

Mr. DUFF: When I come to it. But it will be a long time before I do reach it if I read all the paragraphs I have marked here. What I was going to say was this: In addition to this report and these photographs showing the ice conditions in Hudson strait and Hudson bay it is also a fact that during the very months when the hon. member for Prince Albert and the hon. member for Nelson said that navigation was feasible, they have very heavy fogs there. This fog is caused, as hon. members no doubt know, by the atmosphere being warmer than the ice. with the result that it would be very dangerous for steamers to try to navigate either the straits or the bay even if there was very little ice; the fog is so thick that you cannot, perhaps, see any more than the length of the steamer, and no steamship captain would dare to let his vessel go ahead at very much speed in the effort to navigate this channel. So I say, for that reason, in addition to the ice, the conditions are such that no shipping man would want to charter any boats to go into Hudson strait or Hudson bay.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Would the hon. member say that the fogs in Hudson bay and Hudson strait are any more dangerous than they are on the southern coast of Newfoundland?

Mr. DUFF: I cannot answer my hon. friend's question. I do however know what the Newfoundland fogs are like. All I know is that Captain Anderson in his report says that fogs are very heavy there sometimes. I do not care whether it is only for one day, or for the whole season, the fact is that in Hudson bay and Hudson strait they have fogs, ice, and gales. Consequently, these conditions do not make satisfactory reasons for shipping men or such as to cause them to feel justified in chartering vessels either to go into Hudson bay or out of it.

Now, I need not quote any further from these reports. My hon. friends can see these reports, they can read them for themselves —I refer to the reports from 1911 down to 1915, every one of the reports made by Captain Anderson. I think a reading of these reports will convince every man who has some knowledge of the sea that no shipping company, or no captain, would want to take a chance of going into Hudson bay to load cargoes if he could get freights elsewhere.

Let me say to my hon. friends opposite that although I speak this way, I would be very glad indeed if the Hudson bay route in the opinion of competent men was found to be feasible and for this reason: It would open up a new route for shipping, would give cargo boats more business and in the present depressed state of shipping it would be an excellent thing for the people who own shipping, whether they are steamers or sailing vessels.

Mr. KNOX: Does my hon. friend think he is fair in quoting exclusively from the reports of Captain Anderson and ignoring the reports presented to the committee and upon which they founded their conclusions submitted to the Senate?

Mr. DUFF: I may say in answer to my hon. friend that the reason I am only quoting from one report is that I do not want to take up too much time to-day. Moreover, I do not think it would help the case of my hon. friend if I did quote from other reports. For instance, I think it was my hon. friend (Mr. Knox) who quoted the opinion of the former Minister of Railways, Mr. Cochrane, "that the strait and the bay could be kept open by means of wireless telegraph." Now, I would like to know how either the strait or the bay could be kept open by that means.

Mr. KNOX: Would it not be an aid to navigation?

Mr. DUFF: I understand that a certain amount of electricity would—

Mr. KNOX: Would it not be an aid to navigation?

Mr. DUFF: I cannot see how the wireless would be an aid to navigation either at the terminals or at Port Nelson when a vessel was off cape Chidley or half way in the strait trying to make her way through the ice. You could not put a wireless station out on a pan of ice so as to be of any use to a vessel between Port Nelson and cape Chidley.

Mr. KNOX: It would not be necessary to do that. We have islands in the straits. The strait is five hundred miles long and between thirty-five and one hundred miles wide and one of these islands could be used for the purpose.

Mr. DUFF: If the dimensions given by my hon. friend are true one of these islands would not be of very much use; a tower many hundred feet high would have to be erected in order to look out over the ice and see whether there was ice or open water so as to advise steamers coming round cape Chidley.

Mr. BIRD: I quoted an incident showing that an ice breaker was stuck in the ice at the eastern end of the strait and at the same time the Sheba had a clear passage all the way through. In that case a radio would have been of service in pointing out the open channel.

Mr. DUFF: I may say to my hon. friend that I had a similar experience when a ship that I was on board of, called the Greenland was caught in the ice one spring and had to stay there for thirty-two days with a catch of seals on board. Only about ten miles away there was open water and other vessels were able to get through. They saw our predicament and when they got home reported that we were stuck fast in the ice without any seals. That was the case in regard to the vessels of which he speaks. There may be a lead or channel of open water through the ice caused by the wind or the current where vessels can pass. Not far away other vessels may be caught fast in the ice. But let me tell my hon. friend that no shipping man is going to send his vessel into Hudson bay if he is likely to meet with that danger.

Mr. BIRD: Does my hon. friend apply his statement to the early part of July or to the whole of the period I have referred to?

Mr. DUFF: This investigation showed the conditions in different months—in July, August and September. The hon. member spoke about the experience of the Minto. I would advise him, if he wants some information about Hudson bay and Hudson strait, to consult Captain John Reid who was commander of the Minto when she was in Hudson bay. Captain Reid has enlarged photographs showing the exact conditions in Hudson bay and Hudson strait during the period he was there. Looking at these photographs any reasonable man will be convinced that the navigation of either the bay or the strait under such conditions is a very difficult proposition. I repeat that I am not opposed to this route if it can be shown to be practicable and would be glad if I could get evidence showing that it is feasible. We have not all the information that we should have on this project and for that reason I would suggest to the government that they should make further inquiry before spending any more money on it. From the financial standpoint I think it would be unwise—and I am sure my hon. friends from the West will agree with me—to spend any large sum of money in continuing the railway to Port Nelson, or in the building of terminals, or the construction of steamers, to open this route, until we are possessed of further information. Before spending any further large sums of money parliament and the government should go very slowly in this matter.

What I would suggest, in fairness to my hon. friends from the West who desire to secure a fresh outlet for the grain and other commodities of the West is commendable, is that parliament should ask the government to have a proper survey made of the whole field both with regard to the railway to Hudson bay and the terminals there, and with regard to the feasibility of the navigation of the bay and strait. I would suggest that practical men such as Captain Reid, Captain

Bob Bartlett, and other men who have spent many years in the Arctic, should be asked to go up there, stay one or two years, and make proper surveys, inquiring into the whole situation and investigating the advisability and the feasibility of this route. In that way the government would get information that we have not got now. I know practically nothing about the project except what I have read and what I have heard from Captain Bartlett, and others, who have voyaged for years in the Arctic and worked in the Hudson bay, and who have made statements to me which I have given to the House this afternoon. I would suggest that before spending any further large sums of money qualified engineers and qualified seamen, used to Arctic work should go up there and make a thorough inquiry into the whole situation, and then report to the government. Then it will be possible for us to discuss the matter in an intelligent manner. At present we cannot do this.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): I am glad the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) closed his speech in the manner in which he did. He admitted that he did not know the exact facts of the case. Nevertheless, he maintained that it was unnecessary to go any further into the matter as he was already satisfied that the strait was closed the whole year round. My hon. friend added that he had the results of investigations to prove it. Now, if his contentions are correct I do not see why this debate should proceed any further.

I think perhaps he is right in saying that a very close study of this question should be made by the members of this House. Perhaps the members more directly interested in the matter have already made considerable study of the whole question, and for many years it has been described on the one side as a route feasible and on the other side as a route very difficult, but I have never until to-day heard the statement made that at no time of the year was the route feasible. I have always understood that there was no doubt about at least two months of the year. I had the privilege of looking over a great many charts not very long ago, comparing the voyages of the boats in and out, from Sydney and other eastern ports to Hudson bay, and I did not find in any one of these charts any great difficulty at any time—in fact no difficulty during two months or so. I believe it is correct to say that the Hudson bay route is feasible for at least two months of the year. The question then would be: Is it a feasible or a right project to go on with this work on the supposition that we have only navigation for two months in the year? It has been discussed pro and con for a great many years. I would like to read a short extract from a speech delivered in 1908 by Sir Wilfrid Laurier at Niagara Falls, where he stated:

> We have undertaken the construction of another railway, the Hudson bay railway. We have come to the conclusion that the time to build this railway is now, not to-morrow, but now.

That is a long time ago. On September 22, 1908, the Hon. Clifford Sifton, now Sir Clifford Sifton, speaking at Brandon, said:

> Now we come to the latest development and indeed the best is still to come. The prime minister proposes to build for these provinces the Hudson Bay Railway. (Loud cheers). That pronouncement was a very material factor in inducing me to become a candidate for this constituency in this election, because I felt, and feel now, that the time has come when we men from the west have succeeded in proving that a Hudson bay railway is no mere chimera—no foolish project, but one which the people of the West are bound to see carried into effect, and the time to do it is now.

Fifteen years ago the people of Canada and of the West were convinced that it was no mere chimera, that it was a feasible project, and now we find ourselves debating as seriously as ever the question as to whether the project should be carried on or given up. When we realize that two different governments have investigated this project, have pronounced it feasible, and have declared that it should be carried on, that its completion was only deferred on account of war conditions, that $20,000,000 has already been spent upon it, is it reasonable that we should now come to the conclusion that the work should be stopped and that nothing more should be done?

It has been discussed again and again by the public men and parliaments of this country, both Dominion and provincial. The matter has been so well discussed and so well placed before the House by the mover (Mr. Knox) and the seconder (Mr. Bird) that I really cannot add very much to what has been said. However, I would like to point out again the necessity of some other outlet than the one which we have at present for the products of the western provinces. It is needless for me to repeat, but I sometimes think cannot be too often repeated, that we will have tremendous resorces in those western provinces when they are properly developed. We have realized during recent years the difficulties and disadvantages from which we suffer on account of being located in the centre of the continent, where transportation has become the one great problem which we must and shall overcome. It seems to me that the Hudson bay route as an alternative outlet for our products will to a very large extent solve our transportation difficulties. Not only will it be an outlet but it will be a competing outlet for our produce to the sea, bringing into line the other routes and the interests that control the other outlets.

It has been pointed out by the seconder, and I think also by the mover of the resolution, that Canada has suffered no loss through the building of the Hudson bay railway. Too often we hear repeated what the East has done for the West. I do not like that kind of argument, because I do not believe there is very much in it. Most of the money that has ever been invested in the West has been at so much per cent, and I hope the interest has been paid most of the time. When we come to deal with the building of railways I think we will find that the railways of the West have been largely financed from the values that have accrued through the building of the railways in the West, and the Hudson bay railway at the present time, as far as I can understand the situation, has not cost this country very much, because the land that has been set aside for that purpose has met the demands made in this respect. So that from a financial point of view we have not suffered very much in the building of the Hudson bay railway up to the present time.

It has been pointed out that the natural outlet to the western provinces has been to the south of us. Those of us who live in the West realize that fact, but I think we are good enough Canadians to say that if we can possibly make things go along successfully, we are prepared to do anything we possibly can to develop a national feeling and a national business within ourselves. We appreciate to a very large extent anything that would tend to develop trade between Great Britain and Canada, which I claim would be of great benefit both to Canada and Great Britain.

Now the opening up of this suggested route, should it be feasible—and I believe it is—would do a great deal towards solving one of the great problems we have in the West at the present time. Agriculturists who have studied the situation in the West, and who know the conditions as they exist, are pretty well convinced that the salvation of our western provinces will be in the development of the live stock industry. I know very well that for a great many years to come wheat will be the principal export value that will be produced in these western prairie provinces. Not only that, Mr. Speaker, but I believe the public debt will have to be paid to a very large extent by the produce of those same western provinces, and that the wheat will play a very large part in paying that debt. Nevertheless from experience we are finding out that, in order to carry on agriculture successfully, there must be diversified farming, and there must be a rating of live stock. The transportation of live stock to the sea by a long railway haul is a much more difficult problem than the hauling of grain, and if we could make it possible to export cattle by the Hudson bay route, I believe we would be going a long way towards solving a great many of the difficulties in the way of the development of agriculture in the western prairie provinces.

I should like to point out to the eastern people that the eastern agricultural interests can well supply all eastern wants in that direction. That is one of the unfortunate situations of the western people. I do not care what interests you have in the East, you know very well that the eastern provinces are quite capable of supplying all the agricultural needs of any industries you are likely to have in the East for many years to come, and the western provinces are impressed with the fact that they have to find a market outside for their products.

I hope hon. members of this House will look upon this situation sympathetically and will not dismiss it without consideration. I have heard round the corridors of this House, almost with a laugh, the question: "I suppose you are going to bring up the Hudson Bay railway question"? I want these gentlemen not to dismiss the matter without giving it the attention it deserves. If it can be shown that the project is impracticable, then by all means we do not want the Hudson Bay railway. I would qualify that, however, by saying that I believe the completion of the railway would in itself be a feasible thing, even though the development of the bay should not go on. As the mover of this resolution has said, the road would be a colonization road, and the completing of the line would be something well worth doing, something which would contribute to the development of northern Manitoba. We do not want money spent foolishly; we want the question decided on its merits. But I do believe there will never be contentment in the West; never will the western people be satisfied, until that railway has been completed and the question has been decided by actual experience. It has been demonstrated conclusively that the route is feasible, because the charts in the department show that vessels have made the trip back and forth time and again without encountering ice at all

I met the proprietor of a magazine not long ago and he told me he was going to publish photographs which were similar to the ones the member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) was displaying this afternoon. Well, they never appeared in the magazine; I suppose he got a little more knowledge of the subject and thought it just as well not to publish them, at least for the present. I have no doubt that there will be abnormal ice conditions up there at times and if you are anxious to do so you can get photographs that will present the matter in a very unfavourable light. Anybody who knows anything about the northern seas —and I know the hon. member for Lunenburg knows about ice floes and all that sort of thing —will realize that the conditions vary a great deal. I do not think we need take seriously the hon. gentleman's little joke about melting the ice with electricity, but it is possible that a great many difficulties that were formerly considered insuperable may under modern conditions be easily overcome. By the use of electrical appliances, aerial inventions, beacons, buoys, and so on, navigation into the harbour at least can, perhaps, be made perfectly safe.

So far as dredging in the bay is concerned, I do not think dredging has been very extensively carried on. The information I have is to the effect that what has been dredged has remained clear; so that these difficulties may be very easily overcome. I know it is difficult to get within quite a number of miles of where the harbour would be, but that area has been charted and the investigations already made no doubt point to a solution of the difficulty in that respect. It would surprise hon. members who have not gone into the question to find what a large amount of data the department has accumulated in this connection. It would well repay the attention of those who have not investigated the conditions to find out just what they are to-day. I had an opportunity of seeing the photographs to which reference has been made, and a great many more, and quite a number of them are favourable to the proposed route, indicating, as they do, that the bay is open for a great many months of the year.

I do not wish to take up any more of the time of the House; other hon. members are very much better posted than I am in regard to the conditions that exist in Hudson bay. Of course the difficulty is not in the bay, but in the straits; the great question to decide is how far the straits are navigable. I have not discussed the matter with the mover and the seconder of the resolution but I think it would be well to go a little carefully at first, and to that end a thorough investigation would be in order. I do think, however, that the government should at least complete the railway to the bay and put us in a position to obtain more accurate information along these lines. I hope that the matter will not be dropped without further investigation and without a decision to complete the construction of the line to the bay.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): Mr. Speaker, I am thoroughly in sympathy with the proposal that has been made. My view of this matter is that Canada is committed to the early construction of the Hudson Bay railway. The boast of Great Britain in connection with her war debt to the United States—and it was expressed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer the other day—has been that England keeps her word and pays her debts. Just as seriously have we committed ourselves to the people of the West to build this road. We voted the money, and for the psychological reason alone, if for nothing else; if only to put heart into the people of the West we ought to complete it. But I can give another reason, and it has been advanced this afternoon. The opening up of that country would result in the road paying for itself. There would be made available the most valuable mineralized area in the world. Ontario to-day has a road within 120 miles of Hudson bay, and it is the intention of the province to complete that line to the bay this year. One of their reasons for doing it is to open up the northern portion of Ontario, a district, which, sloping down to the bay, has much good land and much valuable timber. A fine fishing industry can be worked up in Hudson bay, and a traffic in fur can be carried on. Power can be developed on the rivers on the Hudson bay slope and made available to the mines that have been opened up in that part of Ontario —the most marvellous mines in the world. The territory in Quebec adjacent to Hudson bay is equally rich, if we are to believe the reports of the geologists who have made investigations there; and the same applies to portions of Manitoba. The hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) quoted from the remarks of the president of the Canadian Institute of Mining and Metallurgy, who pointed out that that pre-Cambrian shield was the richest mineral area on the whole face of the globe. The successes in Cobalt and Porcupine are such as to justify the completion of this line on its own account. I believe there is enough power on that Hudson bay slope to drive all our locomotives on the Canadian National between Winnipeg and Montreal, and to meet the needs of all the mines and pulp mills in that district. Besides, employment would be furnished to large numbers of people and opportunities for settlement would be afforded.

For these reasons and many others I could give, I say we should complete that road. The amount involved would not be very great, and the experiment is worth making, if only in order that we may keep our word. The main source of the money expended on that road has been the public lands of the West. The West is therefore security for it, and there certainly will be just as much local traffic over that road to Hudson bay, altogether apart from any consideration of sea traffic, as has followed from the development of the Northern Ontario and Temiskaming road. That is almost the best piece of railroad in Ontario to-day, although when it was first projected everyone declared that it was a mere chimera, that there was nothing in it for the province or for those who put their money into it. That part of the country is one of the best sections of the Dominion to-day; it is the best country in the world for men to go to, whether they have capital or are seeking labour. It is the best market in America for labour at the present time, because the demand for men for the mines cannot be supplied. And it may be a great coal country; we shall probably get anthracite there if we are to believe what some of the geologists tell us. But at all events there are great coal and timber resources in that part of the country, and there is also a good chance for farming.

One thing, however, is lacking; and for some reason or other this parliament is reluctant to keep its word. Why should we not keep our word and complete that road? I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the government will see its way to complete this railway, and I hope that before this debate closes the Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) will announce on behalf of the administration that it is the intention to carry out the contracts that were made, first by Sir Wilfrid Laurier and then by the Conservative government. I do not know whether the Union government was committed to the undertaking, but certainly this House has pledged its word in the matter; and the people of Canada want to see the road completed. The people of Ontario, the people of Manitoba, and the people of the West generally are anxious to have the work carried through, because they see in the completion of the road some hope of relief from the excessive freight rates that have obtained in the past. The western people hope for some relief from the opening up of the Vancouver route, in conjunction with the Panama canal, as an outlet for the grain of the West. And we in Ontario wish to see the waterways between Port Arthur and the Atlantic, by way of the St. Lawrence and the canals, improved as another outlet for the products of the West. We must try all these things and make various experiments, because the providing of more outlets for our products is a vital necessity.

And here let me say a word for the National Railways. The greatest asset Canada has to-day is its national railways. These railways have not done their best; they have done their worst so far. But a new and better management is perhaps coming into operation, and the men now in charge will be held responsible for a genuine attempt to solve the grievances of the West in so far as the railways can do so. Up to the present this has not been done; there is rather too much delay in putting the National Railways to the work they are capable of doing. Certainly a reasonable time should be given the new board to organize. But after all we want results; and I have no doubt as to what the National Railways will be able to do if they are properly managed. There is not a better railway in the world; and I will say, to the credit of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, although I do not know where he got the inspiration, that the greatest branch of the National Railways to-day is that line running form Winnipeg to Quebec. It is on the top of a great plain and has a two-fifths grade; and the part of the country through which it runs is rich in agricultural possibilities and in mining. It is a fine country in every way, and the railway from Winnipeg to Quebec is one of the best pieces of railway we have on the Canadian National. No matter what we do with the waterways, this line from Winnipeg to Quebec is one of the solutions of the grievances of the western farmers. These farmers have two real grievances, one in regard to transportation, and the other the fact that they are debarred from the great American market. Whether in the new and broader view that mankind is inclined to take of some of these problems that have arisen since the war, this impediment will be removed, I do not know. There seems, however, a possibility of better relations between the people of the United States and those of Canada, although I do not say that there is. At any rate, there is a better feeling growing up between English-speaking people generally. On the whole, therefore, I do not despair of the future of the Canadian West, but this parliament must help them in the present situation; and I will give what little support I can to this proposition. Canada owes it as a duty to carry out this work, because the country has been pledged to it. The government is committed, not so much to further investigations as to a completion of the work that has been undertaken.

If we do that work the West will have no great grievance against this parliament, except that we must also do what we can to develop the port of Vancouver and our waterways. We must go after the railways, both the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railways, and try to find out, either by experiment or by litigation, what justification there is for these abnormal charges that have obtained in the West. This parliament, too, or the Railway Commission, or whatever body has jurisdiction in the matter, must get after the shipping profiteers on the upper lakes. I do not know anything more discreditable in the history of America than these abnormal freight charges which have been put into force since the war by the people who control the shipping on the upper lakes and on the St. Lawrence. Every concession which the railways have given to the western people has always been absorbed in shipping charges. There seems to be, I was almost going to say, an infamous understanding between the two. Perhaps there is a quiet "divvy"; I do not know whether that is so or not. The fact, however, is that there have been unfair charges levied by the shipowners and the railways. We have got after the railways in an endeavour to obtain reductions and we must get after these other people as well. The main thing is to put heart into the people of the West by building this railway which they require. If we do I feel confident that substantial results will accrue to the people who live in the western provinces and who to-day ask this parliament for relief in various ways. I hope that this parliament will give them that relief not only in regard to transportation but in regard to reasonable banking facilities, and possibly the improved credit which has come to the United States in the last two or three years might also come to the people of the west of Canada. I shall therefore have much satisfaction in supporting the motion. Still greater satisfaction will it be to me if the government make good the pledge of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and complete this experiment —even if it is only an experiment—and so keep faith with the people of the western provinces.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. C. C. DAVIES (North Battleford): In rising to support the resolution moved by my hon. friend for Prince Albert (Mr. Knox) it is not my intention to deal at any great length with the subject. I understand that there are a number of other speakers who will have something to say on this question, and it would not be fair to them if I made any extended remarks at this moment. But the question of transportation, and especially the question of the early completion of the Hudson Bay railway, is of such vital importance to the agriculturalists of western Canada that I feel I should be remiss in my duty if I did not in my poor way try to add something to this debate.

Public opinion in the West has been practically unanimous upon this subject for very many years. I remember when I first came to this country over twenty years ago how the Hudson Bay railway was dangled as a bait to the settlers in the West, and it seems almost inconceivable to me that after twenty-three years we are debating in this House of Commons the question whether this is a feasible route or not. From the beginning of this year the question has been discussed in practically every public assembly in western Canada. Unanimous resolutions have been passed by all the great farmers' organizations in western Canada, and by the board of trade of practically every city and town of importance in that part of the country. During the past few weeks the question has been thoroughly discussed in the legislature of Manitoba and the legislature of Saskatchewan, where unanimous resolutions have been passed pressing this government to complete the Hudson bay route as early as possible.

I wonder if hon. members who represent the eastern part of Canada ever realize the vital importance of the question of transportation to the western farmer. We in western Canada have a great problem to solve: how to raise our agricultural products and place them on the markets of the world in open competition with agriculturalists from every other part of the world, situated as we are fifteen hundreds miles away from a seaport. That is the question we have to solve in western Canada, and it can be solved if we open up the Hudson bay route. The problem of transportation in relation to the distribution of agricultural products is of vital interest to western Canada, and a route which brings us one thousand miles nearer the sea is a route which must receive the earnest consideration of this government.

I listened with very great interest to the speech this afternoon of the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) and I was pleased to note the warm feeling of sympathy that he manifested towards the western farmer. I have noticed before that a number of members on the government benches are willing to show us very great sympathy in some of these projects which are of such importance to the farmers of western Canada, but I would say to them that a little practical help is worth a great deal of sympathy, and at this time if they will support this project which we believe will help to solve the agricultural problems of western Canada, it will perhaps be better than showing us quite so much sympathy.

The statement has been made on the floor of this House a number of times this year that when the economic chaos in Europe rights itself once more, the price of our agricultural products will be enhanced. I cannot subscribe to that doctrine. I do not think the price of agricultural products will go up in Europe, and consequently they will not go up here. Wheat in the Old Country markets is above normal value. Beef and meat products are away above normal value in the Old Country markets. Butter is 100 per cent above normal value at the present time, and if our agricultural products are to compete in the European markets we must reduce the cost of production and the cost of transportation. The question before us is the question of reducing the cost of transportation. We have to compete with the other nations of the world who are not under the physical and geographical handicap that we settlers in western Canada have to contend with. We are in competition with the Argentine with its peon labour, with its short railway haul, and no expensive handling system. We are in competition with India, with practically slave labour, and no long railway haul. We are in competition with Australia, with its fringe of agricultural land around the coast, and with a twelve months working season. We have also to compete with Denmark and other European countries which are rapidly coming back to normal, and I say that if we are to build up in this country a permanent agricultural policy which will leave the farmers something over the cost of production, then this question of the Hudson bay route is of vital importance to us.

I am not going to talk about the feasibility of the route for very long, but I should like to bring to the attention of hon. members a report which was issued by the Manitoba government in the year 1884. I am taking that year because in those days the various aids to navigation in the matter of buoys and so forth, the depth of vessels and their strength, were not nearly so perfect as they are to-day. If, as far back as 1884, practical men who had great experience in navigating these northern waters said that the route was a feasible one, how much more feasible should it be at the present time in view of the perfection that has been reached in the construction of ocean-going vessels? Now, I want to read a few extracts from the report to which I have referred. Dr. Bell, director of the Canadian Geological Survey, who made five voyages through the straits, stated that the straits are: "Navigable from middle of June to middle of November. Captain Chisby, of New London, Conn., who has had fourteen years' experience in these waters, stated that "the straits are navigable for four months and often five." Captain William Kennedy, who acompanied an expedition in search of the remains of Sir John Franklin, and who had had eight years' experience of the straits, declared that the straits are navigable "from June to November."

Captain William Pritchard, who was in the Hudson's Bay Company's service for 39 years, reported as follows:

> The straits never freeze; there is no reason why steamships should not navigate at any time.

He also said:

> The icebergs seen in Hudson's straits in August and September would form no great barrier to navigation, nor do those met with off the straits of Belle Isle, nor were they more numerous in Hudson's straits than they frequently are off Belle Isle.

Further on in his evidence, he stated:

> Steam has now effected a complete revolution in ice navigation and the most advantageous time for pushing on is when the ice is loose.
> Under similar circumstances a sailing ship would be utterly helpless. It is therefore only reasonable to infer that what has been performed regularly and year after year by sailing ships can be accomplished with greater regularity and certainty by well-constructed steamers, especially built for ice navigation and provided with powerful machinery.

The legislature of the province of Manitoba appointed a select standing committee in 1884 to procure evidence and report upon the practicability of establishing a system of communication via Hudson bay. After taking the evidence of a number of men, with thorough knowledge of the subject, the committee say in their report:

> Many of the gentlemen examined have had personal and extended experience as officers and servants of the Hudson's Bay Company at their ports on Hudson and Ungava bays. No evidence has been given that goes to prove that Hudson straits and bay proper freeze over or that the ice met with in these waters is sufficient to prevent navigation at any time of the year; that consequently the period of navigation is defined by the time during which the ports, harbours, or roadsteads on the shores of the bay can be entered by vessels of a suitable description for such navigation.

From the evidence adduced it appears that such ports or harbours are open on an average from four and a half to five months in each year to ordinary vessels.

The latest report that we have had on the subject, that of the Senate of Canada, declares that the route is a feasible route and that in time it will be profitable.

I said a moment ago that I first heard of the Hudson Bay railway when I came to this country over twenty-three years ago. I well remember how, in the first general election in Canada of which I have any knowledge, that of 1908, speakers on behalf of Liberal candidates made a number of statements at that time referring to the Hudson Bay railway. They pointed to the courageous manner in which the late Liberal chieftain, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, had made his announcement in the town of Welland, Ontario, that the Liberal government of that day were going to build this railway. When the Conservative party came into power in the year 1911 they took up the question of the Hudson Bay railway and began to carry it to completion. I cannot conceive that the Liberal government in 1908 would undertake such a work as this without full and complete investigation. Neither can I believe that the Conservative party, when they came into power, would carry on such a work without a very exhaustive investigation as to the possibilities of this route. Engineers were sent out by both governments. Both governments proclaimed that the Hudson Bay railway was a feasible route and that they were going to carry it to completion. I know, Mr. Speaker, that sometimes in the West we hear it said, in regard to the completion of the Hudson Bay railway, that both parties were playing politics, and that the project was simply a bait used at election time to obtain the votes of the western people. I cannot, Mr. Speaker, subscribe to that idea either. I do not believe that our governments and our statesmen have sunk so low in this country that they would willingly spend $20,000,000 of western money in order to bribe the electors of western Canada. I believe that both governments came to the definite conclusion that this route was a feasible one and determined to carry out the work.

I would like now, for a moment or two, to discuss the question of the financing of this railway because I know that it is not generally understood in the West—or in the East either for that matter—how the financing of the Hudson Bay railway was undertaken. It has been understood that the whole of Canada had been financing the Hudson Bay railway. The facts, however, are as follows: In the year 1908, when the Dominion Lands Act was brought before parliament, provision was made whereby homesteads, or second homesteads and pre-emptions were set apart, a large area of land in western Canada being selected for the purpose, and the proceeds of the sale of this land were to be devoted to the financing of the Hudson Bay railway. Under the statute of 1908 approximately 8,050,720 acres of land have already been sold, the revenue derived therefrom being $24,152,160, and the whole of this amount has not yet been spent. There are 2,500,000 acres at the present time which have not been paid for in full. You will see, therefore, that practically the whole of the revenue devoted to the building of the Hudson Bay railway came from the lands of the West. It is western land that is paying for this road, and there are enough homesteads or second homesteads and pre-emptions still in the West to yield sufficient revenue for the completion of the project.

I would like to quote here as an additional authority on this matter, what was said during the session of 1912-13 by a former Minister of the Interior, Hon Mr. Oliver. As reported at page 10951 of Hansard, Mr. Oliver said:

The question has been raised here in regard to the cost of this railway, the charge upon the treasury. Some years ago the principle of pre-emptions was introduced into the western country, with the understanding that the fund accruing from the sale of pre-emptions would be considered as an extra source of revenue from which the Hudson bay railway might be constructed. There was no ear-marking of money received. When the policy of the sale of pre-emptions was introduced, it was introduced with the understanding that a new source of revenue was being created, which would relieve the general treasury from the cost of the Hudson bay railway. Therefore, the treasury of Canada is not finding the money for building the railway. It is the land of the Northwest and the price that is being paid for that land that is building the Hudson bay railway. Enough money is being taken out of pre-emptions of the West to pay for that railway.

Again in the year 1901, during a discussion in Committee of Supply, the following question was put by Mr. Lake, the representative of a western constituency at that time, and replied to by the hon. gentleman who is now Acting Minister of Railways.

Mr. Lake: It was understood by this House I think that the money to be expended on the construction of the Hudson bay railway was to come from a special fund to be created by the sale of pre-emptions?

Mr. Graham: Yes.

I would like to take up the question of the Hudson Bay railway and the branch lines, which was referred to by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Knox) in his speech this afternoon. When men who are in authority in the West are questioned upon the feasibility of the Hudson Bay railway, they always sheer off from the main question, and ask "which would you rather have, the Hudson Bay railway on branch line railways?" We know, Mr. Speaker, that branch line railways are vitally necessary to western Canada, but I claim there is no connection whatever between them. This special vote, as I showed a moment ago, was created for the purpose of building the Hudson Bay railway. It is a national undertaking and has nothing to do with the branch line construction.

I notice by the Estimates that we are going to spend $11,800,000 this year for the Welland canal. I claim it would be just as right and fair for us, and for hon. members who oppose the Hudson Bay railway, or who advocate branch lines in lieu of the Hudson Bay railway, to argue that we should cut down the estimates for the Welland canal. I noticed last year the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) took that side of the question, but when the question of a grant of $8,000,000 for the Welland canal was proposed, I observed the Minister of Agriculture had nothing whatever to say about branch line construction. I think he still holds that view. When the vote for $11,800,000 for the Welland canal comes before the House, I at least expect him to move for a very substantial reduction in that item.

I have the honour to represent a constituency in the northwestern part of Saskatchewan which is one of the finest mixed farming constituencies in Canada. There is no doubt about that. It lends itself to immigration. Large tracts of land are waiting for the settler, and I think the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart), if he would look over that country and see the land that we have there ready for settlement, would immediately become a very strong advocate of the building of the Hudson Bay railway, because it would be of very great assistance to him in bringing in new settlers. We must have a shorter outlet for our wheat, our live stock and dairy produce—the products of the farm. If the western farmer is to continue to place his products in the markets of the world in open competition with the products of all the countries of the world, having to buy all the commodities which enter into the cost of production on his farm, he cannot under present conditions succeed, but it would certainly be a vast help to the western farmer if the Hudson bay project were completed. If vessels were sailing out of Hudson bay with cattle, dairy products and wheat, and if it were only possible for the government to increase the British preference, so that the vessels coming back to Hudson bay could bring back a return cargo, it would have a very great bearing on the freight rate we would have to pay. I agree with the hon. member for Prince Albert and every other western member in the House, that we have a great country and a great heritage in western Canada. I am not pessimistic. The West does not breed pessimists. I believe if we had a fair field and no favour, if the government would assist us and complete the Hudson Bay railway, western Canada would yet become what we always conceived it was designed by nature to be, the granary of the Empire.

Mr. WILLIS KEITH BALDWIN (Stanstead): I cannot believe that politics have been played by either the Liberal or the Conservative party in undertaking such a vast construction as the Hudson Bay railway. I have listened to the speeches and I have not heard anything in this House in opposition to the proposition, as the hon. member who has just resumed his seat has suggested. The member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) has referred to the climatic conditions and has spoken of the ice which is to be found in the Hudson strait. Considering that so much money has been spent on this undertaking, I am going to say frankly, without hedging, that if I understand the amount that is to be spent on this railway, I am in favour of it, because I understand this railway has been graded and the rails are now there, and it would be a great waste not to open up a country that has such vast possibilities. The natural resources of this country have been mentioned in this debate, and I think it would be well worth while to construct the line, if we only got to the navigable part of the river, which I understand is about 30 miles from the end of the rails already laid.

I cannot believe that this railway would hurt Port Arthur, at the head of the Great Lakes, or would injure the railways of this country. Quite the contrary. I believe you cannot benefit one part of the great Dominion of Canada without helping the whole country. The member for South York (Mr. Maclean) has said that Ontario has a railway within 130 miles of—he said Hudson bay, although, I think he meant James bay. In looking at the map I see our Transcontinental railway, running from Quebec to Winnipeg, runs within 250 or 300 miles of the south end of James bay. I will be glad when the province of Ontario has completed that railway, and I likewise will be glad when the great province of Quebec, builds a railway to James bay. Hudson bay has more than 3,000 miles of shore line; we may call it an inland sea, for I believe, according to the scale, it is the largest bay on the map of the world. Practically a thousand miles of the province of Quebec borders on Hudson bay; in Ontario we have 500 miles and in Manitoba more than 500; then there is the great district of Keewatin. People living to the south of us wonder why Canada has not struck out into its vast interior country. The amount it woud take to complete the railway is surely not a ponderous sum. I am emphatically in favour of the Hudson Bay railway because it would conduce to interprovincial trade. It is sometimes difficult for us to get a proper perspective of these things. We are asking immigrants to come here but we have not developed more thant one-tenth of the vast area which comprises the Dominion. Are we always going to be picayune, small in our conceptions of things? If we are to get people to come to our country we must do big things. We must let the world know that Canada is a country of vigorous people who are ready to take any reasonable step that will lead to its fuller development. The great barrier that is in the way of action of this kind, of course, is our vast debt, and more particularly is that true because of the fact that our railroads have been the cause of much of our present taxation. I wonder what my own constituents will think of my standing here to-night and advocating the extension of railways at this time. Well, I can justify my attitude by saying that we have already spent $20,000,000 on this project; that we have a road bed; that we have the rails laid on a great part of the line, though it is true that the ties are rotten. By making a further small expenditure at this time we can open up that great interior with all its possibilities. And it is an interesting fact that north of the territory through which this line runs lies nearly one-half the area of the province of Manitoba. Mr. Speaker, I am entirely in accord with the resolution.

Mr. D. W. WARNER (Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, in discussing this resolution I wish to take occasion to present to the House a new idea. It is unnecessary for me to try to establish the feasibility of that route; that has already been done. I have been somewhat interested in the matter; I have taken note of the facts, and I am convinced that the evidence of its feasibility is beyond question. I would like to point out, however, that we have modern steamships which go where sailing vessels formerly could not. But with regard to the length of time during which navigation is possible on that route, I think there is more to be said than has been stated here to-day. I believe we can use the Hudson bay route during a longer period throughout the year than we can use the Great Lakes. In those parts of the world where ice conditions have to be overcome, ice-breakers are maintained to keep navigation open the year round, and they operate in ice to the depth of four feet. Salt water will not freeze as readily or as firmly as fresh water. I have just been reading of Mr. Stefansson's explorations in the north, and he tells us that the thickest ice he ever encountered, frozen in one season, was six feet. It has been represented here to-day by the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) that ice in Hudson bay freezes to the depth of eight feet in one season. Well, I do not see how the ice there could be so much heavier than the ice a thousand miles or more to the north, in the areas explored by Stefansson. We have evidence however, that will offset any argument of that kind, especially when that argument is brought forward by one who claims he does not know anything about it.

I am convinced that the straits are navigable for at least four months in the year, during which time we can be shipping our grain out in that way. That is important. The part of the country in which I live is as good as can be found anywhere else in Canada; so far as productiveness is concerned I would not exchange it for any other part of the world that I have any knowledge of. Our climatic conditions and our soil are such that there is a possibility of production beyond the imagination of the Canadian people—that is, if all the land is used. I am not going to lay much stress on what we want for the future; it is what we need now that counts. We do need that outlet; we are producing in such amounts that it would be of advantage to us. From a mixed farming country we are sending out large quantities of beef, pork, and dairy products, and if we had the advantage of a better transportation rate, our production would increase very substantially and very rapidly.

It has been stated here to-day that it would be of advantage to the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) in connection with immigration to have this route in operation. I am sure that to go ahead with this project would be one way of giving heart to the people in the West and of making it easier for the Minister of Immigration to get people to come to our country.

We have in Alberta large coal seams; the coal is there in any quantity that we want to take it. We want to sell that coal. There is a fuel problem before Canada that we cannot ignore. I have been told on good authority that this winter coal has been shipped 2,100 miles into Winnipeg, which is only 700 or 800 miles from our coal fields. Upon reference to a government map I find that the distance from Edmonton to Hudson bay is only about 800 miles, and from Port Nelson to the southern end of James bay is another 650 or 700 miles. According to the map the distance from this point to the National railway in Ontario south of James bay is 125 miles—I am taking the government maps for my measurement—and the total distance traversed by the time we reach Cochrane on the National line is 1,575 miles. At this point we commence to distribute coal both ways east and west on the National Railways. We also have government railways to carry it south to the bigger centres, and the railways could be getting traffic from the south as well to carry back west.

The hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) asked what the effect would be on the National Railways if we opened up this route. In my judgment we should be giving these railways more to do than they can possibly get if the route is left unopened. We should have increased settlement and production and should be able to supply our people with our own coal, so that we could retain in Canada about $60,000,000 a year that we now send out of the country for this commodity. If it is possible to haul coal 2,100 miles to Winnipeg, I contend that it is possible for our National Railways to haul coal from Alberta to central Ontario for distribution from Cochrane. We want to supply our people with our own coal and to employ our own miners in bringing this coal to the surface. At present, however, we are dealing with a financial problem in connection with our coal supply which we must solve sooner or later, and it is the duty of this parliament to solve that problem. It seems to me that we should do everything in our power to keep this $60,000,000 a year in our own country instead of sending it away to keep in employment the railwaymen and miners of another country. We can help to make our railways a success by hauling our own produce both ways. Now, we can ship coal from Port Nelson to the south end of James bay. Because the water is salt I am absolutely sure we can use that water route as long as we can ship on the waters of the Great Lakes, although probably there should be a greater emphasis on the facility of shipping grain, beef, pork and dairy products and lumber through Hudson Strait. I think that this route would be better than any other for the shipping of any perishable products such as meat, dairy products and whatever is produced in the mixed farming line.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): What would be the probable cost of that coal delivered at points in central Ontario?

Mr. WARNER: I can give only an approximate estimate, but I believe it could be laid down at Cochrane at $15 a ton, coming practically all the way over the National Railways.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): If it were shipped to Port Nelson and then by water carriage on James bay, and thence by rail into Ontario, what would it cost then?

Mr. WARNER: I could not give any definite answer to that question. I believe, however, that we could lay the lignite and bituminous coal down in Ontario cheap enough for the people to use it. Scientists have told us that our anthracite coal in Alberta is practically equal to the best anthracite in Pennsylvania. I have, of course, only their statement for that; but we can see what possibilities there are. And when we reflect that our National Railways are not paying and that we have been sending out about $60,000,000 for fuel, it seems to me that this House might give some consideration to this problem.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Suppose American coal could be landed at a given point in central Ontario at $9 a ton, would my hon. friend be in favour of prohibiting the importation of that coal by means of a customs tariff?

Mr. WARNER: I am not aware that American coal can be laid down in central Ontario at $9 a ton.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Well, say, $13.99.

Mr. BUREAU: Including graft?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Suppose it could be got in at that figure, how would the hon. member exclude it?

Mr. WARNER: The best information I have leads me to believe that $15 or $16 is about the lowest you can buy good coal for in Ontario to-day. Now, all that we want is something that is reasonable. I would impress upon the House this fact, that it would be worth something to eastern Canada to have western Canada given a better transportation service. If we were enabled, through the production of more coal along with the rest of our products, to use more of the manufactured goods of the East, surely that is a matter that should be taken into consideration. The people of the district in which I live are more interested in shipping westward, and I want to express my appreciation of what has been done in the way of opening up that western route. The government did something worth while when they granted money to facilitate the establishment of elevators at Vancouver and the opening up of that western route, and while we are more interested in that route at present, we are nevertheless interested in the opening up of the Hudson bay route. We want that route opened up and tested, and we believe that Canada can afford to do this, because nearly all the money needed has already been expended. And as has been shown, the East was not called upon to pay for what has so far been done. I do not know whether there is enough money in the western lands to pay for the completion of the rest of the road and the opening up of the harbour. I do not know all the details, but, if we had to do it, it seems to me that we could afford to complete the work into which we have already put $20,000,000 by expending a few more millions on it. I do not believe there is any reason to doubt the feasibility of this route. By proving that the route is worth while you will have a more contented West, for the people will realize that you have done something to help them out. And they need your help. In order that they may develop that country as it should be developed we must give them a chance to feel that there will be a profit in what they undertake to do. Therefore we want eastern Canada to feel that it is worth something to the East to have this railway completed.

Mr. MARTELL: Is not my hon. friend afraid that in the event of the Hudson Bay railroad being completed and the sea route opened up oleomargarine might be imported from England?

Mr. WARNER: Mr. Speaker, I am not discussing the oleomargarine question now. I expect to do so later, and I hope then to have the support of my hon. friend. I want to impress on this House that it is worth while to give favourable consideration to this project. If hon. members want proof of its feasibility they have only to consult the records. All we ask is that the promises of two earlier administrations be redeemed. I do not know whether the Union government approved of the completion of this railway, as a matter of fact not much was said about it during the war, but at least two of our governments not only approved but promised to build this railway to tidewater.

I take pleasure in supporting this resolution, and I support without any fear of the railway interfering with the branch lines which we are asking, and expecting to have built. If I were undertaking to open up a farm on the prairies I would have to make a certain outlay in order to carry my development to the point where it would produce me an income. Similarly I do not see why Canada need be afraid to spend a little more money to complete this route and so provide a much needed outlet to European markets for the grain products of our western provinces.

Mr. JOHN MILLAR (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, before entering upon a discussion of this question allow me to refer to a remark made by the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff). I take it that when he selected from the evidence before the Senate committee the testimony of Captain Anderson he did so because it seemed to him above all others to favour the view that he was taking, that is, opposition to the project. This being so I think it pertinent to read the second paragraph of Captain Anderson's evidence which is as follows:

> Navigation in Hudson bay may be relied upon from the 15th July until the 15th November, with an extension of a week at either end according to the season.

If that is the strongest evidence which the hon. member for Lunenburg can find against this project, I take it that there is not much to be said against its completion.

The Hudson bay route is not an experiment. It has been open for 240 years. It was used in 1846 by the British troops landed here to assist the Hudson's Bay Company in retaining what was then known as the Northwest Territories for Canada and for Great Britain against the aggression of the Americans. If in 1846 it was a route of importance by which troops could be brought in to save Canada, it might possibly 9 p.m. serve that purpose again. Happily we are not at war with any country, but it is quite evident that the League of Nations has not abolished war, and we do not know when we may again be at war. In such an emergency what an advantage it might be to Canada to have a back door whereby we could maintain communication with the Mother Country.

In that connection let me point out that the port of Archangel during the Great War became a thriving centre, although it is seven hundred miles farther north than Port Nelson. When the Black Sea ports of Russia were closed it became necessary to have maritime communication farther north and at the close of the war Archangel had a population of 46,000. And I repeat this fact again for I want hon. members to give it particular notice, that this port is seven hundred miles farther north than Port Nelson.

It has been asked, what effect would the operation of the Hudson Bay railway have upon our National railway system as a whole. It seems to me that when we consider that there is tributary to this route a vast area rich in undeveloped agricultural and mineral wealth, the completion of this railway cannot be other than beneficial to our national system of transportation. It is worthy of note that the tar sands alone in that northern country contain great potential wealth. I noticed in the newspaper quite recently that a sample of these tar sands was taken to the United States, and in competition with similar products from all other parts of the United States and Canada it carried off the first prize. We do not know what vast wealth we have in this country; we have only touched the fringe of it. We know, for instance, that it is very rich in oil. There is a great oil gusher in the Fort Norman district. For a short time after it was discovered the flow gradually decreased and it became evident that the well had been blocked up. It has since been opened up again and is now a strong flowing well, I understand. When a country so little explored shows such indications, what vast mineral wealth may there not be awaiting development? If this country is opened up and settled as its climatic conditions show it can be settled—because we are told the snowfall is much less there than around Winnipeg and the cold is no greater—I see no reason whatever why it should not be a rich traffic producer for the local railway, which in turn will enure to the advantage of our national system generally. Probably some hon. members will remember that some years ago the Canadian Pacific Railway directors strongly objected to railways being built from the United States into Canada. Those lines were completed, and I believe it is a fact that now the Canadian Pacific Railway Company find those railways are an advantage to them. May it not be so too with the Canadian National railways in relation to the completion and operation of the Hudson Bay railway?

I believe those living along the St. Lawrence river especially the people of the port of Montreal, where a great deal of our grain is handled, are somewhat perturbed over the development of this project because they believe it is going to injure their port. I am very doubtful indeed if the Hudson bay route will have any detrimental effect on the business of the port of Montreal. Its only effect, I am inclined to think, will be to draw traffic from the United States. Is it not strange that with the St. Lawrence route open to the sea 65 per cent of our Canadian grain passes through American channels? Why is it so? Let us look at this feature for a moment. In 1913 Canal Statistics, a government publication had this to say:

> The rate Fort William to Buffalo and New York—

That is, New York by Buffalo.

> —was 8.796 cents per bushel. the rate Fort William to Montreal at the same time was 6.341 cents per bushel, an advantage to Montreal of 2.455 cents, and yet ten times as much of our Canadian grain went through Buffalo to New York as passed through Montreal.

Why is that so? Is it not natural it should take the line of least resistance? I will tell you. At that time, and this is what usually happens under normal conditions, the grain flows to New York because there is greater space in the boats from New York to Liverpool than in the boats from Montreal to Liverpool. At times the advantage in the ocean rate is sufficient to overcome that amount of 2.455 cents, and that is the reason that our grain passes through American channels. This is the point I wish to make. Just a very slight advantage, that difference of less than three cents, is sufficient to call to American ports 65 per cent of our Canadian grain at the present time. Now, though it is impossible to say exactly what will be gained by opening up the Hudson bay route, is it not possible that the advantage will be sufficient to draw that traffic from the United States? If we can save four cents it can be done, and the greater part of 65 per cent of our Canadian grain that passes through American channels to-day will be drawn to the Hudson bay.

I am quite convinced that Montreal will always be a live port, but there is this disadvantage at the present time. The Farm and Ranch Review pointed out some little time ago that there was danger of over-production. It gave the acreage of western Canada particularly, and pointed out that if we had a reasonable crop in any one year, with no large tracts being dried up or otherwise injured, we would have a crop and an exportable surplus that no country in the world had ever produced, that could not be consumed by Europe, and could not be handled by our present outlets. They would be glutted, and that would be disastrous. That may or may not be so, but I am convinced that with a fair chance the western provinces are going to produce much more grain than they have in the past, and you know what took place last year, that whereas grain was carried the year previous for 2½ cents a bushel, last year the charge was 8 cents, and whereas for several years the cost to Montreal was from 4 to 4½ and 5 cents, last year at one time it went to 20 cents. There is the disaster that comes from having a bottle with too small a mouth. If you are going to increase our production in the West, is it not necessary, even though Montreal handles as much grain as it now does, even though the Pacific route is going to be opened up—is it not necessary to have a third outlet? I think it is.

I would like to meet a few objections. One is this. Some ask, where are you going to get a return cargo? You have not a population in that northern country, and for some years there will be very little return cargo. Let me point out this: Montreal has no large return cargoes in comparison with the amount shipped out. Canada ships out four tons for every one brought this way across the Atlantic. That means that even at the present time three out of every four vessels must come back across the Atlantic empty, or else the four vessels must return with quarter-cargoes. How much difference is there then? Is there any great disadvantage for the Hudson bay route in that respect? I think not, and it is quite apparent that with the development that will take place in the northern country considerable return cargoes can be brought back. That is something that must be developed.

The hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) made the statement that the advantage of the thousand miles saved—that is about the difference between Fort William and Montreal, and I would point out that that is a most difficult part of the route—was nearly all lost by the slow progress through the Hudson straits. I I would ask if that is any slower than the rate of progress of the boats that must pass through the 44 miles of canal in the St. Lawrence river, or go through the Welland canal or the St. Clair flats or the Soo canal? That is the more difficult and the more circuitous route. Surely by the Hudson bay route, with plenty of depth, with no canals, and wide open water for four months in the year, the progress will be greater, and therefore instead of the advantage being lessened by that route, it will be increased and mean a saving of perhaps 1,200 or 1,500 miles.

Remarks have been made by two or three hon. members that we ought to go slow in this matter, that we ought to take a year or two to investigate. Well, we have been twenty-five or thirty years investigating it already. Surely that is going slow enough. The idea of taking two years more to investigate I have no sympathy with, although it is a very good scheme for chloroforming the whole project. I see no need for any further investigation except of one particular point, and that is which is the better port, Fort Churchill or Port Nelson. That could be ascertained in a very few months, and I think it should be done as quickly as possible.

I shall not dwell upon the wisdom of spending a few more millions after $21,000,000 has already been spent on this project as that has already been touched upon. I pass on.

I have something that is a little bit new. It may be a little bit prosy because I shall have to read it. Some years ago Earl Grey made a trip to this northern country in order to investigate, and he was accompanied by a correspondent of the London Times. This correspondent on his return gave an address in the city of Toronto, from which I wish to give a few extracts. Objections have been taken to this project at times by men who are opposed to it because of selfish interests, and by men who living nearby are perhaps biassed, but surely that cannot be said of a correspondent of one of the world's greatest dailies and a man living in Great Britain. I think his evidence and opinion should be taken as worth something. He says:

> Now, I might, perhaps, begin by reminding you that the Hudson bay route is not a new experiment; for very nearly a century that was the predominant trade route to the west of the continent. You may remember that there was a period, lasting very nearly fifty years, of the acutest commercial rivalry between the Hudson's Bay Company and the North West Fur Company, with headquarters at Montreal. During that long struggle the Hudson's Bay Company enjoyed the advantage of being able to get goods to the interior about a month earlier than their rivals.

Further on he says:

> Franklin went by that route on his great exploration trips, and the description he left applies admirably to what we saw on our trip down there the other day. It was by that route that the British troops—infantry, artillery and sappers—were sent in 1846 to help the Hudson's Bay Company guard the great frontier country of Manitoba against the possibility of American aggression.

Again he says:

> I believe from my observations that the present Far Northwest of Canada can be reached from Liverpool by the Hudson bay route quicker than from New York.
>
> Hudson bay affords a back door to this continent, which might be easily used by the British in case of imminent need, and possibly mean, again, the saving of the Northwest to Canada; and that route, which has been so important in the past, may, therefore, not be unimportant in the future.

Again he says:

> Still, I do not think we can say the question of the Hudson bay route is, as it has been regarded, of supreme importance to the prairie provinces alone. I maintain that if the route is opened up it will be of great national interest to Canada—to the whole of Canada—and of great imperial interest as well.

Further on he states:

Owing to the shape of the Globe, the distance from Liverpool to the western shores of Hudson bay is practically the same as the distance from Liverpool to Montreal, just under 3,000 nautical miles.

One or two more extracts and I am through. He states further:

A ship ought to leave Churchill or Nelson the first week in November to get out the same year. As far as I can make out, the navigation of Hudson bay and straits is just as safe as navigation of the St. Lawrence.

At another point in his address he said:

This practically means that a ship could leave England before the middle of July, and with proper facilities for handling the traffic at Churchill or Nelson, could make three complete trips before the close of the season.

Again he states:

One other point in favour of this route might be mentioned here:

Now this is something entirely new, and hon. members can take it for what it is worth:

When the demand for harvest hands is at its height, instead of draining Ontario, they could be brought out from the Old Country in July by this route, work through the harvest, and return to England in the same season by the same route.

I now wish to read two or three extracts from a report containing the result of the explorations of Mr. Frank J. P. Crean, C.E., of the Railway Lands branch, Ottawa. After exploring 22,000,000 acres of country in northern Saskatchewan, Mr. Crean says:

It has been found that there are 3,000,000 acres of water, 5,000,000 of land suitable for settlement and 12,000,000 of wet land. The latter can all be drained and made good for settlement.

Further on in the booklet, which embodies his report, he says:

Many spendid gardens were seen and barley and oats grew to early maturity as far north as Lac La Loche, which is nearly 200 miles north of Prince Albert.

From another part of the booklet I cull the following:

There is an abundance of good hay land along the Sandy river. There is fertile land along the Buffalo lake and at La Loche lake the soil is very rich, being a heavy loam from 18 inches to greater depths. West of the height of land at Portage La Loche there is good soil and a large territory of good country.

I have one more extract to read and then I am through. There is this further statement in Mr. Crean's booklet:

The climate over the whole district is most favourable, the winters being no more severe than in the settled portions of Saskatchewan. The frost which damaged the grain in Saskatchewan in 1908 did not affect the grain and garden stuff in the north country at all. At Portage La Loche, the most northerly point reached by Mr. Crean, he saw potatoes on September 17 that had not been touched by the frost. He was struck by the variety of garden stuff that was grown in great profusion and with great success at all of the mission stations and the Hudson bay posts. The lakes began to freeze over on October 20, but this was followed by a warm spell and they were navigable for two weeks longer.

Mention has already been made of the necessity of encouraging those who are tilling the soil in the western country, and I think the fact that there is a shortage of money has also been referred to. Let me say that I cannot accept that as an excuse for not going ahead with the Hudson Bay railway. Neither can I accept it as an excuse for not building the branch lines. In view of the lavishness with which we have been voting money during the last few days hon. members opposite can hardly expect us to accept shortage of money as an excuse for not doing anything. Money is available in plenty to complete this line and in view of the fact that a great many of the appropriations which have passed in the last few days have been for public works in the eastern provinces I think we can well claim some consideration now for the provinces in the West—not as a matter of gift but as a right. I hope that hon. members generally will see the matter in that light and that they will not vote to further postpone the project under the plea of investigating it for another two or three years. Such a proposition is worth absolutely nothing. What we want is a hurried investigation of the relative merits of the two ports, and then a speedy completion of the line so that the twenty-one millions of expenditure already made will soon be earning money. I notice that when Sir Henry Thornton was travelling through the West he more than once took the view, in cases where money had already been expended on railway work in grading and so on, that it only seemed good business to make further expenditures in order to earn dividends on money that had already been laid out. That idea appeals to us as good business, and I hope it will be generally supported by the House.

Mr. C. WALLACE STEWART (Humboldt): I should like to make a short contribution to this debate. If all the hon. members in the group on this side of the House had had the same lengthy experience as some hon. gentlemen opposite and some hon. gentlemen to my right, I would hesitate to occupy time in trying to repeat arguments which I am aware have been placed before this House so often in the past. However, I have had but a very short parliamentary experience. Others of my colleagues have not served any longer in parliament. Such being the case I trust those hon. gentlemen who are familiar with the arguments that have been presented during the present century, and indeed during the closing years of the previous century, will bear with me while I repeat some of these arguments and deal with the situation as it appears to me. In looking up the history of this movement I was struck with the number of times it had been debated in this House. While tracing the movement back I came upon a comment made by Hon. Thomas Greenway, a member of this House sixteen years ago, to this effect:

> I remember having had the honour of a seat on a committee of this House more than thirty years ago, when we took a good deal of evidence on this subject.

That would place the investigation referred to away back in the seventies, in the last century. I am not going to refer back that far. However, I went to the trouble of looking up in Hansard how many times this question had been debated in the House during the present century and I was somewhat surprised to find that it had been discussed over one hundred times—119 times to be exact. It was not always a full dress debate; sometimes the discussion was considerably shorter. At any rate the subject has been up many, many times and the arguments advanced in its favour may perhaps be termed old. They are none the less worthy of support. I think the time that has been spent on it to-day, and in past years, is well justified by reason of the growing importance which attaches to this project.

It means, as has already been emphasized, an additional outlet. I am not going to attempt to make larger than it really is the importance of another outlet, but I would ask you to consider this feature. Suppose that only one-tenth of the wheat crop that is grown in the prairie provinces is exported by this route, and suppose that only one-quarter of the sum that has been stated might be saved, what is the result? I believe it has been stated frequently that from 15 to 20 cents a bushel could be saved on the wheat carried over this route, but suppose one-third or one-quarter, say 5 cents a bushel, were saved on the tenth of the crop that might go out by this route, would it not, Sir, be a better paying proposition than any railway in Canada at the present time? I submit it would.

Then aside from the question of the outlet and a cheaper means of getting our crop to its ultimate market, there is the other question which I do not place second, but place alongside of that first, and that is the opening up of a new and valuable territory, the importance of which, I am glad to know has been very largely emphasized in the debate to-day. I refer again to the history of this project, and I note that when it really became of interest to this House, some 16 or 17 years ago, it was not a matter of political strife. Although that was not the beginning by any means, it had its resurrection at that particular time, about 1906 or 1907, because of certain facts relative to the necessity for another outlet and wider markets for the crop of western Canada at that time. There are members in the House who were at that time farming in western Canada, and who can well remember the difficulty there was in getting grain to market; how, particularly in the season of 1906, the railway facilities were utterly inadequate to remove the western crop, and there was great congestion at practically every point throughout the West. It was then this matter became a subject for debate, and the project was adopted by both old political parties as a necessity. I want to note a resolution that was passed in this House in July 1906 declaring that the construction of the Hudson Bay railway was necessary for the commerce of Canada and for the full development of our agricultural and other resources. That resolution was adopted by this House, and in the debate that followed it was shown that there was practically unanimity of opinion on the subject. I want to read a short extract from a speech by Sir George, then the Hon. Mr. Foster. Speaking to that resolution he said:

> I believe the time has come when the Hudson bay railway should be more than an academic question just to be talked of sympathetically. I believe it ought to be built and it cannot be built now any too soon;

Then speaking after Mr. Foster, the leader of the government of that day, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, made this comment:

> I agree altogether with what has been said by my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) that the time has come for the construction of this railway.

Perhaps hon. members might think there is very little use in going into ancient history, but I believe that these comments and these expressions should carry a certain weight with us at this time. Ten years after that the Hon. Mr. Hazen expressed himself as I would like to express myself at this time, in referring to this scheme. He said:

> The members of the House irrespective of party evidently thought that the scheme was practicable because both parties were pledged up to the hilt to build the Hudson bay railway.

And this House has reason for accepting their judgment as having some weight. Mr. Hazen continues:

I do not believe any policy would appeal so strongly to men of the intelligence of hon. members of this House unless there was merit back of it.

And so I think that is really a premise upon which we can build our argument at the present time if such a premise is required.

Now then coming to the present time, I am not going to attempt to express the opinion of any hon. member of this House who is capable of expressing his own opinion, and I presume every member is capable of doing that. I am very pleased to find so many expressing themselves as favourable to this movement. There has been a suspicion in the minds of a great many people in western Canada who are interested in the project that some of the members, perhaps not of the present government so much as of the government which dropped the work, were losing their interest, or perhaps had changed their minds with regard to the feasibility of this project. I have in my hand a letter published in a local newspaper in western Canada, the Melfort Journal, which purports to have been received by a resident of that town of Melfort from the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen). I wish to quote a paragraph or two of this letter from the leader of the Opposition. The letter reads:

The present government has involved the country in large sums much less justifiable than would be immediate completion of this outlet. I am opposed, and the Conservative party is opposed to the indefinite postponement of the execution of this work. Had it not been for the war we would have completed it long ago.

That letter is signed by the right hon. leader of the Opposition. I just offer that statement for what it is worth as I offered the quotations, from other hon. gentlemen's utterances of years ago. We will wait with very great interest for members of the government to express their attitude regarding this question.

Now the question naturally arises from the statement of the leader of the Opposition, who was at the time the work was discontinued, the leader of the government, as to why that work was discontinued. I have heard many rumours, of course, as I suppose every member from western Canada has, and probably members from every other part of Canada, regarding the reasons why the construction of that road was discontinued. I referred to Hansard for the years just preceding discontinuance of this work to see if I could find any good cause for abandoning the project at that particular time. In 1916 I find one of the earliest intimations regarding the possibility of not going ahead with the work, when the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte) urged the government to discontinue work on the Hudson Bay road, to relieve the Finance Minister of further expenditure in that direction under the existing circumstances, the existing circumstances, of course, being the war that was then going on. Further, after perusing his speech at that particular time, I find that he based it largely upon a report that has been referred to very often during the debate this afternoon and evening, of Captain Anderson, that the project was not feasible. Then I think it was the year following that the report was handed to the government by a commission that was appointed to consider a number of subjects, and among others, that commission reported on this matter. I refer to the Drayton-Acworth Commission. Among other things it briefly summed up this matter as follows:

We recommend that future expenditures on the Hudson bay railroad be reduced to the lowest possible amount.

This was made the basis of a further attack upon the project. I am not going to quote at length the remarks of hon. gentlemen, but one of them who is a member of the House at the present time, the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), making an attack on the project based on that report, and criticizing the government of the day, said:

Hon. gentlemen are not honest with the people of this country when, after imposing taxation for the purposes of the war, they divert the money to building unnecessary works like the Hudson bay railroad.

I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, in the light of the facts that have been presented in the debate this afternoon as to the provision made for funds for the construction of this road, that that was not a fair criticism. Other attacks were made upon the project in that year, 1917, not going as far as the hon. member for Pictou went, but affirming that owing to the existing conditions, or words to that effect, it was inadvisable to expend more money on the Hudson Bay railway at that time. So apparently—for I can find no other reason—the government accepted the advice that was offered. Whether or not the conditions really did warrant such action, I am not prepared to state now. But if such conditions existed during the war, if the state of the public treasury was such that it was inadvisable to go ahead with the project, those conditions do not exist now. In the light of all the facts as they have been presented to the House during the last two sessions I feel that the people of western Canada are making a reasonable statement when they say that the time has now come to proceed with the completion of this road and to make a sufficient expenditure on the harbour and docks at least to give the plan a fair trial, or to enable the experiment, as it has been called, to be made of shipping via that route. I am not one who would advise unlimited expenditure at this time on the harbour or on the railway; indeed, unlimited expenditure is not necessary on the railway, and I do not believe it is necessary on the harbour. A very small additional expenditure will make it possible to establish the value of that route as soon as suitable ships can be brought in to accept cargoes there.

I would like to say a few words with regard to the feasibility of the project. The ground was so well covered this afternoon that I shall cut out much of what I had in my notes on that phase of the subject, but there are just one or two points to which I wish to direct attention. The railroad is so nearly completed that it is not necessary to argue as to its feasibility. It is not so very many years since the question was raised in this House as to the practicability of building a railroad to Hudson bay. Nor is it much more than half a century since members of the Canadian parliament stated that it was not possible to lay steel across the continent in the construction of a transcontinental railway and make the undertaking a success. I ask you, then, to consider the arguments that are submitted as to the feasibility of this route.

As to the conditions in the bay, I am not a sea-going man; I am not a mariner, and consequently cannot make statements based on my own observations. I have never, I regret to say, visited the bay, but I have read reports made by men of long experience in those waters. I would like to quote from a report to which reference has already been made, that of J. A. J. McKenna, submitted to the Department of the Interior. One paragraph will suffice to sum up his opinion of the feasibility of the bay and straits route. It says:

> In the course of a century and three-quarters, 750 vessels ranging from 70-ton ships to 10-ton pinnaces, crossed the ocean, passed through the straits, and sailed the bay in the service of the company.

That is, the Hudson's Bay Company.

> Only two were lost—a marvellous record when it is remembered that all the craft were sailers and most of them small and of rude construction, and that the bay and strait afforded them none of the modern accessories to navigation in the way of coast aids.

I had occasion, Sir, to speak to a resolution similar to this last year, and at that time I expressed the conviction that Port Nelson was perhaps, not the proper port for the terminal of this road. But in the year that has elapsed I have searched the available records much further and I now believe that we make no mistake in urging that the road be built into Port Nelson. Should the time ever come when Port Nelson could not accommodate all the traffic that offered, there would still be the other port, which some hold to be a better natural port—Fort Churchill. The building of a few more miles of railroad would then make two ports available instead of one. But as the rails are now directed toward Port Nelson and a great deal of money has been expended there, I think the road should be built to that port as soon as possible. Port Nelson was chosen after great deliberation. In 1913, after a conference between Captain Bernier, Captain Bartlett—who has been mentioned as an authority in this matter—and the then Minister of Railways, the Hon. Frank Cochrane, Port Nelson was decided upon as the terminal. These gentlemen all had not only a theoretical knowledge of but practical experience in connection with the conditions there. The minister had visited the bay; the other two were sea-going captains who had had many years of Arctic experience. Port Nelson was regarded as the more desirable of the two ports, not only by reason of its more southerly location, but also because of its more favourable approaches from a navigation standpoint.

I have a few statements regarding Port Nelson which I would like to place before the House. A search of the records regarding the surveys of that port and the soundings made there shows that there is a deep water channel at least one-third of a mile wide up the middle of the estuary and separated from the shore by wide tidal flats over which the water is from one to three feet deep at low tide. The channel is 15 miles to deep water in the bay proper. The Hon. Mr. Hazen, then Minister of Marine and Fisheries, stated in answer to a question that without dredging at high water vessels drawing from 20 to 25 feet could safely go into Port Nelson. I will offer further testimony along that line in a moment. Later the Hon. Mr. Reid stated:

> The channel is quite safe with a depth of never less than 19 feet and from one-half mile widening to 15 miles at the mouth, and there is a rise of 15 feet with the tide.

I call your attention, Sir, to the fact that these statements were made before any dredging had been done in the channel. It is further established, I believe, that with the exception of a few bars across the channel, a much greater depth of water is there naturally than the 19 feet mentioned, and that by dredging out these few bars—which are clay bars not sand bars—the channel can be made to accommodate an ordinary ocean-going steamer. Here are two illustrations showing what has been possible in the past in the navigation of that channel. The steamer Minto with a draught of 20 feet was twice into the place where the harbour works are now being carried on, previous to any dredging work having been done at all. At the time this steamer entered the channel there were no buoys to mark the course, and yet no trouble was experienced. Again, in 1914, two coal ships from England, each of 22 feet draught, entered the port, or approximately to the point where the harbour is now located. These facts bear out the statements that already have been made as to the existence of a natural channel through that estuary. I should like to refer to one other point, bearing not so much on the port as on the navigability of the straits and the bay. The hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) made a statement which showed that he was not altogether acquainted with the facts. At any rate, the statements I have are entirely contradictory of what he said this afternoon. The hon. member stated that fogs were a great detriment to navigation in the bay and straits. A statement made by Captain J. Hackland would seem to contradict the hon. member's assertion. Captain Hackland stated that navigation in Hudson bay and the straits is not dangerous. There are, he says, no shoals and there are very few fogs. Let me quote what he says:

During sixteen years of navigation of the bay—

Observe, he makes this statement after sixteen years' experience of actual navigation in the bay.

—we were never impeded by fogs.

As to icebergs, I will simply give two quotations from the report which the hon. member had in his hand, that is, Captain Anderson's report. The report states:

Many icebergs were seen and dense fogs prevailed off the Labrador coast.

I would draw the attention of the House to the fact that these same icebergs, and fogs of similar origin, are encountered by all ships that take the north Atlantic course, while no icebergs are encountered in the bay. This statement would seem to bear out the contention that fogs are not encountered in the bay either. In the same report we find this statement:

After passing the strait the weather was clear and very few fogs were encountered.

Now, to turn to the other aspect of the question, which I have placed second in order but which I by no means regard as being of secondary importance, namely, the development of the resources of the country lying adjacent to the route traversed by the railroad. I want to quote from an hon. member of this House who on one occasion gave expression to sentiments in which I heartily concur. The member for Saskatoon, Mr. George McCraney in the year 1907, stated that he believed, altogether apart from the benefits of transportation which the Hudson Bay road would give us, the opening up of that country would be sufficient remuneration for anything we might spend in that connection. I think that if we make a search, not of theories or suppositions, but of the actual records available in the various departments of government here after surveys and exploring expeditions have been made, we shall be convinced of the truth of this statement. I want, first of all, to refer to the fisheries of the bay itself. I think I can briefly sum up what I believe to be the truth regarding the fisheries of the bay in short extracts from three reports that were made in the year 1914. In that year three expeditions were sent to Hudson bay to investigate the fisheries. One took the western shore and the waters adjacent thereto, another the eastern shore and the waters adjacent, and the third James bay and its waters. In the report of the first, Mr. C. D. Melville, officer in charge of the survey work, in his summary states:

1. The question of railroads is of paramount importance.

May I, Sir, read that over as having a direct bearing on the present discussion. In the first statement in his summary of his investigations Mr. Melville states that the question of railroads is of paramount importance. To proceed:

With transportation provided for there can be little doubt that the white fish fishery will prove to be one of the greatest in Canada and with its development the other fisheries will become of immense value.

In a footnote he states that it had proved profitable to send fish to Winnipeg, Chicago, and other points in central Canada and the United States from Prince Rupert, the headquarters of the northern Pacific fisheries, which is 1,745 miles from Winnipeg. And by actual mileage, Port Nelson would not be over one-half of that distance from these centres. I might further point out that if the Ontario government goes ahead with the project it has in view at this time, of connecting the south of James bay with a direct railway to Toronto, it would place these fisheries practically at the doors of the greater cities of eastern Canada. The second expedition—the Burleigh expedition—which investigated the western shore, reports as follows through the officer in charge:

As will be seen the season was an abnormally late one which left me a very short time for work. I regret this very much as I am sure that the south eastern shore would have proved to be of greater value in fisheries than the western portion although the latter is very promising. It would take one full season to investigate this properly.

In regard to the third expedition further south into the bay, I take one paragraph from the summary by Mr. A. R. M. Lower, who states:

It is not too much to predict that some time in the future the supply of fish that comes from the salt water of the north will be as constant and plentiful as that which at present is yielded by our great inland lakes.

His qualification as to "some time in the future" was apparently, in his mind, based upon the necessity for quick transportation. Water transportation is not expeditious enough to bring fish fresh to the inland markets; it requires fast train service. The fisheries I claim are of vast importance and are worth developing; and the railroad, I believe, would be justified if for no other reason than that it would develop this industry. But we have had pointed out to us already the vast water-powers that are available on the Hudson bay slope; and the minerals have been referred to. The argument has been advanced that the expense of developing these water powers at the sites located on the Nelson river would make the undertaking prohibitive. I think there would be a great demand for the power that could be developed there; and with that point in view, and because of certain inquiries I have had regarding the available power, not of course amounting to thousands or millions of horsepower, I went to the department to secure the results of a survey made on a tributary to the Nelson and which parallels the railroad for many miles. I want to place before the House the results of a survey made in 1917 of that particular tributary, the Grass river, and the power available thereon. The Grass river runs almost parallel with the present line of the Hudson Bay railway, and at no point are the sites where power could be developed on the Grass river more than 20 miles from railway stations or sidings. There were five sites surveyed, none of them tremendous, but all large enough to be of commercial value, especially to those requiring power that could be developed cheaply. The first site is sixteen miles from the railway, and the power estimated, at 80 per cent efficiency, is 1,640 horse-power. The second site is twenty miles from the railway and the estimated power, on the same percentage basis, is 2,450 horse power. The third site is seven miles from the railway, and the power that can be developed on the 80 per cent efficiency basis is given at 2,180 horsepower. The fourth site, seven miles from the railroad, is capable of a development, on the same basis of efficiency, of 4,860 horse-power. and the fifth site, ten miles from the railroad, has power possibilities of 4,250 horse-power.

I stated that I had asked for the result of the surveys because of a certain letter that I had received from an improvement and production supply company asking for figures as to the power available and the possibilities of securing a charter to develop power to run a flour mill there to mill grain and ship the flour and other products to the European market.

Mr. WALLACE: Do those figures represent the minimum flow?

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): I think so. One further point. In regard to agricultural land, I have an illustration to offer to the House as to the possibilties of agricultural land in that particular vicinity. I am not going to make any statement in regard to those lands that are already available as soon as transportation is provided to the district. But it has been stated, I think by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar), that there were at least 12,000,000 acres of land that could be drained and made available for agriculture. I believe, Sir, that those are among the best agricultural lands that we have in western Canada once they are properly drained. That may seem to be looking into the future, but it is not looking so very far ahead. I went to the Reclamation branch of the Department of the Interior and secured certain figures in this connection. They have made surveys and have a project before them at the present time which taps this very district. It is an area known as the Moose range and Carrot river triangle. The apex of this triangle points right to The Pas, the town where the railroad starts. In this territory there are 125,000 square miles of land which at the present time is not suitable for agricultural purposes because of lack of drainage. The reports of the surveys which have been very carefully carried out show that this land can be reclaimed and will make the very richest agricultural soil. I do not need to emphasize to western members at least that the Carrot river lands are the very best in all western Canada, in fact I do not think that anywhere in Canada or probably in the world is there such a deep black loam as in the Carrot river country. This triangle of 125,000 square miles can, according to the figures of our own Reclamation branch, be reclaimed and made fit for agricultural purposes at a cost of approximately $2.50 per acre.

Mr. CAHILL: Does the Hudson Bay railway run through this land?

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): It touches it at The Pas.

Mr. CAHILL: Is not this triangle west of the Hudson Bay railway?

Mr. STEWART (Humboldt): Yes. I was not referring to this as land that the Hudson Bay railway would particularly serve; I was simply citing it as an illustration. Farther north there is land similar to this, referred to by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar), containing about 12,000,000 acres, which require drainage. I was offering this as something not theoretical but regarding which we have definite data. It is so definite, Sir, that although the Department of the Interior after securing those figures did not deem it advisable to go ahead with the work, the province of Saskatchewan accepted the figures and have, I believe, reached an agreement with the department to proceed, either this year or at no distant date, on their surveys and drain at least a part of that Carrot river triangle in order to make it suitable for farming operations.

I think, then, it will be readily admitted from the statement which I read, and which I heartily concur in, that the natural resources themselves justify the building of this road. If they justified the building of this road many years ago when it was undertaken and $20,000,000 expended, certainly they justify a further expendture now of another $4,000,000 or $5,000,000 to complete that road and so make profitable the capital investment.

I hinted some few moments ago that there were suspicions in the minds of a great many people in the West as to the reasons why this road was not being completed. I have in my hand a letter which appeared in the correspondence columns of the Saskatoon Daily Star of February 21st, in which the writer airs his suspicions that sectional or political interests are holding up and delaying the completion of this road. Now, Sir, I do not endorse the statements made by this correspondent, but I wish to bring it particularly to the attention of the government that these suspicions do exist and that it is necessary for the satisfaction of the people of western Canada that they should be dispelled. I am delighted with the sentiments that have been expressed in this debate, and I am sure that when the speeches are read by the people of western Canada those suspicions will in a very large measure be dispelled. But to show how this particular correspondent feels in regard to this matter let me quote a passage from his letter. He says:

> We know the East is against the completion of the Hudson bay road.

I am very glad that certain eastern members have expressed themselves plainly and emphatically to the contrary but I should like to add a word to the point emphasized by the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) when he spoke of the psychological effect of the completion of this road to the bay. The people of western Canada feel that its completion is their due. They are not so provincial as not to watch with careful eyes the voting of public moneys in the present session as well as in past sessions, and they are aware that in the past week, for example, we have voted estimates running into millions of dollars to provide transportation ways and means for farming communities located along our lakes and rivers in eastern Canada. We in this section of the House, Sir, could not very well try to hinder the placing of harbours, wharves, breakwaters and other necessary accommodation for the farming people of Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island because we realize that such accommodation is indeed essential, and I think it was very noticeable that the members of this group did not raise any serious objection to these votes. But I would remind the government that the people of western Canada, as I said a moment ago, fully realize that these means of transportation are being provided year by year, and that next year other requirements of a similar nature will probably have to be provided for, and therefore they feel that they too should have absolutely necessary wharves and harbours supplied to them. I was amazed, Sir, when I turned to the appropriations for Manitoba for harbours and rivers not to see its greatest port mentioned —Port Nelson. I thought possibly that a special vote might be found somewhere in the estimates, but I could not find anything for that important harbour. Such omissions are not having a good effect upon the people of western Canada.

I have based my arguments very, very largely upon statements that have already been made in this House, but I doubt, Sir, if sounder statements can be found anywhere on this subject, and I want to make one further quotation to sum up my attitude. It is contained in a speech made by Sir Wilfrid Laurier when criticism was advanced early in the history of this project. He stated

> The future of Canada is too great for any one part of its territory to be hurt by the development of the routes of commerce of any other part.

We need to rise to that viewpoint at this present time and realize that we are not hurting any other part of Canada, but only giving its just due to that part which possesses this great outlet. I think it is a significant fact of history that the man, Sir Henry Hudson, who gave his name to the great bay on which the port of Nelson lies also gave his name to the river in the republic to the south of us, which has the second greatest city in the world and one of the greatest ports of the world, and I, Sir, am one of those like the hon. member for Strathcona (Mr. Warner) who preceded me in this debate, who having read our great explorer Stefansson have become enthused with some of his sentiments, and I endorse his statement that the trend of Empire is northward, and if already a great city and a great port is on the river bearing the name of Hudson, there also will be, and I hope in my time and your time, Mr. Speaker, a great city and a great port on the bay which also bears his name.

Hon. G. P. GRAHAM (Acting Minister of Railways and Canals): I really do not know that I can add anything to this debate, no matter on which side of it I talk. One of the difficulties with which we are confronted is that our numbers are so few and our needs so many. We are heavily taxed—at least, we say we are, though I submit that we have a good deal to learn about taxation compared with many other countries.

Let me approach this question not from the east or from the west, but by keeping in the middle of the road. As a matter of fact, we will never get anywhere as a nation if we cannot get close enough together to talk about Canada as a whole, and not of one particular part of it. Sometimes it is difficult to adhere to that plan of argument, but we ought to let it go through the world that we are united for the welfare of the whole country, and that whatever is best for all Canada is what we are after. I will go further than that and say that generally speaking, although there may be exceptions, what is good for any part is good for the whole.

This resolution of my hon. friend (Mr. Knox) calls for two things:

> That in the opinion of this House, the government of Canada give further consideration to the report of the Senate committee on the Hudson bay railway with a view to safeguarding the investment of public moneys made in the construction of that portion of the work completed to date—

And secondly:

> —that the government recognize the priority of this undertaking with reference to other transportation projects started subsequent to the Hudson bay railway.

I do not know to what projects my hon. friend would refer, but this I do know, that hon. gentlemen who insist that this situation has not anything to do with branch line construction have my sympathy, because we are discussing the Hudson bay route without any reference to branch line policy. The only connection there can be between the two is this, that it takes money to build either or both. In securing grants from our Finance Minister we can go to a certain limit and no further, and we all agree that we are going a long way towards getting at our own pockets in our taxation.

It is a difficult situation with which we are confronted, and particularly do I find it a difficult one. I am asked for the time being at least, to sponsor in this House the Canadian National Railways. The majority of parliament at least are in favour of giving the Canadian National Railways a chance. Now, with no special reference to the Hudson bay project, some things are suggested to me that will not help give the Canadian National Railways a fair chance. Our whole question of transportation is a bit difficult so far as expansion is concerned, and just at this point let me give expression to an opinion of my own. It is this, that in inaugurating transportation projects, two things might be kept in view, and in some cases only one. The government of a country owes it to the people of that country to supply them so far as possible with the means of making their calling a success. It cannot do it altogether, because there are some people you cannot make successful. Providence did not start them out right, or if so, they spoiled themselves. But so far as a government can, it ought to use its best endeavours to make a success of their occupations. That might mean, and I want to call the attention of the House as representing all Canada to this, that the government would be called on to construct railways that would not and could not pay their way for years, but it might at the same time be in the interest of all Canada that certain parts of the country should be developed and certain people given an opportunity to make a livelihood. In that connection the opinion I want to express is this, that parliament ought not to ask the Canadian National Railways to accept the responsibility for deficits that must ensue for years, but if we know that certain projects are necessary and wise and in the interests of all Canada, then the parliament of all Canada ought to accept the responsibility for the construction of those projects and the meeting of their deficits, and not have the Canadian National Railways Board charged with them.

I think that the debate to-day has covered more territory and has been as instructive, to put it mildly, as any previous debate we have ever had on this subject. The members who have spoken have shown that they have read a good deal. They have been in the Library quite frequently, I can see that. They have done their utmost to secure the data which would assist them in placing the case as they saw it before this House.

I am not going to argue with any person, but I would like to make a reference to the Welland canal as that has been mentioned by one or two members. I plead guilty to several things, if guilt there be attached, and one of these is the beginning of the surveys for the enlarging of the Welland canal. I did so not for eastern Canada but for western Canada and at the request and after urgent petitions and deputations of men engaged on the plains in grain growing that we should enlarge the Welland canal so as to reduce if possible the rate of transportation from the head of the Great Lakes to the seaboard. The Welland canal is not for the East; it is not for the West; it is for all Canada, and that is the way I think hon. gentlemen ought to accept that expenditure. Had it not been for our great West, what would we have had to induce us to enlarge the Welland canal? It was the wheat, the product of the western prairies, that first impelled the government to begin the enlargement of the Welland canal, and when that is finished I believe that it will afford some relief even if the St. Lawrence be not deepened for some little time, by allowing the larger cargoes to go many miles further east before being trans-shipped to smaller vessels and canalized to the city of Montreal.

It has been said that lands were appropriated for the Hudson Bay railway. I always hesitate to deal with a statute, not being of the legal brotherhood myself, but I want to present this to the House as I see it, so that we shall be clear as to what took place. In the statute of 1906 the following appears as subsection C of section 6:

Make a free grant of land, not exceeding in extent six thousand four hundred acres for each mile of railway within Manitoba, and not exceeding in extent twelve thousand eight hundred acres for each mile beyond the limits of Manitoba, in aid of the construction of a railway from some point on the Canadian Pacific railway to Hudson bay;

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would the minister read the first part of the section?

Mr. GRAHAM: Oh, yes.

[Mr. Graham.]

The Governor in Council may make a free grant of land, etc.

That covers the point which I think I wish to make. It provides in this statute that the Governor in Council can make a free grant of land for the construction of the Hudson bay project from a point on the Canadian Pacific railway. That was in 1906. So it is very manifest that the Governor in Council, in 1906, was given power, at least, to appropriate large areas of land for the construction of a railway from somewhere on the Canadian Pacific to Hudson bay. Now if we look at the statute passed in 1908—known as the Dominion Lands Act—we find that under section 27 the right was given for a homesteader to purchase a pre-emption, and while nothing is said about the Hudson Bay railway, or any portion of it, the debates in the House would indicate that the government had in mind at that time the idea of selling these pre-emptions and taking the money—or a portion of it at least—for the construction of the Hudson Bay railway, rather than granting such a company, or any company a free grant of land for that purpose. Consequently this act of 1908, as I understand it, repeals the act of 1906 so far as the Hudson Bay railway is concerned.

One hon. gentleman opposite—referring to the remarks of Mr. Oliver, who was in 1908 a member of the government—I think I need not repeat those remarks—has made it clear in the discussion of the matter by Mr. Oliver that it was the intention of the government first to allow the Governor in Council to make a land grant in 1906 to any company to build a railway to Hudson bay; but that in 1908 that act was repealed, in so far as it referred to the land grant, and provided for the sale of pre-emptions, with the explanation of Mr. Oliver particularly, as reported in Hansard, that the money from those pre-emptions might well be taken for the construction of the Hudson Bay railway. Now Sir, I think there could be no question that there was in the mind of parliament—at least the idea was expressed as fairly as it could be without putting the words in the statute—that certain lands might be sold and the money received from those lands as pre-emptions used to construct the Hudson Bay railway.

I am not going at all into the question of the feasibility of the navigation of the straits, or the question of the proper port, except to say this, that during the time that I had the honour of being a member of the Laurier administration I thought we had that question fairly well investigated; and I have yet to find an engineer who will accept the responsibility of saying to the government or to the department, or at least has said, that Churchill is preferable to Nelson. I think the government that followed us found the same situation and selected Nelson, largely on the data I had procured and the reports made to me when I was Minister of Railways. In addition to that, other investigations took place. I think my successor, the Hon. Mr. Cochrane, went to Hudson bay himself and was firmly convinced that Nelson was the proper port, and for this reason: If a great amount of traffic were to be developed, Nelson provides greater facilities and greater opportunity for the development of a large harbour than does Churchill. As I am informed, Churchill at the present time might provide a harbour for small traffic, but could not be developed without very great expense into a larger harbour. But Nelson provides all the opportunities for developing a harbour—I would not say to an unlimited extent but to a much greater degree than Churchill.

Now it has been argued, and I will just dwell a moment on this point, that deep water could not be obtained at Nelson. There is deep water at Nelson a few yards from shore and, under the plans that were adopted by the government, an artificial island has been under construction having connection with the shore. This will provide for the construction of a dock that, with the carrying out of a comparatvely small amount of dredging, will permit vessels drawing 26 feet of water to come alongside.

As to the railway itself the history of the whole project is fresh in the minds of most hon. members. Just here I may say that when I was at home yesterday I came across a relic that reminded me that I had turned the first sod for the Hudson bay project—that is beyond The Pas; I found the spade in my library with which I had done it. It is many years since the Hudson bay project was first mooted.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Before the minister gets to the history of the railway will he mind answering this if he can—I would like the information: If the road were completed now to Port Nelson could tests be made of the feasibility of the route without a very large expenditure being first made in the harbour? That is to say, is the harbour in such a condition now that a small amount of traffic could take place, if boats could be found to take care of shipments at Port Nelson?

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not think it would be feasible for grain, for example, without quite a large expenditure. I am of the opinion it would take quite a large expenditure before any real test could be made—I mean in the harbour at the wharf.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How much?

Mr. GRAHAM: I have not made an estimate of that. It would take about nine millions and some odd dollars more to complete the harbour without the elevator according to the plan; but as ships come in—and ships have come and gone—possibly a test may be made with less expenditure than that. The sum mentioned would be for complete facilities, excepting the elevator which, of course, is necessary for the shipping of grain. Now to return to the point upon which I had entered, I think it is Hugh Sutherland's name that I find first connected with the Hudson Bay railway. Later a line was built from Hudson bay junction to Pas Mission, and was extended towards the Saskatchewan river. The first thing to be done on the line was to build a bridge across the Saskatchewan river. I think it was in 1911 that the contract was let for the first 187 miles. Now, as in the case of the Welland canal, I must plead guilty, if guilt there be, to having signed that contract. Up to date there have been constructed 332 miles. The line to mile 214 has been operated during the past year. From mile 214 to mile 332 has not been operated for some time. At mile 355 at Split lake we come to the point where the route either to Nelson or to Churchill could be established. In the surveys as made that was the point of divergence taken and the difference in distance from The Pas to Churchill and from The Pas to Nelson was some 60 miles, if I remember correctly. Now the addition of that 60 miles was estimated by the engineers to cost $4,000,000. In addition to the construction would be the continuous operation and upkeep of that extra 60 miles. But it has been stated recently that the line running down towards Port Nelson might be used, and then branch off and go to Churchill, instead of making the divergence at Split lake. As to that I am not in a position to say. All the estimates made by the engineers dealt with the line from mile 355. The line has been constructed to Nelson river. A bridge has been constructed across what is known as, I think, Kettle river. Further on there is no steel. About 30 miles down is the head of navigation on the Nelson river. Some have suggested that the road might be constructed down the 30 miles, so that the benefits of navigation up and down the Nelson might be obtained first. That suggestion is worthy of investigation.

The present situation is this: The government has no idea of abandoning the Hudson Bay railway, but we have to go slowly—perhaps I should not use that word after the addresses we have heard to-night—but we have to go carefully and with caution. The position of the second 118 miles at the present time is almost as if it had never been constructed. I believe—and I propose to make this recommendation—that we ought to proceed to put that second 118 miles in such shape that it could be operated, and to rescue some million dollars worth of material —I do not mean to take it out, but to rescue it—and put into workable shape, that 118 miles of line. Now you will ask why we wanted to take the rails out. Well there was a report made by the board prior to the coming of Sir Henry Thornton suggesting that these 80 pound rails might be taken out for the present and used for branch lines that were being hardly pressed for, but on his arrival Sir Henry Thornton made the suggestion that we had better have more investigation before we removed that material, because, to begin with, in order to get the line in condition to move that material over it, a good many thousand dollars would have to be expended; so that at the present time Sir Henry Thornton's advice is—and I have discussed it with him—that we proceed to expend an amount of money to begin the work of putting that 118 miles, which is now practically out of business, into respectable operating condition to-day. To put it in first class condition would take a great deal of money, but I am going to ask my colleagues to allow me to bring down an item for the purpose of beginning the work at least of putting that 118 miles in condition, so that, along the line where there are poles, nuts, ties and fish-plates and all that kind of thing, we can save all this material, level up and re-align the rails, and straighten up the trestles and bridges that have become warped for lack of care for the last three or four years. Of course that will take some time and some money, but when that is done we will be in position to discuss what is the next step to take.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): How many miles would that give of continuous line?

Mr. GRAHAM: If it were all in operation it would make 332 miles. I think the first duty of the government to the country is to place that 118 miles in repair again. When that is completed we can decide what the next step will be.

In the meantime I assure the House that so far as the government is concerned they have never suggested, so far as I have any knowledge, the abandonment of the Hudson Bay project.

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie): In discussing the question before the House it should not be necessary at all to deal with the feasibility of the Hudson bay route as that was established long ago to the satisfaction of two different governments and of two different political parties. However, because certain influences seem to be at work to discredit the scheme and sow suspicion in the minds of the people of the country, I crave the indulgence of the House for a few minutes while I deal with some of the reasons which persuaded the Laurier government in 1907 to undertake the construction of the Hudson Bay railway, and the reasons which convinced the Borden government, in 1912, to continue the work started by their predecessors in office. The saving in distance from Saskatoon to Liverpool by Hudson bay over the Montreal route would be no less than 1,218 miles. It would place the western prairies as near tide water as their competitors the Argentine, Australia and southern Russia. A few days ago this House voted a sum of five million dollars to increase the grain facilities at Vancouver. Let me point out that from Edmonton to Vancouver the distance is 770 miles, Edmonton to Port Nelson is 1,057. With higher freight rates for the mountain it would cost about the same rate to Vancouver as to Nelson. The distance from Nelson to Liverpool is 2,966 miles, from Vancouver to Liverpool it is 8,530. This means a saving by the Hudson bay of 5,564 miles. In addition, there are the canal tolls to pay via the Panama route, and I believe the danger to the grain from excessive heat is at least equal to the danger from navigation difficulties on the northern route.

I would not have my hon. friends from British Columbia think that I am in any way opposing that route; on the contrary I am delighted to see it opened and I feel that we need every available channel to get our grain out in proper time. I do not look on the Hudson bay as a competitor to existing routes. Indeed, I believe the day would come when it would be a valuable feeder to existing transportation systems. During the navigable season of 1921 85,000,000 bushels of our grain passed out through the United States. During the past season, 1922, no less than 129,000,000 bushels of Canadian wheat went to Europe through the United States ports. This is sufficient to prove that the present routes are not able to handle our crop. There is another reason why we are anxious that as little as possible of our wheat should go out through American channels. We are afraid, indeed we are very suspicious, that in transit through the United States our wheat is being mixed and its high quality lost and we are, therefore, anxious to preserve the identity of our Canadian wheat on account of its undoubted high quality.

Furthermore, I believe that by developing every available Canadian route, we can in the future not only prevent our Canadian wheat going to Europe through American ports, but we can secure for our Canadian ports a very considerable quantity of American wheat. It is nearly twenty years ago that J. J. Hill told a delegation of North Dakota farmers that the day might come when their wheat would go to Europe through Hudson bay, and in examining the mileage it looks quite probable. The distance from Grand Forks to Liverpool via New York is 4,802 miles; from Grand Forks to Liverpool via Hudson bay, 3,632 miles, a saving of 1,170 miles. From Havre, Montana to Liverpool via New York the distance is 5,418 miles; from Havre, Montana to Liverpool via Hudson bay 4,268 miles, a saving of 1,150 miles. Port Nelson is 58 miles nearer Liverpool than New York. One of the arguments used against the northern route is the lack of return cargo. The western states import a large amount of goods from Europe and I believe if this northern route were developed, a considerable quantity of these goods would come in via Hudson bay.

The British embargo against cattle has recently been removed, but transportation costs are so high that the British market is of no use to us. The opening of the Hudson bay route, which would be available during the very season that our cattle are being marketed, would be a great boost to the cattle industry. From the point of view of the cattle industry alone it would pay to develop this route, even if no grain were shipped by it. At present the cattle industry is—well, I was going to say, in a deplorable state, but it is worse than that—non est, so far as western Canada is concerned. Whether or not we shall be able to build up in that country a cattle industry depends on whether we can get an outlet to Hudson bay. Cattle and grain can be very conveniently combined in one cargo and thus can be handled very cheaply.

Those who are opposing the completion of the Hudson Bay railway are largely in the same class with those who said that the Canadian Pacific Railway would never earn its axle grease; with those who thirty or forty years ago said that wheat could never be successfully raised on the prairies; with those who thought that the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario Railway was doomed to failure—a railway which opened up one of the richest and most productive mining districts on the continent, if not in the world; with those who only two years ago said that the Vancouver route could never be a success. Men of vision, however, have long believed in it. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, in a speech delivered at Niagara Falls in September, 1908, said:

> We have undertaken the construction of another railway. The Hudson Bay railway concerns more the people of the West, but I say to you, gentlemen of Ontario, and you will agree with me, that what concerns one portion of the community concerns any part of the community.

A few days ago, Sir, we passed a vote in this House for $25,000 for the erection of a monument to the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier. It seems to me that one of the most fitting monuments to the memory of that great departed statesman would be the fulfilment of one of his own promises. The government could contribute a great deal by carrying out what Sir Wilfrid Laurier had in mind at that time.

Mr. Turgeon, speaking in this House in 1916 said:

> I have always favoured the construction of the Hudson bay railway.

Perhaps it is superfluous to quote the hon. Minister of National Defence (Mr. Graham), but I see he is on record in 1916 as saying:

> I have not varied for a moment in my belief that the Hudson bay project will be a success, notwithstanding the difficulties that have arisen. For my part, I have faith in the western country to believe that it will be large enough and productive enough to give business for all the routes in the years to come. I believe it will pay to build that railway, even if we have no imports by way of Hudson bay.

The Hon. Frank Cochrane, after he had made a trip to Nelson by land and home by water, said:

> I have every faith in the scheme, and I will push the Hudson bay road for all it is worth.

Lately some doubts appear to have arisen in the public mind regarding the suitability of the port of Nelson. No doubt Churchill is a better harbour in many respects, but the longer distance by rail and the limited size of the port were reasons that actuated both governments in deciding on Nelson. The latter port, as appears from the reports I have gone through, is apparently quite safe. It can accommodate any amount of shipping; it is open longer and experiences less severe cold than does Churchill. In respect to one of the arguments made in commenting on Nelson, I give this in answer to the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) the main channel is only about half a mile wide at the docks, and several of the engineers state that outside the channel on the flats the water is so shallow that the waves do not rise higher than three feet, and that there would be very little interference with the ships lying at anchor off the docks. The channel never freezes to any extent, on account of the swift current and the heavy rise and fall of the tide. Engineer, R. B. Fry, who was sent in there by the Laurier government in 1905, stated that with a light ice-breaker Nelson could easily be kept open all winter. The port of Archangel in northern Russia has handled a large trade for several hundred years, though it is situated 400 miles further north than Nelson and the most northerly point in the track of the ships to and from that port is over 200 miles north of Hudson strait; yet it has been demonstrated that with the assistance of ice-breakers the Archangel route can be kept open practically all winter.

The bay is open all year, and notwithstanding some of the statements we have heard here I am convinced that the straits are open most of the year. There are no difficulties in the way of navigation in the bay itself; in the straits it is evidently the ice flows that interfere with navigation in the fall and the early spring. All navigators whose reports I have gone into agree that with wireless stations and planes to advise vessels regarding the location of ice, the period of navigation can be greatly extended and much delay saved at all times.

An engineer, Mr. J. W. Tyrrell, was sent up there by the government to make observations. He occupied a position in the rocks from which he could view the straits; there he spent the whole winter. He stated that there was no time during the whole winter that the ice was not constantly on the move, and that there were open spaces through which a vessel could pass in all except two months of the year, January and February. In 1903 Mr. A. P. Low was sent into the bay in charge of the steamship Neptune. He wintered inside the straits and came out in the spring. After observing the ice conditions for the season he stated in his report:

> There is little doubt that a specially constructed ship for ice navigation might pass through Hudson strait at any season, but the voyage would be long and the difficulties and dangers would be great.

I do not suggest that it would be advisable to try to make a winter route of the Hudson bay, but there is some ground for believing that that is within the bounds of possibility. Sir George Foster, speaking in the House of Commons in 1913 said:

> We know from personal observation that we have found greater obstacles in the straits of Belle Isle and north of Belle Isle than we found going through the Hudson straits on our trip last year; and from which I gained a most favourable opinion as to the feasibility of that route.

Captain Bernier gave testimony before the Senate committee of 1920—and I would commend this report to the hon. member for Lunenburg, because I do not think there is an hon. gentleman in this House who will question the words of Captain Bernier. He is an old navigator; he has spent months around those northern waters and should be in a better position to speak on the subject than almost anyone else. He said:

> The average season is four months, with wireless I would say four and a half. Aeroplanes would be an immense advantage to get a bird's eye view and report location of ice.

The Senate report of 1907 stated:

> All witnesses agree that under ordinary circumstances the minimum period of navigation would be four months and the maximum would not likely exceed five.

This report also states:

> The consensus of opinion of witnesses is that Hudson bay remains open all year, strait also open all or nearly all year and would be open all the time except for drift ice from the channel. Aids to navigation would greatly facilitate and extend length of season.

But, Sir, I am one of those who believe that the Hudson Bay railway will eventually develop local traffic sufficient to make it profitable, and the development of the resources of that great north country would mean added trade for the industries of eastern Canada as well. The country surrounding the bay is, on the whole, not heavily timbered, but according to reports this is due largely to frequent heavy fires, very often set by the Indians. These fires have kept the forests depleted. Along the Nelson, the Churchill, and other northern rivers there are large forests of spruce and various other woods, and over large tracts of land south and west of the bay there is an immense quantity of wood suitable for pulp. Pulp manufacturing is an industry that should have a great future in that country. Some hon. gentlemen have already dealt with the water-power resources. Along both the Churchill, the Nelson and several other northern streams there is a vast amount of water-power waiting to be developed. Mr. McInnes, an explorer who spent some time in this territory in 1896 and again in 1905 and 1906, stated that along the Nelson were some of the most magnificent power sites in the world capable, he said, of untold development. The country adjacent to the Hudson Bay railway is not usually considered in connection with agriculture. There is little doubt, however, that at some future time it will support a large farming and ranching population as well as fishing and mining. Mr. McInnes states in his official report published in 1900:

> Much of the land is well adapted for agriculture. I saw fine gardens and crops at Nelson house. Wheat ripens well at Norway house. This district contains abundance of timber and grass and has unlimited water-power. Split lake country which is about 250 miles north of Le Pas, to Churchill especially suitable for agriculture. Immense forest belt west of Nelson river. Vegetation is almost tropical.

Mr. McInnes estimated the amount of arable land in the district to be 10,000 square miles fit for settlement, and he described it as being very much in the nature of the Dauphin district. He kept a record of the temperature from the time he arrived at Split lake on the 19th of June, to the 29th of September, and he states that there was no frost to affect the tenderest vegetation. He was convinced that the country was quite suitable for agriculture. In comparing abstracts of summer temperatures with those at Minnedosa, Stoney Mountain and Brandon, he concluded that the country along the proposed railway is conspicuously warmer during the summer months than 400 miles further south. Mr. J. W. Tyrrell, mining engineer, confirms this in his report and states that 42 degrees below was the coldest he experienced it during a winter's stay at the bay. He had found it colder at Winnipeg.

Mr. J. A. J. McKenna, in his report on the Hudson Bay road states:

> The cold at Nelson house is no more intense than that of a winter in northern Manitoba, partly on account of the much lower altitude, and vegetables of all kinds are raised in abundance, growth almost tropical. This is attributed to the long periods of sunlight and the streams of living water everywhere.

Coal is found in abundance in Melville island as well as in several other islands in the northern part of the bay.

Mr. Stefansson reported seeing coal on nearly every island in the north and his party coaled their ships at Melville island. The coal was similar to Ladysmith coal. Capt. Bernier has also mined this coal and reported it as good as Sydney coal.

As this mining can be carried on all winter, I predict that when the railway is completed to James bay the provinces of Ontario and Quebec will be no longer dependent upon the tender mercies of the United States fuel controller. At present we are spending from $50,000,000 to $125,000,000 per year in the United States for coal, most of which will be saved to Canada when the northern railway is completed. In 1920, we bought from the United States, 11,552,000 tons of coal, and in 1921, 15,407,000 tons, and we would have purchased much more had we been allowed to get it.

The finest of beautiful building stone is found along the Hudson Bay line; also immense quantities of commercial limestone. Marble of high grade is found on Marble island. The islands and shores of the bay are rich in gold, copper, iron and many other minerals, and with cheap power and easy transportation this will eventually provide much of the material for our manufacturing industries.

The rivers and lakes draining into the bay and the bay itself teem with fish and valuable marine animals, and the opening of the road will mean the establishing of a lucrative industry in this line. It must not be forgotten that cold water fish are of a very superior quality to those caught in warmer waters. The American fishermen and whalers are at the present time doing a large trade in the bay and I am credibly informed that a large part of their product would be loaded at Nelson and shipped by rail to central markets in the United States.

As an indication of what this would mean to the Canadian National Railways I may quote the following figures from the port of Prince Rupert: In 1921, there were 1,351 American vessel loads of fish totalling 18,642,721 pounds unloaded at that port and shipped in bond over the Canadian National railway to central points in the United States. In 1922, there were 1,274 American vessel loads, totalling 17,183,163 pounds of fish, and I understand that scores of these American vessels were unable to unload there on account of the shortage of refrigerator cars on the Canadian National railways. They were therefore compelled to continue down the coast and take the fish to Seattle. This would have meant a very large amount of traffic for the Canadian National railways. The ivory alone that is being secured yearly by these Americans is an industry in itself and is worth a great deal of money.

Mr. Stefansson, the distinguished explorer, giving evidence before the Senate committee in 1920, stated that the so-called "barren lands" of the north adjoining the bay, on its western shore, were capable of supporting fifty million reindeer and ten million musk ox and the cost of handling these animals would be slight in comparison with the profit to be made. He states the musk ox is the most valuable animal in the world. If domesticated he needs no hay and no barns; he cannot be killed by blizzard and hardly by wolves. He produces three times as much meat as the domestic sheep and three times as much wool. The musk ox will produce about fifty pounds of wool each year of an exceptionally high grade.

The Dominion Lands Act of 1882 provided for the building of this road by private enterprise, the cost to be defrayed by land grants. In 1908 an amendment to the Lands Act provided for a grant of 6,800 acres per mile to the Saskatchewan river and 12,800 acres per mile for the balance of 2,523,008 acres were given to the Winnipeg and Great Northern railway for construction work to the river.

Some time ago I put a question on the order paper regarding this and the answer appeared in Hansard of February 15. It is as follows:

Mr. Campbell:

1. What is the total number of acres of land sold as authorized by statute of 1908 for the purpose of Hudson bay railway construction?

2. What is the total amount for which this land has been sold?

3. How many acres of land are still held in western Canada on account of the above legislation?

Hon. Mr. Stewart:

1. There was no specific authority under the Dominion Lands Act, 1908, for the sale of land for the purpose of Hudson bay railway construction, but pre-emptions and purchased homesteads were sold under the provisions of the said act as follows:—

2. Total acreage of pre-emptions and purchased homesteads sold under the statute of 1908,—8,050,720 acres approximate. Total amount for which pre-emptions and purchased homesteads have been sold $24,-152,160, approximate.

The minister was quite right in stating that the act itself does not specifically provide for the sale of land for the purpose of the Hudson Bay railway construction. But I submit that this was the distinct and specific object in the passing of this act. If hon. gentlemen have doubts about the matter I would refer them to Hansard of June 23, 1908. I will not weary the House with long quotations, but at page 1153 they will find the following from a speech of the Hon. Mr. Frank Oliver.

We propose to allow the purchase by actual settlers, on settlement conditions, of say 5,000,000 acres of land, realizing thereby, out of a fixed and moderate price per acre, sufficient money to meet the requirements of the government in respect of the railway.

I note on that particular occasion the Hon. R. L. Borden made the following observations:

Even if we do not sell an acre of that land, or no matter how much we sell within the next four or five years, the Hudson bay railway project stands by itself endorsed and approved by this House.

Further on he said:

I trust and am led to believe that the Hudson bay railway project will still go on in the meantime and without delay.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What year was that?

Mr. CAMPBELL: In 1908, June 23rd. Now, Sir, in view of the fact that the railway will have to be paid for out of the sale of these lands and by the grain and cattle to be produced by the men who purchased these lands, I want to say that we are not here to-day as humble suppliants asking this parliament for favours; we are here demanding our right. This railway is ours, and I maintain that no other part of the Dominion has contributed anything towards its building. The grading has all been done, the bridges are all in, and only 92 miles of steel remain to be laid to complete this road. The then Minister of Railways when asked the question in the year 1920 as to the estimated cost of laying this steel gave the figure of $1,750,-000. But as material and labour costs have decreased since that time, I presume the work could now be done for less. I understand of course that a great deal of the road already built has been allowed to fall into disrepair, and that a considerable amount of money will be required to put it again into proper shape, but the least we can expect is that this railway should be completed to the bay and put in running shape and local traffic allowed to develop—the traffic from fishing, mining and lumbering industries. In that way we would get a very fair chance to try out the project and convince those who are still doubtful that it is quite feasible.

I should like to observe that the townsite at Fort Churchill has unfortunately been allowed to pass into private hands. The townsite at Port Nelson is still in the possession of the government, and I trust that the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) will see that it is retained until such time as it is needed for actual use instead of being allowed to pass into the hands of speculators.

The hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) asked one hon. member on this side of the House what would become of the Canadian National Railways if the Hudson Bay railway were completed and in operation. Now, Sir, that question carried with it the implication that the scheme was feasible, and I was almost pleased to hear the hon. gentleman make the inquiry. It appears to me that those opposing this project are divided into two classes: those who think it is feasible and oppose it because it is feasible—I do not imply of course that the hon. member for Bonaventure is opposing the resolution; he did not say so—and those who, perhaps honestly, think the project is not feasible.

In going over the estimates that we have been dealing with recently perhaps I may be allowed to observe, without appearing sectional in any way, that after carefully eliminating all the items that could in any way be considered national, and dealing only with those that I could class as gifts or bonuses or subsidies to the provinces, I find the figures are as follows:

Ontario and Quebec	$2,775,000
British Columbia	2,295,000
Maritime provinces	1,921,000

Of this amount I might observe that Prince Edward Island gets only the small portion of $33,700 and the prairie provinces—Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta—only $305,377, the total being $7,298,062.

To this total I might add the steamship subsidies, because in looking over them I do not find any of really national benefit. They serve the small ports, and therefore are only of provincial account. The large trans-Atlantic steamship systems that handle our grain and other products are made to pay their way by the freight charges they collect from our grain and cattle. These steamship subsidies amount to $1,128,275, giving us a total of $8,426,337. In looking at those items one may perhaps be pardoned for observing that the prairie provinces with approximately 25 per cent of the population of the Dominion receive only about 3½ per cent of that total. This is a further reason why the government should give favourable consideration to the completion of the Hudson Bay railway.

In conclusion, I might refer to the fact that we are approaching a by-election in the constituency of Moose Jaw. I predict that the Liberal candidate will be promising the people that if he is elected the government will complete the Hudson Bay railroad. Therefore I hope the government will express themselves a litttle more frankly on this project, because it is certainly going to be an issue in the Moose Jaw election, and I do not want to see the Liberal candidate making any pledges unless he has the government behind him.

As for the criticisms and the doubts levelled at this project, we are quite prepared to meet them. In fact we have been meeting them for the last forty years. Doubtless there are and always will be such scoffers and doubters, and had it not been that men of vision overruled the skeptics the great country west of the Lakes would still be a fur preserve, the Canadian Pacific railway would never have been built. Indeed, we may go back a few hundred years and say that America would never have been discovered. And as we now criticise those who opposed or supported in their day, these other great projects so posterity will judge us for our decisions here to-day.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Before the vote is taken, Mr. Speaker, I wish to declare my position on this resolution. The resolution has not the definiteness and meaningfulness that one would like. Its first demand is that the government consider a report of a Senate committee for the purpose of saving an investment in the Hudson Bay railway.

11 p.m. It would be a strange government in the Hudson Bay railway. solution to that extent. There is no commitment involved; the government accepting it is just where it was before.

The second part of the resolution has more meaning. It calls upon the government to recognize the priority of the undertaking with reference to other transportation projects started subsequent to the Hudson Bay railway. The meaning of that as well could stand further explanation. It may go beyond what the ordinary man would interpret it as conveying. I take it to mean that the completion of the Hudson Bay railway should be a charge upon this country prior to the prosecution of other transportation projects of a similar or larger character. That is to say, the road should be completed before we put through any similar project whether in the East or West; but not that its completion should be held to be a charge prior to the completion of minor, local, auxiliary and subsidiary projects of a transportation character, many of which are under way or should be in various parts of the Dominion.

Now assuming that I have not misinterpreted the resolution, I will make very clear where I stand myself. I hope in that regard I shall have more success than did the Acting-Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) in his address a short time ago. I will try to imitate his brevity, but I will try very seriously to excel his clearness and finality.

In the first place I favour the Hudson Bay railway. It goes without saying that this would be my position. I do not purpose to canvass the merits of the undertaking, as one would be compelled to do if the whole project were in the future. I do not propose to discuss at all the feasibilty of the route. I know there are many still who doubt that feasibility. I know there are some who doubt it whose opinions from a practical standpoint would be better than mine. On that phase I only say this: The matter has been debated and investigated, investigated and debated, not for a few years but for many years, for a whole generation. For forty years it has been the subject of dispute, and in that forty years, four decades, this country has come to the conclusion in so far as a country can express a conclusion, and come to it more than once and at the hands of both great parties.

The Senate of Canada has rendered a special service in this connection. Committees of that body have deliberated, listened to evidence, listened to professional opinion, have delved to the very heart of the question on more occasions than one. I think the most thorough inquiry was at the hands of the Senate committee of 1920. There were those of the Upper House who viewed most pessimistically the feasibility of the navigation of the Hudson straits and who doubtless sought to bring before that committee the weightiest evidence that could be adduced against the practicability of that transportation route. Notwithstanding this, notwithstanding every effort, after very patient and prolonged inquiry the Senate committee reported favourably, and so far as the report shows, it was unanimous.

The Senate committee may be wrong. I know it is impossible lightly to pass aside much that is now brought forward and has been all through these years tending to establish very considerable peril and to lay in the mind doubt as to whether, after all, there may not possibly be failure. Consequently, I would not base my support wholly on the certainty with which any person or any bodies can arrive at a decision on that phase of the question. I think the weight of evidence, the weight of the verdicts that have been given by competent bodies, is in favour of the route.

Then what else is there to be said? On the question of the utility of the road, outside of its utility as an export and import transportation means, there is testimony of a convincing character. I do not say that if it totally fails as a transcontinental means of transport, if it totally fails in its primary purpose, its usefulness for these other purposes would justify its construction were we at the point of determining whether we would undertake it or not but its usefulness for these auxiliary purposes is a real factor and is established beyond all question. The mineral development has been great. The mineral development has so far exceeded all reasonable expectations. That it will increase, there can be no question. In gold, in copper, in ivory, in many lines of minerals there is undoubtedly going to be great production in that region. As well there is prospect, indeed there is certainty, of substantial agricultural development, though by no means is that prospect as bright as it is for mineral development. There is also the exploration of the whole fishery resources of Hudson bay. That these will amount to something there can be no reasonable question. What it will amount to is problematical as yet. As well for the transport of western coal into the heart of Ontario, there is sound reason, not fantastical at all, to hope that a feasible and a practicable route will be found along the Hudson bay. The extension of the Ontario government road up to Moose Factory will form a means of connection by which there can be transport from Nelson to Moose Factory by water over Hudson bay, and over these government roads by land, very much shorter and undoubtedly cheaper than in any present means of transport. Of course there will be ice difficulties there, but by no means of the character or moment of similar difficulties to the north through the straits.

On account of these other services that the road renders, a second very powerful argument can be adduced in support of the project. But I do not rest on these two arguments at all. Indeed, I can quite understand the mind that resting on these two alone would feel that at this time we should not undertake such a venture. I base my position upon other ground upon which I place more importance than on anything I have said so far. We are not at the commencement of the venture. We are well on toward the conclusion of the venture. This country is committed to the project. This country has been committed to the project for at least fifteen years. This country has made a contract with many citizens that the road will be built, and it is a matter of good faith with a large portion of our population that the covenant of the Dominion be kept.

The history of the undertaking is long; the history of the subject is very long, but passing over the early period when perhaps it was the sport of political adventurers, and coming up to 1908, the Conservative party at that time became committed to putting through the Hudson Bay railway. The Liberal party about the same time—I am not certain about the priority of dates, but I know that both parties made it a portion of their platforms about that year. I know that prior to the election of 1911 the government of the day made a contract with a firm for the construction of a large section of the mileage, I think 187 miles. I do not think any practical work was done. I think the hon. gentleman who just sat down did them credit overmuch in this respect. I fancy that if the Minister of Railways turned the first sod, he turned about the last sod too under Liberal administration, but upon the change of government the contract was for the time being suspended in order that the matter might be looked into from a practical standpoint, with a view to determining chiefly what the best port was, and with a view to ascertaining the merits of the contract in every way. That done the contract was gone on with. That done the covenant of the Conservative party was implemented, and that mileage, and as well a further considerable mileage, was constructed, I think, totaling 332 miles. As well the grade was laid for the balance, or for almost all the balance; I believe I am right in saying that the entire balance of mileage was constructed, as far as the laying down and the grade was concerned.

Then the war came, and by unanimous consent—for I do not think there was any objection; I believe western Canada knowing, or believing, at least, that it was serious for that part of the country, quite acquiesced—it was determined that the project could not be gone on with at all during the continuance of the struggle. The war lasted until the close of 1918. But the burden of the conflict was heavier financially when the war was over than during its continuance. The burdens incident to taking care of the returned men, and all the other problems that followed in the wake of the war, made it impossible to pursue the project further for some time.

During the period that succeeded the war, pressure was brought to bear upon the government of that time to devote moneys to the construction of the road. The government did not see its way to accede to such pressure. Parenthetically let me say that the determination of the building or the taking up of rails and all else is a matter for this government and this parliament. It is a matter solely for our decision; it is not a matter for the decision of the directors of the National Railways at all. It has been a government project from the beginning, it is a capital undertaking, consequently it is an undertaking for which this government and this parliament are responsible, and in respect of which neither can shelter itself behind the Board of Directors of the National Railways.

I said that the late government did not feel that it could justify acceding to the pressure to continue the building of the road during its term of office. We were subjected to considerable abuse for taking that course. The then member for Nelson (Mr. J. A. Campbell), I recall was most insistent—and not only most insistent but I am sure hon. members who have spoken in a totally different vein in this debate will agree most unreasonable—in his attitude toward the late administration on this subject. During those years, because of the fact that we had to rehabilitate the Canadian National system, we had to overtake years and years of deferred betterments and years and years of deferred equipment, we had to build branch lines without the completion of which almost indescribable hardship would have existed—during those periods when money by the hundreds of millions had to be applied to make our railway system that we now own the system that it is to-day, a system that we are proud of, pressure was determined and unrelenting upon the late government, at the same time, to complete the Hudson Bay railway. The situation is rather different to-day. I am not saying that even yet the time has come—I observe this resolution does not say that even yet the time has come—when the capital moneys necessary to immediately complete this railway, should be provided. The situation is however wholly different to what it was some three years ago. Now the moneys that are necessary for our Canadian National Railways—because of the position they have been brought to, because of the patronage they are receiving on account of the service they are able to give—those moneys are much less—less by scores of millions than they were in those other times; and now this House is evidently of the opinion, if this resolution is to express its view, that the time is even not yet at hand when further capital should be expended on extending this route.

I have given a history of the subject up to the present time. We find ourselves now within about eighty miles of the completion of the laying down of the rails to Port Nelson. We find ourselves fairly well agreed that the right port has been selected as the terminus at Hudson bay. Very much doubt existed as to that, but I fancy from the tone of this debate, that it is generally conceded that Nelson is the correct port. We find, as well, that even though the money necessary—some four or five millions—to finish the construction and complete the terminals at Hudson bay has been expended, even after that is done, to put the harbour in shape as originally contemplated will take some nine millions more. That totals about fourteen or fifteen million dollars, and in addition the building of a terminal elevator will be essential in order to provide facilities for the export of wheat. These are not small figures; they are large.

And here let me make this observation: It would seem to me, and it has seemed to me for some time, that it ought to be possible with completion of the railway mileage to provide—perhaps not on the scale originally contemplated but on some less pretentious scale, perhaps some less permanent scale—facilities by which the route can be tested, the feasibility of the navigation of the straits as a commercial venture can be tested, and all these obstacles be tried out. There should be some way by which—with a less expenditure, on a less extensive, possibly, let me say, a less permanent scale,—the whole plant could be put to trial.

Now, assuming so much let me say that it should have priority in my judgment, over other national ventures of a major kind. I do not think good faith will be kept with western Canada unless that is recognized by this House. Men have gone in there, families have gone in, settlers have gone in, on the faith of the determination of this parliament that the road would be built. Whatever may be the average judgment of a member here to-day, there is no disputing the fact at all that the three prairie provinces of the West are a unit, virtually a unit—behind the feasibility of this scheme. They to-day look to the Hudson Bay railway with the same enthusiasm, with the same confidence, that they displayed at the time they were able to persuade this parliament to undertake the venture. Settlers have gone in; large sections are to-day more populated than they would have been had the word of parliament not been given in this regard. Not only have settlers gone in but those already there—farmers of western Canada—relying upon the policy to which parliament was committed have extended their operations, have made investments and commitments on the face of the project. Of that there can be no question at all. This is the case over a large area of land; it applies to many tens and hundreds of thousands of our population. When we get that far we have not the option of turning back. It is the duty of this parliament to go on with the project and complete it, and parliament cannot say "We will do so in the long distant future, we will do so when we feel good and ready at some indefinite time." Such a course would not be keeping faith with western Canada. Parliament, of course, is justified in saying "We cannot do this now. We cannot commit ourselves to similar ventures now; the state of our finances will not permit." Such was the attitude assumed by the late administration. Such an attitude on the part of this government is less defensible because at the present time our railway commitments are by no means what they were, more time has elapsed and longer delay has occurred. While it may be defensible for a while, it would not do for this government and parliament to say "We leave ourselves free to launch on any venture whatsoever; we leave ourselves free to assume large national undertakings of a transportation kind, and let the Hudson Bay railway, to which we have been committed for 20 years, stand indefinitely in abeyance." I do not think such a course would be justified, and I think a negative to this resolution would virtually be a statement by this House that it left itself open to adopt such a course. Consequently, it does not seem to me a negative should be given. With the reservation, that I stated at first, that the completion of branch lines or local undertakings, proved essential in any part of Canada, is not necessarily affected by the passing of the resolution—with that reservation, I support the affirmative.

I believe, aside from all I have said, that every portion of our country is entitled, just as soon as the financial strength of the country justifies it, to the shortest, the best, the cheapest, let me say in one word, the most efficient lines for the transport of its surplus that can be procured, subject only to this qualification, that transport through Canadian ports west, north or east, should always have priority over transport through the ports of another country. With that reservation, I say the farmers of the far West have a right to reasonable facilities for the best transportation of their produce, namely, through the Pacific. Farmers through the central part of the West have the right to the best transport on the shortest line that can be provided for them. Canada has determined that this route furnishes that requirement for at least a considerable section of the country. Consequently Canada must comply with her undertaking in this respect. The same thing applies to eastern Canada. That is the general principle which is followed. In pursuance of this principle, relying mainly on the engagement this country has entered into, relying on the fact that we must keep faith, or respect for parliament will be lost, I support the resolution.

Let me express my regret that the minister has gone no further than to state that the government is not purposing to abandon the route. If I fully understood his remarks, he did not go beyond that assertion. I do not think such an assertion on the part of the government is sufficient. I think the House has a right to expect something more definite from the administration. Does the administration accede to the resolution or does it not? As far as I am concerned, there can be no mistaking where I stand, and it is not too much to ask members of the government to tell us where they stand.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): I very much regret that engagements elsewhere prevented my having the pleasure of being present this afternoon, and consequently I have not heard the debate. I have no doubt it was very instructive and interesting. But with very much that the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) has said I cordially agree. I think it is too late to discuss the merits of the scheme. I am not so enthusiastic in my belief as to its value as a grain carrying route as some others, but this matter has been threshed out in years gone by, and rightly or wrongly this House, under various governments, has consented to the building of the Hudson Bay railway and the government of which I was a member began the construction of the railway. I think if one looks at the map of western Canada it is not difficult to find a reason why the western country should seek an outlet to the nearest and most attractive tidewater. If I lived in the West I should feel that we should have access to that route. Both parties have accepted the responsibility of it, and have done something in the way of building it, and both parties should see to it that it is one of the things we must undertake and in a reasonable time complete. I would hesitate to vote against it, because there is the danger that if one should vote against the resolution it would seem to imply a denial of the commitment of the past. I do not wish to be put in that position. In the resolution a clause has been inserted about priority over other projects. I am not sure what are the other engagements over which this is to have priority, but there are really commitments all over the Dominion, and it is the duty of the government to consider them all. I am anxious that the Hudson Bay railway should be undertaken but my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) made some reservation, and I should like to make a reservation. We must have some regard to the financial condition of the country, and I ask the House to keep that reservation in mind. I am going to support the resolution, because to vote against it would seem to me to be an indication that we were denying responsibility for the Hudson Bay railway. I do not want to deny it. I want to accept it, and the only reservation I make is that which applies to all large enterprises in Canada, namely that you must have regard to the financial situation of the country.

Mr. O. R. GOULD (Assiniboia): Since the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has made a few remarks, I feel much better than I did before. I was about to rise to remark that there would not be very many people in the West who would throw their hats in the air when they read the remarks of the Acting Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham). Hon. members representing the northern part of the western provinces have addressed the House and laid the facts well before the House; in fact there has been considerable repetition, but I do not rise for the purpose of repeating any facts which have been presented to show the feasibility of the route. I firmly believe in it. It has been a part of my teaching in the West. I believe in it and see the need of it. But speaking as one who comes from near the international boundary, I might state that we in the West know no party politics. Politics have no connection with the question; neither is it Progressive, Conservative, or Liberal. Each and all believe in the feasibility and propriety of the route. I have before me a resolution passed by the Estevan Board of Trade, that being the largest commercial centre in the electoral district of Assiniboia. I wish to read a few notes from a letter from the secretary of the Board of Trade, which accompanied the resolution. He says:

> We feel strongly that this is a matter that should have the hearty support of every western member, and trust that some action may be taken by the government to ensure the completion of this project at an early date.

That is a sentiment we have had in common for a long time. I believe in the immediate completion of that road. I believe in the immediate completion of the facilities whereby at least a real good test of that route may be had. Further than that I am not going to ask the government to commit themselves to-night, but it seems to me that the 118 miles that it is proposed by the Acting Minister of Railways to have repaired does not go far enough to satisfy the needs of the country or the wishes of the people there, or to fulfil the promises that have been given to the people in the past. Now, I must protest to-night that it is not a fair thing to the people in that western country. They have a right to expect and do expect more, and I do hope the government may see in their wisdom ways and means whereby they can make provision for the road to Port Nelson this year. As I said before the ground has been well covered, and no arguments, I think, have been adduced to counter those which have been advanced in favour of the project.

Mr. ANDREW KNOX (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to delay the House much longer on this question. The debate, I think, has covered the ground very fully, and in fact has been illuminating in many regards. I believe some benefit has been derived from this discussion and although I have made some notes in regard to some remarks that have been made I will be very brief in dealing with them.

Practically the only opposition to the motion was offered by the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff). He assured us that he was with us on the tariff. Well, I must say that sympathy on the tariff is of very little use unless something else goes with it. He gave us to understand that he was opposed to us on the question of the Hudson bay project; possibly his opposition there will be about the same as his sympathy on the other question. Speaking of the tariff, it does seem too bad if we are restricted both in our buying and in our selling; because I am convinced that the restriction in our selling is brought about by the restriction in our buying. And along with these two restrictions, we shall suffer a further handicap if we are restricted in our outlets.

The hon. member for Lunenburg made reference to Captain Anderson's report on his trip in 1914, and emphasized the difficulty Captain Anderson had experienced in connection with getting stuck in the ice. Well that does not establish the impossibility of navigating Hudson straits. We know that many sea captains have got stuck in ice on the Atlantic. I am not a seafaring man, but I have had a little experience in that regard myself; I was on a vessel which was stuck two days and two nights in ice and fog on the Atlantic.

I might go further into this report, but I think it would be better to close the debate. I was disappointed that the Acting Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) did not go further than he did. We were to glad to know that the government had no intention of abandoning the project and that the 332 miles would be brought up to standard. But when we get that far we are no further ahead than we were in 1918, and I would like to see some indication that something further is to be done in that regard.

Mr. GRAHAM: You will be a good deal further ahead than you are now—118 miles ahead that otherwise would be gone.

Mr. KNOX: There will be some delegations down here shortly from the West asking for something more than what is embodied in the minister's statement, and I hope the government will accede to their request.

[Mr. Knox.]

In looking over this resolution I cannot see anything in it that the government cannot accept, having in mind the remarks made by the Acting Minister of Railways as well as by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). I do not think, therefore, that it is too much to ask that the resolution be adopted.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. MARLER: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member may not speak at this stage without the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Motion (Mr. Knox) agreed to, on division.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King, the House adjourned at 11.40 p.m.

Tuesday, March 13, 1923

The House met at three o'clock.

REPORTS PRESENTED

Third report of the select standing committee on Banking and Commerce.—Mr. Maclean (Halifax).

First report of the select standing committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph lines.—Mr. Cahill.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax) moved:

That the third report of the select standing committee on Banking and Commerce be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

MARINE AND FISHERIES

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved:

That the fifty-fifth annual report of the Department of Marine and Fisheries for the fiscal year 1921-22 be referred to the select standing committee on Marine and Fisheries.

Motion agreed to.

ADMIRALTY ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. Sir LOMER GOUIN (Minister of Justice) moved: That the House do tomorrow go into Committee of the Whole to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Admiralty Act, chapter one hundred and forty-one of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, and to provide that the Governor in Council may, from time to time, appoint for any admiralty district one or more deputy local judges, and revoke such appointments; appoint for any district or registry division of any district a deputy registrar; and when the local judge of the Quebec Admiralty district resides in Montreal, the deputy local judge residing in Quebec shall be paid the salary which he would have received if he were the local judge of the district; and when the local judge resides at Quebec, the deputy local judge residing at Montreal shall receive the salary which he would have received if he were the local judge of the district; but not more than one deputy local judge in any district shall receive a salary.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General has been informed of the subject matter of this resolution, and has been pleased to recommend the same to the consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

PORTFOLIO OF RAILWAYS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Will the Prime Minister be good enough to tell us now when we may expect an end of the present makeshift arrangement as to the Department of Railways and Canals?

Mr. GRAHAM: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The present arrangement is a very good one.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the House has a right to a better answer than that. I used the term "makeshift" because it was the name the Prime Minister himself applied a few years ago to a similar arrangement. I think the Prime Minister owes it to the House to say what his intentions are as to time in this regard—how long he expects it will be before there will be a regularly constituted minister in charge of this department. The House is in session and the need of a regularly constituted minister is much greater than if the House were not in session.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think the House has been embarrassed in any way, in view of the arrangement at the present time. My hon. friend will appreciate that, in the matter of filling a cabinet vacancy, the Prime Minister must be allowed sufficient time. I do not think it is imperative to fill the vacancy at the present time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know the Prime Minister must be allowed sufficient time, but all I am asking is, not that he be not allowed the time, but that he advise the House as nearly as he can what time he considers necessary.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not in a position to give my right hon. friend a definite answer.

HANSARD—MISSING PAGES

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): I would like to direct the attention of the House to a matter which occurred on 6th March when the estimates of the Defence department were before the committee. I asked a question with reference to an item and was told that the information I desired was contained in Hansard of last year. I sent to my room for the bound copy of Hansard which had been supplied to me. Afterwards I made further reference to the matter, but was informed by the chairman of the committee that I was out of order in doing so. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) asked me a question, and, instead of answering him, I sent across the floor of the House the bound volume which I had obtained. He is reported in Hansard to have said:

In the copy of Hansard which my hon. friend has just handed me it looks as though those pages had been cut out.

I did not take notice of it at the time, but I have observed since that several references have been made to it in the press, and the impression is being given, or the insinuation made, that some person was a party to cutting these leaves out of Hansard. I called up Mr. Cook, who, I thought, was still connected with the Bureau. A few days ago I handed him the volume and he took it to the Librarian of Parliament. I interviewed the librarian, and from him I have obtained the following statement which, with your permission and the consent of the House, I would like to have placed on Hansard:

OTTAWA, 8th March, 1923.

DONALD SUTHERLAND, Esq., M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa.

Dear sir,—I beg to confirm what I mentioned to you this morning: Mr. Fred Cook brought to the library, this morning, a copy of the House of Commons Hansard, vol. 3, 1922, out of which after page 2082, a whole signature was missing. Being asked if there was any trace of this signature having been either torn from the book or otherwise separated from it, I carefully examined the appearance of the volume, and found no sign of cut thread, or remnant of the sewing thread. I concluded and answered that this was evidently a case of the gatherer at the printing bureau having omitted to insert the missing signature in its proper place, or having wrongly placed it elsewhere. I brought the volume to our expert binder, Mr. Brown, and asked him what he thought of the appearance, and he fully confirmed my impression.

Yours very truly,

J. de L. TACHÉ,
General Librarian.

If there is any suspicion in the mind of any hon. member with regard to the matter, I would ask as a personal favour that a committee of the House be appointed to examine this volume and report.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I do not know whether my hon. friend wants a word from me, but if he thinks I intended to cast any reflection on him personally, I am very sorry he gathered that impression; I had not the slightest intention of so doing. The volume I had in my hand, which he sent over to me, had a distinct cleavage in it at the place the pages were missing, and it did look to me as though these pages had been taken out, and I so expressed myself. I would be glad to have any member of the House examine the volume, but I did not mean to say my hon. friend had taken the pages out. He made a great deal of the missing pages. I did not make any reflection whatever.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The statement of the Prime Minister has made it more apparent than ever that it would be advisable to have a committee appointed to examine the volume.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I looked at the copy and saw the pages were missing—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the incident is closed. The Prime Minister says he did not cast any reflection.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I must respectfully object to any insinuation as to any cutting being done. The expert evidence is altogether to the contrary.

SUPPLY

IMMIGRATION AND COLONIZATION

The House in Committee of Supply. Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

Immigration—outside service, salaries, $700,000.

Mr. MANION: I would like to ask the minister for a statement in regard to the whole immigration policy in general. I understood we were to have such a statement.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization): Immigration is probably one of the most discussed subjects in Canada, and in a brief way I hope this afternoon to cover some of the important points, at least so far as I am able to see them, and the recommendations that have been made to the government with respect to this very important matter.

[Mr. Sutherland.]

I think, Mr. Chairman, that one can best begin a discussion of this subject by giving a review of opinion in our own country. I have heard a great many different views expressed during the past summer with respect to this question. Some people are of the opinion that we should take steps to bring a huge tide of immigration to Canada; and not only that, but that we should follow some method such as that adopted for the settlement of our returned soldiers,—borrowing large sums of money for the purpose of settling upon our vacant lands people who will come to us from the various parts of the world. Others oppose that idea, and many Canadian agriculturists feel—and they have so expressed their feeling to me—that it is our first business to make the people already on the land prosperous before bringing more upon the land and placing them in a similar condition.

I want to take the middle course between the two extremes. I think I may preface my remarks by saying that with the problem that Canada has to face, with the financial obligations that the people of Canada now have to shoulder, it is imperative that we get more people to assist with this burden that is bearing rather heavily upon our shoulders to-day. Sometimes, one cannot help comparing today's conditions with those of eight, ten or fifteen years ago when we had, perhaps not so large a flow of immigration, as is sometimes stated, but a flow annually that would be regarded as reasonable. While I adopt the middle position, I am not unmindful of the fact, as I said before, that it is imperative to add to the population of Canada; but that addition should be made with care, with a view to the assimilation of the people who will come amongst us and the making of a Canadian citizenship that we shall be proud of. That leads one to this point, and I will not enlarge very greatly upon it. Having all these things in mind, what class of people can we take into Canada and absorb most readily to-day, and who are the most desirable people to come amongst us? After a survey of conditions in Canada, one is led to the conclusion that there is not a great need of immigrants in our cities, particularly in the larger centres. The records of the past year or two have shown that we have had unemployment and that additions to the urban population of very large numbers would create a situation that would not be well for Canada. Not only that, but we must admit that for the past year or two, from the urban centres of Canada a very considerable number of people have left us and gone across the line to the United States. That movement has been accelerated by the fact that the American government have seen fit to place in their Immigration Act a clause providing that from outside countries, with the exception of Canada, three per cent is the maximum number that will be permitted to land in the United States during any one calendar year. Canada alone is the exception; from Canada immigrants may flow freely into the United States, and this has created in the United States, particularly in the urban centres, a scarcity of labour that is being supplied from the urban centres of Canada, and to some extent from our rural sections as well.

Let me say, in passing, that I doubt if we shall ever reach the time when we shall not have an efflux of Canadians into the United States. I have looked carefully over the records of the past fifteen years, and I find that it is somewhat surprising that during all those years there has been a fairly steady movement in that direction. The movement has varied a little, some years more some less, some years not quite counteracted by the movement from the United States to Canada; but during all those years that exodus seems to have kept up, and probably it will continue for some time. Therefore, we are restricted in the industrial field, particularly in the urban centres, although that is not quite so apparent to-day as it was three months ago, and we are limited to the rural field for settlement of people whom we shall bring to Canada.

This brings me to the point where I wish to discuss for a few moments conditions as we find them in rural localities in Canada. I know that hon. gentlemen opposite will say that there are two or three outstanding reasons why agriculture is to-day in its present financial condition. Perhaps, the tariff has a great deal to do with the matter; perhaps a reason may be that transportation costs are high, or interest charges are unreaonable; and I am going to admit, in a reasonable way, because I do not want to be unreasonable, that many of these things are factors in producing present-day conditions, coupled with the sudden depression in prices of products of the farms of Canada and with no corresponding reduction in the price of commodities that the agriculturists must use in their business. But let us be fair. There are other influences that, perhaps have had some effect. Is it not a fact that inflated values as a result of the war—and I speak as one of those who are affected because I have no other business than that of agricuture and I know somewhat of those conditions—led us into difficulties in connection with purchasing land and with reaching out maybe a little further than we should have gone. I am not unmindful of the fact that some will say that we were encouraged to do so; that we were asked to produce in a way that we had never produced before in order that the world's supplies of food might be kept up to the necessities of that period. I am not unmindful of all those things; but perhaps over-reaching has also contributed somewhat to the difficulties in which we find ourselves to-day. All these factors—and I have not time to deal with them now — have left agriculture, from one end of Canada to the other, in a somewhat depressed condition.

But again, I think we can get some encouragement by looking backward I know there are in this House to-day many hon. members who will remember that period of the early nineties. I was farming in Ontario at that time—and perhaps many here were engaged in the same occupation—and agricultural conditions then in my opinion, were worse than they are to-day in Canada. Looking back upon that period, I remember that wheat, cattle, hogs, dairy products were lower in price than they have been during the past two years. I will say this, that the commodities which we had to purchase in order to carry on our business were also 25 or 30 per cent lower, and in that respect, perhaps, the situation is almost evened up. We did not recover rapidly from that condition of affairs during that period. True, we did begin to recover in 1894, 1895 and 1896, and I suppose my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) will tell me that the real era of prosperity began in 1896. Perhaps, our recovery in the present case will be found to have begun from the year 1921.

An hon. MEMBER: Pretty slow.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I see my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance, thinks that is rather a joke.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Well, I never claimed to be an optimist, but in this respect, in the face of conditions as they are to-day, I think I can say, and say with full assurance that perhaps we have struck the bottom in the matter of depression. There must be a corresponding reduction, which I see approaching rapidly, in the commodities that are to be utilized by the farmers of Canada, and that must come about before we have a complete reaction.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is the minister not aware that Mr. Roger Babson recently reported a steady rise in commodity prices next year, but no corresponding rise in agricultural products?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I think I can see evidences that we may be justified in differing from Mr. Roger Babson.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Do the official records of the government show a declining curve in commodity values?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Not appreciably at the moment, no.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Let me refer my hon. friends again to history. Has the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) ever known, or can he name, a period in history when there was a continued rise in the commodities manufactured for use by the agriculturists of a country like Canada, and when there was no corresponding increase in agricultural products?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think myself that cycles occur and that time will do its work. But with the government in office I despair of everything else except time.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): If my hon. friend will forget about the government in office for a moment and deal with the subject in hand we shall get on.

Mr. IRVINE: On what ground does the minister base his optimism with regard to the contemplated decline in prices?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): On the old and well known ground, as I have just stated to the leader of the Opposition, that in countries such as Canada agriculture cannot long continue in a depressed state. I will admit to my hon. friend that there are conditions to-day to be met with that have not had to be faced in the past, conditions in connection with the various articles that go to make up cost, that have not had to be coped with in the past in the same manner as they will have to be met to-day. But there must come a levelling-up between the amount the farmer receives for his labour and that received by labour in other walks of life. That inevitably must come about. And just as sure as there is in the American states to-day an unprecedented era of prosperity in the urban communities, perhaps previously unknown in the history of that country, there is a corresponding depression in agriculture. I shall deal with that point for a moment or two this afternoon and recite some of my experiences in that connection. But let me observe in passing that I am not suggesting, as someone is sure to imply in a moment, that labour should take less for that which it is so frequently represented as selling. Someone is sure to ask, are they to take less?. I am not suggesting that. I am suggesting that labour will be enabled to purchase more of the necessities of life and that there will be a reduction in the natural commodities that pass between one class of the community and the other. I am not unmindful of conditions as they are, but with them I cannot at present deal for any considerable length of time. I will touch them again perhaps a little more fully when I come to consider the question as to the class of people whom we hope to encourage to come to Canada.

Conditions to-day, however, are changing very rapidly in Canada; they change month by month. Three months ago we could not have held out encouragement to labourers to come to Canada to secure employment unless they were agricultural labourers; and I think that one of the problems that has to be faced to-day, in contrast with days gone by in connection with immigration, is the fact that we must necessarily be exercised about the question where the labourer is going to locate and what vocation he is going to be engaged in. Heretofore not very much attention has been paid to that aspect of immigration; rather we have been bringing immigrants into Canada and letting them shift very largely for themselves. Let me deal for a moment or two with where we hope to bring our settlers from and how we propose to settle them. We propose to bring settlers in as large a way as possible from Great Britain, and to encourage as many as will come from there to settle in Canada.

Mr. SPENCER: Is it true that of the advertising being carried on for settlers, some $3,000 has been spent in Great Britain as against $90,000 elsewhere?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Ninety-two thousand dollars.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): That was given in a return asked for by my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), and for the first time the advertising branch of the Department of Immigration began to segregate its accounts. It is not true that $3,000 represents the whole sum spent in Great Britain; it represents simply the amount spent in newspaper advertising. My secretary gave a supplementary return which will be found in the Revised Hansard, and my hon. friend was given the return.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am sorry about that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There was nothing to my knowledge that was supplementary, and the return stands uncorrected, so far as I have been instructed.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): At any rate, I will give at a later period the complete amounts expended during the past fiscal year in advertising in Great Britain and the United States.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the $90,000 odd include anything except newspaper advertising?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes; I will deal with that when the estimates are being considered in detail. Now, we hope to encourage all settlers who will come to Canada from Great Britain, Scandinavia, Holland, Belgium, France and Finland. This fact must be borne in mind, however, that from a rather close investigation of the areas from which we hope to draw our settlers, there do not appear to be a very large number of people who are in a position to purchase land and establish themselves upon their arrival in Canada. So that the bulk of our immigration, or at least a large proportion of it, will naturally be of the class who will be seeking employment. And that is not confined to Great Britain alone; that condition seems to be prevalent in every country in which we have made investigations and from which we hope to encourage settlers to come here. War conditions appear to have left the people of the Old Land, one would perhaps not say in an impoverished state, but at least in such circumstances that they have not a great deal of capital that is not invested and which they can withdraw from the businesses in which it is tied up. I should say that somewhere between twenty-five and thirty-five per cent of the total number of immigrants we expect will be able to establish themselves and that means one thing: we must take steps to assist these people in the work of colonization. With that end in view I have sought the co-operation of the provincial governments throughout Canada. In some respects I take the province of Ontario as an illustration. The authorities there are engaged in immigration work of their own. They are proceeding much the same as the federal government hope to, and prefer to carry on their own work in their London office. It is an altogether different problem with the province of Quebec. The government of that province are anxious to repatriate a large number of their citizens who have gone into the New England states. One of the striking features in connection with the migration from Quebec and the Maritime provinces to the United States, most of which comes from the rural parts, is that those people do not engage in agriculture across the line but find employment mainly in the textile industries of the New England states. The purpose of our propaganda is to induce these people to return to Canada, and with that in view we have employed Mr. Arthur Lemont to take charge of this important work.

Mr. LADNER: Has the minister approximate figures showing the exodus of our people to the United States within the last year? And is that exodus ceasing, or to what extent is it still draining this country of its best type of citizens?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No. In looking over the figures for some years past one is a little surprised to find that on the whole there is little variation; the number may be a little higher one year, a little lower the next year, and vice versa. I have the figures for the past few months. One of the difficulties in dealing with the figures of migration to the United States is that, if, six months after their entry, our people have not returned to Canada, they are then regarded as permanent residents of the United States and are so entered in their returns. Consequently there is a vast difference between the number of Canadians migrating to the United States and the actual number who become permanent residents. I shall go into that more fully when dealing with the United States situation.

Mr. SPENCER: What inducement is being offered to Canadian citizens in the United States to return to Canada?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): In conjunction with the provincial governments we are trying to get those people to come back and take up agricultural land in the province of Quebec. In the northern portions of that province the provincial government are opening up new country along the line of the transcontinental railway. I take it that we are all interested in the success of that undertaking, and it is there that we hope to establish settlement. The provincial government are offering settlers free grants of land with the addition of some improvements thereon, because the land is all wooded and some development work is needed in order to give the settler a start. Of course, perhaps, the one thing that he will hope to make a livelihood out of for the first few years will be the pulpwood which he will take off his land.

Mr. LEWIS: Is this an offer to all Canadians who have gone to the United States?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What is the acreage under this scheme?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): One hundred acres to each settler.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): All wooded land?

Mr. MEIGHEN: What did Mr. Lemont do before he went over to the United States to take charge of the minister's repatriation programme?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): He was a newspaper man.

Mr. MEIGHEN: On what newspaper?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I cannot tell you.

An hon. MEMBER: Le Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I suppose he is in a better position now than he formerly occupied? Anyway he is doing more good.

Mr. JACOBS: Out of order.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I do not know the gentleman personally. He was recommended as a man who could carry on this work with success.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Was he appointed by the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No. That is still to be accomplished.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The government appoints him first and then tries to get the accomplishment through the commission.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Let us get on with immigration. Don't quibble.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): There is some difficulty in getting appointments for immigration purposes passed by the Civil Service Commission. We asked the Civil Service Commission some time last October to fill two positions in the Old Country, one at Carlisle and the other at Southampton. On the 8th of last month applications were closed, but the appointments are not yet made. In view of these difficulties I have this gentleman engaged on this work for the time being in the hope that he may ultimately be appointed by the commission;—he may not be,—in the meantime we are having some active work carried on.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: With what result?

Mr. HANSON: What is the policy of the government of New Brunswick in reference to this immigration?—if they have any policy, which I doubt.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): For the benefit of my hon. friend I will deal with New Brunswick and Nova Scotia in a moment or two; for the present I should like to finish with Quebec. Immigration to Quebec is not being confined simply to Canadians living in the New England states. There are enterprises in the northern portions of Quebec that will require the influx of a considerable amount of labour, and I doubt if such labour will be found in Canada. I am free to say that we are looking for it in the Old Land and want as much of it as we can absorb. This also applies to the northern portions of Ontario. We are carrying on propaganda in an endeavour to secure settlers of the type and character that will assimilate with our people, and are providing places for them to settle on. That is what we are endeavouring to do in this scheme. I have not any brand new striking policy to offer because between two extremes I have decided to adopt the middle course, and in pursuing that course I am trying to get value for the money we expend on bringing people to Canada by keeping them here when we get them. I take it that no hon. gentleman will quarrel with the attitude of my department in that regard.

With respect to the Maritime provinces, their governments were invited to send delegates to discuss this matter with us. To-day we have in England a representative who has intimate knowledge of local conditions in New Brunswick and is working in the interests of that province. The same thing applies to Nova Scotia.

Mr. HANSON: Who is that gentleman?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Mr. W. R. Bowder. The same thing applies to Nova Scotia. The officer in charge of this work in Boston is a native of Nova Scotia and, as I understand it, has been working in the interests of the Maritime provinces in an endeavour to bring from the States settlers for New Brunswick and Nova Scotia.

With respect to western Canada, we have not been successful in getting such complete cooperation of the provincial governments there as we have in the East. They took the ground—and I have no quarrel with it, because I took it myself when I was in charge of affairs in Alberta—that immigration is the problem of the federal government and that no expenditure under that head should be required on the part of provincial governments. I felt I was on fair ground in taking that stand when premier of Alberta, and I have no quarrel, I say, with my western friends in that respect. As in 1908—as, indeed, in the period prior to 1908, in fact, ever since the Canadian Pacific railway was built across the plains—the western provinces have been the great fertile fields for increased population so far as agriculture in Canada is concerned. I am not unmindful of the fact that it is possible in eastern Canada, especially in the northern portion of it, to establish a great many people on the land, but they would have to be selected with a view to their adaptability to the conditions existing there. For the next decade at least the western provinces offer the most fertile field for immigration, and I want to deal with the question for a moment or two from that point of view.

Because of the conditions I have mentioned, the people on the land to-day are feeling the pinch rather severely, and I do not wonder that they sometimes question the wisdom of expenditure on the part of the government for the purpose of bringing new settlers into western Canada, where so many people at present find it difficult to carry on. Well, if we are to sit down and fold our hands; if we are to stop immigration entirely; if we are to say that our present population is to carry the obligations connected with our railways—which, we all admit, are over-built—if we are to leave the vacant lands of western Canada as they are to-day, I think we shall be following an unwise policy. We must take steps to settle up those vacant areas. We must take steps to bring in sufficient labour to enable the farmer to carry on in western Canada. I believe that the productivity of the area that is already broken in western Canada could, by the application of sufficient labour, be increased by at least thirty or forty per cent. But that is not the scheme I have to present to the newcomer. It will be suggested to him that he can make a success of agriculture in the West or in other parts of Canada if he avoids some of the pitfalls that we have encountered in the past. If we are honest with ourselves we will admit that one of the most serious of those pitfalls has been our endeavour to own too much land. When we went westward, 160 acres looked like a very large farm; we were not in western Canada very long when a half section did not seem to be too large; then we set about to acquire a section; and when we had done that we wanted more. The advice I propose to give to the new settler is this: not to acquire more land than he can cultivate—I do not suggest that he might cultivate 160 acres during his first year. It is a fact that in the West to-day good agricultural land along the lines of the Canadian National railway, untilled, can be purchased at from $15 to $25 an acre, or at an average of, say, $18 to $20 an acre. If a man buys a quarter-section his overhead will not be as heavy as it will if he goes on the principle of acquiring large areas.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is it not true that a few years ago the prospective settler could get that land, not for $15 to $25 an acre, but free, and thus clear of any overhead at all?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): That is another serious problem that we have to face to-day, in addition to the problems connected with increased transportation costs.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): What proportion of free lands suitable for settlement still remains in the three prairie provinces?

Mr. STEWART (Argentueil): The most popular figure given is 20,000,000 acres lying along the Canadian National railway line. Put it at 15,000,000 acres, within 15 miles of railway facilities.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I mean homestead lands?

Mr. LOVIE: Does the minister think from his own experience that a man can make a living and raise a family on 160 acres in western Canada? That is, to have pasture land and everything else on it, in a thickly settled country where there are no vacant lands?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My hon. friend is better with 160 acres to start with; his overhead and interest charges are less. When he is capable of purchasing more he can do so. My experience in western Canada leads me to believe that this very thing has perhaps contributed more than anything else to the difficulty experienced by the western farmer in time of stress, having regard to the conditions of hail, frost and so on that he has to contend with from time to time. If we are to succeed it seems to me that we must confine ourselves to smaller areas and cultivate more, perhaps, with the help that we have. I am not suggesting that our wives and children should work in the fields or elsewhere, but the point is that we should not in years of stress accumulate an overhead that in years of prosperity we are not able to wipe off. I do not mean to say that that is an answer to all the difficulties. I am speaking of the man who comes to Canada as a settler, without any accumulated obligations of the past.

The question will be asked, why do you invite people to come here, in the face of what is taking place to-day? Well, I am simply trying to discuss the conditions that have come about as a result, first, of over-purchase of land, and, second, of circumstances over which most of us have no control. But, I repeat that, to start with, 160 acres will not require the investment in implements and live stock that will be necessary if a larger area is taken up.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Surely the minister, himself a western man, understands as well an any agriculturist in this House that the equipment for 160 acres will farm 320 acres without any additional outlay.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Having had sixteen years' experience in western Canada, I believe that you do not need a full equipment to carry on from the start. The men who made successes in the early days did not try to purchase a full equipment of farm implements right from the beginning; there was rather more of the spirit of co-operation, one with the other. That is one of the difficulties to-day in western Canada.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): That is not answering the question.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am trying to demonstrate how we can invite people to come to Canada with some show of their making a success. I am convinced that if a man purchases more land at the outset than he can work, there is danger that his overhead will swamp him. And then he has to consider the possible consequences if he purchases live stock as we were induced to purchase live stock to an unprecedented degree during the years of the war—and I take full responsibility for having advocated that programme. Nevertheless we found that in the period of drought we were not troubled again. But having in mind the experience of the past it seems to me that it is wise to ask: Is there no proposition, in western Canada or elsewhere, calculated to put people on the land with a decent chance of success that will appeal to hon. gentlemen?

Now let me come to the next question. One of the most serious difficulties we have to encounter in western Canada is that of interest rates. We have always been penalized, to a greater or less degree, as against the East, in this respect; and one of the things that I am endeavouring to do is, if possible, to secure the purchase of land at a 6-per-cent rate. I am not unmindful of the fact that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company sold their holdings at that rate of interest, but they sold them on shorter terms of payment. What we propose offering to the settler to-day is land on a thirty-two-year annual payment scheme with interest at 6 per cent. We did not have to come to the government of Canada to secure money for this purpose; and let me say, in passing, that in western Canada we must get our money on short loans from the chartered banks of Canada at about the same rate of interest as that previaling in the East. It is not that we require unlimited credit; that is not the point, in many instances we have had too much credit, in many instances loans have been made too freely, and we are suffering in consequence to-day. What we want is credit to a reasonable point at the same rate of interest as prevails in the East. In my opinion that is absolutely necessary if we are to make a success of land settlement in western Canada.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Would the minister change the period of these loans? That seems to be a marked feature of the credit system of the West, that the banks give loans for short periods; whereas in the United States they have introduced a system of, say, two-year loans secured on the farm—on the crop and on the cattle.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I do not want to be drawn into a discussion of the Bank Act or the suggested amendments to it; I desire to get away from it; I will have something to say with respect to the Bank Act when that proposed legislation is up for consideration. What I am doing now is simply depicting what I think are advantages that can be offered to the newcomer to-day that we did not enjoy. That is what I want to point out to the members of this House this afternoon.

Mr. GOULD: May I suggest to the minister that another remedy would be the consideration of a reduction of the interest charges on payments by men who are unable to meet their obligation. For instance on the sale of government lands when the interest has been raised to 7 per cent, that may very well be reduced to 6 per cent.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I do not wish to get into a discussion of the conditions that exist there at the moment. I am trying to depict the conditions under which, I think, a man can succeed if he gets a reasonable chance.

Now, I have said to you that you cannot expect to get people with a large amount of capital or that such people will come in any number. And I do not think we need worry about it; what we want is the establishment of the men with small capital, and that is why, let me say in this connection, I have been attracted to the Canada Colonization scheme of land selling. They have been able to list these lands for a period of thirty-two years with 6 per cent interest. Sometimes I think we have not played quite fair with the vendor, or the owner, of unused lands in western Canada because in many of our provinces we have put a super-tax upon him in respect to the ownership of these very lands. Let me say, however, that I am not quarreling with the idea; I was a party to doing that believing it would hasten the settlement of our country. Because the one thing that we did need, in order to carry our railway burden, was new settlement in western Canada, and that the settler be put upon these lands with a reasonable chance of achieving success. Now, I think I am safe in making this assertion: That with respect to all the lands that are there for purchase in the hands of private owners, very few of those owners will not be willing to sell those lands at a reasonable rate to a newcomer, or anyone else that will purchase them and put them under cultivation. That, briefly, is the hope that I entertain—that a man will be able to obtain land at a reasonable rate with a fair prospect of securing success. He will also have the advantage of whatever assistance will come in the shape of amendments to any loaning scheme or any scheme for the betterment of conditions throughout Canada generally. I do not think such plans should be confined to western Canada particularly, but at the moment we are dealing especially with that part of the country. In addition the new settler will get the same treatment that every other settler that is already in the country will receive in that particular respect.

I would not suggest that these men go a long distance from the railway, but that they be located as nearly as possible along the railway lines in western Canada and that they be given, as I propose to give them, the full advantage of the experience of the men who are field supervisors for the Soldier Settlement Board for at least the next two years. In dealing with this question let me say this: I do not intend, nor propose, supervision longer than is absolutely necessary. I will deal with the matter of the Soldier Settlement Board when the estimates for that department are up. Suffice it for the moment to say that I think for this year, and next year, we will have to maintain that force of men, because I believe they have been the greatest contributing factor to the success of the scheme so far. Since dealing with the matter last year,—and I will give you the figures later on,—the proportion of success has been considerably greater. In spite of the fact that throughout Canada we have had, I fear, a more or less unsatisfactory year in agriculture, the need for salvaging of the soldiers who were placed on the land has perhaps reached the lowest point notwithstanding the discouragements experienced. That, perhaps, is not true of the province of Alberta where a very severe drought was experienced last year throughout the northern portion, where so many of our soldiers were settled. But these field supervisors will be available. They are at Calgary, travelling in that vicinity; they are at Edmonton, at Regina, at Saskatoon, and at Winnipeg. And we are advertising in the Old Country and elsewhere, through our agencies, the fact that the settler can come and get expert advice from these men with respect to where he shall locate, with respect to the value of the land, and with respect to how he shall take advantage of the conditions that he finds confronting him.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: When were those advertisements first inserted?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): About the first of December, I think, on the return of Mr. Smith from the Old Country.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: After the 31st, was it not?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): There are a great many details to remember in connection with this subject, I cannot recall the exact date.

Mr. HOEY: Will the minister tell us whether the governments of the western provinces are co-operating, or propose to co-operate, in this scheme, and were they represented at the conference to which the minister has already referred?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes, all of them with the exception of the province of Saskatchewan, and that province was represented by Mr. Gardiner a day or two later.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask the minister, before he leaves this point, whether he has any estimate as to the amount of capital that is necessary for a prospective settler to have in order to buy the land, and equip it with machinery and stock, in order to start in the modest way which he has outlined?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I should say that he should have at least between fifteen hundred and two thousand dollars.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: With that amount he would carry on?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I do not think the minister has answered my question. What I wanted to know was whether he could make a statement as to what quantity of free land—that is land available for homesteading—still existed in the northwest.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I did not catch the question. There are in the province of Alberta surveyed and ready for settlement about 4,000,000 acres of free land. In Saskatchewan there are about 5,000,000. All of that land would not be adaptable for homesteading, but that is the amount in those two provinces. I cannot give the figures for Manitoba.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): How far from the railway?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I should say from 18 to 30 miles.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Would that land be adapted to growing wheat profitably?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I would say the bulk of this land would not be adapted to wheat growing, but rather to mixed farming.

Mr. KELLNER: The minister made a reference to the services of the field men of the Soldier Settlement Board. Would the services of these officials be at the disposal of the Western Colonization people?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have endeavoured to keep the services separate. The Canada Colonization people are dealing purely and simply with people who have money to purchase land. They have agents of their own in the United States, who are canvassing for that purpose, and intend later, if the scheme is successful, to do so in the Old Land, but at the moment they are confining their activities to the United States. Our agents of the Soldier Settlement Board are simply advertising the fact that reliable trained advice can be had from the supervisors or the field men of the Soldier Settlement Board, and that advice, of course, cannot be utilized for the purpose of purchasing land.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would the minister explain in greater detail this arrangement he has made about the supervisory services of the Soldier Settlement Board? First, to what extent are the services at the disposal of the Western Canada Colonization Company? Are they at their disposal to the same extent that they have rendered them in connection with soldier settlement? Secondly, what are the terms of the arrangement?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I do not understand my right hon. friend. He has asked me: Are these services at their disposal to the same extent as they were in connection with the soldier settlement?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The Canada Colonization Company did not touch the soldier settlement.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I understood the minister to say he had made an arrangement whereby the functions of the supervisors of the Soldier Settlement Board could be utilized by the Western Canada Colonization Company.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): If I said that I did not intend to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, by their settlers, by those who come and settle under them, and that he had authorized his agents to advertise for settlers to come in under the auspices of that company, and to have their services for certain purposes. Is that correct? If so, for what purpose? And secondly, to what extent do the company's settlers pay for these services?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): They are two distinct services. Probably I had better explain how they work out. I have thought that it would be impossible for the government to assume the responsibility through paid officials of the government—because the supervisors of the Soldier Settlement Board are paid officials of the government—to negotiate sales, to take a newcomer and act as the agent between the vendor and the purchaser. Under the soldier settlement scheme, of course, the purchase was made outright, the money paid in full and the land became the property of the government of Canada. Under this scheme there will be an agreement of sale, running over a period of 32 years, and in many cases the Canada Colonization Company, a company doing business as agents between the vendor and purchaser, will be acting as agent for the vendor for a considerable number of years. That is one of the services they propose rendering the vendor. The absentee vendor, for example, may list his land with the understanding that the payments will be transmitted through their office annually for a period, at least until the time comes when it can be computed and a mortgage taken, which they have promised under their scheme, but in the meantime they act as agents, the same as other agents who act between the vendor and the purchaser of land. For that reason, Mr. Chairman, we have felt there are two distinct services to be rendered. One is the service of listing the land through an agent for sale, for a period of 32 years, at the rate of 6 per cent, and in addition they are finding as many purchasers as possible for the land, but selling to all who may approach them for the purpose of purchasing land. That is the service they will perform. The services the soldier settlement supervisor will render will be that he, in a larger way, will be available to the settler coming from the Old Land, because a settler will come to him, He is the paid official of the government. A vast amount of information about the whole country is at their disposal in the offices, and the settler may go there. He may also obtain advice from that supervisor as to the minimum and maximum amount he should pay for land in any given locality. But the real service in my opinion starts when the settler is placed upon the land, no matter what agency places him there. He is a newcomer and can have from these men the advice that is so important in the initial stages of the settlement of a newcomer upon the land. I anticipate that practically all the settlers coming from the Old Country will utilize the services of the Soldier Settlement Board.

Mr. MEIGHEN: As I understand the scheme, the company acts as the agent of sale and acts as a collector afterwards. The company gets a commission after that on a non-profit basis, but the purchaser, farmer, or the immigrant coming in has the privilege of going to the supervisor first for his advice as to purchase. The minister was careful to say he would give his advice in this form, "In this district I fix a minimum of so much an acre and a maximum of so much an acre." Then the second part of the advice is as to farming afterwards. With all deference, I suggest this to the minister's mind. He is just giving his officers sufficient authority to get the government of the country into trouble, and not sufficient authority to be the least service to the purchaser. He puts a minimum and a maximum in a district. Now there will be one farm worth twice as much as the adjoining one in the same district. Unless the department is prepared, as we did in the soldier settlement scheme, to exercise control over every purchase, it had better keep its hand out of the matter of valuations altogether.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The report I got from the agents of the government, in the United States was that the return of at least 15 per cent of prospective settlers who did not settle in the West in the last ten years was due to the fact that they had received conflicting information. Further we do not propose to restrict that information in a general way, although it is fair for my right hon. friend to take that inference I think. We intend to give that advice in a real way, particularly to Old Country settlers. If a man chooses a certain parcel of land, it may not be listed by the Canada Colonization Company; it may be listed by a private individual, and in almost nine cases out of ten, if the individual approaches him in that way, he will be asked eight per cent interest and, perhaps, a higher rate per acre than the land would be listed for with the Canada Colonization Company or some other corporation of that sort. But if you get your soldier supervisor as agent between vendor and purchaser, then in my opinion, you are going to have a great deal of trouble. If it were possible to purchase outright as has been the case in the past, there would be difficulty. The greatest service the supervisor has rendered—and I am not unmindful of that—is that his business was to purchase the land as cheaply as he possibly could, and purchasing it outright in that way, he invariaby got rock-bottom prices. But that does not prevail in this case.

Mr. MORRISON: Supposing a settler purchased a piece of land and it was discovered later that he had been absolutely defrauded; is there any redress for him? Soldier supervisors have a very large territory to go over. When the Union government appointed those supervisors in the first place, one of them told me that he no sooner got his appointment than men came to him and offered to bribe him to sell their lands to soldiers for double what the land was worth. The leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) touched the right point when he said that one farm lying alongside another will be worth twice as much. I have known them worth five times as much. Newcomers should be protected, and if a glaring fraud is perpetrated, there should be some supervisor who could annul the whole transaction, so that those men might not pick up and go out of the country, cursing the country and bringing the whole thing into disrepute.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): That is just the service that I hope they will render. I am not unmindful of the fact that individuals will come in who will make mistakes in purchasing. The very thing mentioned by my hon. friend, that the supervisor may be offered a consideration for the purpose of assisting the vendor, would be bound to be prevalent, and to a much greater degree than if he were purchasing outright, spot cash, for the government, and, becoming the actual owner of the land for the purpose of selling it to another party. I do not think it wise that we should ask the supervisors to go into that particular service; but as regards advice—and I do not want to cover the ground again—supervisors have had some years of experience; they know the country; they have valued land in the vicinity; they ought to have a fair idea of the value of every quarter section within the agricultural district through which they travel. It is not unfair to expect that and that they could give a pretty fair value for any quarter section of land upon which their opinion might be asked.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I agree with that; but the matter is so important, and I am so confident of my position that I want to impress it again. If the minister gives them any authority, let it be complete. Do not let the minister's officials come in and give any advice unless full responsibility is taken and the most thorough investigation given individually to the land, not merely to the man. If the minister does not do that, he is going to land in this position, and I will give him warning in time. He will find afterwards that there will be throughout Canada settlers who will claim that being promised the supervision and assistance of the officers of the Dominion government, they came in and they were defrauded notwithstanding. They could easily be, under the loose system the minister has in mind; they will be back on this government and this country, and they will have a claim that will be very difficult to answer.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I do not know how far my right hon. friend would go, unless he went the length of making the supervisor the actual agent between vendor and purchaser.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I go to the length in every case we go in the soldier settlement work. There the government is responsible absolutely for the fairness of every purchase. The government supervises each and all in which it lends any money. Unless you are prepared to go that length in cases where you do not lend any money do not go any length at all.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I must confess that personally I did try to have this responsibility taken by the provinces, but they refused.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: The western provinces refused to go into this co-operation with the federal government; am I right?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Did they give reasons?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: That was because the federal government had not given them their natural resources.

Mr. SPENCER: I understand the government is working in co-operation with the Canada Colonization Company. Is the government subsidizing that company, and if so, how much per month?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes, the government proposes, at least, if parliament gives its sanction, to give them $10,000 a month.

Mr. KENNEDY (West Edmonton): Will the government have any supervision over the salaries of officers of that company?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No, not any more than as regards the Salvation Army to whom we have been giving grants for a number of years.

Mr. KELLNER: Who comprise the Canada Colonization Company? What is the association between them and the government?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): If my hon. friend will wait, I would rather give the information when the question comes up in the estimates.

Mr. KELLNER: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have not the information before me in my notes. I can give the name of the manager of the organization with whom I have done business; that is Mr. Everett.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Is there any connection between the present company and the old, defunct North Atlantic Trading Company?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have never heard of any.

Mr. JACOBS: Who is the present president of the Canada Colonization Association?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): There is none at present.

Mr. JACOBS: It is without a head?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Could the minister tell us whether it is true, as reported in the press, that the retiring president has recommended that the whole of this activity be handed over to the Salvation Army?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I had not seen that. In answer to my hon. friend (Mr. Beaubien) as to why the provinces did not assist, I may say that they are quite in sympathy with the settlement of these lands; but for the reason that they did not have the natural resources, they did not feel they were called upon to make any expenditure in this connection. What I hope will be of the greatest service to the settler through the Soldier Settlement Board is the advice that will be given to the settler during the first two or three years that he is upon the land. I have announced to the committee that the advice, so far as it will go, will be not to venture into too heavy investments in land, but that he will make his start in a modest way and, as he progresses, that he will purchase, if needs be, further lands in order that he may carry on. In connection with the American field, at a meeting of the agents held some months ago in Chicago, I found that while agricultural conditions in western Canada were in rather bad shape, the inflation during the war had stricken the American farmer to a worse degree than it had affected our own agriculturists throughout Canada, and that inflation in farm values across the border had gone to such an extent that the farmers could no longer carry on. Indeed, I was approached by very many American farmers with splendid equipment who were desirous of moving out of the central and western states and coming to western Canada, but who found themselves in such straits that they had not even the means to pay their railway transportation. That is the difficulty one encounters everywhere. But I am hopeful despite that fact that a great many of these men will come to western Canada. With that thought in view we offered a scheme of leased lands to encourage them to move out of the United States and settle here.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister seriously contend that the reason our farmers go there instead of the farmers of the United States come here is that ours are better off and are able to travel?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): So far as I have been able to ascertain I do not know that there are so many Canadian farmers who have gone to the United States to farm. I made that statement before.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They are going by thousands.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: They are going for the high tariff over there.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Possibly the high tariff is an inducement for them to go there, but the people that are going are locating in the urban centres; they are not going to farm, I can assure my hon. friends of that fact. And more than that, the statistics will show that a great many of those who have gone to the United States are only temporarily there; out of four or five thousand there are only one thousand who have entered as permanent residents of the United States. They are not going, at all events at the moment, with the intention of remaining over there. But I do not fancy that I am stating a new fact; I think that has always been the condition with regard to immigration to the United States.

Mr. GOOD: What does the minister mean by permanent residents?

Mr. MANION: Has the minister the figures regarding the exodus from Canada to the United States for a period, say, of six months?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I cannot lay my hands on them just at the moment.

Mr. FORKE: I can give the figures to the end of June, 1922.

Mr. MANION: Perhaps the minister can give the approximate figures; I do not want an exact statement.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The press gives an average of 10,000 a month; perhaps that is right.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No, that is not correct. I have the correct figures here. The movements from Canada to the United States, according to the United States annual reports, were as follows:

1918-19	96,000
1919-20	143,000
1920-21	72,000
1921-22	46,000

Mr. MEIGHEN: Up to the 31st March, 1922?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes, I think that is correct.

Mr. LADNER: What have been the figures since March, 1922, to date?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have them somewhere but I cannot lay my hands on them now. I will give them at a later period. They have been prepared up to last month, and they show a fair average.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They show a large increase over the year before.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes, that is true. But looking back over a period of years they fluctuate considerably. I know that from the city of Toronto there has been a very serious efflux to the United States.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This year?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes. Unquestionably a great many tradesmen have left Canada for the United States; and I am not overlooking the fact that a fairly large number of people went out of western Canada even off the land to the United States.

Mr. MERCIER: Can the minister give the figures by provinces?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No, we have not got them by provinces. What I want to point out, however, is that from the United States and Great Britain we shall get about the same percentage of people who can establish themselves on the land. I do not expect that we shall have a large population for the year 1922-23, because immigration has reached one of its low points in Canadian history. I may give some of the figures with respect to immigration since 1881, when we had 47,000 coming into Canada, down to 1900 when it was 44,000. The next year it was 23,000 and in 1905 and 1906 we had 128,000 and 130,000. In 1910 we had 208,000; in 1911, 311,000; in 1912, 354,000 and 1913, 402,000. Then it began to drop until in 1916 we had 48,000; in 1917, 75,000; and in 1919, 57,000. In 1921-22, it was 89,000. I mention these figures to show the fluctuation there has been over that long period of years. What I have been trying to show this afternoon is that we shall undoubtedly get from the United States a fairly large number of desirable settlers who will go on the lands of western Canada, and we shall also get from Great Britain and the Scandinavian countries pepole who will ultimately become settlers in the West. We have established on the Continent of Europe agencies for two purposes; because from the Continent, owing to war conditions, there are areas from which perhaps we would not get people whom we could assimilate or absorb into the population just yet. Nevertheless there is a very large population on the Continent from which we can draw desirable settlers for northern and western Canada. Let me say, too, that the governments are becoming interested in this question. They have over-population in their countries. I know it may be said that that is one of the reasons why Great Britain wants to get rid of some of her people who are not of a very desirable type, but I shall deal with that feature when I come to the subject of assisted passages. I think it is safe to say that we are on sane ground when we claim the right to designate who may come into Canada and so afford reasonable protection to our citizens. At the continental ports we are not seeking to hold back desirable immigrants but rather to encourage them. From Bohemia we hope to obtain a very desirable class of settlers; also from Poland, Hungary and other continental countries. One peculiar outstanding fact I should mention in passing, namely, that from Hungary there promises to come a larger proportion of people in a position to establish themselves here than perhaps from any of the other countries from which we hope to draw a considerable number of immigrants.

Mr. JACOBS: Under our law no Hungarian is permitted to come into this country. He is regarded as an alien enemy.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Hungarians have been coming in for some considerable time by permission of the minister.

Mr. JACOBS: By permission of the minister?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The order in council has not been cancelled as against Hungary and other enemy countries.

Mr. JACOBS: Does that apply to Germany also?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes. Notwithstanding that we have been letting in a few Germans for whom application has been made by their friends. I am hopeful that in the near future the order in council against nationals from those countries may be brought to an end.

Mr. JACOBS: If those nationals are permitted to come in by order of the minister, why should not the order in council be cancelled forthwith?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I see no particular reason why it should not be cancelled. But I take it that no desirable individual is being handicapped as a result. Immigration seems to be rather a touchy subject in this House. I did not know there were so many tender spots that one might tread upon in dealing with the question.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is immigration from other countries a matter of pull too?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No, I would not say that.

Mr. BOYS: The minister, I understand, predicts increased immigration of a desirable class of farmers from the United States during this year, and I also understand that he predicts a decrease in the movement of our farmers to the United States. What, if any, new policy or change in policy is likely to produce the result he has predicted?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I think it is safe to say that in crises of all sorts you reach the peak sooner or later, that there comes a day for liquidation. I think that day has come. I may refer to my own locality, which I know fairly well. Perhaps 15 per cent of the people there have been forced out of business, nothing could save them, they had to go; there are 15 to 20 per cent in rather serious difficulties; a fair percentage of the balance is not by any means on Easy street, but there is no doubt that they are going to remain and continue in agriculture. I think my hon. friend will agree with me that the same condition of affairs applies in a business way.

Mr. BOYS: Then I understand that the minister's prediction is based on the fact that the peak both ways has been reached, and is not due to any new policy or change in policy? In a word, it is merely an accident, so to speak. We on this side want to do everything we can to assist the minister in bringing about the most desirable conditions, but if his prediction is based on what is only an accident, surely it is time that some policy was evolved whereby the improvement should be the result of that policy and not a mere accident.

Mr STEWART (Argenteuil): I think in the past too much credit has been taken by governments for policies that would change conditions. That they have some effect I will not deny, but not to the extent of completely changing conditions of depression or inflation. I am not announcing a policy for the government or for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), I am dealing with the question of immigration solely and am describing some of the chances of success which I think I have, or in regard to which I am optimistic to suggest to the agents of the government in the Old Country and elsewhere that they have, for inducing settlers to come to Canada. Possibly the Minister of Finance will have something to say about the policy of the government.

Mr. MacKELVIE: The minister has taken us as far as the prairies. Will he tell us if there is any prospect of co-operation with the province of British Columbia in respect to immigration?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I shall have a word or two to say about that if my hon. friend will permit me to get through with my remarks on the Old Land and other sources of immigration.

Mr. BOYS: I, too, have a few questions to ask, and if the minister would prefer to finish his address and deal with them when his estimates are up, I shall be very pleased to wait.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I do not object to any questions now except that they lead me away from what I am proposing to say. We have had a visit from the representative of the Swedish government which is undertaking to supervise emigration in a systematic way. He has gone as far as Winnipeg at the expense of the Canadian government. I suggested that he go as far as Vancouver in order to get a first hand idea of the opportunities awaiting settlers throughout Canada. He has come back enthusiastically in favour of recommending his government to send out settlers. Indeed, he is to bring over the first contingent of two or three hundred. The same thing applies to Holland. We were visited by the representative of that country and he went as far as Vancouver. He has gone back to recommend to his government that settlers be sent out to the number of 1500 as an experiment this year. These men have not very much cash to invest, and it is a matter of finding employment for them at the outset. But in a real way we have been trying to bring to the attention of the governments of the countries from which we hope to attract settlers the opportunities we have to offer homeseekers.

In respect to Scotland, a country that has done more for the settlement of Canada than perhaps any other country of its size in the world, we have been endeavouring to interest people in the northern part of that country to settle here. If I had time I could read to the committee letters from our agent, Mr. Murphy, who has gone through the northern portions of Scotland, where he says there are hundreds of men anxious to come to Canada.

Mr. FORKE: What was Murphy doing in Scotland?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Well, he appears to be getting along very well with our Scottish friends there. At least, he is having splendid success in interesting those people in Canada. We hope to induce a large number of people to come from Scotland, who will be fully as able to establish themselves as those who come from England. We have not been so successful as far as Scandinavia is concerned; only in Denmark have we had an agent up to the present. In Sweden the possibilities of the settlement of their people in other countries than their own is commencing to be realized, and we hope to go into that country with our agents and propagandize for the purpose of encouraging emigration to Canada. Then, we expect to get people from Iceland and other countries where the climate is similar to that of Canada—people who will be readily assimilated here.

Mr. LADNER: What about Belgium?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We have an agent at Antwerp, but there is no immediate prospect of inducing many Belgian people to come to Canada. So far as British Columbia is concerned, we have had the premier of that province here. He has a very active officer in the person of Mr. Pattullo, who sent an agent to India to induce officers retired from the Indian army to come to Canada. An officer of the Soldier Settlement Board was sent there by the federal government with the same object in view. I cannot say what success they are having, but we hope that a large number will be induced to take up residence in western Canada, particularly in British Columbia, because we feel that these people would adapt themselves more readily to the conditions in that province than in the others.

Mr. LADNER: Has the government of British Columbia made a definite offer to join with the federal government in an aggressive policy of immigration in conjunction with the British government under the Empire settlement scheme? Has not British Columbia also concluded or partly concluded arrangements with the British government contingent upon the consent of the Dominion government?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I know that negotiations were being carried on, but I cannot say whether or not they have reached a conclusion. Ontario has carried its negotiation to a conclusion respecting immigration into that province from the Old Land. I know Mr. Pattullo was carrying on negotiations of the same sort.

[Mr. Forke.]

Mr. LADNER. The point of my question is that the British government and the provincial governments are apparently agreed upon some sort of action. Is the Dominion government willing to co-operate in that scheme or does its policy exclude the possibility of such co-operation?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No, the British government will deal with private corporations, with municipalities, with provincial governments, or with federal governments. Indeed, in the case of Australia there are dealings with the states as well as with the Commonwealth government. Such arrangements are, of course, always subject to the approval of the federal authorities.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I wonder if the minister can say now whether or not the figures I gave the other day were correct. I pointed out that under that scheme, Canada, having taken no interest in it, got 5 p.m. only 130 immigrants as against upwards of 11,000 in the case of Australia and New Zealand. I think the minister said he was going to send the deputy minister to find out something about it; perhaps he knows now.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): As I recall it, what my hon. friend asked the other day was whether or not we were too late in making application for the joint action. I had no recollection of any figures being mentioned, because we have no intention of entering into a similar agreement to that made between the British government and the government of Australia, namely, for the settlement of land as well as for assisted passages. Ours extended only to the point of assisted passages.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Was the deputy sent over?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: When?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): He should be in England now.

Mr. LADNER: Is there a definite arrangement between the government of British Columbia and this government respecting immigration, and if so would the minister be good enough to give us some intimation of what it involves?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): There is no definite arrangement between the two governments at the moment.

Mr. LADNER: But is there any working arrangement under which immigration will be going to British Columbia just as it will be going to the prairie provinces? The reason I ask this is that according to the press the Attorney General of British Columbia has intimated that there will be a considerable demand for labour in that province this year. He says:

> While not anticipating such a labour shortage as that—

Referring to a statement made by a large employer of labour.

> —there is every indication that the demand for labour will be at least equal to if not considerably more than the available supply, and that there will be no justification for any man being idle.

The article goes on to show considerable activity in British Columbia. I understand the provincial government is desirous of having an early immigration policy there, not only for agricultural settlers but also for men engaged in such other business as mining, lumbering and fishing. The matter is of considerable interest to British Columbia, therefore, and we would like to have some information from the minister on the subject.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): So far as that demand is concerned, we have no recent communication. As in the case of Ontario, British Columbia maintained an office in the Old Country and carried on a considerable amount of propaganda work on their own part, and they may be carrying it on now without my knowledge. We have been co-operating very fully with British Columbia, and we are prepared to carry on in the same way. I speak only of the demands for labour from the areas from which we have received them; I have no knowledge of any communication from British Columbia stating that they required labour of that character.

Mr. LADNER: I do not wish to be too persistent, but will the minister be good enough to disclose the nature of the co-operation? Mr. Pattullo, Minister of Lands for that province, in an address delivered to the Board of Trade before I left Vancouver, intimated that he then had negotiations under way with the Dominion government under which a definite scheme would be worked out to bring immigrants to the province, and that the Dominion would be a party to that scheme. If such a scheme has been arranged for, it is of importance to the province to know what it is, just as the minister has outlined a scheme of co-operation—or non-co-operation, as it appears—with the prairie provinces.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Well, everything I have said with respect to the prairie provinces would apply to British Columbia, with the exception that British Columbia, through Mr. Pattullo, is taking a very much more active interest in immigration than the governments of the prairie provinces. The reason is a good one: British Columbia owns its natural resources and is setting aside land for the purposes of settlement, particularly along the Grand Trunk Pacific. I know that they are extremely anxious to promote settlement and have asked us to co-operate in bringing these localities to the attention of prospective settlers, they on their part agreeing to take care of them upon arrival. Beyond that we have no definite scheme of co-operation, except in a general way; we shall, of course, give to British Columbia or any of the other provinces any support or assistance that we can.

Mr. LADNER: What is that support or assistance? That is the point.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): In bringing to the attention of prospective settlers the advantages of British Columbia, in the circulation of any advertising matter that they may provide, and so on—in a general way; because we cannot pick any particular province in that respect. Our business is to try to induce people to come to Canada, and to that end, in a fair way, to present the advantages of all the provinces to prospective settlers.

Mr. MANION: So far as that point is concerned, is it not a fact that the Department of Immigration—under this government as under other governments—generally recommends the prairie provinces to settlers? I ask that because it is my understanding that they do. Like British Columbia, of which my hon. friend speaks, northern Ontario, from which I come, is a very fine farming section, although it has bush lands just as British Columbia has. Yet it has always been my impression that the Department of Immigration recommends the prairie provinces to the detriment of the other sections referred to. I should like a little enlightenment on that point from the minister if he can give it?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I think my hon. friend's objection, if he puts it that way, is well taken; I think there is no doubt about it. In former days the lands were free on the prairies, but they were not free elsewhere. There was a charge made, if I remember correctly for lands in the province of Ontario as well as in British Columbia—not very much it is true, nevertheless a small charge was made for land. These provinces owned their natural resources. They were exploiting them and trying to settle the lands in their own interest, whereas in other cases the lands belonged to the federal government and that government was trying to settle them primarily in the interest of the Dominion.

Mr. LADNER: Does the minister's scheme involve granting financial assistance to the settlers? Take a concrete case. Supposing John Smith from England wanted to come out here and select a piece of property in Alberta. Does the minister's scheme involve a measure of financial assistance repayable over a period of years, and does that rest upon the province, carrying the same illustration to the province of British Columbia?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Well, I would not like to be drawn into a discussion of what Mr. Pattullo has in mind for British Columbia. So far as regards the federal government, I would say "no" to every one of his queries. We have not a scheme of placing people on the land and assisting them with money. I will deal with the subject of assisted passages later on.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: In reference to the minister's last remark, is it not a fact that the control of immigration belongs to the federal government and not to the provinces? Consequently, the fact that a province might control its own lands should not debar that province from the benefit of the operations of the federal authorities in regard to immigration. Just along that line, may I ask—because I notice that the minister has dealt very fully with the Maritime provinces, the province of Quebec, the prairie provinces and British Columbia—did I understand him aright, at the outset of his remarks, to state that in so far as the province of Ontario is concerned they were going to do nothing?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Oh no, what I said at the outset was that the government of the province of Ontario were carrying on a propaganda in the Old Land on their own account; they were bringing in, for example, domestic servants, they were making advances for them, they were trying to induce settlers to come to that province; but I hope, that I did not in any way mislead my hon. friend into thinking that the federal government had no responsibility. I say we are doing just the same for Ontario that we are doing for every other province; trying to induce people to come in. We are willing to distribute literature for Ontario and willing to hold up the advantages of that province as well as those of the other provinces of Canada. My hon. friend is perfectly right; the responsibilty for inducing people to come to the country primarily devolves upon the federal authorities. In the past, the responsibilty of the colonization end of it has rested very frequently upon anybody, but primarily upon the provinces themselves.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: They were forced to assume the responsibility. The minister has stated in his remarks this afternoon that the prairie provinces offered the most fertile field for immigration. He paid but scant attention to the requirements of the rural districts of old Ontario where I will venture to state—in view of the doleful tale we have heard from the representatives of western Canada—there is no field so fertile to-day, and no demand so pressing.

Mr. LEWIS: Is it not true, in spite of the emphasis laid on the three prairie provinces and the fact that the Dominion government owns the land, that if we look over the statistics for the last twenty years we find that more people have settled in Ontario than in the other provinces referred to?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): In reply to my hon. friend let me say that I have brought to the attention of intending settlers the portions of northern Ontario that are being opened up to-day. I cannot say how much of this has been done in the past, my hon. friend, perhaps, will know better than I. However, it is our intention to have a policy of propaganda that will bring to the attention of the settler the chances that are available throughout the whole of Canada. That is one of the things I think it is the duty of the department to do, not to concentrate absolutely on one particular part of Canada, because there are advantages in every province. There are advantages, perhaps, in one province that will appeal to the individual, and that will hold him in Canada, that he will not find in the other provinces. We cannot say that any particular province is better than the other, but we can say that there are advantages to be obtained in all of them.

I do not know that I should detain the House any longer with the matter of immigration or where it shall come from. But let me emphasize this one thing before I have done: On several occasions, in speaking upon this question, I have emphasized the necessity of reasonable and careful selection; and I hope that in dealing with the matter of assisted passages it will not be inferred, as it has been said to me on some other occasions, that when we embark in an undertaking of this kind we will not, perhaps, get as desirable a class of settler. I do not think it should be inferred from the mere fact that some people make application for assistance to come to the country that they are not desirable settlers. I think that the evidence we have in the Old Land fully goes to prove that very many desirable people are anxious to move from their present homes, anxious to come to some new country in the British Empire to make a fresh start, but perhaps, have not sufficient means to enable them to do so. However, to that particular class our scheme does not apply. It rather is more restricted in character than that. Here let me say that one of the greatest schemes in connection with immigration that has appealed to me most is that of child emigration to Canada. In my younger days I knew somewhat of the success of the Barnardo scheme. I know that in some respects this work has been criticized, but there are organizations in the Old Land who have been doing a splendid work in this respect and the record of the Barnardo Boys Home, having regard to enlistment during the war and the success of the boys who did enlist, is a splendid record and one that will bear comparison with the record of any of the young men who enlisted in the Canadian army. From Ontario and eastern Canada—but it will apply, perhaps, to my hon. friend's province more than to any of the others and it has been the case for several years so far as I can discover from the records of the department—applications have come in excess of those that the various organizations engaged in this work are able to fill. For example, a year ago there were about 15,000 applications for boys and girls from people who were willing to take them into their homes and adopt them, and about 1,500 were placed. That gives you an idea of how close we are to the point at which we aim in connection with this work.

Now let me, for a moment, deal with the matter from a close personal standpoint. In the province of Alberta we have had for a number of years what is known as the Delinquent Children's department. That is a very poor name for it. It should never have been called by that name. It was rather a department organized for the purpose of caring for children who were unfortunate, through no fault of theirs, and very frequently through no fault of the parents, and we find, strange to say, that in the new provinces in the West, which are said to be settled by bachelors, there are always more applications for children than we are able to satisfy. Indeed, the only children in the hands of the government to-day, or a year ago, so far as I know, were those who were slightly mentally deficient. The robust, physically fit child was adopted into a foster home as soon as he was able to go there. There is in Ontario and eastern Canada a great field for this work, and there are in the Old Country children of deceased soldiers by the thousands, children of respectable parents by the thousands, who will make splendid settlers and citizens of Canada if we can bring them here. This work has been very largely philanthropic, so far as I can ascertain, assisted by contributions of people interested in the work. Very little assistance has been given to the organizations by the government of the Old Country or the government of any country, and the recent increase in transportation rates has made it difficult for these organizations to carry on. I therefore propose to offer a grant for those who can be carefuly selected and absorbed in decent homes in Ontario, and in this work we are enjoying the full co-operation of the officials of the Ontario government who have been dealing with this phase of the question in placing these children in foster homes. The government is asking parliament to give us a reasonable sum for this work, up to $200,000, which we hope will be supplemented by the British government through their Overseas Settlement Board. I want to emphasize first the selection of the child; secondly, the selection of the home and the desirability of getting these young people into our Canadian homes. Strange to say there has been throughout Canada for the past few years a very serious lack of domestic help in the household. The Ontario government and the Saskatchewan government have been doing something during the past two or three years in connection with bringing out those girls for domestic service. Again we find the same difficulty in regard to assistance. So far as the province of Saskatchewan is concerned they have been collecting from various individuals and have been putting up some money themselves, sending over and bringing girls out. I made careful inquiry of Mr. Gardiner when he was here discussing the question of immigration as to the success of their scheme, and I was assured that they were meeting with splendid success and that there was very little loss in connection with the proposition. Miss Biden, an official of our department, paid partly by the Department of Immigration and partly by the Saskatchewan government, has been an inspectional officer and has made the selections. We propose to carry out this work to a greater degree, trying to supplement the demand for domestic servants by asking for a vote of $200,000 for this purpose, which will be further supplemented by the Overseas Settlement Board.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Is that an additional $200,000 to be asked for in the case of children?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes. That however is a grant that will not be returned. In the case of domestic servants we hope that 90 per cent of the money will be returned to the federal government. So far as the child is concerned, it is absolutely a grant in toto for the passage.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Would the minister not consider the advancement of assistance to that extent to competent farm labourers who are vouched for by the provincial authorities?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Referring to the farm labourer, we have not ventured into that field. Perhaps my hon. friend will agree with me that I am somewhat of a careful individual with respect to the expenditure of public money. At least I know that this vote will not meet the ideals of a great many of my hon. friends in this House. They will say I should have gone a great deal further. So far as I am concerned, I propose to go slowly. I hope we shall get settlement. I feel that we shall get settlement and the evidence of that is that the steamship companies are having splendid success in their booking so far with people who will come as labourers to Canada.

Dealing with the other class to whom my hon. friend referred, we have no scheme for the bringing out of farm labourers. It is rather a difficult proposition to deal with, owing to the fact that you have no assurance, or perhaps not as much assurance of holding the farm labourer or the mill labourer as is desirable, in order to secure the return of the money. But what we are doing is this: in regard to the individual who has come to Canada and has not been able so far to obtain the necessary funds to bring his family or his children, or the individual who is desirous of bringing a friend whom he knows, either from an urban centre or from a rural district and who will settle upon the land, we have set aside $200,000 for assistance, as an experiment. We provide that he shall pay 25 per cent of the cost of the passage of his family, or the family whom he may nominate, and give a guarantee for the return of the money. In order that it may work smoothly and easily, we are dealing with the local banks in this respect, taking security from two of his neighbours, because my experience since coming here is that on hundreds of different occasions we have been appealed to by men already in the country for assistance in order to bring out their families and establish them here. We thought it would be proper to provide for the furnishing of 25 per cent, either by the individual who nominated the family, or by someone else. We provide for the return of the money in a certain period. If it is the wife alone, or if it is a family consisting of the husband and wife, a repayment inside of one year of the full amount, or if there are children within two years, without interest, according to the size of the family is required.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Is this in addition to the $400,000 already referred to?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes, making $600,000 in all.

Mr. LADNER: Is there a class of assisted immigrants other than those to which the minister has referred? A little while ago he referred to assisted immigrants. Does the class he has referred to include all of them?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No, it is simply assisted passages from the Old Land, with respect to which we have the co-operation of the Overseas Settlement Board. There is no programme of assisted passages from any country except Great Britain.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Does the Old Land mean Great Britain and Ireland, or what does it mean?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It covers the area to which assistance is given by the Overseas Settlement Board of the British government. That applies to Great Britain.

Mr. SPENCER: In regard to the people who are being brought out from various parts of Europe, is the government guarding against these various people settling in colonies to the detriment of western Canada, as has happened in the past? Is an effort being made to assimilate them with the people of the country?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I might say personally that I do not favour colony settlement as we understand it in western Canada. It is a deterrent to assimilation; but we must bear in mind that on the part of many people there will be a desire to settle in communities, and indeed, this desire comes from the Old Land. One of the great attractions of the Australian scheme is that they are going to settle in communities where convenient for them. Our experience in western Canada has been that people assimilate much more readily if there is a reasonable amount of distribution of those people, rather than if there are close colonies of people of one nationality.

I think I have covered the ground fairly well. I anticipate I shall have innumerable questions with respect to this matter, but what I have in mind is a careful selection of the people who shall come to Canada a follow-up policy that will assist the settler, not in the expenditure of money particularly, but by advice that, we think, will be valuable to him. Not only that, but we propose to bring, as fast as labour conditions will warrant, labour into Canada. We have to-day, in both the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National Railway offices advertisements asking the farmers to make application for the men that they can employ annually very largely upon their farms. Those men will be carefully selected and brought out to fill the requirements. In fact, we have not missed any agencies, because I take it that we are to have first carefully selected settlers, and second, when we get them into the country, some organization that can perform a service to a certain point; but above and beyond all, we must have the hearty co-operation of all the people and all organizations, churches and otherwise, in connection with this problem

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Would the minister go on and finish the relation of his scheme of land leasing? He touched on that, but I do not think he finished it.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I did not intend to deal with it at any particular length, except that I would say this, that strange to say, in spite of the fact that the information we got was that a great deal of land that had been cultivated was being abandoned and that it was going back into the hands of owners, non-resident or otherwise who would not cultivate it, in Manitoba alone, the only province in which we were able to secure any considerable number of farms for the purpose of leasing, after correspondence with secretary-treasurers of municipalities, the men who ought to know best, and after a careful canvass of the whole province, all that we were able to get was 75 farms. Some of those were not, on inspection, found to be in condition to offer to any tenant, without at least one year's summer fallow. That is not a desirable proposition to offer to a newcomer to the country unless you are prepared to pay him for that operation. Our investigation in that respect did not go very far. In spite of the fact that we are told so frequently that so many of those farms will be settled but will not be occupied and worked next year, I think that is a hopeful sign and evidence in itself that things are not just as bad as we sometimes think they are. I am optimistic enough to think that we have at least reached the peak of the depression, and that our farmers from now on will make progress, although I am not suggesting, of course, that they are going to be inordinately prosperous.

The removal of the British embargo has had this effect. Hon. members from western Canada know what difficulty was experienced in disposing of live stock at 2 1-2 cents per pound. True, perhaps, a good deal of it, was not in a condition to market, but drought conditions sometimes forced the farmer to sell whether he was desirous of doing so or not. To-day, I am informed by Mr. Pat Burns, who is a reliable authority, that they are prepared to pay for stall-fed cattle, even as far as Innisfail, in Alberta, 7½ cents per pound. This argues, in my opinion, that we can depend upon that price for export to the Old Country, and paying transportation charges from Calgary to Liverpool or Glasgow or whatever other ports these cattle are required at. This means a considerable change from the condition that formerly prevailed with respect to our live stock.

I agree with what many of my hon. friends have said in the past, that some change will have to take place in connection with the price of wheat; but there can be no serious complaint as regards dairy products. Wheat alone probably does not show any sign of advance, and any prosperity will have to come rather by way of reduction in the price of commodities the farmer must buy, and by way of reduction of freight rates upon the commodities upon which we have to pay transportation charges.

I have tried in a general way to cover this question. In some respects, it has been a great pleasure to study and discuss this question. There are as many different ideas as to what should be done with respect to immigration, I sometimes think, as there are people in Canada, and my view is, just as I said at the outset, that we must not adopt the extreme opinion of either party, on the one hand that there is no solution; that we should stop this thing outright; or on the other, that we should embark upon a programme of large expenditure of public money to purchase privately-owned land upon which to place settlers and perhaps, have a very undesirable result when such a scheme is worked out. My recommendation is that we should adopt a middle course. That is the recommendation I have made to the government of the day, and my recommendations have been accepted by the government. I hope they will bring about the desired results. I do not believe that it would be desirable to have a huge influx of immigrants; but I hope this scheme will bring about an increase this year over last year and that, in the end, we shall get back to the state of affairs of 1913 and 1914, because we can, under reasonable conditions, absorb in Canada quite acceptably three or four hundred thousand people a year.

Let me say in conclusion, that it is my desire, so long as I have charge of this department, to administer it so that the benefits of immigration and incoming settlers will be available to all the provinces of Canada. I dwelt upon the western provinces merely because our railway mileage there has in its vicinity a large acreage of desirable untilled land that, I believe for the time being, offers, perhaps, the best opportunity or one of the best opportunities to be had throughout Canada.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I think the minister led the committee to expect from him a statement with regard to the personnel and status of the Canada Colonization Land Corporation, as this company is apparently to act as a medium between the speculator or land holder and the settler.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The Canada Colonization Company, as I understand the matter, has had rather a stormy career in endeavouring to carry out a land settlement scheme that was projected by Mr. M. A. Brown, of Medicine Hat, who went throughout Canada and induced a large number of men of influence and financial means to back him in this scheme of settling, in the first instance, the privately-owned lands of western Canada. I well remember when they came to interview the government of the province of Alberta, they were accompanied by General McRae, who was then manager of the company. They had a scheme for the compulsory listing of lands for a period of two years. This would require legislation by the provincial governments and was rejected; and upon that scheme they spent about a year. I know it is a most difficult thing for an organization of this kind to obtain a satisfactory arrangement under which to carry on its work. But we do need some sort of organization such as this to take the place of the individual who has made a business of land selling for profit. That such a need exists there is not the slightest doubt in my mind, particularly as conditions exist to-day. We have not free lands to offer people within reasonable distance of the railways; all the lands that are desirable are held by private owners. It is difficult when you reject a scheme of purchasing these lands outright and re-selling them to find some other plan which the government can embark upon with any protection to its officials, as outlined by the leader of the Opposition this afternoon. I quite realize that, and I have repeatedly gone over the matter trying to devise a scheme that would keep the government out of difficulty. Now, this organization adopted a scheme of charging a certain percentage of the sales for the service they rendered the private individual.

An hon. MEMBER: What is the percentage?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Ten per cent. I cannot see any objection to a scheme of that kind. These men do not propose to make any profit out of this undertaking; nor do I see how they could make a profit. On the basis of paying to the agent what he legitimately gets for bringing people into the country it will cost them at least a dollar per acre. They have in the United States to-day, I am credibly informed, sixty agents who are operating on a commission basis, who receive for their service something like ten per cent per acre. Hon. gentlemen can figure that out. On a basis of $18 per acre for land, they will get $1.80 per acre for the handling of the land. On the other hand they have the responsibility of going to the vendors, getting the listings of these lands and acting as the agent of the vendor for a period of six or seven years at least,—I am now speaking of the non-resident vendor—thus rendering a service not only to the vendor but to the people of Canada; because to bring in a settler who is located properly, with a decent chance of paying his interest and of having his payments extended when they are due, is certainly rendering a service to the people of Canada that is of some value. Now, a certain proportion of the balance of that money will go to the local individual who assists the agent in that respect. True, if they do not interest the prospective settler from the United States or elsewhere and the settler comes in and purchases without an effort on their part, that dollar will be saved. But that does not happen in a very great number of cases. I am informed that there are at the moment nearly 900,000 acres of western land listed which they can sell on the terms I have outlined, namely, over 32 years and at a rate of 6 per cent. And they propose to spend all the money that they get on that 10 per cent basis in an endeavour to bring people into the country. The arrangement

I have made with them is that they shall settle on the land as a minimum 200 heads of families this year. That is the minimum which I think we should require. I am trying this purely and simply as an experiment, hoping to establish people permanently in that way with a decent chance of getting on.

Mr. SPENCER: Can they settle anywhere?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Allow me to finish, please. If we do not adopt some plan of that kind, what will happen? You will simply put the prospective settler again at the mercy of the private landowner or his agent, and I need not ask any hon. gentleman from western Canada what that means. We all know that the settler will be asked 8 per cent, the prevailing rate in western Canada. And as I have experienced on many occasions, the moment you go to purchase from the private owner, if you appear anxious to have the property he owns you invariably find the price increased ,particularly if you are a newcomer. The same experience is reported by the immigration agents in the United States. They are asking for an organization to which they can send men with the assurance that they will get a fair deal and that they will not come back dissatisfied because of conflicting reports they hear from various points they visit in western Canada. I hope that we shall save some money ultimately in connection with this attempt on our part to carry out the colonization end of the scheme in a definite way for the settlement of people in western Canada. The manager of the company is Mr. Everett. He is the man in whom I stake my confidence for the success of the scheme. As regards Mr. M. A. Brown, he was the originator of this scheme and is again about to raise money. He has met with difficulties and I am not prepared to criticize him. I know that he has been criticized very severely in many quarters, and many of the individuals who backed him at the start say he changed the programme, that another scheme was attempted, and that they were not consulted and are not prepared to put up money. On the other hand, there are still behind him a number of ardent supporters who are putting up their money in order that the scheme may continue. So much for him. But the man on whom I depend to make a success of the undertaking is Mr. Howard Everett, who has had many years experience in land settlement in western Canada. He is an American and was at one time manager of the Luse Land Company who settled a great many people throughout central Saskatchewan and central Alberta. This company did a tremendous business in the early days, as the people of Saskatchewan may remember. This gentleman thoroughly understands the business in which he is engaged, and he thinks he can make a success of it. I hope he can. I hope he will make a huge success of it, because it means that he is bringing in and settling people on the land and giving them an opportunity which they would not otherwise get if it were not for this private corporation which is not taking profits out of the enterprise.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Before the minister entirely concludes, I want to correct something I said this afternoon in connection with the question of advertising. I said that the amount spent outside of Great Britain was $92,000; it is only $90,000. But I want to draw the minister's attention to this fact. I have Hansard before me and I find at page 540 the statement that the amount spent in advertising carried on in Great Britain was $3,089.82, and in other countries $90,595.81. The minister says this return was amended. I turn to the next day's Hansard but I find that the correction has absolutely nothing to do with that question. I have been unable to find it amended anywhere else and these figures are not correct. The minister should tell us where the correction is to be found and how it was made. The House has a right to rely upon the answers given by ministers in the ordinary way, and I want to be entirely fair to my hon. friend. The day that answer was given, and he realized the frightful discrepancy in the figures, he came over to me and said that there must be some error. If there is an error we must have it corrected quickly. I have heard nothing since from the minister. I can well imagine his astonishment at the figures.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My hon. friend's statement is hardly in accordance with what happened. After a note reached me from my secretary saying that a mistake had been made with respect to the advertising in Great Britain, and that instead of giving the full amount it merely referred to the newspaper advertising, which was $3,000, I went over to my hon. friend and told him that I would get a correction of the statement for him the following day. The correction was prepared by Mr. Stead's department and left in the hands of my secretary. The only reason I can conceive for the delay is that he was taken ill and possibly did not forward the statement.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Chairman, evidently the secretary is sick this time. The hon. minister did not tell me anything about that before. If the statement is wrong, cannot we get the facts now as to how much money was spent? How many more shuffles are we to have?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I understood the figures were corrected in Hansard. I will undertake to get the figures to my hon. friend and also to place them on the Table without further delay.

Mr. FORTIER: Are the various provinces which are co-operating with the government ready to grant free land to settlers? Is it not a fact that the province of Quebec has extensive areas of land upon which improvements have been made in the way of the erection of houses and barns ready for intending settlers? And is it not also a fact that the Department of Colonization of Quebec is ready to sell these lands to settlers under very favourable conditions?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes, I think I mentioned that early in the afternoon. We are co-operating very closely with the government of Quebec through the Deputy Minister of Colonization.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Am I correct in inferring from the minister's remarks that this land corporation are to receive 10 per cent on the purchase price of the lands they dispose of and also about $10,000 per month from the government, and that they on their part, according to the arrangements made, are to bring out at least 200 families? In other words, are they to receive $600 per family as a bonus?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I merely say that that is the minimum. It is hoped they will exceed that very substantially.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: They get $120,000 if they bring out 200 families?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No. They get $100,000. It is not $10,000 per month for twelve months, but for ten months.

Mr. BOYS: Supposing the company fail to live up to the conditions laid down, what penalty is provided?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The only penalty one can provide in such a case is to stop further payment. That is one of the reasons why we have a provision for payment by the month. Largely the settlement will be made before the month of August.

Mr. BOYS: I presume there is an agreement signed between the department and the company?

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): That is the proposed agreement. It is not signed.

Mr. BOYS: I would take it for granted that there would be a written agreement for such an important matter?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. BOYS: And I also would assume that the agreement would cover a term of years?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No.

Mr. BOYS: If that is so there is not the same necessity for a penalty. But I would suggest to the minister, if it is the intention of the department to enter into an agreement with the company for a period of years, that it should contain a forfeiture clause in case the company fail to make good; in other words, the agreement should then come to an end.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Month by month they are to report to the government the actual settlement accomplished, and if there is no reasonable prospect of their reaching the minimum we are to cease to do business with them. That is the proposed agreement which is not signed.

Mr. BOYS: I may be wrong, Mr. Chairman, but I am of opinion that a company putting up a large sum of money to engage in this undertaking would want an agreement from the department for a certain term of years.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): They have not asked for that. The agreement is for one year.

Mr. BOYS: If the agreement has not been completed there is plenty of time yet for them to ask for that.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. BOYS: In that event I would certainly recommend to the minister the insertion of such a clause, otherwise we will be committed to obligations without a satisfactory way of reaching the company if they fail to make good.

Mr. MacKELVIE: Is it in contemplation to relax the general regulations regarding labour other than farm labour?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Wherever there appears to be necessity for labour we are prepared to pass it into Canada.

Mr. MacKELVIE: Skilled or unskilled?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Although there is a prospect, I am told, in the building trades in the eastern cities particularly, of a shortage of skilled labour, it has not appeared yet.

Mr. SHAW: In view of the fact that $40,000 has already been paid to this company, according to the return laid on the Table the other day, I presume that some results have been achieved in bringing families to Canada?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I do not know that any families have been brought forward to date. Indeed, it would be rather a mistake to do so at this season. Arrangements are being made for parties to come out. I can only speak authoritatively of two such parties, namely, a number of Polish farmers who are coming with a view to purchasing land for themselves and interested compatriots, and a number of Danish farmers. From Iowa agents are coming forward with parties as soon as weather conditions will permit of inspection of land.

Mr. GOOD: The minister has stated that there is a large quantity of land fairly near the railroads owned by absentee parties. Has he considered the propriety of instituting some system of taxing that land into use so it may be rendered cheaper for those who want it?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): If my hon. friend lived out west he would realize that unimproved land is being severely taxed. The taxes in many cases are 25 per cent higher on unimproved land than on improved land. So the absentee owner is being taxed.

Mr. GOOD: Is there a prospect then of the land returning to the Dominion shortly so that free grants may be made to settlers?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I cannot answer that.

Mr. LEWIS: Presuming that the returns brought down are correct with regard to the $3,000 spent on newspaper advertising in Great Britain, does it not seem a very large amount of money for the desperate efforts that are being made to get British settlers over here at the present time?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): There is very little reduction in the number of people coming from the Old Land over last year or the preceding year. Taking the figures as a whole, they would not indicate any very serious falling off. Indeed, the serious falling off is from the United States; in that case the figures dropped to about 19,000 last year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is my hon. friend quite right there? My recollection is to the contrary.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): If I have quoted the figures wrongly, I shall be glad to be corrected.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps the minister will give us the figures now. My recollection is—and I think we had it up before—that the year before last, British immigration and foreign immigration were in the ratio of 5 to 1, and that last year that dropped down to something less than 2 to 1.

Mr. MANION: I have the figures under my hand. They are divided into English, Irish, Scotch and Welsh, but the totals show that in 1920 there were about 60,000, in 1921 about the same number, and in 1922 abont 34,000; so that they were practically cut in two.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): What period in 1922 does that cover?

Mr. MANION: The figures are furnished by the Bureau of Statistics. The years are given, 1913, 1914 and so on up to 1922, without any indication of what period is covered.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Then the figure for 1922 would cover the nine months to December 31.

Mr. FORKE: I think it is about time I made a little explanation. I hold in my hand a memorandum from the Western Canada Colonization Association on which my name appears as one of its directors. I am fairly familiar with all the circumstances connected with the organization of that association. Two or three years ago—I am not sure of the date—when the organization was first formed I took an active part in it. I attended three or four meetings, but I never received any remuneration for my services, and I never asked for any, so that I have no pecuniary interest of any kind in the organization. I am familiar with the scheme that the association outlined, and with its operations. The only criticism I have to offer would be that the percentage going back to meet the cost of operation of the scheme might be considered a little too large. The weakness I saw in it from the beginning was this: I did not think much privately-owned land would be bought by the association. The average private owner of land does not care very much to sell it on the basis of repayment in thirty-two annual instalments.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

SECOND READING

Bill No. 53, respecting Canadian Press Limited.—Mr. Ryckman.

SUPPLY

The House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

Mr. FORKE: When the House took recess I was making some little explanation in connection with my relations with the Western Canada Colonization Association. I do not suppose the House is very much interested in the matter. However, when I noticed my name on the letter head of the association I thought, perhaps, some other member might have a sheet of the same kind and make an allusion to it in the expectation that they were throwing a bombshell by announcing that I was one of the directors of that association. That is my reason for making this explanation. I may say however that I have no apologies to offer for any connection I have had with this association. Looking into the scheme which it is promoting I believe it has some merit and deserves a fair trial. It is better, perhaps, than the old system of the land colonization companies that got large tracts of land and sold them at the highest price they could possibly get. In this case we know the percentage of profit that is going to the colonization association. I understand that the association has been promised approximately $1,200,000 of subscriptions towards its scheme, and I think that about $150,000 has already been paid in in cash—that is outside of any assistance they have received from the government. I never had time to attend any of their meetings, except one or two when the association was first formed. The only objection that I had to the scheme at that time was, that there were several officers connected with the association that were drawing larger salaries than, I think, their services entitled them to. However, since that time those gentlemen have severed their connection with the association.

In the province of Manitoba I have a comparatively busy time, being associated in a semi-public way with quite a number of organizations, and I never found time to attend any of the meetings of this association. Consequently I made up my mind that when I was not familiar with the inner workings of the association I did not want to share any responsibility. During last session, after being elected a member of the House, I sent in my resignation to the secretary of the association and understood it had been accepted. In looking at the paper I have before me I notice the letters "M.P." are omitted from my name so I suppose that the letter head on it is the old one. I am not making this explanation as an apology. I have nothing against the association. I believe its work merits a fair trial. Upon the face of it the scheme has merit. But I would like to say this: If any member of the House, if any of the hon. members behind me, have any criticisms to make let them do so because if there is anything wrong with this scheme we want to know it. Let the criticism offered, if any is made, be fair criticism, and when the item comes to be voted we will know exactly what to do.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I look upon the subject before the committee, that of immigration, as one of the most important of the session. To a large extent my sympathies were with the minister this afternoon. I am not here to criticize, I am rather here to assist, and I hope that that will be the attitude of hon. members, in this part of the chamber anyway. If they have any criticism to offer by all means let us have it if it is helpful and calculated to assist in the solution of this problem. That kind of criticism, I think, is what we will get. The minister has a difficult problem to solve and he is perfectly aware of the situation. He knows all the circumstances that attend immigration, the difficulties of getting the immigrant and properly settling him on the land once we induce him to come to the country.

I heard a good deal this afternoon about the claims of the different provinces in connection with this matter. That brings to my mind just how many difficulties surround the carrying on of the government of this Dominion. Each province sets up its claim for some attention. It is perfectly proper that it should do so; but I think the explanation why the prairie provinces got more attention in the years gone by with respect to immigration is perfectly evident if we once look at the matter impartially. We had out west great stretches of free land, the best agricultural land, perhaps, that you could find anywhere, land easily broken up. This offered great attractions to incoming settlers, the consequent influx of settlement helping to pay the obligations of Canada and also furnishing a large market for eastern manufactures; and although available lands in other provinces merited attention it was quite natural, altogether apart from the fact of the Dominion government owning the land in the West, that special attention should be paid to peopling the lands that were so eminently fitted for early occupation.

I would like to say a word here in connection with the land in the northern part of the provinces of Ontario and Manitoba, and perhaps in Saskatchewan also. A large amount of that land is bush land, requiring a great deal of work to clear. I do not know how hon. members may feel on the subject, but I think that to settle that land would require a different type of settler; we require a man who will go in there and live what you may call the simple life. I may be wrong in my belief, but I think the only way to get those lands settled will be by inducing people to go in there and clear an acre or two, raise some vegetables and grain, keep a few cattle, and perhaps, work out in the summer and resort to lumbering in the winter. I may be wrong because I am not very well acquainted with northern Ontario. I do know, however, the character of the land in northern Manitoba; and I am perfectly sure that to get the right class of settlers you will have to go to Europe and induce some of those people who are hardy and eminently fitted for clearing up land of this description to go in there and settle. In the case of the lands that we are dealing more immediately with at the present time, it is, perhaps, a different problem altogether.

I now want to say a few words about the condition of agriculture. I would not have mentioned agriculture at all in this debate had the Minister of the Interior not made frequent reference to it this afternoon. The intimation has been made that perhaps the members in this part of the chamber dwell a little too much upon the ills of agriculture at the present time. I am convinced, however, that a little examination of the subject would enable hon. members to see that the condition of agriculture is a very vital question, and one that affects the welfare of the whole Dominion. No matter what our interests may be, we must feed ourselves, and we must withal have something with which to clothe ourselves. Agriculture is the greatest of all industries and one of the most essential to humanity, and even to-day, in this wonderful country of ours, we recognize the fact that if agriculture is not prosperous all suffer alike. I mention that because I want hon. members to realize that while we dwell upon the drawbacks or ills from which agriculture suffers at the present time, we are quite aware that other industries are suffering and other people have difficulties that seem perhaps as large to them as the difficulties of the agriculturist seem to him. We realize however that agriculture is a basic industry and must be made profitable, and when it is prosperous other industries begin to prosper.

Then, the question immediately arises: Why are you asking immigrants to come here when you find agriculture in the condition in which it stands to-day? We can answer this question. I hear from the Old Land sometimes that agriculture is in a deplorable condition over there, and I do not think we need be at all afraid to ask the people to come from the British Isles and throw in their lot with us in Canada. I think the very best brains of the country are needed to solve the problems of agriculture. It seems to me we are in a very difficult position. I quoted the words of Lord Shaw, who was a visitor here, when he referred to the conditions in Canada, and said that it was a crime that 9,000,000 people should be in possession of half the continent and unable to develop the resources. It is no use talking all the time about the great latent wealth of our country in natural resources.

It is about time we quit talking in this strain and started to do something to develop those resources. We have latent wealth, but a section of land uncultivated is no use to us except to grow grass and prairie flowers, and the mines and minerals under the soil are no use unless they are mined. Consequently, if we are going to get the benefit of the natural wealth of our country we must have men and money. These are two essentials to the development of the country. We know our economic conditions. We have a great land. We have provided facilities for a very much larger population than we have to-day, and if we had that larger population the overhead expenses—that is the expenses for the government of the country, the railways and other matters—would not be increased, but the number of people who bore these expenses would be greatly increased, and the burden would be made much lighter for all.

As I said before, agriculture is depressed everywhere, and the conditions here are no worse than they are anywhere, perhaps, in the world to-day as regards that industry. We hear a great deal about the prosperity of the United States. There is no doubt a great industrial boom there, but I do not think the husbandman in that country is so very prosperous at the present time, notwithstanding what we might call the industrial prosperity of the United States.

Looking back, recalling my own experience, I can realize that if the agricultural population is going to be prosperous, the agriculturists will have to help themselves to a very large extent. We are dwelling upon our economic evils. We believe a great many things can be improved and circumstances made better for those engaged in this calling. Nevertheless, I believe that the remedy is in the hands of the people themselves. I think hon. members will excuse me for dwelling more particularly on the prairie provinces, as that is the land with which I am best acquainted. It seems to me to-day that different methods will have to be adopted, if the farmer is going to succeed. We will require to have small farms, more intensive cultivation, and what might be called mixed farming. The day of wheat growing has gone by, and I am perfectly satisfied that even, under present conditions, life can be made quite pleasant on a prairie farm. I know that some people will be prepared to differ with me. I know the circumstances in the West just as well as the Minister of the Interior knows them. The one depressing fact in the prairie provinces is that farmers are loaded down with debt. Were it not so, there would be nothing disheartening in the situation, but that is in reality the position. I believe that we can only help ourselves by having more people to develop that country and to till the prairie soil.

I wish to say a few words about the class of immigrants that we ought to get in this country. We hear a great deal about selected immigrants, I am not one of those who want what you might call indiscriminate immigration. We have a pretty mixed population even at the present time. I will read a short extract describing the sort of people we have in western Canada. We have representatives of every race, creed and tongue under the sun. This extract reads:

> Here we have representatives of every race, creed and tongue under the sun. Chinese, Hindu, Japanese, German, Austrian, Hungarian, Russian, Italian, Pole, Swede, Scandinavian, et al. Fifty-three nationalities, speaking 89 languages and dialects and subscribing to 73 religions and creeds. One man of every 12 living in Saskatchewan is a Ruthenian; one in every 5 living in British Columbia is a Chinaman; 46 per cent. of the population of Saskatchewan is non-English. Winnipeg has the second and Regina the third largest foreign-born population of any cities in the Dominion of Canada.

So that we have a pretty polyglot representation in the western provinces, and perhaps to mix them too much might be rather dangerous. But I am not afraid of the hardy peasant who is willing to go on the land. I do not care very much where he comes from. Of course, the better class of immigrants for Canada will be always from the British Isles and from northern Europe.

With reference to selected immigrants, I think it is nothing more than an intolerable crime to bring, say the London citizen, who never saw the prairie land and knows nothing about prairie life, and place him in an Alberta shanty. We should only bring here people who are fit to live in our country and understand something about the conditions of rural life. We talk a great deal about our country. I am just as proud of Canada as any one, but we have here a very rigorous climate. We have quite a number of months of severe winter, and it must be borne in mind that the people who are to come here and go on the soil and develop the farms of the country must be of vigorous and virile character. To bring to Canada people who are unsuited is both a crime against them and a wrong done to the country to which they come.

Another matter that should be taken into consideration as regards bringing immigrants into this country is the channels through which they pass. I happened to be associated with immigration about twenty years ago, when there was a large flow of immigrants into this country, and I know something about the system that was adopted in Great Britain and in some parts of Europe in securing those immigrants. I should like to give this information to the minister. If he wants to get the right immigrants, he will have to get the right people on the other side to select them. This work cannot be done from this side of the water; it must be done by the people who are in control of the situation over there. The Minister of the Interior of that time, then the Hon. Clifford Sifton, had a most wonderful system of organization, perhaps the best system of getting immigrants that we have ever had in this country. I know he has been blamed for letting down the bars and admitting into Canada some immigrants who should never have been here. I question very much the truth of that assertion. I think it will be found that a good many of the undesirable immigrants that came to Canada, came at a later date rather than during his regime. I will repeat that one of the methods to get proper immigrants to this country is to employ on the other side the proper agents who understand the situation, who can sift the immigrants and see that only the right kind sail for Canada. I have no doubt there are in the Department of the Interior officials who understand something about the system and who will be willing to help as much as they can in this matter of selecting immigrants.

I speak with all due caution, as I do not want to say anything that will reflect upon the minister. I am going to tell the committee only what I have heard. I have heard sometimes that the Department of the Interior has been a dumping ground for inefficients from other departments. I am only repeating this from what I have heard.

An hon. MEMBER: The hon. member should not believe all he hears.

Mr. FORKE: I am rather simple in some ways and, perhaps, I should not believe everything I hear.

Mr. JACOBS: Is it not a fact that these officials are appointed by the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That does not apply apparently to editors of Liberal papers.

Mr. JACOBS: That seems to stick in the crop of the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. FORKE: I am beginning to wonder just where I come in. When I was in the Old Country and connected with the immigration service, there was in vogue a system that I did not like, namely, that of subsidizing steamship companies. I do not know whether that is done at the present time to any extent or not. We found in different towns and villages agents of steamship companies who had no regard at all for the truth. According to them, this was an Eldorado, a land of sunshine and happiness, and anyone who came to Canada was blessed. With the steamship companies, the question was one of numbers, and quality had no place in their calculations. I do not know what the system is to-day; but I would certainly be opposed to granting steamship companies a subsidy for every immigrant they brought over. I would find some other method of assisting passages.

Where should immigrants be sought? I believe to-day you can find in the British Isles many immigrants of the very best kind, young agricultural labourers, whom I could, without hesitation, advise to come to Canada, knowing conditions as I know them as they exist here to-day. We have had some pretty good immigrants come to Canada as agricultural labourers. I would refer the committee to the premier of Alberta, Premier Greenfield, the premier of British Columbia, Premier Oliver, and the premier of Saskatchewan, Premier Dunning. They all came over as immigrants, a pretty good sort, and it was a pretty good thing also for themselves that they came over.

Mr. JACOBS: Likewise the hon. gentleman himself.

Mr. FORKE: I am very modest, as hon. members know; but I have found it a pretty good thing to come to Canada.

I should like to say just a few words as regards taking care of the immigrant after he comes here. I can well recollect the feeling that I had many years ago when I bade farewell to my native land and turned my face toward this land of hope. There is a good deal of sinking of the heart and of wondering just what the future holds for one. You come across the wide ocean amongst strangers, first impressions have a great deal to do with what you are going to think of the land to which you are coming to make your home, and I should like to see these immigrants, when they set foot upon these shores, receive a very hearty welcome. I have never forgotten the first experiences that I had at Halifax. I do not think it is at all derogatory to me to say that I crossed the ocean forty years ago as a steerage passenger. I can well remember our being herded at Halifax just like so many sheep or cattle, and I can assure hon. members that the experience was not very pleasant. I have visited Quebec and Montreal since then, and I am happy to say that conditions as they exist to-day are different from those that prevailed forty years ago. I would, however, repeat that there is nothing like giving immigrants a hearty welcome. I know the hearts of the Canadian people are kind anyway, and immigrants are most likely to receive a welcome.

The immigrant should be looked after upon his landing in this country in order to see that he is not taken advantage of, because there are in Canada, as elsewhere, dishonest persons who will take advantage of innocent people. I have looked into the soldier settlement scheme, and while some other speaker to-night will, perhaps, take up that subject and enlarge upon it to a greater extent than I am going to do, I believe in the soldier settlement scheme we have the nucleus of a system that might be widened out to great advantage in dealing with other settlers who come to make their home amongst us.

Let me say a few words as regards the drift to the south. I have under my hand some statistics, but I think most of them have been mentioned this afternoon. I do not think any government is to blame for the drift of people from Canada to the south. I do not care what government or what conditions we have in Canada, there always will be, to some extent, a drift of our people to the great republic to the south of us. It will have the attraction that numbers have; that the unknown has, and young and ambitious people, no matter what Canada may be, no doubt will, at times, drift over the line and leave us for the time being. We have, undoubtedly a rigorous climate, and older people may find it to their advantage to move to a warmer climate. I only hope older people will see their way to go over the mountains and, perhaps, find what they want in British Columbia in our own country. Almost a tragedy of the western prairies has been the fact that people have gone out to the West, have developed a farm, have made a home and become fairly comfortable, and then as old age has come on, they have felt they would like some milder climate, so they have sold their farm for a good price and moved away instead of their wealth remaining in this country to beautify and develop the original home in which they have made their money. This is something we cannot help; it will perhaps always remain so, and it to some extent explains the drift that goes over the line to the south of us.

There is another percentage of our population that goes south that we can very well do without. Perhaps there is at the present time an abnormal crossing of the line. I think I said before that there is what might be called an industrial boom in the United States to-day. I do not know if anyone can explain just how this boom is coming about. Agriculture is not what one might call in a first class condition there. If the wages are high on the other side of the line our artisans and labourers will inevitably drift there and you cannot keep them back. Most of the young men that go, although they are Canadians, experience no difficulty in making the change; their belongings can be packed into a club bag or satchel, and they can very easily cross the line, perhaps never to come back. These are the conditions that we must face. I know that some of my friends will not agree with me, but in my opinion, in seeking immigrants we must not draw the line at agriculture. If we can get labourers and artisans I believe we can find room for them here, because I think it will be found in the not distant future that there will be a shortage of labour of that kind in the Dominion if the United States continues to prosper industrially as it seems to be doing to-day. Well, it may be said, if such people come into Canada they too will drift across the border. However, that may be, I have no doubt the tide will turn some day, and not very far in the future either.

It must be perfectly evident from what I have said that I am much in favour of a vigorous immigration policy, although I do not know that many of my friends will agree with me in this respect. This is a matter of opinion, but I would be in favour of the appointment of a minister of immigration and colonization who should have charge entirely of that work. I believe the present acting minister (Mr. Stewart) is overloaded with work. While undoubtedly he is capable, I think he has more to do than he can properly attend to. I am not finding fault with him, nor criticising in any way what he has done, but I think the position is important enough and requires enough ability and energy to necessitate the appointment of a minister who shall be solely charged with the duties of this office. I am prepared to foster a vigorous immigration policy, because I do not believe that our circumstances are ever going to be improved if matters remain as they are to-day. How are we going to get along if we do not take some vigorous steps in the direction of increasing our population? We say that we have hard times and are burdened with high taxes and more railways than we need. Well, are we going to sit idly by and see our people drift south while our own population dwindles and our burdens grow heavier? Are times going to improve under such a policy of inactivity? I believe that the times can and will be improved if we double our population. If we do that, instead of making things worse it will make them better for us; and I do not believe that the people of Canada would have anything to regret in the result. Now, I think perhaps I have spoken long enough. I am willing to assist the minister in this work, in any way in order to see it carried forward successfully. Referring again to the colonization scheme, I have looked into proposals of the Western Canada Colonization Association and I think the scheme has merit. If there is any weakness in it, however, by all means let us hear about it and criticise it and, if we think it is wrong, withhold the vote.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I agree with my hon. friend in all that he has said, except one statement he made, namely, that my department is the home for the derelicts of the other departments. I should like to know where the hon. gentleman got that information. I have only one officer in the department, Mr. Lynton, who was formerly in the Department of Agriculture, who has come from any other department of government to any of the four departments of which I have charge.

Mr. FORKE: I am rather sorry the minister took it so seriously; I simply hear the statement and have no proof of it.

Mr. MANION: With the rest of the members of this House I listened this afternoon with a good deal of interest to the statement delivered by the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Stewart), and I must confess frankly that I was somewhat disappointed, as I am afraid the people will also be, that something newer than anything he offered was not placed before the House. I know that the minister has a very difficult position to fill and I do not wish to be unfair to him in any respect; but so far as I could infer from his remarks, it seems to me that in the period of nearly a year and a half during which he has been in power he has not changed any of the policies of the previous government in regard to the work of his department. At any rate, I gleaned no sign of any change; and I gathered from some of his remarks that he had made practically no alterations in any way. That, I presume, is akin to the course that has been followed in connection with other policies which the previous government carried out, which were severely criticised at various times by hon. gentlemen when they were in opposition, but which were not changed when they had an opportunity to change them.

I agree with most of the remarks of my hon. friend who has just sat down (Mr. Forke). I think he has made a speech which will be of service in this discussion. We do need these immigrants; but unfortunately we are not getting them. The minister gave this afternoon certain figures which I think were correct. He did not quote them all and I shall give three or four that bear on my contention. In 1914, we had over 400,000 immigrants coming to this country; in 1920, 117,000; in 1921, 148,000; and last year it had dropped to 89,000; in other words, practically cut in two during the first year of my hon. friend's regime. I may observe, because I think it will be of interest to the House, that a short time ago in reading a history of this country I ran across the fact that in 1842, eighty-one years ago, we had 44,000 immigrants coming to Canada, or half as many at that time as came in the past year.

I was struck recently by an article that appeared in one of our morning papers as reproduced from the London Times, in which it was stated that Canada was not taking advantage of the opportunity which she had of bringing immigrants to this country. Let me quote a couple of paragraphs from that article:

> There is no doubt Australia is the one Dominion which has risen to its opportunity.

That is with regard to Empire settlement.

> As for Canada, her best friends hope she may soon take the very plain hint which W. G. Ormsby-Gore, Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies, gave at the Canada Club dinner last week when he said that unless Canada hurried, Australia would ear-mark all the £3,000,000 which the British government was prepared to spend yearly on emigration under the Empire Settlement Act . . . .
> Mr. Ormsby-Gore was amply justified in appealing to the government of Canada, which has yet to respond to the invitation in the Empire Settlement Act for a greater degree of co-operation.

That perhaps is part of the reason why Canada has not been getting the British settlers whom we should like to secure, a fact which the hon. leader of the Progressive party deplores. I admire the remarks of that hon. gentleman, because he has broadly taken the stand that Canada must have immigration. I recall having read in various newspapers resolutions passed by different farmers' organizations in this country advocating that no more immigration should be permitted at the present time, and I was glad to see the leader of the Progressives take the broad-minded attitude he did on that question. It seems to me overwhelmingly obvious that in this country of such vast area we require immigration, no matter what any organization may say to the contrary, whether it be a farmers', a labour, or an industrial organization. The very fact that we have an area of three and a half million square miles—greater than the area of the United States and double the area of Europe apart from Russia—and that in that portion of Europe there is a population of 300,000,000 as against our 9,000,000, is strong proof that we require immigrants.

Mr. SPENCER: The hon. member has mentioned several organizations that want to stop immigration. Can he tell me of any people's organization that is asking for increased immigration?

Mr. MANION: I am not speaking for any organization, but I think I am voicing the opinion of the large majority of our people when I say that we do want immigration; and when my hon. friend's leader endorses that opinion, perhaps his remarks will have more weight with the hon. member than anything I may say. It seems to me to be deplorable that we should allow such an immense country as this to go to waste; and that anyone should ask such a question as my hon. friend puts to me is certainly unreasonable, to put it as mildly as I can. We have in northern Ontario, an area extending from North Bay on the east to the Manitoba boundary on the west, embracing from three hundred to three hundred and fifty thousand square miles, nearly as great as France and Germany added together, where they have considerably over 100,000,000 people, and yet in this area we have only 150,000 people. These figures are so simple to realize that they show to my mind the absolute necessity of bringing in more people.

And may I say that I regret that this government and previous governments—for I am not criticizing the present government particularly in this matter—and the provincial government of Ontario have neglected northern Ontario? It has been neglected as have northern Quebec and northern British Columbia, because they are all bush lands. I put a question to the minister this afternoon, and he very honestly answered it as other ministers in previous governments would have done, that northern Ontario, northern British Columbia and northern Quebec did not get the advertising from the Dominion government that the prairie provinces got. I understand the reasons—that the prairie lands are held by the Dominion and are more easy to cultivate. But there are throughout the northern European countries people who prefer to go into bush lands, just as I am informed the French Canadian pioneer has the same preference. Consequently I believe it should be the effort of this government, even if it has not been of past governments, to bring into northern Ontario as many of this class of settler as possible.

I mention northern Ontario particularly, and for this reason. This country unfortunately is divided into five great sections: the Maritime provinces in the East, then Ontario and Quebec, with different ambitions and different interests; then that great section of northern Ontario; then the prairie provinces, also with different ambitions and different interests; and finally British Columbia. But northern Ontario, the section from which I come, unfortunately divides into the East and the West this great country, and until that vast area is more fully populated it will continue to form a chasm separating the East from the West, and help to keep alive, and perhaps intensify, differences which I regret to say already exist to too marked a degree in this country.

We have in northern Ontario, northern Quebec and northern British Columbia millions of acres of land and, as the minister has pointed out, in the prairies we have from 15,000,000 to 20,000,000 acres of land within reasonable distance of railways. There are in Europe tens of millions of people anxious to get out of that militaristic battleground and start life anew in this country; and I believe now is the ideal time for the government to do everything possible to populate these vast areas with the best type of agricultural workers—and, as we know, these always form the best type of citizens.

Not only that, Mr. Chairman, but the increasing of our population with the proper type of immigration will help to cure the two great ills with which we are now afflicted—the railway problem and the tax problem. These two problems can be solved in only one way. We have overbuilt our railways for such a small population by twenty or thirty years, and, of course, we spent an enormous amount of money on the war. By increasing our population we shall be creating greater traffic for our railways and lessen the burden of our national debt and taxes.

Every fair-minded man admits that conditions in western Canada have been bad during the last two or three years. I think everyone who is not blindly prejudiced will admit that the farmers of the prairie provinces have had difficult conditions to contend with in that period. But I am only speaking from the standpoint of the ordinary citizen when I say that I do not think the real reasons are always given in explaining the cause of those conditions—at least not all the reasons are given. In the first place the minister mentioned this afternoon—and I think it is one of the main reasons—that one of the reasons for the bad conditions out West is that the prices of agricultural products produced in the West have been deflated to a much greater extent than the prices of other products of the country. The farmer has to sell his goods at a low price but everything which he has to buy is still very much above the pre-war level. Before the war the farmers of the prairie provinces were doing fairly well in fact a very large proportion of them were doing very well, on prices very much akin to the prices of agricultural products to-day but the prices of the things they bought were very much more reasonable than those they have to pay to-day. Then the minister also mentioned what I have had pointed out to me many times by those who have lived in the West that there has been a great deal of land speculation by those who got high prices for their grain during the war years and who forgot as many of our industrialists forgot that these prices would not prevail permanently. They speculated in land as many of us in the cities did. I know many cities west of the Great Lakes where live men who were rich are now poor. They speculated on the possibility of prices continuing high. Farmers speculated in land on the possibility of the price of grain continuing high, and to-day they find they cannot sell their products at sufficient prices to pay interest on those speculations.

But there are two other conditions that are rarely mentioned in this House. In fact I have never heard them mentioned, although no doubt they have been without my noticing it. One of these factors is world conditions. Previous to the war a large proportion of our western grain was sold in Europe. Unfortunately owing to the chaotic conditions brought about by war the people of Europe are no longer able to buy our products in the same proportion as they did in pre-war days. That has been a very important factor in placing the farmers of the prairie provinces in a difficult position, and until these world conditions improve those farmers will probably remain in at least not as good a position as they were before the war. I notice by the press that Russia is again beginning to ship wheat to some of the European countries. Well, if Russia and Roumania come into the market to the extent they did before the war, it will be one more reason why the farmers of western Canada will have to take more of the advice offered them by the leader of the Progressives (Mr. Forke) in his speech a few minutes ago, as to mixed farming for example.

Mr. COOTE: If conditions are as the hon. member states, how is it going to help us in Canada to bring in more farmers to produce more agricultural products to get rid of?

Mr. MANION: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to offer advice to hon. members from the West. I leave that to my hon. friend, the leader of the Progressives. He offered some suggestions which I think might well bear investigation by most of my hon. friends who surround him. But at any rate I submit that I have offered reasons why I do not believe these millions of acres of our lands should be permitted to go to waste. I think there is room for millions of people from Europe to make a living out here even if they do not sell their products in the European markets.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What are we going to do with those products if we do not sell them in European markets?

Mr. MANION: If my hon. friend will have a little patience I may offer some suggestions and indicate what my opinions are in that respect. I was going to offer another suggestion, Mr. Chairman, in regard to a further cause of present conditions in the West. It is rarely mentioned by my hon. friends to my left. One of the main causes I think for the difficulties not only of the prairie farmers but of many farmers in other parts of the Dominion, and certainly of the farmers in my section, is that there is a practical embargo put up by the United States against the entrance of our agricultural products. I may mention in passing that the exodus to the United States is not to a free trade country, it is to a country which to-day probably has the highest protective tariff in the world.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Will the hon. gentleman not admit that the United States to-day is the largest free trade area in the world.

Mr. MANION: No, Mr. Chairman, I will not admit that the United States is a free trade area at all. It is an absolutely protected area. The United States has the highest protection to-day of any country in the world. I understand what my hon. friend is pointing out.

Mr. CAMPBELL: It has free trade within its boundaries.

Mr. MANION: But Canada has a larger area than the United States, so we have a fairly large free trade area here, if it gets down to that. But at any rate the tariff barriers on goods entering the United States are very high, and therefore I do not think anyone who wishes to be fair will argue that the United States is a free trade country. It is as Germany was before the war, a very highly protected country.

Now, Mr. Chairman, like my hon. friend, the leader of the Progressives, I have not risen with any desire to offer unfair criticisms, and I have done all the criticizing I intend to do. I wish simply to offer a few suggestions that may be of some assistance to the minister in dealing with this question.

In regard to the exodus from this country, it has been said—the minister says the figures are too great—that it amounts to something like 10,000 per month. I assume it is difficult to get accurate figures; at any rate we all admit that the exodus is very considerable. It may be of interest to the House to know that there is a very heavy exodus from the United States at the present time. Some figures I got from the Bureau of Statistics the other day show that from 1910 to 1920 the number of immigrants going into the United States was 9,000,000, while the number of emigrants going from the United States was 6,500,000, so that out of the 9,000,000 going in in that ten years, only 2,500,000 remained.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Can my hon. friend say where the emigrants from the United States went?

Mr. MANION: I have the figures, but I have not the time to look them up.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Do the countries to which they go maintain less tariff protection than the country whence they came?

Mr. MANION: There is only one free trade country in the world—Great Britain; and I am sure they did not go there.

Mr. SHAW: Some of them went to the war, perhaps.

Mr. MANION: Yes, and there was some exodus from Canada also on account of the war. I am certain that all those who left the United States went to protectionist countries. Certainly very few of them went back to Great Britain. I notice that there are more immigrants going into the United States from Great Britain to-day than are going into all the British dominions combined from Great Britain; so that the United States is getting quite a number from that country. I assume that most hon. members have had an opportunity of seeing the figures; it is stated that something like 75,000 are to be allowed into the United States this year from Great Britain under their rule of admission, and that that figure will be overtaken so rapidly that during the remaining eight or nine months of this year probably no more will be permitted to enter who come from Great Britain. So that the free trade of Great Britain is apparently not helping very much to hold her people within her own borders.

Mr. COOTE: Can the hon. member tell me whether the United States has sought any of this immigration from Great Britain? Is she carrying on immigration propaganda in Great Britain?

Mr. MANION: I do not believe she is. I think the United States is discouraging immigration at the present time.

Now, I was suggesting some points in connection with the exodus from this country. One suggestion I wish to offer is that we should endeavour to remedy the conditions in the prairie provinces which are unjust. Judging by the questions put by some of my hon. friends, one might get the impression that I am unfriendly to the prairie provinces. I may point out to them that the whole future of my section of the country depends on the prairie provinces, so that I have every reason to be friendly to them. I have nothing but the best wishes for them and am ready to do everything I can to assist them.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): All right; will the hon. gentleman offer to help us to secure a lower tariff.

Mr. MANION: I will deal with that question in a few moments, if my hon. friend will just be patient. I marked down on my notes the word "tariff," because I knew it would come in some time.

I was going on to say that there are many injustices from which the prairie farmers are suffering, such as high railway and shipping rates. A committee of this House is dealing with shipping rates, and another is dealing with agricultural problems and the grain trade. My home city probably handles more grain at the present time than any other city in the world. I noticed recently that Montreal was given credit for handling more grain than any other port in America; I think the figures given for Montreal were something like 125,000,000 bushels last year. But Port Arthur and Fort William, which are really one port, handled last year considerably over 200,000,000 bushels of wheat. So that this is really the greatest grain port on the North American continent—with all due respect to our good friends from Montreal.

Mr. BUREAU: Which is the better, Fort William or Port Arthur?

Mr. MANION: Modesty prevents my saying which. Despite the fact that Fort William is so largely dependent upon the grain trade, I believe that there are injustices in connection with that trade from which the prairie farmers are suffering. The injustices to any individual farmer may not be very great, but in the handling of the wheat generally for the whole of the prairie provinces, taking it by and large, it means a good deal. I shall be pleased to see any of these injustices wiped out. If the committee which is dealing with the banking affairs of this country can show how banking rates for the prairie farmers can be lowered, I shall be only too happy to back up any legislation looking to that end. The hon. minister this afternoon said that the farmers of the West were paying high rates of interest; I do not know whether it was he or somebody else who mentioned the payment of 9 to 10 per cent on occasions. Somebody expressed the view that 6 per cent should be a fair rate. Well, I know that the lowest rate allowed by the banks in Fort William on gilt edge securities is 7 per cent, and if the farmers of the West received their money at 7 per cent they would probably be fairly well satisfied. However, whatever we do respecting our banking institutions we cannot afford to put them in a precarious position. The whole House will stand back of the farmers, though, in any legislation which may be brought down designed to benefit them. I mention these things only to show—and I know I am speaking for the whole of this corner of the

9 p.m.

House—that we would do anything in our power to improve the conditions of the western farmer.

There is another way in which conditions can be improved, and that is by building up the home market.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MANION: All hon. members know that the farmers of the United States sell over 90 per cent of their products in their own markets. My hon. friends to my left may laugh at the idea of building up a home market. I quite understand that it would take some time to build up a home market in Canada big enough to absorb all the grain produced in the West, but perhaps the farmers in the vicinity of Montreal, Sherbrooke, Hamilton and Toronto would not be so ready to laugh at the suggestion that we should build up a home market. I am ready to say that tariff reductions may be made that will improve conditions for the farmers, and I will answer my hon. friend (Mr. Garland, Bow River) now: I am quite agreeable to tariff reductions being made so long as he can prove that they will improve the conditions for the farmer in the West without ruining the rest of the country. There is no doubt that free trade, which is advocated by many, would benefit the prairie provinces for a time, but it would ruin the eastern sections of the country. I cannot see that it would be advantageous to our country as a whole to ruin the East in order to benefit the West.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): What about ruining the West for the sake of the East?

Mr. MANION: Well, before the war, tariffs were not ruining the West; the West was getting along fairly well, and as soon as the conditions respecting prices, particularly of eastern products, get back where they should be, the farmers of the West will prosper; there will be no ruining of the East to help out the West or vice versa. I believe that a moderate tariff policy is what we should have in this country.

To my mind this country requires three classes of immigrants. The most important class, probably, is the farming class, consisting of men who go on the land, whether in the prairie provinces, in northern Ontario or elsewhere. I believe it would be a very good idea for this government to take into account the fact that that chasm between the East and West, extending practically from where we sit to-night to the Manitoba boundary, should be given more attention, and even if these lands are uncleared lands I believe the minister would be well advised, in the interest of Canada as a whole and in the interest of the better understanding in this country, if he would co-operate with whatever government is in power in the province of Ontario next year and do everything he can to fill up those northern lands.

In addition to agriculturists there are two other classes that I think we need in this country. First we need domestic servants. I believe that this country could stand to-day—to the good of Canada and the good of the people brought out for that purpose—quite a large inflow of domestic servants. There is one other class. Despite any resolutions passed by labour unions, I believe we require a certain group of labourers, particularly those who wield the pick and shovel. The Canadian will not do the work that used to be done by the Italian labourer, neither will the American or British immigrant. He does not wish to do that rough work. He prefers to do something a little more genteel, if I may use that expression without disrespect to the men concerned. We require in this country a certain group of immigrants who will do that work.

I have endeavoured to offer a few sugestions to the minister with the object of rendering him whatever assistance I can. I hope he may be very successful in bringing more people to this country than he has brought in the past, and that he may have success to a greater extent than he has hitherto had in preventing people from leaving this country and going to other lands.

Mr. MERCIER (Translation): Mr. Chairman, Canada is, to-day, pre-eminently a land of peace and mutual respect; it is the beacon-light towards which the European nations anxious to emigrate, now turn their troubled souls to begin life anew, an ideal life which would be as the image of their former happiness. Our country enjoys complete unity, with its two dominating races whose national aspirations are similar; it is the land of religious and constitutional freedom. Although it has nine provinces, Canada has but one flag: the Union Jack. The maple leaf and the beaver are the only emblems of our country. Its soil is fertile, its forests extensive, numerous are its natural resources, its industries most promising notwithstanding these difficult after war times. However, we fully realize that an agricultural, commercial and industrial crisis is still being felt here as in other foreign countries. Trade has not yet fully recovered: it lacks stability; workmen are even forced to remain idle two or three days per week. The farmer calls loudly for markets. In short all seem to bear witness to the fact that, at the present time, throughout Canada, our population is able to cope with the requirements of trade and industry and so contribute to their success.

The government, in which I have absolute faith and particularly the Minister of the Interior, who is competent in such matters, seem to have drawn up a wise policy on immigration though couched in rather cautious language. Let us hope that the carrying out of these ideas will have all the good effects intended, for the welfare of our people and the success of the work which they desire to place to their credit. Let us be prudent. Let us choose our immigrants with a view not only to securing the best, but also to securing the kind most needed. If we wish for the future and forever to maintain our country great and prosperous, we should strive to preserve it such as it is to-day, respectful of its forefathers' traditions and watchful of our customs and manners. With that aim in view, Mr. Chairman, we need at least immigrants who understand our economic situation and our ways, they must have sufficient intelligence and judgment to adopt, conform and especially assimilate themselves to these conditions. I do not hesitate for a moment to state on the floor of the House that Canada is in no need, at present, of labour immigration. Our national—I want to say, so as to be better understood our Canadian artisans—have a first claim to any manual and industrial employment available. We must not, by all means, bring them in contact on our own soil with the competition of foreign labour. It would be unjust at the present moment, especially in these after war hard times, when they have to toil and make the most of every opportunity so as to enable them to procure the bare necessities for themselves and their families. If agriculture needs help let us find it only in a sound and fit immigration. Let it be strictly limited to agriculture. This step would be of a practical nature, benefiting all the people in the Dominion.

The figures cited by the hon. Minister of the Interior bearing witness to the emigration of our people towards the United States, is food for thought; it is the present generation, the hope, the living and tangible future of our country which is flowing out. A repatriation policy is necessary. We must reach them either through lectures or agents, in fact by all possible means; we must convince them that it is necessary they return to the land of their forefathers, the soil they deserted on the spur of the moment, enthused at the prospect of joining the American Republic and obtaining higher wages. If they left, naturally it is through the soliciting of others who had preceded them to that foreign land. The example was fatal. Branches were detached from the great Canadian tree; impoverished in sap the small branch found its way to the neighbouring republic, only to linger and die within a few years.

Let the Dominion government closely associate itself to the various provincial associations and adopt a common policy so that this repatriation work may bear fruit. May it bring back to our country excellent families of farmers and labourers who should never have emigrated in a passing moment of disillusion.

All the provinces suffer from the emigration of our people to the United States. The present situation resembles somewhat that of 1896. Most of the hon. members of this House will remember: uneasiness was general, trade was languishing, the smoke-stacks of mills were towering but lifeless, agriculture practically without markets and prices unstable like passing clouds. In the West, settlers shifted to the United States, even a western newspaper of the time said: "That the roads leading from Manitoba to the United States were worn and broken up by the wheels of trucks of settlers deserting the West."

Their discouragement was therefore evident; they took to the road leading to their native parish or directed their steps towards the mills over the border. The Laurier government applied a remedy to the situation and, through its efficient policy, brought back prosperity to the country. Again, in 1923, we must courageously get to work. Let us develop our natural resources and induce our workmen to further promote that object. Thus we shall again see days of abundance appear in Canada. We shall then perceive that it is not a great flood of immigration which will have rebuilt us, but our own efforts alone.

Mr. GOOD: I listened this afternoon with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart), but I must confess, with a good deal of disappointment. We are all anxious for immigration if we can get it, but I have some figures here I would like to submit to the House and I think they are entirely relevant to the discussion. I have a little pamphlet written by Miss Whitton, who is now, I understand, secretary to the hon. minister without portfolio (Mr. Low). The title of this pamphlet is "Some aspects of the Immigration Problem," and I gather from it that during the years 1900 to 1919 this country spent nearly $20,000,000 on immigration. What results have we secured from that very large expenditure? Take the last census period of ten years, from 1911 to 1921, we have, according to this document—and I think the figures will stand examination—lost about two and a half million people. I would like to submit to the minister and to this House that if we are going to spend $20,000,000 in twenty years, or, say $10,000,000 in ten years—and the minister is going to ask a very much larger appropriation for the coming year—and if we are not going to be able to retain any of the immigrants we get, what is the use of spending the money?

I am anxious, and I think we are all anxious, that we should have immigrants of the proper type in this country. We have vast natural resources to develop. We have a railway system which is capable of handling the business of two or three times the present population, but I do think we ought to give some consideration to the facts which have come to our attention during the last ten or twenty years. We have spent this large amount of money. We have received, I think, during the last forty years, nearly 5,000,000 immigrants, and during the last ten years about three and a half million, but we have not kept them. We are losing our immigrants and our natural increase almost as fast as they come. Anybody who looks at the increase of population in this country during the last twenty years, or even beyond that, and figures out the natural increase and the amount of immigration that we have received, can come to only one conclusion, namely that Canada has been and is at the present time, as was mentioned the other day in this House, an immigration sieve. I dare say a great many hon. members have read that very interesting and significant article in Maclean's Magazine a few weeks ago, "Is Canada an Immigration Sieve"? We can answer that question only in the affirmative.

There is the situation that confronts us, and I want to ask the minister and this House whether there is any better prospect of getting returns from the money that it is now proposed to expend? We have not been able to retain the immigrants. We have been throwing away the money during the last 10 or 20 years. And what difference is there now? What better prospect is there at the present time of being able to retain any of the immigrants we may secure than there has been during the last 10 or 20 years? If we had any assurance that we could retain these immigrants, there would be some advantage or propriety in authorizing the expenditure, but if it is simply maintaining a large organization for securing immigrants who rapidly emigrate to the United States, I do not think it is good business.

There is another question also which we ought to consider before any considerable expenditures are authorized for immigration purposes. The minister in his address referred to a certain type of settler which, he stated, was wanted. It is quite possible we may secure from Europe—and I think we can secure from China and Japan, at all events—people who are prepared to accept the conditions in this country and probably stay here. Are we prepared to receive those people? Do we want people of that type in large numbers to come into this country? We had a debate last year on oriental immigration. There are many Europeans—and I am quite satisfied the members from British Columbia will admit that there are lots of orientals—who will be glad to secure an entrance into this country, and when here will stay here, and probably make good. Are we prepared to throw our doors wide open to these people? I think, without elaborating the idea any further, we must give some attention to the immigrant's quality and general outlook, when we are dealing with prospective immigrants. I remember last summer hearing Bishop Lloyd of Saskatchewan speak of some of the problems of assimilation which the people of Saskatchewan had to face, and I must admit it was an address which impressed upon me very much the need of going carefully in regard to getting into this country in large numbers people who do not speak our language, who are not familiar with our institutions and who can be assimilated only very gradually.

Mr. JACOBS: Will the hon. member tell me what he means by assimilation? I should like to get his definition of it in regard to the immigrants that come into this country.

Mr. GOOD: What I mean by assimilation, and what I understood Bishop Lloyd to mean, was that they should become Canadian citizens, that they should be rendered capable of taking part in our public life—in our municipal, provincial and federal life—to become good citizens. That would involve, to a very large extent, learning to speak English, the establishment of schools and so on.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Or the French language?

Mr. GOOD: The French language, certainly. I think the hon. member understands what I mean. I think, without going into the niceties of definition, that we all understand what is meant by assimilation. I only wish to bring out the thought, which was expressed very pointedly by Bishop Lloyd last summer when I heard him, that the problem of assimilation in some of our districts is a serious one. I noted when the minister was speaking an admission that there were a number of Quebec enterprises needing labour. I took it that it was cheap labour. Now that is a very significant admission.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I never said anything of the kind. I did not make any suggestion whether it was cheap labour or dear labour. I said there was an opening for labour.

Mr. GOOD: I did not wish to insinuate that the minister said it was cheap labour. That was an inference which I drew from his remark that certain Quebec enterprises needed labour. I understood that he meant by that ordinary unskilled labour.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes, correct.

Mr. GOOD: I simply want to draw the attention of the House to this: that a good many of our social problems—problems that I have seen in one city in Ontario that I know pretty well—have arisen out of the demand of our manufacturing industries for cheap labour irrespective of everything else. I want the committee just to keep that in mind. It is not always the best kind of labour to get in. While we may desire cheap labour for performing rough work, and while our manufacturing and other large industries may desire that kind of labour, we ought to go just a little cautiously before we give in too much to that demand.

With respect to the remark which the minister made as to western farmers starting out by acquiring too much land, I want to suggest this, that there are two purposes for which a farmer may desire more land. He may desire to speculate; he may wish to pocket the unearned increment, and I dare say that throughout our western provinces particularly, that desire has led to purchasing large tracts of land, far larger than can be worked to advantage. But there is another reason. A farmer may wish to get what might be called the economic unit for the particular type of farming in which he is engaged, and it does not follow by any means that 160 acres is the economic unit. From what I know of western farming—and, perhaps, that is not very much—I judge that a very much larger area than that is the economic unit in western Canada.

I think some of us must have been very much impressed by the information which we secured this afternoon in regard to the activities of the Western Canada Colonization Association. I made a note here that it was stated that they were dealing solely with those wishing to sell or purchase land, and that they have agents throughout the United States. I presume those farmers who were mentioned as desiring to leave the high-priced lands in the United States and come to Canada are, perhaps, the unconscious victims, shall I say, of the Western Canada Colonization Association? I do not wish to deal uncharitably with this organization; but it is well known, I think, that there are a number of people in Canada and, perhaps, outside of Canada, who own large tracts of land in our western provinces, who have bought that land for speculative purposes, who are holding on to it, who, in my judgment, are parasites in this country, and who should be taxed out of their unholy or immoral earnings—earnings which they hope to get at the present time or which they have already received. I venture to suggest that it is quite possible; I do not say that it is probable—

Mr. HARRIS: Would the hon. member call a retired farmer a parasite?

Mr. GOOD: I certainly do not call a retired farmer a parasite as long as he lives on his savings. I call a man a parasite who speculates in land and who lives on other people's earnings.

Mr. HARRIS: Will the hon. member say that retired farmers who are living on the incomes they derive from the farms they have previously occupied, are not, in a manner, speculators?

Mr. GOOD: By no means. No, I would not admit that for one moment.

Mr. HARRIS: Will the hon. member permit of this suggestion, that competition is the essence of what farms are going to rent for?

Mr. GOOD: The hon. member has not understood my point at all, apparently, but I think there are a good many members present who have understood it. Just in that connection, I want to point out this. I have a note here that the Canada Colonization Association acts as agent for absentee vendors. These absentee vendors are the people in western Canada who have—what shall I say?—been the curse of this country, and they are the people we ought to get after. They should be ousted from the position which they occupy. I do not consider this country is under any obligation to show them mercy, and I should like to see those earnings that I spoke of, what is called the unearned increment, appropriated by the state. That would soon cause many of our western lands to revert to the Dominion or to the provinces, as the case might be; in that way we would have free homesteads again, and some of the people whom we want to get into this country would have some of that cheap land. About the time the war stopped and there was a prospect of our soldiers coming back, I remember getting a circular from some land organization operating, I think, in Winnipeg, informing me and all others who received the circular that we should get in on the ground floor. The returned men were coming back, the circular said; they would soon be wanting land, and now there was a chance to purchase the land, and to hold it so that when the demand was great from those returned men, we would make a good profit on our money. That was the sort of bait held out to investors in this country, and I want to say frankly here that I cannot conceive of anything more iniquitous than propaganda or temptations of that sort which were publicly circulated in this country. This has been the curse of western Canada as it has been of other new territories.

In conclusion I want to make just one or two comments on the speech of the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion). I was rather amused at what he said about the United States being a highly protected country. I cannot quite imagine that the hon. gentleman was serious in his description of the United States, because if there is on the face of the earth any country which shows the benefits of free trade, it is the United States.

Mr. MANION: Will the hon. member explain to the committee in what way the United States is a free trade country?

Mr. GOOD: I was about to proceed to elaborate or elucidate my point for the benefit of the hon. member. When we consider the effect of a fiscal policy upon any nation, we must consider the proportion between the internal trade and the external trade. If a country has 90 per cent external trade and 10 per cent internal trade, as some of the very small countries have, tariffs are a serious matter for that country. I think that is quite apparent without going into the matter any further. But if a country has 90 per cent internal trade and 10 per cent external trade, a tariff is a trifling matter. If a country has only 2 per cent external trade, you can have 100 per cent duties all around, and they will have very little effect on that country. That is the key to the situation in the United States; the external trade is small as compared with the internal trade.

Mr. MANION: What my hon. friend is arguing is that the tariff policy in the United States is not of great importance to the United States. I have not been arguing about that at all. Surely my hon. friend will not deny that the tariff on goods coming into the United States is a highly-protective tariff.

Mr. GOOD: Of course, I am quite prepared to admit that; but I am not prepared to admit that the United States' tariff is as important a factor in the industrial life of the United States as the Canadian tariff is in the industrial life of Canada.

Mr. MANION: Of course, I admit that. That is beside the point. The hon. member said that it amused him to have me state that the United States is a highly protective country. I should like him to give some proof—he has not given it yet unless my head is thicker than I think it is—that the United States is a free trade country.

Mr. JACOBS: I think the discussion is altogether out of order.

Mr. GOOD: Let me continue if I am in order. I took the argument of the hon. member to be that Canadians were leaving this country in order to reap the advantages to be found in a country which was highly protective.

Mr. MANION: I was pointing out that they were not going to a free trade country.

Mr. GOOD: Well, so far as the effect of the tariff is concerned, I think they are going from a country which suffers from high protection to a country which has nominally high protection but is in reality practically a free trade country, because of the very large area and the great variety of its internal resources, and because of the fact that its internal trade is large in comparison with its external trade.

The hon. member spoke also about building up the home market. I will admit that it is particularly desirable for us to build up Canada as a manufacturing country. I should like to see as great a diversification of industry in Canada as possible; and if our farmers cannot find a foreign market, as seems likely to be the case in the near if not in the distant future, for agricultural products, then we ought to have a big home market. I am prepared to admit all that; but I am not prepared to admit that the tariff, to which the hon. gentleman attributes the industrial development of Canada, has been a good thing for this country from the manufacturing or the industrial point of view. I venture this assertion, that had there never been any tariff barrier between the United States and Canada in the last fifty or sixty years, instead of Canada having between eight and nine million people there would be a population in this country to-day of 25,000,000. And I am of opinion that without such a barrier our manufacturing industries would be ever so much larger and more important than they are at present. I believe that if we could only wipe out this tariff barrier on the North American continent we would do something which would be in the very best interest of ourselves and also of the United States. I realize that I am possibly digressing rather much in this connection; but I do not think I am going any further afield than did the hon. member whose remarks I am considering.

Before concluding I might refer to the policy—I do not know indeed whether we can call it a policy, but at all events to the remarks—which the minister gave us this afternoon. I would be prepared to support any reasonable appropriation for an immigration organization if I could see any prospect of holding the people when we got them. The only way I can see of an immigration policy being successful judging from past experience is for us to invite the Japanese and Chinese to come in. We can hold them, and I think we can increase the population of Canada if we invite the orientals including also the Hindus.

Mr. HARRIS: Could you hold them on the farms?

Mr. GOOD: Yes; and I think from the experience of British Columbia they would readily take to farming.

Mr. HARRIS: Our constituency would not have them; you are welcome to them.

Mr. GOOD: I am not advocating their admission; I am simply saying that if it is only numbers that we want that is the way we can increase our population, and I do not think we should have to spend $3,000,000 a year in order to get such people. That is all I have to say at the moment on this subject.

Mr. MARLER: It has been a great pleasure to listen to the discussion so far as it has gone. It reveals courage in many ways. The minister came forward with a frank and free expression as to what his policy was; the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) was equally courageous and I must also congratulate my fellow member from Fort William (Mr. Manion) on the manner in which he approached the situation. I am sorry that the last speaker (Mr Good) seems to think that the only kind of people whom we can keep in this country are Japanese and Chinnese. Such an attitude does seem to me to lack courage. If there was ever a time when we needed courage and vigour in connection with an immigration policy in this country, that time is the present, because if we do not put into force a bigger immigration policy and obtain more people our lifeblood will simply be drained away and we shall cease entirely to exist as a people. I offer that opinion for what it is worth, but I have no hesitation in making that statement on the floor of this House. I must admit that I am a little disappointed in the estimates; they do not go far enough. This year the estimates in this department are $1,300,000 more than they were last year, and that increase is divided under two heads, one of $600,000 in connection with the Empire Settlement Act, and the other of $700,000 for general purposes. The Empire Settlement Act I will take up at a later date. But these figures mean that the minister brings forward an increase of $700,000 for all other purposes, such as advertising, organization and matters of that description. Now, an immigration policy cannot be built up in one day. It is quite correct, as the minister states, that even if we had a perfect organization to-day we could not expect in one year or in any such short period to obtain a lot of immigrants at first hand. The organization will have to be in existence if in the future we hope to get any very large number of immigrants. For that reason I should have liked to see the minister bring down to the House a larger appropriation for this purpose, and I believe the House would have supported him in view of the urgent necessity there is for immigrants in this country. That may seem to certain hon. members to-night a peculiar statement to make; it may seem strange for me to advocate the spending of more public money in view of the finances of the country. But we should bear in mind that if this country is good it must go ahead. And it is good. It has been fought for once, and I see no reason why we should not fight for its economic existence now. And the only way I can see of fighting for that existence is to get more people to come in and produce in greater quantities from our natural resources which we have in such great abundance.

Mr. COOTE: Does the hon. gentleman want our immigration efforts to be confined to one particular occupational class, namely, farmers?

Mr. MARLER: I will come to that in a few moments, but if my hon. friend wants an immediate reply, I think it is preferable to get the farmers in. But I would not exclude others. Now, I was going on to state the necessity for immigration. I do not wish to quote figures unduly, but from the statistics with regard to our population in the past few years, it is very clear that there has not been that increase which we should have a right to expect. I will speak later as regards conditions to the south which we heard so much about.

But there is another matter which I think we should view, and view with grave concern—the financial condition of this country. I see no way of bettering that condition, of making our railways pay, unless we get more people into this country and so increase production.

Mr. KENNEDY (West Edmonton): Is the hon. gentleman under the impression that we need more immigrants to increase the tonnage for our National railways?

Mr. MARLER: Yes, I am most decidedly of that opinion.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Regardless of conditions for settlement in this country?

Mr. MARLER: I do not quite understand my hon. friend.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The hon. gentleman says he is in favour of immigration in order to increase the tonnage for our National railway system, and I presume for the other railway systems too. Would he advocate that regardless of the existing conditions?

Mr. MARLER: I do not know what my hon. friend means by existing conditions; but I do not think existing conditions are as bad as he paints them.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I wish the hon. gentleman lived in my constituency. Then he would know that conditions are worse than I paint them.

Mr. MARLER: I am very sorry indeed to hear my hon. friend is having such a very hard time in his constituency. If he will have a little patience with what I have to say I think he will agree with me that if we can have more production the conditions in his constituency will get considerably better.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the manner in which we are taxed and the extent is getting perfectly appalling to all of us. If we realize that in 1914 our taxation was slightly over $21 per head of population, as against over $42 per head in 1922, in addition to which in the last few years we have advanced to the railways over $250,000,000—

Mr. SHAW: Does that include the municipal, provincial and Dominion taxation per capita?

Mr. MARLER: No, it is simply Dominion taxation. The figures are taken from the Dominion statistics. During the fiscal year 1921-22 we collected taxes to the extent of $49.43 per head of population, and yet we went behind to the tune of $92,000,000, and in 1922 we added another $80,000,000 to our national debt. In 1923 the Main Estimates call for an expenditure of over $466,000,000. It therefore means that as we are going on at the present time our taxation cannot be reduced. I do not intend to discuss finance at any great length, that is not my purpose at all, but I do think that these figures are sufficiently impressive to make us pause and think whether or not we can keep on pyramiding our national debt in this manner. I repeat, that these are figures which should make any sane man who cares for the position of this country pause for a considerable time and wonder how long we can continue piling up these deficits year after year before we break.

But we are doing more than that. We are not only piling up deficits during our lifetime—and it is no fault of our ministers of finance, past and present, that we are piling up these deficits, for these gentlemen have done their work well, they have done everything they possibly could for their country during their respective tenures of office—I say we are not only piling up deficits during our lifetime and are taxed out of all the delights of life to the point of misery, but in addition we are handing down to the generations that shall come after us a tremendous load, we are saddling them with a staggering debt which we do not know whether they will be able to bear or not.

Mr. IRVINE: What is the hon. gentleman's proposal in this regard as a means of reducing taxation?

An hon. MEMBER: Give him a chance.

Mr. MARLER: I am going to tell the hon. member that I think if we got sufficient immigration it might in time reduce our taxation. I shall elaborate that idea very shortly, and then I shall be only too glad to answer my hon. friend's question. Taking our taxation at the present time, I was very much impressed by an article which I read recently in the London Spectator, and I shall give the committee a short quotation from it. Talking about the new government, it says:

> What is wrong with us just now is that we are taking so much out of the pockets of the tax-payer that we are perceptibly diminishing the nation's stock-in-trade. To put it in more conventional language, we are injuring and preventing trade and commerce, but if we injure and prevent trade we accomplish a double curse:—we increase prices and we stimulate unemployment. By decreasing taxation we shall improve trade and so improve the demand for labour. In the words of our ancestors, we should be setting more men and women to work and thus increasing production. But that would tend to lower the price of the things produced, although not the price of labour.

Now, the same situation existed in the United States after the Civil War as we are passing through at the present time. Speaking from memory, the Civil War ended on the 9th April, 1865, when Lee surrendered at Richmond, Virginia. A serious inflation followed, then came a great depression. I have the figures here. From 1867 to 1873 trade increased from $784,000,000 to $1,164,000,000. It does seem to me that to judge the wealth and activity of a nation we must examine what the imports and exports of the country may be at the time. This is very well put by Mr. W. C. Ford, who was chief of the United States Bureau of Statistics. He says:

> The imports and exports of the United States are the expression and measure of its commercial dealings with nations and peoples of the world. Their development and importance have been commensurate with the economic growth and political power of the country and people. To compare the foreign trade of the United States in 1795 with that of 1895 would be to compare a wheelbarrow with a locomotive or an ocean liner.

As I have stated, after the Civil War the trade of the United States increased for a time, immigration also increased for a time; then there came a sharp drop in immigration and likewise a sharp drop in trade. Taking the years 1867 to 1873—and I have not picked out these years particularly—nearly 3,000,000 people came into the United States and trade, as I say, increased from $784,000,000 to $1,164,000,000. Then in 1874 immigration began to decline until in 1877 it reached the very low figure of 130,000; likewise trade dropped in the same period from $1,164,000,000 to $1,053,000,000, or a decline of $111,000,000.

Mr. GOOD: Was that external or internal trade?

Mr. MARLER: Not external trade; simply exports plus imports.

If we turn back to the history of our own country we shall also find that during active periods of immigration trade was at its best. Take our immigration figures from 1903 to 1914.

In that period there entered this country nearly 3,000,000 people, to be exact 2,789,484. During that time our trade increased from $450,000,000 to $1,074,000,000. It seems to me that the objection some have to getting immigrants is not well founded, because these figures indicate that during a period of immigration trade increases very materially. That was the effect of immigration in the United States. There are really two aspects of the value of an immigrant who lands in this country; there is his ordinary value as an addition to the country and there is his value as a potential producer. In other words, every immigrant who lands on our shores at once creates trade. That was very clearly shown during the great immigration period of our country of which I have spoken, and the same thing happened in the United States. In that connection I was interested in an article by Mr. H. A. Hill, who at one time was secretary of the National Board of Trade of the United States. Referring to the increase of immigration there, he said:

> The total immigration of 1873, as we have seen, was 422,545. The net immigration for the first half of the current year at the two principal ports of the country, so far as the returns have been accessible, proves to have been only 13,905.

He goes on to say that the immigration at that particular time would be only 100,000 for the year; then he continues:

> Such a falling off in the great army of producers and consumers which has been wont to land upon our shores, while it forcibly illustrates the severity of the industrial depression through which we are passing, represents also a most serious loss to the aggregate national wealth. If, as Dr. Young estimates, the capitalized value of an immigrant on the average is $800, this loss reaches apparently the enormous sum of $240,000,000. Actually, however, large numbers of people will ultimately come hither, who are at present deterred by the unfavourable accounts.

When an immigrant lands on our shores, then, he is of particular value to the country, and that value increases. He becomes established; he starts to produce. I am not saying that we bring immigrants here simply to place a load of taxation on them; I do not look at the matter from that point of view. What I say is this: the more we get out of the soil the more we increase the natural wealth of the country and enable those who are here and those who come here to assume their fair share of taxation.

Mr. KELLNER: The hon. gentleman is arguing that every immigrant that we bring into the country increases our wealth. Would that apply to other countries, and why are other countries anxious to get rid of their people?

Mr. MARLER: Are those other countries anxious to get rid of their people?

Mr. KELLNER: The hon. member must know that several European countries are very anxious to get rid of some of their people. England, for that matter, has an appropriation for that very purpose.

Mr. MARLER: It is true that England does want to send out some of her people because England is an over-populated country, and the same applies to many other countries across the seas. But we are not over-populated here. We have millions of acres of land; we have natural resources that we cannot use, and every man who has a pair of hands, a good heart and sound brain can enrich this country by getting the natural resources out of the soil. To leave those natural resources as they are makes them worthless to us or anyone else. It is manpower we want; we must get our wealth out of the soil—because the wealth does come out of the soil in one way or another.

Mr. COOTE: Will that man who goes on the soil be enriching this country any if he gets less than the cost of production for what he produces?

Mr. MARLER: That question cannot be answered in two words, and if the hon. member will permit me I shall be glad to answer it later in the course of my remarks.

I was going to show the value of the immigrant to our country. Take our internal trade. I think it was stated in this House last year that the Dominion Statistician had reported that the value of Canada's production in 1921 was estimated at over $5,000,000,000 and that the total production plus the imports but minus the exports represented the value of our internal trade. In 1921 our imports were valued at about $30,000,000 more than our exports, so that according to this calculation our internal trade was valued at $5,200,000,000, or $600 per head of population. I claim that every man who comes into this country will increase that internal trade, and the result will be an acceleration of the work of our factories and a demand for all our farm products. In that way the unemployment which at present exists will be largely done away with.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The hon. gentleman means, I suppose, every man we can keep in this country.

Mr. MARLER: I am coming to that question also, if my hon. friend will permit me. I do not want to quote the newspapers regarding the necessity of immigration, but there are just one or two comments to which I wish to direct attention. I shall not quote entirely from the eastern press, because I have been told that the eastern press is prejudiced to a certain extent. But let me quote one remark made to the meeting of the National Trust Company. That company has a great many interests in the West, and I believe it is one of the best posted companies in the Dominion. The president of the National Trust Company says:

> I wish to-day to again emphasize this question. Immigration, it seems to me, stands in the forefront of the important problems facing our country at the present time. I feel confident there is no other single factor which would contribute so much to the solution of all our problems, and in the end to the material comfort and contentment of every class in Canada. There exists to-day upon our farms and in several of our industries a demand for labour which cannot be filled. The cry against immigration, when examined, is found lacking in substance. Immigration properly controlled and well directed will injure none, but must benefit all. What we need in this Dominion is volume of business. This is strikingly illustrated in our railway situation. We have a large equipment in every business activity—too large for the needs of our present population. More people would create greater demands upon our equipment and thus afford a larger market for labour, for agriculture, for manufacturers and for all.

There may be some hon. members who will not agree with what the president of the National Trust Company says—I hear one hon. gentleman say "hear, hear"—but it does seem to me that, generally speaking, his remarks are characterized by a good deal of sense. The member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) speaking at Winnipeg on the 10th of November, said:

> Canada has a hard way ahead of it. The surest guarantee of our future prosperity lies in the wise development of our agricultural resources.

The western members will probably agree with that.

Mr. LEWIS: "Wise development".

Mr. GOULD: Wise development, that is right.

Mr. MARLER: How are you going to have development of our agricultural lands unless you get men able to develop them.

Mr. GOULD: Make it profitable for them to do so.

Mr. MARLER: Premier John Bracken apparently does not take that view. This is what he said, speaking in the Manitoba legislature on the 31st of last January:

> What was needed was the restoration of the purchasing power of the farmer's dollar.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MARLER: He goes on to say this about immigration:

In this connection he wanted to say there were two schools of thought in Canada regarding immigration. One thought that any kind of people should be brought to the country, and the other considered no more should be brought until agricultural conditions were improved.

Mr. MARLER: I wait for the cheering now.

An hon. MEMBER: Go ahead.

Mr. MARLER: He continues:

Many thought these two things were antagonistic. He did not regard them as that. He believed they were complementary and went hand in hand. The government would do all it could to improve agricultural conditions and, at the same time try to bring into the country a reasonable amount of good settlers.

Now, that I think from the Premier of the province of Manitoba is perfectly clear. And in the London Times which is a very well informed paper and has correspondents all through Canada—

Mr. COOTE: Did the Premier of Manitoba say that he would limit these immigrants to one class only?

Mr. MARLER: I do not know whether he said that or not. Does my hon. friend say he did say that?

Mr. COOTE: No, I was just hoping that he did not say it; I did not know what he said.

Mr. MARLER: I do not know. I cannot read what the mind of Premier John Bracken said, I can only, unfortunately, read what he is reported in the newspaper to have said.

Mr. SPENCER: Did the Premier at that time mention that the people of Manitoba owed taxes over $14,000,000?

Mr. MARLER: No, I do not think he did. I was going on to read what the London Times said about the necessity of immigration to Canada. It said on the 4th September, 1922:

What Canada needs more than anything else is population. She needs a strong immigration policy, together with the widest possible advertisement of what she has to offer. Her empty spaces are calling for settlers. She has less than three people to the square mile, whereas her neighbour across the border has thirty-five, and the Japanese across the Pacific have more than three hundred.

The Japanese my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Good) spoke about.

Now, what I would like to make quite clear to the committee to-night is that in the first place I believe the only way we can produce is by means of having more man power in this country; that unless we do produce more we cannot lighten the load of taxation which this country is suffering under at the present time.

The question will naturally arise in the minds of all those I am addressing to-night, what kind of immigrant should be brought into this country? In other words, am I in favour of deluging the country with anybody who may come in? Should we go after that class of immigrant, or should we have another kind of immigration policy in Canada? The policy that I am in favour of comprises two classes of immigrants. The first I call, for want of a better name, "A preferred class of immigrant". Those are the immigrants which, in my opinion, we should go after. Those are the immigrants we should spend our money to bring to this country and when we get them—and I will speak of that later on—keep them here. Another class of immigrant is the immigrant who presents himself at our doors, and if people voluntarily present themselves at our doors and ask to come into the country I do not think they should be refused admittance. In other words I claim this: There is ample work for everybody in this country who is willing and anxious to work. Perhaps there is not ample work for those who are not willing and anxious to work, but I would not close the door in the face of any immigrant who was sound in body and mind and came to the doors of this country and asked to be admitted.

Mr. COOTE: Does the hon. member include the orientals in that?

Mr. MARLER: No, I am not speaking of oriental immigration at all; that is entirely out of my mind.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the hon. gentleman suggest that something like 6,000 people who are being kept by the city of Winnipeg are not able and willing to work? The same thing is true of other cities in this country.

Mr. MARLER: I do not want to hurt my hon. friend's feelings in any way.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There is no danger of hurting my feelings. I asked a simple question of the hon. gentleman, whether he means to imply that the large number of unemployed men in the cities of Canada are unwilling to work.

Mr. MARLER: I do not mean to be at all impertinent in replying to my hon. friend. Whether they are willing to work or not what I say is this: I believe the great majority of those men could get work if they went out and looked for it.

Mr. McDONALD (Timiskaming): What would they get employment at during the last two years if they went out to look for it?

An hon. MEMBER: Farm labour.

Mr. MARLER: I was going to deal with the question of unemployment in Canada later on.

Mr. McDONALD (Timiskaming): I have asked the hon. member a fair question and I would like to get a fair answer. I do not believe in putting a matter off until later in the evening in order to avoid answering a question.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. The hon member who is speaking may answer the question if he so desires. If he does not desire to answer he is not compelled to do so.

Mr. MARLER: I will answer my hon. friend's question with pleasure. From all that I can read—I may not have the distinct knowledge that my hon. friend has of certain conditions—it does seem to me that the question of unemployment in this country is not as serious as has been pointed out. My knowledge is derived entirely from the press of the country. The knowledge I have acquired in that way may be quite wrong; I would be very glad to be corrected if that is the case. But here is a clipping from the Toronto Saturday Night, of 28th October, 1922, which I intended to read in any event:

In many centres in Canada, if not in all, there is a distinct shortage of labour in certain activities. This is specially apparent in the building trades. All through the spring and summer there have not been sufficient masons, carpenters, bricklayers and plasterers to meet the demand, and in consequence building operations have been held up. Structures which in the old days would have been fully completed in that period between April and November are still, roughly speaking, half done.

That is one report which I read. Another report which I read was taken from the Financial Post of the 16th February, 1923. Dealing with the New Brunswick labour situation, the lumber cut, the article says:

The lumber cut in New Brunswick for this winter is expected to exceed that of any winter for the past five years. There have been two drawbacks to a large cut—too much snow in the woods and a dearth of men. In many of the sections so much snow has fallen that cutting concerns have been unable to use horses, in fact conditions have become so acute that several companies have ceased operations.

Regarding the scarcity of men in New Brunswick, the cause is migration to other provinces and to New England.

There is a further clipping that I read some little time ago—now we go farther west—from the Financial Post of the 16th February, 1919.

Mr. CALDWELL: Does the article state where the men from New Brunswick went to? I think if it does he will find they have gone over to the states of Maine and Massachusetts.

Mr. MARLER: No not all of them. I would be glad to continue reading the quotation if the hon. member so desires. Some of them did go there.

Regarding the scarcity of men in New Brunswick, the cause is the migration to other provinces and to New England.

That is as far as I read. Now to continue:

The American government has allowed two thousand lumber-jacks to be imported into New England from New Brunswick, owing to the scarcity of men in New England. Originally the two thousand men were turned back at the border by the United States immigration agents but on the appeal from lumber companies in Maine, New Hampshire and Vermont operations, the United States labor department lifted the bars.

In addition to the two thousand that went to the New England woods, ten thousand men have gone to the woods of Quebec and Ontario.

I was going to speak of British Columbia:

In spite of warnings issued last fall that the present winter would witness unemployment in British Columbia on a scale greater than ever experienced, there is to-day very little idle labour in the province. At some points the demand for workers has been so great that men have been brought in from Alberta and Saskatchewan. This was notably the case in connection with the tie cutting operations along the line of the Canadian National railway east of Prince Albert. Logging operations in the interior have been held up by heavy snow-fall, but that is a purely temporary condition, and on the coast the logging concerns are operating at full strength.

I spoke about the situation in New Brunswick and I referred to the situation in Toronto and in British Columbia. I have given this information for what it is worth and I have taken information from the only source from which the average man obtains his information. Take the city of Montreal, the actual situation there is not as serious as has been alleged. Of course there is some unemployment there, but I have had no difficulty in my little experience in placing men who came to me asking for jobs. I have answered the question the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) to the best of my ability. That is the general situation as I see it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not want to press this matter unduly, but I say that resolutions passed in the city of Winnipeg have been placed before this House, calling attention to the thousands of people in that city who have been out of work and are to-day out of work.

I have information from the mayor of the city that the situation is very serious. Reference has been made to British Columbia. I know the conditions there very intimately, and men who were employed there two years ago have gone to the woods on the other side in thousands. Is that not so?

Mr. MARLER: I do not know whether my hon. friend will admit the correctness or incorrectness of these reports. Most of them are written in Toronto—a very reputable city as I have heard—and I have almost taken them as being absolutely correct. I do not deny what the hon. member says about the Winnipeg situation. I do not wish the hon. member to misunderstand me. I have no antipathy towards labour—quite the contrary—but I have asserted that I do think, that, in many cases, certain classes of labourers at the present time do not like difficult labour and they will not accept employment where the work is hard. If they would do so I think most of the labourers would be employed. That is the viewpoint I take. I have no disrespect for labour—quite the contrary.

I was going on to speak in regard to the class of immigrants we need in this country. I stated that in my opinion there were two classes so-called. The first was the class that we spoke of as the agriculturist; the man who would be placed on the land. I also said —and I would like to repeat—so that the trend of my thoughts will be continuous—that we should not close the doors to other immigrants coming to this country, but if they are strong and healthy and willing to work they should be allowed to come in. In addition to that, I would like to say, even if it is digressing at the present time, that I think that those who have relatives abroad in various parts of Europe should be allowed to bring those relatives into this country, and that certain restrictions, existing at the present time should be removed.

However, I would like to go back and explain why, in my opinion, the agriculturist is required at the present time. It appears to me that in any country we require to have a properly balanced population. If you have a larger urban population than rural population, it is ill-balanced. The rural population is tributary to the urban population. At the present time in this country our population is not properly balanced, and the rural population has in many cases gone down in percentage during the past twenty years. Take the figures for the whole of Canada, and we find that in 1901 the rural population was 62½ per cent, and in 1911 it was 54.58 per cent. In 1921 it was 50.47 per cent. In other words, the rural and urban populations are pretty nearly equal. Some hon. member will say that the reason they are so nearly balanced is because it does not pay to farm. That may or may not be the case, but I think there are other reasons why the rural population is not increasing as it should. But whether it is increasing or not the reason that I suggested a moment ago that it is decreasing on account of the farm not paying is no reason in the wide world why we should not have courage enough to bring out to this country agriculturists and place them on the land, because they are certainly needed there in order to increase production. I am not in favour of urging a great influx into our cities, but I do urge that we should bring forward as many agriculturists as we possibly can and place them on the land.

We always imagined, from our past immigration figures, that the great majority of the immigrants who came here went on the land. That is not the case. They did not, at least, go to the western provinces where we thought they were going. In the last 20 years for example, 51 per cent of the immigrants went to the Maritime provinces, Quebec and Ontario, and less than 50 per cent went to the West. Although I have urged the government at the present time to bring out agriculturists, there is no use bringing these people out and landing them in Winnipeg or some western city and not actually placing them on the farm and looking after them. We should bring them here, not as strangers, but as future citizens of Canada, and make them understand that this is to be their home. There is at the present time an excellent organization called the Soldier Settlement Board which can look after immigrants who come here. They are able not only to bring immigrants to the proper sections of the country on which they can be placed but they can explain to them what should be grown and what should not be grown. They can keep a watchful eye over the immigrant when he comes here, during his early years in Canada, and, generally speaking, the Soldier Settlement is a most excellent organization in every way, and the man at the head of it is a thoroughly reliable and able man. The Soldier Settlement Board has done remarkably well in this country in every way. Some people are very apt to say that the land which was bought for the soldiers has been a loss. There has not been a loss on that land. There has been a certain loss, I admit, on the stock and implements, but as regards land purchased for the soldiers up to 31st January last there was a surplus—I am speaking of the lands taken back—of over $402,000 what was paid for the lands then.

Mr. CALDWELL: Does this include what the soldier himself paid as his initial payment and his subsequent payments, or just what the government put in?

Mr. MARLER: If the hon. member had asked me that question last year I could have answered it, but I cannot answer it now.

Mr. CALDWELL: I am inclined to think it does not.

Mr. MARLER: I am inclined to think it does include what the soldier put in. The hon. member does not think so?

Mr. CALDWELL: No.

Mr. MARLER: I am not competent to say whether it does or not. I would like to repeat, without wearying the House, my statement that the government should put agriculturists on the land. In addition to that, I would even go so far as to be in favour of a scheme of colonizing certain parts of this country, where the farms may be too large, by bringing people in, dividing up the farms, and letting the newcomers cultivate parts of these farms, even if the government had to set aside a certain amount of money for this purpose. I know perfectly well the minister does not approve that method, but if colonists were brought in and these farms divided up, it would not only help the colonist coming in, but it would also help very many of the farmers in the northwest, who at the present time, as I am informed, are overburdened with too much land and a great deal of debt. We have also certain free lands still in the various provinces and the leader of the Progressives (Mr. Forke) spoke about those lands to-day. He spoke of a certain class of immigrants we could bring out here. I do not think we can get all the agricultural immigrants we require from Great Britain. We will have to go to the continent of Europe for them. The question is not whether these immigrants are of a lower standard of living or not. That is a sad way to look at things. The question is whether Hungarians and people of that description are willing to go on and work and clear land of that description, when others are not willing to do it.

Mr. SPENCER: Is the hon. member, therefore, willing that we bring in immigrants of a lower standard of living?

Mr. MARLER: I did not say that at all. I particularly attempted to avoid, in as clear a way as I could, saying that there was any desire to bring in immigrants of a lower standard of living. I said that as regards these immigrants who could be got from Europe—I used the Hungarians as an example—the question was not whether they were satisfied with a lower standard of living, it was whether they were willing to go on land of this description, clear it and work it. There are such people scattered throughout Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta, so I am informed, who have been doing remarkably well, and there are in those countries, I presume, people of that class, who can be made to populate such lands, who, I believe, will be contented there, and who will, in course of time, become splendid citizens. That is what I referred to in speaking of bringing in immigrants; I used the word "Hungarian" simply as an example of the class who, I believe, would be satisfactory.

Mr. KENNEDY (West Edmonton): Why should the manufacturers of eastern Canada not be willing to face the same kind of competition?

Mr. MARLER: What kind of competition?

Mr. KENNEDY (West Edmonton): When the hon. member refers to bringing in those people to live under circumstances under which the present citizens cannot make it go, or make their farming pay, he is certainly advocating a system of extreme competition. He is advocating something that, if brought to its logical conclusion, means that the present settlers will have to get out or else adopt the other standard of living.

Mr. MARLER: Does that whole question not some down to the fact whether farming in Canada can or cannot be made to pay? I claim that farming can eventually be made to pay; but there are certain fundamental facts which are at the present time preventing farming from paying. I do not think there is on the floor of this House any man who has greater sympathy for the West than I have, and I am coming to that point in just one moment.

Before doing so, I want to speak regarding the amount which has been placed in the Estimates to be used under the Empire settlement scheme. The minister has included in the estimates an amount of $600,000 for the purpose of paying assisted passages of men and domestic servants and various other classes of settlers. Let me make myself quite clear as regards British immigration. I would be only too glad to see as many British immigrants come to this country as we can get; but we should realize at the present time that there is a particular class of immigrant which we require, that is the agriculturist, and the agriculturist should be the man preferably to be helped under this particular scheme. When there are plenty of people who will come to our doors without being paid assisted passages, those assisted passages should not be meted out to the clerical class and classes of that description under the British Empire settlement scheme. In other words, if labour is required in any particular locality, by all means help to bring out that labour. If labour can be supplied by the Canadian people themselves, we should not assist labour to come out to Canada by means of paying assisted passages. But we should pay assisted passages where the immigration officer knows there is a good farmer or a good farming family desirous of coming out to Canada for the purpose of farming. I repeat again; I am not opposed to British immigration, rather the contrary.

I wish to say just a word as regards the orders in council which are at present in force, and I hope the government will, in the course of a short time, take into consideration the question of cancelling those orders in council. No doubt they were passed at a time when it was necessary to make them, but now their usefulness has very largely passed. I cannot myself see the necessity of the non-continuous journey order in council. I cannot see the great necessity either of the alien enemy order in council.

Mr. McBRIDE: If the order in council in connection with the non-continuous journey had not been passed, would not the western part of this country have been flooded with Hindus?

Mr. MARLER: Let us face the situation like men. If we do not want Hindus in this country let us say so; but do not let us pass an order in council that blankets everybody else and says to a man coming from the United States or any other place from which we welcome immigrants: "No, you cannot come in here, simply because you have not come by a continuous journey." If we do not want Hindus or any other class of people, let us say so; but do not let us pass a blanket order in council and keep it in force.

I was going to say a few words about the alien enemy order in council. Various hon. members may have feelings on that subject. Some of us may think we should not allow into this country those who have been connected with countries which were at war with Great Britain or her allies during the great war. I know there are mixed feelings on that subject, and perhaps I am treading on very dangerous ground in speaking about the matter at all. But I do not think we should continue to foster and keep up this war feeling any longer in this country. We should recognize that we have a great big country to fill up, a country rich in natural resources, and although I am not in favour of flooding any one particular section of Canada with people from any particular part of Europe, putting them in a community and saying: "You can have your own laws, your own schools and half a dozen other things," I am in favour of a general immigration in a fair, selected and directed way from all the countries of Europe, provided that the immigrants who are brought forward are suitable. For that reason I think this alien enemy order in council should be eliminated.

Mr. SHAW: The hon. member discussed the matter of the Soldier Settlement Board. Would he favour the extension of the principles of the Soldier Settlement Board to others than soldier settlers?

Mr. MARLER: I am very much obliged to the hon. member for Calgary West, asking that question. Yes, I would. I am quite frank in saying that I believe the Soldier Settlement Board, if extended in other directions, would prove a great colonization agency in this country, and that the money would be very well spent if money were set aside for the purpose of bringing people in and colonizing them and keeping them on the land. As a proof that I do not think the country would lose a single dollar by a policy of that description, I cite the splendid work that the Soldier Settlement Board have done in regard to settling returned soldiers. When they bought their land, they had not as great experience as they have now; and if they went out now and bought land of this description and put suitable families of settlers on to those lands, the money would be well spent in the interest of this country.

During the course of this debate, the question of the lure of the south was taken up time and time again. I do not think we should be so terribly afraid of the lure of the south. You will get the ebb and flow in every country of the world; you cannot prevent that. You will never be able to prevent Canadians from going to the United States or Americans from coming to Canada. You will always have that ebb and flow so long as these two great countries, with no barriers of any kind between them, exist. But we can prevent that flow into the United States to a very great extent by making this country a better country to live in, by building up this country itself, by making positions here for our young men so that our young men will be willing and ready to stay at home instead of going to the United States. Frankly, I do not know that one can blame an ambitious man for wanting to go to the United States now with its tremendous possibilities. As a matter of fact, one has to look around with a great deal of care and wonder what one will do with one's children when they grow up, when one sees the possibilities of this country dwindling away

I believe that anyone who has faith in this country—and I have unbounded faith in the country and in its people—will agree that it is well worth while spending money on immigration to bring immigrants into Canada. But someone will say, what about the lure of the south? Well, we have also had in this country considerable immigration from the United States of America. In the period from 1900 to 1909, 403,000 such immigrants came into this country; from 1910 to 1919, 875,000 came; and in 1920, 1921 and 1922, 127,000 came in. Someone will say, however, that a great many of our people have gone to the United States. So they have. But I doubt very much whether the figures which have been repeatedly given in this House regarding those going to the United States are absolutely correct. As everyone knows, we do not keep records with regard to emigration from this country to the United States. Those records are kept by the United States officials, and in many cases in the past they have been found to have counted as permanent settlers in the United States people who have gone there only on a temporary visit. An investigation was made by the department in two instances, in 1910 and 1912, when a large number of cases were inquired into. I am taking this from the Canadian Annual Review which I saw the other day; and out of 849 cases of persons reported as having gone to the United States to settle, it was found by actual examination that 415 had gone only on a temporary visit. The Review goes on to give the statistics of emigration from Canada to the United States and from the United States to Canada. It shows that in the period 1910-1914 there came from the United States to Canada 605,498 people while there went from Canada to the United States 329,000. In the period 1915-1919 the trend was not quite so favourable: 379,000 went from Canada to the United States as compared with 270,000 from the United States to Canada. But be that as it may, there is no reason in the wide world why the Canadian people should lose courage. There is no reason why we should be downhearted because a certain number of our citizens are going to the United States from year to year. In this matter courage is all that is required; and if we have a courageous policy, as we have a courageous people, I am confident that sooner or later we shall make this a good country to live in and shall retain not only our own people but the settlers that come in.

But when we talk to-day of Canadians going to the United States, we must realize that there are reasons for this exodus. The Dillingham law in force there, as stated this afternoon, restricts the immigration of aliens to 3 per cent of the nationals resident in the United States; that is to say, of people from the United Kingdom, only 3 per cent of the number of British people resident in the United States can enter that country, and so forth. That has made a very great shortage in labour in the United States, and now there is a tremendous building boom in Chicago and Los Angeles and I believe in Boston, although I am speaking only from memory as regards the last-named city. If our artisans therefore find that they can get large wages in the United States they are going to go there in large numbers. And they are going; there is no denying that, because it is the case. But because that is the situation at the present time, because our people are leaving Canada just now for specific reasons, is that any reason why we should conclude that the lure of the United States is something that will always exist? It does seem to me that in due course of time conditions will revive here and we shall be enabled to retain our population. But it will do us no good to sit down and declare that so long as there is this lure to the United States we are not going to get any people to come here. That is not going to do us a bit of good. If we take any such despondent attitude we shall simply find that more and more of our people will go to the United States, our trade will sink lower and lower, and our population will gradually eliminate itself, creating a condition that may be very unpleasant to contemplate.

Now I want to say a word as regards the attitude of certain gentlemen in the West on the question of immigration. And if I speak personally and feelingly I think that hon. gentlemen will believe what I say. There is no man in this House who has a greater sympathy with those pioneers who went to the West than I have, for I believe they have done for this country something that no other people have accomplished. They have withstood hardships and tilled the land and reaped enormous crops. The figures of the past year of their tremendous crop, as taken from the Manitoba Free Press, show a total of 903,000,000 bushels of grain valued at the head of the lakes at $590,000,000. I know that some hon. gentlemen will observe that it did not pay. Well, perhaps it did not; nevertheless the men who have raised that enormous crop of grain, of such a huge value, and brought that vast area of land under cultivation, surely do not lack in courage. I am perfectly positive that they cannot lack courage, and I believe that the conditions prevailing in the West to-day are due more or less to fundamental causes which I think will be removed.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Does not the hon. gentleman think that we are entitled to a little more than commendation for our courage?

Mr. MARLER: Yes, certainly. I think you are entitled to a great deal more, and you will get a great deal more too, I am perfectly sure. As I was remarking, there are fundamental reasons to-day that prevent farming from being very profitable in the West, and I approach the matter with a great deal of hesitation, I must admit. The first reason is, of course, that the farmer's dollar is worth only about 70 cents while he has to pay a great deal more for all his commodities. But the prices of commodities are going down at the present time.

Mr. CALDWELL: What about sugar?

Mr MARLER: And when further deflation does take place it seems to me that the farmer's dollar will be worth a great deal more than it can now purchase. Another reason is that the European buying power is not what we should like it to be. It is not very good now, but I believe it will improve as time goes on; and that will make the situation still better. There is another question that we must consider, and that is the matter of freight rates, which are weighing heavily on the farming industry. I do not see how we are going to bring down freight rates unless we give the railways more freight. It is not possible for them to reduce rates unless they can get more freight.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Did the hon. member read the annual report of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company?

Mr. MARLER: Yes, in one of the Toronto papers. What about it?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): You will find in that report that they made this year a net surplus of over $22,000,000. Does my hon. friend not think that we ought to have a lowering of rates in view of that fact?

Mr. MARLER: The net surplus was not $22,000,000. After paying a reasonable dividend on the money invested it was probably more like $1,000,000, because the Canadian Pacific Railway was running behind largely all through the year, and it was only when the fall crop came that they were able to earn dividend requirements.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May I quote the figures for the hon. gentleman's benefit? The net earnings from the railway and lake steamers was $36,301,691, and after deduction of fixed charges the surplus is given as $22,952,785.

An hon. MEMBER: The dividend must come out of that.

Mr. MARLER: Yes. Does the hon. gentleman not want the shareholders to get anything at all? The surplus of the Canadian Pacific Railway last year, after the payment of a moderate dividend after years of patient striving, was comparatively little. However, that is a digression.

Now, I have taken up with the committee as far as I think is necessary the question of unemployment, and I have only one word to add. I should like to repeat that if we adopt a courageous immigration policy and bring in the right class of settlers it will help us along very much. Some hon. members may say, "Well, if we get more immigrants in here what are we going to do?" I would reply that if we do not take a chance and bring immigrants in our home markets will dwindle, our population will decline, and the lure of the United States will continue, thus perpetuating the conditions which we now deplore so much.

Mr. BAXTER: Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to take very much time at this hour of the night, but I would not desire to economize by omitting a reference that I think ought to be made to the very valuable address which we have just listened to. Possibly I would not associate myself with all of the hon. member's arguments nor with all of his conclusions, but I think it is to the credit of this House that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Marler) should have given so much study to what in my mind is one of the two important questions that confront our people to-day. For in my judgment there are no more than two questions now before the country, nor are there likely to be any others for some years to come. One is the railway question, on which I shall not touch to-night; the other is the question of immigration. I think this committee realizes that the question which we have so often debated—the tariff—no matter how strong the views of many hon. members may be, is something that by the agency of any party cannot be changed by more than a fractional variation from its present condition, and therefore we may as well settle down to consideration of the great questions of railways and of immigration.

I believe the country is prepared to support the hon. Acting Minister of Immigration (Mr. Stewart) if his policy contains that element so much emphasized by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler)—courage. It is only by courage that this problem can be successfully handled. I do not think the people of Canada expect that every immigrant will remain here. If we were to take a view so limited we would not spend a dollar, we would not make a single effort to attract desirable immigrants; on the contrary, we would allow our country to wither, to die of inanition. That cannot be the Canadian spirit. Certainly it is not the spirit by which we have surmounted the difficulties of the past, and it is not the spirit which will solve our national problems to-day.

After all, immigration is like a fertilizing stream, which passes through the land depositing something of its value, but always carrying something away. We cannot expect to retain all the immigrants we bring in. It is our business to make conditions here favourable to the retention of every immigrant, and especially of every native-born son. But we cannot war against human nature. No parliament can stop that onward progress of the ambitious boys and girls from the farm to the civic centre, and thence to the greatest opportunities of life. Nor is it desirable that we should try to turn the world back. Progress is the natural order of events, and we should not desire to stop it even if we had the ability to do so. Neither is it possible for us to stop the tide of immigration flowing through to other countries. We know that the United States is greater in population, in wealth and in opportunity, and it is perhaps not a little to our credit that our native-born of ambition, of courage and of ability have left us to occupy leading positions in the country to the south; and there is no reason why we should desire to stop them. But we must replace them by attracting immigrants in increasing numbers, and therefore I think this country should be opened to a selected immigration, an immigration which ought in my judgment to be directed to the parts of the Dominion that want it and ask for it.

Mr. JACOBS: How can you keep that immigration there?

Mr. BAXTER: I have just said that you cannot stop its natural movement, you cannot cause a fixation of the human character. I have seen something that possibly resembles an effort at fixation, but I would not want Canada to attempt it.

I do not purpose to discuss the problem of immigration from east to west and from nort to south, but to treat it from what in one sense is purely a sectional aspect. I want to speak of immigration from the standpoint of the Maritime provinces, and I think I am justified in doing so. We have heard from every other part of the Dominion its attitude towards immigration. We in the Maritime provinces have our attitude. We would like to see our desires translated into action. While I cannot congratulate the minister upon any particular courage in the policy which he puts forward, nor upon any great ambition involved in that policy, still I feel that the hon. gentleman is sincere in his desire to do all he can so far as his path is clear to him, and I think whether we agree with him or not in details it ought to be the part of hon. members to give him at least such suggestions as they think are of value. He will then have the opportunity of selecting those which to him possess merit. It was largely for that purpose I am sure that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George delivered his speech. I want to make this suggestion myself, I trust that this debate, which is one of very great value to the country, will be made up of a succession of suggestions with the view of giving the minister assistance which will enable him to make his department more helpful to the country.

Now, we have to a certain extent a complaint in the Maritime provinces in regard to immigration. I trust we are not of a whining breed and that we do not complain for the sake of complaining. I hope we have not yet come to the conclusion that the axis of Canada is in the Maritime provinces and that the rest of the Dominion must revolve around it and by our permission. We do not take any such stand, but we do intend to say what we think we need and to point out a way by which we think it can be given to us. Hitherto, no matter what government has been in power, as the minister said to-day, the policy has been to treat the Immigration department as a sort of fly on the wheel of the administration—a general sign hung out and a certain amount of money spent in a certain way to attract people. Where? To Canada. That is all right as a glittering generality.

The federal government has always refused to make distinctions between the provinces, and in that respect I think it has failed to do justice to all Canada. The result of that policy has been that people have flocked to the western lands. It is true that we have the burden of the Canadian Pacific to help to carry, and we have the burden of the Canadian Northern. I shall not follow all the changes of name in connection with the Canadian Northern down to the present time, but we still have the burden with us, and it is quite right to get settlers into that country. But is it quite fair that there should be no direction of the stream of immigration toward other provinces which need the vitality of immigration quite as much as the West needs it? The House sees exactly what has taken place in the Maritime provinces. We have either lost population, as in the case of the beautiful little province of Prince Edward Island, or made a gain so slight that we are losing representation, as in the case of Nova Scotia, or are barely able to hold our own, as in the case of New Brunswick. That is the fact in relation to this last decade; in the previous decade we lost in our relative position to the provinces as a whole. Now, do we not need some of the immigration? Do we not want it? Are there not fertile valleys, pleasant slopes, lovely plains, in these three provinces? Are there not great natural resources which can be developed by labour? We want population, not talking machines. If other people want the country to stand still; if they do not want immigration; if they do not want success they can so express themselves, as they have done many times before. For my part, I will do my own talking. I am not a catechism.

Conditions in the Maritime provinces from the agricultural standpoint differ greatly from those in the West. Our soil in most instances requires to be denuded of some growth. The proposal I will make may appear startling, because it might involve the expenditure of a few hundred thousand dollars. It might even cost a million or a couple of millions. It may be startling to gentlemen on both sides who yesterday with the greatest complacency approved of the spending of millions upon millions to complete the Hudson Bay railway. If that dream of some peoples' lives is to be realized, we in the Maritime provinces may fairly put in a plea for a chance for our own lives, and what I say is that the immigration policy could very well embrace the expenditure of some money upon a suitable class of immigrants by preparing farms for them in the Maritime provinces. If you do that, we will keep them there, and we will not whine if the crops go bad. I trust that the minister may be able to persuade his colleagues to give him enough money to enable us to 11 p.m. settle good farmers upon the land in the Maritime provinces. Let him do that, and we will produce the results.

[Mr. Baxter.]

Mr. CAHILL: Mr. Chairman, I regret that I cannot agree with much that has been said by hon. members opposite and by the minister himself. We are all pretty well agreed that so far as the minister is concerned he at least has no immigration policy; the immigration policy that he is proposing has been handed to him by outside schemers who wish to have their plans promoted. I would have thought that the Liberal government after taking office would have seen fit to try to find out the cause of emigration from our country. This country has had problems of immigration and emigration for the past forty years. During all that time we have not maintained our natural increase in Canada, yet we have spent millions upon millions of dollars in bringing tourists to our shores and allowing them to drift out of the country again. The minister now proposes to do something even worse; he is going to pay passages and thus assist these people to come to Canada. If the government of the day had lived up to their pre-election pledges and promises to put a certain tariff into effect in this country, they would have freed the implements of production from customs tariff. If that had been done the result would have been a great incentive in the matter of bringing people to this country and making our present farming population more prosperous, more happy and more contented. That, after all, is what will bring the most immigrants to Canada and keep them here—a prosperous, happy and contented people. All the immigration propaganda that the minister talks of is not worth one cent to him; is not going to get him anywhere.

He proposes to spend $600,000 in bringing people into Canada by means of assisted immigration, and he intends to participate in the British Empire settlement scheme. Now, that scheme is designed to get rid of the surplus population of Great Britain. It is a very good scheme for the British people, but what are we to do with these people after we get them here? Put them in the cities and open soup kitchens for them? Nothing else can happen. These people are being brought from the cities of England; they are not people who will be assimilated into the rural life of our country. They are not people who will go on the farms of northern Quebec, northern Ontario, northern Saskatchewan and Alberta. If the minister will attempt to legislate so as to make conditions in the rural districts livable for the people who are there; if he will do something to bring prosperity to the farming communities, then he will get all the immigrants that Canada wants, with very little effort on his part.

There are four things necessary for this country to-day, and one of them is tariff adjustment. We have lived under this present tariff arrangement of protection for the past forty years and we have got nowhere. Our transportation system is bleeding the people white, and it is the duty of the government to see that the people get a square deal from the transportation companies. Our banking system is so arranged that there are no rural credits, no provisions for the development of the rural districts. It is so arranged that the money is gathered into the cities. I am not blaming the banks; they are doing business according to their lights, according to the best profit they can get, but under the present system the country banks are simply gathering offices for the cities. The result is that the bankers of Canada are in the large cities—Toronto and Montreal; and they are anxious to lend money to the manufacturer, the jobber and the speculator. Your money and the money of the rural districts finds its way to Montreal and is there lent out. I do not know that this condition can be remedied immediately, but it is one of the things that has helped to depopulate rural Canada. There is no person in rural Canada in a position to make loans through the banks. It is true that a private individual can make loans; but the boy in the bank in the rural districts of Canada is not competent to do so.

Mr. LADNER: Is the hon. gentleman aware that in the prairie provinces the loans from the banks exceed the deposits.

Mr. CAHILL: Who gives my hon. friend that information? Does he get it from the farmer on the prairies, or does he get it from the man that wants to make him believe that the present system is the finest in the land?

Mr. LADNER: The hon. gentleman's method of answer might suit the hustings but in the House of Commons—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. LADNER: I submit the hon. gentleman has not answered the question which I put. He may not have the information. If he does not have it no doubt he will say so; if he has the information he will probably let us know.

Mr. CAHILL: I will answer the hon. member in this way: I am not aware that his statement is true.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this waste of money in Canada has gone on too long. This system of paternalism is getting too great a hold on the Canadian people. We are not only going to bring these immigrants into Canada but we are going to regulate their movements after they get here; we are going to have a system of inspection and of restrictions. We are going to tell these people how they are to farm, when they are to farm and why; we are going out to waste the money of the Canadian people, a thing that we cannot possibly afford to do.

My hon. friend also has a scheme to spend $100,000 with the Canadian Colonization Company. Just imagine the federal government meddling with real estate problems! Just imagine them wasting the people's money in a real estate deal of that kind! Why if my hon. friend will spend, not $100,000 but $1,000, he will be able to stop as many people from leaving Canada in a week or in a day as his agreement requires to be brought in in a year. The whole scheme is absurd. I propose to vote against the appropriation of $100,000 for this purpose, and against that of $600,000 for assisted immigration to Canada until the conditions are better, and until this is a more satisfactory country for people to come to, and for the people who are now here to live in.

Mr. EVANS: I had not intended taking part in this debate but in view of the manner in which some hon. members have discussed this most serious question I rise to make known my views from a humanitarian standpoint. The economic system of this country has been such that all those who own the public utilities which the farmers and agriculturists of Canada need to use—the railways, the banks, the grain dealers, the elevator concerns and the loan companies—are accumulating great wealth, while the man who creates the new wealth of this country every year does not make enough to clothe and feed himself in decency. Some of these men are still hanging on to their farms in the hope of salvaging something out of the labour which they have so many years devoted to the building up of what they fondly call home. Why any government should inveigle newcomers to take the places of the old and experienced farmers who have failed, without considering the reason for that failure is to my mind political insanity. The present immigration policy is nothing more than the inveigling of the uninformed into taking the places of men who, through hard times, have had to leave their farms every year. The time was when we thought that the western part of this country was rich enough to carry any overhead expense, and we built thousands of miles of railway which have never been needed and which can never economically serve the interests of Canada. Freight rates were increased to pay the dividends of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. This, it was said, was needed to maintain the country's credit and the settler had to pay for it. Our legislators have looked on with unconcern whilst the lake shipping combine, and other combines obtained control of the wealth which the farmer each year made for this country. The effort was made to ease the settler's mind by telling him how much his farm had increased in value; and so he went on adding to the wealth of the country and borrowing at a high rate of interest from the banks, to meet his own obligations. Implement companies have been left to conduct their operations virtually as they pleased. So the dance has gone merrily on.

There are a good many things which the government can do in the way of carrying out a consistent immigration policy, but it seems to me that they are still surveying the situation with unconcern. The present immigration vote, under existing conditions, is certainly bound to meet with lively opposition. It is known to all that are on the land endeavouring to make a living that it is useless to bring in settlers under present conditions to take the place of experienced farmers who are failing to make good. The fact that the Acting Minister of Immigration says the present conditions are largely our own fault does not alter the case. It was not the war, as he says, that caused excessive or undue inflation of the price of land. The conditions with which we are now faced threatened to arise before the war began; the war only postponed them for a time. The conditions, coupled with the rise in freight rates, have been so bad that the farmers' products have fallen even below the prices which prevailed previous to 1914. I think it is certainly reasonable to say that under present conditions it is a useless waste to spend money on immigration. Take the case of a new settler. The proposition is to people 20,000,000 acres of land within ten or fifteen miles of the railways. Now, just see what the overhead expenses of the intending settler will be to start with, and I have only mentioned those things it is imperative for him to have. He needs a binder, which costs under present conditions $330; a drill, which costs $180; a wagon, which costs $160; a plough, which costs $60; a harrow, which costs $30; and a rake and mower, which costs $180. He will also need four horses, costing $400, and he should have two cows which he can buy at present for about $40 each. Then he should have in cash—outside of what he can make as he goes along—to feed his family for one year and a half until returns come in, at least $600. He will also need another $100 for fuel. Now he requires to buy a quarter section at $20 per acre, and if he can get the necessary money at 6 per cent that will represent an interest charge of about $204. He has to pay the interest the first year, but at the end of the second season he still finds himself in debt $2,324. Now it seems to me that he cannot borrow this amount from the bank because the present rate of interest is too high. One of the reasons why farms are vacant to-day is that the rates of interest are so high that it does not pay to borrow money to work a farm.

I just rose to say that I oppose the vote for this expenditure on immigration, and I do it largely from a humanitarian standpoint.

Mr. FORTIER (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I listened, this afternoon, with great satisfaction to the government's policy on this important question of immigration; it gave me much pleasure to hear the eloquent speech delivered by the Minister of the Interior, who gave us a masterly outline of the situation. I therefore approve of the government's policy. I am in favour of this wise moderate policy, and, I think we are fully justified, under the circumstances, to avoid extremes and more than ever we can say in medio stat virtus. No doubt the country is in need of immigration but a select and desirable one; Canada must not follow the example of other countries and hold a wide opened door to all immigrants of the world. It seems to me, that at this period in our history, it would be bad policy to erect either on our Atlantic coast or the shores of the St. Lawrence, a new Statue of Liberty opening widely its mantle to gather in all the wandering children of the earth.

I listened with pleasure to the Minister of the Interior bringing out new features in regard to this immigration policy. I think the criticism of the government by the opposition for following up the old policy is not well founded, because as I have stated there is in the government's policy new features. In fact there is the co-operation of the government with the provinces. This is a new element which will be appreciated by the people of this country. Another new feature is the one of the publicity which will be widespread encouraging immigration not only towards the western provinces as in the past, but towards the nine provinces of the Dominion. These are the new features introduced in the policy of immigration that deserve to be pointed out and with which I entirely agree. This new policy is acknowledged by the Progressive party since they reproach the government for changing the old policy by introducing this special new feature by which the Dominion government would co-operate with the provinces and, they seem rather astonished at the fact of this co-operation. We may have, in the past, made mistakes by opening too wide the gates to immigrants and especially by directing them towards those territories, the western provinces, only which, according to certain people, seem to be well fitted to immigration.

A member of the opposition commenting upon the remarks made by a previous speaker, stated that the important questions which interested the country, at present, were those of immigration and railways, and, that both had been discussed in a masterly way by the speaker who had preceded him. No doubt these two questions are of the utmost importance; but to my mind, there is one which dominates both of them: it is the question of colonization. The latter holds the foremost place, while railways and immigration are but means to attain the great aim. It is by co-operating with the provinces that we may help immigration and especially colonization in this country.

No doubt in the western provinces this co-operation cannot exist between the Dominion government and the provincial government for the simple reason that the natural resources belong to the former. These provinces take no interest in the question because they cannot supply lands to those who wish to settle in this country. In the older provinces, the eastern provinces, it is absolutely necessary that lands favourable to farming be offered to settlers so as to help immigration. There must be lands offered but there must also be settlers to take them over. This work accomplished by the older provinces and that the Dominion government now wish to help, is an excellent thing for this country. Indeed, it was by opening up areas of arable lands that we were able to keep our people in this country; it is through such a colonization policy that we succeeded in preventing the exodus of our children to the United States, and it will again be through applying such a policy, backed by both Dominion and provincial governments that we shall hold the settlers amongst us and assist in the work known as repatriation. If praise is due to the government, at present, it is certainly for having contributed to establish the work of repatriation. I wish to congratulate them on this achievement, and, on having designated to perform such work a man whose ability is indisputable. Indeed, Mr. Arthur Lemont has a wide experience in economic questions; he was attached during a number of years to the Department of Colonization in our province; as a journalist, during twenty years, he wrote on all the important subjects interesting our country and has even published works on Canadian economic questions. I have reason to hope that this organization and under the direction of the official in charge repatriation will proceed in an efficient manner.

These are the views that I wished to emphasize in this debate. I renew my most sincere adhesion to the government's policy. I state that we should encourage the repatriation of our people to the older provinces, and, specially my own province, and that we should also help in the settlement of the western provinces. Those who wish to return and live under the skies of their province are always welcome. At present, settlers are not numerous enough; they must come in greater numbers so as to further develop the eastern provinces. If amongst us, there are people having an adventurous turn of mind, rather than cross the 45th parallel to seek work in the New England mills, they would be better off to go west and settle the Red river, the Assiniboine and Saskatchewan valleys, taking their place among their own people already settled in those parts, and who, thanks to Providence, are prosperous. I therefore favour this policy of the government in regard to immigration and shall cast my vote with pleasure in support of the credits asked by the government.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King, the House adjourned at 11.25 p.m.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT

FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. JAMES MALCOLM (North Bruce) presented the first report of the special committee appointed for the purpose of inquiring into chapter 12, 8-9 George V., an act respecting the Civil Service of Canada as follows:

Your committee recommends that its order of reference be so enlarged as to empower it to make recommendations looking toward the betterment of aforesaid act and the Civil Service in general, and also that the committee be empowered to sit while the House is in session.

INQUIRY INTO AGRICULTURAL CONDITIONS

THIRD REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. ANDREW McMASTER (Brome) presented the third report of the committee appointed to inquire into agricultural conditions, as follows:

The committee appointed to inquire into agricultural conditions beg leave to present the following resolution which was unanimously adopted.

That in the opinion of the committee it is advisable and in the interest of agriculture in this country that a full and searching inquiry should be made into all aspects of the grain trade in Canada and that for this purpose a Royal Commission should be appointed, clothed with full powers not only from the Dominion government, but from all provinces, desiring to co-operate in such inquiry.

NARCOTIC DRUGS ACT AMENDMENT BILL

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Minister of Health) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 72 to amend the Narcotic Drugs Act.

He said: The purpose of this bill is principally to consolidate previous legislation for the suppression of the traffic in narcotic drugs. Legislation was first enacted in 1908, and subsequent legislation was enacted in 1911, 1919, 1920, 1921 and 1922. At present the legislation is somewhat confusing, and the purpose of this legislation is to make the interpretation of these different statutes clearer and easier for those charged with the administration of this law. There are a few minor changes. One change relates to the right of appeal which in some cases is limited to a point of law. There is another minor change, as I take it, providing for the indentification by the finger prints of criminals convicted under the act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

INDIAN RESERVES—GRAIN PRODUCTION

Mr. EVANS:

7. What area during the previous five years?
8. What amount of rentals has been collected during the last five years?
9. What amount during the previous five years?

Hon. Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Stands as an Order for Return.

Mr. MEIGHEN: As regards this question which has been asked to stand as an order for return, I think this is an abuse of the rule. Of all the nine questions there—I went over the list just now—there is not one the answer to which would be one line in length.

Mr. BUREAU: It is the time it takes to find out the information.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That does not matter.

Mr. BUREAU: It does.

Mr. SPEAKER: Of course, the rule of the House does not leave much discretion to the Speaker. Paragraph (4) of section 37 states:

If a question is of such a nature that in the opinion of the minister who is to furnish the reply, such reply should be in the form of a return.

There is no discretion left to the Chair.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

PROPOSED REORGANIZATION

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is in the public interest that the present Royal Canadian Mounted Police force be disbanded, and that there be organized (a) a federal police force for the protection of government buildings and other federal property, (b) a northwest mounted police force whose activities would be confined to unorganized territories.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this resolution is the same as that which I introduced on this subject last year. The resolution has been modified in form to meet an objection offered by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that, in the event of its being carried as it was presented last year, it might leave public buildings without guards. The object is essentially to have that force which was formerly known as the Royal Northwest Mounted Police restored to the status it once held. I had hoped that this reorganization would have taken place without the introduction of this resolution this year. In a speech delivered in Toronto on August 30th, the Prime Minister intimated that there would be a change in the control of the Mounted Police. Let me read from the report that appeared in the Citizen of August 31st:

> That there will shortly be a radical change in the organization and jurisdiction of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police was intimated by Premier King in the course of his speech at a banquet in his honour here to-night. The Premier advanced as one of the "Striking evidences of the centralizating tendencies" of the recent Union government the change made in the Northwest Mounted Police, whose headquarters were transferred from the northwest to Ottawa, and its character changed from that of a "police for unorganized territories" to a "federal and practically military force." Already, said the Premier, the Liberal government had discharged a large body of the new force, and he hoped that the time would soon arrive when the headquarters of the force would no longer be in Ottawa.

That announcement of the Prime Minister was received with favour in many sections of this country and I should like to quote one of the press comments upon it. In the Montreal Star there appears an editorial from which I extract the following paragraph:

> The Northwest Mounted Police are part and parcel of the history of this country. Their fame is world-wide. Their work has won for them recognition in every land where law is the basis of civilization, and their achievements have formed the basis for many a thrilling novel over a long course of years. To take them from their old home in the West and make them an appanage of the formalities and red tape of the capital was at best a mistake. The Premier is courageous enough to undertake the remedy and does not hesitate about making his views known. It is clear that the headquarters are to be re-established in the West, and that in size and duties the force will be remodelled on the old and tried lines.

Now, there is an impression in some quarters that a resolution of this kind is a reflection upon the work of the force. Rather it is, I take it, a plain practical proposition as to how we can more efficiently and economically administer the affairs of this department of the public service. Further I think I am speaking on behalf of a very considerable section of the old force when I say that they would welcome a change along the lines contemplated by this resolution. I notice in the March number of a little publication entitled the Maple Leaf, the organ of the Canadian Club of New York, an article by F. J. E. Fitzpatrick, an ex-sergeant of the Mounted Police, in which he speaks of the exploits of the old force in bygone days. May I quote a paragraph as bearing on this point?

> I use here the appellation "Northwest" advisedly, as you are aware that within recent date, that term has been eliminated owing to the fact that the romantic and famous corps has been amalgamated with the Dominion Police Force, an entirely different institution and of a very different composite.
>
> Members of the Northwest force have for a great many years been of the adventurous young element, while that of the Dominion force, of men of more mature and sedate habits, satisfied perhaps with a more humdrum life. I believe it was a mistake to merge the two. The attraction of the western prairie life appealed at all times to the spirit of youth with red blood. The duties in the new force, with the prospects of a station at some coal mine in Nova Scotia or some such prosaic duty, will likely eliminate all enthusiasm in the new recruit.
> No. Better unscramble the sad mixture. Let romance return to its lair for future additional glory to attach to the name—The Royal Northwest Mounted Police of Canada.

The original force is the one with which we were familiar in the earlier days in the West and the activities of which were confined to the Northwest Territories, where we know it performed a very valuable service in protecting the pioneer settlers and in dealing with the Indians and cattle thieves on the western ranches. But in February, 1919, the activities of that force were extended so that it operated from Fort William to the coast; and on June 7, 1920, it was organized on an altogether new basis. From that time the cost has been tremendous, ranging from $3,000,000 to $5,000,000 a year. This year we have in the estimates an amount of $2,587,999.11 to which must be added the expenses connected with civil government, salaries and contingencies, bringing the total up to $2,634,224.11. We note an addition this year of a sum of no less than $100,000 to assist in the enforcement of federal statutes. We were told by the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) that this was not a new item; but it does not appear that any of the other departments have cut down their estimates proportionately. It would seem therefore that this $100,000 is really an additional expenditure. As a matter of fact, some of the departments have rather extended their provisions for the enforcing of federal statutes. For example, I notice an item in connection with the appointment of Walter Duncan at a salary of $2,550 per annum as a special investigating officer under the direction of the Department of Finance, with further contingent expenses in connection with this service amounting to $2,500, or a total of $5,050 for this particular work of investigation. If the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are doing the work of investigation for all departments of the government, and are doing it efficiently, why should we have additional items of this character in connection with the various departments?

There is a motion on the order paper looking to the reduction of the sessional indemnities of members, and which may come up today. Without anticipating that debate to any extent, might I point out that the amount spent this year on this force alone would pay the sessional indemnities of all the members almost three times over. It seems to me that we may very well hesitate to pay out such an enormous sum for this particular force unless a great deal more is being done by it than is apparent from the reports.

The report shows a force now of some 1,200 officers and men. I think the figure given us by the Minister of Justice the other day was in the vicinity of 1,100. But I wonder whether he was correctly informed when in answer to a question he stated that 118 men were located in the city of Ottawa? My information with regard to the local force—and if this is not correct I shall be glad to be put right—is as follows: At headquarters, one assistant commissioner, two superintendents, one surgeon, three inspectors, one sergeant-major, eight staff sergeants, eleven sergeants, four corporals, twenty-three constables, and three lady stenographers—a total of fifty-seven. In A division, one superintendent, two inspectors, one sergeant-major, one staff sergeant, fourteen sergeants, one hundred and fifty-two constables and two lady stenographers—a total of one hundred and seventy-three. In N division, one superintendent, one inspector, three sergeants, two corporals and twenty constables —a total of twenty-seven. If these figures are correct we have a staff of two hundred and fifty-seven for Ottawa alone. According to the report I notice the force has been reduced during the past year from 1,680 to 1,227 men—a reduction of 453, or 27 per cent. But the officers have only been reduced from 70 to 64 —merely a reduction of 6 or, say, 10 per cent. I think we might say of this force as one of the members across the floor said recently with regard to the permanent force, that we have generals where we might have colonels, colonels where we might have majors, and so on all down the line. There does seem to be a very, very large number of officials in proportion to the men.

Now, what is this large force doing? Originally it was confined to the vast teritories in the West. I note from the report that out of the 1,100 or 1,200 men there are only 78 stationed in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. If we had to provide only for this small force the expense would be very considerably cut down, and the duties which were originally intended to be discharged by the Royal Northwest Mounted Police could be attended to. Of course, there is the other part of the work to which reference was made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) last year—the guarding of our public buildings. I have often wondered, Mr. Speaker, as I have gone in and out of the public buildings here whether we need quite so many guards in them, and especially whether we need as guards men who are presumably trained to do work on our frontiers. As we go into our library I notice there stands on guard at the door a man in the uniform of the Mounted Police. I have no doubt he does very efficient work, but I do not know that he is more efficient than the other guards who are stationed in other parts of the building. I am told that he was placed there at the time of the fire. I presume no one has told him to go away since that time, so he is still there and likely to continue for some years to come unless some action is taken by this House. A few weeks ago I paid a visit to the art gallery, and found there guards in the uniform of the Canadian Mounted Police. They were very estimable men, and I found one had developed into quite a connoisseur and he showed to me and explained the pictures. I was very grateful to him for so doing, but I still wonder whether we need a mounted policeman to do that kind of work. I have noted that in the art galleries of the Old Land aged pensioners are employed for this work and they do it very efficiently. Of course, if we possessed such a great work of art as a Mona Lisa, and an attempt were made to carry it off, I have no doubt that these gallant men might stage a spectacular rescue and we would have it pictured in the movies. I am not sure if something of this sort is anticipated. But to guard pictures in our art galleries, however valuable those pictures may be, it does not seem to me necessary to employ members of the Mounted Police.

Mr. RINFRET: What about suffragettes?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We do not have any since we have a lady member of the House. Undoubtedly during the war and post-war periods there may have been certain duties for these men to discharge, but that part of their work has largely ceased. I am glad to think that it is not the policy of the present government to use this force for the settlement of industrial disputes. During the past year on two occasions the permanent force has been called out, or at least was asked for, in Edmonton and Cape Breton. The Mounted Police were not requisitioned, so it would seem as if here again one of the tasks for which this force was organized in its present form no longer requires their attention.

Mr. CARROLL: Does the hon. gentleman know of any industrial strike in this country where the Mounted Police were called out?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes. There was an industrial strike in Winnipeg in 1919, there was also some trouble at Thorold in the Niagara peninsula, and at Drumheller.

Mr. CARROLL: Does he know as a matter of fact whether or not the Mounted Police were called or sent to Glace Bay in 1922?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I cannot give any information in regard to that. Then there is the enforcement of federal statutes. Just how far men trained to do frontier work are capable of discharging this duty I do not know. It seems rather strange that when the Postmaster General wished to discover the criminal responsible for the theft of $50,000 from the Edmonton post office he had apparently to go outside the Mounted Police for assistance. I am not quite sure how effectively the Narcotic Drug Act has been enforced by the Mounted Police. I should like this House to be informed as to how many non-commissioned officers and men have been dismissed during the past two years for dishonesty in connection with this work. The very nature of enforcing this act in Montreal and in Vancouver would apparently leave the way open for considerable connivance by the men with the very criminals whom they are supposed to suppress, and I think during the course of this debate the House might very well be informed as to how many men of the force have been dismissed for complicity with these criminals.

Another serious question involved in this matter is that of the enforcement of the Criminal Code. We have before us—at least, I hope it will come before us at this session—a bill to amend the Criminal Code. Very few of the citizens of Canada realize the great powers that under the existing Criminal Code are vested in the Mounted Police. Let me read one subsection of the code as assented to July 7, 1919:

> Any property, real or personal, belonging or suspected to belong to an unlawful association, or held or suspected to be held by any person for or on behalf thereof may, without warrant, be seized or taken possession of by any person thereunto authorized by the chief commissioner of Dominion Police or by the commissioner of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, and may thereupon be forfeited to His Majesty.

It is not necessary, according to this clause, that a man should be a member of an unlawful association; if he is suspected of belonging to an unlawful association the officer may without warrant seize his property, which shall be forfeited to His Majesty. I know of cases where several years ago mounted police entered the homes of reputable citizens and seized books—in one case a library brought years ago from Great Britain, which was confiscated. To this day the gentleman I have in mind, who is an alderman, by the way, of one of our western cities, has been unable to obtain redress, and under this act I do not see how he can. Arbitrary authority is in this instance vested in the Mounted Police. At the time that certain books were banned during the war, mounted police entered the library of the city of Regina and took from the shelves of that institution a book called Myer's History of Canadian Wealth. It is quite true that that book, which was written from material in the Archives here in Ottawa, is no longer on the banned list, but it is quite possible under this statute that similar proceeding might be taken in regard to any other literature or any other property.

Let me put a purely suppositious case. Some of the members of the Progressive party are anxious to have radical changes made in the Bank Act. Suppose it should be considered that they were going to do that by unlawful means and were accordingly suspected of belonging to an unlawful association. There is no reason why, under the Criminal Code as it stands, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police might not seize any property belonging to the Grain Growers' Association or the Progressive party.

An hon. MEMBER: They have nothing to seize.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Perhaps not. The fact is—this is no supposititious case—that under the guise of ferreting out sedition there has been established a system of espionage that is most objectionable, at least to the labour unions of the country. This was brought to the attention of many of us several years ago. On the witness stand one of the corporals of the Canadian Mounted Police confessed that he had wormed his way into the unions, that he had secured the confidence of the members and had actually tried to get people to purchase books which he knew at that time to be banned, and thus, if possible, to persuade them to commit crime. So far as I am able to learn, that particular corporal is still in the employ of the Canadian Mounted Police and still carrying on that kind of work. He has been transferred from Calgary to Montreal.

Mr. RINFRET: We will send him back.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: He was introduced to some labour people of Montreal by a man who is generally known in labour circles as being a "red." The labour people do not understand why the government has not arrested this man, who all along has been supposed to be a great agitator. It is passing strange that he should be the very man who introduced this corporal of the Canadian Mounted Police to the unsuspecting workers of Montreal. One thing I should like this House to know is that in the free and easy meetings often held by the labour people in their halls, when almost any man is free to get up and say what he thinks, if someone urges violence the word is immediately passed around that group, "Be careful of that man; he is a government agent." Is it a desirable condition, Mr. Speaker, that it should be said or suspected that when a man urged violence in this country he was a government agent, trying to get a certain number of people into trouble? But this is said and said freely, and we have good reason to believe that it is true. I do not know that the officers in charge know of what is being done in this respect by their subordinates and by the detectives who are subject to their direction. I do not suppose they do. But one man put it this way: "I have to keep my job. To do so I must make many reports. But it is not necessary to tell all the truth, because who is to check me up?" There is no reason why labour people should be spied on in this way, nor is there any reason why public funds should be diverted to the maintenance of a certain number of individuals whose business it is to go in and out of meetings of labour people to try to find out what is going on. If this is to be done, I submit it might be of more advantage to the people of Canada if some of these men were detailed to visit boards of directors of some of our big corporations. If the board of directors of the Merchants' Bank, for instance, had been watched in this way, a good many dollars might have been saved to certain people of this country. Essentially the trouble, it seems to me, is this: that we have half a dozen entirely different classes of work placed under the supervision of one particular group of people. It would clarify the situation a great deal if we had an entire reorganization of the force. I think I am not making an unreasonable request.

I wish to close by quoting the remarks of eminent gentlemen who have given considerable attention to this matter. Perhaps Mr. Speaker will pardon me if I quote from Hansard some words of his, spoken as far back as June 7, 1920. He said:

> Whenever I meet those fine young fellows walking with a jaunty air on the streets of Ottawa, I ask myself why they have been taken from the plains of the West where they represented law and order and sent to Ontario where we have a strong body of provincial police, in addition to having a strong body of provincial police in Quebec, and similar bodies in the other eastern provinces.
> During the period of war, when the government had some drastic action to carry out in connection with military service and such business, I could understand that the government should strengthen the arm of the law for the carrying out of such policies, and I did not begrudge the help that might under such circumstances be given by the Northwest Mounted Police to the Federal authorities, but now that war is over and all such troubles are past, I do not see why we maintain at such a high cost this body of fine young fellows at Ottawa. Their place is in the vast solitudes of the West, of the prairies, where they can maintain, as they have done heretofore, British law and order.

If I need even a more conservative authority, one whose opinion for many years has received respect, I would quote that of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) who according to Hansard said on that occasion:

> Yet with the creation of the provinces and the development of municipal and provincial governments who have all the resources of civilization at their command, there is no longer any need for the Mounted Police. The Yukon might need it perhaps, but there is hardly room for a very large force out there, and in the Northwest Territories I suppose there is not enough population to require very much attention along that line. I wish that we could find some useful service for the Mounted Police.

I think I have nothing to add to that, Mr. Speaker. It seems to me that we are talking economy and efficiency in all these different departments and here is one place where we can practise economy and where by a reorganization of the service we can secure a great deal more efficiency.

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): I have listened with considerable interest to the remarks made by the mover of this resolution (Mr. Woodsworth), expecting to hear some more logical and more sound economic reasons given to back up this resolution than we heard at the last session of parliament when a similar resolution was before the House. I expected to hear to-day some valid or reasonably sound economic reasons given for disbanding the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

The resolution states that it is in the public interest to disband the force. I do not think the words "public interest" can be used there in the ordinary sense, that is, meaning for the good of, or for the benefit of the public. On the contrary, I think that the interests that would be served by the disbanding of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are interests which are entirely inimical to the public interest of Canada. The mover of the resolution is apparently willing to have a smaller police force in the unorganized territories, though I am afraid he has failed to make clear to the House what he means by unorganized territories. I heard the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories mentioned, but I would hardly say that either of these are unorganized territories. The mover of the resolution, however, is taking the proper stand in not desiring to move the Mounted Police from the Yukon territory. Such a move would be most unwelcome out there.

As the mover of the resolution has failed to take the House into his confidence as to the real reasons behind this desire 4 p.m. to disband the Mounted Police we must draw our own conclusions why anyone would want such an admirable body, and one which has rendered and is rendering to-day such a splendid service, disbanded. The Mounted Police have been efficient in the West, and they are efficient to-day in other parts of Canada, and to my mind, to use a slang expression, that is just where the shoe pinches. They were never popular with law breakers in the West nor with outlaws in the West, and they are apparently not popular to-day with the same class of people elsewhere in Canada. Why should anybody want to see them disbanded? Not in the interests of economy, although that plea has been advanced, for I think that for the amount of work they do it is one of the most economical services we have in Canada. That may not be saying very much, for I do not know that we are much given to economy in any of our services. But in value received I think we get as good service from the Mounted Police as from any other branch of the service, and more.

The suggestion was made that if the Mounted Police were disbanded, and two or three million dollars saved thereby, there would be no necessity for further advancing the resolution on the order paper to cut down the indemnity of members and senators. Surely the members of this House are not to be appealed to in that way. Even at the loss of a portion of their indemnity they would not cut out a public service such as the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. In that I think the hon. member is underestimating the calibre of the members of this House.

The mover of the resolution has carefully refrained from giving the House any information as to the wonderful amount of work done by this magnificent force. All told the Royal Canadian Mounted Police number only 1,227 officers, non-commissioned officers and men, and their activities extend from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from the Arctic to the southern boundary of Canada. As was pointed out, which must have been good news to the people who wish to see it disbanded, the force has been reduced by 27 per cent within the past year, but the work accomplished even by that reduced police force probably does not make such enjoyable reading to its detractors. Last year the Mounted Police made 12,600 investigations. This year with the reduced force they have made 14,000 investigations. Under the federal statutes they have made 5,235 investigations; under the Criminal Code 470; under provincial statutes and park regulations, 219; and investigations for other departments of the government totalling no less than 8,108. That information is obtainable in the annual report issued by the Mounted Police department. The report is a colourless affair, a cold, matter-of-fact statement, not seeking in any way to add lustre to the splendid reputation of the force or its accomplishments. It is on an examination of the report that one realizes the importance of the services so efficiently rendered.

Of the 5,235 investigations and prosecutions under federal statutes we find that there were 73 under the Chinese Immigration Act; 84 under the Customs Act; 107 under the Explosives Act; 119 under the Fisheries Act; 622 under the Indian Act; Inland Revenue, 1,606; Immigration, 219; Opium and Drug Act, 1,694, and under the Railway Act, 166. Now somebody had to make these investigations for the various departments enumerated; if not the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, then some other police force, because it is inconceivable that these departments could each employ a secret service corps, for that is what it would amount to. The investigations for other departments were no less than 8,108, and included investigations for almost every department of government in the Dominion of Canada. We find them all enumerated at page 11 of the annual report—Finance department, Soldier Settlement Board, Customs department, Immigration, and in fact practically all the departments of government of the Dominion of Canada. There were no less than 8,108 investigations held and in many cases prosecutions carried through. Under the Opium and Narcotic Drugs Act alone there were 1,694 investigations, and I say that if the Royal Canadian Mounted Police did nothing but the work they performed in enforcing the Opium and Narcotic Drugs

Act the country has been well repaid. I will read shortly a very interesting extract from the acting commissioner's report in regard to narcotic drugs. This report says:

An important and arduous task is the support of the Department of Public Health in enforcing the Opium and Narcotic Drugs Act. Reference was made in the last annual report to the calamitous nature of this traffic; I regret to be obliged to state that the evil persists, and I fear has grown in some parts of the country. To check it will require the united efforts of this force and the provincial and municipal authorities, and also drastic punishment of the agents, such as the peddlers who deliberately create addicts.

The figures already given show that we have been active, having arrested and prosecuted over one thousand persons, and having secured 800 convictions, with nearly 350 prison terms and over $60,000 in fines. The quantity of cocaine, morphine and heroin seized in the year is nearly 1,250 ounces. This amounts to about 600,000 grains and as a "deck," the cant name for a dose, usually is five grains or less, it will be seen that we have intercepted fully 120,000 doses. These "decks" are sold to addicts at from one to five dollars each, according to circumstances; so that this quantity represents from one-third to half a million dollars which would have come from the pockets of the wretched customers of these harpies.

A recent change of the act provides for the deportation of aliens convicted under its provisions. With regard to orientals, when such convictions are obtained we turn the particulars over to the Chief Commissioner of Chinese Immigration, and I understand that about one hundred offenders are awaiting removal from the country. It has been observed that Chinese addicts to this vice continue to be devoted to opium, and to be little inclined to the use of the other drugs; but further that cocaine and the other noxious drugs usually are to be obtained in the Chinese opium dens, so that white addicts repair to these plague-spots.

The difficulties of repression are exceedingly great, for several reasons. One is the ease with which these drugs, which are small in bulk, can be imported; numerous and very cunning devices are resorted to for the purpose of smuggling them, instances being known of their being most artfully concealed in shipments by apparently reputable firms from abroad. An effective international governmental control of the manufacture and trade in these drugs seems the only real preventive of this illicit form of international commerce. Another difficulty is that the traffic is so remunerative that those who take part in it have abundance of money at their command and use it to counter our measures, and to fight cases stubbornly in the courts. Yet another obstacle is the repulsive nature of the work of repression, entailing as it does contact with peculiarly loathsome dregs of humanity; our men greatly dislike it, and it is undertaken only in accordance with duty, and because of the knowledge that while unpleasant it is a service to humanity.

I can only repeat that if the Royal Canadian Mounted Police did nothing except what they did under that act, their services are well worth the money we pay for them. Then further, if the Royal Canadian Mounted Police did not perform those services, who would perform them? You answer: the provincial and municipal police. Well, municipal and provincial police are all very well in their way, but they do not commence to compare, as a police force, with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The provincial and municipal forces are all subject to local influence and pressure. It may be imperceptible and we may regret to have to say it, but the pressure is there just the same. Anyone who has had anything to do with the practice of law in the various parts of our country knows that that is so. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police are above that sort of thing. They cannot be bribed, and they cannot be bluffed or intimidated. They are not now in politics and never have been, so far as I know. I remember on one occasion a Tammany politician in the north tried to get them in politics. He succeeded, but very much to his discomfort, and it was never tried again. That was the only time in my experience that political influence has been applied to the Mounted Police and that effort was promptly resisted and properly resented.

In the matter of morale, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are comparable to the Canadian corps overseas. They have their traditions and are proud of them. They are proud of the record of the force and they do not want it lowered. Every man is seized with the idea that it is up to him to do his duty under all circumstances, and there is no task too arduous or hazardous, and on the other hand no task too monotonous, for the Mounted Police, if it is their duty to perform it. In that northern country, where there was at one time, as the hon. mover of the resolution (Mr. Woodsworth) says, a certain amount of lawlessness, I have seen a stripling of a boy, in the Northwest Mounted Police uniform, walk into a bar-room where a dangerous row was going on, and where armed and enraged men were fighting. The men were arrested and disarmed by him without protest. He came in there with as much authority as the British fleet would have in sailing the seas. The row stopped at once, the men were taken to the lock-up, and no one had the slightest idea of resisting this officer. When he came in the row was over. It was not because of any superhuman power, on his part, but because public opinion of the Dominion of Canada was behind him. That public opinion being behind him, the whole force and all the resources of the Dominion were behind him, and the law breakers knew this force would be exercised and that this man would be backed up to the limit in the performance of his duty.

As I say, by comparison, there is no police force like it in the world. During the great gold rush to the north, the bulk of the men went up through Alaskan territory. They landed at the American town of Skagway, where they had marshalls and special police without numbers. Well, they were entirely useless. They had no real authority. Nominally they had the authority of law, but they were not backed up and they could not enforce the law. It was every man for himself in that town, and holdups and murders were of daily and nightly occurrence. The rush moved up the trail some 40 miles across the boundary, and came under the Union Jack and the Northwest Mounted Police. Then the guns simply had to be put away while on the American side you had to have them to protect yourself. If a man was seen carrying a weapon of any kind, he was politely tapped on the shoulder by a Mounted Police officer and told that he did not need it, that he would have to put it away else someone might be hurt by it. He certainly did not need it, because life and property were fully protected by the Mounted Police in that Canadian territory.

There is no demand from the public for the action contemplated by the resolution. If there were we would hear about it. We have never heard of it anywhere, except in the House last session, from the same honourable member who moves the resolution to-day. If there were any proportion of the population dissatisfied with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police we would hear of it through other channels, as well as the channel through which we have heard it to-day. As I said last session, when the question was discussed, I do not think this is a matter on which any private member is qualified to advise the government. It is a matter for the government of the day, and for the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin). If the Minister of Justice and the other government departments are getting satisfaction and receiving value from the services performed by the Mounted Police, the minister will continue them. If he is not getting satisfaction, I am sure this parliament would back him up in disbanding, or reducing the force, or creating some other force. But, with the past record of the Mounted Police, which cannot be gainsaid, and its record of work being done to-day, as disclosed by the official report and by our own observations as Canadians, I say the matter is one to be left for the government and for the Minister of Justice to decide, and that the resolution should not receive the support of this House.

Mr. JAMES STEEDSMAN (Souris): Mr. Speaker, in rising to discuss this resolution, I find myself in agreement with certain portions of it only, although I wish to say as well that I cannot endorse all the reasons offered with regard to the resolution by the hon. member (Mr. Woodsworth) who introduced it. The chief reason that I will give at the present time for supporting the resolution is my great regard and admiration for that old force known as the Royal Northwest Mounted Police. I was very sorry when the Royal Northwest Mounted Police were amalgamated with the Dominion Police. At that time we had two forces. To-day we have one. All that has been said by my hon. friend (Mr. Black) to my right with regard to the force, has been said with regard, not to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, but to the Royal Northwest Mounted Police. As we in the West, particularly those of us who are old-timers, know, the mounted policeman is not fitted by disposition, temperament, nor training, for police duty in industrial centres. His place is out on the frontier, and that is where the Mounted Police have made their record. I am seized of the fact that the West is not yet in a position to do without a mounted police force. Not only in the unorganized territory, but in the very provinces we still require the services of a mounted police force.

I should like to recall an incident that took place a short time ago, in fact in the early days of the war, when the producers of the West were being urged on every hand to increase production and they were doing it to the limit, at a time when our country was supposed to be flooded with spies, and at a time before the United States had gone into the war. We knew then that those western states were full of enemy supporters, at any rate, and during the harvest of 1916, I think, speaking from memory, a rumour spread throughout that country to the effect that a large portion of the ripened crop was about to be destroyed by fire by alien enemies. Whether that rumour was correct or not is neither here nor there. It existed, and you can readily understand the feelings of the people at that time. What happened? An appeal was made for a guard of Mounted Police and they were sent in there. The feelings of relief and protection that came to the people of that district when they saw that thin red line spread out towards the boundary, there to be broken up into small groups and spread along the boundary forming a complete patrol of the southern portion of the constituency from which I come, must be experienced to be realized.

I want to draw the attention of the House to a condition that existed last year in that same part of the country. A band or bands of robbers invaded that district and bank robberies took place there, not only in one town but in many. The people again were ter-rorised. I shall mention just one case in particular, that of the robbery of the Dominion bank at Melita, Manitoba, where, together with many thousands of dollars, the property of the bank, over $100,000 worth of Victory bonds, the property of the people of that community, were stolen. Not only that, but a very intimate friend of mine was shot and very severely wounded in an effort to arouse the citizens of that town. I am aware that a certain number of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police were sent in there at a late date; but I am forced to the conclusion that either they were not there in sufficient numbers or their organization was not complete enough—there was some reason at any rate—they did not succeed in rounding up any of that band of robbers. That band is still in existence; those robbers are still free, and we have every reason to believe that when spring opens up and the roads get into condition to suit them, they will be upon us again. What is to be done about the matter? There is only one course to follow, and that is to have the Royal Northwest Mounted Police fully equipped and organized so that they can take control of the situation and stamp out and bring to justice that band of bandits who are terrorising those people.

I should like to point out that the prairie provinces are not yet in possession of their natural resources, and again, speaking for Manitoba, the province from which I come, I think the House is already very familiar with the development that has taken place in the northern part of that province. It is entirely unfair and unjust to expect that Manitoba should bear the cost of preserving law and order in that territory. There is no force equal to a force of mounted police to take charge of the work in that country. Therefore, I contend that the time has not yet come when the western provinces can do without a mounted police force. That is my answer to the last part of the hon. gentleman's resolution, that we are not ready to have the Mounted Police pushed out into the unorganized territory; that we still need them in the provinces, especially the prairie provinces. For these and other reasons, I would urge upon the government to disband the present force, to establish or reorganize the old Royal Northwest Mounted Police Force, and to let that force be continued as long as there is need for a mounted police force in Canada. When the time comes that there is no longer any necessity for them, let them go down in history and in the hearts of the people of Canada with all the honour and the glory of their traditions to which they are entitled.

Hon. Sir LOMER GOUIN (Minister of Justice): The hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) wishes this House to declare that it is in the public interest that the present Royal Canadian Mounted Police force be disbanded and that there should be organised:

(a) a Federal Police force for the protection of government buildings and other federal property, (b) a North West Mounted Police force whose activities would be confined to unorganised territories.

In other words, the resolution proposes that we should revert to the old system under which we maintained two forces of federal police. In order that I may make my statement as clear as possible, I would ask the permission of the House briefly to outline the history of the legislation which has constituted the present status of our federal police. In 1868 the Dominion Police, as that force was called, was organised for the purpose of enforcing the criminal and other laws of the Dominion only. In 1873, the Royal Northwest Mounted Police was organised to repress crime and maintain peace and order in the western territories. In 1919, it was provided by statutes 9 and 10, George V, Chap. 69, that the Royal Northwest Mounted Police might be employed to maintain peace and order throughout Canada; and in the same year, by another statute passed at the second session of parliament, the name of the force was changed to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. In 1920 the powers of the Commissioner of Dominion Police were transferred to the Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the result of that amalgamation, as I find it after an experience of one year of administration of our federal police, has been to bring more uniformity and efficiency to bear upon the performance of the duties of our police throughout Canada. We now have one bureau, and there is no more uncertainty as to the duties to be performed by our police both inside and outside of the Dominion. There is no more overlapping between two forces as we had in the past; and we no longer require the employment of private agents. The duties of our police are to act, under the instructions of the minister in charge of that branch of our administration, for all departments of the government. The Dominion Police, or rather the Royal Canadian Mounted Police—the name is hardly of such great importance—is charged with the maintenance of peace and order in the unorganised territories and the Arctic region; and that same body has to enforce, among other federal statutes, the Inland Revenue Act, that is to say, they must see to the suppression of illicit stills, and the Opium and Narcotic Drugs Act, the Indian Act and the matter of the protection of reserves. The number of reserves, as hon. members know, is considerable. We have in Canada about 1,200 Indian reserves in Alberta, Saskatchewan, British Columbia and the Northwest Territories. And in Ontario there are 70 Indian reserves which are under the administration and control of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Our federal police force is also charged with the carrying out of the following acts: The Radio Telegraph Act, the Immigration Act, the Fisheries Act, the Chinese Immigration Act, the Explosives Act and the Post Office Act. Practically all of these acts were enforced in the past, before the amalgamation of 1920, partly by the Dominion Police; but many of the departments employed private agents to do that kind of work. Since the amalgamation, however, there is no longer any necessity for going outside to have that work performed. So that the result of the amalgamation has been, as I will show, a reduction in the number of men employed, with the consequent dispensing of private agents, which means a great economy in the cost of administration.

The hon. member for Winnipeg, in support of his proposition, contends that if we were to disband our Mounted Police, as it is to-day organised, and create a special force for the unorganised territories and a special police for the protection of buildings belonging to the federal government, we should save money. Well, I am in a position to show that since the amalgamation we have considerably reduced the strength of our force and considerably reduced the expenditures. In 1920-21 we had a force of 2,605 men and the estimates totalled $4,674,066. For the year 1923-24, the estimates are only $2,587,999. We have reduced the number of men by about 1,500, and as will be seen from the figures I have quoted we have cut down the expenditures by over $1,000,000. The men are now distributed as follows: In the Maritime provinces 32; Quebec district 32; eastern Ontario 312; western Ontario 34; Manitoba, 97—as a matter of fact, it is only 71—; southern Saskatchewan 196; northern Saskatchewan 55; southern Alberta 114; northern Alberta 90; British Columbia 152; and the Yukon territory 49.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Before the minister proceeds, will he give us the estimates for 1921-22?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: The 1921-22 estimates were $3,527,670. We had then 1,726 men. The number of men and the expenditure have decreased, while the work has been increasing every year. It will be found on reference to the last report of the department that in 1920-21 we had 10,888 investigations, which in 1921-22 had increased to 14,032. In regard to the enforcement of federal statutes, in 1920-21 we had 2,068 cases, while in 1921-22 they had risen to 5,235—an increase of nearly 150 per cent. At page 11 of the same report it will be found that we have made over 8,000 investigations for the various departments. This work has to be performed. In the past, as I have already said, it was done by our Dominion and our Mounted Police. The duties now performed in the unorganized territories are the same as those which have been performed since 1873; our men now known as members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are doing exactly what their predecessors, the members of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, did for so many years. They are engaged in investigating work for the various departments of the government. If we take, for instance, the province of Manitoba, we shall find at page 54 of the report that our federal police investigated 601 cases, and at page 55 the figures are 1,302.

The hon. member for Winnipeg, referring to an answer that I gave him when I brought down my estimates, said that I was in error in telling him that we had in Ottawa 118 men. What I said then was that we had 118 men in charge of our public buildings. I never said that this was the total force in Ottawa. We have a special corps here to prepare our men, and, as detailed by him, we have a local force of about 212.

The hon. member seems to object to our employing members of the Mounted Police as guardians of this and other buldings in Ottawa. He even objects to their uniform. Well they may be called members of the Dominion Police or members of the Mounted Police, but I do not see what difference this could make. We have to have such policemen all over the Dominion. Too many people are under the erroneous impression that the federal government has nothing to do with the police work of this country, and are under the impression that because the provinces are charged with the administration of our criminal laws they should do all the police work for the federal government. But there is nothing in our constitutional law which imposes such work on the provinces, perhaps we may have the right and power to transfer this administration to the provinces, but unless we legislate to that effect the provinces are not concerned. The Fathers of Confederation understood our constitution in that sense, because immediately after confederation, in 1868, they passed the statute to which I have referred constituting the Dominion Police, a statute which is still in force.

The hon. member for Winnipeg complains that we have increased the estimates by $100,000 for special police work to be performed for the various departments. He regards it as an increase because he finds no corresponding reduction in any of the other departments. As I had the honour of explaining to the committee when my estimates were under consideration, reductions were made, not by the other departments, but by the Department of Justice itself. Formerly the expenditures for investigations which we made for the various departments appeared under different headings, those departments reimbursing the Department of Justice. We have changed the system, we do not now ask any of the other departments to pay for any work performed for them by the Mounted Police, and it is for that reason that we have this apparent increase of $100,000.

The hon. member for Winnipeg has brought before the House certain cases, which he mentioned last year when he discussed a similar resolution, to show that the Mounted Police had been unfair to certain citizens in the West and had acted in a way that could not be approved by this House. I cannot contest any of the allegations made by the hon. member, but supposing they are perfectly true—and I have no doubt that they are—this affords no reason for changing the system. If some of our men have abused their power they should be reprimanded or even dismissed, but to say that their action should be sufficient reason to discard our Mounted Police system is a proposition which I cannot accept.

There is one interesting fact in connection with the Mounted Police that I would like to mention. The hon member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) complains that there are too many men in the force. We had a post at Brandon in his province and one at Portage la Prairie. We decided to close both these stations, but immediately after acting upon that decision we received protests from the municipal authorities and from practically the whole population of the districts concerned, who urged that we should send back the men we had there before. I do not know of any province where the people are complaining of there being too many men in the Mounted Police. In the Maritime provinces there are 32 men in the force, and I have not yet heard any citizen of any of those provinces ask that a single one of these men be withdrawn. We have 32 in Montreal, and they are doing good work. Hon. members know what the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are doing in Ontario. I have come to the conclusion, after an experience of one year in the administration of the Mounted Police, that the system we now have is a good one and that we are saving money by having only one police force. If there is objection to the name; if the majority of hon. members are of the opinion that we should not call the force the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, that is a matter of detail. But to say it is in the interests of this country that we should reduce the force very considerably is to make a proposal the soundness of which I cannot admit. If our officers are not diligent; if they are not performing their duties as they should, that is another matter. I must declare that I have found those officers most diligent, intelligent, and honest. But I say that if it can be established to my satisfaction that any one of them should be removed, I am prepared to do it. If any one of our constables is not an honest man, honestly doing his duty. I am prepared to dismiss him. But I must say in all sincerity, with no other interest in the matter than a desire to promote the welfare of our country, that in my opinion we cannot have a better system for our police than the one we now have.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Before the hon. gentleman concludes, would he not admit that the increased numbers of the force following the war was due to the returned men who went from the force and who on coming back were entitled to reinstatement, they being reinstated before others who had been enlisted had served their whole term of enlistment? As those who enlisted in the force during the war have completed their terms of enlistment, it has of course been possible to make the reductions that have been made ever since.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: That is quite possible.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask a question of the hon. Minister of Justice? Did I understand him to say that there was at present no more employment of private agents? If I remember rightly, the public accounts last year showed considerable sums paid out to various detective agencies. Am I right in understanding that no private agents at all are employed?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Some private agents may have been employed, but in very few instances. I say that in the past it was the rule to employ private agents; now it is only occasionally that we do it.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have not been able to follow this debate, but I have heard the address, or most of it, of the hon. Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin). I wish to express my commendation of the courage he has shown in standing by his guns in relation to this resolution. I wish the example he has displayed were more generally followed by his colleagues in other matters connected with the administration.

I only wish to comment on three phases of the minister's address. He commends the action of the government in 1920 in amalgamating the Dominion Police and the Royal Northwest Mounted Police. I think the commendation is well placed, because that action made possible reductions that have since actually taken effect. He also states that it is essential to maintain in Montreal, in the Maritime provinces, in Quebec and Ontario, certain units of the Mounted Police. That I wish especially to draw attention to, and I do so because my memory still is green of attacks on that very policy, attacks on claims that we made when in office that units of the police were essential in those eastern cities and those eastern districts; attacks which the minister now, after experience in the department, finds to have been utterly unfounded and uncalled for. My reference, though, particularly is this: I understood the minister to admit the truth of certain allegations made by the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) that there had been misbehaviour on the part of the Mounted Police in the past or that improper means had been adopted by them. I did not hear the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg, but my recollection of his address a year ago would lead me to believe that his reference was to the conduct of the Mounted Police in connection with the strike situation in Winnipeg in May, 1919. If that is the case, I do not think the Minister of Justice was justified in stating not only that he would not contest the allegation, but, as he said in the following sentence, that he would admit the truth of it.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I did not have the Winnipeg strike in mind at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, I do not know what the reference, then, was. I am sure the House will receive with pleasure the minister's assurance that he did not wish to cast a reflection on the conduct of the police on that occasion. That was an occasion of real difficulty such as had not arisen before, I think, in the history of confederation. It was a difficulty that could not be handled by those quiet, unobtrusive measures that may be satisfactory in normal and gentle times; a difficulty that had to be met in a spirit of determination and of courage—and I think it is correct to say that it was surmounted with surpassing success. If it is stated that there was another occasion when the members of the Mounted Police did not behave according to their tradition and their duty, and the minister really is of opinion that that is true, then it seems to me he owes it to the service to make such facts known to the public, to bring home guilt, and at the same time to administer correction by dismissal.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: If my right hon. friend will allow me, I simply said this: that the allegations made by the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) might be true; that I supposed they were true, since he was making them. But I do not know anything about such allegations.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am very much relieved to hear the minister put it that way. I would suggest that in future his suppositions be not so easily arrived at. In fact, the supposition does not follow. I would be very much surprised myself if the allegations were found to be correct after full and fair investigation.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to take any part in this debate other than to point out to the minister that the Brandon city council suffered an injustice when the Royal Canadian Mounted Police were removed from that city. The city had gone to a large expense in providing equipment, stabling, sewerage and other conveniences for the maintenance of the force, and then the force was suddenly removed and all that equipment and the improvements that had been made were entirely lost. I think the city has really a claim for some recompense for the expenses that were incurred in that connection.

In regard to the vote that was taken last year, I must say that I cannot see my way to following the same course this year. During last year there was considerable outlawry and, as one hon. member has said, banks were being broken into. I know that I appealed to the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin), myself for some help to the local police in the province of Manitoba and he very courteously replied that every assistance would be given by the force that was stationed in the province at that particular time. Taking all these facts into consideration, I cannot see my way to supporting this resolution

Mr. D. W. WARNER (Strathcona): I do not care to enter into this discussion at any length, but I should like to say a few words as we have a station of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police where I live. Last year we had considerable difficulty during a strike by the coal miners, when men who were citizens of Canada and who wanted to work were prevented from working. There was a police force there engaged to see that these people could exercise their right of going to work when they wanted to work. I am not going to enter into a discussion of the difficulties in that case, but I should like to point out this to the House: The people in my community showed a lack of confidence in the provincial police when they pressed for the services of the Dominion Mounted Police to take charge and see that law and order were enforced. I do not know why that force was not permitted to be made use of on that occasion. I have no knowledge of the reasons why that was not done, but I know that I attended several meetings where I was pressed to see that the Dominion Mounted Police were put in charge to look after the difficulties at that place. I should like to ask the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) now why the Dominion Mounted Police were not used on that occasion after they had been asked for by the people of Edmonton.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: The reason why we did not intervene was because we considered the municipal police could maintain peace and order in Edmonton.

Mr. WARNER: I am glad to hear the explanation. As I said before, I wanted to point out to this House the confidence that our people have in the Dominion Mounted Police. We used to call them the Northwest Mounted Police. I know when I went into that country in 1898 we had no fear from any source so long as we felt that the Mounted Police were in charge. They commanded the respect of the people, and still command their respect. I should like to see it made possible for the Dominion Mounted Police force to co-operate with the provincial force when that should be necessary. Our people thought it was necessary at that time. I feel that there is perhaps more or less overlapping between the two police forces, the city police and the provincial. The city police on that occasion had charge of part of the work which was inside the corporation, and the provincial police was supposed to keep order outside, but order was not very well kept. Now if the Dominion police had taken part, I believe that order could have been kept, and that we would have had order at once. That is my opinion from my understanding of the situation. I would like to see it arranged that the Dominion Mounted Police could co-operate with the other two police forces whenever need should arise.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think I have nothing to add to my statement of the case. I would call attention to the fact that the protest of the citizens of Brandon against the taking away of the Mounted Police from that city was, so far as the public is concerned, based very frankly on the fact that they missed a very large pay roll in that particular town. It did not concern itself primarily with the necessity of maintaining the old policy.

If I understood the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) aright, he said that in the western provinces the Mounted 5 p.m. Police were now doing the same work as the old Northwest Mounted Police. Of course so far as Manitoba or British Columbia are concerned, we did not have any Mounted Police in the old days. The kind of work to which most of us have objected is not that taking place in the outlying districts, but rather it is that connected with the industrial communities. I might say that whilst this term "unorganized territories" may be somewhat indefinite, it is the very self-same term that the Prime Minister himself used when intimating that the force was to be reorganized. I used it because I did not want to limit exactly the position which the force was to occupy, whether it was to be entirely outside of provincial boundaries or outside of the municipalities where there was an adequate municipal police force. Purposely I left it general in that way.

In closing I should like to call the attention of the House to the fact that the Minister of Justice accepted my statements, as I think he is bound to do, with regard to certain arbitrary actions of the police several years ago in certain districts of the West. I think the House will recognize that my statements on the floor of this House must stand, and it seems to me, that the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) came very nearly calling them in question. I am quite sure he could not have intended to do it. He confessed that he was not present when the statements were being made. I think I have the right to have my statements of fact go unquestioned when made on the floor of the House.

It seems to me there has been a little bit of tendency on the part of hon. members in this House to rather disparage or ridicule measures submitted by the labour representatives, some hon. members suggesting even to-day that these measures would be welcomed by those who wish to perpetuate lawlessness. It seems to me that the time has come when that kind of thing should cease on the floor of this House. We had industrial and political troubles in 1919. I did not intend, nor do I intend now, to go into that matter here. We had trouble when certain fundamental rights of British subjects were taken away from them by the late government. So far as the city of Winnipeg is concerned, the citizens expressed themselves at the last general election in no uncertain terms. I claim that on the floor of this House we should discuss particular measures on their merits and not enter into controversies as to whether or not somebody has some ulterior motive in proposing them.

With regard to this matter, I have been perfectly frank in suggesting the various economies which I think might well be effected by the proposed change, and also in bringing forward a situation which has been brought to my attention again and again by large numbers of labour people in all sections of this country. I state frankly that the labour people resent the espionage system which has been foisted upon this country. I am glad to think that, to a certain extent, under the present administration the evils of that system are being lessened. I should like to have the assurance of the minister that that kind of thing would entirely cease, because we cannot have industrial goodwill in this country as long as we have a system by which one particular section of the community is under surveillance.

In order that I should conceal nothing I mentioned that among other reasons why I would like to see the activities of the Mounted Police confined to unorganized territories was the abolition of the use of secret service agents in our industrial sections. Many of these men are not of a high character. I know whereof I speak, and if occasion arises I can bring evidence to prove that they are not of a high character. The matter was before the courts several years ago, when it was clearly shown that there was serious interference with a number of citizens of this country. It is for that, among other reasons, that I have proposed this resolution, and I submit that it would be in the interests of the country at large that a reorganization of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police should take place.

Let me remind the House that several of the gentlemen whom I have quoted, who cannot be accused of having any particular sympathy with the lawless elements of this country, very urgently pressed this course upon the country.

The House divided on the motion of Mr Woodsworth which was negatived on the following division:

MINISTERS' SALARIES AND MEMBERS' INDEMNITIES

Mr. HARRY LEADER (Portage la Prairie) moved:

That, in view of the rigid necessity for economy in all walks of public and private life, it is incumbent upon this parliament to give the country a lead in this matter, and therefore, in the opinion of this House the government should take steps to reduce the indemnities and salaries paid to ministers of the Crown, the leader of the Opposition, members of the Senate and members of the House of Commons by 12½ per cent of the present indemnities and salaries.

He said: I had no intention of letting this resolution drop, but it is perfectly obvious that under the present circumstances, in view of the lateness of the hour, it will not come to a vote this afternoon. I understand that according to the rules of the House if the resolution is not voted on by six o'clock it automatically falls to the last place among the motions, and that might involve the danger of its not being taken up again this year. I certainly do not wish to withdraw the resolution, but I fear this danger; and at this stage, although the subject is one of the greatest importance, I will cut my remarks short if the House is willing to let the matter come to a vote.

An hon. MEMBER: Explain.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. LEADER: I am sure that hon. members wish to give me a fair show. I know that this resolution is out of the ordinary. A motion of this complexion is not usual in the House; resolutions of this kind usually ask for an increase in indemnities. That is what we have been used to.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, no.

Mr. LEADER: Back on the farm I always thought it was hardly a square deal when I read of resolutions being introduced into parliament asking for increases in indemnities of $200 or $300. When I hire a man for $50 I do not expect him to ask for $75, after he has agreed to the wage I offer. In proposing this resolution, Mr. Speaker, I hope I have the goodwill of hon. members.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LEADER: I expected that. But if some gentlemen choose to disagree with me I trust that my honesty of purpose will not be questioned and that it will be taken for granted that I am actuated by a desire faithfully to serve those whom I represent.

The necessity for economy and retrenchment is apparent to all hon. members. I believe the government are fairly well seized of the necessity of rigid economy in administration and are working with that end in view. To some extent, however, as I see it, they are handicapped by the taunt, and rightly so, that while they are willing to economize on the other fellow, they still cling to the higher indemnities voted to members and ministers in 1920. Economy is the crying need of the hour. While there are men who by the advantage of birth or sheer ability are not forced by circumstances to curtail their expenditure, the fact remains that the great body of the people are forced to economize.

The Speech from the Throne declared the need for economy. The amendment and the subamendment thereto stressed this need. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I believe that in adopting this resolution we would give a practical demonstration of sincerity in our demand for economy. In my opinion this is the final test. The amount that we would save is perhaps not very large, in fact it is a mere bagatelle as we count money here in Ottawa, but I think the people would rather have a small surplus than a huge deficit.

Briefly, what this resolution means is to cut $500 off the indemnity of each member of this House, $500 off the indemnity of each member of the Senate, and $1,750 off the salary of each minister of the Crown, thereby saving approximately $200,000 a year. But the monetary saving is of the least importance. I maintain that the principle is a very large one and places the government and members in an unassailable position from which to effect economies of a like nature. The burden of salary reductions generally falls upon those who are least able to bear it. Let me illustrate. I remember reading about two years ago an award respecting the wages of men engaged in the packing plants in Chicago. By that award the first class men, those getting the highest wages, were to receive a reduction of 2½ cents an hour; the second class men, those getting lower wages, were to receive a reduction of 5 cents per hour; and the third class men, those in every instance least able to bear the decrease, were to receive a reduction of 7½ cents per hour. I repeat, the burden of reduced wages generally falls upon those least able to bear it.

I would not for a moment reduce the salaries of those who are only receiving sufficient for a decent livelihood, but I would urge upon the government to go after the higher paid officials, for instance, the higher paid judiciary. We all admire and respect very much our Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin), and it is not in a spirit of antipathy towards him that I make these remarks. But I feel that along this line we might perhaps save considerable expenditure. I have extracted some figures from the speech made last session by the hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville (Mr. Lanctot), and I would ask his pardon if I have encroached on his rights; I think not, however. These figures are in reference to a judge who was a Minister of the Crown, and I quote them to show what he received from the public treasury. He received as salary, $78,147.50—

Mr. RINFRET: In how many years?

Mr. LEADER: As a state pensioner—I shall have something to say about pensions—he received $70,893.33. I think there must be added to that two or three years' pension at $4,666.66 per year.

Mr. LANCTOT: He is still living.

Mr. LEADER: And drawing a pension. He received travelling expenses as a judge to the amount of $282.90. While a member of parliament he received in indemnities $40,555. As Minister of Justice he received $76,636.20. For travelling expenses as a Minister of the Crown he received $3,196.25. For trips to Europe during the war he received $9,000. When he came back he was offered a job—that is the way I would put it—as counsel of the Labrador commission and was paid in advance $5,000. I do not know whether he ever started work on this job, but that is the sum he was paid in advance.

Mr. CANNON: Would the hon. member go on the Labrador coast for so small a salary?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

[Mr. Leader.]

Mr. LEADER: The total amount, Mr. Speaker, is $283,711.18. As I stated before, he is still drawing a pension of $4,666.66. I guess he is a good sort of a man, but I do not think the tax-payers should have been called upon to pay him such an enormous sum, nor should they now be called upon to continue his pension. Yet a man who has received nearly $300,000 from the public treasury is still drawing a pension.

I notice in the newspapers that the people of England are sitting up and taking notice of the extravagant expenditure on pensions. And let me say in passing that I hear rumours of the extension of the pension system in Canada to cover our senators. In England an ex-Minister of the Crown has received £2,000 a year, practically $10,000, for the last twenty-two years. In other words, he has received $220,000 out of the English tax-payers, and they are getting up in arms. Four ex-Chancellors of the Exchequer are drawing $10,000 a year in pensions. If we do not watch out we shall be in the same position as the English people in this regard.

Still more striking are the figures that were given in Hansard the other day in reply to a question as to the fees paid a certain lawyer —W. N. Tilley. I believe he lives in Toronto. We find this man drawing a salary of $400 a day for 198 days, and $100 a day for so many days in Toronto, his home, where he spent his Easter vacation. He received over $100,000 from the treasury, and that had to be made up by the tax-payers. I am giving these figures because I believe the general public know absolutely nothing with regard to these expenditures and as a member of parliament I should like to be able to convey the information to them. Mr. Tilley in the course of events, if he is a good party man, will be appointed to the bench, and after serving as a judge for a while he will retire on a pension. He is a very wealthy man. I would vote any day for pensions to the old folks, but I do object to paying pensions to wealthy men who do not need assistance.

Mr. CANNON: How could he get wealthy if he was not paid?

Mr. LEADER: Mr. Speaker, conditions in Canada to-day, while not as bad as in some other countries, are bad enough. We have in western Canada public schools closed for want of funds. Premier Bracken, according to a newspaper report, is authority for the statement that there are $14,000,000 of unpaid taxes in my province of Manitoba. Now a new method is being adopted there to collect taxes. Hitherto the authorities were satisfied to take a man's land or house and sell it for taxes. Now they are going to garnishee the wages of the defaulter. I feel, Mr. Speaker, that owing to these conditions, we should share a little of this burden.

The question arises, then: Is there room for economy in our administration? In that connection let me read an article published in the London Free Press—and this will be my only quotation. I am not fully conversant with the conditions in eastern Canada with which this newspaper comment deals, but they are no doubt similar to those in the West. It says:

> Are we over-governed in Canada? We have only eight to nine million people and yet we have a federal parliament and 9 legislatures. The total population of the Maritime provinces is slightly over a million people and yet they have 3 legislative assemblies, 3 lieutenant-governors, 3 speakers and in all three provinces the paraphernalia of the mother of parliaments. Nova Scotia, in addition to a legislative assembly of 43 members, also has the luxury of an Upper House with 21 members. Prince Edward Island, with a population less than Middlesex county, has all the fuss and feathers of a real parliament. It has a legislature of 30 members, with a sessional indemnity of $500 each, and a cabinet of 8 although only 4 are paid. New Brunswick has a house of 48 members, drawing an indemnity of $1,000 per session, and a premier and 6 cabinet ministers.

Mr. MARTELL: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. LEADER: Yes.

Mr. MARTELL: The other night the hon. member raised a question as to who was the representative of Portage la Prairie. Why not divide the indemnity between the two members concerned?

Mr. LEADER: I may tell the hon. gentleman that I have no doubt as to who represents Portage la Prairie, although some may have. It is evident from the article I have read, therefore, that the impression is abroad that we are over-governed in Canada.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If the hon. gentleman will permit me a question, I wonder if before he leaves his interesting financial details he would give us the expenditure of the Ontario government in law fees during the last few years. My recollection is that it runs to $600,000.

Mr. LEADER: I regret that I cannot answer the hon. gentleman's question. I believe there is extravagance in administration and that we could avoid some of that extravagance. I would like just for a moment to make a comparison of the cabinet of the United States with that of Canada. The United States cabinet comprises ten ministers, each with a salary of $12,000 per year, so that it costs the United States $120,000 for their cabinet. In Canada we have seventeen ministers with salaries of $14,000 a year each, the total cost being $238,000, or almost double what it costs the United States with twelve times as many people.

Mr. CANNON: Is not the difference in number between the United States and Canadian cabinets explained by differences in constitutional status?

Mr. LEADER: That may be, but if the Canadian ministers could show us the surplus that the United States ministers are showing we would be willing to pay them the bigger salary. I am quite sure that the members of the United States cabinet are carrying on their work to the satisfaction of the American people, at the salaries they are receiving.

Mr. MARTELL: Would my hon. friend—

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask hon. members to be fair toward the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. LEADER: Now, let us compare our representation with that of the United States. As I have pointed out, the United States has twelve times as many people as we have. Canada will have 245 representatives in the House of Commons after the next election; the United States has 435 members in its House of Representatives. It is true that the United States indemnity per representative is $7,500 while that of the Canadian representative is only $4,000. But the unit of representation in the United States is 210,000 while in Canada it is a little over 36,000. You can therefore see that we have at least six representatives where the United States has one, and that where it costs us $24,000. at $4,000 per year, the cost to the United States is only $7,500. A comparison could also be made with Australia, where there are 75 representatives with a population 35 per cent less than that of Canada. We might also make a comparison with England, where the unit of representation is 70,000. I think, therefore, it is fairly established that our administration is extravagant. The United States Senate has 96 members, or one senator for every 1,000,000 inhabitants, while the Canadian Senate has about 10 senators for every 1,000,000 people. In Australia I believe they have about half as many senators as representatives, so the comparison with Australia is very striking indeed.

Our administration is too costly; there should be a reduction, and I believe the people generally are waking up to that fact. Nova Scotia last year reduced the sessional indemnity from $1,500 to $1,000. Alberta is also effecting a reduction in indemnity this year; I forget the exact figures, but I believe the reduction is from $2,000 to $1,800. A bill has passed the Manitoba legislature this session reducing the sessional indemnity of members of the legislature from $1,800 to $1,500 per annum. It is evident therefore, that the people are realizing that something must be done along this line, and the purpose of this resolution is to draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that it is our move.

If we accept this cut in our indemnity, we can more than compensate for the loss in money by economy in time. I have been here only a short time, but in my judgment the sessions could be shortened very materially by the co-operation of all groups in expediting the work of parliament. I have no ground for complaint this year; we are moving along much faster than last. For instance, while it took fifteen days to dispose of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne last year, the time occupied this year was only nine days, and no one doubts that the work was just as effectively done. Moreover, the speeches are much shorter and a great deal better. Another reason why I believe we can save time is found in the fact that the hon. member for St. John city (Mr. Baxter), speaking for his party, I presume, declared a willingness to co-operate with the government in an endeavour to save the time of the House. I believe this can be done, and speaking as a farmer I know it would mean a great deal to western members if we could get through our work in time to superintend our seeding operations at home. I would not for a moment suggest a shirking of our responsibility as representatives of the people; I rather suggest that we concentrate on our duties and perform them with the utmost despatch.

I think that the House should accept this resolution. In effecting a reduction of $500 in the sessional indemnity the amputation might be somewhat painful, but we would all feel much better after the operation. I would point out also that it is not money alone that induces men to go into public life; in fact, we get quite the contrary impression as we listen to the speeches of members when they learn that they have been elected to represent the people in parliament. I question if there is an hon. member in this House who did not on the night of his election say something to this effect: "Ladies and gentlemen, from the bottom of my heart I thank you for the honour you have done me." I remember the right hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Meighen), who was the member for Portage la Prairie, when he was assured of his election for the first time, saying to us: "Ladies and gentlemen, this is the proudest moment of my life thus far." It was such a catchy phrase that I used it myself when the occasion arose. I intended to make some further remarks, but I see it is almost six o'clock. I earnestly commend this resolution to the attention of the House and I hope that hon. members will see their way clear to voting for it.

[Mr. Leader.]

On motion of Miss Agnes Macphail, the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the House adjourned without question being put, pursuant to rule.

Thursday, March 15, 1923

The House met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS

Bill No. 73 from the Senate, for the relief of Harriet Ethelwyn Kingsley.—Mr. Rankin.

Bill No. 74, respecting the Montreal Central Terminal Company.—Mr. Rinfret.

REPORTS AND PAPERS

Mr. C. A. GAUVREAU (Témiscouata) presented the first report of the Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Printing.

Report in conformity with the provisions of section 38B (2) of the Civil Service Act, 1918, (as amended by chapter 22 of the statutes of 1921), setting forth the positions in the public service in Canada which have been excluded in whole or in part from the operation of the said Civil Service Act during the year 1922, together with the reasons for such exclusion and the regulations prescribed and approved by His Excellency the Governor in Council for dealing with such positions.—Hon. Mr. Copp.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

DOMINION STOCK YARDS

Mr. McTAGGART:

1. What are the names and dates of appointment of the Dominion Stock yards agents at Prince Albert and Moose Jaw stock yards?

2. Did either of these men see overseas service, and if not, what special qualifications have they that gave them preference over returned soldiers who applied for the positions?

3. Were these appointments made through the Civil Service Commission?

4. If so, why was the returned soldiers preference clause of the Civil Service ignored, when making these appointments?

Hon. Mr. COPP:

1. Prince Albert, D. A. McKenzie, October 14, 1920; Moose Jaw, Charles N. Stetson, February 1, 1923.

2. Neither of these appointees had been on active service overseas. They proved to have the necessary qualifications for the vacant positions which the ex-service men did not possess.

3. Yes.

4. The returned soldiers' preference clause was not ignored. It provides that in order to obtain a preference, the returned soldier candidates must pass the necessary examination. In this instance none of the ex-service candidates passed the examination.

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT RAILWAY GROUP—SALES TAX

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

By a return tabled on February 28, 1923, it appears that goods purchased by the Canadian Government Railway Group (not for resale) were on December 2, 1922, ruled exempt from sales tax on or after May 24, 1922, such railway group comprising in all some fourteen different railways. The ruling was retroactive and exempted purchases on or after May 24, 1922.

1. What was the amount of purchases made by said railway group between May 24 and December 2, 1922 in respect of which the ruling was made, and what was the amount of the sales tax payable thereon?

2. What is the estimated amount of revenue lost by the department under this ruling?

3. Was the former practice under which the sales tax was collected on purchases by railways irrespective of ownership changed owing to alleged insufficiency in the statute or on other legal grounds or as a matter of government policy?

4. If owing to alleged insufficiency of the statute or other legal grounds is it the intention of the government to bring down further and remedial legislation?

Hon. Mr. BUREAU: I should like to be allowed to answer the hon. gentleman by informing him that since the reorganization of the Canadian National Railways, sales tax is being collected from, or paid by all railways. I hope that will satisfy my hon. friend.

BUSINESS PROFITS AND INCOME TAXES

Mr. CANNON:

1. What amount was collected under the Business Profits War Tax Act for each of the following periods; eighteenth of May, 1916, to thirty-first of December, 1916, and for each of the calendar years, 1917 to 1920, inclusive?

2. What amount of Business Profits War Taxes were due and unpaid at the expiration of each of such periods and what was the number of tax payers in arrears at such dates?

3. Were legal proceedings taken against such tax payers prior to 31 December, 1920?

4. If so, what was the number of such proceedings for each of said periods?

5. Were any promissory notes received and held by the department concerned in respect of such taxes?

6. If so, under what provision of the statutes, order in council, or ministerial authority?

7. How many promissory notes were so received and held by the department concerned and what was the total amount of such notes for each of said periods?

8. Were all of such notes paid when due?

9. If not, were legal proceedings instituted?

10. What amount of Business Profits War Taxes were unpaid on the 31 December, 1921, and what was the number of tax payers in arrears on that date?

1. What amount was collected under the Income War Tax Act for each of the following periods: 24 May, 1918, to 31 December, 1918, and for each of the calendar years 1919 to 1921, inclusive?

2. What amount of Income War Taxes were due and unpaid at the expiration of each of such periods and what was the number of tax payers in arrears at such dates?

3. Were legal proceedings taken against such tax payers prior to 31 December, 1921?

4. If so, what was the number of such proceedings for each of said periods?

5. What amount of Income War Taxes were unpaid on 31 December, 1922, and what was the number of tax payers in arrears on that date?

Hon. Mr. FIELDING: As regards these two questions, I am advised that the preparation of the information asked for would involve a large amount of labour and expense and would consume much time. I hope that on further consideration, the hon. gentleman will not desire to press his questions.

GRAND TRUNK ARBITRATION

Mr. BEAUBIEN:

1. What was the amount paid to Mr. Taft in connection with the arbitration of the Grand Trunk securities?

2. Was Mr. Taft paid by the Grand Trunk Railway Company?

3. If not, (a) by whom was he paid, and (b) what amount?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. $75,000.

2. No.

3. (a) By Grand Trunk Shareholders, (b) see answer No. 1.

THE BANK ACT

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance) moved: That the House do to-morrow go into Committee of the Whole to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved that it is expedient to revise the law relating to banking, to continue until the first day of July, 1933, the charters of the several banks to which the provisions of the Bank Act apply, to authorize the payment out of Consolidated Revenue fund of remuneration to auditors for special examinations of the affairs or business of banks which the Minister of Finance may require to be made, and to provide for the charge of fees in connection with the registration of securities taken under the authority of the provisions of the Act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General has been informed of the subject matter of this resolution, and has been pleased to recommend the same to the consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRIVATE MEMBERS' DAY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That on and after Monday the 19th of March instant to the end of the session, government notices and government orders shall have precedence on Mondays and Wednesdays over all business except questions by members and motions for the production of papers.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I do not think the government can desire to take both these days immediately. If the motion carries it means that no more resolutions of private members can be considered at all. The hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Clark) has on the order paper a resolution as respects which he was promised consideration, as I am informed. But if this motion carries that resolution cannot be gone on with.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What motion is that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Indeed, the most important resolutions among the notices of motions have not yet been considered. I refer now first of all to No. 12, the motion of the member for Burrard, which reads:

That, in the opinion of this House, railway rates westward from the prairie provinces should be reduced to an equality with railway rates eastward from said provinces for similar goods and distances.

I should think that one of the private members' days, preferably Monday, should be retained for some little time yet, perhaps two weeks.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): I share the opinions expressed by the leader of the Opposition in this matter. There are on the order paper three or four resolutions dealing with the coal situation, and I think that this House is entitled to the fullest possible opportunity of discussing this question. There are also two or three other resolutions that are certainly of sufficient national importance to warrant this House going into them. After all, we have been sent here for the purpose of presenting to the House and the country the requirements of the various constituencies which we represent, and I do not think it would be wise at this time wholly to abandon private members' day. Perhaps if one day, say Wednesday, were abandoned and Monday retained for a little while until the more important resolutions have been dealt with, it would meet the views of hon. members generally.

Mr. PIERRE F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Montmorency): There is on the order paper a resolution of very great importance, the first one, standing in my name, which proposes the amendment or abrogation of the Bankruptcy Act for the reasons stated in the resolution. On many occasions when the resolution was called I was quite prepared to proceed with it but was requested by certain hon. members who were evidently interested in it, to allow it to stand over until some other day. I should not like the present motion to carry unless I were given a definite assurance that I should be able to proceed with this resolution. I would suggest that the motion of the Prime Minister be amended by striking out the words "on and," so that the motion would read:

That after Monday the 19th of March instant, to the end of the session, government notices and government orders shall have precedence, etc.

This would give me an opportunity to proceed with my resolution.

Mr. J. J. DENIS (Joliette): Under the rules of the House notices of motions by private members have precedence on Mondays and Wednesdays until such time as the government introduces a motion, which is agreed to, to appropriate these two days to itself. It is well known that as far back as confederation—and possibly the system was followed before that time—a fairly reasonable time was allowed to elapse before the government brought in such a motion. When that motion is carried private members' motions can be dealt with only after government business has been disposed of, the result being virtually to debar private members entirely from presenting any resolutions to the House. This year it is my fortune, or misfortune, I do not know which, to have a very important resolution on the order paper. I am anxious to propose that resolution, but if this motion carries I shall be unable to do so. It may be said that I have had ample opportunity to bring it up, but we all know that members have been very busy, and furthermore the resolution that stands in my name is one that calls for considerable preparation. For that reason I have not been prepared to present it sooner. Nor did I think that the government would introduce the present motion as early as they have done. That opinion I based on last year's experience. Last year the session opened on 8th March and it was not until 5th May that the Prime Minister submitted a motion of this kind to take effect on May 15. During that interval private members had an opportunity to proceed with their resolutions twice a week, and I thought that this year an equal length of time would be allowed for the consideration of such resolutions. Last year we had ten weeks after the beginning of the session in which to discuss our resolutions; on the present occasion the motion to do away with private members' day is introduced six weeks after the opening of parliament. I have been asked more than once during this session by members on both sides of the House when I would proceed with my resolution, and I should be sorry if the fact that I had not moved it sooner—and I could not very well have done so—should preclude any discussion of the important subject with which that resolution deals. Now, I have no advice to offer the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), but I may be allowed to quote his own words in regard to the subject matter of his motion. On 8th April, 1920, Right Hon. Sir George Foster moved, on behalf of the government then in power, a motion similar to my right hon. friend's. The leader of the Opposition of that day, the present Prime Minister, strongly opposed the motion on the ground that private members had not had sufficient time to present their resolutions. Sir George Foster, in reply to my right hon. friend, made this statement:

> Always the experience has been that the leader of the government pays particular heed to the plea that has been made, and in good form and with good grace he allows another week. This squares the matter and nearly everybody is satisfied and amiable and complacent. Now, I am quite willing to do that and to give my hon. friend another week, if he will agree to the motion going through in that amended form.

Hansard then reports the present Prime Minister as follows:

> Mr. Mackenzie King: We shall be thankful for small mercies if we cannot get anything better.

Now, I am asking to-day only for a small mercy in the shape of another week at least. I would move therefore that the motion be amended by substituting for the words "the 19th" the words "the 26th," which would give us the whole of next week in which to bring forward private resolutions.

Mr. J. A. CLARK (Burrard): The suggestion of the last speaker (Mr. Denis) may be all right so far as he is concerned, but for those of us whose resolutions happen be in the tenth or twelfth place it gives rise to difficulties. In my case I have been quite prepared to go on. I put my resolution on the order paper early in the session but have not had an opportunity to proceed with it. And I may say that the Acting Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) assured me that I should be given an opportunity to take the matter up; he said he would see that I got that opportunity. I cannot see, however, how he can carry out that undertaking if private members' day is abandoned. I therefore strongly advocate the retention of private members' day at least once a week for a reasonable period in order that hon. members may have a chance to clear up the resolutions that were placed on the order paper in the early stages of the session.

Mr. Gauvreau and Mr. Johnston having risen together:

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Johnston.

Mr. J. FRED JOHNSTON (Last Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I find myself in about the same position as the hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Clark). While I have little sympathy for hon. gentlemen whose resolutions have been repeatedly called and allowed to stand, I am not in that position. The resolution standing in my name was reached on the evening of 5th March, and at the direct request of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), who was leading the House at the time, I agreed to allow it to stand over. I took it from his statement that I would be given an opportunity to present my resolution at a later date. I hope the government will set apart a day for the discussion of what, as the Minister of Finance pointed out at the time, is a very important matter, and under the circumstances I think it would not be fair that we should be debarred from dealing with this resolution.

Mr. C. A. GAUVREAU (Temiscouata): Now I have my chance.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would assure the hon. member that there is no ill will against him on the part of the Speaker. The rules of the House must be applied, and the practice is that when one hon. member speaks on his side of the House two other hon. members from the two groups sitting on the other side are entitled to follow.

Mr. GAUVREAU: I bow to your decision, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate that those on the Conservative side should have a chance, too. I must protest in the strongest manner against postponing the motion of the Prime Minister. All the private members' resolutions were called I do not know how many times—and I am here every day, even Saturdays and Sundays.

Mr. BUREAU: That is zeal.

Mr. GAUVREAU: I think it has been customary in the past for the Prime Minister to fix a date for the discussion of any motion that is very important. If we want to go home before the end of the summer it is time to curtail these motions. Most of them are absolutely nonsensical.

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (George Etienne Cartier): Mr. Speaker, I agree largely with the last words which dropped from the lips of the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Gauvreau), with the qualification that I do not think they have any application to my own motion. This naturally is a resolution of the most important character and I should not like to have discussion on it choked off by this sudden motion presented by the Prime Minister. I understand that at the present moment it comes in the nature of what is known as a feint attack; there is not really any intention of pressing it, but it is notice given to private members that motions on the order paper will have to be proceeded with in due time. If I am mistaken and the motion is intended seriously, I must make a plea for my own resolution, which refers to Hindu franchise, one of the most important matters on the order paper.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (North Toronto): Mr. Speaker, not 10 per cent of the time taken up with private members' motions has been devoted to motions presented by hon. members in this quarter of the House; most of the time has been devoted to resolutions introduced by the Progressives on purely academic questions. I have a resolution on the order paper, No. 11, in which ninety per cent of the people of Canada are vitally interested. I have had many representations from municipalities and other public bodies requesting me to bring this matter to the attention of the House, but so far I have had no opportunity to do so. The resolution was called one day, but I could not proceed because the Prime Minister had arranged to give another motion precedence. I should like an early prorogation, but I do urge on the Prime Minister that he set apart an afternoon or an evening for the discussion of this very important question. I think it is only fair to the government that the country should know what it has been doing, and that an opportunity should be given for hon. members to present constructive suggestions on how to avoid a repetition of the disastrous conditions which have prevailed this winter through the lack of an adequate supply of fuel—conditions which will be still more disastrous next winter unless we take proper measures to ensure an adequate supply of coal.

[Mr. Bureau.]

Mr. W. C. GOOD (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I hope that the Prime Minister will accede to the request made by a number of members to extend the time for another week for the discussion of private members' resolutions. There are a number of very important resolutions on the order paper, and I am sure hon. members generally will be very much disappointed if we do not reach some of them. If the Prime Minister does not consent, I hope that the amendment offered will be voted on, for I shall certainly vote for an extension of another week.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, if I may be allowed, I should like to make a suggestion. After an extensive experience in the House I have come to the conclusion that the government would be well advised, if they would avoid this annual discussion, to amend the rules to the effect that when a motion has been called for a third time, and not proceeded with, it be dropped from the order paper. The circumstances quoted by the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. Denis) apply in every case—the government of the day finds itself generally obliged to give one week longer for the discussion of private members' resolutions at the request of various members who have resolutions standing in their name on the order paper. Of the resolutions now on the order paper notices of nine were given in January, and they have all been called since then; twelve in February, and seven this month. These resolutions would all have been proceeded with if their sponsors had been ready. The only exceptions are one or two in regard to which an arrangement was made with the government to take them up on a special date. Therefore I think the only course open to the government to avoid this recurring trouble is to amend the rules in the manner I have suggested.

Mr. T. G. McBRIDE (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, although I have a resolution on the order paper, I think the time of this House has already been taken up sufficiently by hon. members speaking longer than they had any right to do. I am quite prepared to waive my right. Let us get down to business. I am fully prepared to support the Prime Minister's motion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I need hardly say that the government has no motive in presenting this motion other than to expedite the business of parliament. There is no desire to deprive hon. members of any of their privileges. But I do submit, there is very much force in what has been said about the number of times that many of these resolutions have been called, and it is hardly fair to the House as a whole that the business generally of parliament should be delayed in order that hon. members who have not taken advantage of their turn when it came should have this further extension of time. However, the government, I need hardly say, has no desire to press this motion unless it is going to carry, and from the discussion which has taken place I gather that possibly it is the consensus of opinion that some further extension of time should be granted—one day possibly, certainly not more than two days. If it would meet with the general approval of the House I would be prepared to amend the motion by changing the 19th to the 26th, thus allowing an additional week.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Hon. Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): Mr. Speaker, I am not at all sure that would meet the situation. I quite agree with my right hon. friend that a lot of these motions have been called many times, but I do not think the time of the House has been wasted in consequence; if I remember rightly, we went on with estimates and made considerable progress. Usually, private members' days are taken because the government has some real object in view; that is, there is government business that the House is seized of waiting to be done, and suffering by delay. I see no such business on the order paper at the present time. The government list is not at all long, and we have not any bills down that I know of. The Bank Act amendment bill has not been distributed yet. Speaking generally we have really had no government business outside of estimates. We usually hear about the budget speech before this motion is made; this year we have not heard a word as to the approximate date when the budget will be brought down. Yet the privileges of hon. members are to be taken from them. We do not want to delay progress, but I would point out that motion No. 11, in the name of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church), deals with the question of the coal supply. That is not an academic question; it is a matter of immediate importance, and an opportunity for its discussion should be afforded. If we are to have only two more private members' days, it means that the debate on the resolution respecting the Senate will take up the whole of one day, one other motion will take up the next day, and the motion with respect to the coal supply will not be reached. We know how futile these resolutions respecting the Senate are. If the government can assure us that the motion on coal will be dealt with, that meets the case so far as I am concerned.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the subject to which my hon. friend has just referred was considered at some length in the course of another debate in the House, and doubtless in other connections it may come up again. It is reasonable to expect that we can rely on the good judgment of those who have resolutions on the order paper not to take up too much of the time of the House in dealing with them. If hon. members will be seized of what appears to be the general wish they will be short in their speeches and not devote more time than is necessary to their resolutions. Certainly any resolutions in respect to which there has been an understanding should be taken up; where the suggestion has been made that they be held for consideration later, it would be desirable to arrange that they be dealt with. Apart from that, however, it seems to me that if an additional week is given, involving an additional two days for members' resolutions, that would meet the situation. I would like to move, therefore, with the permission of the House, to substitute "26th" for "19th" and to present the motion in that form.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have no objection to the resolution being amended, but I am opposed to it as amended, because there will not be time for reasonable discussion of important resolutions. This, I think, is the earliest that this motion has ever been pressed —I speak only from recollection; I have not checked the dates—and it is done in a session in which the government business has been expedited the most. That is to say, there has been on the part of hon. members less delay of government business than I have ever seen in this parliament. Not only has there been nothing in the way of obstruction, but every facility has been given for reasonable progress, and the progress has been rapid, in a session when there is less government business than there has been, perhaps, in any session for years. There are only the estimates, and there is a bill regarding combines; what else is there? There are two others that are being considered by committees, but that is all we have this session. It is true that if a motion is called and passed by, and the House has then to adjourn, time is lost, but if the House simply gets to another resolution that is disposed of, or if it gets to government business, time is not lost; and that has been the practice this session.

Two additional days for private resolutions will not enable the House to reach the motion of the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Clark), the motion of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church), or the motion of another hon. member who sits opposite. In the two days we can get through with perhaps the first and second only, at least with nothing more than appears on the first page. To have the motion carry as with the proposed amendment means wiping out everything beyond the first three or four motions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am very anxious to meet the wishes of hon. members, though it is a little difficult to oblige my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) in everything. In his first remarks on the subject he said that if the government would give two more Mondays he would be satisfied.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Two weeks, I said.

Mr. BUREAU: Two Mondays.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I meant to say two weeks, but two Mondays would be a great deal better than a Monday and a Wednesday. In fact, one Monday is as good as about three Wednesdays.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my right hon. friend will agree to two Mondays I am prepared to amend the resolution in that form. I think that ought to suit us all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will agree to two Mondays and a Wednesday.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think if hon. members will look at Hansard they will see that what I said was two weeks.

Mr. BUREAU: If Hansard has not been corrected since, it was two days.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, Hansard has not been corrected—at least, not by me.

Mr. BUREAU: I am willing to leave it to Hansard, then.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What I had in mind was that two weeks would be necessary, that is, two Mondays and two Wednesdays. I am not speaking for anybody in respect of motions except hon. members of this group; there are others just as much interested and whose rights are just as clear as ours. And what does the government want? They will get through in plenty of time; I do not know what their object can be. We shall have a very short session, with very little done, and all these matters will have to wait over for another session.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. BUREAU: It is an occasion of rejoicing to hear that statement with respect to a short session.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I suggest that the motion read, "after Monday the 26th."

Mr. GRAHAM: That will give you two Mondays and a Wednesday.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Strike out the words "on and" in the first line and substitute "26th" for "19th."

The SPEAKER: The motion as amended will read as follows:

That after Monday the 26th of March instant, to the end of the session, government notices and government orders shall have precedence on Mondays and Wednesdays over all business except questions by members and motions for the production of papers.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

EASTER ADJOURNMENT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. A. BOYS (South Simcoe): I would like to ask the Prime Minister if he would intimate to the House the intention of the government regarding the Easter adjournment. I have seen notices in the press of a somewhat extended adjournment, and I am asked questions from time to time by members interested but cannot give them any information. It is necessary that they make their appointments and secure their reservations without delay, and I shall be glad if the Prime Minister could tell us when the adjournment will take place and what its duration will be.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): In the matter of the Easter adjournment the wish of the government would be, as in these other matters, to ascertain what suits the convenience of the House as a whole. The adjournment will be from Wednesday the 28th of March; the 29th, I understand, is a holiday. The government had thought that if adjournment were taken from that date over the following week, until the 9th of April, that would probably best suit the convenience of hon. members. It would permit those who are from the West to go to their homes and give opportunity for consideration during the Easter recess of matters which may come up afterwards for discussion in the House. We cannot hope to please every individual member, but speaking generally, if it meets with acceptance the government proposes that arrangement.

Mr. T. G. McBRIDE (Cariboo): I think the people from the West out in British Columbia should get some consideration. We are down here and have to stay here until the session is over. What are we going to do during these ten days when the House takes recess? I think there are a great many of us who want to get through the business of the House and get home as early in the season as possible, and I do not see why we should close down that long. I would say not more than four or five days at the outside.

THE BUDGET

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps I might facilitate the business of the House by asking the Minister of Finance what is the date fixed for the budget?

Mr. FIELDING: I would not like to deprive my hon. friend of the opportunity of repeating that question another day.

WEDNESDAY EVENING SITTINGS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. GAUVREAU: May I ask the Prime Minister when the government intends to start Wednesday evening sittings?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would not want to suggest next Wednesday, but I think after the Easter recess we might take Wednesday evening.

ALBERTA COAL

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. GARLAND: I wish to ask the government if a communication has been received from the Alberta branch of the Canadian Institute of Mining and Metallurgy asking for appointment of a federal committee consisting of a mining engineer, a freight expert, and a business expert, to report upon the feasibility of shipping Alberta coal into Ontario? And, what is the intention of the government in the matter?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): A communication was received in my office two or three days ago from a committee of that organization. I have not yet had time to present it to the government.

Mr. JAMES LARKIN

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. WOODSWORTH: According to press reports, Mr. James Larkin has been refused admission into Canada. May I ask the government on what grounds such action is taken?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have no knowledge of the gentleman mentioned having been refused admission into Canada. The matter has not come to my notice before.

SUPPLY

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Royal Candian Mounted Police—salaries, $37,225; contingencies, $9,000.

Hon. Sir LOMER GOUIN (Minister of Justice): This is practically the same amount as last year; there is a decrease of $37.50.

Item agreed to.

IMMIGRATION AND COLONIZATION

Immigration outside service—salaries, $700,000.

Mr. JACOBS: I do not know that I can preface my remarks on the question of immigration now before the House, in a better way than by reading to the Committee an editorial from the Montreal Star of Tuesday, February, 13, 1923. It is very short, and I trust that the members of the Committee will bear with me while I put it on Hansard;

51st Month

It is now fifty months since the armistice. The cessation of war should have been Canada's golden opportunity to increase her population.

Australia and New Zealand seized the opportunity and are benefiting enormously, adding huge capital accretion to the national assets. Canada with folded arms has stood still. The old coalition government attempted nothing, did nothing and did'nt want to do anything. The Liberal government has shut its eyes to the situation, permitted the waste of time of enormous value, then attempts to propitiate the public by promises that mean nothing but delay and suggest nothing but cowardice in dealing wtih the greatest problem that ever confronted the Canadian people.

If the Liberals are to be as inert as the Conservatives or Coalitionists, our country will never take its natural place amongst progressive nations. This Dominion needs a saviour. Its best interests have been neglected.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There has one come now.

Mr. JACOBS: Does the hon. gentleman refer to me? I should not be the first of my race that acted as such.

I was glad to note from the remarks of the Acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Stewart) that he did not dignify the proposition which he brought down on Wednesday last by the name of a policy. We have no policy before this country in the matter of immigration. During the tenure of office of the Union government, and later of the National Liberal and Conservative government—as I think they called themselves—nothing was done at all, absolutely nothing; and it gave me a splendid opportunity to make attacks from time to time upon the ineptitude of that government, and I took occasion to predict that when our party came into power the fog and miasma, if I may call it such, of Unionism would yield to the sunshine of Liberalism.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Before the hon. gentleman gets to that much more appropriate subject, will he tell the House the actual number of immigrants secured during the time he is complaining of?

Mr. JACOBS: I do not think the number of people who came into the country during that period is a fair test of the immigration which was received, because the war held up for a number of years a large number of people who were in Europe, from coming to this country. I do not think it is quite fair that the Union government should claim that all these people who came back including even the soldiers, should be looked upon as regular immigrants.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is none of that kind claimed at all, and the records do not include them. The records only include immigrants who are immigrants, that is, those who have come for the first time to settle in this country. The hon. gentleman knows that. There is none in the House knows it so well.

Mr. JACOBS: If they came in, they came in notwithstanding the protest of the government. I had myself a great deal to do in bringing some of them in. In any event we expected nothing from that government, and we got what we expected. But at the present moment when we have here, in "the seats of the mighty," on the treasury benches a galaxy of all the talents of the Liberal party, I must express my surprise and my astonishment that we are simply following in the way of the Philistines,—nothing is being done at all. We have a commercial proposition put before us: We are going to go into partnership with a company known as the Canada Colonization Association—

An hon. MEMBER: No, no.

Mr. JACOBS: —a company which has no president so far as I know, and has no general manager. It is a company which shows its astuteness in many ways worth while. As I understand it they have received large sums of money through the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. I believe a call was made on members of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association to give their support, in a monetary sense, to this organization. Each member of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association was invited to contribute according to the number of men in his employ to this patriotic movement. In that respect, as I say, they show a considerable degree of commercial ability. To extract large sums of money from the members of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association is in itself no mean feat.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Can the hon. member inform the House exactly how much was extracted from this association?

Mr. JACOBS: Well, it is rather difficult to find out how much money the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and its members contributed to the public weal; I am not in a position to say. I do know, however, that a call has been made throughout the country for support for this patriotic scheme and—

Mr. CHAPLIN: The hon. gentleman said that an assessment has been levied. What proof has he of that?

Mr. JACOBS: I have the statement from a member of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association who was asked to contribute $15,000 to this scheme, that is, in proportion to the number of people whom he employed; and he said he promptly ushered to the door the gentleman who applied. I do not know whether the hon. member himself has contributed any such sum as that. He would probably know and I am sure we would be glad to learn from him what the amount was.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I can tell the hon. gentleman, not one cent. The hon. gentleman said that a levy was made. I object to that statement. I do not think it is true, and I do not think it can be substantiated.

Mr. JACOBS: I did not mean to convey the impression that a levy was made, it was just a friendly application to members who felt that this was a worthy object. Well, after this work was concluded we find that the president of this colonization association, Sir John Willison, retired precipitately from the presidency—why, I do not know. The minister in discussing this matter the other day did not give any information to the House as to why this organization, which will have hundreds of thousands of dollars of the money of the people of Canada, has no president. That is something, I think, which the country itself would like to be enlightened about. Without a president they nevertheless went on—probably they found that they could get along as well without a president; it may be they felt that it would be better for their purposes if they jettisoned Sir John Willison. They came before the Department of Immigration and secured $100,000, with the understanding that they would obtain 200 families to settle on the land. Well, 200 families do not seem to be a very large number when we consider that during last year as many as 10,000 people have left the farms and towns of Canada in one month to go to the United States. In any event we are to be out our $100,000. I am not complaining particularly about that phase of it: "Any port in a storm;" "A drowning man will grasp at a straw." The minister had no policy at all to bring before the government, he felt that anything was better than nothing; and when the Canadian Colonization Association showed up he looked upon them as friends of his because, to a certain extent, they helped him out of the situation in which he found himself just previous to the meeting of parliament.

I want to say this, Mr. Chairman, before going very much further: I feel like the father who was about to chastise his child—it pains me more than it does the child. It is not a very pleasant matter for me, a Liberal of many years standing, to get up and snipe my party and the minister from my seat in the House. But this is something that transcends party, this is a national problem. I feel very strongly upon this question of immigration. I have discussed immigration ever since I came into the House. I have delivered what I might claim to be my annual address on this subject to the House ever since 1918. So far my words have fallen on deaf ears; I am a voice in the wilderness. But I trust that in time the government will see that this is a matter which vitally affects every person in this Dominion, and that unless we awake to the seriousness of the situation we may find ourselves before long in the shades of opposition—I was going to say, which we will fill so acceptably, but which we did fill for an entire decade. We will find that our kingdom will have been taken from us, and that some persons considered more worthy to reign in our stead will be occupying the government benches.

Mr. FORKE: Look over this way please.

Mr. JACOBS: I want to tell my hon. friend the leader of the Progressives (Mr. Forke) that if he is prepared to accept my policy on the immigration question, I will go over to his side of the House and support him on that question. In fact, in order to show how seriously I look upon this matter, I would go so far as to join the Labour group in the other part of the chamber if I found they would do something for immigration.

This whole question of immigration has become acute, Mr. Chairman, owing to the conditions which have been brought about in the United States through the closing of their doors to immigration of all kinds. Ever since the American government put the three-per-cent quota into effect we have been suffering from it, and I will tell you why: The United States, for over a hundred years, have had their doors open to immigration. They have received vast numbers of immigrants of all kinds, of all classes, from Europe, and they have incorporated them into their nation and made men out of them. Suddenly the door is closed. People who have been accustomed to receiving hundreds of thousands of workmen find that they cannot get them any longer, and where do they turn? They turn to the north, and in that way our people are being drawn off the farms and from the cities in order to supply the demand for people in the United States. That is why 10,000 people a month are leaving our country and going to the United States where they are attracted by very large wages. I am told that in some of the border cities of the United States carpenters receive from $12 to $20 a day as wages. How is it possible for us to keep our people in this country when they are attracted by such enormous wages on the other side of the line? We in our unwisdom felt that what is good enough for the United States is good enough for us, and we put up the bars in almost the same sense as the people of the United States. We carefully scrutinize, we microscopically examine every workman who wishes to come into this country to take the place of those who go to the United States. That is why our people are being attracted from the farms and from the cities in Canada to the larger fields in the country to the south. Now, if the minister would realize what is going on he probably would not, with a mere wave of the hand, tell us that in this country there is no room for artisans, no room for city labour, but that what we have to do is to concentrate our energies on settling people on the land.

I point this out to the minister. As soon as we have those people located on farms, they find that things, particularly in the West and, in fact, throughout Canada, in the farming line, are not what they were led to believe, and they flock into the cities in order to obtain the larger wages which are given to all classes of labour in the cities.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): Higher wages and shorter hours.

Mr. JACOBS: Yes, the glare of the gaslight, the movies, and the general social life in the cities. That is what attracts people from the farms. I venture to predict that if you colonize the West within the next three or four years with half a million farmers, it will be a question of only a very short time when a large body of those people will find their way into the cities, on the principle that if you place two bales of hay in front of a donkey, the animal will make for the larger bale of hay. Why do people go into farming? Because they feel they can make a living. They leave the farms because they feel they can do better in the cities. A farmer who makes $1,500 or $2,000 a year on the farm, working himself, his wife and his children from five o'clock in the morning until sundown or even late at night, is entitled to something more than $1,500 or $2,000. But if that farmer, his wife and his entire family were to locate in a city, they could make twice that amount of money, with shorter hours, better conditions and a better social life.

My suggestion to the minister is that at the time when he is seeing to it that people are placed on the farms, he should also see to it that vacant positions in the cities are filled by people who are accustomed to live in the city. In that way, the farmers will not be attracted to the cities, because the positions there will be taken up. But if you have a vacancy in one place and place an opportunity for leaving in another, it is only natural that the vacancies will be filled particularly if it is found more profitable to fill them. If you make farming pleasant and profitable, and if you surround it with all the advantages which life in this country can give, you will attract people to those farms and those waste places. At the same time, if you see to it that positions in the cities are filled by city dwellers, then you have solved the problem. But nothing of the kind is being done, and the reason of it is that, as our dear old friend Sir Sam Hughes used to say in this House: "There is an unseen and hidden hand somewhere that is arresting the progress of the government." He liked to dwell on the unseen hand.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Would the hon. member be so kind as to deprive the farmer of an opportunity of bettering his condition by going into the city, by bringing in a considerable number of men to fill up the cities?

Mr. JACOBS: The question is one of the survival of the fittest. I am looking after the interest of the country as a whole, not after that of any particular farmer. I believe the farmer in the end is very much happier on the farm than when he comes into the city. He does not see the thing in that way; but after a while, after it is too late, he comes to realize that he should never have left the farm.

[Mr. Jacobs.]

Mr. BEAUBIEN: How could the farmer be so happy when the hon. member has mentioned all the social conditions that exist in the cities and the very different conditions on the farm?

Mr. JACOBS: The farmer must work out his own salvation in that regard.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: The hon. member, then, is trying to work out the salvation of the country.

Mr. JACOBS: It must be made profitable for the farmer to live on his farm. His freight rates must be reduced to such a figure that he can actually live on the farm. I am not altogether a free trader yet; I have not been converted to that school of thought; but we must reduce, to a certain extent, the tariff on his agricultural implements, his implements of production, and do other things of that kind.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): To what extent—two and a half per cent?

Mr. JACOBS: I shall be glad if my hon. friend will come to my room to-morrow, when we can discuss the whole matter fully, and I am sure we shall arrive at a conclusion which will be satisfactory to us both. We have been told that we are going to have farm labourers brought to this country. That is one of the planks in the platform, if I may so call it, of the department. Would the Acting Minister of Immigration tell me what he is going to do with farm labourers if there are no farms? The farmers are scarcely able to maintain themselves on their farms, working with their own families. How then are they going to pay farm labourers if farming is not profitable? Farming is a seasonal occupation. The farm labourer is used for the seeding and for the harvest, and at the end of that time there is, in a general way, not very much work for him to do. He accordingly finds his way into the city. He is not accustomed at first to doing anything else and he forms a queue for the soup kitchen and the bread line, when unemployment is rife, because it is this class of people not accustomed to city life and who do not know how to cast about when times of stress come on, who are filling up our cities and who create the unemployment question. They are the very first people who come into the cities to swell the tide of unemployment.

Then we are going to bring in female domestic servants. I ask the Minister of Immigration how long he thinks a female domestic is going to be employed in service at $20, $25 or $30 a month, when that young woman can go into a factory and get twice that salary with reasonable hours of living, eight hours a day, and instead of receiving $5 or $6 a week, she perhaps receives $30, $35, or $40 a week. How long can you keep such women in domestic service? Why not say to them: "Come into the country; look about for yourselves. If you want domestic service, enter domestic service. If you want to enter factories, enter factories." But to have watertight compartments such as are sought to be built by the minister, in which it is declared that this person must go into this service and that person into that, is a mistake; it is against the law of nature and all economic law and it will never succeed. The result will be that we shall always be without domestic servants and without farm labourers, and these people will be filling the factories where they can secure large wages.

I have spoken about the hidden and unseen hand. I should like to read to the committee something which will show the African in the woodpile. This is a despatch from Ottawa, dated January 28, and headed:

Tom Moore fears cheap labour here. Immigration policy would open the door to it, he says.

The despatch reads:

Ottawa, January 28.—Speaking here Saturday night, Tom Moore, president of the Dominion Trades Congress, expressed his views on the Canadian immigration policy. An analysis of a statement made by Sir Edmund Walker showed that the immigration policy was really the opening of the door to admit cheap labor, Mr. Moore contended.

While it has been said that Canada wanted settlers for the land, the lid was being lifted by prominent financial men who wanted more settlers to reduce the labor costs, and Mr. Moore urged that the admission of all classes of immigrants would not be beneficial to Canada, for if cheap labor was allowed in to compete with the established citizens, living conditions could not be ameliorated. The speaker reviewed the achievements of organized labor in Canada, stating that great difficulties had been surmounted and the lot of the workingman greatly improved.

I should like to say a word or two in regard to that. In passing, I might say that this gentleman is now a director of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. HANSON: Who appointed the gentleman?

Mr. JACOBS: I do not think that requires any answer. When this gentleman spoke I rather fancy he spoke as president of the Trades and Labour Council and not as a director of the Canadian National Railways. I do not know whether he has yet converted Sir Henry Thornton to his views, but there is room for conversion, because the last time I heard Sir Henry Thornton speak he was in favour of a strong and vigorous immigration policy not restricted to the farms. I must express regret that a director of the National Railways should declare himself on matters of this kind. It is not fair to the country; it is not fair to those interests that are advocating a proper immigration into Canada; and by reason of the fact that he is a director of the Canadian National Railways, what he says carries more weight probably than it otherwise would. This man is a paid official of the Trades and Labour Council. He is a sort of glorified walking delegate. He is paid for this purpose, and it is his duty to keep wages as high as possible if he thinks that will enure to the benefit of labour generally. But I must express the fear that Mr. Moore, occupying the high position that he does, is not very much of an economist. He ought to know that where wages are inflated as they are now everything is proportionately dear. For instance, the labourer who pays $40 to $45 a month for his dwelling, which is really worth only $15 or $20, pays the higher rate because he cannot obtain dwellings at any lower figure, the reason being that we do not permit people to come into this country to build houses. There is a scarcity of builders in Canada. You cannot get people to build because they are all going to the United States to get the high wages to which I have referred. So that, although the labourer gets $45 or $50 a week for his work, it is, I venture to say, materially less in reality than the $20 he got before the war. Let us look at the situation. The farmer has already undergone the deflation process. He is obliged to sell his products at 60 to 70 cents in the dollar, but is obliged to pay for the commodities he has to buy, such as manufactured products, not 100 cents, but 150 cents, in the dollar. Why? Because we are obliged to pay labourers more than they are worth. And if you do not cut down the prices of commodities by reducing wages, how is it possible for the farmer ever to get on? It cannot be done. Deflation must take place equally and equably all along the line. But where there is this lop-sided deflation you are bound to suffer as you are suffering now in the West. So that Mr. Moore does not understand the economic situation at all; he is killing the goose that lays the golden eggs. We cannot very much longer stand the conditions that are now prevailing. You pay for your clothing, your boots and shoes, and everything that you need more than twice what you paid for them before the war, but you are getting for your products just the same as you got at that time. And that is going to go on so long as we do not get the cost of labour reduced to the same proportion as the prices of farm commodities.

Mr. CARROLL: Does the hon. member say that we should have lower wages in this country?

Mr. JACOBS: I am saying that we ought to have the same ratio of wages for labourers as the farmer gets for his products. The present condition is ridiculous. What is the use of getting $50 a week wages when you have to pay it all out for your upkeep?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Does the hon. gentleman not think that it would be better for us all round if, instead of reducing the wages of labour to what the farmer receives for his work, we raised the farmer's returns in keeping with what labour receives?

Mr. JACOBS: The hon. gentleman ought to know that the prices of farmers' commodities are fixed in the world's market. Liverpool fixes the prices for farm produce; they are not fixed in Canada. You are confronted with the Argentine, with Russia—at least you will be faced with Russia shortly if not now—with Italy and every other producing country in the world; and it is idle for us to say that we can fix prices here. We tried to fix prices through a Board of Commerce and we know what happened. It cannot be done; Nature must take its course; and I leave this thought with hon. gentlemen of the committee, trusting that they will see that there is something in the argument I have tried to make.

Mr. KELLNER: I think that if you reduced the wages of the working man you would decrease his buying power and the farmer would consequently get less for what he sells.

Mr. JACOBS: How could a reduction in the wages of the labourer decrease his buying power if there were a deflation all round? If he gets, say, $30 a week for his labour and has to pay $10 or $12 for a pair of boots for each of his children, himself and his wife, $40 or $50 for his suit of clothes, and $40 a month for rent, supposing he got half that amount in wages, how could his buying power be reduced if all these other expenses were proportionately lowered?—if he paid $20 a month for his house, $20 for a suit of clothes, $5 for boots, and so forth. After all, what is money? It is simply purchasing power; considered in any other light it is nothing. And if the labourer could purchase with $25 exactly what he can get under present conditions for $50, wherein is his purchasing power reduced?

[Mr. Jacobs.]

Mr. KELLNER: Does the hon. gentleman advocate a simultaneous reduction all round, or is the workingman's wages to be reduced first?

Mr. JACOBS: I am now advocating the bringing in of people and letting them fend for themselves. If we had 100,000 persons brought into this country at the present time, does the committee not see how the wheels of commerce would be accelerated? We should have to have dwellings for these people, they would have to be set up in business, and everybody would be doing something until they got to work and produced for themselves. We have more than enough in this country for every one who wants to come and work. But through the narrow-sighted policy of our governments we have interfered with the natural laws governing immigration and we find ourselves therefore in the present deplorable condition. Someone the other evening referred to the alleged lowering of the standard of living. May I refer the member who introduced that question to an address of Sir Clifford Sifton delivered in Montreal on February 26 in which he speaks of the standard of living. He is reported as follows:

"Criticism is made," said Sir Clifford, "that these people have not as high a standard of living as our own people have. A lot of nonsense is talked on that score. They will have the standard of living of pioneers, and what they can get out of the soil. You cannot get the higher standard of living out of that soil I speak of, and you must get the man who will be satisfied with what he can get from it if you are going to settle it.

"That standard of living would probably be as good as that of the men who were the pioneers of Ontario and Quebec. My own ancestors were Ontario pioneers, and they did not worry about standards of living, but cleared the land, and when they had time they built schools and churches and otherwise laid the foundations for the present conditions. They suffered hardships, but they made a prosperous Christian community, and turned out men whose names have become household words in the history of Canada.

Now, with regard to the complaint that we have unemployment so extensively at the present time that it would be dangerous to bring more people in, I would say that this is one of the stock arguments of our friends who wish to repress immigration into our cities. In this connection I may cite a report of a debate in the Ontario legislature on February 13th. I quote the heading as well as the report itself:

Plenty of work on Ontario farms: $35 to $40 a month and board; farmer can't give more. Must get men.

"There is plenty of employment in Ontario but unfortunately there are a considerable number of men who are not in a position to take advantage of the opportunities of employment offered," said Premier Drury yesterday in the House.

It was an interesting discussion bringing out a sharp difference of opinion as to whether there was an unemployment problem or not. Several labor members claimed that there was a pressing problem of men out of work and quoted a recent return that ten thousand people were unemployed.

Minister of Agriculture Doherty, on the other hand, while admitting there were people without jobs, explained that about thirty applications a day were being received by his department from farmers seeking farm help and it was imposible to supply this demand.

The debate started when K. K. Homuth (South Waterloo) read from the Liverpool Echo an interview given by S. Harris, of the Canadian Army and Navy League, that there was no unemployment in Canada at present except those who would not work. He contended that there was unemployment and people should not be encouraged to come to Canada at the present time. "There are a great number of farmers," said Sam Clarke (West Northumberland) "who would be tickled to death"—

The words are his, not mine.

—to get men who could do the work at $40 to $50 a month and their board. But they cannot get them. There will be a 20 per cent shortage of labour on the Ontario farms by April 15. People can get any amount of work out in the country and if the people would only realize that $2 a day in the country is as good as $4 a day in the city, and keep away from the cities, there would be no unemployment.

G. G. Halcrow (Hamilton East) read a reply from the Minister of Labour that the average wage paid by the farmers was $8.36 a week, with board, and continued.

"As far as I am concerned, I would not be willing to leave a wife and family in the city facing rents and high cost of living and go out to work in the country at $8.36 a week. I would rather stay in the city and all starve together."

"Move them all out," Mr. Clarke interjected.

"There is work in this province for every man who is able to do the work that is offered him," said Mr. Doherty. "If the farmers are to get the labour they need we must bring in people who are prepared to work on the farm. The farmers are paying $35 to $40 a month and board, which is exceedingly fair, in fact, it is only because they are sorely in need of help that they are offering this amount, in view of the low prices they are receiving for their products."

I think that is an effective answer to those who say we have unemployment in the cities. We have people idle in the cities, it is true, but if men engaged in seasonal occupations have an opportunity to go out on the farms and earn money I see no reason why they should not seize the opportunity; and if they ignore it, I do not see why we should concern ourselves further with them, indeed, we ought to wash our hands of them altogether. Undoubtedly it is our duty to see that work is provided for them, but not a paticular kind of work or work in a particular location.

Another citation with regard to unemployment. This is an article from the Gazette of February 28th, incorporating a report from the Dominion Statistician. It says:

According to reports received, compiled and tabulated by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics employment at the beginning of February showed considerable revival from the contractions recorded at the commencement of January, when losses incidental to the holiday and mid-winter inventory period, supplementing seasonal declines, had reduced activity to a marked degree. The reaction was somewhat more pronounced than that registered at the beginning of February of last year, and considerably more so than at the same period in 1921. Statements for the month under review were compiled from 6,253 employers of labour whose pay-rolls aggregated 733,063 persons as compared with 707,859 at the commencement of January. This increase of over 25,000 workers caused the index number to gain slightly over three points, standing at 89.5 as compared with 86.3 on January 1, and with 78.9 on February 1, 1922. Practically all the recovery was recorded in the manufacturing industries, (notably in iron and steel), but logging and coal mining also afforded more employment. Activity in transportation and construction continued to decline, although the shrinkage was on a rather smaller scale than in the preceding months.

This would go to show that we really have no unemployment situation at the present moment.

My hon. friend from Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) referred the other day to the fact that there are 6,000 unemployed people in the city of Winnipeg. We all know that during periods of depression the unemployed from the country districts flock into the cities. Winnipeg has a population of 250,000, and the district round about must comprise, I should judge, nearly 1,000,000 people, when we take in the Red river and the Assiniboine and Saskatchewan river valleys. Out of all those people in that district merely 6,000 were found to be unemployed in the city of Winnipeg—a negligible number.

Now, we must investigate and find out why those people are unemployed. As is well known, we have a large number of returned soldiers, men broken by their military service overseas. It is impossible to get them to remain in any vocation. They wander about, their former life having unfitted them for steady employment. Then we have the human flotsam and jetsam found in all large cities: these people never work. Of course, they have to be provided for in a certain way, but if we are to be deterred from encouraging immigration by there being a few hundred unemployed people in this or that part of the country, why, we shall never have any practical immigration policy.

I feel, Mr. Chairman, that I have already taken up too much of the time of the committee in discussing this subject, but it is one on which I feel very strongly, as my friend, the Acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Stewart) knows. He has in various orders in council a number of rules prohibiting people from entering this country. All kinds of what I would call if I were permitted—I have been permitted and I have called them before—fool regulations, nonsensical rules. Those rules do not accomplish the purpose intended, but they keep out very many people who would be valuable acquisitions to this country. For instance, one order in council declared that no person unless possessed of $250 could enter this country. I understand that this order has been abrogated. But in place of this monetary qualification, another regulation quite as good, even better, has been put in force. After all, $250 is not a very large sum of money for a person to have in his possession. I have known of cases where $250 did a great deal of good, and in fact the same sum was instrumental in enabling many immigrants to pass the immigration officers. Now it is not necessary to be possessed of $250 in order to enter this country. In place of that regulation we have something much more effective as a restriction. No man of the artisan class who is not a British citizen can come to Canada unless his passport has been vised by the Canadian agent before the immigrant goes aboard his ship. That, I admit, is a very effective restriction. If the artisan is a British citizen he can enter, although even a British citizen used to be debarred unless he possessed $250. If he is an American citizen he does not require the $250 either. The United States take in as many Canadians as are prepared to go there; the Dillingham Act, I understand, does not apply to citizens of our country. But when a Canadian who has left Canada and gone to the United States attempts to come back to his own country he is prevented from doing so on the ground that he has lost, as the order in council says, his domicile—and that is what the minister calls a proper rule. Last year we barred 10,000 Americans from entering Canada at the border—why, I do not know; probably for the reason that from the point of view of their occupations or callings there were no openings for them in Canada at the time. Now, there are hundreds and thousands of people who could come into this country and earn a living as well as any of us can, and who would be an asset to Canada. I do not say they would engage in work in factories, or that they are of the artisan class, but they are small traders, small merchants and so on, who may have been crowded out by the conditions in the United States and elsewhere and who want to get a foothold here. People of this class have always made a success in Canada, but they are not permitted to come in. And, who, do you think, decides whether or not there is a vacancy for a member of the artisan class who seeks entry into Canada? The Department of Labour, so worthily presided over by my hon. friend the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock). When an application is made for an artisan to come into the country a report is asked for from the Minister of Labour. He probably turns the thing over to the Trades and Labour Council, of which Mr. Tom Moore is the president, and in due course we are notified that there is no vacancy for that particular person and that it is not in the public interest that he be permitted to come in. Is it any wonder that I protest against rules of this kind? We have a lopsided system that will never work. We have a watertight scheme that is bound to fail, because it is not natural. I hope the minister will realize that before it is too late.

[Mr. Jacobs.]

Mr. CARROLL: Before the hon. gentleman leaves the question of passports to immigrants from central Europe, may I ask what is the effect of the regulation to which he refers?

Mr. JACOBS: The effect of it is this: the Canadian official has his instructions and he will not visé their passports, and the result is that the intending immigrants cannot get on board the vessel.

Mr. MARTELL: What information is before the Canadian official to show that that sort of man is not wanted in this country—provided he does not know otherwise?

Mr. JACOBS: He has the information supplied to him from time to time by the Department of Immigration.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): May I be permitted to make a correction? I am prepared to sit here and take all this warm medicine, and when hon. members get through I shall have a few things to say. But there is one statement made by my hon. friend that I cannot allow to pass. The instruction given to the agents on the Continent is that there is a place in Canada for physically and mentally fit people from the countries from which we have been accepting immigration. In fact we have been accepting immigrants from former enemy alien countries in cases where their friends were prepared to guarantee that they would be respectable and decent citizens in Canada. But there is no bar on the physically and mentally fit individual who wishes to come to Canada to farm or to seek employment as a farm labourer.

Mr. JACOBS: I admit there are no restrictions at all; if a person wants to go on a farm or become a farm labourer, he gets in without any trouble and in due course he finds his way to the city. What I want to have is a direct route.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Does my hon. friend suggest that we are being lied to on the Continent in respect to getting people into this country?

Mr. JACOBS: What I mean is this: when they get on the farm they cannot make the farm pay; then they drift into the city. That has been the burden of my complaint during the whole of this afternoon. We have tens of thousands of persons of British and Canadian stock who started on farms in Canada and who are now in the cities. It is not reasonable, therefore, to conclude that those who come here to go on the land, subjecting themselves to the rigors of the West, having no knowledge of the conditions or of farming in a large way such as is carried on in that part of the country—at best they have been engaged only in intensive farming or market gardening—it is not reasonable, I say, to conclude that these people will remain on the farms but will find their way to the cities. I venture to say that ninety per cent of the members of this House to-day were born on a farm or at one time lived on a farm, but ultimately wandered away to improve their position in life. The hon. Minister of Immigration himself, started out as a farmer; now he is a statesman. Why did he not stay on the farm? Because he found it more pleasant and more profitable to become a statesman; and here he is. I venture to say that fifty per cent of the people who are now on farms to-day in the Canadian West would, if they had the opportunity, flock into the cities and help to swell the urban population. I know something of what farming is in the West. It may be a surprise to many hon. members to know that I myself was born on a farm.

Mr. HANSON: Is my hon. friend a statesman now?

Mr. JACOBS: Well, I may say that "Hope springs eternal in the human breast."

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend also probably remembers that "Hope deferred maketh the heart sick."

Mr. JACOBS: Well, that may apply to my hon. friend, who is an ex-statesman. I would invite the Minister of Immigration and the Minister of Labour to come to Montreal: I will get together for them a mass meeting of from 4,000 to 5,000 people; we will fill the largest hall in the city. These people will consist altogether of artisans, and the two ministers can get the benefit of their views as to whether there is need in Montreal and other large cities for immigration of the class that I have advocated. Many of the departmental officials to whom I have referred are first-class men and I have nothing to say against them, but in other cases dry rot has set in, and when that happens the official is of no possible use to the department; in fact, he is a drag on the wheel. Such people ought to be superannuated or otherwise removed and live persons put in their places who could give the Minister proper information upon these vital matters. The Minister, I understand, is managing five or six different departments; he is doing the best he can, but after all he is only human and he has to take his information from people who are living in the past, who are in the nineteenth century, not in the twentieth; who do not know of conditions in the large cities. How many of them have gone to the large cities and interviewed the artisan classes or the employing classes to find out just what the conditions are? Where they got their information I do not know, but what I do know is that they have made a very sorry fist of it if they have given information to the minister upon which he has based his so-called policy which he brought down to the House this week.

I trust that I may have an opportunity later in the discussion when questions arise out of particular estimates to speak a little further. For the present I should like to have some reply, effective or otherwise, or an attempt even at a reply, to what I think is an arraignment against the department and something which calls for an answer from it.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House (Mr. Jacobs) admitted that he was a voice in the wilderness. He admitted also that he was sniping the government from behind. To alleviate the force of his blow, after a little sniping at his own party he seeks to draw the Canadian Manufacturers' Association into the fray as being in some way connected with the Canada Colonization Association with which this government have made some arrangement. I repudiate that statement absolutely. The Canadian Manufacturers' Association, except as individual citizens, had nothing whatever to do with it.

Mr. JACOBS: That is correct. I agree with my hon. friend that it was the members individually of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association who were invited to contribute to the Canada Colonization Association.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I am glad to have that statement from the hon. member because that was the suggestion I took exception to.

Mr. MARTELL: That is what he said at the outset.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The hon. member from Nova Scotia might be quiet for a moment. He will have an opportunity later. I would like to put a few questions to the minister regarding this association with which he has made an arrangement, but before doing so I want to emphasize further what I have to say with respect to the organization that has been referred to. I want to read a sentence from a letter of the Canada Colonization Association written within the last two or three months, and you will see then whether the Manufacturers' Association have anything to do with this association and who has to do with it.

Mr. MARTELL: My hon. friend referred to the hon. member from Nova Scotia. I will tell him that the hon. member from Nova Scotia represents a free-born constituency and is not a counsel for the Canadian Manufacturers' Association.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I understand, Mr. Chairman, that I have the floor. The sentence I wish to read is as follows. This association speaking of itself, says:

> It has the approval and support of the Imperial, federal and provincial governments, the co-operation of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the government-owned railways.

There is no word there or in this whole letter regarding the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, but there is word of the federal government, and I think the hon. member who has just spoken might take the responsibility himself, as a supporter of this government, when it admits that it has made an arrangement for the payment of public money to this corporation.

In the course of his address the hon. member (Mr. Jacobs) told us that this company was without a president. I should like to inquire from the minister who are the officers at present of this association, and would also ask him to give us some further information regarding it. Surely we have a right to know with respect to this company, even if it is a charitable organization, which is good enough for this government to make a contract with of the magnitude it has, what is its personnel and everything regarding it.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The president until recently was Sir John Willison. The vice-president of the company is M. A. Brown. The general manager for western Canada is Mr. Howard Everett, and the general manager for eastern Canada, Mr. George Creelman, of the city of Toronto. These are the main officers.

Mr. MARTELL: Is there any one from Nova Scotia a member of that company?

Mr. CHAPLIN: Would the minister tell us who the directors of the company are?

Mr. MARTELL: Is there a Nova Scotian in that company?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have not that information.

Mr. MARTELL: Will the minister say there is or there is not?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I could not say that.

Mr. MARTELL: Nova Scotians do not deal that way.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Did the minister say he did not know the directors?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have not that information at hand.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Would it be too much to ask the minister to let the House know at some future time who the directors are?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Very well.

Mr. RINFRET: I admit that my first words will be to express my sympathy towards the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Stewart). Since he has brought down this policy he has been subjected to criticism not only from both wings of the opposition, but also from behind. I venture to say that if instead of framing his policy he had waited until he was in the House and had heard the different suggestions made to him, and had then tried to put them together, it would have been a tremendous task because I have never yet heard in a debate in this House such a merry-go-round of contradictory statements as have been made here regarding immigration. I will take the stand that even if he has not, as is evident, succeeded in satisfying everyone, yet we should have much sympathy with him in the situation in which he happens to be placed, and understand by the very phases of this debate how complex this problem of immigration is,

An hon. member speaking during the course of this debate stated that the main questions of Canadian politics were the railway question and immigration. Some go further and claim that by increasing population in this country the government will go a long way towards wiping out the railway deficit. It will be time enough, in my opinion, to deal with that phase of the situation when the railway estimates are before the House, but the problem of immigration in itself suggests so many comments that even at the risk of reiterating what has already been said to-day, one feels that one cannot refrain from expressing his own views.

The minister the other day defined the government policy. He stated that in his opinion it was imperative that Canada secure more people. He argued that the financial burden was heavy on the present population, and that increased immigration would lighten it. He also considered it urgent that some selection be made of the immigrants who apply for admission to this country, and he volunteered the opinion that we should not have too many immigrants for the cities on account of the unemployment situation. With that summary statement I will say that personally I find very little fault. The reasons for an increased immigration are perfectly obvious. We live in one of the largest and richest countries in the world. One who travels across this country from ocean to ocean is astonished at the immense possibilities of Canada. It is a country vast as a continent, but its richness lies dormant in the soil beneath for want of the required number of miners, tillers and workers to bring it to light, and if immigration was imperative before the war I contend that it is even more so now under the present conditions.

We have inherited an enormous war debt. In 1896 our net debt was only $225,738,079. In 1911 it had grown to 326 millions and some odd thousands, and in 1922 it stood at $2,366,861,252. In my opinion it has grown at a rate out of all proportion to our population. It is urgent, not only to increase the number of tax payers in this country, but also to increase the production of wealth and the potential paying ability of the community as a whole.

Now, let us look at the figures of our population. From 1911 to 1921 the increase by immigration to this country was 1,975,393. The natural increase in population was 1,836,407, giving what should have been a total increase of 3,811,800 persons. Yet the net increase during that period was only 1,562,851. In other words, as has been stated before, not only did we lose the total number of immigrants that came into Canada during those ten years, but also 273,000 of our natural increase. I will say at once that I am not placing a definite value at all on these figures. I am one who thinks, in common with many others, that the figures of the last census are not correct. For example, we in Montreal contend that the population of that large city has been underrated by the census figures to the extent of fully 100,000 people. But taking the facts as they are, it is very clear that we need more immigrants if we hope to maintain our population at the figure at which it should stand.

Some say—it has been said in this debate—that we need not spend any money on immigration because all the immigrants we induce to come to Canada leave us, and therefore the money is misspent. But we have no proof at all, Mr. Chairman, that the 1,800,000 people who left us during the ten year period referred to had been immigrants. On the contrary, I claim that if we had had no immigration at all during those ten years the conditions that brought about the exodus from this country to the States would have had their effect to a certain degree, and instead of reporting an increase in population—however small it may look to us—we would probably have had a decrease. And touching this subject I will say, that although I have much sympathy in theory with the efforts made towards repatriation I do not entertain any great hope that that phase of the government's policy, even with the co-operation of the provinces, will have very much effect. I think it is much harder to entice any citizen to come back to this country than to prevent him from leaving, or than to replace him by another citizen through the medium of immigration. Therefore I think it is obvious—and we might in the confusion of opinions expressed in the course of this debate agree, at least, on this point—that we should try, in some way, to increase the number of our immigrants. But it is also true that we must exercise some care in their selection.

As to the country of origin let me say very frankly that this, to my mind, is of much less importance, than the character of the individual immigrant. We may get good settlers and we may get bad settlers from any country on the earth. It is quite natural that we should try to secure a large number of immigrants from the British Isles. It would also be natural for us to try to secure a number of immigrants from France and Belgium. Here let me say that it is very hard to get any immigrants at all from either of the last two countries mentioned. It is well known that even in normal times Frenchmen do not emigrate to other countries, that they are very strongly attached to their native land. If that is true in normal times, how much more true must it be in this period of after war reconstruction. The French government itself is very anxious at this moment to keep its

French children on the soil of France in order that the efforts towards reconstruction be brought to their full fruition. Furthermore, we all know that there is a decrease of population in France due to the falling off in births, and that there were very heavy losses during the war. It is also well known that any immigration propaganda in 5 p.m. France is prohibited by the government of the republic. Such propaganda was barely tolerated before the war; now it is very strictly prohibited. Therefore, I would like to state, in all frankness, that although we are very desirous of securing settlers from France and Belgium, it would appear to be a very hard task, and for my part I would not feel inclined to blame the government too severely if the stream of immigration from these two countries does not flow to Canada more copiously than it does at present.

Mr. SHAW: Do I understand that the laws of Belgium prohibit emigration from that country now?

Mr. RINFRET: I was alluding more particularly to France. I will frankly admit that I am not positive as to what is taking place in Belgium. I am inclined to think, however, that it would be somewhat easier to procure immigrants from the latter conutry, more especially in view of the fact that the population of Belgium is very dense. Nevertheless, it is a fact that it has always been very hard to attract immigrants from both these countries.

Mr. BROWN: There is a large number of Belgians in the West.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): That immigration is under government supervision.

Mr. RINFRET: I frankly admit, for I believe in being frank about these matters, that I have much sympathy with the proposal made by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St George (Mr. Marler) as regards immigrants from those countries with which we were at war during the great conflict. Such immigration, however, must be under regulation; we must be very careful in admitting such immigrants to this country. Again I say I have no prejudice at all against immigrants coming from any country in the world; I attach much more importance to the character of the individual than I do to the country of origin.

As regards the question of regulations, I will not go into it fully as my hon. friend from George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) has done. Nor will I say that I endorse all that that hon. member has said. But I would suggest, in a general way, that the regulations be made less rigid in their application, and that the authorities use some discretion in regard to individual cases. I place little faith in any stringent rule which is not intelligently applied and carried out with discretion.

I must say also that I was much surprised, during the course of the debate, to hear so many hon. members opposite object to the immigration of farmers and farm help. I think they are the very immigrants that we do require and that there is unlimited space for them in Canada. The average farmer succeeds very easily in feeding and maintaining his family. The exodus from the rural parts of Canada is not due, in my opinion, to inability to secure subsistence; it is due to the lure of the city, which exerts its influence on well off and very prosperous farmers.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): Does my hon. friend suggest that all the incoming immigrants require is space?

Mr. RINFRET: They require space where they can get busy, where they can live and subsist. The hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) just a moment ago read a report of a sitting of the legislature at Toronto, which report, in his opinion, went to show that we needed immigrants in the city and that we did not need them on the farms. Yet what did he read, but simply this, that farmers in Ontario were all asking for help? He was blaming the men in the cities who needed work for not going on to those farms to help those Ontario farmers. I think every line of the report that he read was ample proof that, in that part of the country at least, if men were needed, they were needed as farm help by Ontario farmers. I am not so sure that we need immigrants in the cities. It is all very well to say that at present there is little unemployment and that most people who really care to work can find work. I know very well that some people will refuse work under any conditions. I will also agree that others will claim that they are entitled to work according to their willingness and taste, their own opinion as to what should be their standard of living; but I claim there are to-day, especially in large cities, quite a number of men who cannot find any employment whatever. We have heard the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, for whom I have great respect, venture an opinion somewhat in opposition to that, and the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier has said the same thing. I should like to agree with them. Perhaps we may agree on this point. Every Saturday morning when I am in my office in Montreal, I have about a hundred callers asking for work. If the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George or the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier will tell me where I can send those men, I shall be very grateful to him. In agreement with the government policy, I would strongly object to any immigration effort which would tend to increase the number of unemployed in the large cities of Canada. We want immigrants for the farms; but we have an over supply of population in the cities, and the very fact that there is a tendency to leave the farm for the city is no proof at all that the policy is wrong. On the contrary, does it not show that we should do our utmost to send as many men as we can to the farms and to restrict as many as we can from entering the cities?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): How is the hon. member going to prevent them from entering the cities?

Mr. RINFRET: I agree with the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier when he says that you cannot prevent nature from following its course; but I think by taking the necessary precaution to ensure that any immigrant coming into this country is a farmer or has farming aspirations, we shall go some distance towards that goal. The fact that something is hard to prevent, is no argument at all that we should not attempt to prevent it. It is, on the contrary, ample argument that we should have a policy that will do the utmost to secure that result.

Mr. MARLER: My hon. friend will, perhaps, remember that I said I agreed with assisted immigration as regards agriculture, but I would allow immigrants who present themselves voluntarily to come to the cities.

Mr. RINFRET: I agree with that. I think my hon. friend is closer to my views than some hon. members opposite, and I am glad to record that.

The minister says that he intends to spend money in advertising this country and letting everyone know of its great possibilities. That is very sound and to that I do not object. But he also intends to spend pretty large sums of money with special organizations whose business it is to secure immigrants. He has contracted with the Canada Colonization Association for ten months at a figure of $100,000, provided that they procure a minimum of 200 families during the ten months. I believe that is their proposal. Taking the average family at five, which I believe is a reasonable figure, that will mean a minimum of a thousand settlers who will cost this country a hundred dollars per head. That is paying a very high price, and unless the minister is able to get a much larger number than the minimum stated, he is hardly getting a commensurate return for the money spent.

There is another proposal to spend $600,000 in connection with the British Empire Settlement Board. I understand that board has been working in connection with the Australian government, and while the reports that I have read may not be accurate—I say again you get reports on this matter which are very contradictory—I do not see that the results have been very favourable in Australia. The immigrants which this board has been able to send to Australia have been moderate in numbers and rather low in quality. I believe in attracting immigrants in the ordinary way, but the amount seems very large.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What number does the hon. member say that Australia got?

Mr. RINFRET: I have not that before me. I was speaking in a general way.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the hon. gentleman's information as to the morale of the immigrants which Australia got?

Mr. RINFRET: Perhaps the hon. gentleman, when he speaks in this debate, will discuss that point.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend made an assertion.

Mr. RINFRET: I think I qualified the statement. I do not object altogether to the large sum of money; but it should not be spent unless we are sure of having good results. I have quite a large amount of confidence in the present government. If I were sitting on the other side of the room, I would probably be more inclined to be cautious. But I am voicing the opinion in a general way regarding the Settlement Board and the Colonization Association, that this is not the best way to secure immigrants for this country.

Mr. MARTELL: Does my hon. friend know who are the members of this company with which he alleges a contract has been entered into by the government? If it is Sir John Willison who is connected with it, I do not wonder at the hon. member's doubting.

Mr. RINFRET: The Settlement Board or the other company?

Mr. MARTELL: The company with which a contract was entered into on the basis of 200 families.

Mr. RINFRET: That is the Canada Colonization Association.

Mr. MARTELL: Who are the members of it?

Mr. RINFRET: I do not know. The government has contracted with the company at a certain figure. I am giving my opinion as to the principle of any such contract, no matter who are the members of such a company. I say, in a general way, whether it be the Settlement Board or the Colonization Company, I take little stock in the work of any such company which indulges in wholesale bargaining for immigrants at a certain figure, for a certain consideration, whether their idea be to get paid for the work they do, or to free another country from a certain surplus of population that they do not want, but that they would like us to absorb. I think that the immigrant who is attracted to this country because he thinks the place is worth while, and comes of his own will, is on the average a better prospect than any immigrant who has been influenced and attracted into the country by companies whose interests are merely to live up to a contract, or who possibly are engaged in relieving other countries of an overflow of population. I would direct the attention of the minister to this more especially, and ask him if he is going to apply his regulations at all rigidly—to be much more stringent with any flow of immigrants sent out at so much per head by any settlement board or company than with the average immigrant who comes on his own responsibility because he has discovered that Canada will very likely prove a fine country for him to live in.

No matter where these immigrants may come from, I say that we should see to it that they shall become good Canadians. What is assimilation?—asked an hon. member during the course of the debate on this question. Centuries ago a Roman pro-consul put a similar question to the multitude: "What is truth?" Now, we all know what assimilation is; we all know what the word means. It means not only that a person coming into this country should be able to speak or should learn one of the current languages of the country, but it also implies the obligation to interest himself in the country's general welfare and become a part of its social and economic life. Any body of immigrants, call them Doukhobors, Mennonites, or by any other name you choose, who retain their peculiar class identity after their arrival in this country and who continue to lead a separate and distinct life from the great Canadian body, falls short, in my opinion, of all that is implied in the term "assimilation." Differences, racial or otherwise, are numerous enough in this country without our adding to their number.

Now, it is often charged that hon. members' utterances on this subject lack consistency and preciseness. Quite a number of questions have been put to every speaker, questions very kindly in their phraseology; and I have done my best to answer such questions. Some, I admit, I could not answer. Possibly that has detracted somewhat from the logical sequence of my speech; and it might have been more advantageous to a proper conclusion of my remarks had I been allowed to travel a continuous and uninterrupted route. However, before I resume my seat I should like to sum up my remarks briefly. We need immigrants, but we should not pay too high a price for them. We need them on the farms and not in the cities; and they should be subject to regulations moderately and discreetly enforced. We should advertise this country, too, as well as improve its living conditions, so as to retain within its borders the citizens we already have. In the expenditure in connection with the Canada Colonization Association and the Empire Settlement Board, I have little faith; and I trust that the government will promptly discontinue such expenditure if it fails to bring proper—and unexpected—results.

Mr. IRVINE: Most of us appreciate the courage displayed by the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) in attacking members of his own party, and particularly the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Stewart). But I was not very deeply impressed with the policy which the hon. gentleman would substitute for that offered by the minister. I think the hon. member went out of his way a good deal to find justification for a criticism of labour in Canada, and he characterized the policy of the Minister of Immigration as a watertight compartment. I am sorry I cannot say as much for his policy; in fact, it was leaking all over. I wish to show in a few sentences how he misrepresented the policy of labour with regard to immigration.

If I understood the policy as outlined by the minister and by those who have supported him, I should say it seeks by immigration, first, to reduce taxation, secondly, to increase production, and in the third place to bring prosperity out of the economic chaos in which we find ourselves at the present time. We all agree that these are noble purposes; the intentions back of them are very good; and I think we shall have to extend our sympathy not only to the minister himself but to the Cabinet as well in dealing with the situation that faces Canada to-day. We fully realize that the government did not create these economic conditions which they seek to alleviate through an immigration policy; we frankly admit that they are not responsible for them in any way and that they cannot materially affect them by legislation at this time. We must recognize their problem as one that calls for the consideration not only of the Cabinet, or of the minister or of any party, but of parliament and of the people of Canada as well. The government are in a wilderness of economic difficulties to-day, no doubt because of following to some extent what I would call a vague and unanalyzed tradition.

It has been stated by some of the speakers that have been supporting the policy of the minister that, following the assumption of power by the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Canada experienced a great period of prosperity; and it is assumed that, by continuing an immigration policy similar to that which was in force during the regime of the late right hon. gentleman, a corresponding prosperity will ensue. Now, there have been periods of prosperity so-called and periods of depression. These alternate; and a period of depression is simply a sign of the coming prosperity, and vice versa. But prosperity does not come merely because an immigration policy of any kind is in force. It is not detracting in any respect from the greatness of Sir Wilfrid Laurier to say that his immigration policy was not what constituted the prosperity attributed to his regime. There are many economic factors that enter into these cycles of prosperity. There is such a thing as a world situation to be considered, where the producers of a country can find a market for their produce. There is manipulation of credit, by those who control the financial system of a country; there is inflation as well as deflation of credit, reflecting itself in high prices or in a slump in prices, as the case may be. Then there are favourable crop conditions, and hundreds of other circumstances to be taken into consideration. So that we must not assume, merely because prosperity happened to obtain during a certain political regime in Canada, in which an immigration policy was fostered, that we shall therefore usher in again a similarly prosperous period by the adoption of another immigration policy of the same kind.

I submit that there is no connection between an immigration policy and prosperity, except that prosperity may attract immigrants whereas immigrants do not necessarily bring prosperity in their wake. The government are evidently aware of the unfavourable economic conditions that prevail, and have attempted to bring forward an immigration policy by which in part they seek to remedy these conditions. The government are conscious of enemies of the state as for instance unemployment, high prices of commodities, high taxation, and an enormous national debt—these enemies are besetting the nation, and the government is striking at them. I think it is striking in the dark, assisted ably by the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs).

Now, it is all very well for us to criticize, and I think most of the criticisms we have listened to so far have not contained much of constructive value. I purpose to advance the ideas of labour with regard to immigration, and I hope that the government will at least listen to my suggestions, if they do not follow them in detail. I scarcely anticipate that the hon. Minister of Immigration will adopt the policy of labour in toto, but I do hope that he will give it consideration. Speaking for myself, and attempting as best I can to interpret the opinions of labour on immigration, I want to state that they are not opposed to immigration. The attack made by the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) would lead the House to believe that the policy of Labour in this country was opposed to every kind of immigration under all circumstances. It is true that we oppose certain policies of immigration that do not make for permanency, policies which do not take proper care of immigrants after arrival, policies which have been inaugurated with an absolute disregard of conditions prevailing at the time. These are the reasons for our opposing immigration on certain occasions, but our opposition is not to be regarded as permanent.

That all hired labour outside of Canada must be secured through the employment service of Canada is one of the requirements which the labour organizations of this country demand from the Minister of Immigration. And it is not difficult to see why they should urge this requirement. I understand that last year certain companies in this country requested that several thousands of miners be immediately shipped in from Belgium to work our coal mines. That request was investigated by a certain organization in this country, and it was discovered that there were already enough miners here to take care of all our requirements; in fact there were more than were necessary to operate our coal mines. In such circumstances it surely would have been folly to bring from Belgium a thousand or more miners who had specialized in that particular line, and thereby less fitted by that very specialization to take up other vocations, even if opportunities offered themselves. That is one reason why Labour is opposed to certain policies of immigration under certain conditions.

We want an immigration policy that, first of all, will contain in itself the elements of permanency when put into operation. Much emphasis has already been laid upon the fact that Canada is an immigration sieve, that we take in immigrants on one side and drop them out on the other, that we are losing to the United States and perhaps to some other countries more immigrants than we take in, notwithstanding the expenditure which has been made to attract them here. The problem for Canada, according to the Labour view, is not so much one of immigration as one of emigration and colonization. How, then, do we propose to colonize? Here are a few suggestions which I would submit for the consideration of the minister dealing with this question.

First, I submit that a colonization scheme should be devised to settle our vacant lands close to railroads. That immediately brings us face to face with the high price of lands. How are we going to settle immigrants who come here with very little money on lands that are close to railways? These are the high-priced lands, the lands that, somehow or other, have been secured by favoured individuals in this country. The minister said that he thought approximately $1,500 would be a very fair beginning for an immigrant to settle upon the land. How far would $1,500 go in purchasing land valued at the lowest possible price at $20 per acre, some of it as high as $50 per acre very near a railroad? How is that immigrant going to begin with $1,500 to pay high interest charges on his purchase, to equip himself with the implements necessary for farming, and to feed himself for at least a year? I tell you what would happen—

Mr. MARTELL: I would ask my hon. friend, why should the taxpayers of Canada pay one cent to any person to come into this country? If people want to come, let them come so long as they are not physically unfit or Bolshevist. It is better to keep one good Canadian here than to bring in fifteen hundred foreigners.

[Mr. Irvine.]

Mr. IRVINE: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has stated my position about as clearly as I could state it myself. I am not advocating that we pay money to bring people to this country. I am trying to show, as the basis of my opposition to the present immigration policy that after paying money to bring them in we cannot keep them here.

Mr. MARTELL: We should not pay anything.

Mr. IRVINE: What will happen with a $1,500 beginning is that the immigrant will have to look for work in the city to pay the interest charges on the farm which he will never be able to own. Fifteen hundred dollars will not go very far in purchasing land. So some scheme must be found to free our land for the use, first of all, of the people who are here now landless; and secondly, for those who may subsequently be brought in. In pursuing this idea we should have an examination of all lands listed, and there should next take place an expropriation of all lands held at unreasonable prices. I have used the term "expropriation." Let me modify that and say, let us tax that land in order to free it. Such a procedure will increase the revenue of the country, while at the same time forcing the land from the hands of the exploiter and into the hands of those whom we are bringing into this country to increase production.

In the next place, we request that assistance should be given for the building of farm homes either to the labourers on the farms that we propose to bring in or to the farmers themselves.

Now, it may be asked: Whom should we first colonize; when lands have become available? In answer to that question—assuming of course that we are going to introduce single tax and free the land quickly—I submit it as a reasonable proposition that it is better for us to begin to colonize the people who are already in Canada than to go outside for others while our own people are walking the streets. If we cannot colonize the people that we already have, by what process of reasoning does the Minister of Immigration presume to be able to colonize new comers? That is a question which I should like him to answer when he replies to all the tirades of criticism to which his policy has already been subjected. If, then, it be a sane and good policy to put people on the land, we want first of all to colonize our land with the people already here, those in the unemployed ranks at the present time, and those who may be employed but who would rather go on the land if they saw an opportunity of making a living there. I am not going to deal with farming conditions. These, I presume, will be dealt with by the hon. members representing the farming interests of this country, and dealt with well, I have no doubt.

Colonization opportunities, I insist, should first be offered to all residents in Canada, and the employment service offices should be used as recruiting offices in this connection. Let me for a moment in this respect refer to the child immigration policy of the Minister of Immigration. I think he proposes to encourage the bringing in from other countries of children somewhere around the age of fourteen years. I may not be quite correct in stating that age. However, let me point out what happens to the children of Canada, and ask the minister if we should not try by some means to keep our own children alive before we begin to import others from outside countries. The number of children who died in the respective provinces last year before they were a year old was as follows: Prince Edward Island, 180; Nova Scotia, 1,311; New Brunswick, 1,299; Ontario, 6,763; Manitoba, 1,533; Saskatchewan, 1,814; Alberta, 1,391; British Columbia, 602; Quebec, 11,389. This is an enormous death rate among children, yet we are to go over to Great Britain or elsewhere and bring in others. It is true that those we intend to bring in are older than those referred to in these statistics, but if we could keep this large number of children alive they would make far better citizens than any children we could bring in, even if we went to Scotland for them. It was recently found in Alberta, the great farming country that is to be laid open for these immigrants, that 1,500 children were suffering from malnutrition. If we cannot feed our own children now; if we cannot keep alive the children we have brought to life in this country, why should we seek to bring others in from other countries?

I understand that it is the law in Ontario that children shall go to school until they are sixteen. Does the minister want to bring in children at the age of fourteen and put them to work—that is what I call cheap labour—with farmers, thus violating or helping to violate the law of the province and lowering the educational standard of the community? If not, what provision is he going to make that these young boys and girls coming from Great Britain, leaving the opportunity of getting an education there, shall, in spite of doing chores and becoming the servants of farmers, have an opportunity at least to get as good an education as they would have got had they stayed in their native country—indeed, as good as any other child in Canada gets under the present law?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Every child coming into Ontario or any other province from an outside country who is under the age for leaving school will come under the provisions respecting school attendance.

Mr. IRVINE: In accordance with the law?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. MARTELL: Does the hon. member not think that Canada can get all the people of all sorts and classes she wants without spending money to bring large numbers here who will starve or be drugs on the Canadian market?

Mr. IRVINE: I am glad that the sentiments I wish to express are echoed from the government side. I shall come to the advertising in a few moments; for the present I am trying to submit a constructive policy embodying the expressed opinions of organized labour in regard to immigration.

We believe that some organization should handle the colonization scheme that I have suggested. I would add to that suggestion that the Soldier Settlement Board or some similarly qualified organization should be charged with the work of surveying and reporting upon available lands for settlement in all parts of the Dominion, keeping in view the fact that it is our own people we first want to colonize. If we succeed in doing that, it will be a good argument for the getting of more people to colonize. All this might be summarized in that well known and well worn phrase, "Back to the land." Getting back to the land ought to begin here; if we follow some such scheme of colonization as I have suggested and get our own people on the land, we will not need to advertise for others to come in from outside.

Our manufacturers to-day are highly protected, on the ground, as they say, that they are infant industries, and so on, and that they want to be sure that their investments are safeguarded. All that labour is asking in regard to immigration policy is that their interests may be, not protected, but given some consideration. Labour desires that it shall have the right to live, not that it shall be degraded and destroyed by any immigration policy whatsoever. If the Canadian Manufacturers' Association can claim protection from this parliament for their machinery and their investments, it is surely fair and reasonable that labour should ask parliament not to advocate or advance a policy that would imperil the rights of labour to get work and life. But in all probability labour would be deprived of these humble rights if we followed out the policy outlined by the Minister of Immigration. If every immigrant who comes to this country is a benefit to Canada and a potential producer of wealth, it surely goes without saying that each unemployed worker in the country at the present time is of equal value, and if we cannot utilize his value now, it is doubtful whether we would utilize the value of those other prospective immigrants after spending two or three hundred thousand dollars in bringing them here. So our first problem from a labour point of view is to put our own people to work. What that may involve I am not at present prepared to say. I know it involves the whole economic problem of our day, but if we cannot solve it to some extent we should not make it worse by following the policy of immigration outlined by the minister.

Let me conclude by summarizing the suggestions of Labour:

> Begin by creating facilities for emigration of our own population from industrial centres to the farms thus relieving congestion in the urban districts; deal effectively with the problem of finance and credit to eliminate usury and exploitation to-day existing; liberate the workers from the fear and results of unemployment and establish full opportunity for profitable employment; export in their highest manufactured form raw materials and natural products obtainable in Canada; release the natural resources held out of use for speculation by private interests and provide equal opportunity for all for their fullest development; encourage scientific and industrial research to discover commercial uses for many articles to-day considered valueless.

With regard to advertising for immigration, let me quote an advertisement which appeared in the London Times and which came from the Minister for Immigration for South Africa. If the minister would advertise like this, I think we would not object to the spending of a little money for advertising. It reads:

> Migration is again to the fore. Tens of thousands among all classes, see no future unless it be overseas. Their problem is where to go, and what to do there.
>
> If they have sufficient capital, the Union of South Africa is the country to settle in, farming is the career to take up. It is a likeable country, and in its farming there is a living to be made, and scope for progress.
>
> Capital is however necessary. The migrant will require at least £2,000 for even a modest start. South Africa is therefore not open to mass migration, but that does not make it less attractive to those who have capital. This is being increasingly realized;—

Mr. MARTELL: Does my hon. friend know who it is over in England who selects the immigrants that we do not want?

Mr. IRVINE: My hon. friend, being closer to the Minister of Immigration, is in a better position to answer that question than I am. I am certainly not asking for any selection of immigrants, but I am saying that from such an advertisement as I have quoted, it is not likely we shall have any great rush, and if we have no great rush of immigrants to this country we shall not have the resultant difficulties we have had during the last few years. I want to finish this quotation to show that South Africa has taken a different course with regard to advertising from that which we have followed in Canada:

> This is being increasingly realized; the stream of migrants to the union of South Africa is comparatively small, but it is select and continuous.
> The people who in recent years have gone to the union of South Africa are people not only of means but of judgment. They went only after weighing the prospect. What satisfied them may merit investigation by you. Is it not worth looking into?

Now if South Africa is getting the immigrants that have judgment and capital, I submit that in view of the present economic conditions in Canada the only immigrants we could hope to get would be those without judgment, and I do not think it would be good policy for us to spend $200,000 or more in trying to get into this country immigrants who have no judgment.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): Mr. Chairman, I want to say frankly that I rise to oppose the minister's immigration policy. My great objection, of course, to the minister's policy is his endorsation of the Canada Colonization Association. I am very sorry that the minister has apparently taken a place in this great national colonization scheme that is lower than that taken by the Colonization Association. I had hoped that at least he would be the leading figure, the chief authority in the whole matter. I have an article here that was released for evening papers Winnipeg and west of Winnipeg, Monday, September 11, 1922, and also for morning and evening papers east of Winnipeg, September 11. It starts as follows:

> The Western Canada Colonization Association, in close co-operation with the federal and Imperial governments and the Canadian railways have worked out a well matured land settlement policy, which is to be put into effect forthwith.

That in the first place is my objection to this whole scheme. The date of announcing this policy was in September of last year. Just about that time we had harvested one of the largest crops that had ever been grown and matured in Canada, and it seems to me, reading between the lines and considering the whole question, that the people who were interested in this scheme remembered the good times we had in Canada as a result of the crop of 1915. I remember reading how in southern Alberta the farmers went to various loan company officials who refused to accept payment of mortgages in full. Possibly in this case the Canada Colonization Associatoin was expecting a return of that sort of prosperity and was ready to climb on to the band wagon. At least, that is the impression I have received from reading their literature and putting that together with the date of the announcement of the policy. However, "the best-laid schemes o' mice an' men gang aft agley," and it must have been so in this case. We have not had a return of prosperity since the tremendous crop that was grown and matured in western Canada last year. In fact, I doubt if the country is as well off on the whole as it was one year before.

I want to examine further the manifesto of this association. In the leading paragraph we have the problem and the solution stated, as follows:

> The British and Canadian governments have joined with the Canada Colonization Association and the Canadian railways in a co-ordinated land settlement plan covering all the provinces. An efficient colonization machine is being set up and will begin to operate forthwith. Colonization in Canada has been at a comparative standstill ever since 1913. Yet nothing is clearer than that effective land settlement on a comprehensive scale is the only available solution of the country's pressing economic and financial problems. By increasing the farming population and agricultural production throughout Canada, we shall lower freight rates, stimulate business, lighten the burden of the national debt to every individual family, lessen federal, provincial, and municipal taxation, and go far to eliminate the serious annual deficit on the National Railways.

The scope of the plan is comprehensive enough. It promises a great deal, promises what no group of men anywhere can guarantee. The first promise it makes is that it will bring back prosperity. That is a very general statement.

It is also claimed that it will lower freight rates. Now anyone who studies the question of freight rates in Canada during the last ten years will, I think, come to the conclusion that increased population does not necessarily mean lower freight rates. Of course, there may be circumstances to take into consideration; the circumstances during the next ten years may be altogether different from those during the last ten years.

Mr. MARTELL: Can the hon. member tell me who is the Deputy Minister of Immigration and where he is at the present time?

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): No, I have not been investigating that matter. This national scheme of land settlement, presided over and controlled very largely by the Canada Colonization Association, according to this manifesto promises a great deal. Some of the things that it promises will, I think, be fulfilled, but considering all the statements made in this manifesto I think it shows a great lack of real consideration for the welfare of the intending immigrant.

I have no objection, in fact, I am very anxious like any other Canadian to see our railways prosper, and the country as a whole, but unless we give the intending immigrant every consideration, and a great deal more than he will obtain under this land settlement plan, we can never have an ultimately successful immigration policy. The first thing we learn, according to this manifesto, that the settler is going to do is to lighten our burden of debt. That means that the settler will have to assume a certain portion of our national debt when he comes into Canada as a settler. Though I am not a prophet, and have never professed to be, I would not mind guaranteeing that that promise regarding the incoming settler will be absolutely fulfilled regardless of what government or governments may be in power for the next ten or fifty years.

Regarding the lowering of freight rates, I do not think we have any real justification at the present time for saying that the mere incoming of immigrants will lower freight rates.

Mr. MARLER: Will the hon. member not admit that if the railways get increased traffic they will have greater earnings, and that consequently we may ask for a reduction in freight rates?

Mr. KENNEDY: (Edmonton): That is a different thing from what the Canada Colonization Association is preaching in this manifesto.

Mr. MARLER: I asked the hon. member a question. Does he not admit that?

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): That it is possible? Yes. I certainly do. I wonder if the benefits that are supposed to accrue to the people of Canada, or to the people who are already here are passed on, or if the intending immigrants are informed as to both sides of this question. I remember in the Highlands of Scotland, away back in the year 1900 and a few years following, the very roseate literature that we used to get on immigration. I remember that on the front page of these pamphlets there would be a picture of a tar-paper shack, and two or three pages further on an illustration of an experimental farm and generally, beneath the picture was written "After a few years." Of course, railways and other conveniences found mention. I believe, however, notwithstanding the literature issued in the Old Land by the Department of Immigration that the works of Ralph Connor exercised the greatest force in interesting the people. I want to say further that in any literature sent abroad, either by the government or by this or any other like association, the effort should be to tell the truth as nearly as possible, and not seek to create a false impression. When the advantages which may accrue to settlers coming to Canada are dilated on there ought to be, side by side with that statement, some account given of the disadvantages which the new arrivals will have to face.

The men who were behind the present scheme when it was announced—and I suppose that their spirit controls its operations even at present, at any rate to some extent—were not farmers, and yet they were associated in a movement to induce farmers to settle on the lands of western Canada. The president of the association at that time was Sir John Willison who has written a book entitled Reminiscences, Political and Personal. Now on page 10 of that work we find the following:

> But one may love the woods and the fields and not like farming. I got away from the farm as soon as I could, and I have not wanted to return. Nor have I ever heard that there was any desire that I should. It is often said that a good farmer has been spoiled to make a poor lawyer or a poor doctor. Whether or not I am a good journalist, no one who knows will suggest that I was likely to become a good farmer. The fashion changes. It is a sure word of prophecy that the movement towards the cities has spent itself. Moving pictures, rural mail delivery, good roads, motors, bath-rooms, house furnaces, and many other devices to save labour, enhance comfort and relieve isolation, make the country ever more desirable, and better prices give the farmers an increasing but still inadequate return for their labour. In a democracy rooted in the soil lies the sanity and stability of human institutions. But we cannot all be farmers, and to many of us a call comes that will not be denied. Whether we go to town or country, still blessed is he that findeth himself.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): When the committee rose at six o'clock, I was dealing with this national land settlement plan as advertised in the western papers on September 11. The plan is, according to the language of the advertisement, to drum up settlers in the United States and also in Great Britain, though I understand the association is not operating in Great Britain at the present time, to bring them to Canada and to settle them on the land. The first thing that must be ascertained with regard to a settler is whether he has enough cash to start on a quarter section of land. He is to be settled on unoccupied land. The vast majority of such settlers will, of course, come from parts of the country which have been fairly well developed, where they have barns, houses, fences, water supply and other necessary things for the successful operation of a farm. To take men of that type with what little stock they may bring along with them, to place them on unoccupied quarter sections and to ask them there to make a payment of two dollars an acre and to sign an agreement that they will pay the balance in thirty-two years with interest at 6 per cent, even though under the agreement they have not to pay any principal for the first two years, is something of a problem.

The weakness in that scheme lies in this. Supposing a settler comes from some one of the fairly well-developed western states to Canada, and buys land on the recommendation of the association or any officer of the government. He can hardly be said to be doing that of his own initiative. From my knowledge of farming and of the real estate business in general, as it has been and is being carried on in western Canada, I think more mistakes have been made through men buying farms or lots on the recommendation of others, be they real estate agents or otherwise, than in any other way, and this has been a great detriment to the country. To bring settlers in from the United States, regardless of the organization that is instrumental in bringing them in, or from Great Britain, should any come from there, and avail themselves of the services of this Canada Colonization Association, and to tie them down, or as Sir John Willison says, to get them rooted on the land with an initial payment of $2 an acre and an agreement to pay the balance in thirty-two years, before they have had time to become fairly well acquainted with the seasons and the general conditions prevailing in the country is, to my mind, a big undertaking and one of the principal weaknesses in this scheme.

Life on the farm in western Canada, especially, is a life of loneliness in many cases, and if there is one thing above everything else a settler needs, if he is to make good, it is self-reliance and personal initiative. If settlers are brought into this country by a shepherding organization, many settlers will very likely be brought in who would not on their own personal initiative have come in, and the result will be, I am afraid, that we shall have a larger percentage of failures under this scheme than possibly we could have had under any other plan. I came to this country something like twenty years ago; I have gone through the various stages of homesteading and so on, and my experience has been that the easiest thing in all those twenty years was to emigrate and that the hard experiences came afterwards. If we are going to settle 15,000,000 acres in western Canada under this system, I am afraid we shall have a very much larger percentage of discontented settlers than we have at the present time. It is much easier for a settler to become discontented and it is much more likely that he will become discontented under this plan under which he is advised to buy land by an organization such as this, than if he came of his own initiative and took up land because he wanted that land and because he was led to want it through his experience in and knowledge of the country.

We are advised further that this association, through its officers, is going to set up what it calls "community clubs," which, apparently, are going to look after those settlers after they come to Canada in order that they may not drift to the cities. It will be very difficult to prevent them from doing that, and that phase of the operations of the organization is practically worthless. After the settlers have been established in communities and they have those local community clubs organized, I find in this circular what the clubs will do:

(a) prepare a chart of its particular district which will indicate occupied and unoccupied farms.

And so on.

(b) assist the officials of the Canada Colonization Association in securing listings of land.

(c) Report on vacant lands and land valuations in each district.

Apparently, after these community clubs are established in various districts, they are going to be used to further the interests of the Canada Colonization Association.

(d) Induce local farmers to write their friends "back home," advising them of the advantageous opportunities for land settlement in their neighbourhoods.

I am afraid we have in this something that might become a rather dangerous principle. The settler pays his $2 per acre down in the first place, and then he signs an agreement to pay the balance in thirty-two annual payments with interest at 6 per cent. After he pays down his initial $2 per acre, he gets two years without paying any principal; but I am afraid that to take hold of a raw quarter section and to grow anything more than feed for stock during those two years, will be more than the average settler can do. Although the ordinary farmer is not a man who is very ready with his pen or fond of writing letters, it is possible that some of them might be induced, through a promise of an extension of time on some payment that might be overdue, to write to their friends back home. I am afraid we are being asked to endorse something that is not in the best interest of the settlers who might come to this country through the agency of the Canada Colonization Association.

It is stated that the landowner will pay the Canada Colonization Association $2 per acre. There may be some dispute in regard to this. This manifesto would indicate that the owners of vacant lands would pay the association $2 commission. It is open to dispute, however, as to just who will pay that $2. It may be that conditions will be such that land cannot be raised in value an extra $2 to meet that commission; but from a knowledge of real estate practices in the country I am afraid there is a chance that in a great many cases this is what will be done. We have not solved the problem for the settlers in bringing them in in this way; and I will go further and say that encouraging settlers to come in this manner, who would not otherwise be likely to come, is not a very good guarantee for their future success as farmers, at least in western Canada.

There are others, however, who are going to benefit from this organization. Thousands of absentee owners of unoccupied lands along the railways are tired of paying heavy taxes and super taxes on these unproductive holdings and would gladly dispose of their property at prices and on terms that would facilitate purchase by incoming settlers. The absentee landowners will be benefited. I also find that the American as well as the local land men will be provided with business. I find here that the former Minister of Agriculture of the province of Alberta will shortly tour the British Isles speaking in support of British agricultural emigration to lands in Canada. The statement is made, too, that others will be employed by the Dominion government and the association in an endeavour to work up this great land settlement plan. The association, it is said, has a subscribed capital of $1,500,000. It does not show in this manifesto how much of this has been actually paid up. So far, I do not know; and I am wondering whether anything more has been paid in in cash than has come from the federal treasury. The expectation of the officers in charge of the organization is that between $30,000,000 and $40,000,000 will be earned in commissions in the next ten years, to be disbursed in the working out of this plan; and it is further stated that the plan is non-profit sharing. Well, there are various ways of sharing profits, and I think that profits are often paid in salaries. And, of course, if they are paid in salaries and good salaries in some cases, dividends may not be necessary. I have no confidence in this plan, and I would much rather have seen the minister control the whole immigration policy himself through his department and its officials.

A good deal has been said about the value of British and American immigrants to Canada. We have been given to understand a great many times, not only on the floor of this House but also in agricultural papers throughout the country, and from other sources, that these settlers could bring to us a knowledge of intensive farming which we need very much in Canada. I do not quite agree with that view. I believe that we do need a little more intensive rather than extensive farming in Canada; but I do not believe that the new settlers coming in from the United States or Great Britain are the people that are going to show us how to carry on this farming. I believe that the demonstration is more likely to come from the men who have been through the mill in the past few years of our country's history and who know the mistakes that may have been made. What are the conditions on farms in the Old Land? On farms of 100 acres there you have good fences, good stone buildings, and every convenience at hand. You will find possibly five persons on such a farm besides the tenant, who generally goes around managing the business. Who could not farm intensively under such conditions? Do you think settlers coming from the Old Country are going to apply those same intensive conditions here, where one man would have to tackle a whole quarter section himself, in addition to building fences, herding stock and putting up his buildings, possibly all at the same time? That is a different matter. The Old Country settler coming out here and settling on land under this plan might find, after he had done his day's work, that he had no good pasture to put his stock in for the first summer, and he might be driven to the necessity of merely hobbling his horses and turning them out at night while he rolled himself under his tent or retired into his cabin, whichever he might happen to have, in the hope that Providence might be kind enough not to allow the mosquitoes to drive them away before morning.

Mr. MARLER: Does the hon. member approve, or does he not, of inviting British settlers, agriculturists, to come here?

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): I approve of inviting British settlers to come, but not under this plan, which would place them on the land before they had any knowledge of the country.

[Mr. D. M. Kennedy.]

Mr. MARLER: Would it be impertinent to ask the hon. gentleman whether he could suggest a better method of getting them here?

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): Just allow them to come; they will come if conditions are fairly reasonable.

Mr. MARLER: That does not answer my question.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): Let the hon. member state his question again.

Mr. MARLER: Under what conditions would my hon. friend suggest inviting settlers to come here if they are not competent to take up farming of this description?

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): Let us inform these people just how conditions are here. We have immigration agencies in the Old Land. I suppose there are still immigration agents in Glasgow, Edinburgh, London and such places, and they could give the people a fair knowledge of the facts, placing before them both sides of the situation. They could come if they wished, and I think there would come as many as we can assimilate and settle under present conditions. But when you undertake to drum them up, according to the language of this pamphlet, you have a different problem altogether on your hands.

I am very much interested in this question of immigration, and nothwithstanding anything I may have said against this plan, I am in favour of seeing a reasonable number of immigrants come to this country. But I am opposed to this plan because I think we are putting the cart before the horse; we have not finished with the colonization plans we have had under way for the last number of years, in the West at any rate. The most recent undertaking of this kind was the soldier settlement scheme. I happen to represent a constituency that possibly has the largest block of land settled in the last ten years—I refer to West Edmonton as the constituency and the Peace River country as the settlement. We have in that country Britishers, Americans, French Canadians, Germans, Russians, Hungarians and all the other nationalities now represented in Canada. And I want to say to hon. gentlemen that I do not see very much difference in all those settlers. As one hon. member said this afternoon, it is not so much a question of nationality as of character; there are good and bad people in all nationalities. But those settlers are having a hard time. There is a large German settlement in the Peace River country. I must say that they are very good settlers, and they were good citizens during the war.

Mr. MICHAUD: What about the other settlers, were they good citizens, too, during the war?

Mr. KENNEDY (West Edmonton): Yes. These German settlers have had an agent in Mexico lately to see what the prospects are down there, because they have been so greatly disappointed in the railway facilities promised them and which they require so urgently. From 1918 on a large number of soldier settlers came into the Peace River country. They took up homesteads, of course, back from the original centres of settlement. In 1910, 1911 and 1912 the good clean prairie land was picked up, and a great many of the soldier settlers are back on the poplar-covered land.

I do not think we have yet done our duty by the settlers in this country. A great many of them who came in from the United States have informed me that wherever they went during the years previous to 1911 and 1912 they were met by immigration agents of the various railway companies advertising the country and describing the proposed railroad through to the Pacific coast, and inducing them to come in in the belief that before they got well established all those railway facilities would be provided.

Now, I suppose it may strike some hon. members that the Peace River country is so far away that we should not use it as an example. But we have settlers also in West Edmonton who are located right along both sides of the Grand Trunk Pacific and that branch of the Canadian National Railways running northwest from the city of Edmonton, and among these settlers are many ex-soldiers. It may surprise the committee to be informed that settlers in the Peace River country are just as well off as those located along the Grand Trunk Pacific fifty or seventy miles from Edmonton; but this is undoubtedly the case not only as regards those settlers located in the brush lands but those who have settled in the more open stretches. And one of the main reasons why I am opposed to the present immigration policy is that I do not think we have done our duty by the settlers who were induced to come into the country by promises of railway and other facilities. I do not suppose the government is prepared to spend a great deal of money for the construction of branch lines in western Canada. My constituency is not the only one that needs such accommodation, but we have been very anxious to get a railway built from Grande Prairie south to the Canadian National railway, thus giving us a short cut to the Pacific coast instead of hauling our produce two thousand miles and more to the east. However, unless we get relief of that kind I fear we are going to lose the settlers who have gone in there and tried to establish themselves during the past ten years. Therefore I cannot see the wisdom of drumming up settlers in the United States while we are losing the men who came in on the strength of these promises ten years ago.

Mr. JACOBS: Is it not a fact that about twenty thousand settlers have left that district?

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): No, not yet. Ten thousand probably have left during the last four years but there was a population of 18,800 when the last census was taken. There are still about three million acres of settlement in that district, and the population, as I have said, is approximately about twenty thousand. The land is just as fertile as any in Canada. I repeat, the reason I am opposed to spending money to drum up settlers at the present time is because we can get the same results by retaining the settlers we have already if we are able to give them the railway facilities that they so urgently require.

Now, it may seem unreasonable to say that this government must fulfil all the promises and pledges given by immigration agents ten or fifteen years ago. I know it is difficult to pin down a corporation to redeem the promises made by an agent who may have acted more or less without instructions. Similarly it may be hard to pin down the government at the present day to redeem all the promises made to these settlers in days gone by to induce them to come into the country; but the settlers are there, and if we are willing to spend a few million dollars to bring in more settlers, surely it is the part of wisdom to spend money to retain the settlers that we have already on the land. It will take the new settlers at least five years to become acquainted with the climatic conditions of the country and be as efficient farmers as those already settled there, while the latter have their equipment and are ready to go ahead under reasonably favourable conditions. I would make that constructive suggestion to the minister and government in the hope that he will be able to adopt it.

I hope also some means will be found to assist the returned soldiers located on these brush lands to clear their holdings. Most of them that I have seen during the past summer will pay about twice as much to clear their farms as it will cost to buy new land under the method of clearing by hand. I think in some instances mistakes were made. However, there is a way of clearing this land by fire, and I hope the department will be able to see its way to help these men to clear their lands by this method. It will cost in some cases $50 an acre to clear land in the ordinary way, where it can be done for less than a dollar an acre by fire. Consequently I think the system would be well worth consideration by the minister. It was tested two or three years ago not very far from McLennan on the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia railway, and proved very successful.

In conclusion I wish to read an article from the Farmers' Advocate of Winnipeg, dated October 10th, 1922, which states:

> It is true that a great many farmers think that the bringing of immigrants will be a fruitless endeavour. Naturally enough, they argue that the policy will not be beneficial to Canada because the established and experienced farmers of this country are having a hard time to dodge the sheriff. This fact, however, has no real bearing on the question of future immigration. If it had, the logical thing for us to do would be to discourage immigration until farmers were agreed that farming held rosy opportunities for new settlers. We know perfectly well that if we waited for this decision we would wait in vain, for, speaking in a general way, farming is never universally profitable. Farming, especially in the West, is a perennial game of chance with the elements and experience has taught us that agricultural prosperity is very seldom general. Certain methods of farming sometimes pay where other methods fail. Certain districts get good crops when other districts have crop failures. Immigration cannot possibly aggravate this condition, for, as we have said before, a good immigrant is never a charge upon the state or the farmer.

Now, if the conclusion of that paper that we can never make farming profitable is well founded, that is a great tragedy so far as this country is concerned. If that is the final conclusion of the wisdom of this country, where our universities are turning out trained economists by the dozen every year, there is something radically wrong with our educational system. I believe that by co-operation we can yet reach a system under which we shall have something nearer equity throughout this Dominion than we have at present. I believe also that if the industries of Canada, would be willing in hard times to assume their share of the sacrifice with the industry of agriculture, even to the extent of going without dividends when farmers all over the country were operating at a loss, we should have a better country and be able to assimilate all the good immigrants we could obtain from the United States, Great Britain or elsewhere.

Mr. ST. PERE (Translation): Mr. Chairman, Canada, we hear everywhere, is an empire in itself, both as to size and natural resources, having, however, no more than the population of a province. Immigration would therefore be the sure cure for most of the ills from which the Dominion, at present, suffers. Double the population and you thereby diminish the debt by half; double the population and you will supply the National railways with the positive means of reducing the accumulated deficits.

Canada, Sir, seems to be in the same situation, to-day, as that in which the United States found themselves in 1880, with this difference, however, that our country did not leave the gates as wide open, so that a selection was more thoroughly made to eliminate the greatest number of possible undesirables.

The Canadian parliament has already passed legislation in regard to what constitutes an obstacle to the admission of immigrants to Canada. Section 38 of the Immigration Act bears the stamp of good common sense, but it is important in its present circumstances to have a better knowledge of its purport. Subsection "C" of the above section is of special interest for residents of large cities, for it gives the government the power to check all immigration of foreign labourers in these times of industrial unrest.

It is a common saying that work is picking up in cities. This is in a certain measure true, but let us not be led to believe that the working class have all the bread necessary. Being a representative of a large labouring constituency whose citizens are neither Bolshevists nor Soviets but rather genuine workers whose only aim is to have employment, I am sorry to state and especially to witness that many of them, notwithstanding all their good will and the help they receive from people enlisted in their cause, cannot obtain regular work the year long. Therefore, let us not import foreign labourers while the industrial uneasiness lasts. The hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) gave us to understand the other day that we must admit immigration of labourers able to perform certain work which our people refused to do. I have no knowledge of the work he refers to, but I do know that, in the city of Montreal, no labourer has refused any hard job, such as pick and shovel work, etc., when their own and their family's bread was at stake. Let us not rush in the matter of favouring a certain class of immigrants. Sir Clifford Sifton, an ex-Minister of the late Laurier administration, objects even to the proposal of a wholesale recruiting of British workmen as immigrants:

> "This scheme is absurd," he says, "and if we admit 10,000,000 British people within ten years, at the end of the same period, 7,000,000 will have crossed the American border, because it is impossible for our government to bear up with the expenditure that such a movement would entail. In that space of time we can hardly accommodate 500,000 and it is all we ask for. Moreover we must especially lay stress on the type of immigrant and without any hesitation refuse admittance to all those who would be incapable of becoming good farmers and honourable citizens. We do not need artisans, workmen and tradespeople. We neither care to admit Clyde mechanics or labourers of the south of England. He goes one step further than his rival from Cambridge and states that the idea of turning into good farmers these workmen is a dream, that these people hate country life, and will never settle there. It is also useless to carry on immigration wholesale as certain people propose to do. To emigrate is an individual question, and what one must seek is the individual who answers our wants and to whom we can offer reasonable means to work on a farm which is government property first, but which will later become his own.

The Minister of the Interior thought it proper to specify that his department will especially look after the immigration of farmers and farm labourers. An order in council, dated May 9, 1922, provides that an immigrant desirous of working on a farm, possessing a knowledge of the work to be done and especially assured in advance of a place, may be admitted to Canada. Paragraph 2 of this order in council should be strictly adhered to, if we wish to avoid abuse, for the bona fide farm hand could quickly become a common labourer or docker, as soon as he tires giving to the land the best of his energy.

Our large towns have already too many unemployed; let us watch that their number be not increased by applying strictly paragraph 2 of this order in council.

I am fully aware, Sir, that all do not agree with my views on the subject and I respect their convictions while holding firmly to mine. The hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) gave us, this afternoon, a splendid description of the conditions of the working class in cities so as to support, on solid grounds, his claim in favour of an open door. According to him, we might think that we had returned to the prosperous days of the Laurier administration. The workmen, he says, earn good wages, pay high rents and nothing seems to justify the demand made by organized as well as unorganized labour against the import of foreign labour. I have never taken the habit of playing to the gallery, my electors have not sent me to Ottawa following a campaign made to rouse labour against capital, but I owe it to them, in all justice, to expose before this House their true conditions. The working class of the electoral division of Hochelaga are mostly skilled hands who had in the past plenty of work at the Angus shops, the Vickers dock yards, the locomotive works, and the large shoe factories, and so forth. The trade depression which followed after the great war has thrown out two-thirds on the street and the remainder hardly work enough hours per week to meet the expenses of the family budget.

I have consulted with business men of my division and nearly all agree to say that the unemployment crisis and the lowering of salaries places them in a dilemma. I must however acknowledge much to their praise that since the beginning of the crisis they have generously come to the rescue of these workmen who had been their good clients during the days of prosperity and that they have continued to make advances to them on the strength of their good name. Let the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier go to the trouble of making a small inquiry; he will verify that our textile workers are far from having an easy time, and I may add without fear of contradiction that the conditions which prevail at home are practically the same as those of other working divisions in Montreal. Providence must have been specially kind to the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier and his division; I therefore congratulate him and his electors on the enjoyment of a degree of prosperity that the other divisions of the great metropolis envy.

So as to further strengthen his arguments, he has graciously invited the hon. Minister of Labour to a monster labour meeting where the workmen shall give proof of their entire satisfaction of the present conditions. I know, Sir, that contradictory meetings are out of date, but I would ask him to invite at this labour meeting all those of the other Montreal divisions, so that we may discuss on the spot, if it is necessary to open, to-day, the gates of Canada to foreign labourers. I fully know that a negative vote would soon kill such a suggestion. Some one may suggest that the farm labourers should come out and settle down in cities. Perhaps, but there would certainly be a way to prevent them by special legislation that would hold on the farm those who were admitted in Canada under the express condition to give themselves up to farming. This rule, however, would only apply in times of industrial crisis as the one we are experiencing. I am therefore opposed to the open door policy as are all the English, Scotch, Welsh and French-Canadian workmen of my electoral riding.

England and Wales have made serious efforts heretofore to provide a living for 618 people to the square mile. The unemployed are more than a million and more than a million pounds sterling have been spent to keep them from the horrors of famine. To alleviate this social scourge, the British government intend to spend £2,000,000 so as to remove a great number of these unemployed to the different dominions.

I am of opinion, Mr. Chairman, that only those immigrants desirous of living on the farm should be, at present, admitted to Canada, and what is more, be granted a little money to keep its people at home.

So as to relieve the industrial centres already too congested, the advantages of land settlement offered to foreign immigrants should also be offered to Canadians. I know, sir, that the government has already done a great deal in that way by settling the veterans on the land. In so doing they but wrote another page in the history of Canada; for the soldiers of the Carignan-Salières regiment, those of the Scotch regiments who took part in the battle on the plains of Abraham, were the first in our country to drop the sword for the plough.

If it is good policy, sir, to encourage immigration on the farm, we must of all necessity encourage them to remain on Canadian soil. Statistics show to our regret, that most of the immigrants entering Canada between 1881 and 1922, have practically all left the country to emigrate to the United States. Sir Clifford Sifton refuses to blame the different governments that have succeeded one another, or put it down to the tariff, for the emigration of our people to the neighbouring republic. He acknowledges that with the exception of the French Canadians and a few others wishing to better themselves, those who left us were not worth much to Canada, and, they would have become, in a very short time, parasites.

The hon. Minister of the Interior intends to do a great deal to "repeople" Canada by encouraging a farming class of immigrants to this country who could buy farms on easy terms and by being given help from certain provinces so as to give to this campaign a more conclusive and practical object. The government gave proof of national spirit by organizing a special campaign encouraging the return to their native land of those French Canadians who left to establish themselves in the manufacturing centres of New England. If our friends on the opposite benches only wish to recall the fact, it was under the Conservative administration that the exodus of our people began. An hon. member belonging to the Progressive party, who is certainly not aware of the spirit of justice and equity which prevails in Quebec in regard to the distribution of government grants, asked the hon. Minister of the Interior, if the funds expended for the above-mentioned campaign would be applicable to the English speaking Canadians. If so, there would be no grounds to be scandalized if we so insist on the repatriation of the French Canadians, because as pointed out recently by l'Ecole Sociale Populaire, in a communication to the Minister of the Interior, should not the province of Quebec which has been paying for the last twenty-five years for the recruiting of foreigners destined to other provinces, keep its people?

Canada has been up to now, if we are to put faith in statistics,—and statistics are occasionally reliable—a sieve for immigrants brought here at our expense. Henceforth, our immigrants should be possessed of a different spirit and their only desire before coming across to our country, should be to live here forever. I know, Sir, that we shall never be able to prevent all our immigrants from resisting the powerful attraction of the great country to the south of us; however, so as to diminish the attraction of that great magnet, let us make life easier for all the citizens of Canada by a wise and judicious administration. The government has decided to allow a certain class of immigrants to enter the country. Very well, but to keep them here we must first train them. The recruiting agent should certainly show practical results in the country where he is called upon to work, but we must give him an agriculturist as an assistant who can advise the future settler on the character of the arable land, in the province where he intends to settle. Let not the immigrant come here and tempt fortune in a haphazard way.

What are to be the means employed to bring this campaign to a successful issue? An intelligent and truthful publicity carried on by agents speaking perfectly the language or the dialects of the country where they are sent to work.

Is the Civil Service Commission capable of selecting such agents? I refuse to believe it. The selection of such agents should be left to the minister, because qualified applicants may be easily found.

Mr. Chairman, shall this immigration be to the benefit only of the western provinces? I do not think so. Let us consult the statistics of last year; the immigrants that settled in Ontario were more than 38 per cent, in the West 42 per cent and in the East about 18 per cent. While the other provinces were losing almost all their immigrants, Quebec, during the last twenty years, has kept the 500,000 immigrants it received plus 146,000 the natural increase of its population.

The government's project, as recommended by the hon. minister is very acceptable, since he provides in the majority of cases for the reimbursement of the money which he will have paid out to draw settlers to this country. The collateral securities that the immigrant will have to put up in certain instances will shelter the government against any loss. Let the government watch over the selection of those who are to settle here. The worthy immigrant may become intolerable and the latter may change and become undesirable.

Let the repatriation of our people take precedence over all the other means to "repeople" Canada. Let a thorough examination, both in regard to moral and physical fitness of the future citizens of Canada, be made at the embarkation port, and let us be especially assured that the applicant possesses the spirit which will allow him to accept the ways and customs of our country. Let us not commit that great blunder that befell a governor of a large French colony, who wanted "his black subjects to accept progress against their will."

Our new settlers should be before and above all assimilable and we should not be obliged to alter entirely their notions in order to have them co-operate with us.

The primary requirements to be heeded, sir, are those in connection with human activities: when to act, how to act and in what limits to act?

A wise and prudent answer to each of these questions, will contain the whole policy of our government on the subject of immigration.

A scrupulous attention given to the selection of the new seeds which it is the intention to sow on Canadian soil will produce presently a new wheat whose maturing ears, under this same sun of liberty and tolerance, will ripen into a truly Canadian nation. Such united efforts witout favouring sectionalism as regards the interests of the different provinces of confederation, will promote the progress of our beautiful Canada and enable it to fulfil the sublime destinies that Providence has reserved for it on this continent of America. That, sir, will be the eager aim and desirable outcome of a sound policy of immigration.

Miss MACPHAIL: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the debate on immigration which has now been going on for some time. Some one made the statement to-day that possibly ninety per cent of the members who sit in this House were born on the farm; it would be interesting to know whether that estimate is true. If it is, I can only conclude, after listening to what a great many of the members have had to say, that some of them at least have very short memories; they have forgotten what living on a farm means. I thought from the speech of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) that he did not understand farming until he said that a person with a sound brain, much courage, and two pairs of capable hands could make a living when he turned his attention to cultivating the soil. I concluded then that the hon. member did understand farming. I was glad that the hon. member representing another Montreal constituency (Mr. Jacobs) spoke to-day because he made life on the farm and the difficulties which just now attend it so very plain that he saved me the trouble of doing so.

I believe that the real difficulty in Canada to-day is that there is too much difference between the standards of living of urban and rural people, and I believe that if we could re-adjust the rewards of life and effort we could solve the whole problem. Because the way to deal with the immigration problem is not to bring in new settlers, but to spread the present population more evenly over the country, in that way relieving congestion in the cities and avoiding the scarcity of population in the rural districts. I think that one of the things that makes people fight shy of working with their hands in this age is that as a nation we do not sufficiently respect those who toil with their hands. We have almost forgotten the biblical injunction that we were to earn our living by the sweat of our brow. I am amazed—and I feel that I would not be fair to myself, to my people or to the members of this House if I did not say so—I am truly amazed at the sentiments that are expressed by some of our well-groomed luxuriously living friends. They evidently have not had their brow wet with sweat for some time, or if they have their hands were not soiled with work on that occasion. I want to say right here that I respect more a person who knows what a good honest day's work is, a person who works with hand as well as brain, and who works so hard that he or she goes to sleep aching with weariness, than I do those people who disdain the very idea of toil and try to make it appear to the world that they do not understand what actual work means.

Mr. BUREAU: So say we all.

Miss MACPHAIL: I think that that is at the very basis of this problem in Canada.

In connection with this immigration scheme one hon. member recommended bringing in servant girls to Canada to work in homes, to do the work that the woman of the house would do if she did not have a servant. But that girl is not considered the social equal of those for whom she works. Why not? If her character and her brain are as good is she not the equal in every way of the woman of the house who hires a servant simply because her husband is in a financial position to enable her to do so? I think it is time we were trying to even up social standards and not make such a difference between those who work with their hands and those who work with their heads—work exclusively with their heads, I mean.

I do not see why there should be such a great anxiety to bring into Canada more farmers and more farm labourers at this particular time. The farmers are already, with the help of the experimental farms and the many things that have taught them how to produce abundantly, producing more than they can get rid of. There is no shortage of production, and yet it is sought to bring in more people into Canada to further produce when we are unable to consume what is already grown. This must have the effect of throwing upon the markets of the world a surplus which must be consumed somewhere.

I am very much opposed at this time to any large expenditure of money for immigration purposes. I believe that the immigration offices which have been kept open for years should remain so, and that immigrants,—fit in body and mind—that offer to come here should be accepted; but that any great scheme of what I might call artificial immigration should be launched at this time is, I think, a mistake. A great deal has been said here about farming conditions in western Canada, but very little has been said about farming conditions in Ontario. Consequently one would judge that people on the farms in that province were having a very pleasant time. That is not true. Farming in Ontario is right now passing through very strenuous times, and suffering more than it has done for a great many years. I received a letter, not more than a week ago, from the director of our organization in the township of Proton, Grey county, and in it he said that farming in Proton this year would not return them 3 per cent on the money invested. He also stated:

> All that is keeping us on the land is the fact that we cannot get off.

This letter did not come from a fanatic but from a man who is a successful farmer, as successful as farmers can be under existing conditions. I have heard it said many times that we have passed through the worst of the economic distress. I hope that is true, but I do not believe that it is. If the revival of trade in Canada is to depend on the increased buying power of the agriculturist, I feel quite sure that that revival is yet some distance in the future. The unsettled condition of Europe has very much to do with poor prices for farm products. The depreciation of the currency in many European countries which prevents them from buying food which we so abundantly produce, and the high tariff against us which prevents our sending our foodstuffs into the United States, all make it look to me as though a revival of good times in Canada would be very slow in coming. If that be true, then why are we going to spend this year a vast sum of money, an increase of a good deal over a million dollars, to bring settlers to Canada to put on the land, to live under conditions which the people who have been on the land during good times cannot live through? If we want to help things in Canada, I would make this suggestion to the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Stewart) amongst the many dozens of other suggestions he has received. If he wants to cheapen living and to make life more livable in Canada, I would suggest that he import more manufacturers, doctors and lawyers and cheapen the cost to the producer, so that when we take sick we shall not have to spend so much in order to have a doctor come and see whether we are going to die or not, and when we scrap with our neighbour over something, the lawyer will not get the property of both.

Mr. JACOBS: That does not happen in Quebec. It may in Ontario.

Miss MACPHAIL: I know we have some very gracious lawyers from Quebec. I am glad to learn that they would not do such a thing.

Mr. BUREAU: The same is true of the doctors. They would not see people die.

Miss MACPHAIL: I really think this is not the scheme of the common people, neither the farmers nor the labourers, nor the ordinary working business people. I really believe this scheme has been carefully prepared by those most interested in immigration, by those who would reap the reward of the labour of the immigrant. They have always been interested in immigration and they will always continue to be. I think it is quite possible that railway and steamship magnates, financial knights, land corporations and the government which they control, have more to do with this scheme than the people. The United Farmers' convention, in December of last year—and I am proud to call myself a representative in the House of Commons of Ontario agriculture—passed this resolution:

Resolved that this convention is utterly opposed to any system of state-aided immigration of agricultural workers or prospective land owners until economic conditions are so changed as to ensure the retention on the land of a fair proportion of those born there.

The whole question of immigration is one of economics. If you can make farming conditions in Ontario, in Quebec—because the farmers in Quebec are not very well represented in this House—in the Maritime provinces and in western Canada, livable, so that the people who work long hours, who have hands which bear the marks of much toil, who are faithful, who have courage, can, as a reward of their toil when applied to the land, have a fair amount of the good things of this life, whether those good things are in pleasure, in enough property to keep them in comfort in their old days, in culture or anything else—when that is true, that is all the immigration agency you will need; and until that is true, until farming in Canada is able to hold the best blood that is born on the land, you can spend all the people's money you want to spend in bringing people out and putting them on the land, but the best that are there will leave until conditions are rectified.

Mr. NEILL: I will leave to members from the prairies to discuss this question more immediately in relation to the farming industry there, because they are so much better qualified to do so. I will only say that I do not at all approve the suggested arrangement with this colonization company.

There are two minor matters to which I wish to allude briefly. The first is this, and so far as I know it has not been mentioned by any of the speakers. The Minister of Immigration (Mr. Stewart) told us, in fact we know that there is in vogue to-day a system whereby the railway agents of the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National become agents of immigration to the extent that they solicit applications from farmers for labourers, and then they gurantee immediately and speedily to supply that labour from Britain or Europe. I object to that because the government have gone to a good deal of expense to inaugurate a system of employment bureaus,—and they have shut down private employment bureaus—the idea being that wherever any scarcity of labour existed, application would perforce be made to the nearest government bureau and they would keep in touch with labour conditions throughout Canada. If there was a shortage of labour in one place and a surplus in another, they would be in a position to supply,—to feed the labour out—where needed. If a demand arises, as it so often does on the prairies, for labour which is of a mere seasonal character, they are generally able to supply it from the farms or towns of Ontario where that labour could return. But under this system, these railway agents act as immigration agents and the result will be confusion. Suppose the employment bureau has decided that a certain amount of labour of an agricultural character is required and they have provided for that. They suddenly find that these so-called railway immigration agents in the prairies have got orders for a certain number of farm labourers and they have rushed them in, in excess of those that have been provided for by the bureau. The system is not a good one, in any case; the people who solicit emigrants in the Old Country or Europe should not be those who have a direct pecuniary interest. Very often these agents in the Old Country are paid so much a head, and experience has shown that this is not a desirable practice. This system of having railway agents act as immigration agents is calculated to promote confusion with government bureaus, and the labour organizations strongly protest against it.

The other thing I want to draw attention to is the fact to which the minister alluded yesterday when he said: "We have no immigration agent in Norway". If there are in the world any people who make suitable settlers, they are Norwegians. I hardly put them second to the inhabitants of the British Isles. The latter are superior because they are familiar with our language, but beyond that, Norwegians and Swedes are in many cases better fitted to be pioneer settlers in this country than men from the British Isles, because in Norway and Sweden conditions in the rural districts are very similar to the bush districts of Quebec, northern Manitoba and British Columbia. Therefore, those people take more quickly to conditions existing in Canada when they come here. They make sturdy industrious settlers of the finest type, and they are very readily assimilated; in fact, the second generation cannot be distinguished from our native-born. They are a distinct advantage to our nation because they improve our blood. It is a notorious fact that nations in the northern part of Europe, brought up in a hard climate and under severe conditions, are of a more virile type than the peoples of southern Europe. We were told last year when this question was under discussion, that we had an agent at Bucharest and another at Warsaw. I would suggest that they be taken away from Bucharest and Warsaw and put into Norway and Sweden, and we would get a better class of settlers from those countries.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am sure the hon. gentleman did not hear my remarks correctly yesterday. What I said was that we were prepared to go into both those countries the moment their governments would allow us in. We quite appreciate everything the hon. gentleman is saying. The moment we have that permission we will go in, but so far we have not that permission.

Mr. NEILL: Does the government of Norway object?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. NEILL: I have a clipping which I took out of a local paper and which is headed:

Norwegian fishermen on their way to the Coast.

I may say that the Norwegian makes the very best class of fisherman, next shall I say to the Scot. It says here that:

Twenty Norwegian fishermen bound for Vancouver and Prince Rupert to engage in fishing at these points passed through here to-night.

Now, that is a forerunner of the fishing immigration that I anticipate, and I think I can justly anticipate it in consequence of the steps the government is taking in deference to the report of what is termed the Duff Fisheries Commission to reduce the number of Jap fishermen. It is claimed out there by the cannery men that ruin stares them in the face if they cannot have the labour of the Japanese; and yet within a few weeks of the publication of this report we find Norwegian fishermen on their way to take the place of these Japanese. And there are many more who will follow.

Now, that is all the criticism I wish to offer on the so-called policy as some hon. gentlemen sneeringly designated it, of the Minister of Immigration. I will go further. I will say that I congratulate the minister—and I say it in no spirit of sarcasm at all—not altogether on the policy that he has brought down but on that portion of it which he has not given to us. I say that, I repeat, in no spirit of cheap sarcasm, because I believe he has done a better service to this country in omitting a good deal of the policy which it was reported he would bring down. We heard a great deal about a much heralded immigration policy that would be introduced by the minister, but we did not hear anything about it from the minister himself. We heard it from a carefully arranged system of propaganada which was used to educate the public and incidentally to educate the minister himself into the idea that we should have the bars flung down entirely and a huge bold immigration policy put into force. First of all, those who were anxious to see such a policy put into effect ran to the minister and told him, "We must have this policy because it is needed in the interests of the country." Then, they ran to the public, through the medium of the newspapers and other sources, and told the public in bated breath, "Oh, the minister is going to bring down a grand, broad policy"; and they return to the minister and tell him that the public expects this policy and he must come through. But I give the minister credit for having withstood the influences that were brought to bear upon him. That the pressure was great we have only to listen to some of the speeches that have been made here to be convinced; and we learn as much from the press during the past six months.

There is no question that there was a skilfully arranged propaganda to force the minister into such a position that he would have to bring down practically an open-door policy. There are a number of people, perhaps I might call them unthinking people without implying any reflection on their intelligence, who have not thoroughly studied this question, and who have a vague idea that after the Liberals got into power in 1896 there ensued a wave of prosperity. The Liberals have preached that so often that no doubt a number of people believe it; and I think they almost believe it themselves. Associated with that fallacy also is an equally vague idea that the prosperity that prevailed at that time was correlative to the big immigration policy that was in operation in the years immediately subsequent to 1896. But we must bear in mind what the conditions were at that time. It is absurd to say that because something was successful then it will necessarily be successful now, when conditions have changed. What were the conditions then? There was absolutely free land, and abundance of it, close to the railways, and the markets of the world were crying for wheat. There was at least one transcontinental railway being constructed and later on there was another which took up the surplus labour that was not disposed to go on the land and become farmers. But what are the conditions to-day? There is no free land now. Land has been quoted at $18 to $25 an acre, and while that might not be costly under some conditions, it is surely costly in comparison with land which was got for nothing and which my hon. friends to my left say they can make nothing out of to-day. Hon. gentlemen to my left declare that out of that land which was free originally, a living cannot be derived to-day.

I am justified therefore in the assertion that land is costly now. Besides this, it is remote; because if it is eighteen miles from a railway, my hon. friends to my left state—and I have every confidence in their correctness in this regard—it is beyond the limit at which you can profitably haul wheat to the market. So that summing up, there is no free land to-day, what land there is available is costly, it is remote, there is no railway construction, and there is practically no market, or at any rate a restricted one for wheat. And I shudder to think what the conditions in the prairies would be to-day if we had to compete with the wheat that used to go to the European market from the south of Russia. If that wheat were being unloaded on the market to-day the conditions in the prairies would be a good deal worse than they are.

An hon. member on the opposite side, the name of whose constituency I regret I have never ascertained, but whose charming personality will never be effaced from my recollection, spoke about the unseen hand, the hidden interest. He also mentioned something about an Ethiopian in the woodpile. Well, I too seem to be able to smell an Ethiopian in the woodpile; but it is a different woodpile, and a slightly differently coloured Ethiopian. I maintain that there is good reason for the assertion that the real insistent demand, what I might call the original demand, for this bold immigration policy of letting down all the bars comes from but two sources. It is true it is put forward by many other bodies now, no doubt many were innocently intrigued by the skilful propaganda that has been carried out. There are many men who firmly and honestly, I think, believe that we should have such an immigration policy and who had nothing to do with the origination of this propaganda. But I am firmly convinced that the real insistent demand for this flood of immigration—cheap labour is really the term—comes from but two sources with which I will briefly deal. The first one is the transportation companies, and that applies as well to our own railways and steamships. I have here a cutting from a paper of last October, which says that the transportation men, a number of high officials of the railways and steamship companies waited on the Hon. Charles Stewart, and presented to him a memorandum urging the adoption of "an aggressive immigration policy." The companies represented at the conference were the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Canadian National Railways, the White Star Dominion Line, the Cunard Line, and Anchor-Donaldson Line, and no doubt they represented other interests allied to them.

Now just consider the way in which these people submit this demand of theirs to the minister. They do not come and say "We represent a transportation company or a steamship company and we want the job of bringing over immigrants." Not at all; they were not so crude. It is the naivète of the thing that amuses me. They come and tell the minister, "We, acting on the high principle that what we suggest is in the best interests of Canada, demand in the name of Canada this bold immigration policy." This is very much on a par, I think, with the action of a delegation that might come to this House as representing, say, the interests of the brick manufacturers. Suppose such a delegation should say to the government that they demanded, in the name of the good of Canada, that we should pass a law, by reason of the danger of wooden houses being easily destroyed by fire and because of their short duration, that all houses should henceforth be made of brick. Now, what would be the first idea that would suggest itself to one's mind? Why, one would say, "You are not a good witness; you are an interested party. You may be acting for the good of Canada, but we have a shrewd suspicion that your mind is more filled with bricks than with any high principles about the interests of Canada."

The parallel, I think, is complete. It would be better, we should say with the Scriptures, to let another man praise thee and not thine own mouth. If the transportation companies want to bring people over to this country it is their legitimate right to do whatever they can to secure for themselves that traffic. But when they presume, in the alleged interests of Canada, to dictate to the minister what policy he shall adopt, that is entirely another thing and they are going beyond the bounds of reason.

The other body which, I claim, is at the back of this demand for a bold immigration policy is the large corporation of employers in Canada. Their ideal of a proper industrial condition is that there should be always a large surplus of idle population, a sort of bank of idleness, a bank of reserve labour from which they can draw when they need labour and obtain it without much competition and which, when they have used it to meet an emergency, they can put back on the shelf for the general public to warehouse against the time when it may be needed again. They want such a bank of labour which they can draw upon at their convenience and foist off upon the public when they are done with it.

Now, that used to be a popular idea and the world saw nothing wrong with it, but times have changed and the world has learned that we cannot afford to do that—we cannot afford to allow large numbers of men to remain idle for long periods. It is too costly and too dangerous and can no longer be tolerated. We used to think that labour paid the price of that storage—did we not?—but we know now that we pay for it. We pay for it in the mental and physical deterioration of the workers for one thing. We pay for it as well in the cost of the doles, amounting up to millions. In the Old Country those unemployment doles amount to many millions every month. They are forced to do it over there or there would be a revolution. We are forced to do it in Canada to meet the ever-pressing demands of the unemployed, and we pay in that way as well as in the other way I have indicated.

We pay in many directions, and we pay perhaps most of all in this direction—in the economic degradation of our workers. Mr. Chairman, I have never had the misfortune to stand in a bread line, I am glad to say, but I have been perilously near it. I have been for weeks unable to get work in spite of the most assiduous efforts, and I realized then, as one only can from personal experience, how rapidly and how insidiously the deterioration of a genuine worker goes on under those conditions, especially for single men without home ties—conditions which people would hardly believe. The tendency to deteriorate is rapid. Those in the lower stratum, those with small education, eventually turn or tend to turn into hoboes. We do not have many in Canada, but they have hundreds of thousands of them in the States, caused by just such conditions as I have outlined. There was an investigation held some years ago, and testimony taken, and it was shown that many of those hoboes were honest workingmen originally, but who had drifted into the hobo life, and having once acquired the habit it stays with them. Those men a little higher up, men with a little more education and brains, are not so apt to become hoboes as they are to live on their wits and prey upon the public. They say, "Well, the world owes us a living," and they become parasites on society. That is another way in which we pay, and pay very dearly, for this warehousing of labour for the benefit of the corporation employers until they may need it.

There is another way we pay for it—in the increase of the smouldering discontent of the labouring men in Canada to-day. A lot of people think that because a fire is smouldering it is not very harmful. A fire may be smouldering but extending, and when it bursts out into conflagration it will be a great deal worse than if it burst into flame at the outset. And our economic methods to-day are tending to increase the smouldering discontent of the working men. It is all very well, Mr. Chairman, to airily dismiss it as Bolshevism. Bolshevik is the term applied nowadays to anyone who opposes you politically. But it does not follow that these men's opinions are Bolshevism; they are not. I would rather call it—and I speak of what I know because I have been amongst these men—I would rather call it the settled unalterable conviction that a large body, a majority in fact of the people of Canada are not getting a square deal from the minority, the ruling and employing classes. I do not say that that conviction is justified—it may be so, but at least it is only so in part. But it is there, and it has to be reckoned with, and these long periods of unemployment in mass formation, so to speak, are just the sort of thing that incites and increases this sentiment.

For these reasons and for many others I am strongly in favour of our going slowly in allowing ourselves to be made the vehicle, not to say the tool, for piling up a large surplus of idle labour for the corporation people to play with as they may require it. Industry if it tried—but it does not—might often improve industrial conditions of labour. By seeking a way of readjusting their business somewhat they could often cut down these periods of seasonable unemployment, but they do not do so because they find it much cheaper to yell about a broad policy of immigration to get the public to bring in these immigrants, and then we common people, the ordinary bourgeoisie, so to speak, have to pay the price of keeping the men idle when the corporations no longer need them. In the States there has been the same propaganda. For the last six or seven months the corporations there have howled about how badly they needed labour, just the same as they howled here in Canada, but apparently the plutocrat does not seem to be on top just now in the States because we find that during a recent session of Congress the quota of immigrants allowed from any given country was cut down from three per cent to two per cent; and not only that, but the basis was changed. This two per cent is calculated upon the immigrants of one year, a year much earlier than before, and the result is to still more greatly reduce the quota of immigrants. More than that, Congress passed a measure absolutely excluding all Asiatics, which again reduced immigration. Surely with that object lesson before our eyes this is no time for us to pull down the barriers and have a free-for-all immigration. But enough of that subject.

Now, Sir, I just want to suggest two new ideas. I do not think they are really new, but they may be to some hon. members. And of course the fact that they are new will lead many hon. members to look at them askance and with suspicion; it would not be for the first time. Twenty-three years ago I remember advocating in the legislature of British Columbia that the then system of taxation was a poor one and that a better system to adopt would be that of the income tax. I did not find a man to back me up in what is now a commonplace. There was an hon. gentleman sitting opposite me, a member of the cabinet, and a very wealthy man. He looked at me with horror and turning to his desk-mate he said, "Do you hear that man? He ought to be in gaol." That was the sentiment twenty-three years ago. I am sorry to say that my dreams have been over-realized—we have three income taxes now! But perhaps these new ideas, these weird suggestions I am going to make may twenty-three years from now bear practical fruit. I have in my hands a pamphlet giving the transactions of the Commonwealth Club of California. I wish to be as brief as possible and shall only touch on the beginning and end of this article. It is a very excellent society. It takes up subjects of importance touching the welfare of the commonwealth of the United States, and it employs or procures the very best brains to deal with the subjects taken in hand. I may say that one of these men is the ex-superintendent of the Census Bureau of the United States. This will show the standing of the men engaged by the club. The pamphlet sets out a thesis, and goes into the argument, and ends up with the conclusion. The thesis is this: "That immigration does not increase the population of a nation." That is perhaps a new idea. The members go very thoroughly into the matter indeed and I wish I had time to elaborate the argument. It is plain and simple, and it is backed up by the soundest reasoning and accurate figures, and is handled by men who apparently have no possible axe to grind This is the conclusion reached:

> The law of population that has led to a decline in the American birth rate substantially equal to the number of immigrants admitted is in operation to-day just as rigidly as in the past. It will govern the century to come just as it has governed the century that is gone.
>
> The question for the American people—

And for the Canadian, too.

> —to decide is whether the land shall be peopled by the descendants of those now here or shall pass in large part to those who will come from other lands.
>
> Except for brief periods,—

And this is the crux of the whole thing.

> —immigration will not increase the population above the figure it will reach without immigration.

Rather startling, is it not? But it is so.

> The influences that determine population are inexorable; and if we admit those from other lands we shall decrease by a like number those who will be born of those now here.
>
> The question for cold-blooded consideration by the American—

By the Canadian.

> —of to-day is this: Do you want the soil inherited by your son or by the son of one who now toils in a foreign land?

The argument is, you only change the population. If you bring in a thousand to-day, of course, there will be a thousand more to-morrow; but in long periods, calculated by decades, it is proved conclusively that you only change the population, you do not increase it. And the result is that instead of having in America, the American and Nordic stock, you have the Slav and the less desirable immigrant from southeastern Europe. That is another reason we might well consider in connection with this question of whether we can make a fortune by free for all immigration.

Mr. McMASTER: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question? Why is the immigrant from southeastern Europe undesirable?

Mr. NEILL: For many reasons. In many instances he is not an agriculturist; he runs to small businesses and to city life. The principal reason, however, is that he is born in a southern climate and has not the vitality and the virility of the men from the north of Europe. He does not assimilate; he remains in colonies of his kind. Where we find the Norwegian soon calling himself not Jonsen but Johnstone, and may be governor of the state or a candidate for the presidency, the other man remains in his own environment and is more or less a city dweller.

I was going to say that for the reasons I have enunciated I appreciate the moderation of the policy brought down by the Minister of Immigration. But I do think he has made a slight mistake in his dealing with the prairies; I think he has, in a measure, put the cart before the horse. The idea seems to be to bring in a lot more farmers and that farming on the prairies will then be prosperous.

I suggest that the other method be adopted; make your farmers prosperous on the prairies, and the immigrants will come of their own accord. It may be urged that that is a trite saying: "Yes, make them prosperous, but how?" My friends to the left, the Progressives, say, by a free trade policy. I think, Mr. Chairman, they do not say it with quite the assurance or with quite the emphasis they did last year. I may be wrong in that, and if so I offer my apologies, but I do not think they are quite so insistent upon a policy of free trade as a panacea for all their evils as they were a year ago. At any rate, if it were to be at all successful it would have to be complete free trade; anything less than that would be so trivial a reduction in their costs as to be immaterial. Very well; we will allow for the sake of argument that if we have absolute free trade we benefit the farmer, but at the expense of the eastern portions of Canada, of the manufacturers of the East. That is too big a price. I do not want to be a party to ruining the eastern provinces for the benefit of my prairie friends. On the other hand, it is equally unthinkable, equally fatal for us to allow the prairie provinces to be depopulated—because that is eventually what must take place if they do not get relief.

Mr. GOULD: The hon. member is making a presumption that is not correct. I do not know that the group of which I have the honour to be a member has ever taken the stand on free trade that he presupposes; neither is it on record on any of our platforms or incorporated in any of our teachings that we support that principle. It is something that has been thrown at us; it is not something we have subscribed to in any particular.

Mr. NEILL: I am very glad to hear my hon. friend's statement. I would answer it by referring to the pages of Hansard.

If, then, we cannot agree on free trade, what is the remedy? Unfortunately the obvious remedy is an impossible one—reciprocity with the United States. That is out of court for the present; we cannot achieve it however much we may desire it. But there is another remedy that I suggest, and it is even more iconoclastic than the one I enunciated before about the population. Let us meet the United States people on their own ground. If they say they are going to have high protection, then we must say that we are going in also for protection. But if we do that, we should go in for all-round protection applied not only to the manufacturer but also to the farmer of the prairies. The question then arises, how can you protect the farmer when his goods are exported? The suggestion I make is that in view of the long railway haul, the only one in the world applying to the production of wheat and therefore handicapping the prairies to a very serious extent, we should adopt a system on a sliding scale of bonusing the wheat of the country and thus put the prairie farmer on the same level as the eastern manufacturer. I know my friends will hold up their hands in holy horror and say that that is an unsound economic principle. But I do not care anything about theories or principles of that description. I never studied economics, but I learned in a hard school that where there was a grievous evil, a practical remedy should be applied to it. I suggest this as a practical remedy. Germany a few years ago, speaking in terms of the life of a nation, was almost solely agricultural—more so even than Canada is to-day, but by the adoption of this system; by the payment of bonuses to her native or imported industries, she had a long chance to become the economic mistress of the world. Had she not gone mad in 1914 she would by this time practically dominate the world in matters of trade. That is the system I suggest we should use to-day. It may be all wrong; it may be against economic principles —but suggest a better one if you can! Now, speaking for my own district—because I would not presume to state the views of other parts of Canada—I believe the "middle of the road" policy, as he called it, of moderate immigration suggested by the minister will meet with the approval of my constituents. I will go further—and here I speak only personally; I think it will conduce ultimately to the best interests of Canada.

Mr. DENIS (St. Denis) (Translation): Mr. Chairman, the immigration question is to my mind the most important of all those which have been debated during the present session.

The hon. Minister of the Interior has given us a masterly outline of the policy which he proposes to follow in this respect. I must offer him my sincere congratulations and at the same time promise him my entire support. Our country, although in its infancy, has before it a most brilliant future. It has known days of prosperity as well as days of depression. At present, it has a population of over 8,000,000. Its territory is very extensive. The natural resources are abundant, in fact inexhaustible. The soil is very fertile and large areas only await vigorous hands to yield crops sufficient to feed the whole of Europe. Although our industries are somewhat at a standstill, owing to unstable trade conditions, they are gradually picking up as the market becomes firmer. Our labouring class reduced to unemployment through the shortage of work are experiencing a rather serious crisis; however we notice a change for the better in their conditions. Nevertheless, I think it would be a great mistake at present to believe and especially to state, even on the floor of the House that the labouring class are satisfied with their present conditions. I congratulate the government for closing the gates to all the labouring class of immigrants. Its duty at present, is to better the living conditions of the workman by supplying his family and himself with the means of existence; as long as the normal economic situation is not reestablished we must not open wide our doors but keep them well closed.

I consider, Mr. Chairman, that the first duty of a good government is to furnish to all citizens the means of existence, it would be an unnational and unpatriotic policy to bring in immigrants belonging to the labour class, when misery still reigns in many homes as a result of unemployment. What we want, at present, in this country, are settlers, real settlers, it matters little whether they be English, French, Belgian, Italian, Jew or Scotch, as long as they can be assimilated, are sound of body and mind, are not bolshevists, anarchists, nor socialists, are thoughtful of the moral and religious conditions and obedient to the laws of our country.

For the last few years, Mr. Chairman, farming, if I am to believe the doleful stories of our hon. friends the Progressives, does not give the same returns as it did previous to the war. I am of the same opinion; however, although the condition of the farmer is very precarious, I think there is some exaggeration. That the western farmer's plight is more serious than that of the eastern farmer, I am ready to acknowledge. The hon. Minister gave us the true solution when he said: If we wish colonization to progress in the west, we must avoid past mistakes and not sell to the new settler more land than he can cultivate. The hon. Minister considers that 160 acres of land constitute a large farm; it is, indeed, ample for a settler if he desires to farm it with good results. That there may be other reasons than those I have just given, that contribute in making farming in the West a poor paying proposition, such for instance as the high price of labour, the high freight rates and lack of transportation facilities, I admit; but I think the keynote of success for a farmer is to make the most of every inch of ground at his disposal and that all his efforts must be concentrated with that aim in view, bettering as much as possible his method of farming and adapting it to the conditions of his land so as to husband its power of production indefinitely.

I do not wish, Mr. Chairman, to detain any longer the attention of the hon. members of this House, however before closing my remarks I would ask the hon. Minister to use discretion in his choice of immigration agents. Each country has its particular ways and the agent must necessarily be familiar with these conditions. I doubt very much if an agent having only English at his command and unacquainted with the particular ways of the people would be a success in Belgium or in France. Every agent must be fitted for the position, if we wish that the money we are going to vote be profitable to the country.

In the past, Sir, the government made use of the agents of transportation companies. I think it was a great mistake, for these agents were more interested in increasing the number of passengers, so as to show large increases in their business, rather than bring into the country desirable settlers. What we are in need of are settlers capable of being assimilated, sound of body and mind, desirous of entering our country with a view to settling down and become part of the great Canadian family and contribute to its prosperity.

Mr. MacLAREN: During this debate there have been innumerable views put forward regarding the subject of population and of immigration. The only common ground that I have observed in the debate is that there should be an increase in population, that it is of great importance and of value to the state. It has been put forward that increase in population may be secured by increase in the birth rate, decrease in the death rate, diminution of the exodus and by immigration.

As regards the first point, an increased birth rate, I do not know that I can give the minister any very valuable suggestions on how it can be secured, but I would wish to make use of a phrase which has occurred several times during the debate, and that is to let nature take its course. As regards the diminution of the death rate, that is necessarily a slow process. To attain it is a process of gradual education throughout the country, and that is now going on. We all recognize the advance that public health is making in the country. I do not think it reasonable to expect the advance in public health and an improvement in the death rate to occur in more than a gradual way, and that is now going on in as satisfactory a way as we can reasonably expect. Therefore, the minister cannot look to that as any substantial basis upon which to increase the population.

Then we come to the checking of the exodus from this country. What can the government do in this particular? I do not think that I can suggest anything to the government to secure this beyond what they could do if they saw fit. It would be a declaration to the country of a fixed determination to carry out a protective tariff policy. Now, while this at the present time is somewhat in force, it is not frankly put before the country. It is not put forward by the government as an article of their faith. The difficulty arising from this is that the country lacks the stimulus to the expansion of trade and industry that it otherwise, I believe, would secure. That being the case, and I presume that it will not be the policy of the government to make any such declaration, it comes to this, that the minister and the country will have to fall back upon immigration. I grant you that in any case the policy of immigration must be a very large and important factor under all the circumstances. Whatever the tariff policy of the government may be and whatever the death rate may be, I believe we must still look to immigration as a very important part of any policy to increase the population of this country. That being granted I ask, what principle should we adopt in carrying out our policy of immigration. I believe the principle we should adopt is to bring these people into those districts where they are needed, where the industries and occupations are suffering from a shortage of men to carry them on. That should be the true principle underlying our immigration policy, and I think that is the principle the minister proposes to carry out. The hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) this afternoon advanced the view that we should bring in immigrants, doubtless artisans and mechanics, and place them in the cities. In this way the labour market in the cities would be supplied and the tendency to drift from the rural districts into the centres of population would be lessened. It does not seem to me, however, that that can be regarded in any way as sound advice to the government, first of all because artisans are not needed to the same extent that farmers are; but in any case the adoption of such a policy would produce a condition of unemployment—without the advantage of populating the country districts. I therefore think the true principle is to attract to our country men of a class of occupation that we lack in Canada.

[Mr. MacLaren.]

As regards the volume of immigration at which we should aim, I am not one of those who believe in crowding the country too rapidly. There is no advantage in it; quality is always better than quantity. I think the minister would be well advised were he to admit immigrants in generous numbers but under regulation and always governed by the idea of quality, the purpose being to procure suitable men who will be of substantial value to Canada.

Having advanced this view I would now ask: How are the immigrants to be distributed throughout the Dominion? That is an important question and one that, in my judgment, has not been given the attention or received the consideration in past years to which it was entitled. What has happened? The large proportion of immigrants arriving in Canada has been directed to the West. That was quite natural because the field of settlement lay there. The free lands were there, the movement was along the line of least resistance, and therefore an enormous number of immigrants proceeded to the West. I do not say the West received too many immigrants; I do not think it did. I do say, however, that other portions of Canada have not received the attention which was their due. It was an advantage to the whole of Canada for a large number of immigrants to go to the West, but other portions of the country should also have received attention.

The minister has referred to the various ways in which he proposes to deal with the different portions of the Dominion. Now, the needs of the country vary very greatly; so do the previous occupations of the immigrants. Their aspirations are also widely different. It is well that they should go to different portions of the Dominion, as prompted by their own wishes and in harmony with the needs of Canada. This is a matter in which we are keenly interested. This phase of the question has not received that attention from past governments that it was fairly entitled to, and we hope that the minister will now be able to make good this past deficiency. I am afraid, however, from what I heard him say this afternoon that his policy will not meet this situation. I will give my reason for that opinion. The minister has outlined an elaborate programme for the West. What is proposed to be done with respect to the East? The minister has an official in the United States who is occupying his time in repatriating Canadians to the province of Quebec. As regards the Maritime provinces the minister states that he has an official in London who is familiar with the needs of New Brunswick, that is Mr. Bowder. Now, Mr. Bow-der has been in the employ of the Dominion government in London since the first of November, having been taken on on a ninety days' certificate. He had previously been in the New Brunswick office in London for some considerable period and remained there until that office was closed. After having served the ninety day period, an extension of another ninety days was granted. It does not seem to me, under the circumstances, that any very great regard has been shown for an officer holding such a responsible position. I do think that an official capable of doing effective and reasonably valuable work in connection with the province of New Brunswick should hold a position of a more definite and permanent character than Mr. Bowder has been given.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I may tell my hon. friend that we have made application for his permanency. Of course, that will be settled by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MacLAREN: I am very glad to hear that. I know that Mr. Bowder made application to be appointed an immigration agent and that the Civil Service Commission took the position, on the advice, I think, of the Department of Justice that as he was a resident of Great Britain he could not be appointed an agent. Perhaps the minister will have an opportunity of looking into this matter further.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My hon. friend's statement is news to me; I had not heard that. Does my hon. friend say that the Civil Service Commission would not appoint a Britisher to the office?

Mr. MacLAREN: The circumstances are these: I happen to know Mr. Bowder; I have taken an interest in him for several years. I received a letter from him dated London, February 8, 1923, in which he states:

> I have been employed, on instructions from the Minister of Immigration and Colonization in the Dominion Emigration office. London, as a temporary employee on a 90 days certificate, which was renewed for a similar period again on the 29th ult.—

And so on. He tells me that he has applied to be appointed an immigration agent and asks me to interest myself in the matter. When I received his letter, I wrote to the Civil Service Commission, and this is the reply from the secretary of the commission under date of February 22:

> I have your letter of the 20th instant enclosing some correspondence from the above named—
> W. R. Bowder,
>
> —who is anxious to obtain employment in connection with Canadian emigration work in the Old Country. His letter has special reference to vacancies now being filled by competition under the auspices of this commission in Great Britain. In this connection he mentions in his letter that he had been promised advice in the event of a vacancy occurring but that he received no notification of the above-mentioned vacancy, but had his attention called to it through an advertisement in the Gazette.
>
> In reply, I am instructed to say that Mr. Bowder's application is on file in this office and would not be overlooked in the event of an opportunity offering to consider him, but in the particular case under consideration, namely, the present vacancies in Great Britain, the commissioners have decided that applicants resident in England cannot be admitted. This decision was reached on the advice of the Department of Justice in view of the large number of candidates apparently possessing the qualifications required and resident in Canada.
> I may add that information to the above effect is being sent to Mr. Bowder.

Mr. Bowder, I believe, has lived both in England and in Canada, and his residence at present in London grew out of the fact that he was in the New Brunswick London office. Perhaps the minister will have an opportunity of further investigation upon that point; but I would submit that an official holding such a position and suitable, as I think Mr. Bowder is, should have the status, the influence and the permanency of a permanent immigration agent.

I was trying to describe what I thought was too scanty consideration of the Maritime provinces in connection with the immigration policy. There is another point. I instanced the fact of there being in the United States a Dominion official whose duty is to secure and repatriate Canadians to the province of Quebec. The minister has told us that there is an official from Halifax who is now at Boston and who has a similar function. Perhaps the minister can inform us if this official at Boston is co-operating with the New Brunswick government.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes. I suggested to him when meeting him in Chicago, I think, in October last, that he should go back to both provinces and get full information as to the requirements in these provinces.

Mr. MacLAREN: If there is co-operation obtained especially with the local government, that may be of advantage; but I see this difficulty, that he is representing two provinces, or perhaps three, and if that be the case, I do not anticipate that we, in New Brunswick, will get very great results from that arrangement. At the present time, there are in New Brunswick hundreds of vacant farms. I would suggest to the minister that he consider whether there could not be in reference to New Brunswick a somewhat similar arrangement on a smaller scale to that which he now has in reference to Quebec, under which arrangement there will be an official whose duty it will be to secure the return of former New Brunswick residents to New Brunswick. One would certainly rather see them all go to Quebec than not come to Canada. One does not wish to take any limited view; but we want to take the view that there is something coming, and I should like to have heard the minister say that he had a little more definite policy for each province. There must, of course, be a general policy; but if the minister would say we hope to do something for Quebec, something for Prince Edward Island, something for Nova Scotia and something for New Brunswick, we would feel there was something tangible in his policy. At the present time I feel that New Brunswick will get very little out of the policy as we have heard it enunciated. I may be mistaken about the matter; I shall be very glad to confess my mistake if the minister's policy should prove to be different; but I believe if we can secure a more important appointment in the government's office in London, if we can have an official who will care especially for the repatriation of New Brunswickers from the United States and who will co-operate with the New Brunswick government, we shall make a substantial advance, something that is worth while.

As I said, there are in New Brunswick hundreds of vacant farms and while, naturally, it is easier for the Dominion government to concentrate more on the parts of the country where they have lands of their own, surely the duty of the government is to care for all the provinces. It is probably more difficult for the government to do that, but that is not sufficient reason why the needs of the provinces should be overlooked. I do not direct these remarks especially at the minister. He is only enunciating his policy, but what I have heard does not satisfy me that there is enough in it to make it a success for New Brunswick. What I am referring to more particularly is our past history, and statistics will show that immigration to New Brunswick and, I presume to the other Maritime provinces due to the Dominion government's policy, has been extraordinarily small. I believe the minister can get more value for the money he spends in bringing men to take the vacant farms, than by putting the money into some of the other schemes he proposes to put it into. Perhaps the minister would be good enough to go further into this.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): What my hon. friend is asking for has been promised the New Brunswick government, that is, that Mr. Bowder would be operating in the Old Country, and that they would have a man who would work in their interest. They did not discuss the abandoned farms with me; but I wrote the particular agent who is operating in the United States in the interest of New Brunswick to keep closely in touch with the New Brunswick government and to try to fill the necessities as they arose of the province of New Brunswick. The same applies, of course, to Nova Scotia.

Mr. MacLAREN: I think, with the minister, that is a vital matter. The local government will necessarily be familiar with the situation; its co-operation is essential, and there is no difficulty in obtaining the co-operation of any provincial government. There may be as regards expenditure of money, but that is a different matter.

The other point to which I wish to refer is this. I should like the minister, when he is replying to the many suggestions that have been made and the views that have been put forward, to tell us what arrangements are being made regarding the distribution of farm labourers and domestic servants. I understand that it is the policy to bring these two classes into the country in addition to farmers, and with that I am fully in accord. I think these are three classes of people who should receive the preference. Domestic servants and farm labourers are not the classes that would come from the United States. We cannot look to that country for them; we must go beyond the seas, and I hope especially to Great Britain. Are there any plans as regards the distribution of domestic servants throughout the country? Will these immigrants and the farm labourers be distributed throughout the Dominion?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I cannot wholly support the remarks which have been made expressing sympathy with the minister in regard to his policy, or rather his lack of policy. I cannot fall in line with the statements of my iconoclastic friend from British Columbia (Mr. Neill) who spoke a few moments ago except in so far as they deplore the attempt that has been made, and which has been wholly successful, to induce the minister and the government to adopt what will eventually become an absolutely open-door policy. If that is not the aim of the department why the appalling increase in the estimates this year?—why an increase of $1,316,400? In the past you can trace where in a decade hardly more money was spent than we propose to spend this year in the increase alone.

I shall have something to say in regard to that feature of the question in a moment. But I want to assure the minister of one thing, and that is that I am absolutely in favour of justifiable immigration. And when I say justifiable immigration I mean immigration that is purely voluntary and absolutely selected. In other words, it will be essential to maintain in European countries, whence immigrants can come, and in the United States, a staff of men inspecting medically and otherwise those who propose to come of their own volition.

The present policy—it seems that is the only word we can use to express ourselves in regard to the statement that has been presented by the minister—bears, as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) and others who sit behind the minister have said, the earmarks of pressure from some Ethiopian, or something of that kind. I entirely concur in that statement. Indeed, we cannot do otherwise than believe it. We find in a despatch printed in a western paper, forwarded from Ottawa, the statement that the inspection of intending immigrants before they depart from European ports to Canada is to be continued, and I want to congratulate the minister and his department on their firmness in this matter. But why should it be necessary for the minister to declare himself on behalf of Canada in this regard? It is because the transportation companies had asked that this system be dispensed with, according to the despatch. If this is true I want to brand it as one of the most appalling attempts that have ever been made in this or any other country to secure tonnage, for we can call it nothing else, for the steamship and transportation companies at the expense of the unfortunates who may be deported.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have no brief for the steamship companies, but in fairness to them I should tell my hon. friend that there came from them no such request at all. There are a great many despatches that are issued from the capital and I may say that I knew nothing about this one. But the steamship companies would much prefer inspection on the other side of the water, and in fairness to them I think I should make that known.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am glad to hear the minister say so. But if that is the case there has been a great change of heart on the part of these companies since his predecessor, Sir Clifford Sifton, held office. Speaking before the Toronto Board of Trade not so long ago, Sir Clifford Sifton said that the shipping people were very hostile to attempts made to confine immigration to certain desirable people. The report says:

> They did not care what kind of people—

I want you to note the words.

> —were brought to Canada. All they wanted to do was to bring the people here.

I sincerely trust that that attitude on the part of the transportation companies has been overcome. I have listened with the greatest attention to the minister and have carefully noted the declarations of the government from the outset this session, and I have not heard a single word that would encourage me in the belief that the administration now in power in this country is about to launch any definite policy of amelioration or alleviation of conditions as they exist today in the agricultural districts. Undoubtedly, the programme of propaganda that was carried on during the summer must have inspired the hon. member for Comox-Alberni to the outburst he was guilty of a little while ago which I certainly enjoyed. But some of the propaganda is illuminating. We find that open-door immigration is urged upon the department in order to settle up vacant lands lying idle. And these are the reasons given:

> For example, the settlement of one township of land now lying vacant and undeveloped would mean the construction of quite a group of new farm residences, barns, outbuildings, fences, etc., with a resultant demand for lumber, hardware, cement, and other building materials. It would mean an additional school or two. Farm machinery of all kinds would be required. New roads and possibly bridges would have to be constructed calling for more road machinery, steel, cement, culverts and labor. The manufacture of these things would call for the profitable investment of capital, the employment of skilled workers in the work of manufacture, and of unskilled labor in the production of needed raw materials. In the haulage of raw materials to the factories, and food and clothing for the factory workers, and the finished products from factory to consumer, the railways would secure much needed traffic, and, as the township became producing, return traffic to the markets of the world.

We do not read one solitary word about what is to happen to the settler when he comes here; it is all filled with what is going to accrue to the great manufacturing and transportation interests. An hon. member (Mr. Marler) the other day rather intimated, perhaps unintentionally, as I am quite willing to believe, that we painted the picture of deplorable conditions in the West in too lurid a fashion. I assure him that, on the contrary, we do not paint it nearly as bad as it actually is. I have not yet heard a single member on this side of the House tell of the things which I could show the hon. gentleman, if he cared to witness them next summer, day after day in my own constituency. Let me try to give him an example.

Mr. MARLER: Let me ask the hon. gentleman a question. Are the western prairies worth while bringing immigrants to, or not?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Will the hon. member explain just what he means by that question?

Mr. MARLER: Yes, I would like to know, is it possible for selected settlers to make a livelihood on the prairies providing they possess average intelligence?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, under present conditions on the prairies I say it is absolutely impossible—absolutely impossible.

Mr. MARLER: Then it is absolutely no use to bring immigrants to the prairies at the present time?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Absolutely. That is what I shall endeavour to demonstrate before we get through. In my opinion there is no use spending millions lavishly to bring people to this country when those already here cannot make a living. An hon. member on the other side of the House said to me one day recently that the peasant from south-eastern Europe who will dig himself into a hole or live in a sod shack is the kind of man Canada wants. Well, even those poor devils are just as badly off as the rest. If you bring them in they will stay a little while and then leave us.

Mr. MARLER: Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that everyone is insolvent in the three prairie provinces?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The actual condition is so close to it that we might as well call it so. In the province of Alberta out of 80,000 farmers 20,000 are absolutely insolvent, and the majority of the remainder are approaching that state rapidly. Thirteen million dollars will be required this year alone to renew farm mortgages in that province. In the southern portion that comes under the operation of the Drouth Area Relief Act no less than $25,000,000 of debt has been administered by the commissioner in charge of that act. That was the amount of indebtedness turned over to him to endeavour to apportion among the various creditors, but which has of course not been paid.

Mr. MARLER: Will my hon. friend inform the committee who created these particular mortgages and for what reason? Was it on account of over-buying or anything of that description? Possibly not.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Let me inform the hon. gentleman of this fact. Shortly after the war was over a policy of financial deflation was commenced and carried out with the most ruthless brutality by those who alone can carry out such a policy. The immediate result was deplorable. Let me give my hon. friend an example of my own. In the fall of 1920 I think it was—I speak from memory and am not quite certain that my dates are absolutely correct—had I been able to thresh and dispose of the crop I would have been able to pay all my debts. But I did not get it threshed that year until October, nor did my neighbours, and by that time the rapid toboggan of prices had commenced, and when we actually got our grain to the market not only were we unable to pay our debts out of the proceeds but we had to carry over heavy liabilities to the following year. Pressure was exerted by the banks—very gently at first, but very steadily, and we had to meet it. Subsequently our debts piled up and mortgages had to be taken out. Just to meet the mortgage interest and renewals alone that amount of money which I have mentioned was required. This is official information issued by the government of the province of Alberta.

Of course deflation has not been the only factor. Drouth has had something to do with the trouble, but this does not apply so greatly to the north. A particular instance I wish to cite is that of a very good friend of mine living in the district of Hanna ordinarily a fairly good district. He is interested in the work of parliament. I thought I would send him a copy of Hansard, and this is the letter I received from him in acknowledgement:

> I received the first copy and my wife and I are very thankful to you for sending us Hansard this year. I assure you we appreciate it very much. In view of our financial condition we had discussed very seriously what item of our household expense we could dispense with or retrench in order to get Hansard as we wanted it very much.

Is it not lamentable that they had to squeeze and corner to find $3? That is not all. He also took the opportunity of telling me something about the conditions there. I know them fairly well but not in any detail. I may say that this man is one of those who works from daylight to dark, he never spares himself, and does not drink alcohol or smoke. He is a married man with a small family. He writes:

> The financial position in this locality, as indeed I believe in all Alberta, is very serious. Farmers are unable to meet their taxes and consequently the schools are closed.

Those are the facts, Mr. Chairman.

> The banks have told us that not one cent will they advance until the indebtedness of the municipality to these institutions has been met. In Dowling lake municipality we have only three schools running at the present time and in two of these schools the teachers are waiting for their salary until it becomes available. God only knows when that will be. Loan companies are compelling practically every farmer who is in arrears with his interest to become nothing but a tenant on land which we spent the best years of our life opening and developing, and now instead of owning the land we become tenants. I sold a 50-lb. hide last month for $1.80, 45 pounds of hide, 5 pounds dockage. The same day I bought a little pair of shoes for our little girl, the cheapest I could get, weight about 5 or 6 oz., price $3. Where is it all going to end?

That is the desperate condition these men are in. No one can appreciate who does not live among them the suffering, the misery, the depression, the despair they go through year after year. And the day has gone by—I think the House was warned of it last spring—when the hopeful effort of former years will be put into the preparation of the land for this season's crop. I had the honour of going around my constituency last summer speaking at meetings. Sometimes I had to take long drives at night time, and on three different occasions in the southern part of that country we met people driving towards the United States border by night. On one occasion a party was stuck in a sand hole with a Ford car piled to the top with blankets and bedding. These are the conditions. Does any hon. gentleman think we can take an inexperienced immigrant from any part of Europe, put him out in that country without capital and expect him to make a success of farming? Do hon. members think that men with a capital of from $1,500 to $2,000 can go out there and make a success of it? They may remain a little while, but if present conditions exist—there is the root of the trouble—and if an attempt is not made to curb the exploitation of these people by the combines and by the transportation companies—which my hon. friend from Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) spoke of as bleeding this country white, and I agree with him, if such enormous sums must be paid out in dividends to the shareholders of the Canadian Pacific railway and other corporations every year, then I say there is little hope for the West. It would be far, far better not to bring settlers into that country.

Mr. MARLER: Does my hon. friend suggest that the Canadian Pacific Railway shareholders should go without their dividends? I merely ask for information.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): As long as the great mass of the people who are helping build up this country are not getting any dividends whatever, although they are doing far harder work than the shareholders of the Canadian Pacific Railway, I would say most emphatically, yes. I think we should endeavour to curb the profits of these corporations and allow the people who are working to build up the country to get some gain for their hard labour.

I cannot understand the attitude of some hon. gentlemen who talk of progressing from the farm to the city. Is it really progression? Should it be regarded as such? Why do we hear hon. members say that the ambition of the young, of those who want to get ahead, is to leave the farm and go to the cities? Why should it be so? Yet we find in the delightful pamphlets sent out by the Department of Immigration the most glowing prospects that await the immigrant who engages in agriculture. Listen to what we send to Europe. We say:

> Come to this country. The call of the West is no vain call. It beckons the courageous, the thrifty, the industrious, from the Mother Country particularly, to a life that is essentially democratic and independent, to an industry that assures the most encouraging returns, the basic and the noblest industry in the world—agriculture.

And yet we are told that it is progression, that it is only the ambitious that leave agriculture and go to the cities. There are many more similar statements in these publications, and I think the minister would be well advised to go over them very carefully. I find the grossest misrepresentation in these statements. The poor man in a foreign country; the English or Scotch crofter, the Irish hill peasant, who read this sort of thing and saw that picture on the cover would think this was a land of milk and honey and golden grain; that there was nothing to it but to come here, get a quarter section, and become a millionaire. I suggest that the minister revise these descriptions. I could paint a different picture, and it would be more truthful than this is.

Mr. McMASTER: And less encouraging.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Exactly, and it would be my intention that it should be so, under present conditions.

Mr. JACOBS: Was the hon. member himself attracted by one of these pamphlets?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I was. But unlike many other immigrants I went to the agent and discussed the matter very thoroughly with him. The first thing he told me was "You will not need hob-nailed boots in Canada, and you do not need to take any tobacco over there, because they grow it," and a number of other interesting facts. But he did not tell me a single thing about what I would have to do when I came here. All he told me was—and I took his advice—that I should go on a farm and learn farming. That is what I did.

Now, let us come back for a moment to the statement of the minister. It is extraordinary to find such a difference of opinion existing between the hon. gentleman and one of his predecessors, whom I quoted a moment ago, Sir Clifford Sifton. Speaking at this meeting of the Board of Trade, Sir Clifford said—and I would commend these words very seriously to the attention of the minister as well as to the consideration of those hon. gentlemen on my right who are so anxious that the government shall take advantage of the Empire settlement scheme:

> I want to express an emphatic opinion about the class of settlers we do not want. It is said that there are millions of town dwellers, artisans, small shopkeepers, labourers, etc., who are anxious to come to Canada. Everyone will sympathize with their condition and desire that they should find a place where they will lead a happier life. It is said there are millions in Poland—

I notice the minister has Poland on his list.

> —who want to come to Canada. These people are essentially town dwellers and you cannot make them anything else. We do not want them under any conditions. We know perfectly well you cannot make agriculturists of them. They come here and swell the ranks of the unemployed; they will create slums; they will never go on the land; they will never add anything to the production of the country; and it will be the most fatal mistake in the world if they are allowed to come into Canada at the present time. There is talk about getting people from the manufacturing towns in England and Scotland. We do not want mechanics from the Clyde, turbulent, riotous, and with an insatiable appetite for whiskey.

The poor beggars would die of drought in this country.

> We do not want artisans from the southern English towns who know absolutely nothing about farming. There is nothing in these schemes suggested for educating them and making farmers of them and then bringing them out to fight the battles of the pioneer's life. Take a bookkeeper say from Liverpool and bring him out and put him in a shanty near Prince Albert. Leave him there for a winter. It is cruel. He would starve to death. It is an intolerable crime to bring out these men and try to make pioneers of them. The pioneer has to be of the toughest fibre that can be found. Do not let anyone persuade you that you can get people from the towns and make farmers of them. If you do you will have a problem worse than the one you have now. We have had cases where English mechanics have made a great success on the land, but they are the exceptions that prove the rule. It takes two generations to turn a town-bred population into an agricultural population, and I do not think anything but dire starvation will make them do it. We have not got time for that job. We have not two generations to spare.

The minister suggests that these people are not brought here unless they are farmers or say they are going on the land. Well, I may inform him that I came here as a farm labourer, and I do not know whether they will put me in jail for it now or not, but I did not know fall wheat from barley; I did not know the hames from the tugs on a horse's harness. That is a little note of warning to the hon. minister; no questioning will prevent people from coming here if they want to. I do not think it is wise that people should be brought here under the Empire settlement scheme or any other scheme under present conditions. We see in the press at various times expressions of opinion as to the type of settler we want, the settler who will make a good citizen, who will go on the farm and make an effort to stay there. Sir Clifford Sifton does not think so; his idea is the very opposite of my own. He wants to bring into this country the peasant, "the sheep-skin clad man with the large wife and the large family, with the strong back and the short legs, built close to the ground, to dig his living from the soil and be content with what he gets." I quote from memory; those may not be the exact words, but they are the import of what he said. That statement went all over this country. Here is another quotation from Sir Clifford:

> There are hundreds of thousands of hardy peasants, men of the type I have described, farmers for ten or fifteen generations, men who have always worked from four o'clock in the morning until dark, and have never expected to do anything else.

Now, you may get that type of man here, but I am glad to say that the West has made and will make this change in him: he no longer is content to settle on the land and work from four o'clock in the morning until dark. He is no longer content with what he digs from the soil—that is, with what he gets for what he digs from the soil. In a short time he becomes discontented; he joins the U. F. A. local and learns why he is where he is and who are making profits from his labour; then he ceases to be the pleasant kind of peasant that those who now control things would bring in here to debase agriculture with. Any plan of that kind cannot but be faced with failure.

I am glad to see the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) here. He has not been in the chamber for a little time. I say I am glad he is here, because a paper which I have under my hand reports him as having said something that is rather significant. I want hon. members to pay close attention to this. This minister, speaking out of his great fund of wisdom, gained, no doubt, from his long years of experience in farming, is reported as follows:

> Mr. Motherwell suggested that many of them—

Those who went west to take up homesteads.

—looked to the day when "someone with more money than brains" would buy them out.

Will any hon. member not bow to the wisdom of the Minister of Agriculture? I have no doubt that there are farmers—indeed I have met them—who say: "Oh, you must not oppose this colonization scheme; you must not oppose immigration. Why, I might be able to sell that rotten half section of mine, and you will spoil the deal on me. Let us get them in. We have to get rid of this land and get out of here." It is a sad fact that there are only too many who are in that frame of mind.

Let us turn for a moment to the Empire settlement scheme, in respect to which there is an enormous item here, for some $600,000. But before I leave Sir Clifford Sifton I would like to read what he says about assisted immigrants—and I would commend his words, his thoughts, his experience, to the present Minister of Immigration. I know he is anxious to learn from the men who preceded him, and who have learned in the hard school of experience what may be expected. He said:

I am opposed to the system of assisted immigration. The class of peasants I speak of do not want to be assisted.

I also am opposed to that, but not for the same reasons. He is opposed to it because he says the peasant class he speaks of do not want assistance. I am opposed to it because I think this whole British Empire settlement scheme is simply one for relieving the pressure on those who control in England to-day. We find Lloyd George speaking before he became the ex-Prime Minister in the northern part of England at one of his very large meetings, and we find the press report the next day said:

While the Premier was referring to the unemployment situation the sounds of hundreds of men outside the building singing "The Red Flag" and cheering could be heard clearly. A force of mounted and foot police were kept busy moving the demonstrators away.

Again we find Sir William Joynson-Hicks speaking not long ago in London and saying that it would have been better for England to have voted the sum of £50,000,000 to have bought land in the dominions and to have deported the unemployed to these lands than to maintain them in England at the present time under the expensive system of doles and poor law relief, which he estimated to have amounted already to £100,000,000.

There is no question whatever that money was voted and a policy enunciated and developed for the one purpose of getting rid of their unemployed. Let us see if we have any evidence of that. A meeting was organized and held in London by the National Constitutional Association, presided over by Lord Ampthill, to urge the government to take immediate action towards the solution of the unemployment problem by means of Empire settlement and development. We find also Colonel L. C. Amery, Secretary of the British Admiralty, and a gentleman whom hon. members in this House will remember, saying that in the immediate condition of Great Britain, faced by urgent financial problems of congestion and growth of population in excess of increased building and social remedies, from the point of view of social welfare it was immensely desirable that the immediate problem should be eased by migration to another part of the Empire.

We find at that very same meeting at which Col. Amery spoke another reason given for this Empire settlement scheme, a most amazing, a most illuminating, one, but upon which I do not wish to dwell long upon. This was a meeting of the International Conference for the Reaffirmation of the World's Moral Ideals held in Caxton Hall, Westminister, Lord Parmoor presiding. Reference was made to the widespread irregularity of sex relations and Sir Joseph Ward, High Commissioner for Australia in England, expressed the opinion that immigration within the Empire was itself one of the fundamental remedies.

These are the reasons, I believe, for the Empire settlement scheme. But we can go further if you wish and see the jobless parades in England and numerous other demonstrations that add to strength of my belief. There are two other illuminating instances that I want to call to the attention of the House. The Bishop of Birmingham speaking on immigration, said that he regarded immigration as one of the means for the reinvigoration of the British race. I want you to get the words—immigration was to be for the reinvigoration of the British race. I do not need to assure hon. gentlemen in this House that Canada is not, in spite of the Bishop of Birmingham, a sort of sanatorium for the rejuvenation of the British or any other race. It takes, as was said a little time ago, a very rugged and vigorous type of settler even to exist in this country, and the run-down people of Britain cannot be made vigorous or be made over again by sending them to Canada.

Again we have Sir Rider Haggard's testimony. He said that the dominions were seriously under-populated—and no one will question that. He said further that he did not favour sending out the nation's youngest and best. He preferred the family migration, or the block settlement system. He believed it would be cheaper for the government to bear the whole cost of sending out emigrants, and even to buy the land on which they settle, than continue the present system of doles and poor-law relief.

The only thing I have to say with regard to his remarks is this. Emigration may be an excellent method of getting rid of the English poor, but I am afraid that that class would not be very suitable here. These men who suggest buying land in Canada or some other of the dominions might just as well buy land in Greenland and settle these people there. Their chances of success would be just as good, and the land would be a whole lot cheaper. Even at that, Mr. Chairman, the members of the British House of Commons are not altogether easy in their minds. In spite of the delightful literature that is sent over there, and the glowing language, I have no doubt, of those who speak on emigration in England, the members of the British House of Commons are doubtful as to the suitability and feasibility of this thing. Sir Mitchell Cotts, a National-Liberal, discussing this matter in the House of Commons, December 6th, 1922, suggested that a party of members of the House of Commons should visit the Dominion and watch the settlement of immigrants here. I wonder why they thought that was necessary? We know why it was necessary. Too many, as an article in the Journal not long afterward said, had fallen into the hands of land speculators who had exploited them to their own advantage. Too many had found it impossible to make a living out here. I have in my own district a number of Englishmen of a very fine type, from Yorkshire. They came there many years ago and homesteaded with myself. These men, every one of them, hate the day they came in here, and they are Britishers, not foreigners. Their wives regret their coming and are continually talking about the lovely place they had back home in Yorkshire. One of these men worked for the Earl of Ripon, and he is everlastingly talking of the glorious times he had on the Earl of Ripon's estate.

Mr. McMASTER: Is not that generally true of English people, even if you put them in a part of the country such as the Eastern Townships in Quebec, where things are not nearly as bad as in Alberta?

[Mr. E. J. Garland.]

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I have no doubt the hon. member asked that question for the purpose of making that statement. It may be quite true.

Mr. McMASTER: No, I asked for information.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Although I have lived for almost two years in Sherbrooke county, Quebec, I know nothing about the part the hon. member speaks of. The part I lived in is devoted almost entirely to mining. But the hon. member may be quite correct. I do know some splendid young English settlers in the West, and splendid English families, who are striving hard but are in a condition of desperation. I would be glad to take any hon. members of this House out with me this year and show them in my own constituency these things I am talking of. After all, Mr. Chairman, this thing of spending millions of dollars on immigration can be characterized as indirectly bonusing the transportation and steamship companies. That is what it amounts to. It is advertising in foreign countries and securing tonnage for them. The people of this country are not going to stand for it any longer.

Again, when we bring these people over here, we cannot keep them. I need not stress that point as almost every speaker who has preceded me in this debate has pointed out how rapidly immigrants are leaving this country. If further evidence is wanted I would refer hon. members to the fact that President Harding of the United States, supported by many members of congress, has been discussing seriously the bringing in of an Immigration Registration Bill. The reason given is this: Growing out of complaints of the Commissioner General of Immigration of increased activity in the efforts to smuggle immigrants through from Canada, and from Mexico, into the United States over the international boundary, congress is showing a disposition not only to grant ample funds for the enforcement of the immigration laws, but there is also serious discussion of an alien registration law. We are, Mr. Chairman, simply being used as a back door for those who want to go to the States and do not wish to or cannot enter the country directly. I have no doubt that when the quota plan from foreign countries enforced by the United States is used up we will have a tremendous influx of settlers into Canada. There will be no question about it. They will come in but they will not stay here; they will, if they can possibly do so, cross the border into the United States. Representative L.

B. Rainey, of Alabama, in a recent speech, urged larger appropriations to prevent the smuggling of emigrants from Canada into the United States. And may I point out, the minister knows it as well as I do, that every disgruntled settler, every man who leaves this country in a dissatisfied or discontented frame of mind is not the kind of man who will speak well of this country; he will try to prevent other people from coming here.

I have great hope, Mr. Chairman, that in the future conditions will be changed, but I doubt very much if they will be brought about very rapidly by the present government. I see no indication of the activity that is desirable on their part. The conditions are much as they were a year ago. The government have had a year but appear to have no policy for remedying present conditions Hon. members from the Maritime provinces have cast a few joking remarks in our direction. I am quite sure those remarks were made in the best of humour and were not intended to be sarcastic. But it is well to point out to them that conditions in the Maritime provinces do not appear to be much better than conditions in the West judging from newspaper reports. I find in the Shelburne Gazette a despatch from the Bridgewater Bulletin containing the views of its New Germany correspondent. I think the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) knows the district very well. The despatch in question is as follows:

> Our New Germany correspondent sends us the following item: "Charles Lohnes and family are removing to the United States. This is one of the many families of this town and vicinity who are leaving. It is lamentable to see our country being drained of its best native blood. The Methodist congregation alone has lost fifty of its members through removal within a very brief time."

Again we find the following from Nova Scotia:

> The exodus of young men and women from Nova Scotia to the United States was spoken of at length and deplored and Mr. MacKenzie suggested high taxes as a cause. It was his opinion that no more unskilled labour should be introduced into Nova Scotia until present farm production was being absorbed.

I just give these few extracts in passing. I would now like to deal with the general question of immigration in this country past and present. I was particularly interested in the speech delivered by the Acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization before the University Club, Ottawa. As reported in the Citizen of January 19, he said amongst other things the following:

> Particularly affected by these conditions was the farmer. Farming would not again be profitable until the commodities which the farmer had to purchase came down to the same price level as the commodities he had to sell. The same applied to other lines but to a lesser extent.

I quote next the following:

> Agriculture, Mr. Stewart said, was the basic industry and all other industries were permeated and affected by it.

Further on I find this:

> All of Canada's free land, Mr. Stewart said, was so far from the railroads as to be hardly practical to farm and the Canadian government would have to make the present railways pay before starting on extensions.

But the most delightful statement in his whole speech—and I ask hon. members to listen most attentively because these are the words of the minister who has come before us to-day and asked for an increase of $1,316,000 odd—is the following:

> Extreme conditions of deflation in the farming communities of the West had resulted in the impossibility of making the farm pay there. "What is the use," asked Mr. Stewart, "of bringing people to the country if they cannot exist."

Is there any justification for voting money for such a purpose after an admission of that character by the minister himself, made in public in this city? But let us go further and see if there is any justification whatever.

I was interested enough in this question to seek information on it, and I secured from the Bureau of Statistics the figures of the population of Canada in each of the census years from 1871 to the present day, also the figures of the immigration into Canada in each of these ten year periods. I am sorry to say that the bureau was unable to supply me with the figures showing the natural increase, that is the number of births over deaths, in these periods, until we come down to 1901. But I again inquired and I found that I would be justified in using 15 per 1,000 per year as about the average rate of increase. It sometimes varies, last year I found it was 16.4, or something like that, but with that information I have worked out the following: In 1871 the population of Canada was 3,689,257. The immigration into Canada in that year was 362,893, a total, not making any allowance for natural increase of 4,052,150. The census year of 1881, that is at the end of the ten year period, shows a population of 4,324,810. Working out the natural increase I find that it should amount to 553,350. I do not make any allowance whatever for the increase from year to year but simply take the population at the commencement of the decade, and estimate it on that only, not on the increase, so that I am well within the figures when I give you 553,350 as representing what should have been the natural increase. In other words when the population in 1881 should have been 4,605,500, we had an actual loss of 280,690. It cost us $2,309,496 in those ten years to lose that much population. We come down to the period between 1881 and 1891. At the commencement of that period we had a population of 4,324,810. The immigration during that decade amounted to 920,351, or a total of 5,245,161. But the census of 1891 shows that we had a population of 4,833,239, or a loss, without making any allowance whatever for natural increase, of 411,922. If we make allowance for the natural increase 648,600 and add that to the immigration and the increase in population, we find that our loss would amount to 1,060,522 in the decade between 1881 and 1891, and it cost us $2,861,383 to lose them. Now let us come down to the decade 1891 to 1901, and I am making no apology to hon. members for putting these figures on record. I think it is absolutely essential, I think the time has come, when the public should know the facts as to the results of immigration expenditures and policies in the past in this country. At the commencement of that decade we started out with a population of 4,833,239. By immigration we secured 288,286, or a total of 5,121,525. But the census in 1901 showed that we had 5,371,315, or a gain of 149,790, if you make no allowance whatever for natural increase. If you make an allowance for natural increase you find we have a loss of 475,160, or almost half a million. Let us come down to the decade from 1901 to 1911. By the way all the figures I have given before excepting those of the natural increase, are from the bureau. The natural increase I have figured out myself, but from this on, I give the bureau's own figures all the way through:

Population, census of 1901	5,371,315
Natural increase, estimated, 1901 to 1910 inclusive	853,566
Immigration in that period	1,715,326
Total	7,940,207

But the population, census of 1911, shows 7,206,643, or a loss of 733,564, and it cost us $8,402,599 to lose them.

Population, census of 1911	7,206,643
Natural increase, 1911 to 1921, inclusive estimated	1,150,659
Immigration in that period	1,812,836
Total	10,170,148

The census of 1921 showed that we had a population of only 8,788,483, or a loss through emigration of 1,381,665, and in that decade it cost this country $14,234,242 to lose them.

[Mr. E. J. Garland.]

We might look at another simple little fact. It is perhaps, an idle one to waste the time of the committee with, but I amused myself this morning in figuring it out. In 1871, we had a population of 3,689,257, and if we had kept that population and just added the immigration to it, we would have all the numbers that we have to-day, making no allowance for natural increase.

Those facts are striking. The total that we have spent on immigration into this country is $30,207,894, and we have not a single soul to show for that. We are now proposing to spend $3,386,190 in this one year to bring more immigrants into this country. If anybody ever heard of a more insane proposal in what is supposed to be a responsible House, I should like to have him tell me of it.

I have but little more to say except to offer some suggestions. If it is the determined policy—and I hope it will not be—of this government to continue with this Canada Colonization scheme and these other "broadening out" and "opening wide" policies, I would ask the minister to pay attention to a despatch that appeared in the Financial Post. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) thinks that is a very reliable paper, and I have no doubt he will not question the authenticity or reliability of this despatch. It is "from our own correspondent Montreal"—also from his city. It states:

> Most of the group of eastern business men who subscribed $1,200,000 to the work of the Canadian Colonization Association have suspended their financial support. Some of the larger subscribers who had made substantial payments on account of their subscriptions, have declined to make any further payments into the funds of the association until they can be shown definite and tangible results. There is no lack of appreciation of the necessity for an aggressive, constructive immigration effort but there seems to be lack of confidence in the association in its present form and it is felt that to continue to accomplish the fine work of settling the vacant lands of western Canada reorganization is necessary.
> Around $175,000 has been spent to date, it is understood, and no settlers have been definitely located. One case of good work has been accomplished, the listing of available vacant lands in a central bureau of registry, but the excellent uses that such a listing might be put to have been overlooked, it is stated by some of the erstwhile supporters.
>
> When the scheme was first launched under the name of the Western Canada Colonization Association it was easy to raise money. Corporations of various kinds were making large profits. It was a period of easy money. These corporations were ready to contribute large sums to any project for the good of Canada and the association got subscriptions totalling $1,200,000 from a comparatively small group of Canadian industrial and financial leaders and the companies they controlled.

I find in the annual statements of the various companies that we regard as large corporations no great falling off this year. Life insurance companies, transportation companies, steamship companies, railway companies, all show record years. The banks show their dividends as usual. But let us continue this despatch:

It was proposed to get an additional $300,000 from the general public. Much of the money was spent in an advertising campaign. The nature of this advertising campaign, by the way, was the first thing that made the larger group lose confidence in the backers of this scheme. The advertisements in themselves were fine and apparently no organization to follow up the feeling of goodwill created by the advertising. The larger subscriptions that might have followed were, therefore, not obtained.

The eastern supporters, too, began to lose faith when it was seen that the West was not giving as enthusiastic support as the East. Originally it was thought that at least 25 per cent of the money would come from the West.

You see, they were very moderate and gentle with us. All they wanted was 25 per cent from the West. They knew conditions.

But instead eastern business men were left to bear almost the entire burden. "If the West had no faith in the scheme," the eastern group argued, "there must be something radically wrong with it."

But the supporters continued to pay over their money until they began to feel that nothing was going to come out of the expenditures. No results were shown. One by one the big supporters dropped out, following the example set by the most important props. It is understood that the association has been carrying on for the past few months with money from the Dominion government which alone of all the supporters continued its payments.

If that despatch is true—and I have no doubt the Minister of Immigration will know if it is true or not—an explanation is certainly due to the members of this committee. If this government intends to go into a real estate scheme of this kind when all the other supporters have dropped out of it, that shows a lack of business sense that is absolutely deplorable, and must cause loss of confidence in the government amongst the people of this country.

The whole question, I think, boils down to very much what other hon. members on this side of the House who have spoken, and, I believe, what one or two on the opposite side have said. I have never listened to a speech that I have enjoyed or appreciated or admired so greatly as the one delivered by the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill). It was a courageous speech, direct to the point and absolutely realizing conditions. I wish hon. members would ask that hon. member where he got his information. He will tell them that he had lived in Saskatoon, Saskatchewan, for some years. He knows conditions. That is the difference. Some hon. members, who live in Montreal and in other places, and who stand up in this House and talk about immigration are perfectly sincere, perfectly in earnest; they think this is in the best interest of Canada, the best thing in the world for Canada; but they just do not know, that is all.

I do not think that this government is justified in this expenditure; I do not think it is justified in asking the committee to vote these large amounts. All these increases should be cut. I do not suppose we can get the whole expenditure for immigration wiped out, nor would I advocate that this be done. We should keep a protective barrier against Canada's shores to those undesirables I have referred to. May I say that until the government has fully investigated the present industrial conditions and has definitely established a well-planned remedial policy which will substantially alleviate conditions in this country it is not desirable that there should be any further expenditures of public moneys on immigration except in so far as such expenditures are absolutely necessary to protect Canada's shores. I hope that the Minister of Immigration will have a consultation with the other members of the government that will enable him to arrive at some solution of this question. We do not want to move for the reduction of items in this House. The government, we realize, is faced with difficulties; and no doubt pressure has been brought to bear upon the minister. But I would ask him seriously to consider the advisability of himself proposing a drastic reduction in these estimates, say to the full amount of the increase.

Progress reported.

COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURAL CONDITIONS

Mr. ANDREW McMASTER (Brome) moved:

That the third report of the special committee appointed to inquire into agricultural conditions be concurred in.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): This report, which was read yesterday or the day before, calls for the appointment by the government of a royal commission to inquire into the grain trade, and adds a recommendation that this commission be given powers by the federal authorities and also by the provincial legislatures. I have grave doubts as to the wisdom of the latter proviso. Some of the legislatures concerned, perhaps all three of them, are sitting. But, in the light of the decision of the Court of Appeal of Manitoba regarding the powers of the commission which was appointed by the late government and which was arrested in its work, I am not clear as to what powers which this government is not amply authorized to confer the committee desires to place in this commission. I do not know what the provincial powers are that the committee has in mind. It seems to me that the proviso is going to delay the work of the commission, a commission which, it will be recalled, I urged to be appointed in my speech on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. What is the need of that proviso? Would it not be better to eliminate it and appoint a strong commission amply armed with federal powers—for our powers of investigation are very wide indeed—rather than put in the way of the commission impediments that may result not only in delay but possibly in disaster?

Mr. McMASTER: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has exhausted his right to speak. Perhaps the seconder of the motion might deal with the subject.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Trade and Commerce): There is no trade in Canada that has been so often investigated as the grain trade. I have before me a record showing that between 1897 and 1921, a period of twenty-four years, there were fourteen royal commissions, federal and provincial. In 1921, a royal commission was appointed to investigate the trade, and it is within the memory, I imagine, of almost every member of the House that the work of that commission was blocked through an injunction obtained in the courts. I have no legal knowledge nor any legal pretensions, but my recollection is that the action to obtain that injunction upon the commission was taken under provincial statute. With the wish therefore to avoid the possibility of a recurrence of such an injunction, I take it, the committee on Agricultural Conditions unanmiously put in this proviso. The government have no pronouncement to make on the issue raised by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen). If it is the desire of parliament that there should be another investigation into the grain trade the government are quite willing to carry out that desire, and it will necessitate the placing of an amount in the Supplementary Estimates. If, however, in the judgment of legal men the proviso will delay the proceedings, then, of course, it might be a matter for conference, and I am not sure whether my hon. friend who is chairman of the special committee (Mr. McMaster) would not desire to look n ore carefully into that aspect of the subject. But I would appeal to you, Mr. Speaker, that the chairman of the committee, who has no doubt given the matter legal consideration, and possibly has already consulted with the Justice department, might be unanimously given the right to explain the legal features of the matter.

Mr. BUREAU: Without precluding other members from speaking.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the unanimous consent of the House the hon. chairman of the committee may, of course, speak again. I may say to other hon. members, however, that when the member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) speaks he will close the debate, and if any hon. member desires to speak on the subject he should do so now.

Mr. O. R. GOULD (Assiniboia): I think I have already placed myself on record during this session in regard to this matter. Speaking, as I have previously said, in behalf of the producers, I believe that they should have the privileges which a commission of this kind would afford. While it is true, as the minister states, that fourteen commissions have been appointed within a certain number of years to investigate the grain trade, it does seem to me that events have shown in the past that the producers, the men who have the real grievances, have not had an opportunity of placing their views before any commission. At all events, the results have never been to their satisfaction. I have many letters in my office to-day from individuals throughout the country who endorse the attitude I have taken in the past on this subject, when I have urged the appointment of a commission specifically for the purpose of hearing what the producers have to say. And I have tried to point out that in all parliamentary committees appointed by the government such expert evidence as has been given has resulted, I honestly believe, detrimentally to the interests of the producers. My only plea for a commission is based on the desire to facilitate the producers in laying their case before such a body.

Hon. Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): Let me say in the first instance that if we can do anything to facilitate a proper inquiry into the grain trade we want to do it; and I may add that our attitude is exactly the same as it was in 1921. The only thing we are afraid of, however, is that, very likely unwittingly, nay, I will go further and say, absolutely unwittingly, because I know the hon. chairman of the committee—there is a grave danger of our going through the same sort of farce that we went through last year in connection with the wheat board. It is a great deal better to do something we know we can do ourselves than to undertake anything in regard to which our powers are open to dispute. We know at the present time that we can make a certain investigation, and possibly having regard to all the different matters which will be found to be a proper subject of inquiry we might be able to legislate as broadly and as fully as we should like to. I admit that what the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb) says is technically correct, there have been many different investigations; but I think he will look in vain for any general investigation into this business in the last ten years. He will not find one. I should like to have the minister converted to the idea of the great necessity of a proper investigation.

Mr. ROBB: I admit it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We tried to convert him last session, and I thought we had succeeded. Indeed, I thought we had a pledge from him that there was going to be an investigation during the recess. We gave him a vote of $50,000, I think, for that purpose, and apparently all parties wanted the investigation.

Now, in so far as the strict legal position is concerned, it is perfectly true, as the hon. minister has pointed out, that interests which did not want the investigation that was being conducted by the Grain Inquiry Commission applied for an injunction and stopped the investigation temporarily. That injunction ought never to have been issued according to the unanimous opinion of the Court of Appeal of the province of Manitoba, which, reversing the decision of the trial judge, held that this parliament had absolute power to order the investigation. We thought the investigation should have been resumed, but we did not have control of the matter and nothing further was done.

Our only desire, Mr. Speaker, is to have a real investigation as quickly and fully as such an investigation can properly be held, so that we may know exactly what the troubles are, if troubles there be. And certainly we have heard of many; why, every day we are receiving complaints. Cannot we find out what the truth is and remove grievances which, I have no doubt, exist? We want to help our hon. friends, and we know we are helping them for we told them to go ahead and not get themselves in a position where possibly they would be held up through misunderstandings or by obstacles raised here and there. Surely, for the present at any rate, the unanimous judgment of the Court of Appeal of Manitoba, unappealed as it has been, ought to be enough for us.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the confusion that has arisen in regard to this report is possibly the result of its wording. If I understand the purpose the committee has in mind, it is that this government should appoint a royal commission, and that if any of the provincial governments desire to co-operate they themselves should give powers to that particular commission. In other words, it is to permit the same gentlemen to exercise all the authority that can come to them from both the federal and provincial governments. If that is correct, I would say that so far as our government is concerned we will endeavour promptly to appoint a commission and to have in mind, in the selection of its personnel, the choice of gentlemen who would inspire the confidence of the governments that are likely to unite to co-operate in this matter. If that is the view of the committee it ought to settle the matter.

Mr. A. B. HUDSON (South Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, I am not a member of the committee on Agricultural Conditions, but I have some knowledge of the legal position, and particularly of the injunction which the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) has referred to. An injunction was taken out and supported by the trial judge, who held that the commission was improperly issued and was beyond the powers of the Dominion authorities. As my right hon. friend has said, there was an appeal from that decision, and the Court of Appeal reversed the trial judge's finding, holding that the Dominion authorities had power to create that commission. The point in argument in support of the injunction was that the commission covered matters which were not within the purview of the Dominion parliament, but were solely within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures. That argument was not supported by the Court of Appeal. But since this decision of the Court of Appeal the Privy Council has decided that the act which created the Board of Commerce was ultra vires. That had a direct bearing on the extent of the Dominion's powers in regard to matters such as this, and following that decision the Manitoba Court of Appeal held that some portions at least af the Canada Grain Act were ultra vires of the Dominion. For that reason if a commission is now issued solely under Dominion authority questions may be raised which were raised in the preceding case, and may create obstacles.

Mr. McMASTER: I thank you Mr. Speaker, and the House for giving me an opportunity to briefly address hon. members in connection with the report which was brought in unanimously by the committee of which I have the honour to be chairman. When we had the matter of investigating the grain trade brought before us we first of all discussed whether or not we should make the investigation ourselves. We came to the conclusion that if we attempted such an investigation we should have to set aside for the time being all our other work; it would give us more than really we could accomplish ourselves. Then I was asked to confer with the law officers of the Crown to see whether there was some way of obviating the situation which arose in connection with the last royal commission which was stopped in the course of its investigation by a judgment of the court of first instance in Manitoba. True, that judgment was set aside by the higher court of that province, but in rendering judgment the Court of Appeal indicated that, although a royal commission appointed by the federal power had the right to make a general investigation, still in the course of that investigation questions might come up touching contract, property and civil rights which would fall under provincial jurisdiction, and which might lay the investigation proposed to be carried on by the commission open to attack by any one who came before the provincial courts. So we proposed that the government should appoint a commission and should invite the provinces to name the same gentlemen as commissioners for the same purpose, and that these gentlemen should start their work clothed with every power that the sovereign authority of the provinces interested or the sovereign authority of the Dominion might bestow upon them. It seemed to me that that was a wise proceeding to take. It may consume a little more time at the beginning but certainly it opens a way for a full and complete investigation without possibility of let or hindrance.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Hudson.]

WRECK OF THE ALASKAN

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. NEILL: I should like to ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe), only he is not present, if he would give orders to expedite bringing down the report of the commissioners who investigated the wreck of the Alaskan off the coast of British Columbia. This wreck investigation took place on the second of February; the investigation commission sat then, and on one or two subsequent days. This is the sixteenth of March, and I think the report might be forthcoming by this time.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS

HALIBUT FISHERIES TREATY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. MEIGHEN: On the 12th of this month, an order was passed calling for production of the correspondence with the British government relating to the Halibut Fisheries Treaty and the execution thereof. Of course, that is four days ago. Some orders might take pretty long in preparation; but this concerns only one department. The correspondence would not likely be very long, and I think an hour would likely be enough in which to copy it. I was expecting the return yesterday or to-day.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think I can promise to give my right hon. friend most of the papers to-day. The delay has been on account of a cable having been sent to the British government to ask a question with respect to some of the papers, and the reply not yet having been received.

BONDED WAREHOUSES, NEW BRUNSWICK

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. CALDWELL: How soon may I expect the papers asked for under an order for return passed on 5th March, covering correspondence between the New Brunswick government and the federal government regarding bonded warehouses in New Brunswick?

Mr. BUREAU: I can bring the return down on Monday for my hon. friend.

MR. JAMES LARKIN

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Can the government give any information concerning the question which I asked yesterday, as to the reasons for refusing Mr. James Larkin admission into Canada?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have no further information than that an investigation is being made with respect to this case. I expect to hear to-morrow.

PROPOSED CUSTOMS OFFICER AT NEW YORK

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. LADNER: A despatch has come from British Columbia dealing with the question of a customs officer at New York. It quotes Mr. Oliver, the Premier of British Columbia, as saying that:

> —when he drew the attention of Premier King and Hon. Mr. Fielding, Minister of Finance, to the fact that duty was being collected on goods going from eastern Canada to British Columbia, they were astounded. The existing customs regulations laid it down that Canadian goods transhipped in a foreign port, unless under supervision of a Canadian customs officer, had to pay duty on entry into Canada. Yet, when British Columbia asked for the establishment in New York of a customs officer, the application was refused.

I want to ask if, in fact, the government have refused the application for a customs officer at New York. Because, I should like to say, this is a question in which public bodies, boards of trade and so on, at the coast, are greatly interested, and I understood the government had the matter still under consideration, and perhaps favourable consideration. This is a statement by the Premier of British Columbia.

Mr. BUREAU: Does the hon. member want the Prime Minister to answer?

Mr. LADNER: No.

Mr. BUREAU: An application has been made to place a customs officer at New York to look after the traffiic that goes via the ocean and the Panama canal. This matter has been under the consideration of the department, and while the department has not decided definitely, it feels inclined to refuse the application, because this would divert traffic towards the United States and all the Canadian railways would get out of it would be the haul from the point of departure to the boundary—the whole of the railroad haul to the sea and the whole of the ocean freight would go to the United States.

CANADIAN PURE BRED STOCK

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I notice that in the estimates provision has been made for the appointment of commissioners to visit South America and Great Britain with a view to securing trade in Canadian pure-bred stock. When will the report be placed on the Table or has it already been placed on the Table?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have one of the reports ready. The other one will be ready, I expect, in the course of a day or two.

SUPPLY

IMMIGRATION AND COLONIZATION

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair:

Immigration—outside service—salaries, $700,000.

Mr. HOEY: It was not my intention to take part in this discussion which has already become unduly long. I feel, however, that I should refer to the address delivered during the course of this debate by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland). I regret that that hon. member felt it incumbent upon him to make certain statements, not because I believe the statements were in themselves untrue. In so far as they relate to Alberta, they may be conservative, but in so far as they relate to western Canada, as I know it, they are hopelessly and outlandishly exaggerated. The weakness of his address, it seems to me, lay in the fact that he failed to distinguish between conditions for which a mistaken economic policy has been responsible and conditions that are inherent in or natural to the territory which he described. Naturally our sympathies all go out to hon. members who have come from other lands, lands of peace and prosperity, and we can all realize their anxiety to return and enjoy the peace and prosperity associated in our minds with those lands from which they originally came.

I want to follow very closely in one particular the hon. member for St. John City (Mr. MacLaren), when he decided to discuss this problem of immigration from a purely sectional standpoint. I want to look at it from the standpoint of the province of Manitoba, with which I am most familiar, and in doing that I want to answer the question put, I think, by the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Martell), the chief interrogator for the Liberal party, who asked, "Why should we bring immigrants into this country?"

Turning to the province of Manitoba for a moment, what do we find? We find in that province political, educational, religious and social institutions far in excess of our present needs. We have in the province of Manitoba a parliament building of which we are justly proud, that was built in all good faith anticipating immigration, a structure which cost almost exactly as much as this edifice in which I speak this afternoon. We have also in that province an agricultural college, one of the finest in the Dominion of Canada, an agricultural college that cost us millions of dollars and costs us now hundreds of thousands of dollars a year to maintain an institution the capacity of which has never been tested. Nor is that all. If we turn eastward from Winnipeg to the Winnipeg river, we find there a complete power plant. It was opened in January of this year at a cost of exactly $6,000,000, money invested largely by American investors, business men of astuteness, men who have unshakable faith in the future of that province—an electrical plant that is at present giving us electricity far in excess of our present needs, the cheapest light and power on the American continent, a plant that ought ultimately to make the city of Winnipeg one of the largest industrial centres on the American continent.

If we turn to lake Winnipeg we have there in our fisheries, if they are carefully guarded and legitimately exploited, a source of inexhaustible wealth. We have our mining areas in the north, two of which have just recently been opened up, the value of which has not yet been determined. I say that the institutions to which I have referred earlier in my remarks were all built, in my judgment, in good faith. But we are over-institutionalized. I am not blaming anybody in the province of Manitoba to-day for that, but we are groaning and staggering under the burden of taxation resulting therefrom.

Let me take hon. members in imagination just for a moment or two to a typical Manitoba town. The train service is tri-weekly. We arrive at the depot and get into conversation with the station agent. If he is an honest man—and all station agents are honest men, as the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) well knows—what will he tell us? He will tell us what hundreds of them have told me, that they could handle three times the traffic that they are at present handling, and handle it just as efficiently without one cent of added cost to the company. Turning to the section men what do we find? Exactly the same conditions. Go into the village itself and there you will find two or three storekeepers who are unemployed two-thirds of their time. Go into the schools immediately adjoining that territory, and what do you find? You find school teachers, employed at a salary of approximately $100 per month, teaching seven, ten or fifteen youngsters, when they could just as efficiently teach forty-five. We find in those territories —and I know Manitoba; I do not take second place to any member in this House in my knowledge of Manitoba and conditions in that province; I stand open to correction, the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) sits to my left—we find in those territories men attempting to farm—shall I say, or to scratch? —large areas of land. In this regard I often think of a story I once heard of a farm wife who sent a youngster out to set the hen on some eggs. She gave him a specified number, and when he returned she asked him how he accomplished the task. He said, "I accomplished it fine. I set the hen down on two hundred eggs." "Oh", she said in astonishment, "a hen can never cover two hundred eggs." "I know that", the boy replied, "but I did it just to see the old fool trying to spread herself." It is most pitiful, Mr. Chairman, to see the attempts on the part of certain sincere but mistaken agriculturists in the province to "spread themselves". Almost everything has been sacrificed—in some cases the education of their children, domestic utensils in the home, all sacrificed—in a mad lust to acquire more land. What would immigration mean to these districts? It would mean, first of all, a daily train service, and a daily train service would mean a daily postal service. It would mean the enrichment of the social life and the satisfaction of the social instincts of that community. It would add no extra burden so far as the maintainance of the institutions is concerned. That is my point.

I pass from that to what I consider to be the cardinal fallacy that has entered into this debate. "If you bring settlers into Canada you are going to increase production, and increased production will mean deflation of prices, if indeed you can obtain a market for your products at all." It is scarcely necessary to deal with such a fallacy; it is so pitifully obvious. If you bring an agriculturist from the United States and establish him in the province of Manitoba, does he still remain a producer in the United States? If you bring an immigrant from southern or northern Europe, or even from Ireland, does he remain a producer in Ireland? You cannot cut out competition by shutting men out of the country. The crux of the whole question is, are we going to bring them in here to co-operate with us or let them remain outside to compete with us? That is the crux of the whole situation. "Oh," you say, "if you keep out European industrial workers we exclude competition and keep up the price of wages." Do you? You cannot keep out their products except by the erection of tariff barriers in which my hon. friends do not believe. Personally I cannot follow a course of reasoning that would allow manufactured articles to come in, and deny men the right to enter this country and manufacture such articles here. That is the cardinal point. "But", you say, "we can keep them in Europe; it is true we cannot keep them from competing with us, if they are Slavs, on the free markets of England, but we can keep them unemployed in Europe." Yes, but to the extent that you keep them unemployed there you paralyze Europe's purchasing power, and consequently cause reaction against your own trade and commerce.

I want to make this suggestion to the minister, with whom I have considerable sympathy and in whose sincerity I absolutely believe, I want to ask him if he has ever seriously considered the advisability of extending to rural areas in this province the housing scheme created by the late government and confined until now to the urban centres. We might establish in the province of Manitoba—or indeed, for that matter, anywhere in Canada—a standard farm labourer's dwelling constructed out of concrete, indestructible, at a cost of say $2,500; we might establish such cottages on our larger tracts of land, give the farm labourer a home in which to live with an acre of land upon which he could produce during the summer months sufficient to keep him and his family during the winter, a little cottage where his wife could board the hired help of the farmer that are now a nuisance—I might precede that by an adjective but I do not want to—to the over-worked farmer's wife, where the wife of the farm labourer could help the farmer's wife during the busy season of the year, and where the farm labourer's family could grow up and enjoy the great advantages of rural life. Similar homes have been erected in European countries, the suggestion is in no sense original. After you had erected such homes and had brought men with their families and established them there, after they had acquired experience and had become familiar with Canadian conditions, is it not the most likely thing in the world that the man who is to-day farming two sections would enter into an agreement with his farm labourer now Canadianized—I mean Canadianized in so far as farming experience is concerned—to take over half of the land he is attempting to scratch.

Reference has been made by the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth), to unemployment in the city of Winnipeg. Unemployment exists there. Unemployment has always existed in Winnipeg, and personally I do not think the government treated Winnipeg fairly in regard to unemployment relief this year. Winnipeg has for years been the rendezvous for the surplus farm labour of the three prairie provinces. You can talk to thousands of them on the train, and what do they tell you? "We are going to the Peg, there's no other burg on the prairies big enough to give us a good time." The result is that they crowd in from bankrupt Alberta and from comparatively prosperous Saskatchewan, causing unemployment, causing congestion, creating chaos—and the city of Winnipeg has got to maintain them. We have a real grievance, speaking as an industrial worker in the city of Winnipeg, against the agriculturists of the prairies; and I think the time has come when we have a right to demand of them that they absorb their surplus farm help in the fall of each year. How can they expect us to maintain it?

Mr. COOTE: Does my hon. friend not believe in immigration? If so, why does he object to this labour immigrating to Winnipeg?

Mr. HOEY: I say the time has come when we have a right to demand that these agriculturists, a great many of whom are in no sense insolvent, absorb their own surplus labour. And I want to say that after fifteen years' intensive study of the rural problem in the province of Manitoba, I do not think this labour can ever hope to become absorbed until some such scheme as I have indicated is launched. Personally I would take the whole amount to be voted for immigration this year and build farm labour cottages. The building of these cottages would cause employment and stimulate the building trades; it would distribute wealth in this country and go far to create a spirit of optimism; and when you have these homes constructed I can assure you that there are thousands with their families to-day in the urban centres who will be glad to go out and take possession of them. The scheme may seem impracticable, it did seem so to me at one time, but it is the best suggestion I can submit.

I am opposed to the co-operation of the government with the Canadian Colonization Association—not because I know anything of that body, but because I believe the co-operation does no go far enough to achieve practical results. But it goes far enough to create suspicion in the minds of the people, and create a great deal of unpopularity so far as the government is concerned. That, without knowing anything about the association, is the position that I take. If I were the minister I would put forth a supreme effort to interest the provincial departments of immigration. I would propose to the province of Manitoba that their department of immigration, which has been dead for some years, might be resuscitated and placed under the Minister of Agriculture, the federal government perhaps, paying the salary of the Deputy Minister of Immigration. I would propose some such policy to all of the provincial governments. I would go further than that, I would get in touch with our municipal reeves, and our municipal councils throughout the province; I think that the thing might be very profitably discussed if we are going to have a conference on the problem of taxation in this country. And then I would utilize the whole machinery associated with the Soldier Settlement Board. Now, if the federal government, the provincial governments, the municipal authorities and the Soldier Settlement Board cannot put across this scheme of immigration I do not think the Canadian Colonization Association can. The co-operation which is proposed by the minister is going to be interpreted as a tacit confession of failure on the part of the Dominion government to undertake a task which is paramountly their duty.

Now, just a word with regard to the type of immigrant that should come in. I have come in contact with thousands of so-called non-English-speaking people in the province of Manitoba. I have entered their homes; I have met them in a thousand and one different ways. I want to say that they are not the most prosperous people in the province to-day, but they are as prosperous as other sections of our Manitoba people and, I think, the most contented. They were driven up into the northern sections of the province; they had to encounter almost unsurmountable obstacles. They have made good, their young men are entering the universities and graduating with honours; they are entering the professions; they are a source of pride not only to Manitoba but to the Dominion as a whole. But when you turn to the class of immigrants that we should encourage to come in, it is a somewhat difficult task to determine the most desirable type. Personally I am opposed to bringing into this country any man who has passed the age of 35 years. You can never detach him from the old country habits and from the old country methods of doing things. Again and again he will remind you of the kind of trains they have in the Old Country, the way they live there and the way they do things there. If you bring him out when he is comparatively young, he forgets the Old Country. I never think of the Old Country. Therefore, I would discourage men who are past the age of 35 years coming to this country.

Speaking of Scandinavians I would admit all the Scandinavians into Canada to-morrow and would be prepared to accept the responsibility for so doing. I never met in western Canada a Scandinavian who was, if you will pardon the colloquialism, "broke." I remember a former American school teacher in Minnesota paying me a great tribute on one occasion when I was in conversation with her. She asked me how long I had been in that part of the country where I resided. I said I had been there three years. She said "How did you acquire such a working knowledge of English?" I said they spoke English in the land from which I came. She said "Have you not come from Sweden?" The Scandinavians are the best settlers that have been brought to this country. But when you are deciding the type of settlers it all depends on the ambition of the individual, and unfortunately it is difficult to detect ambition in a man—when you are first introduced to him it is absolutely impossible. I can remember an immigrant who came to this country some fourteen years ago. When he arrived in the city of Quebec he had not $35 which, at that time, it was necessary for him to have in order to land. But by his ingenuity he evaded the immigration authorities and got in. He came up to the city of Montreal, and unemployment at that time was rampant. After two hours' search he secured a job in a Montreal tannery owned by a Scotchman, washing and stretching hides. The old employer said to him "The work is difficult and onerous, but the wages are high", and he received for his work in that tannery for two months $7 a week. He saved in that two months enough money to take him to Fort Frances in New Ontario, where he obtained a position at $400 a year, where he worked for two years and saved enough to enable him to take a five-year college course—that is, with the little additional sums the he was able to earn during the college vacation. We sometimes hear of men living on a meal a day. This particular immigrant lived for four days on one meal, and I remember on one occasion he lived for five days on one meal, and the last six weeks of the year in which he graduated he lived for ten cents a day, and was denied 4 p.m. the privilege of writing home to his parents, because he did not have the money for postage. His parents were then living but have since died. He graduated from that institution, and is to-day a member of the Dominion parliament. He is still in his thirties, and by no means a physical wreck. I wish to say that even the discussions that have taken place on this subject have not shaken my faith in the Dominion of Canada. With that experience, Mr. Chairman, could I honestly and conscientiously deny young ambitious men the right to come into this country? I would not encourage them to come in, and I would not spend a cent to bring them in, but I would allow them to come if they so desired. We have a tremendous debt in this country. We have social conditions that are depressing, but I believe we can bring immigrants in here who will help us surmount these difficulties, and help us pay off these financial obligations, and in the meantime these immigrants may enjoy a measure of prosperity which is greater than you can enjoy in any other country in modern civilization.

Mr. CLARK: I find myself, Mr. Chairman, very much in agreement with the sentiments expressed by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey) and I think it entirely proper that I should congratulate him upon the attitude he takes on this question. I certainly agree with him in his statement that immigration in this country is a great necessity. I look upon the problem of immigration as the greatest problem facing this country to-day. It is the country's most important business and likewise the most important business of this House. Canada cannot develop without an increase in her population. The subject of immigration cannot be considered except in relation to three things, farm industry, our railways and our industrial concerns. Each one of those has its own bearing upon this subject. Our farmers complain that they are not making profits today. I think the same is true of our industrials. Canada is over-industrialized, she is over-built with railways, and at the present time all classes are suffering owing to the lack of markets. The hon. member for Springfield said: Are we going to bring in immigrants to co-operate with us, or leave them out to compete with us? I think that is all very well, so far as it goes, but if they co-operate with us they will certainly create markets for our farmers and for our manufacturers, and traffic for our railways, and increased traffic will produce what the farmers so urgently desire, lower freight rates, and thereby lessen the cost of their agricultural implements and other necessities. Increased production and increased markets must also enable the manufacturer to reduce his overhead, and by increasing the volume of his production, enable him to reduce the price at which it can be sold. Furthermore this increase in population will mean more people to share our burdens of taxation.

A great deal has been said with regard to the question of emigration. I believe that emigration from our farming community has resulted from the burdens borne by these farmers due to high freight rates, due to the fact that they are not getting more for their produce, or very little more, than they were before the war, and due to the decreased value of our dollar. Therefore, our farmers are leaving, wherever they can, for better farms, or better places to earn a living. The lack of markets has caused stagnation in industries and building trades. The result is that our skilled artisans, our professional men, our architects are leaving the country to go to the United States where there is an industrial boom. But when we create those conditions which are bound to result from an increased population these men will flow back into the country.

I believe that the matter of great importance in connection with any policy of immigration is to select immigrants from the right sort of people, and the qualifications of such people, in my opinion, are these. First, the mental capacity of the immigrants; secondly, I would see to it that we secure people whom we can assimilate; and thirdly, I would insist that the people who come are such as will not drag down the standard of living in Canada. We in British Columbia have a very good illustration of the sort of immigrants we cannot assimilate, in the orientals who have been allowed to come into the country. And the people in the East, I believe, have also had an example of people whom it is impossible to absorb into the population in those immigrants who go into the city of Montreal, for instance, and work in the sweat shops, thus driving out our best labour from the manufacturing industries and forcing them to seek employment elsewhere. I know of two industrial concerns in Hamilton, one of which has failed recently. That firm always employed good Canadian citizens of Hamilton, and I believe they have been driven out of business because of the fact that we have permitted to come into the country sweat shop labour that we cannot assimilate into our population, and with which our own people cannot compete.

I have listened with a great deal of interest to the long explanation given by the minister and I must confess that I have yet no clear conception of what he has done or what he proposes to do with reference to this problem. I believe that we are entering an era in the history of this country when we require for our proper development something new in the shape of an aggressive immigration policy; we need measures that are vigorous and bold. We have to take a chance if we are to succeed; we cannot sit down and rely on old methods and the course of nature if we are to secure the population which we so much require. I know of a scheme which has been before the department for at least a year and which involved the bringing into Canada of the most desirable type of settlers from the north of Scotland, from the Hebrides, but I have reason to believe that these settlers have not yet been secured, although at least a thousand of them could have been brought in in the last year. Why has not this been done? I cannot understand why we should suffer from a moment's delay in this regard. We want people in this country of the right sort and we should not hesitate a moment in seizing an opportunity to bring in a dozen, a hundred, or a thousand men who will make desirable citizens.

With the majority of the members of this House, I regard farming as our basic industry; and so far as I can gather from the minister's policy he purposes to look for agricultural immigrants from foreign countries. True, he states that the British will be given the preference. But what steps is he going to take to bring people from the British Isles into Canada? I have waited for some explanation as to why such a small amount is spent in advertising in Great Britain in comparison with such a tremendous sum in foreign countries. That explanation has been promised but so far it is not forthcoming, and I think that this House might have expected it almost forthwith, after the suggestion that was made that enough was not being spent in Great Britain. In my opinion it is possible to secure desirable settlers from Great Britain for farming purpose—I have given one instance of where there are farmers available for this country who have not been brought in.

[Mr. Clark.]

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Perhaps I might reply to my hon. friend at this stage in regard to the matter of advertising. The approximate sum spent in Great Britain is $69,000, and in all other countries about $200,000.

Mr. CLARK: Well I still look on that as being almost as bad as the figures we were given at first, of some $3,000 and $90,000 respectively. This country requires an energetic and aggressive campaign for immigrants from Great Britain.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The hon. gentleman is complaining about nothing having been done in the north of Scotland. We have had an agent working there and settlers are coming from that part of Great Britain about the beginning of next month.

Mr. CLARK: I was speaking of last year; I was refering to people who, I knew, were available but who were not brought.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): If my hon. friend was in the House when I spoke he will remember I stated there was a delegation of five gentlemen who travelled throughout Canada last year from the north of Scotland and who were coming back to this country with a fairly large number of their neighbours. These people intend to settle in the vicinity of Red Deer, Alberta, that desperate province, about the ruin of which we have heard so much.

Mr. CLARK: I am glad to know that some steps are being taken in this direction, but at the same time I want to impress upon the minister the fact that our people are anxious to increase the 54 per cent of Anglo-Saxons who now reside in Canada. And we can do this by a proper, aggressive campaign for immigrants from Great Britain. I do not know whether a suggestion from me is of any use, but I cannot see why we should not inform the British government and our agents in Great Britain that we are prepared to take in this country 100,000, or as many as they like to send, of the youth of Great Britain from the ages of fourteen to sixteen or seventeen. The Canadian government could take the responsibility of placing them on proper farms and carrying out a system of inspection of these farms to see that these youths were properly educated, and there might be, in connection with a scheme of this kind, a regular annual examination, so that these boys, when they qualified under tests prescribed by the Department of Agriculture, or whatever department was selected, might be enabled to secure land of their own and be encouraged to develop it. By so doing I believe we could form the foundation in this country of such a future as we cannot expect if we bring in undesirable immigrants from foreign countries.

The same policy should be adopted for our cities. I think, with the hon. member (Mr. Hoey), that there should be co-operation between our Department of Immigration and the various municipal councils. But I would go further. We have in every city and town social service organizations such as Rotary and Kiwanis clubs, Y.M.C.A.'s and church associations, every one of which is directly interested in the development of this country. I would advocate that we carry on a campaign of education among these organizations with a view to impressing upon them the great importance to Canada's welfare of increasing our population by the addition of the right sort of people. And I believe that if proper steps were taken to co-operate with these organizations we could secure the results we desire.

We have placed before us briefly three views: one, no restrictions; two, no immigrants; three, selected immigrants. I want to support my argument for selected immigrants, and for immigrants as largely as possible from the British Isles, with some figures giving the experience of the United States. They have gone through a period in their history similar to what we will go through in the next hundred years. They have had the experience, let us benefit by that experience. What I am about to quote is the result of their experience gained from scientific tests made by them during the war. Scientific mental tests were made on 1,700,000 officers and men of the American expeditionary force. This is a quotation from the official army mental tests:

> Relatively early in this supreme struggle, it became clear to certain individuals that the proper utilization of man-power, and more particularly of mind or brain-power, would assure ultimate victory. . . All this had to be done in the least possible time. Never before in the history of civilization was brain, as contrasted with brawn, so important; never before, the proper placement and utilization of brain-power so essential to success.

> Our War Department, nerved to exceptional risks by the stern necessity for early victory, saw and immediately seized its opportunity to develop various new lines of personnel work. Among these is numbered the psychological service. Great will be our good fortune if the lesson in human engineering which the war has taught is carried over directly and effectively into our civil institutions and activities.
> The purposes of these psychologcal tests were, as stated in the army orders: "(a) to aid in segregating the mentally incompetent, (b) to classify men according to their mental capacity, (c) to assist in selecting competent men for responsible positions." And, to quote a subsequent official pronouncement after the administration of the tests: "In the opinion of this office these reports indicate very definitely that the desired results have been achieved."

These tests were made according to nationality of the individual, and the table which I shall now present gives the percentage of inferiors found among 1,700,000 men, namely:

Country of Birth—	Percentage of inferiority
England	8.7
Holland	9.2
Denmark	13.4
Scotland	13.6
Germany	15.0
Sweden	19.4
Canada	19.5
Belgium	24.0
Norway	25.6
Austria	37.5
Ireland	39.4
Turkey	42.0
Greece	43.6
Russia	60.4
Italy	63.4
Poland	69.9

In the table giving the percentage of superiority we find the English again come first. Here are the figures:

Country of birth—	Percentage of superiority
England	19.7
Scotland	13.0
Holland	10.7
Canada	10.5
Germany	8.3
Denmark	5.4
Sweden	4.3
Norway	4.1
Ireland	4.1
Turkey	3.4
Austria	3.4
Russia	2.7
Greece	2.1
Italy	.8
Belgium	.8
Poland	.5

I think these tables tell a very interesting story summarizing the experience of the United States. In selecting immigrants from foreign countries I think the minister might well be guided by the experience of the United States and profit by the lessons they have learned.

I should like to refer to a remark made, I think, either by the minister himself (Mr. Stewart) or by the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke), that the Londoner cannot stand the conditions on our farms.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I did not say so.

Mr. CLARK: Then it was the leader of the Progressive party. I take issue with him. While the Londoner of mature age may not make a good farmer, still the youth born in London will if he is properly trained. I believe the Londoner can be trained to do anything. Many of us saw the Londoner on the field of battle, and we also saw him living under conditions that no farmer in this country has ever had to endure—sleeping in the mud and on ice with nothing under him but a waterproof sheet. And he stood it. We must not belittle the Anglo-Saxon, the British, because I feel that the United States have proved beyond all question that the immigrant of Anglo-Saxon stock makes the best citizen. He is the dominant influence in the United States to-day. In my opinion the only way in which we can make this country prosperous and have a national type with a proper patriotism is to follow the policy of bringing the Britisher to this country and thus making Canada a British nation instead of the conglomerate nation we shall be if we persist in the policy of bringing in foreigners.

Mr. EULER: Mr. Chairman, I am not entering this debate with any thought of delaying the estimates, nor of embarrassing the minister, but to offer what little I can to solve what seems to be a very difficult problem. I am glad to speak for a moment, if it is only to congratulate the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey) on the excellent address he gave the committee a few moments ago. I was very glad to hear what he said, because after I had visualized the picture drawn by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) last night I feared that one of the factors in the prosperity of the city from which I come was about to disappear entirely.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, if I may be allowed a question. Is not the hon. gentleman aware—I am quite sure the hon. member for Springfield is—that the crop of which we have a record in the Manitoba Free Press for 1921 fell below the taxes of the province by over $16,000,000?

Mr. EULER: Mr. Chairman, I was not referring to an isolated statement of that kind at all.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): But that is the fact.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. EULER: I was referring to the statement my hon. friend made last night that his province was practically bankrupt. And people who are bankrupt cannot buy goods.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): We are not buying them, either.

Mr. EULER: I think it is hardly necessary to argue that immigration is desirable, although I know there are elements in this House that are rather unfriendly to the idea of bringing more people into this country. I do not think the point needs labouring that we want more people. In a country of the size of Canada, with its illimitable resources, the question of the need of more people should not be open to argument at all. But if in working out the details, the minister finds that he is meeting with a good deal of difficulty and some opposition, I would say to him, if I may, that in this parliament as elsewhere, it is absolutely impossible always to reconcile the ideas of various people, and he should go on just as he thinks is in the interest of the people of Canada. When I say that, I would also say—and I will refer to this later—that I do not entirely agree with one or two of the suggestions which he has in mind.

The value of immigration cannot be minimised. It develops our natural resources, in the first place. The greater the number of people you have in the country, the greater the consumption and therefore, the greater will be the production required. Thus, the question whether we should have more people in this country with its great spaces and its resources should not be open to argument. There are certain facts operating against the success of immigration at the present time, even if we open the door very wide. The first thing is the high cost of transportation. The people of the British Isles, and the people of European continental countries as well, are not blessed with a great deal of this world's goods. In many instances, they have not the money, even if they so desire, to pay their way across the ocean. In past years those immigrants who have come to Canada—and I have knowledge of some of them—have come here because their friends or relatives in this country have advanced them the money to pay for transportation. The second reason is this, that in the past two years the restrictions have been so onerous that it has been impossible for those people to come. While some of those restrictions have, I am glad to say, been removed by the present government—and I am in this making no special criticism of the previous government—the effects of those restrictions are still occupying the minds of people who would like to come. There are, I understand, people to-day in England and on the European continent who believe it is impossible for them to enter Canada, who believe that the restrictions which existed at one time are still in force. A vigorous immigration policy would include making known to the people whom we wish to secure the fact that they would be welcome if they desired to come to Canada. For that I would spend a little money; I would not spend a great deal. I may say frankly and almost at the outset that I am in favour of voluntary immigration. I am not particularly enamoured—and I say this with all goodwill —of any scheme which contemplates the expenditure of great sums of money to induce people to come to Canada, and perhaps, painting rosier pictures than should be painted. I am also not very greatly in favour of spending large amounts of money on those people after they arrive in Canada. Briefly, I would say this. I would spend a reasonable sum of money in acquainting the people of various countries from which we wish to attract immigrants, with the fact that if they are willing to work, if they are healthy, if they are white, if they are morally and physically sound, we shall be glad to welcome them to this country and to open the door to them.

I might say, just in passing, in reply to the speech of the hon. gentleman who preceded me (Mr. Clark) that I am quite in sympathy with him when he says that we ought to encourage immigration from the British Isles. I believe, however, if we desire to obtain all the immigration which this country ought to have and which it can stand, we cannot stop there.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What class of men would the hon. member bring from the British Isles?

Mr. EULER: I was coming to that a little later on; but I would say to my hon. friend that I would not bar a man whether he was a farmer or engaged in any other occupation, provided that he was physically, mentally and morally fit. I was going to refer for a moment to some of the remarks made by one or two hon. members opposite, and more particularly to the remarks made by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland). Last evening, when I was listening to him, I felt rather depressed and discouraged for fear that what he said might possibly be true, although I could hardly believe it. I was, for that reason, particularly pleased that the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey) took up the cudgels on behalf of the western provinces and said what he did.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I would not like the hon. member to go on record in that way. Every word of what I said was true, and the hon. member for Springfield admitted that quite possibly it was true in Alberta.

Mr. EULER: I did not hear the hon. member for Springfield admit that the West was bankrupt. In discussing western Canada and the life of the farmer there, I say with all sincerity—and I think my hon. friends will believe me—that those who come from industrial Ontario have every sympathy with the western farmer, and I believe we are willing to go almost any distance in a reasonable way to help them, if giving such assistance is possible. In saying that, I am thinking now of another farming district in Ontario. I come from the county of Waterloo, the centre of a farming and industrial district in western Ontario. I believe that there we have, perhaps, the happiest combination, the combination that makes for success. We have an industrial population, manufacturing towns and cities surounded by good farming country in which mixed farming is being carried on. If that could be developed in western Canada, I think the problem that is being discussed would be solved.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Would the hon. member tell us where the farmers would find a market for products from mixed farming?

Mr. EULER: I was coming to that. That deals very intimately with the question of immigration of which we are speaking now. That is why I am in favour of immigration for the West as well as for other parts of Canada. I was going to make a comparison. In western Ontario, the part of the province from which I come we have first-class agricultural land. In Western Canada, I fear it is true that many of the farmers, particularly in southern Alberta, from what I have heard, have become located on land which will never be able to support them as an agricultural community. That will correct itself in time. Apparently, the greatest difficulty they have is their distance from the market. The population is not there to consume that which they themselves produce, and they are forced to the necessity of exporting their goods by rail for some thousand or fifteen hundred miles and then overseas to foreign markets. I am not a pessimist when I say this, but this has often occurred to me when the difficulties of the western farmer have been discussed: I am not sure whether the West, in the matter of growing wheat and exporting it thousands of miles to the country of consumption, is not at the present moment conducting what is really a great experiment. I do not know whether it is possible for western Canada to continue to grow wheat only and to send it to market, this requiring the expenditure of large sums of money for transportation, something which cannot be overcome at the present time. It must be difficult to carry this on, because the western farmers are in competition with countries where wheat can be produced at low prices and transported at lower costs.

Mr. HOEY: Is the hon. member aware that the best British economists inform us that wheat consumption in Europe to-day is only one-third of what it would normally be if Europe were re-established?

Mr. EULER: That is, in a way, an answer to my question. When the European peoples become able again to purchase to the full extent of their requirements, the price of wheat will go up, and that will immediately be reflected in the prosperity of the western farmer. Let us hope that that condition will soon come about.

Mr. GOULD: "A good time coming".

Mr. EULER: In the meantime the eastern farmer has his local market, and I am inclined to believe—I do not care to be dogmatic with regard to these things—that that which makes the eastern farmer prosperous will be what in the end will have to make the western farmer prosperous, and that is the development of a home market.

Miss MACPHAIL: Does the hon. member consider that the eastern farmer is prosperous to-day?

Mr. EULER: I am speaking now for the farmers in my own community. Perhaps when I use the word "prosperous", I use too strong a word.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. EULER: I am not going to say I used too strong a word. I said "perhaps". I do say this, that the farmers in the neighbourhood in which I live are very comfortable. They produce a great many of the things which they need; they produce a variety of commodities—butter, cheese, eggs, wheat, and the other products that are raised in western Ontario, and which they take to the towns and industrial centres. The point I want to make is that the interests of the cities and towns are identical with theirs, the farmer gets his home market there, and the working man living in the towns and cities gets the benefit of having these goods brought in to him from time to time. I believe that that will be the salvation of the West. Perhaps I should not say the salvation, but I believe that is the proper solution of their problem. When the hon. member for Springfield spoke of the development of a water power in Manitoba great enough to move the wheels of vast industries, I was hoping that at no distant time the West itself would begin to create its own industrial centres, and then the problem of the farmers will be solved if they apply themselves diligently to farming as farming ought to be carried out, and do not try to spread themselves over too much territory, as was mentioned by the hon. member for Springfield.

Mr. GOULD: What is "too much"?

Mr. EULER: If it is true that the western lands, as in some cases has been mentioned, are not in a position to produce crops, if that should turn out to be the general condition in the West, which I do not believe, then I do not see how any legislation on the part of this or any other government can relieve the situation. I am not referring particularly to the tariff. I know my western friends would like to have the tariff reduced, and in some cases entirely wiped out. I come from an industrial community. Some 150 to 175 manufacturing establishments are operating in the town from which I come, and I say to my hon. friends, if it is of any interest to them to have me say it, I am not a high protectionist. I have the good of the industries at heart. I do not wish to see them destroyed.

Mr. SHAW: Can my hon. friend mention any member of this House who is a high protectionist?

Mr. EULER: I think that almost anybody in the chamber is as capable of forming an opinion with regard to that as I am.

Mr. HANSON: Then the hon. member is not in sympathy with the tariff plank in the Liberal platform of 1919.

Mr. EULER: I do not know just exactly what the hon. member is driving at, but I will say quite frankly that I at no time approved of the tariff plank in the Liberal platform.

I was making a comparison between the eastern farmer, and the western farmer, and for that reason I did not think it necessary to discuss the tariff in this connection for the simple reason that the tariff applies to the eastern farmer just as it does to the western farmer. If the trouble, then, is with the markets, they must find their market in the United States where there are great centres of population nearer to them, or else build a market of their own. The latter takes time and immigration, and that is my sole reason for referring to the West and western conditions in this way.

Mr. BIRD: How would it be possible for the West to build up industrial centres without some form of protection against the highly developed industrialism of Ontario and Quebec?

Mr. EULER: There is no reason in the world why the west could not develop industries just as Ontario has done. I can see no point in that argument.

Mr. BIRD: The hon. gentleman seems to be anxious to protect the industries of his own town against the industries of the United States. Have we of the West not the same right to be anxious concerning the highly developed industries of Ontario?

Mr. EULER: I cannot grasp the hon. member's solicitude for the industries of western Ontario. I do not see why in the course of time western Canada, which is under exactly the same economic conditions as eastern Canada so far as the tariff is concerned, cannot develop industries in the same way as western Ontario has developed them, or Quebec, or any other part of Canada. Perhaps I am very slow in grasping the point of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BIRD: I wish I could put the question a little more clearly, because it is vital. How does the hon. member expect western Canada to develop industries without some form of protection against the highly developed industries of Ontario?

Mr. EULER: In exactly the same way as, to-day, a small manufacturer can begin his industry in Ontario and build it up in competition with the larger ones.

Mr. GOOD: Why, then, do the Ontario manufacturers need protection against the United States manufacturers?

Mr. EULER: I did not propose to get into a debate on the tariff, though I am not at all afraid of debating the tariff. As I said, I am not a high protectionist, or perhaps I might say, as one hon. gentleman said once, I am not a very high protectionist. The one answer to that question, and I propose then to go on with my argument, is this: As against the United States you have a population of 120,000,000 to compete with. Their manufacturers have a market of 120,000,000 of people as compared with the 8,000,000 of people that the Canadian manufacturer has for his market. I will say this, and leave it at that: I believe there are many manufacturers in Canada to-day—and I know some of them in my own community—who would be willing to enter into open competition on an equal basis with the United States manufacturer if the tariff wall came down both ways. But to ask the Canadian manufacturer to throw his market open to the highly developed industries of the United States, with their big home market, and not have access to that market himself, that, I say is not a fair and square deal.

Mr. GOOD: They are ready for reciprocity.

Mr. EULER: Now, I think I might be permitted to go on with my real argument. I have said that I favoured a form of voluntary immigration with no great amount of money expended in bringing the people here, but I would like to make known to them that they could come, and that we would welcome them when they did come. I would open the door reasonably wide with proper precautions. I would let in the man who looks like a worker, though I agree with the hon. member for Springfield that it might be pretty difficult to say whether a man is an earnest worker or not, but where there was any doubt I would be inclined to give the immigrant the benefit of the doubt.

I think there are certain things that are fundamental in the discussion of this question. First of all, the immigrant should be physically healthy, mentally and morally healthy. Secondly, there should be a certain racial fitness, and in that I am not going so far perhaps as some others; when I speak of that, I would say that I would exclude the oriental; I would go that far, and not a great deal further. And then there should be a certain industrial fitness, although I think that is of minor importance.

Now, some of the non-essentials as I view them are these: I would not insist on any great money qualification. If this country had insisted on immigrants having a certain amount of money in their pockets upon arrival, I wonder how many of us would be here to-day. I think the forefathers, the fathers and grandfathers, of a great many of us, would not have been able to come to Canada if there had been any money test at that time. I am glad that requirement has now been removed. I do not think the matter of language is so important; that will correct itself in one generation. I further think that the matter of occupation is not of very great importance either, because if we enforce too many restrictions, if we ask too many questions of these people as to what they are going to do, exactly what man they are going to be employed with, and all the rest of it, the impression will remain in the European countries and in Britain that it is difficult to enter Canada, and a great many people whom it would be desirable to have come here would not even attempt to enter. So I say that if men fill all the requirements of which I have spoken I would let them enter Canada no matter what their race or creed, and I would bid them welcome.

Now, I am going to speak for a moment about the position of labour in regard to this matter. I know that the representatives of labour have some doubts as to the advisability of permitting men to come into this country who are not going on the farm. I have not the fears that perhaps they have. I have before me here an extract taken from one of the Toronto papers—possibly it has been quoted before—which reads:

> Canadian skilled Labor is absorbed
>
> Ontario now faced with a shortage
>
> That the absorption of Canadian skilled labor by the United States continues, and that the result the industrial life of the province of Ontario is faced with the prospect of a shortage of labour comparable with war-time conditions, is the opinion of William Meath, superintendent of the Ontario Government Employment Service. "There is still some unemployment in Ontario", said Mr. Meath "but these without work are mostly unskilled men. The coming of spring with the revival of building and construction work is sure to encounter a famine in trained labour in Ontario" says Mr. Meath.

The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, (Mr. Robb) some time ago, in the course of an address stated as follows:

> "It should be the ambition of all," he said to work for the day when Canada will export all finished products. This day would see increased labour in the country and a consequent increased domestic consumption of Canada's own products. He said that Canada would not only have to make goods in quantity but in quality. The keynote of the export trade, urged the speaker, was quality.

Now, I would not for one moment be understood as saying that the skilled workmen of Canada are not as skilled as those of other countries, I think that the great majority of them are; but there does actually exist in some of the manufacturing towns and cities in this country to-day a scarcity of skilled labour in certain lines, and it has been difficult to get the right kind of men from other countries. I can cite an incident in support of that statement. I spoke to a gentleman—a manufacturer in a very large way, who had built up his business with his own hands and had himself been a workman—and he said to me, "I do not like to take a walk through my factory and see the way in which the work is done. It is not done the way we did it in the olden days. We are making to-day articles of as good quality as anybody in Canada, but they are not as good as they were because we are unable to get skilled labour at the present time." If we did permit a number of intelligent and industrious men to enter this country freely—I do not say that we should go after them particularly—I do not believe there would be any hardship worked to the men who are already here. In this connection I want for a moment to refer to what was said by the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) and to support his statement. He referred to the attitude of the president of the Dominion Trades and Labour Congress, Mr. Tom Moore, and he disagreed with that attitude. I was rather surprised to read some time ago an article written by that gentleman in which, while he did not absolutely say so in so many words, he intimated that he objected to the coming into Canada of immigrants who would go to the farms, because possibly they might drift into the cities and there compete with workmen. If Mr. Moore was correctly reported I think that is a selfish view that would not be endorsed by the working people in general in Canada, and I think it is an attitude that is entirely improper—possibly that word is too strong—but it is an attitude that should not be taken by a gentleman who is also a director of the National Railways in whose success the matter of immigration is such a great factor.

I have only one more point to touch upon, and it is one that I have not heard mentioned to any great extent. I think, possibly, those who know me best will not say that I am a sentimentalist, or anything of that kind, but I would like to refer to the humanitarian side of the question of immigration. They say that charity begins at home, but I do not think that a civilized people can entirely dissociate themselves from the welfare of others of their race or from the obligations to their fellow men. We were said to have fought a war to end war, but the world has been disappointed in that hope. There is only one remedy for that evil and that is a realization by all the peoples of the world that there is such a thing as the brotherhood of man. Now it seems to me that if that is true, it is inhuman and immoral, if the term is not too strong, to exclude from this country, which has infinitely more territory than the present population can occupy, men women and children desiring to escape the misery of over-crowding and the conditions of war-worn Europe, where life is such a trial and in some cases is almost impossible. I wonder, Sir, whether eight or nine millions of people have the right to monopolize the millions of acres of land and the boundless resources which they themselves cannot occupy and develop. Are we justified in assuming that the Creator of the human race has given forever and exclusively to the few people in Canada this land for us and our descendants? I do not believe it. I am not, Sir, in favour of unrestricted immigration. I do not believe that we should admit people whom it would not be in our interest or their interest to admit. The United States has a negro problem on its hands because it imported years ago a prolific race which never will assimilate with the white people of that country. I do not think we want to repeat that error, we do not want a jumble of black and white and yellow races, but my conviction is this: Excluding those, our proper immigration policy is to let it be known that we shall welcome industrious people of all kinds, so long as they are white and physically and morally fit and likely readily to become real Canadians in this or the next generation.

Mr. LEWIS: During the past few weeks when reading the newspapers I was in hopes that peace was in sight in Ireland. But after hearing the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey), I have decided that the prospect is hopeless. In regard to this important subject that is now being discussed I was just a little disappointed in the spech of that hon. member. I will tell you why. My hon. friend mentioned immigration, and also spoke of the economic factors that entered into the life of the West, but devoted practically the whole of his time to the subject of immigration. I wish he had devoted his fine talents to solving the economic difficulties that are the real cause of our dissatisfaction at the present time.

The hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) made the statement that the West needs salvation. By implication he admits that the conditions are not what they should be in the West, and in speaking of the conditions of Canada in general and the subject of immigration he naturally spoke of the brotherhood of man. I wonder whether the brotherhood of man takes in the black man and the yellow race as well as the white race. Of course, I do not believe in these people being admitted here, but it seems to me to be a little inconsistent, when you are speaking of the brotherhood of man and the equality of man, to discriminate against those races. It may be that some time in the near future it will be difficult for us to discriminate against those nations which are becoming enlightened forces in the world at the present time. The hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Clark) spoke of British immigration. So far as that question is concerned, he has my sympathy. I believe to a large extent that a British country, or a country that was settled by the British to a large extent, should be populated by that stock, and for that reason I am in sympathy with what the hon. member said in regard to that policy.

I was very much impressed with the very excellent and most extraordinary speech of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland). In the first place it was excellent in preparation, excellent in delivery and most extraordinary in the revelation that he gave to this House last night. He qualified his statement to some extent by saying that he was dealing largely with the conditions in his own constituency, and I have it on the authority of the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Stewart) that a part of my own constituency is really in a worse condition than the constituency of the hon. member for Bow River. But after I got home last night, feeling depressed with the situation, I came to the conclusion that it was not the part of wisdom to generalize and to say that the whole of western Canada was in the same condition, because we do know that in certain portions of the West it is possible at least to make a comfortable living. As far as my own constituency is concerned, I do not say that the fault lies with this administration, but it seems to me a great fault lies at the feet of the governments who opened up large areas of land that should never have been opened. That is one of the problems of the West. Lands that should have always remained ranch lands should never have been opened for homesteading. If I shut my eyes for a moment I can see a stretch of a hundred miles in my own constituency that 5 p.m. to-day is largely becoming a barren wilderness, and yet fifteen years ago it was the most productive part of my constituency. The government opened mile after mile of land until they got a little too near the hills, with the result that after the prairie grass and shrubbery were taken off the hills, the wind played havoc with the soil, and smothered the valley with sand, till to-day, if you drive through with a motor car, you will find the fences covered with it. So that the fault was not altogether with the country, but the trouble arose because of the opening of certain territories which should never have been opened to the settler.

I am glad to see there is a remedy in view, and the government to a large extent have advocated that remedy. There is a scheme on foot by which those good settlers who are acclimatized and experienced shall be taken off those bad lands and transferred to lands more favourable to the diversified agriculture which we advocate in Saskatchewan. With reference to the remedy which the hon. member for Bow River emphasized last night, I am entirely in accord, but I am not in accord with the general conditions. However, I agree with the remedy which he advocated and emphasized. There is one point upon which I differ, and I differ because of what I heard this afternoon. He made a quotation from a statement of the Bishop of Birmingham, to the effect that the British race were being sent to the colonies to re-invigorate them. Well, if the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey) and the hon. member for Bow River, are samples of the stock they are sending here to be re-invigorated, I do not think that the British nation is going to become defunct, or that they are in a state of decay or in need of regeneration.

An hon. MEMBER: How about yourself?

Mr. LEWIS: That is all right. The hon. member for Springfield said that in a careful analysis of western conditions we should discriminate between the economic factors that are entering into the situation and the country at large. I quite agree with him. I am quite in accord, and I do not play second fiddle to any one in regard to eulogies of the West. I think it is a splendid country. I think it has the most productive soil of any country in the world.

Mr. MARLER: Hear, hear.

Mr. LEWIS: Nobody denies that. We are not denying that. We can produce 400,000,000 bushels of wheat in the coming year, as far as that is concerned. But in spite of the fact that we have the finest land and can produce the best wheat in the world, to a large extent we are not prosperous and many people are leaving us. Therefore, what we say is not that the land is not good or that there is anything wrong with the country, but that there must be something wrong with our internal policy which makes conditions as they are.

Mr. MARLER: Are the people all right out there?

Mr. LEWIS: The people that we have, yes. But some of the people who come to us are not always the best.

The hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Kennedy) spoke of the literature that was sent to the Old Country. I remember, twenty years ago, receiving this very literature. I admit it was a little exaggerated, but I am not sorry that I came to this country. I am glad that I came. The hon. member for Springfield tells us about coming to this country and working his way through university. I may tell him that I was in the same position when I came to Canada. I took the first job offered to me. I was told I had an appointment in Winnipeg when I came here, but I found the agent was lying to me. I simply settled down and took the first job I could get. After a number of years I saved enough to take a university and theological course, and I had a wife and family at the same time. Any country where there is this possibility of a man of ambition getting through, I think, is a worth-while country. There is nothing wrong with the country. But it is probably our internal conditions that make it what it is at the present time. In the matter of comparison can you compare Canada with Germany, where we are told economic conditions are terrible and people are hardly able to live, or with Russia where conditions are so bad—with apologies for the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth). In those countries, there seems to be economic chaos. As far as other countries are concerned, with the one exception of the United States, it seems to me at the present time that Canada is the finest country in the world.

Mr. MARTELL: Why except the United States?

Mr. LEWIS: At the present time it seems to me that the conditions in the United States, with its internal policy, are possibly a little better for the people who want to create desirable home conditions. The climate is not so severe and industrial conditions in that country seem to give better scope for men who are seeking employment. Of course, from the point of view of my wife and family, I would say that Canada is the best.

Let me say a few words in regard to the speech of my hon. friend (Mr. Rinfret). I always listen to that hon. gentleman with marked attention. He generally has a prepared address and we usually expect something worth while from him. But his immigration policy I do not agree with. He said he was willing to let any people come into Canada from any country in the world. That statement, I think, is far too general. The hon. member sympathises with the minister and the government because he says there are so many contradictory views placed before parliament on this subject that it is very difficult to know where one stands. It seems to me, however, that he rather increased the contradiction. There is one thing he did say that struck me and that was that the reason for immigration was obvious. I listened to learn just wherein it was so obvious, and the hon. gentleman explained himself. In the first place, he said, immigration was to help the people who are now in the country to bear the burden of the national debt; secondly, it was to assist our National Railways; and in the third place it was intended to increase our wealth. Now, I do not think that any one of these three things is the real reason why we should get people to come into Canada. You tell the people of other lands that you want them to help bear the national debt, to assist the railways out of their difficulties, and to contribute towards our wealth, and they will look for some other field for their activities. It is easy to see, of course, that if you increase the number of people in the country and divide the debt amongst them you will decrease it proportionately. But I do not see how, if the wealth in Canada to-day is stationary, you are going to increase it by bringing more people into the country, when at the same time that increase in population means a decrease in the debt. It does not appear to me to be logical that in one direction you decrease the national debt by bringing in more people and, in another, you increase the wealth by the same means. The hon. member also referred to emigration to the United States. He did not say whether the figures were correct, but no doubt they were approximately so. He gave a cure for this outward flow of people; he said that it lay in an increase in the number of immigrants coming into the country. And he was surprised at the opposition of the farmers to farm labourers coming into Canada. Now, so far as my hon. friend for Springfield is concerned, in view of the conditions in Manitoba, there may be room for immigrants there; and if the people in that province are in such circumstances that they can assimilate farm labourers and take care of them in winter they should do so. But, speaking for my own constituency, I must say that during the winter we have not even enough work for our own boys who are living on our farms to-day, and I do certainly hope that there will be found some solution whereby the western farmer can be enabled to make ends meet.

Now a word or two with regard to the statement that we need a class of immigrants from northern Europe to go into northern Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, and the observation that came from across the floor that this class of people will exist where the average Canadian would perish. I do not think that it would be the best plan to bring such people into the country. It may be that we can get a class of settlers who will establish themselves on such lands as are evidently in contemplation. But I see a difficulty; how are you going to keep them there? Let me state my own experience. We have certain people of that description whom we settled in Saskatchewan; and what do we do immediately we find them there? The different churches—and I am speaking of my own church as well—immediately look over the situation from the home mission standpoint, see that these people are isolated, and go to them with this statement, "Why, you have not the facilities for education that you should have." Then what action do we take? We make our appeal and gather money from East and West and in Saskatoon, Prince Albert and other places we build what are called "school homes." We then educate the most favoured and the soundest of these boys at the home in Saskatoon and in immediate proximity to the collegiate and the university, and after we have educated them we find that instead of going back to their own people as we had expected, they enter into our professions and defeat the very object for which we had them educated. So that in the ultimate analysis the people do not settle at all. The older generation stay there, but the younger generation, of whom we say that our democracy should be built up, will not stay under these conditions. So that unless we loop the loop every ten years by resettling that northern country, this kind of education and settlement is not advantageous to the Canadian people at large.

I do not wish to speak at any great length on this subject, but there is one thing that was said by the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Irvine) with reference to children who might be brought into this country. He presented one phase of the argument against the bringing in of these children by almost casting a blot on our national life. He spoke about the number of babies that died under one year of age in Quebec, Ontario, and all through the list of the provinces. Now, I have had some experience so far as this is concerned, and I am convinced that the death rate in Canada of children under one year compares favourably with that of any other country in the world. We all admit that some children die under that age, but we could not rear them all; that has never yet been done. So that there is no argument in that respect against bringing children into the country. There is, however, an argument against such immigration, in that, as it seems to me, during the period of adolescence these children should have at least the influence of a real home under the care of father and mother and not be subject entirely to the influence of strangers.

Now I come to what I think is the crux of the whole problem. Why is such a desperate effort being made to-day to secure immigration to Canada? That seems to me to be the crux of the entire situation. I am not against immigration to Canada. Not at all. I believe that ambitious young men and women should come to this country, and I think that there is plenty of room for them. But why this desperate effort? If conditions in the country were all right and people here were satisfied I have no doubt that they would tell their friends just how things were. But it does seem to me that there is something wrong with our internal policy when we find it necessary to make such strenuous efforts to secure people. We are told that the United States to-day has received almost its full quota of immigration from the British Isles, although it has no special immigration policy. The United States does not make any particular plea for people to come in. The only reason I can see why people go to the United States is that immigrants who go there are so satisfied with the internal conditions and the economic life of the country, and find that there is such a possibility of making a home, that through their own propaganda other people are attracted to the country.

My hon. friend the member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler), who is in his seat at the moment, made a very fine speech, but there was one thing he bemoaned. He said that if we do not get immigration to this country we shall soon be out of existence. I am surprised at the hon. member making that statement. If it came from British Columbia, where it seems race suicide is on the increase, it would be all right; but it seems out of place coming from the province of Quebec, which I think is doing her duty towards the national life of Canada. I might say myself that I do not believe there is any danger of our going out of existence. Fifteen years ago there were only myself and my wife; now we are ten.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LEWIS: So I do not think there is any danger of our passing out of existence for some time. But after carefully looking over the arguments of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, I am led to this conclusion, that he contends that the prosperity of Canada, industrial, economic and social, depends entirely on the prosperity of agriculture. I think that is a right conclusion to draw from his speech. If it is wrong I hope he will say so.

[Mr. Lewis.]

Mr. MARLER: I do not think my hon. friend is quite right. I said that agriculture was tributary to the cities, and that you had to have a properly balanced population. I think the rural population should be greater than the urban in a country of this description. They should be balanced; that is my argument.

Mr. LEWIS: I accept my hon. friend's statement, but it does seem to me he went further and said that the basis of the prosperity of our industrial life depended upon the prosperity of agriculture.

Mr. MARLER: I admit that. I think it does in this country.

Mr. LEWIS: Then I think we are agreed that the success of agriculture is essential to the well-being of the whole of Canada.

Mr. MARLER: Hear, hear.

Mr. LEWIS: Now, I want to ask: Is immigration going to assist agriculture? Are we making one step in the right direction so that the prosperity of agriculture may become the basis of the well-being of Canada? That is the only question I wish to ask. I shall try to answer it in a few moments.

There is one other subject I wish to speak upon in passing, and that is the deporting of immigrants. Recently I was speaking to a clergyman who some time ago went over to the Old Land. He told me that he decided to take a berth in the steerage because he found there were on board thirty-three or thirty-four British immigrants who were being deported. He spoke to these people and found among them a Scotchman, a very strong man physically and apparently mentally sound. He had had a position offered to him in Canada, but for some reason on arrival he was detained, later placed behind bars, and in a month's time deported. That man was a veteran of the Great War and had received honour at the hands of the British authorities. When he tells his own people in Scotland of his deportation it is safe to assume that any intending immigrants to this country after hearing his story will change their plans and go to the United States.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Would the hon. gentleman give me the name of the individual so deported?

Mr. LEWIS: I will endeavour to furnish it later.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Thank you.

Mr. LEWIS: One hon. member speaking about the causes of failure said there were two: one, over-purchase of land; the other, heavy overhead expenses. Are these the real causes of the difficulty in which our agriculturists find themselves at the present time? I do not think this is the trouble in Saskatchewan; it may be in Manitoba where holdings of two sections are said to be common, but the great majority of the people where I live in Saskatchewen—and I am acquainted with over 1,000 families—farm a half-section which I do not think is too large. Consequently I do not believe that the two causes mentioned are responsible for the general failure of agriculturists in the West.

I think the hon. minister (Mr. Stewart) in speaking of colonization said he hoped his scheme would enable men to be settled within eighteen to thirty miles of railway facilities where they could engage in mixed farming.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Not thirty miles; up to fifteen.

Mr. LEWIS: I thank the minister for the correction. I believe that mixed farming is going to be one of the main solutions of the difficulties of Saskatchewan farmers at all events. The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) in speaking of the solution of the problems confronting this country said that free trade would ruin the East and he voiced the opinion that the kind of people wanted here was domestic servants and labourers with pick and shovel. I believe that in this discrimination between men engaged in manual work and professional men there is a false philosophy which sooner or later will drive our highly organized society to the wall. I remember some years ago in the University of Saskatchewan coming in contact with men who thought that because a man had a university education he had a right to a better home than the man who worked in the sewers, for instance. It seems to me that the man who works in the sewers, who, as we say, does the dirty work, is far more in need of recreation and the luxuries of home than the professional man; and I think the sooner we as a democracy realize that the health and sanity of this nation depend to a large extent upon the groundwork, the so-called dirty work of looking after our sewers and so forth, the better it will be for all concerned. The sooner we educate the people that any honest work is worthy of a place of honour in our society, the sooner we shall recognize that there must be a commensurate reward for the proper discharge of the disagreeable work of the community.

Mr. MARLER: Quite right.

Mr. LEWIS: In my constituency of Swift Current we had a class of people who are called Mennonites. I understand from the Minister of Agriculture and from the people around Swift Current that they were the best class of farmers to be found in the district. They were making good, and yet for some reason or other they in a body went to Mexico. We do not believe that the Mexican conditions are better than our own, and yet as far as I am able to discover we did not turn a hand to try and stop this exodus. They may not be ideal citizens in conforming to our educational laws, but they are amongst the very best farmers to be found anywhere.

Now, I do not think it would be wise on my part to take up the time of this House without offering some solution of the problem that confronts us. In this connection I do not want to be hard on the government. The Acting Minister of Immigration has my sympathy, but I have listened for a definite policy of immigration, and so far as I can gather it seems to be this. When we, as representing the farmers speak in regard to the tariff, we are told that the government listens first of all to the manufacturers to see if it is possible for them to do without certain protection that we wish to have removed. That may be the right course to pursue. The manufacturers understand manufacturing conditions better than we do, and therefore the government may be justified in listening to them. In the same way it seems to me that when we, who are agriculturists, come down to this House and describe the conditions of agriculture, an industry in whose success we are personally interested, the government should listen to our representations. But instead of taking the advice of those who are on the spot and experienced in agricultural conditions, the government listens to someone else. The same may be said in regard to labour. Labour has its representatives here who tell us that they do not need any industrial immigrants. Do we take any notice of what they say? I did not think that all the wisdom of the sages was monopolized by the capitalistic and manufacturing classes—not by any means. I think it will be found that the greatest men that have ever lived have all sprung from the farm. For that reason, it seems to me, it behooves the government to listen to the agriculturists as regards their conditions and the solution of their problems.

I will close by speaking briefly regarding three things. If I were to be asked what I consider would be one way to improve the condition of the West, I believe the remedy and immigration should come in at the same time. I do not include one to the exclusion of the other. We should have people coming in because, in my constituency, you have a school, you have taxation, and if people leave the land, the burden on the few that remain becomes intolerable. Therefore, if people are moving from this country, we must have other people to take their place. But at the same time, we should have a remedy that will cause people to remain in this country. One of the solutions of the problem is, I think, this. I am not speaking of agricultural implements, and I am speaking directly now to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). I would place the absolute necessaries of life on the free trade list, and I would also remove the sales tax and give the people who are endeavouring to make a home an opportunity to establish themselves on the land. That would be one of the remedies that I would advocate and I give that advice to the government.

The second, it seems to me, the hon. member for Springfield just touched on, and that is the lack of co-operation amongst the whole people of Canada. What I mean by that is this. I think it was found some time ago by investigation that, as regards a hundred commodities that enter into the national well-being of the people of this country, the factory price was forty cents on the dollar, but sixty cents was taken up before an article got into the hands of the consumer. That is "over-commercialization," if you can use that term. I have seen it in my village, a village with two stores, and the commercial men crowding on each other at the rate of five or six a day, selling brooms, bluing, washing machines and so on. It seems to me that we are overrun with that class of people who are taking out a picking, in the middleman sense, before an article gets to the consumer. I am not saying that the manufacturer charges too much for his commodity; perhaps he does not; but before an article gets to the consumer, instead of costing forty cents, it costs one dollar. What we are kicking against at the present time is this lack of co-operation, and if some means could be devised by which we could eliminate many of these middlemen, commercial men and selling agents, and lower freight rates I believe one of the greatest problems that enter into the production of our western lands would be solved.

I do not know that I should presume to give advice to the government; but this is my final statement. If I were asked to go into a business, first of all I would look into that business to see if it was solvent, if there was any danger of bankruptcy. If I found that the business was exceeding its revenue, I would think twice before going in. We have the great business of Canada, nationalizing our assets, our industrial life and our agricultural life, and we are inviting people to come to this country. They look into the situation and the financial state of Canada, and they find that we as a government—and I include myself in this parliament—are exceeding our revenue in the administration of our work by over $40,000,000 or $50,000,000, as the case may be. If we as a people want to get people to come from different parts of the world, people who are intelligent, who can discriminate, then let us clean house in this parliament; let us, as a nation, begin to live within our income, and the time will not be long before we hear once again the tramp of feet of people coming to our shores, and the laughter of the children in the many homes that are found within the borders of Canada.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): A consideration of the matter involved in this appropriation is one of the most important that could engage the attention of this parliament. The problems involved, which have been discussed by various hon. gentlemen who have spoken in this debate, are of the most vital character; they strike at the existing condition of affairs in this country. It is, therefore, quite right that we should have had such a full discussion as we have had, and I hope the discussion will go on until all hon. members may deal with this question from their various points of view. The hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Lewis) and the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey) who preceded him from the other side of the House are, I think, to be congratulated on the fact that they have lifted the debate to a much higher level than that on which it stood yesterday. I did not have an opportunity of hearing the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland); but on reading over his remarks, I began to wonder whether he really belonged to a party which called itself "Progressive", because if there ever was a misnomer as regards the application of the term "progressive" to that hon. gentleman as a member of that party, then I am sure it revealed itself last night. Rather, he might be said to belong to a "retrograde" or " pessimistic" party, in whose make-up no vestige of progressiveness could be found. When the hon. member for Springfield and the hon. member for Swift Current manfully and courageously faced and laid before us the real situation in the country and discussed the matter in a practical way, I am sure the House and the country felt gratified at their contribution to this debate.

Everybody must recognize that the situation in Canada to-day is one which demands the closest possible attention and the wisest judgment on the part of every hon. gentleman who happens to represent in this House any portion of the people of Canada. We are confronted by great problems which one might enumerate at length; but I need only mention the fact that the problem of taxation which bears upon the wage earner, the farmer, the artisan, in fact, every man in every occupation in life, is of so severe a character that how we are going to deal with that problem and how we can reach the stage and time in our history when we may be relieved in some degree of that burden, is a matter which is of great importance, not only to ourselves, but to those who come after us in this country. That problem is not to be faced by sitting down and declaring that this is the worst country in the world because hon. gentlemen who use that argument in discussing this question, utterly fail to pay the slightest attention to conditions which exist elsewhere. My hon. friend (Mr. Garland) who came from across the ocean, knows that the land from which he came is to-day suffering under difficulties and conditions a thousand times worse than those that exist in Canada. If you take the whole of Europe, the situation there was well described a few days ago by Hilaire Belloc, speaking in Montreal, when he discussed the possible fate of civilization which at the moment was hanging in the balance in Europe, and pointed out conditions that existed. If that is so in other parts of the world, why should hon. gentlemen in this House undertake to tell a pitiful story of exaggeration as to conditions that happen to be found in one locality due to drought, and the continued failure of crops on account of like conditions, and lead the House and the country to believe that Canada is in a desperate condition, because that happens to be the situation in one particular part of this country?

We have our difficulties in the East. Our farmers and wage earners have problems of a more or less grave character; but where do these problems come from? They come from the reaction which followed the war in a very great degree. Nowadays, we are all too apt to think that the solution of matters that come up for consideration to-day can be determined by the wisdom which we possess for the moment, and that we must not look at the story of the past or the lessons of history in order to find out whether or not in the days that have gone, the people that have gone before, have had similar problems to deal with. What was the situation in Great Britain after the great Napoleonic wars? Let me call the attention of the committee to a very short statement regarding that published in an admirable work, written by Mr. Marriott, M.A., Professor of History in the University of Oxford, and entitled England Since Waterloo.

The human heart through all the ages that have gone has always remained the same. Problems of a different nature would recur throughout the ages and they were solved by the wise men of those days but in the century following probably exactly the same problem would arise under different conditions varying according to the country where it did arise, and would have to be dealt with along the same lines. One might think to hear hon. gentlemen talk about the condition of the country that at no other time were conditions in any other country comparable to what we have in Canada to-day. Let me call your attention to what this writer says. Speaking of the conditions that existed in Great Britain during the Napoleonic wars, he says:

> For the last twenty years England had been the only country in western Europe free from the devastating effects of military operations. She had consequently been called upon to supply the commercial needs of the whole world, and, thanks to the recent improvements in agriculture and in manufacturing industry, she was in a position to do so. The result was seen in a totally unprecedented expansion of foreign trade.

The conditions with us during the war while our sons were fighting overseas were the same as when the sons of Britain were fighting one hundred years ago on the Continent. We were freed from the devastating influence of the war itself, and we had an unprecedented period of prosperity in this country, a period of unusual development of our agricultural and industrial life, with the greatest foreign trade we ever had since confederation. But what was the reaction that came in England? This writer says that almost immediately after the war:

> Bad harvests and violent fluctuations of prices were bringing widespread ruin upon agriculturalists. In the hope of assisting them the legislature in 1815 prohibited the importation of wheat until the price reached 80 s. a quarter. But this afforded no relief when, as in 1816, the price fell to 52s. 6d. It is easy to blame farmers for their folly in taking leases at rents calculated upon war prices, and to condemn landlords for extortion.

Just as it is easy to say that the people took on too much land in the West:

> But meanwhile the course of English industries appeared to be threatened with imminent ruin. Reports received by the Board of Agriculture in response to a circular letter issued in 1816 attest the severity of the crisis. Farmers, who a few years ago were competing eagerly for farms, were sending in notices to quit, and many farms were unlet; mortgagees found it difficult to realize; credit was collapsing; banks were failing in all directions; substantial farmers were becoming parish paupers. And while the producer was ruined the consumer derived no benefit. In December, 1816, wheat which in the spring had fallen to 52s. 6d. rose to 103s. Agriculture had become a mere gamble.

The condition was even worse in England than that portrayed by the hon. member for Bow River last night. It continued:

If landlords and farmers were ruined, merchants and manufacturers were in no better plight. . . . Traders, as is their wont, looked no further than their noses. The inevitable happened. With the restoration of normal conditions the continental demand for English goods rapidly slackened; prices came down with a run; production was paralysed, and thousands of hands were turned adrift to swell the army of the unemployed. . .

As William Cobbett himself observed: "When men are in distress they are out of humour: they have not time and are not in a disposition to listen to reason." . . . . Because work was scarce, machinery was smashed and factories were destroyed. . . . Nor was the unrest confined to the agricultural counties. The Tyneside colliers, the Preston cotton-weavers, the Wiltshire cloth-workers, the Monmouthshire and Staffordshire iron-workers, the jute-workers of Dundee,—all alike were in ferment, demanding more employment, higher wages, and cheaper food.

That was the condition of affairs which faced the statesmen of the Mother Country after the Napoleonic wars. The picture portrayed there was a very grave and a very dark one indeed. We have no such dark picture confronting us in this country to-day. We had a period of unprecedented prosperity and of high prices during the war. Then the reaction came and prices fell. Conditions have not been righted, and that is one of the reasons why this discussion has been brought on. But here in this marvellous land of ours, with a territory exceeding that of the United States with great undeveloped mineral wealth as well as great tracts of agricultural lands that have not been opened up, with our great forests, our fisheries and all the other resources in this land which could support a population of 100,000,000 as well as the population of 8,000,000 that we have to-day, are we going to sit down helplessly and hopelessly and say that we do not expect to see the conditions arise under which all that we might hope for would come? I had the honour and distinction of coming to this parliament some twenty years ago and of imbibing from that great statesman, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, some of that inspiration and belief in the future of this country which dominated him in his long political career. He told us and told the Canadian people twenty years ago of his abiding faith that the twentieth century would be Canada's century, and I am satisfied that out of the mist and gloom and uncertainty of these days, which while it exists to-day is not at all comparable to what is to be found among other nations of the world, if we but play our part properly in the days that are to come, that prophetic utterance of his will be fulfilled.

Let us also look at the situation in the United States at the time of the Civil War. There was a great nation absolutely rent asunder by an internecine struggle between the North and the South. Immediately following the war came a period of depression. Their currency became degraded, and that country might almost have been looked upon in the view of the world outside as a nation with no hope for the future. Yet with that wonderful spirit of unity and the development of a national spirit which came to the United States of America, they entered upon a period of prosperity and advancement which in the next fifty years made them the greatest nation in the history of the world. And so we have lessons to learn from the experience of the Mother Country one hundred years ago, and lessons to learn from the experience of the great people to the south of us sixty years ago, and shall we not stop for a moment and see whether the paths they have trod, the lines which they have laid down, and which resulted in their advancement and progress and prosperity, are not such as we might also well follow?

One of the great things we lack in this country to-day is a national spirit. If there is any one thing the Canadian people need, and to this task no matter to which party we may owe allegiance to-day we might well join together and devote ourselves, it is the development of the idea of a great Canada whose sons we ought all to be proud to be; it is the realization that has come to us in this generation carrying on from the generations that have gone before in this wonderful land with its free institutions, where no man is discriminated against on account of birth, religion or station, where the highest position in the gift of the people is open to the man of honesty, ability and integrity, as we have had the fact recorded in this very debate by the hon. member for Springfield who so eloquently told the story of our possibilities. In order that we may develop that spirit, we must see to it that sectionalism is eliminated in this country. Instead of this continual argument going on about the attitude of antagonism between the man in the workshop and the man on the farm, let us realize that in this House, I venture to say, the greater percentage are farmers or sons of farmers, men born on the farm who have occupied prominent judicial and business positions and a high status both in this parliament and elsewhere in this and other countries. Why should there be any antagonism between the different classes in this country? Rather than that there should be any antagonism between the men in the workshops and mines and the men on the farms, let us vie with each other to be co-mates and partners in everything that makes for the progress and advancement of this our common country.

Mr. GOOD: How can the hon. member prevent the development of antagonism between classes if there is a feeling that one class is exploiting another?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): If certain gentlemen like my hon. friend for Brant (Mr. Good) wish to preach the gospel of class consciousness in this country they are doing little to promote the development of national spirit. I do not believe, Sir, that in this country there is any occasion to preach such a gospel. If there ever was a country that is free from any social condition in which you have upper classes, or middle classes, or lower classes that country is Canada. In that respect we are far in advance of our friends in the United States who, in their hundred years or so of history, have developed an aristocratic class—a class aristocratic as to wealth—which, in its disregard to the rights of the people, is far different even from the aristocracy of birth which exists in the Old Country. But here, in this free land, where the men of to-day are the successors of the workers of yesterday, and where the reward always comes to integrity, to effort, and to industry, we have a condition where there is no room for the existence of class consciousness, no matter in what quarter it is advocated.

Mr. GOOD: I object to the hon. member insinuating that I was preaching, and have preached, class consciousness. I asked him a straight question as to how we were to prevent the development of these antagonisms if there was a feeling among these classes that injustice had been wrought.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I am very glad to receive the assurance of the hon. member that he will not join in the efforts of those who are engaged in preaching class consciousness. In that case we may welcome him to the ranks of those who are looking to the development of a true national spirit in this country. Nevertheless, there are selfish men on the farm just as there are in the workshop.

Mr. GOOD: I admit it.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Just as there are selfish men in office too, but the selfiish men in any of these occupations are not the men to take the lead in influencing thought in this country but rather men of greater breadth of view.

Mr. BIRD: Can my hon. friend point out an instance in the history of British political life, or economic life, wherein the solution of the difficulty was not attended by the presence of class consciousness, I refer particularly to the problems that arose after the Napoleonic wars?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I do not propose to be examined for the information of my hon. friend, as though I were a student in a class in history. I have made my argument along lines which I think are going to commend themselves to this committee, and I do not propose to be interrogated as though this were a debating society. I propose to lay before the committee my own views on this question, and when I have concluded my speech I shall be very happy to answer any question, pertinent to the issue, which my hon. friend may desire to ask me.

I was urging that one of the necessities to-day is the development of a national spirit and the elimination of sectionalism. I want to say, coming as I do from the Maritime provinces, that I have the greatest possible sympathy with conditions in the West. Down in our little province by the sea a great many of our people are men with Scottish blood. They have inherited, during the one hundred and fifty years they and their forebears have lived in this land, something of the genius of the race, something of the spirit of the men who peopled "Caledonia, stern and wild." They have travelled far through this land. In the West to-day are to be found thousands of Nova Scotians, many of whom came from my own constituency. They know, as we know in the East, that the conditions to-day owe their origin to the reaction following the war. They know that in the home districts in the East we have had a lack of prosperity and have had difficulties to encounter just the same as they have had in the West; but I do hope that these men will be true to the instincts of their race and of their forebears and will take a proper view of the situation.

Let me say that I think the feeling is growing to-day throughout this land that a great mistake was made in 1911 when the Reciprocity treaty, introduced by the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) was not adopted. I think a great many of the difficulties that the hon. gentlemen opposite complain of would not have existed to-day, or if they did exist would have disappeared, had the view not been entertained then by a great many that for all time the trade of Canada must flow east and west; had we realized that we cannot be a hermit nation but must trade with our neighbors, and with other nations. However, there is no use in arguing that a movement towards class consciousness is going to remedy a trade condition. We have got to realize this, that in all parts of Canada we are suffering from the after effects of the war, from the deflation which is going on—following an abnormal prosperity and development that occurred during the four years of that great struggle. We must all pull together in Canada and apply ourselves resolutely to the problems which confront us so that we may be able to pass on to those who come after us a prosperous land and a happy condition of affairs as the result of our administration and our efforts.

We are told that men are leaving the farms and going to the cities. Well, they have been leaving the farms and going to the cities during all the ages. They have been going also to the United States; they have been going to and from the United States for a great many years. In eastern Canada, comparing the conditions which exist to-day with those which prevailed when I first had the honour of a seat in the Nova Scotia legislature, I remember the time when the young men of our province used to take their axes, go into the forest, hew down the trees, and make homes for themselves. They do not do that to-day. There came the lure of the free lands of the West. Harvest excursions were introduced, the boys of the East were carried out west there to learn that they could acquire 160 acres of land by simply staying on that land six months a year for two years. They went out to the West, saw the land which did not need the axe in order to bring it into a state suitable for cultivation, and thousands of them settled there. To-day the men in the East are not willing to go out and cut down the forest to make homes for themselves as their predecessors used to do with this exception: that the sons of Quebec still retain the wonderful pioneering instinct of the men who settled on the banks of the St. Lawrence two or three centuries ago, in greater degree than people in other portions of Canada. Our people have felt the lure of the cities, they have experienced the stirring of life that the twentieth century has brought with it, they have felt the development of materialism that has been going on not only in the cities but also among the tillers of the soil. The present situation is, perhaps, not due to any financial or economic reason; it is due to inherent conditions which have prevailed at all times but have become more deeply accentuated within the last few years. We see the same thing in the United States. I read with interest a speech made in New York by Judge Manton, a distinguished jurist, who declared that the United States had lost by emigration during the last calendar year 100,000 of its workers—men who had come from southern Europe, had tarried for a period, and had gone home. The country, in the meantime, had received 32,000 people who had come to take the place of the 100,000 workers referred to. What was the situation last fall over there? Plans were drawn for the construction of public and other buildings to the extent of over five billions of dollars. Then the call came to the worker in Canada and every other worker elsewhere who was out of employment. Do we forget one of the difficulties we have in this country that when the snow comes in November there is a period of six months when our workers cannot engage in any outside employment? Thousands of these men have gone over there temporarily. They have gone from my province. They went from the city of Halifax which was partially destroyed during the war by an explosion. After that explosion men came from all parts of the Maritime provinces to engage in the work of reconstruction. When that was finished they went to the United States, to engage in this wonderful building movement which developed there. They are gone, but they are coming back again, and I say there is no reason why we should be fainthearted on account of either of these things. In the cycle of events all these problems come and go, but if we have abiding faith in the possibilities of Canada, then let us look forward with confidence to the future.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the House took recess.

SUPPLY.

IMMIGRATION AND COLONIZATION

The House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair:

Immigration—outside service—salaries, $700,000.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): When the committee rose at six o'clock, I was endeavouring to deal with that phase of the discussion which was referred to by several hon. gentlemen as to the fact that there was a continual flow of emigration from Canada to the United States. Some hon. gentlemen went so far as to argue that, therefore, we should take no steps for further immigration to this country. I was pointing out the unique situation that that great country to the south occupies, the fact that for a great number of years there was a continual flow back and forth between the two countries, and the further fact that last autumn there developed in the United States a tremendous boom involving an expenditure running into billions of dollars. This naturally drew from Canada, in the autumn and winter months, men who were unable to engage in outside work in this country. In addition to that, in considering this question, we must always remember that we are situated alongside a country with a population of a hundred million people, with wonderful diversity of climate, which enables the people within its borders to engage, at all seasons of the year, in vocations to which they are accustomed. Another fact in this connection that we must not forget, is that the United States, of all nations which participated in the war, came through in the best financial position. Almost every European country is debtor to the United States, and she succeeded in obtaining and in bringing within her borders the greatest percentage of the available gold in the world. That has been her situation. Therefore, she was better able than other countries in which these advantages did not exist, to stand the reaction which followed the war, and she had the further advantage, owing to the fact that she did not enter the war until a later date, of having participated probably to a greater extent than any other country, in the benefits resulting from the tremendous expenditure on supplies required during the war. So that it was natural that, during that period, those who might, for the time being, be out of employment in Canada, might find their way to the United States.

It is also well worth remarking that the United States was the one great democratic country that, during the war, did not find it necessary to destroy its party alignment in order to carry on its affairs. The historic Republican and Democratic parties maintained their identity and worked together through all the problems that came before that great nation. I am sure the lesson which we ought to learn from the magnificent position she occupies to-day, should not be lost upon some hon. gentlemen in this House.

An hon. MEMBER: Explain.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): The fact is so self-evident that it is hardly necessary to give an explanation. In Canada, ever since the war, we have been under the shadow of the swing of the pendulum that occurred after the tremendous prosperity that existed in this country, the high prices that were paid for and received from agricultural products, the continued activity of our industries in the East, all this creating an abnormal condition which naturally was followed by the situation which we have before us. Fortunately, we are beginning to see the turn of the road. Last year's great crops in the Northwest helped to bring back the nation's poise once more; and as we are awaiting the advent of spring, from all parts of Canada, from the eastern provinces as well as from far-off British Columbia, comes the word: The Canadian people are looking forward with confidence and hope to a renewal of normal conditions under which this country made such marvellous progress in the twenty years before the war. Under those conditions we have no reason to doubt the fact that we should look for, maintain and support a vigorous and aggressive policy of immigration. I take it that notwithstanding the remarks we have heard as to the lack of necessity for attempting to obtain immigration into this country, hon. gentlemen will agree that we are the one great undeveloped country of the northern zone whose resources have yet been touched only in the slightest degree, and that the need is apparent for more people to develop the available wealth of this country. Perhaps, I have been labouring that argument, because I am sure hon. gentlemen will agree as to the necessity of activity along those lines having regard to the problems before the people, and the advantage and necessity of having additional population to cope with them.

What is the class of people that we should have in this country? We have had various arguments and suggestions in regard to that. I was interested in seeing what Abraham Lincoln, whose language and whose predictions have almost come to be regarded as the voice of a seer, said in one of his wonderful utterances as to the conditions that existed and should exist in the country to the south of us. He said:

> We should welcome every person of good family who really means to incorporate himself into our society, but repel all who will not be a real addition to the health and strength of the United States.

It seems to me that that general statement is one we might well adopt with regard to the immigrants who come here. I believe there should be no restriction as to nationality or religion with respect to the men who are to come to Canada. The test as laid down by Lincoln is one that I think we might well apply to everyone who comes here to participate in our Canadian citizenship and take part in building up this country. We do not want any laggards in this country, but men and women who are industrious, and who realize that indolence and indifference will lead to failure here as in any other country.

Hon. gentlemen who come from other parts of Canada have spoken of the advantages of their own particular part of the country, and in that connection reference has been made particularly to the West. I am free to say that I think those of us who come from the Maritime provinces have been altogether too modest in asserting the advantages which would flow to the immigrant who should settle in our part of the country. We cannot boast of wheat fields that will yield the products of the earth simply by a little scratching, and by that I mean that fertilization is required, but we can boast of this, that the settler who comes to our part of Canada will be able to find a home there, not necessarily in the forest, but close by the forest, where he can get his wood to keep his family and himself warm, and where he has no difficulty in getting water for his household and his stock. There he will be beside the great ocean which yields with the slightest possible effort the best food any settler could have in the fish that swim in the sea. We have also there rich fruit belts, and the conditions as to living and the social conditions generally offer to anyone with a limited capital, even the settler who comes to Canada with only $2,000 as his entire capital an opportunity to make a home for himself and his family in the provinces down by the sea under better conditions I believe than obtain in any other part of Canada. When he has started his home there, he will be able to live with less effort than he would elsewhere, because nature has so generously endowed that part of the country with those things that the poor but able and industrious man looks for in the place where he wants to make his home. That is the place I think where these immigrants who come to our shores should settle.

There are many problems that have been suggested in connection with this question. I do not profess to be an expert upon it. I believe that the question of the best regulation of immigration is a very difficult and a very important one, and personally I would be disposed to leave in a very broad way to the minister, who has given very careful attention to this subject, the solution of these various problems.

We hear a great deal about the British Empire colonization scheme. It is a singular thing that for the first time in the history of the Empire, Great Britain has embarked upon the policy of assisted emigration. Never before has she undertaken to engage in the policy of assisting her people to go abroad, either to other parts of the Empire or elsewhere. The necessity for this action has been unquestionably due to the tremendous amount the unemployment doles have reached. I do not mean to say that that is the sole reason why the proposition is made that Great Britain should help send her people to all parts of our far-flung Empire and participate in their upbuilding, but still that fact does exist, and a proposition is made which would involve the assumption by Canada of very grave and very serious obligations if she undertakes to participate in the scheme. It does seem to me that there are a great many problems involved in questions of this kind, and the solution of this immigration problem is one in which the self-reliance and the energy of the individual immigrant ought to be trusted to a very great degree if it is going to result successfully.

I view with some alarm the proposition that we should bring people out wholesale to this country, find land for them, pay them to stay on the land, and altogether finance them. Why, if Canadians are ever to be worth while, the men of to-day must do like our fathers did, and go out relying on themselves to build their homes and establish themselves in this country. It has become the fashion to-day to ask the government to have a finger in every pie, and if every man who is to come to this country is to be financed from the general treasury, that is a proposition that must be very seriously considered. I welcome as I am sure every Canadian should welcome, as many people from the Old Country as can come here, for naturally we would like to have them join with us in the development of Canada and the upbuilding of the Empire, but I think this matter should be approached with the greatest possible care. I do not wish to be understood as absolutely condemning it, but I think the minister should give it the gravest consideration and the closest possible attention in order that the correct solution of the problem may be arrived at. I think that with a return of prosperity to this country, which I believe is coming, we can safely leave the selection to the man who desires to get away from the difficult conditions in Europe and elsewhere, and who is looking abroad for an opportunity to make a new home for himself and family, and with all the advantages Canada has to offer, I think that with the advent of prosperity this country will prove a great attraction to these men from across the sea.

With reference to the Canada Colonization scheme, I gathered from the statement made by the minister the other day that we did not have before us the full facts in the matter, and personally I propose to await with interest the fuller statement which we were promised later on in this debate. In this connection let me remind hon. gentlemen that though some severe criticisms have been made, we have also had tributes paid to the immigration law of this country as it stands to-day. Judge Manton, federal judge for the state of New York, and one of the leading jurists of the United States, in discussing about a month ago what he regarded as the inequalities and injustices of the American law went on to point out this:

> Our younger neighbor at the north, Canada, can teach us a lesson in dealing with the question of immigration. Its law is simple and direct. There the immigration officer may admit any immigrant who otherwise complies with the provisions of the immigration act, if it is shown to his satisfaction that such immigrant is (a) a bona fide agriculturalist entering Canada to farm, with sufficient means to begin farming in Canada; (b) a bona fide farm labourer to follow that occupation, who has reasonable assurance of employment; (c) a female domestic servant with reasonable assurance of employment, or any other labourer who has reasonable assurance of employment.
> The wife and family are admitted with the immigrant labourer. The passport must be vised by Canadian immigration officers stationed in Canada and simple provisions are made which aid and invite the immigrant to the shores of Canada.

Notwithstanding the criticisms that have been made of our immigration system, this statement made by a gentleman who is unquestionably an expert and has studied all the phases of the American immigration problem is an indication that we are quite up-to-date in the immigration law we have in this country.

I have detained this committee at very much greater length than I intended. I merely wish to say in conclusion that I hope every man who takes part in this discussion will feel, when expressing his views on this problem of immigration, that we are dealing, or ought to deal, with it in the most serious manner, entirely apart from any local or any narrow political consideration, and animated solely by the greatest possible faith in the future of our common country, and that we will do all we can to bring to this Dominion men and women who will come within Abraham Lincoln's estimate of what the citizens of a country ought to be. I hope that we will give to the government and the Acting

Minister of Immigration, in dealing with this problem at the present time, the greatest opportunity for thorough study and thought in order that such a policy may be devised as will work out in the best interests of Canada not only for to-day but in the days that are to come.

Mr. MORRISON: Mr. Chairman, the immigration question which is now before us is a national question. Nevertheless, it seems to me as though some hon. members have been looking at it from a merely local viewpoint. My sympathies to-day are with the Acting Minister of Immigration in his efforts to solve this great problem in the interests of Canada. I believe the government need constructive criticism of their policy, and I will try to offer to-night suggestions which may be helpful.

Economic conditions in Canada to-day, as previous speakers have said are poorly balanced, and are mainly attributable to the war, but local factors and conditions have also had their influence. It is a trait of human nature to try and pass the blame on to someone else when things go wrong; but I think if we are courageous we will take our share of the blame and admit that we have contributed in some degree to the position in which we find ourselves at present. I contend that many of the farmers who are in great difficulty—and that such is the case cannot be denied—are responsible to some extent for the existing trouble. I do not wish to underestimate the picture painted by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland)—he was conscientious in expressing his views, and I give him credit for it—but I do not think that conditions are as bad as described even over the entire West. The farmers, in my opinion, helped to a certain extent to bring about the difficulties from which we are now suffering. During the war years they allowed their judgment, to some extent, to be warped. They got out of alignment with the true conditions and in good years did not conduct their operations wisely. They were not sufficiently careful in their expenditures during the period of high prices and good crops. Following the big harvests of 1915 and 1916, we had five successive years of comparative crop failure in large areas covering thousands of square miles, with the result that in those areas there is great distress to-day. Hence, it is the duty of parliament to try and alleviate the condition of the people in those districts if it possibly can.

I also think that the labour unions—including the coal miners, the building trades, the transportation workers, the railway and shipping interests—have all contributed towards making the problem as we find it to-day. The farmers have to sell their products on the open markets of the world in competition with cheap labour, and have to buy commodities produced at unionized prices. Our dollar, as one hon. member said, is to-day in reality only worth about seventy cents, while unionized produced goods are selling at prices in excess of their real value. Some of the farmers are afraid of over-production and the consequent reduction of the prices of the products which they sell. I do not like the idea of restricting production. I think it is a poor policy for any organization of people—whether it is producers of coal, or farm products, or anything else—to adopt. Restricting production in an effort to make high prices only creates poverty. The world does not need high prices for anything; high prices denote a scarcity in some quarter. An extremely high price for wheat would be reasonable evidence that there was a famine in some country. Surely we do not want a condition of that kind. I think that what we are suffering from very largely is underconsumption. Most of us realize that Europe is our main market for food products to-day, and Europe is in a chaotic condition. The great mass of people there are not eating as they would if they were working steadily. Consequently they cannot buy, and we cannot sell our products. This big problem cannot be righted in a day; its solution is going to take time even though we all do our utmost, and even though a greater degree of harmony prevails in the future than in the past among European governments.

I would like to see greater production in every line of activity, in every line of industry. To-day we have a big overhead expense in running this country. We have railways which would carry several times as much freight as they are carrying to-day; we have a post office system large enough to cater to the needs of twenty-five or thirty millions of people. But our overhead has to be met, even though we have but a comparatively small population, just as much as though our population were far in excess of what it is. I think, therefore, it behooves us to get people into Canada in order to utilize those public facilities which are costing us so much, and thus help to lighten the per capita burden. To-day we have great natural wealth which is lying undeveloped. Natural wealth in its raw state is more of a liability than an asset if it is not worked. I think that what Canada needs is the intelligent application of labour to our natural resources so as to develop and work them up to nearer 100 per cent of capacity. When Canada reaches that stage many of the economic difficulties from which we now suffer will have disappeared.

I would give prospective settlers, as nearly as possible, the actual facts about Canada. I would not try to picture the prospects for settlers in colours too rosy. Let the actual facts be stated, and if the truth will not attract settlers let them stay away. A dissatisfied settler will do more harm to the immigration policy of Canada than anything else. If we can succeed in satisfying settlers that will be the best immigration agency we could have. Hard conditions are not confined to Canada; they obtain in many other countries including the great United States. I will not admit that conditions are roseate throughout the entire republic, although that is what we have been hearing so much about to-day. In some of the great middle western states farming is in a precarious condition to-day, due to an over-inflation of the price of land when the war was on. In the great states of Iowa and Illinois, where the price of land went up to three or four hundred dollars an acre, they were fortunate enough during the war to get big crops, and, as we all know, they got tremendous prices. That threw the farmers generally off the track, and they overvalued their lands. Farm lands were sold for three or four hundred dollars an acre. Many farmers sold their small holdings and bought larger ones. The result is that thousands of those farmers are absolutely bankrupt and are looking for new places to locate and start in business. These farmers would make the very best settlers that Canada could procure.

I am sorry, for this reason, that the member for Bow River painted as blue a picture as he did, because the American agents will use the statements that have been made on the floor of this House to try and keep people from coming to Canada. I know that the United States government had two men in the city of Regina before I came down here, trying to get settlers to go to the States. They were working among the Mennonites, trying to show them they could give them better terms in the States than they were getting here. A friend of mine in western Canada, an ex-American farmer, told me shortly before Christmas that a neighbour of his who was very much dissatisfied with conditions in Alberta, took his boys and went back to their old stamping ground in the States. They found conditions even worse there than in northern Alberta when they left. They returned to northern Alberta.

There are many people in England, Ireland and Scotland who would improve their positions very much if they came to Canada. The same is true of the Scandinavian countries, and Germany, Holland, Denmark and Switzerland. Large numbers of the people in these countries would be delighted to come to Canada. I do not like to mention matters that come under my personal notice, but I will give one instance which will give the House a little idea of what can be done. A neighbour of mine, a German farmer, got his sister-in-law and six children to come out here. They have been here about 17 months. Shortly before I left home he came to my house and told me that it cost $1,600 to bring that family out here—a widow with her six children, the youngest being eight years old and the eldest a girl of twenty. In fifteen months they had paid back the $1,600 and had $300 in the bank. That man said the family were simply delighted with everything in Canada, it was so much better than conditions in Germany. Those people make the very best settlers Canada can get. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that we should forget about the alien enemy and try to do the right thing by these people. The great common masses of Germany are not the people who brought on the war. It was the military element that was in the saddle and forced the situation, but the great common people were not to blame for it any more than our working classes were to blame. I would like to see the restrictions against alien enemy countries lifted, and would like to see all good, sane, worthy people brought in. We want everybody who is willing to take off his coat and go to work and who would not be too particular about what work he did. These people would be valuable citizens in Canada. It used to be said that every man was estimated by the government as being worth $1,000 to the country. The greatest asset Canada can have is her people, and I submit that those people make settlers that are second to none. They are not afraid to encounter hardships, and we may as well admit that settlers have to suffer hardships. It is not a bed of roses and we should not hold up such a picture before prospective settlers, because if we do we will only have dissatisfied settlers, who will go some place else, and we will have spent our money in vain.

Referring to the conditions under which new settlers should expect to start in this country, some people expect they are coming to a ready-made farm. I do not think it is at all necessary to give them that idea. Canada wants working people, domestics and farm labourers. We are very much in need of them. A good farm labourer will soon become a tenant farmer, and, with an improved land credit system, which I hope we will get, those men will soon become proprietors of farms. It can be done, but it cannot be done in a day or in a year or two. I venture to say that most of the men in this House who are farmers started in a small way; at least, many of us started as farm labourers and worked our way up and that is good enough for the incoming immigrant. The man who gets a chance to work and gets good pay for his work is not entitled to any more. I do not feel sorry for the man or woman who has to work. I feel sorry for a man who cannot find work when he is willing to work. But if incoming immigrants have got a fair field, and good wages, as they will have in this country, they can get along much better than they can in the Old Land. About 25 or 30 years ago farmers that went West, while they were not compelled to endure as much hardship as the pioneer settlers in Ontario and Quebec in clearing their farms, yet they had to put up with hard conditions. The hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) was for 20 years located 25 miles or so from a railway station. It would take him two or three days to make the round trip to Indian Head with his grain. He had to put up with many hardships, and thousands of others were in a similar position. The average incoming immigrant from Europe, or even from the United States, should not expect to have everything handed to him on a plate. Give them a fair chance and they will make good. In my constituency there is a lot of vacant land, on which some day prosperous farmers will be located. I admit the best of it was taken up, but there is plenty of land yet where good men will succeed. We want some branch lines of railway there, but the railways like to put a line in some place where they are sure it will pay, where there will be a big production and large tonnage to ship out right away, and that condition prevails in most of the western constituencies. There will be lines built in to help out the unfortunate people that went in there ten or fifteen years ago with the expectation that railway lines would be built. These lines will be built when they have more population in those districts. We are overbuilt with railway mileage to-day, according to our population, and immigration will hurry the building of railways when we get more settlers in. Somebody asks, are we justified in spending money on an immigration policy? I say, yes. I say that at the cost per capita of immigrants Canada to-day can make no better investment than to spend money to bring immigrants to the country.

I have my doubts about the wisdom of this Canada Colonization Association. I would have preferred seeing this government cooperate with the provincial governments in the matter of immigration and have the provincial governments take it up with their municipal authorities and distribute the immigrants. I think this could have been worked out more satisfactorily in that way. I do not know whether it would be more economical, but in the past there has been much misrepresentation by interested shipping companies, railway companies, and real estate companies, painting too rosy a picture, and they got the settler out here and he was immediately dissatisfied. Now, this is a very delicate problem that should be properly attended to, and I think the government should take the responsibility of it instead of deputing it to some other organization.

My hon. friend (Mr. Hoey) advocated the building of labourers' homes. I do not like the idea of asking the government to do anything of that kind. On many of these large farms there are two or three houses to-day which the settlers had to put up for themselves. I think that we should go rather slowly and not undertake to build homes for anybody. Most of the settlers who went out to this part of Canada built them very cheaply. I myself lived for seven years in a house, if you can call it such, which cost me $65, and there are lots of people who have lived in shacks that did not cost them much. They have lived in them for years, and they are healthy men to-day. I think that most people can manage to build their own homes after they have been out there a little while. Some people say that you cannot afford to build to-day as you could twenty-five years ago. Well, the best wages I could draw was $40 for a month at harvest time, or $1.25 a day, and I have paid men five times that during harvest. I have paid them by the month five times as much as I ever got myself. Labourers get more money to-day and they can get work out there more easily than people could twenty-five years ago. I like to see people come here and help themselves. I do not think we should spoon-feed people; let the right class come out who are willing to dig in and help themselves. Now, I think I have said enough for the present. There are several other hon. gentlemen who would like to speak, and although there is much more that I might say on the subject, I shall not weary the House further. However, I should like to see several hundred thousand immigrants a year brought into Canada and distributed throughout the country, provided they are of the right type, because I am sure that most of the provinces can assimilate large numbers of hard-working settlers.

Mr. DESLAURIERS (Translation): Mr. Chairman. I have listened with much interest to the speakers who have expressed their views on the question of immigration. After consideration of the policy which the hon. Minister of the Interior, at present, submits to us, I deem it my duty to strongly support him, although a number of my colleagues have thought fit—they call themselves good Liberals —to state that this policy is devoid of sense or rather foolish. For my part I think there is wisdom, foresight and especially good judgment in this policy. Some favour the open-door policy for all immigrants as regards our country. I believe this would oblige us to recommend a policy devoid of control, which would be a source of more evil than good. In regard to the immigration of artisans to this country, I am very glad to hear that the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs), has kindly invited the hon. Minister of Labour to take a trip to Montreal, so as to enable him to form an opinion as to the needs of the labouring classes in the metropolis. As I represent a constituency which by itself forms a large city, I take the House as witness that I will place at his disposal large halls, capable of holding 10,000 people. I would advise him to invite at that meeting those who contend that there is unwillingness to do any manual labour rampant among the electors and I would ask him not to forget to invite the hon. members for Hochelaga, St. Henry and St. Denis. I would further advise my hon. colleague to also invite those members who have already expressed their opinion in the House on this question; moreover, to come himself and advocate the reduction of salaries of the people who work three days per week during six months in the year, and I promise him that the same evening the question of labour immigration will be settled and that our honoured guests will return to Ottawa after witnessing some good evidences of democracy and bringing back a precious souvenir of their visit to Montreal.

For the last twenty years Canada's policy has been marked by a system of migration, and if we are to-day facing an immigration problem requiring a rather tactful handling, it is because this system of migration has produced here another problem, far more serious in my opinion, than is the emigration problem, without which we would not have devoted so much time to the question of immigration.

In about twenty years, the Canadian government has brought to this country more than 1,500,000 Europeans. We, to-day, find out that the increase of our population barely exceeds a figure representing its natural increase. There is therefore as many people who leave Canada as there are immigrants entering.

In 1921, for 90,000 immigrants received 100,000 of our own people have crossed the 45th parallel, in search of more favourable conditions. In the province of Quebec the evil is of long standing. Between 1865 and 1890, more than 400,000 of our people have crossed the border. This emigration has not diminished. In 1910, when the country enjoyed the greatest prosperity, it was shown, during the inquiry made by Mr. Rene Dupond, that there emigrated to the United States 19,093 of our countrymen. A few months ago, a paper published in the United States, Le Messager, of Lewiston, stated that during the year 1922, for the period of July, August and September 5,000 Canadian families, that is to say about 25,000 people had crossed to the frontier. In one parish alone in the Richelieu Valley, in the space of a few weeks only, 126 people went over to the American side. In one of the northern parishes, seven families, in a week's time, sold their furniture at auction, and purchased railway tickets to the United States.

Proof of these statements may be obtained by calling at the United States immigration bureau, at Montreal. There it will be seen that on many week-days, they have to make out as many as 100 certificates for French Canadians to enable them to enter the United States. The question that we should ask ourselves, at present, is certainly the one which the hon. Minister of the Interior, on November 16, 1922, put to the Kiwanis club, at Montreal: "What is the cause of there being so many Canadians in the United States; why are there so many deserted farms in Canada?" The reasons are numerous. The enticing wages offered in the United States is one of the causes. A number of families not finding in this country means of subsistence, leave for more clement skies. We also have a quota of adventurers, citizens who settle now here, real immigration agents who, through their advice, induce many people to follow them. There are also those who have heavily mortgaged properties which they cannot clear, and who emigrate to the United States hoping to make a fortune. Lastly, there are those who seek a more favourable climate; and on that score the United States offers better advantages than Canada. I admit that it is hard to restrain immigration if we take into account the reasons I have just enumerated.

There is also a class of citizens who are forced to emigrate to the United States, I mean the large families with holdings too restricted in area to provide for their needs, and which they cannot possibly extend. I think, Sir, that the government could perhaps come to an agreement with the provincial governments, so as encourage the settling in new territories of those families who still desire to cultivate the land and thereby remain together on our Canadian soil.

I believe it would be possible to found a trust and loan institution for settlers; I also think that it would be possible to establish for these new settlers, a good market for the disposal of their lumber and grain. We should particularly assist in the transportation of these families so as to allow them, once settled on these new farms, to visit their relatives; in this way, they would act as agents for the government and attract many of their people to these new territories. We should, in my judgment, extend to these men of goodwill, facilities for railway transportation, settlers should not be left to pay their railway fares out of the few dollars remaining to them, thus exposing them to hardships once the work is started,—my opinion is that the government must undertake first an educational compaign. This campaign should especially begin with our own settlers so as to help them in the fulfilment of their task and so as to let it be known among our people that there must be in Canada, as in other countries, a national spirit which pledges the people to obligations and duties towards the country.

The Minister of the Interior should have agents to organize the common effort, watch over our interests and to carry on publicity in all possible ways; such as excursions, demonstrations, lectures and literature so as to pave the way to success and cultivate the love of one's country. This would perhaps cost much less than to import, at our expense from European countries, settlers who will be exposed to the same hardships as our own settlers and who, as in the past, will at our expense, cross over the borders to settle in the United States.

In 1921, while a serious situation existed, I deemed it my duty to rise in this House and bring on a debate on the subject, when we had 500,000 unemployed, according to the statistics of that day, when revolution was rampant in Russia and threatened all the European nations, when the Workers of the World, that you all know as an outgrowth of the Soviets began to branch out in various cities of this Dominion. I moved a resolution perhaps somewhat radical, asking that the admission to this country of all immigrants be stopped until conditions became normal again. At that time this resolution apparently supported to a certain extent by the government of the day, did not have the good fortune to please everybody. I was then the object of some criticism on the part of certain colleagues, I am, however, glad to see, to-day, on the Orders of the Day, under less solemn circumstances, a proposed resolution by my colleague from George Etienne Cartier, having as marked a radical character as the one I proposed in 1921, although tending exactly in the opposite direction "O tempora, O mores!" instead of having, as he then had, the sympathy of his colleagues the contrary is happening to-day and I should be glad to see the vote taken to-night on his resolution in regard to immigration. I wish however, to prove to my hon. friend and to those who may share his views, that he was in error when he said that I examined the immigration question through spectacles which did not allow me to see beyond the county of St. Mary. To give the proof, I shall travel 800 miles away from my home: I shall go down to Gaspé; it is some distance from St. Mary's but I think it is well known by most of the members of this House. All tourists know the country for its beautiful spots, they are aware that it is rich in beautiful vistas of valley and plain; with fisheries renowned for the abundance of their fish, and their high quality as well; mines also of great value. Indeed, we all know that there are zinc and lead mines in operation; we all know that at Port Daniel, on the coast of Baie des Chaleurs, there is to be found a large bed of bituminous schist; finally we all know that the country is rich in forests that are taken advantage of by Americans by way of New Brunswick. Now, notwithstanding all these natural advantages, farming is at a standstill, fisheries pay very little, the lumbering is done to the benefit of a foreign country. Why does this state of things exist? Because the means of transportation are useless or inexistent. The country is drained by a number of rivers, such as the St. John, the Dartmouth, the York, the Bonaventure, the St. Anne, the Madeleine, whose water powers could be utilized to bring to life the pulp and saw-mills of Gaspé. The utilizing of these water powers would allow the manufacture, in Gaspé, of all the pulp and paper which is at present being manufactured in the United States with the pulpwood of Gaspé. This would help to keep in our country a class of our countrymen which is very valuable to us and already acclimatized; it would moreover control this rush of emigration which is taking place at a staggering pace.

According to many hydrographic authorities, the Bay of Gaspé could be turned into one of the freight ports of the world if some work not of a very extensive character were carried out so as to allow the largest ocean craft to enter that bay twenty-two miles long; this would shorten, by 375 miles, the ocean route. A few years ago, a private company requested from the government permission to build a railway from Gaspé to Amqui, and, later, from Amqui to Edmundston, this would have further shortened the freight route by about two hundred miles. However, an hon. senator of the Maritime provinces, whose name I do not know, prevented this company obtaining a charter. Would it be possible now, in order to retain the whole population of Gaspé in that territory, to get in touch with this company and to grant it a charter free of charge, since it was disposed to carry on all the necessary work at its own expense? It is an acknowledged fact that this railway would be an excellent thing and would come to the rescue of the one that exists now and which is not sufficient. The railway of the Quebec Oriental Company and Atlantic Quebec and Western Company does not suffice, first of all, it is practically useless owing to its length and its exorbitant freight rates. We have at Murray Bay a deep water wharf which cannot be utilized as a winter port because the building of a branch railway of less than two miles in length has always been refused. The whole population of this locality is thereby isolated and business intercourse being rendered impossible for these people, they are obliged to emigrate; and that is what is happening. If this branch line was built, I feel certain that would greatly contribute to retain at home the inhabitants of that locality. The government might also agree to the building of a winter port on the coast of Baie des Chaleurs, at Paspébiac or at Port Daniel. The proposition was already mooted but, there again, influences, either local or provincial, were brought to bear to prevent the carrying out of the project. I think that it is under such circumstances as those under which we are at present placed, and when it comes to discussing questions so ticklish as that of immigration, that the government should not only consider the province which I have chosen as an example, but also co-operate with every province, where the necessity arises, so as to stop that rush of emigration towards the United States, dispensing us with the necessity of bringing here, at the public expense, foreign citizens.

We can but praise the government for the appointment of Mr. Arthur Lemont to the Immigration Bureau, at Ottawa. The good effects of his work is already being felt. We must also congratulate the government on the advertising campaign which it has undertaken in the United States for the repatriation and the settling in our country of our own people at present in the United States. Already good results have been obtained, namely in the counties of Chicoutimi and Lake St. John, where during the last year, 263 families have settled on farms and 126 in the villages. Last year alone, 2,471 people came from the United States to settle in the province of Quebec. Why did these people decide to return to their country? Because they knew they could earn their living, owing to colonization, agriculture and the industries being in full swing.

Mr. Chairman, I am coming to the end of the few remarks that I had to make. I sincerely believe that the question of emigration that I have just discussed is more important than the immigration one and I think if we went to the trouble of keeping our own people in this country, we would not find ourselves in the sad plight of having to bring foreigners here. I support almost in its entirety the policy which the hon. Minister of the Interior has proposed. Perhaps, he might again consider the item in his programme relative to young children. I think it would be more practical to hold on to our public money so as to bring up our own abandoned children rather than apply this money to foreign children.

I was listening, last night, to the remarks of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) on the immigration question. He stated that the western people did not wish or have need for, more immigrants. I am led to believe that he did not then express the views of the western provinces, for, at the time of the last census, they gave us proof that they did not think they had a sufficiently large population, by inflating the figures of the census so as to secure more representation than they were really entitled to.

As to the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) I must say, that I cannot agree with her theories going so far as to deny the dignity of labour. I contend that a young girl can perfectly be honourable and so honoured while performing domestic duties, when she would perhaps, if constrained to change her occupation, be a failure as a school teacher.

I am glad to have had the opportunity of drawing the government's attention to the emigration question of our people, for I am satisfied that if, after giving the question serious consideration, they are able to solve the problem, it would be from the economic standpoint, to the great advantage of Canada.

Mr. DICKIE: I have thought, after listening to this debate for several days, if a composite picture could be drawn of it, I would like to have that picture. We have had all kinds of expressions of opinion and arguments with respect to the policy brought down by the minister, and I do not see any finality in anything that has been said with respect to that policy. I am sometimes almost persuaded to one phase or another, and then another speaker arises and disabuses my mind. I am reminded of an old man of ninety-two years of age who had never taken a drink in his life. Some prominent temperance people were holding a meeting in the vicinity, and they decided to motor out to interview this old gentleman. They went out and saw him. He was hale and hearty, ninety-two years of age. He said: "Yes, gentlemen, I have never taken a drink in my life." While he was talking, there was a noise of furniture being broken upstairs, and someone expressed a little concern. The old man said: "Never mind, that is only father; he has been out and had a drink or two, and they cannot do anything with him." So that shows that what may seem almost unassailable is probably not quite as sound as it would seem. I sympathize with the minister in connection with the policy that he has placed before the House. I sympathize with him because of some of the criticisms that policy has received. It is my humble opinion that he is trying to do what is best for the country in what is a most complex, difficult and contentious problem.

I am going to deal with this problem from an entirely different angle. I am going to try to show that it is of very little use bringing immigrants to this country, unless we can prepare the country for them. For a number of years now we have had very many of our men and women going to the country to the south of us. Why are they going? I am going to endeavour to tell this House why they are going, and they are going in greater numbers now than in previous years. This is due in large measure to the wonderful prosperity which that country is enjoying at the present time, to which prosperity we are contributing in a large degree. Our young men are leaving the West, leaving the Pacific province, of which I am best able to speak, and their fondest wish when they leave is that they will return at some early date, for they love their country and are only leaving it because of the better opportunities that exist in the United States. The reason, I think, Mr. Chairman, is this: We have an adverse trade balance with our neighbours to the south, of $200,000,000 every year. A fairly constant stream of $200,000,000 of gold or its equivalent is flowing yearly from this country to the United States. Just imagine—one billion dollars every five years from a population of nine million people! What can be the result? We must inevitably follow that stream of gold. We will drift the way the gold is going. We have a trade balance in our favour with the old countries of Europe and people from those countries are following that gold out here at all times. We want them to stay here. Canada cannot afford to be a preparatory school for people from European countries whose ultimate destination will be with our neighbours to the south. If they come here and remain here they will probably displace some of our citizens, and then they will go. One man who has been brought up in the resourceful Canadian school is in some respects worth on an average three men that come to us from European countries. I think that will be conceded. We must keep our people at home.

How are we going to stop them following this constant stream of gold to the United States every year? My remedy will be one which will not appeal to my hon. friend from Saskatoon probably, but he may agree with me before I get through with my argument.

One phase of my remedy would be for each of us to practise a little patriotism ourselves for the sake of our country. There is not a person in this country who does not buy something that is manufactured in the United States when probably he could buy something here that he could get along with just as well. I do not mean to discourage trade with that wonderful country to the south, but we must keep our money at home, and we can probably do that by a little self-denial on the part of each person in Canada, if we only would do it.

Let me explain a little further how this stream of wealth affects us. In the island where I live, Vancouver Island, we have a large coal mining population in the district represented by my hon. friend the member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) and myself. We have a coal mining population of 20,000 people. We find a market for not one half the coal we can mine, and it is rated as the best bituminous coal on the continent to-day. In the years 1920 and 1921 we were sending $1,000,000 approximately every month out of British Columbia for fuel oil, $12,000,000 a year from a population no larger than the city of Toronto. What could occur under those circumstances? What did occur was this: We send out that million dollars a month, and we are importing 360,000,000 barrels of oil every month. That is the equivalent of 90,000 tons of good coal. That displaces that output of 90,000 tons of coal, and to mine that 90,000 tons of coal monthly would represent a population of 6,000 or 7,000 people. This oil comes into our country. Our coal mines are only working part time, and none are paying dividends. They have been good to their employees. We have had no trouble with our coal miners in British Columbia, although they are largely imbued with socialistic ideas. They were true all through the war, and we had no complaint of them loafing on the job. Our coal operators tried to treat them as men, and receiving such treatment, they are content. But with this $1,000,000 worth of oil coming into our country every month, these coal miners and others who are dependent on what the coal miners do, drifted down into California, and they are down there now working in the oil fields. They simply followed our money to California. There is no other way out of it. The thing seems perfectly plain to me. In California they are having a period of unexampled prosperity. What is known as the Huntington Beach field, near Long Beach, has turned out to be a wonderful oil producing field. In a strip of barren country known as Elk Hills, from which geologically speaking little was to be expected, there is I believe, the deepest well in the world. It was drilled to 6,500 feet and was a failure, but with all the money they have there they tried again, and at 4,500 feet I understand they opened up a gusher of 45,000 barrels a day. Since then numerous wells have been placed there, and it is now one of the great oil fields out-rivalling even Oklahoma. On the Pacific coast transportation is very cheap, as the oil comes in tank steamers to British Columbia. At one time before this Huntington field was opened up, we had to pay $2.75 a barrel. Now by buying for future supply we can get it at $1.24 a barrel. It we had the assurance that we were going to get it that cheap for two years more, our coal mining population would be absolutely wiped out. There is always a chance, as people know who are familiar with the oil question, that some day a well will begin to spout salt water, and then the well is done, and it is only the uncertainty of the life of the oil regions in California that keeps our coal mines operating at all to-day. We are just living from hand to mouth in that respect. I am not going into the remedy for that now. I shall leave that to a time when the subject may more appropriately be discussed.

Just on the subject of people leaving our country, I may say that our probably greatest potential wealth in British Columbia, is timber. Nearly every day immense booms of our logs leave British Columbia for the state of Washington to be manufactured into lumber in the mills there. That raw material is going over there every month to be manufactured, and our people are leaving this country and going over there to assist in that manufacture, or people are manufacturing over there who would come to our country and do the manufacturing here if they were forced to manufacture it in British Columbia. The slopes of our mountains are being denuded. There is a regular timber boom on out there, and a great part of this timber is going to our neighbours to the south. Is not that a matter for grave consideration?

There is another matter which occurs to me at the present moment. I am quite familiar with an undertaking in which half a million dollars has been embarked, and that is the creosoting industry in the constituency of Burrard, which I believe the Minister of Finance has had drawn to his attention. This industry has had simply a life and death struggle for years. For this reason: On the American side they have two immense creosoting plants doing an immense volume of business. I do not need to tell any of you gentlemen that an industry conducted on such a scale can simply crush the life out of a smaller competitor. We have a comparatively small plant in British Columbia, but given equal treatment, given a chance to succeed, it can be made a success. That would mean giving employment to 200 people, which would represent a population of nearly a thousand souls. In that industry preference has always been given to married folks and to white people. When tenders for piling are asked for, the creosoting plants on the American side put in bids at such a low figure that our people cannot compete with them. It has been asserted that the American firms put in such low bids that they made no profit at all. They do that, we have reason to think, in the hope of crushing out their Canadian competitors. The minute they succeeded in doing that, competition would disappear and the prices for creosoting piles and material would go up to rates much beyond what the British Columbia company is doing this business for. That is another argument which undoubtedly will be used later on in favour of a higher tariff wall.

A policy which appeals to one section in Canada we well know does not appeal to another. In the Maritime provinces free trade is looked upon very kindly. I do not believe that Quebec could succeed under a policy of free trade, or that Ontario would be any more successful. Undoubtedly the prairie provinces would succeed; free trade would be a great temporary benefit to them. In British Columbia free trade would simply put us out of existence. I could multiply arguments showing what the result would be. Therefore, why cannot we sit down and reason together, regardless of political dissensions, and see if we cannot devise some remedy, such a remedy as a business man or a business firm would devise. I know of no reason why we could not do that. I believe that every thinking man in Canada should be in favour of erecting a tariff wall in this country corresponding in height to the tariff wall that has been erected against us by our neighbours to the south. Why, Sir, I have heard Americans laugh at us for neglecting to do this; they wonder at our being so slow in adopting this protection. What argument is there against our doing this? We import forty million pounds of pork products every year from the United States. We also import, I do not know how much, butter—probably a couple of million pounds. We allow the United States to ship butter into this country under a duty of only 4 cents a pound, whereas in the case of the five million pounds of butter which we exported to that country last year we paid a duty of eight cents a pound. That meant a difference of four cents a pound which might represent the profit to the Canadian manufacturer of that butter. What is the argument in favour of such a policy? I can see many good arguments in favour of reciprocity which was so strongly supported by the Minister of Finance. Some of us, however, were fearful of the future effect of reciprocity on this Dominion. Whether right or wrong I for one was fully convinced, from personal judgment, and in view of the statements of Mr. Champ Clark, Mr. Taft, and others that the policy was one which required careful consideration on the part of Canadians. But, Sir, reciprocity is absolutely out of the question at the present time. Under the circumstances why allow to these gentlemen in the United States privileges which they do not extend to us?

[Mr. Dickie.]

With respect to our Progressive friends to my left something must undoubtedly be done for them and for those whom they represent. Unless the farmers on the western prairies prosper, to a limited degree anyway, we cannot prosper as a whole in Canada. Out in British Columbia we look to them for our market, we would like to be more closely associated with them so that we might work together. In the matter of Canada's welfare we should all be closely united. As the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) so eloquently said, we must be united if we are to make of this Dominion the country which it should be, a country of which we will all be proud. Why not let us all work together? Why not let us forget this miserable political bickering and sparring for position; let us sit down in council together and try and do business. The benefits which my hon. friends to my left would lose under a policy which I advocate could be made up to them in some other way. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni suggested that we might possibly bonus the production of wheat. I do not agree with that suggestion, but possibly some concession in the matter of freight rates might be given to them which would be sort of equivalent for any benefit they might otherwise derive under free trade. The great argument in favour of a policy which I recommend is that under it our money would remain in this country. If we only had $100,000,000 of the $200,000,000 which we send over to the United States what could we not accomplish in this country. The future of Canada is fraught with great possibilities. I have made a somewhat modest study of geological and mineralogical conditions and I say it is the consensus of opinion among mining men that the great Laurentian plateau away to the north of us holds possibilities leading us to expect that it will prove to be the greatest gold mining country in the world. We have plenty of reason for optimism. But let us try and stop the flow of gold which is at present going from Canada to the United States. If we do this it will help to put an end to the exodus of people from this country. At present there is a great boom over there to which we are contributing very materially. People will go to a country which holds strong attractions in the way of possibilities, but after all there is in the heart of every man a love for his own country. Make the conditions here more attractive and you will be able to repatriate many Canadians now in the United States. Personally I think very little of a man born in this country with a soul so dead that he will ever forget that he is a Canadian.

There is another thing which would contribute materially to the prosperity of this country. We have got to find a remedy for the situation which exists in Canada at the present time in regard to coal. Our American friends have been more than kind; they have allowed Canadians to have coal when they could have used it themselves to good advantage. In 1922 we sent $60,000,000 to the United States for anthracite and bituminous coal. Now that flow of gold to the other side of the line could be stopped. Suppose we have the anthracite fields that are said to exist in Alberta. I do not know whether the facts are overdrawn with respect to these immense deposits or not; at any rate we know there is plenty of coal there. Even supposing our railways haul that coal at a loss, if we can only keep in the country that $60,000,000 now going to the United States do you not see how we could make good any losses incurred in the transportation of coal via Canadian channels. Such a policy would work to the great benefit of Canada. We have unbounded reason for optimism. If we will only work together we can make this country a land to be proud of and we can prevent our people from leaving the Dominion and going to the country to the south. We will also pave the way for a flow of acceptable immigrants from European countries.

With respect to immigration, reference has been made by some of the British Columbia members to the oriental problem in that province. I am not going to say anything about it tonight except that it is a very serious problem, more serious than this House evidently realizes. We also have to have a good white population out there; some of them are not just what we would wish. In saying this I hope it will have some influence on any action which the minister may contemplate in respect to bringing immigrants from Europe. During the peregrinations of the Fishery Commission last summer we called at Malcolm Island where there is a Finnish settlement the members of which are said to be free lovers and socialists. I do not know whether they are Marxians or Leninists. I do know that they are absolutely discontented although they live on an island which is an elysium compared to the country from which they came. Owing to the noxious doctrines evolved from the unsound reasoning of unsound brains, they have imbibed, however, they are absolutely discontented. There is no reason why they should be. We listened to their woes for a while. We sat in a large hall with a drop curtain on the stage. There was depicted on the curtain an Hogarthian female with a large red flag. We deliberated under the red flag in this country with people living better than they had ever lived at home. Those people were told at the last election that if they did not exercise their franchise they would probably lose it. We were informed that a number of them voted and deliberately spoiled their ballots. We want no such citizens. It may be said they were white people and perhaps their children will be all right. Well, they may be, but what chance has a child raised in an atmosphere of sullen discontent and sodden lust to become a good citizen? It may be true that in after years environment will bring out the best that is in them, but the best that environment can bring out is pre-determined by heredity. True, some may be useful citizens, but the chance for children of that kind is a remote one. I would very much prefer that no more of those people should come here. With respect to oriental immigration, I have no doubt that other hon. members will deal with that in a very comprehensive way later on.

Mr. BALDWIN: If ever I thought there was need of building up in this country a spirit of patriotism and love of country, it is since this debate commenced. We have been taken by some speakers to the hill tops of patriotism, and others have taken us to the dark valleys, if not of death, then of despair. When we look at this vast and amazing country, and see the opposition that has been aroused against allowing people from the crowded sections of middle Europe and Scandinavia to come over and work out their destiny, it seems to me the situation is peculiar. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler), the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Baxter), the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey), and a few others appear in this debate like an oasis in a horrible desert. I am pretty nearly the oldest member of this House, as near as I can figure it out; I have lived along the United States boundary and I have seen the pendulum of immigration swing to and fro many many times in my lifetime. It seems to me the pendulum is swinging the people into the United States and for what reason? On account of the United States not entering the war for two or three years after it commenced, they have become the richest nation on the earth. They are now engaged in the greatest development possible in the country, notwithstanding the immense cost. If prudent Canadians are able to go into that country and get $10 or $15 a day, live on $2 a day and bring the residue back to this country, I congratulate them. Personally, as good a deal as I ever made was when I bought something from a cold-footed American, and sold it to a hot-headed one. If we can make a profit by dealing with them in that way, let us go to it.

The suggestion that this country is not able to assimilate or receive tens of thousands of the people of Europe seems to me a queer proposition. The wheat raisers of the West have told us their tale of woe, and have stated that they have paid from $8 to $10 a day to people who would not be subservient to their will and wanted to be masters. It is inconceivable to me that they do not want people to come to this country. The people of the West are asking for the Hudson Bay railway and for branch lines. Why, they need labour in every part of the great western provinces. We want labour now and we wanted labour many years ago. The people of Nova Scotia will remember when the product of their quarries was being taken to Atlantic cities of the United States, and with these products the people erected permanent buildings. At present we have great mines in Manitoba and no one to work them. In my own county we have the best granite quarries of the Dominion and they were practically closed for want of help. Formerly the owners of the mines went to Scotland for their help, but Scotland was so depleted by the war that they can furnish no more help from that country. Then they went to Norway and Sweden where the boys learn stone quarrying and stone cutting, as the boys in this country learn farming. Then the embargo was put on. I know that the Acting Minister of Immigration (Mr. Stewart) has had many overtures made to him to alleviate the situation but with what success I do not know.

10 p.m. I have understood from this debate that neither Norway nor Sweden is willing to allow their people to emigrate.

If I were to tell the House one-quarter of what the great nation of the south had received by immigration, it would take half the night. Any one who had the opportunity during the last 40 or 50 years of seeing the people pouring into Castle Garden, New York, Portland, Maine, Boston, Chicago or St. Louis, must have wondered where all these people could plant themselves. But they have done it. The United States has received millions of people, and before the American Civil War they had a system of bringing the sunny negroes to that country as slaves. In order to emancipate the country from the condition of slavery the United States was placed in a worse position than Canada is in to-day. They have those people there now and they have to contend with them. We do not wish to mention the horrible things the whites have perpetrated on them. The negro population amounts to 10 per cent of the whole population of that great and glorious country. We have not that negro element to deal with here, but our British Columbia friends are becoming alarmed because Oregon and California became alarmed first. Considering that the negro element constitutes one-tenth of the population of the United States they do not want the yellow race to predominate in the western states. They were to blame. They were proud at one time when they had their Chinese and Japanese to work for them, but when these orientals through their thrift became moneyed men and desired to invest in real estate they became suspicious and they are now quite alarmed. I think Canada need not be so much alarmed, although I would not set up my own judgment against the judgment of the people who live in British Columbia. Hansard will show that I have said in this House on more than one occasion that I would allow every one who is law-abiding and willing to work to come to Canada. I would have to change my statements a little by saying that we would not give the yellow race free admission to this country, but beyond that I make no qualification.

I believe that my hon. friend (Mr. Euler) said what was right and just to-day. I have heard in this House, I will not say from which quarter, some remarks that lead me to suspect that the feeling of class hatred is not yet extinct, and that is one of the worst things with which any people can be cursed. The great nations of the world are to-day sending missionaries all over the globe in an effort to Christianize people, and surely the colour of a man's skin should make no difference to us and certainly should not render him unfit to be a fellow-citizen of ours, for we are all brothers if we believe in the fatherhood of God. But looking at the question from the point of view of the necessity for bringing immigrants into this country to-day, I say that the need is imperative.

In the part of the country from which I come, and is known as the "New England of Canada" we have great water powers which are awaiting development, and probably within the next five years in the province of Quebec I am positive that there will be commenced a development which will run up into tens of millions of dollars. During the last three or four years the great hindrance to hydro electric development has been simply because the metallic world has been wild, and the cost of labour has been high. We are looking forward to development, but there is a labour shortage on every hand, and we want people to come into the country to produce from our resources.

The free traders on the other side of the House contend that we should be able to sell goods in Canada as cheap as they can be got anywhere else in the world, and they would have us pull down the protective tariff wall. But how can we manufacture goods in Canada and compete successfully, in the absence of a protective tariff, against Japan and Germany where there are great armies of workmen who labour long hours, and where a great degree of skill and ingenuity is brought to bear upon their industries? If it were not for the tariff wall in Canada to-day we should hear the same tale of woe in every other part of the country as we have heard from some who have been sent here possibly to espouse the cause of certain classes. What happened in the United States after the great Civil War? Non-commissioned men who had passed through the great fight, perhaps thirty or forty years of age, became great captains of industry, and under the fostering policy that was adopted in that country the industries of the United States gradually grew until they are what we find them to-day. There is no use in everlastingly demonstrating this fact. I believe in following the pattern of those who have been successful. If I adopted any course as an individual I would certainly follow that of the man who I thought had made the greatest success in life, and I think the same thing applies to nations. Living as we do alongside of a nation between whom and ourselves there is a border line of some 5,400 miles, both peoples speaking the same tongue and having almost wholly the same resources, I do not see why we in Canada should not be successful if we followed the same course that our neighbours have pursued, and which has made them so rich. How can it be reasonably urged that we should throw down our tariff wall while they maintain one of high protection? It is inconceivable. I admit, with the hon. member (Mr. Euler) that I have heard captains of industry say we can stand free trade with the United States. We have the great white coal in this country that provides power cheaper than black coal can give them; and although there are not many of us here who will live to see it, I believe the time will come when Canada will be able to compete with the world in the manufacturing industry even though we may have free trade. Considering our population I think that Canada holds a wonderful position to-day; her agricultural, mining and timber resources and her fisheries are enormous; but we must have people, more people in the country if we are to develop these resources. The other night, during the course of my remarks, I referred to the vastness of this country, mentioning incidentally Hudson bay, which I said was more like a sea. Two minutes in the Library showed me that this bay is five times the size of either the Black or the Balkan seas.

I do not wish to detain the House but I might refer to one or two other points before I close. The other day I was searching the market for beans and I discovered that if I wanted this commodity at a reasonable price I could get only Danubian beans grown in Hungary or Austria, or beans raised in Egypt Now, the farmers are afraid of competition, and this is not saying anything new. I heard only to-day in the Agricultural committee rumours of the enormous amount of money that we are sending to the United States for agricultural products. What does this show? Is there not room for agriculturists in this country, in every province of this wide Dominion? There certainly is. We are sending $100,000,000 to the United States for agricultural products, not including corn and cotton. These are two commodities for which we have to depend on the United States. And we are sending a huge amount of money to that country for coal. I hope that the amount we send out of the country for this purpose will in the next decade be diminished to as many thousands as we are now sending millions of dollars. I believe that we can so build up this country that our great national railways will be able to carry our own products within our borders at reasonable rates and that there will be an increase in traffic so that the deficits may be reduced.

I agree with the hon. member (Miss Macphail) who stated that we should have lawyers and doctors and everyone who could come into the country enter Canada. That is my opinion. Do not let us turn anyone down. Let them all come and we will build up this Dominion as the great United States has been built up. They have no unduly restrictive measures there, and I think we would meet with the same success which has attended that country. I spent a few weeks in the state of Wisconsin some forty-five years ago and what I discovered was a revelation. The Scandinavians, particularly the Norwegians and the Swedes, had done so well that large numbers of their friends and relatives were following them and occupying that part of the United States, so that the population of the states of Wisconsin and Minnesota was comprised very largely of these people. An hon. member on the other side spoke a few moments ago about lifting the ban from our former enemies of the war. I most heartily concur in that sentiment. You will find in the United States that the German element has been second to none in the settling of that country. I do not think there should be any more talk about race hatred. I am a pacifist and am opposed to that sort of thing, and this world will never be right until race hatred ceases. With our tremendous railway system, with our extensive waterway system to feed our railways, and with our practically unlimited natural resources, it is simply beyond the scope of my judgment to know how we can get along without a broad immigration policy. The writers in our newspapers and magazines are for the most part agreed on the necessity for an energetic and comprehensive policy of immigration, and I think it may be safely assumed that these gentlemen possess as much wisdom as any of us in the House. They see no other way out.

I think the Progressives and the Labour representatives entertain a wrong idea in thinking that the more people we bring into this country the greater competition they will have to meet, for it must be borne in mind that every settler is a consumer as well as a producer, and we need men that will do hard, laborious work and rough it. In the United States the early settlers lived in dug-outs and shacks built of poles and roofed with straw, they roughed it, and the most affluent people in the United States to-day are the descendants of those settlers in the great Mississippi valley and westward for two or three hundred miles. For fifty years or more these men hung on to their land with just enough returns from their work to exist on and pay their taxes, until ultimately with the development of the country the rise in the value of their land made them prosperous and even wealthy. I say the same good fortune will attend our farmers in the West: Let them hang on and deny themselves for the present and with the development of our country they, too, will become rich like the American farmers.

Our Progressive friends have been bewailing both this session and last session the unsatisfactory conditions of agriculture. Let me make a comparison. In New England, in Minnesota, Dakota, Idaho, Oregon and Washington just as many tales of woe are heard as in Canada. And I would tell our western farmers that just as many tales of woe can be told right down in my community, the Eastern Townships. Why? Because our farmers paid three times more for their farms in many instances than they are now worth. That is an instance of over-capitalization.

It has been suggested, Mr. Chairman, that every member give his opinions regarding the solution of our immigration problem. I have given mine. I presume the minister, with whom I sympathize very much would like to see this debate close before we sleep, and therefore I refrain from making any further remarks.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Mr. Chairman, I realize that this is perhaps one of the most important debates which can engage our attention, because immigration and all that it involves touches practically every phase of our national life. In immigration itself is wrapped up not only the present condition of this country but the possibilities of its future development, and therefore I repeat, this is one of the most important subjects that we can discuss.

It is customary, I believe, to commence with a few remarks concerning present conditions. We have heard so much from so many different angles that I shall content myself with a consideration of the conditions which will to a large extent influence the class of immigrants coming to this country and which also will to a large extent direct and guide any immigration policy that may be evolved, for it is upon present conditions that the policy of the minister (Mr. Stewart) must be founded if it is to be successful.

I find there is general agreement on one point—that for one reason or another we have not been able to take anything like full advantage of the immigration we have received in the past. Now, that is not a statement which can be very well controverted. Indeed, I do not think it is an argumentative statement at all, it is a statement of fact founded upon the figures of the department itself and upon the knowledge of every member of this House and of every one outside who has given any thought to this subject. We have not been able to take advantage to any great extent of our past immigration policy because we have not succeeded in retaining the percentage which we should have retained of the men and women who have come here.

Why is it? In speaking of conditions I shall refer to those portrayed by two hon. members who sit in this quarter of the House. I shall first take the picture drawn by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland). I regret some of the criticisms that have been directed against his speech. I know, and many others in this House know, that in describing conditions as they exist in his part of the country he described them with truthfulness and exactitude. I do not say that those conditions prevail generally throughout the West, but I do say that in the part of the country from which the hon. gentleman comes those conditions exist as he has described them. I know because although I do not live there part of my constituency runs into that country. I also know because thirty odd years ago I went through that district and at that time every oldtimer—and I include the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell)—and every rancher knew it was not fitted by nature for farming. In that country, in fact throughout the whole West, there are two reasons for adverse conditions. One is the lack of sufficient rainfall to produce crops—a natural condition which no government can mend. No government can cause enough rain to fall for the production of crops. The other condition is one for which to a large extent governments may be held responsible—the economic policy which we have followed during the past. I wish to divide those two adverse conditions, because the government has enough sins—and I am not speaking merely of this government but of preceding governments also—they have enough sins to answer for without calling down the sins of Providence on their head as well.

Mr. McMASTER: Surely that is dangerous theology, that Providence is responsible for sins?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: The hon. gentleman is probably better qualified to speak as to that. I was simply discussing natural shortcomings with which the farmer has to contend. During the last general election a certain gentleman not unknown to fame in this country made the statement, with which I sympathize to a great extent, that his lack of success in that campaign was due very largely in the West to too much rain having fallen in some places and not enough in others. I am not going to blame the present government or the preceding government for these conditions. They exist in that part of the country, and in stating those conditions, I think the hon. member performed nothing more or less than his bounden duty in this House because, if we are to provide remedies for conditions that prevail, if we are to improve those conditions, we can provide those remedies or improve those conditions only if we have a knowledge of the conditions as they exist. Those conditions may be unpalatable to us; we may not like to face them; but if they are there, we should know they are there, face them like men, and see if, to some extent, they can be overcome. Nothing can be gained by closing our eyes to facts and imagining, because we do not see those facts, they do not exist. When the hon. member for Springfield spoke and poured forth his optimism and praise of the great province of Manitoba, I was cheered up; I felt almost exuberant in my joy to know, in one part of Canada at least, all was well with the world. I could not, I will admit, quite understand the full extent of his optimism in the face of some facts that even I was aware of, for instance, that there are at the present time in that province unpaid taxes amounting to $14,000,000. But no doubt that was attributable to the "over-institutionalism", was it not?

Mr. HOEY: That it was staggering under taxation.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: That it was staggering under taxation, and I am not going to hold that against my hon. friend at all. But when he spoke of that province, again I say, if those are the conditions there, the conditions of which he was cognizant, he was right in stating what he did. As for myself, I shall have to walk the middle of the road again. You know, I have noted that it has been commented upon that I have been given to moderation in this House; I intend to stick to moderation in this House, and in this respect I shall be moderate again. In my part of the country—and that extends over a good deal of Alberta—conditions are not as bad as they are painted by the hon. member for Bow River. We are in a part of the country where we have in an average year sufficient rainfall and sufficient feed for our stock, where we can grow crops year after year, where we engage in dairying, where we raise beef, hogs, poultry and eggs, and where in most years we can make our living. I believe that, given a decent chance economically, given laws under which we can carry on, under which we shall be put on an equality with other people, in our part of the country and taking the West as an average, we shall certainly succeed.

There is in this House no man to whom I will yield a place in my pride in Canada, in my optimism for the future of Canada, if rightly governed and if proper policies are put into effect. I believe we have at the present time, in potential possibilities, one of the greatest countries in the world. No one who has ridden as I have ridden over the plains of my own Alberta, who has gone through the mountains and seen the enormous deposits of the easily mined coal to be found there, who has seen hills covered with cattle, the crops that can be raised and the results of the gas deposits, who believes, as I believe, that oil, that almost every natural product can be found there, can despair of a country like that. I believe we have potentially one of the greatest countries in the world, indeed, as the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) said, probably the one great undeveloped country in the northern zone, and there is no country to which we need take a second place. But if we grant that—and most hon. members have granted that— then why is it that during the past forty or fifty years we have not been able to retain more of our population; that we have not succeeded better than we have succeeded with that foundation of natural resources? In an ordinary business, if a company or if a certain number of men were provided with capital, with a splendid stand for doing business, with all the essentials to conduct a successful business and to carry it on to a successful conclusion, and they failed, would you not think their failure was due to bad management on their part? Therefore, if in the face of those natural advantages we possess, we have not succeeded as we should have succeeded—and I do not think any hon. member will say that we have succeeded up to the present time—I contend that there must be something wrong with the management.

Mr. McBRIDE: Since I have come into this House, I have not heard one person in this section say a good word about the prairies. How is it that from 2,000 to 3,000 people come to the coast every year and that many of them go down to California and have a good time if conditions on the prairies are as bad as represented?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: No doubt, many men do go to the coast from some of our towns and a few from the farms. I have heard a good deal about the men who go to California, and spend their ill gotten gains in riotous living during the winter; but it has not been my good fortune to meet one of them. There may be such men, but they can be but a very small percentage of the men who live on the prairies.

The hon. member just asked me how it was that there was no one with a good word to say for the prairies. I am one who will say a good word for the prairies. I believe the prairies and those western provinces have all that is necessary to make a great country. I have lived there since I was a small boy; I went in there when the country was absolutely undeveloped, and my life, my whole upbringing has been in that country. I have grown up in it; I have learned to love it; I believe in it, and I have the greatest faith in it. It is not the country which is at fault, and no one in my presence will say that the prairies are at fault. The prairies are all right. What I contend is this, that given those prairies as they are, with all their vast resources and potential wealth, the men living on the prairies and working them should be now in a better financial position than they are, and we should have been able to hold our population there.

I know criticism is easy. Nothing is easier than to criticise and to say that the policies of the past were wrong. It is far more difficult to offer any suggestion as to how things might be bettered. I am prepared to offer one or two suggestions; I am not prepared to say that they will absolutely hold water, because they have never been tried out, and until they have been tried out, they will be in the nature merely of a theory or experiment. But I believe three or four changes could be made in our economic system, in the laws which govern our country, which would tend to eliminate many of the disadvantages under which we live at the present time and to bring back at least a reasonable measure of prosperity. I have enough confidence in the country for that. I will state them very briefly, because the time is getting late, and I like to live up to my reputation of confining my remarks to a very short period. First—and this matter is being worked on now—we should have a better system of credit. I have touched on that before and I shall not go into it again. Second, we should have a tariff which would not bear so hardly upon the basic producers. It is acknowledged on every side that at the present time the tariff is an unmitigated evil to the men on the prairies. Since I have come here I have learned to sympathize more deeply than before with men who are not on the prairies, because I know more of the troubles with which they are faced. I have learned that no one section of the country can have all it desires; that the matter must be one of compromise. But so far the compromise has all been made by the men on the prairies, and the tariff policy could be adjusted so that it would not bear so hardly upon those men and would not raise the cost of their means of production so far beyond the proper proportion of the value of the stuff they raise.

Again, and this is perhaps one of the most important questions—and that is not just a statement, it is a fact—in the matter of transportation for years the western railways have been bled for the benefit of the eastern end of the system. There is absolutely no question about that. All we have to do is take the statements made before the Transportation Committee last year, and every hon. member must acknowledge that through these past years, whether under the Crowsnest pass agreement or not the prairie section and the British Columbia section of the railway system of this country have paid a large part of the profits for the system as a whole. I believe that an equalization of rates in that respect all the way through from points to the east and from points to the west, would be of very material assistance.

Further, I believe that with the encouragement of a system of co-operative buying and selling by which the produce could be pooled and sold in large quantities at the lowest possible cost, eliminating the enormous cost of distribution which at present stands between producer and consumer, and which I believe can be done—I think that the cumulative effect of these four remedies, which are worth trying, would go far towards making it possible for the dwellers on the plains to live and to prosper.

What is the remedy offered by some of our friends? Immigration. That means that when you have a leaky barrel, one with a hole knocked in the bottom, you are going to fill it by continually pouring in more water regardless of how fast it is running out. That seems to me to be somewhat of an absurdity. It has been pointed out by some hon. members that as long as there is this enormous demand in the States, our people will keep going to the States, and apparently their only remedy is that we shall pump immigrants into Canada who will pass on to the south until the United States is saturated, and then the residue may remain here. I contend that that is a most absurd policy. We cannot afford to assist in bringing in immigrants if they are simply to use Canada as a sort of calling place on their way to the States, and continue that process until the United States is saturated and has received all the population it requires. I say we cannot afford to do that. When I look upon this country and hear the glowing eulogies pronounced upon it by various members—and I endorse all those eulogies, I believe this is a great country—it makes me all the more deplore the paucity of policy on the part of the government, and I am not referring particularly to the policy of the minister but the policy of this government and of other governments preceding, in attempting to deal with this problem.

What have been the policies suggested? They are embodied in a few words spoken by one of the members to my right, who said that the remedy, forsooth, was more protection. Protection, forsooth, was to be the great panacea which would alleviate and remedy all our wrongs, which would set us all right and enable us to retain our population, enable us to succeed where now we are not succeeding, and to prosper. I have a great deal of respect for that hon. gentleman. I find him in private life to be a most kindly and sympathetic man, but I cannot believe that the simple continuance of a system which has been found to be absolutely useless in that respect for forty or fifty years is going to solve the problem. Something more than that is needed. As a young member in parliament I do not pretend to have the knowledge that is necessary to solve a problem of that kind. I have some suggestions, some ideas of what might be done, but I cannot pretend to bring forward any solution. The problem has baffled a great many of our wisest men. But in order to solve it, the first thing that must take place is the realization that these conditions exist and that the old methods have failed. If these methods have failed, it seems to me that the obligation is upon the shoulders of the men upon whom has been placed the responsibility for governing this country, and who I believe to be intelligent and sincere men, to find a remedy. We can make suggestions; it is for them to act upon them.

I would like to say a word as to the possibility of immigration itself. I am not one of those, nor do I think there are many in this House, who are among those who believe that we should not have any more people in this country, that this country cannot support any more people than it has at the present time. I believe that this country could support five and ten times the population it has at the present time. I believe it would be good for the country and good for the immigrants themselves, but until we have a policy of retention to go hand-in-hand with the policy of immigration, an immigration policy is suicidal. It in itself cannot solve the problem. Immigration to my mind is a result. It is not a means for gaining a result. It is the result of sound policies put in force, practised, and the two must go hand in hand. We know, even the farmers, and we are not credited with knowing much by some members of this House, that it is absolutely useless to sow a crop of wheat, buy your seed and put it in the ground, unless you get the ground right first. You have to plough it, and till it, and put it in proper condition, or you will not have any crop, and I wish to reiterate and emphasize the fact that that applies absolutely in the same manner to the crop of people we wish to sow here. If they are to grow and prosper and succeed, they must be planted in the proper soil, and we must prepare the soil for them.

I was somewhat interested in a few remarks that were made by one or two hon. members who apparently feel that they have a personal grievance in our presence in this House. I was struck by a remark of the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) and I speak of him with a good deal of respect because I admire his ability, ability gained, no doubt through many years in this parliament, and no doubt also through his legal studies and in his practice. The ability with which he can present a case is only equalled, if possible, by the ability with which he evaded answering any question asked of him. I was interested in one thing he said in particular. He said that the United States, which is a very great country, was prospering far more than Canada was at the present time under the two-party system, and that they had not found it necessary to bring in a third party in order to save the country. That is a criticism that might cut both ways. If this country had prospered under the two-party system then this third party would not have entered the House in this country. The third party entered this House as a protest on the part of a great many people against the way in which the business of the country had been handled by the two old parties. That is the reason we are here.

It was also stated by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Baldwin) I think, that we were here representing one particular class. Well, to some extent that is true.

Mr. BALDWIN: I think I did not say one particular class. I said that men were in the House representing certain classes.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: In that case I must apologize to the hon. gentleman, but at this distance I certainly understood him to say that there were men in this House who had come here to represent a class.

Mr. BALDWIN: I did not mean the farming class.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I am glad my hon. friend does not mean his observation in any derogatory sense. I will admit that some of the members here are largely representing one class. And why? Because any hon. member sent to this House represents the majority of the people in his constituency. They cannot help the fact that in certain constituencies the majority of the people happen to be of one class; there is no known means of preventing the majority in any constituency, or in any province, from sending representatives to parliament if the people come together and work together in co-operation. If any excuse were necessary for the farmers sending men to represent them in parliament that excuse is to be found in the statements of some hon. members in this House, and the fact that certain hon. members seemed to be unaware, until the last two sessions of parliament, of conditions as they existed amongst the farmers.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to make one or two suggestions with respect to the subject of immigration itself. I am not sure whether they will be of a constructive character, but I hope they will be. The first suggestion would be as to the type of settlers we could do with here. They should be settlers who would come on a voluntary basis, selected simply according to their fitness for admission to this country, of a type that would be apt to succeed here under reasonable conditions, I would not draw a line at Anglo-Saxons particularly, I would not limit admission to people who come from the United States or from the Old Land. All through our western country we meet with a great many people, especially people from northern Europe, and I want to say this: Although I am of British birth myself, and am perhaps prejudiced in that direction sometimes, no better settlers are to be found anywhere than the Scandinavians, the Dutch, the Finlanders, let us say in many cases the Icelanders, the Esthonians, and a number of other such people. They make splendid neighbours, fine farmers, excellent citizens, and they are turning out to be good Canadians. I have met them by scores and by hundreds and in every case I have found that their standard of living is rapidly rising to the standard of living of the Anglo-Saxon. They are striving after high ideals of citizenship such as are held by the true Canadian, and they are endeavouring to make true Canadians of their children. I am not in favour, however of bringing people of these nationalities and establishing them in colonies consisting exclusively of people of their own race. That is no way to build up a country. You cannot build up Canada by establishing in it little Scandinavians and little Russians. These people must be treated as individuals, and established individually, if they are to be absorbed into the life of this country and become part of the real Canadian population.

There is one point in the minister's policy that I would like to comment on for a moment, and that is the possible use of the Soldier Settlement Board for the purpose of locating men on the land. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have become somewhat familiar with the working of that organization, and I believe that the staff are admirably qualified to carry on some aspects of this work. I would not believe in the staff of this organization acting as immigration agents—that is going out to solicit immigrants to enter this country. But I think there are no men better qualified to do that; to take care of and locate people after they come here; they have the knowledge, and they have the experience, in fact the store of data they have at their disposal is simply enormous and may be utilized to good advantage; I would agree to that only on one condition. I would not be in favour of—in fact I would strongly protest against—that organization being allied in any way with any corporation, or any company, in this country whose business was the establishment of persons on the land. Whatever success they have obtained in settling soldiers on the land—and I believe under the circumstances it has been considerable—has been due to the fact that they were able to control the character of land which the settlers would buy, and control the price to be paid for that land. That is the secret of the success they were able to achieve. But if someone else were allowed to sell at high prices to settlers land that was absolutely unsuitable for farming, and then the Soldier Settlement Board were to step in and take over the supervision of those men, and assume a part of the responsibility for their success, it would put them in an absolutely impossible position, and would make it absolutely impossible for them to succeed. If the responsibility is placed on governmental officials or a governmental organization, then the necessary authority and powers should go along with that responsibility; the two things cannot be divorced. I have seen farm after farm where the farmer was industrious, thrifty and honest, working all hours of the day and night, absolutely fail for the simple reason that the land upon which the farmer was located was totally unsuited for farming purposes. I am very much afraid that any colonization company might list properties of an unsuitable character and the Soldier Settlement Board officials would have no supervision over the choice of those lands or the price to be paid for them. Yet they might be asked to assist in supervising the work of the settlers afterwards. I think such a situation would be absolutely impossible. I believe in granting assistance to those who are going to be settled on farms. I do not believe in the system of assisted passages, but I do believe in giving intending settlers all the information possible as to the places where they should be located, and the style of farming which might be followed profitably in certain districts. I also believe in protecting them against the exorbitant exactions of men who, in some cases, have more land to sell than they have conscience. I believe in looking after the prospective settlers to that extent. We have no officials more competent to perform that work at the present time than those on the staff of the Soldier Settlement Board.

In conclusion let me say that the way to ensure the success in connection with immigration is to inaugurate a plan under which a governmental policy which will enable men to succeed shall go hand in hand with the policy of bringing in more immigrants. That course being followed I would let the people of those countries where there is a surplus population know of the opportunities to be found here. I would let them know of the opportunities that exist, what lands there were, inform them of the laws under which they must live—in fact give them a true picture of the conditions they must face and the possibilities of success. Having done that, if they were of a suitable type to be admitted into Canada and wished to come to this country I would do everything possible to welcome them here and to see that they got a fair chance to be favourably located, to make a living, and to prove that they were capable of becoming good citizens.

One hon. member spoke of the co-operation that was necessary. I also think that co-operation is necessary. I think that the co-operation of every man and woman who is already in this country is the main essential. I think the one thing that, more than anything else, discourages a settler is to come into a new country and find himself apparently unwelcome, to find himself excluded from the social circles, excluded from friendships and from neighbourly kindliness. I think one of the greatest ways in which we can co-operate, one of the greatest helps we can be to the new arrival is to see that he gets the help that honest, kind hearted neighbours can give. In my opinion that will prove a very great help indeed. I am in favour of having as many people coming to this country as desire to do so, if they are suitable for the country and can make a living here. I would go further; I am in favour of doing all we can so to change conditions and so to change some of the laws under which we work as to make it possible for those men to succeed.

Progress reported.

That the first report of the special committee appointed to inquire into the operation of chapter 12, 8-9 George V, an act respecting the Civil Service of Canada, be concurred in.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would ask the hon. member to explain the effect of the report.

[Mr. Speakman.]

Mr. MALCOLM: The committee recommends that the order in reference should be so broadened as to allow the committee to make recommendations looking towards the betterment of the act; and that the committee be empowered to sit while the House is in session.

Mr. MEIGHEN: On the understanding that that is the effect of the report I have no objection to it.

Motion agreed to.

FOREST RESERVES AND PARKS

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Argenteuil, Minister of the Interior) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 82 to amend the Dominion Forest Reserves and Parks Act.

He said: The purpose of this bill is in some cases to reduce the forest areas and in the other cases to add to them. The proposal has been submitted to the provincial governments interested, and they have all acquiesced, with the single exception of the government of Alberta. Therefore, in relation to that province we are not removing from the park areas any of the lands included in the bill, rather we are making additions. That, briefly, is all the bill purports to do—simply to change the boundaries of the forest areas in the several provinces.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have seen in the press a report of the intention of the government in regard to these forest and park areas, namely, to introduce some legislation affecting water-powers therein. That is not included in this legislation?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is there such a bill?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The matter has been discussed, but I am not sure at the moment whether we shall ask for legislation this session or not.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

2. 4. Since becoming part of the Canadian National Railways, has the Grand Trunk section of said railways, in the last annual financial statement shown a profit or loss?
5. What is the amount of such profit or loss?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. The government acquired control of the Grand Trunk under the terms of the agreement embodied in Chap. 17, of 1919, and Chap. 13, of 1920, by which the government guaranteed the interest upon the debentures and guaranteed stocks and undertook to acquire, at a valuation to be established by arbitration, the preference and common stocks. The annual interest charges upon the debentures and guaranteed stocks amount to $8,984,634.58. The board of arbitration held that, at the time of taking over, the preference and common stock were valueless in view of the unsound financial condition of the company. Under the agreement the government became responsible for Grand Trunk financing as of May 21, 1920, and has, through the receiver, been responsible for Grand Trunk Pacific financing since the default of that subsidiary of the Grand Trunk on March 9th, 1919. What these responsibilities have cost the government to December 31, 1922, will be disclosed by the Acting Minister of Railways in his forthcoming annual statement to parliament.

2 & 3. The late Sir Walter Cassels, Chairman, $50,000; by the government, $25,000; by Grand Trunk Shareholders, $25,000; Sir Thomas White, $29,000.

4 & 5. The results for 1921, including the Central Vermont, were a net deficit, after fixed charges, of $15,672,299.34. The 1922 results will be disclosed by the Acting Minister of Railways in his forthcoming annual statement to parliament.

2. Who were the shareholders of the company at the time of the purchase and what were their respective interests?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. $200,000 and the cancellation of indebtedness of the Caraquet & Gulf Shore Railway to the Canadian Government Railways, amounting to $96,399.60.

2. The government bought the physical property, not the stock, though 24,444 shares of the par value of $50 each, in the names of Messrs. E. B. Stockdale and C. S. Hamilton, in trust, and by them endorsed in blank, were, together with certain debentures, turned over to the government, January 13, 1921, by the Trusts and Guarantee Company, Limited, Toronto, trustees for the bondholders, as security for an advance of $175,000 on purchase price, pending settlement of differences regarding title.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—DIRECTORS

Mr. GRIMMER:

1. Is it the view of the government that the position of director of the Canadian National Railways is of so little importance as to be properly filled by a civil servant whose business ability is represented by a yearly salary of $2,500 since November, 1911, with no increases?
2. In view of the fact that Mr. Talbot is continuing his services with the government of the province of Quebec, is the government nevertheless of the opinion that should occasion arise the said Talbot would not follow the instructions or representations of his provincial employers?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. The remuneration of a Canadian National director, $2,000 a year, is not necessarily indicative of the business ability of the directors, nor is the fact that the directors have had no increase since the board was appointed a reflection on the manner in which the directors have discharged their duties.

2. In the view of the government, Mr. Talbot's experience and acquaintance with conditions pertaining to the district of Quebec will be of distinct advantage in the consideration, by the Canadian National Board, of railway questions affecting that province, in the welfare of which the Dominion government, the Canadian National Board and the provincial government are, in their respective spheres, equally concerned.

REBATES AND DRAWBACKS

Mr. FANSHER:

1. What was the value of the raw materials imported into Canada during the past fiscal year for the manufacture of goods for export?
2. What was the amount of duty paid on these raw materials?
3. What was the amount of money returned to the importers in the way of rebates or drawbacks?
4. What was the value of the raw materials imported into Canada during the past fiscal year for the manufacture of goods for home consumption?
5. What was the amount of duty paid on these raw materials?
6. What was the amount of money returned to the importers in the way of rebates or drawbacks?

Hon. Mr. BUREAU: It is impossible to answer the question as put. When goods go through customs there is no indication of the purposes for which they are imported. The only check we have in that respect is in connection with the drawback paid when the raw material imported enters into the manufacture of goods that are then exported. If my hon. friend will change his question I can bring down a statement showing the amount of duty paid upon materials imported which entered into the manufacture of goods finally exported from Canada.

Question stands.

ORIENTAL IMMIGRATION

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminister) moved for a return showing:

1. All statutes, orders in council, regulations and other enactments and provisions of the province of British Columbia since the entry of that province into confederation, dealing with or affecting oriental immigration, or the rights or privileges of orientals, which have been disallowed; giving dates of disallowance and the reasons therefor in every case respectively.

2. A copy of all papers, correspondence, letters, documents, telegrams and other writings which have passed between the present government or any minister or official thereof, and the government of the province of British Columbia, or any minister or official thereof, relative to the disallowance of any provincial enactment affecting orientals.

3. A copy of all papers, correspondence, letters, telegrams or other writings which have passed between the Secretary of State, or any of his officials and any of the county court judges in Vancouver on the subject of naturalization of oriental aliens.

4. A copy of all orders in council or other regulations passed during, or since, the last session of parliament, affecting oriental immigration.

5. Details as to oriental immigration since the present government assumed office, classified as to age, sex, nationality and occupation.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend is asking for a good deal of information in this motion. Perhaps he would enlarge it to include a little more. Subsection 4 asks for "A copy of all orders in council or other regulations passed during, or since, the last session of parliament, affecting oriental immigration." I would suggest that he change that to read "since January 1, 1917," and also that he change subsection 5 to read "since January 1, 1917." If he has no objection to enlarging the order to that extent, it might pass.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN: (Leader of the Opposition): The understanding would be that the information would come down by years.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Motion as amended agreed to.

CANADA'S COAL SUPPLY

MOTION BY MR. CHURCH FOR A NATIONAL FUEL POLICY

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (North Toronto) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the time has arrived for Canada to have a National Policy in relation to its coal supply and that no part of Canada should be left dependent on a United States coal supply. That further in the opinion of this House, the government should immediately consider the initiation of an all-British and Canadian coal supply and that such a policy is both a social and economic necessity and in the best interests of the future of Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the House for the opportunity of presenting this resolution. I am bringing it forward, not in criticism of the government or of anybody, for I believe that everybody has done what he could in the present fuel emergency in Canada. The object of bringing forward this resolution is rather to throw out some constructive suggestions so that another fuel famine such as we have had this year may be avoided.

Canada needs a coal supply from some other source than the United States. Canada's dependence on the coal supply of the United States is not only a national danger but a national humiliation also, and it is the duty of this parliament to try and work out some other arrangement. We have a national policy with respect to food, and a national policy with respect to clothing, and I can see no reason why we should not have a national policy with respect to our fuel supply. This is a question affecting the health, peace and comfort and prosperity of every man, woman and child in the community. Our very industrial life is at stake if conditions are to continue as they have been in the past. It is only of comparatively recent years—about forty years ago—that Canada abandoned her national fuel policy. In those days people used wood very largely for fuel, but the development of the Pennsylvania mines and the advertising which the Pennsylvania coal barons gave to that coal at the fall fairs in Canada brought about a new era. Anthracite coal was burned in stoves at these fairs and at exhibitions from coast to coast as a demonstration and finally the habit of using anthracite coal for fuel became fixed on the people of Canada. We have seen the results of such a policy. We do not want to have another winter like the last one in our large centres of population with plumbing frozen and sanitary conveniences destroyed, where we had many families suffering hardship, people taken sick with grippe and pneumonia and many dying from it, and with such a shortage of fuel that people were lined up for hours before the coal offices hoping to place an order, and when they did get an order placed they would come back the next day and find the office closed.

We do not want to face again such a condition as that if it can possibly be avoided. The shortage of American anthracite in this country was largely due to the two great coal strikes in the United States. The first occurred in 1902-3 when the price of coal in Canada went up to $30 and $35 a ton. The second strike took place about a year ago, in April, 1922, and it was the greatest coal strike in the history of the civilized world. That strike lasted for five months during which time not a ton of anthracite coal was mined as compared with a production of 40,000,000 tons for the corresponding five months of 1921. Of soft coal only 90,000,000 tons were mined during those five months of last year, as against 150,000,000 for the same period of 1921. The first to be affected by the coal shortage in the United States were the manufacturers, but when November arrived the demand for coal became pretty general, and a cry went up that the government should take over and operate the coal mines. Congress was called to consider the situation, but fortunately did not adopt the foolish policy growing out of the popular clamour, which was asked for. The people of this country must never be caught napping again as they were in 1902-3 and in 1922-3. I suppose it is fair to say that the average consumption of a family in Canada is about six tons of coal per annum. In addition to the visible supply of coal for heating purposes there is also an invisible supply that must be taken into consideration. It has been estimated by the Scientific American that a family which consumes 14 tons of coal per annum for heating purposes also consumes 14 tons of what you might call "invisible" coal. The latter represents the coal consumed by electric heating and power plants, gas plants and various industrial establishments in supplying one's household with these public utilities. There is scarcely an article of food appearing on the table of the average family in the production of which there has not been a substantial consumption of this "invisible coal."

The question has an international as well as a national importance. It is well to bear this fact in mind. In that respect the coal question is like the financial question; it has its international as well as its national aspect. Owing to the shortage of coal in Europe the United States is becoming an exporter of coal. Just as Canada and the rest of the civilized world were affected by financial conditions growing out of the Great War, so this country and the other countries are affected and influenced by the shortage of coal. The production of a coal supply for the world and its distribution on an equitable basis is one of the pressing questions of to-day, and one which must be carefully considered and dealt with in an efficient manner. The importance of this problem has been increasing with the passage of the years; but undoubtedly the present situation has developed very rapidly on account of the conditions growing out of the war. Future industrial development, and the wellbeing of the peoples of the various countries of the world, are jeopardized by this fuel shortage. Although Canada has been, in the main, seriously affected by only the two coal strikes to which I have alluded, the conditions to-day are such that this country stands at the parting of the ways. Unless we take up this problem and deal with it in an adequate manner we shall soon be face to face with a national discomfort on a huge scale, and with industrial disaster. If we do not deal with this problem in a big, broad, statesmanlike manner it threatens the economic future and industrial development of the whole of this country. It is perhaps not too much to say that the future of the civilization of the world depends to as great, if not a greater, degree upon a sufficient production of coal as upon a production of food. Upon this point let me quote the opinion of Mr. Herbert Hoover:

> The fate of European civilization now rests in the hands of the coal and coal mine owners of Europe to an equal if not a greater degree than in the hands of the producers of foods and supplies during the next year.

Mr. Hoover contends that only an adequate production and efficient distribution of coal will save Europe from disaster. Outside of the strikes referred to we have not had in Canada the dire distress from which other countries have suffered in a fuel way. In Europe, for example, the conditions owing to the lack of sufficient coal have been and are to-day lamentable in the extreme. As I said, the United States is now exporting coal to Europe which is also deriving a large supply from Great Britain. The countries of western and southern Europe have been almost entirely supplied with fuel by Great Britain. These countries are France, Italy, Denmark, Germany, Holland, Portugal, Norway and Sweden; all of them are largely dependent on Great Britain for their fuel supply. In 1913, the fairest year of record and the last year before the war, Great Britain exported over 50,000,000 tons of coal to various countries in Europe. France took 20,000,000 tons; Italy, 9,650,000 tons; Sweden, 4,500,000 tons; Norway 2,300,000 tons; Spain, 3,650,000 tons; Denmark, 3,030,000 tons; Holland, 2,010,000 tons; Portugal, 1,360,000 tons; other Mediterranean countries 3,500,000 tons. In addition, Great Britain sent about 9,000,000 tons to South America, 5,000,000 tons to South Africa, 5,000,000 tons to other parts of the world; and to Canada little or none. Great Britain's export of coal, before the war, amounted in value to 8½ per cent of her export trade, and in point of weight to 75 per cent of that trade. A great deal of the coal which the Mother Country exports serves as ballast; the return cargoes consist of food stuffs and other commodities. But the conditions in Great Britain to-day are not reassuring. Owing to the conditions in Europe to-day there is not only a large demand for coal from Europe but requests for fuel are also coming from South America and other countries which in earlier years did not to so great a degree depend upon the British mines. The demands of France for coal from Great Britain, owing to the situation in which it finds itself at present are not confined to Great Britain; she is knocking at the doors of America and preparations are under way to meet that demand from this continent. During the war the mines in France were dismantled by the Germans, wantonly and for reasons of military necessity, and it will be years before they will be rehabilitated. That country produces 20,000,000 tons a year for domestic purposes, but French engineers state that it will take from two to five years to rebuild the operating equipment and ten years to completely restore the production rate of these mines. France, however, will be able to increase her fuel supplies owing to the occupation of the Sarre district. But she has to replace her former importation where deprived of the same. France still faces a serious coal shortage.

Italy's condition with respect to fuel throughout the war period has been desperate. In 1913 she was producing less than 750,000 tons of coal per annum, and was importing from Great Britain some 10,000,000 tons.

During the war, at great expense, she was able to increase her home production of an inferior grade of fuel by about 1,000,000 tons. I shall not dwell at length on the conditions in Germany, because everybody is familiar with them. Owing to the invasion of the Ruhr, Germany has had to import a great deal of coal from Great Britain. To-day she is in need of further importations and is trying to get them from America. During the war some countries were coerced into supplying coal. Referring to Sweden, Switzerland and similar countries, during the war, these neutral countries found themselves dependent upon the warring nations for their coal, but Great Britain and Germany released coal to these countries in exchange for food. The United States export coal is a phase in which Canada is vitally interested, because if the United States exports coal in large quantities to Europe, as she has been doing for the last twelve months, they will have to curtail the supply sent to Canada. The coal commissioner on the other side of the border has told our coal commissioner here that he must curtail his demand.

That is the problem as far as Canada is concerned, because Canada has received some 12,000,000 tons of anthracite coal per annum from the United States. All the countries in the world to-day are forced and urged by scientists and geologists to do something to place an embargo on wanton waste of this coal throughout the world. This matter is not confined solely to America, but it has been considered in other countries. We must take cognizance of the fact that the United States is being pressed by the demands of its own people for local exigencies last year, so that its own people should not suffer on account of what others are receiving. It is a fact that charity begins at home, and I think the people of the United States will adopt that rule, as far as the coal situation in Canada is concerned, because no country should be expected to send outside its borders the commodity upon which the existence and life of the people depends. I do not believe that the United States will place an embargo against coal being shipped to Canada, but economics may drive them to do so. The geologists and the Conservation Commission of the United States for six years have been urging the adoption of such a policy. I think that Canada will have to take some action during the next two years. I do not say we can establish a national policy in a few months, or in the twinkling of an eye, but the policy enunciated by this resolution is the open door policy and the logical one. The people of Canada should work for a national coal policy the same as they have done in the past in regard to a national policy for their food and clothing. I may say that this policy is the only correct one. It is evident to everybody that if the United States, either in the interests of her own people, or in the interests of people whom she may consider more needy than Canada, should decide that it is necessary to supply nations with coal, with the result that Canada's normal supply should be substantially reduced, who may reasonably find fault with such a course? It is evident to every intelligent gentleman that the outlook is far from reassuring, and it calls for drastic action, immediate or prospective.

This coal situation will be far reaching. Canada is richly endowed with water-powers, but she cannot depend upon them as a sole source of heat. Then the question arises what is to be done by Canada? Let us have a survey of our own conditions. Let us adopt a national policy. We must develop our own coal resources. Considering the coal situation, in respect to the quantity and quality of coal, Canada is the most fortunate country in the world. She has 1,000,000,000 tons of semi-anthracite, and 315,000,000,000 tons of bituminous coal and 10,000,000,000,000 tons of sub-bituminous coal and lignite. It seems out of place to emphasize how much we have latent when alongside of it we are not able to show how beneficially these assets are being used both for our own support and for the assistance of other needy nations.

This is not a new question, because I find many authorities in favour of it. Sir Henry Thornton, the head of the Canadian National Railway System, spoke the other day at Edmonton, and gave the people of Alberta—and the people of the West are vitally interested in this problem—his views on this question. Those views are covered in the following newspaper report:

> Referring to his recent trip to the West, Sir Henry said: "We often think of the prairie provinces in the West as agricultural, but believe me there exists in the west of Canada a mineral development which in importance will, in time, fully equal if not excel the possibilities of agricultural development. It is essential that the railway companies, by proper rates, by proper service and by such assistance as lies within their power, should do all that they can to assist in that mineral development and extend the selling radius of the coal and other minerals which lie in the West."
> Enlarging on the coal question Sir Henry said: "Certainly it is better and wiser for the people of Canada and the people of Ontario to buy their coal from their own people than to purchase that coal from their neighbour to the south. Because, apart from the sending out of the country each year a large amount of money, there are always embarrassing questions arising with reference to the export of coal from the United States whenever there happens to be a coal shortage in this country. One of those embarrassing questions is being discussed at the present time. I hope the day will come and the Canadian National Railways will leave nothing undone to hasten that day when the people of Canada will not be dependent on the United States for their coal supply, except to a very limited extent."

Mr. J. B. Shaw, the president of the Manufacturers' Association, speaking at a dinner of the live-stock interest at the Canadian National Exhibition, said that he approves of a national policy, and that every day the policy is postponed the country will be placed in a worse position, and that Canada should face the situation, and do it now.

Sir Clifford Sifton said at a dinner in Ottawa of the Conservation Commission:

We will live to see every pound of American anthracite driven out of Canada. It will mean $100,000,000 a year to Canada.

Sir Clifford Sifton said that a contract of $2,500,000 had been let the other day in Hamilton for the construction of a by-product coke oven, and that so surely as the sun rises the same industry will be started in Toronto and Montreal, and would succeed. Another high authority is quoted in the following news report:

"Canada is at the mercy of the United States in regard to the coal situation," Dr. Frank D. Adams, Dean of the Faculty of Applied Science, McGill University, told the Young Men's Canadian Club in an after dinner address on "The Coal Situation" at the Windsor Hotel last evening.

"They have got us by the throat," he declared. "If they choose they could freeze us to death in one winter." All of Ontario and most of Quebec now depended for its supplies on the United States, because Canada's coal was located in the Maritime provinces and the Western provinces. In addition they had the assurance of American geologists that the coal supply of the United States would not last 100 years. . . . It was "definitely certain" that in 80 years there would be no more anthracite in the United States and that in 25 years Canada would not be able to get any more anthracite from over the border. Canada had therefore to prepare for the time when she would have to provide her own coal. Western coal must be brought as far East as possible and Eastern coal must be taken as far West as possible. The matter was one of transportation and cost since Ontario and Quebec had no coal mines and never would have any.

The coal situation now was grave and the future held no prospect of things getting any better. It was one of the very greatest problems which Canada had to face at the present time, Dr. Adams concluded.

The following shows how this matter is regarded by certain United States authorities:

George Otis Smith, director of the Geological department of the United States, saying that it is a menace to the country to export every year forty per cent of their coal, that this raw material should be preserved to the United States for the purpose of manufacturing and supplying all the nations of the world with the goods they are in need of, we may expect before a very long time—and there is a persistent rumour to this effect—that they will impose a partial if not a total restriction on the export of American coal.

Then the last authority in regard to a national policy is Dr. Charles Camsell, Deputy Minister of Mines, who was appointed to investigate the coal supply of this country and who is head of the Federal Coal Commission. He is quoted thus:

The most feasible scheme appeared to be reducing bituminous coal to coke. He believed that the agitation in the United States against exporting anthracite would ultimately result in an embargo, so that Canada would be forced to burn something else.

Dr. Camsell said a coking plant, to be operated economically must be in conjunction with a gas company. The by-products could not be disposed of profitably by a plant whose sole object was reducing bituminous coal to coke.

Further, Dr. Camsell says:

The transportation problem is the principal one respecting the supply of fuel to the two coal-less provinces, Ontario and Quebec. Peat and wood were the only fuels native to these two provinces. He thought the peat industry could be developed to a point where it would replace to a considerable extent the use of anthracite in the homes. About 7,000,000 tons of peat a year were used in Ireland.

The people of Manitoba have, of necessity, had to adopt a national policy in regard to coal failing to get Pennsylvania anthracite this winter, and they have to thank the people of Alberta for the coal they gave them this winter. It is very fortunate that a large number of people in Manitoba to-day are buying Alberta coal, as this has done a great deal towards helping out Manitoba during the coal scarcity. The national policy adopted by Manitoba of using Alberta coal was a success, and to-morrow, Alberta coal should supply Ontario as well. I cited the quantity of coal which the great province of Alberta possesses. The question is purely one of transportation and, indeed, the coal situation on the North American continent is ninety-five per cent a transportation problem. We have a national railway and a government merchant marine, and the people of Canada have spent some $900,000,000 in direct and indirect aid to the railways of this country. During several months in the year, our national railway is sending to the West empty cars waiting for the grain trade. If a business man has a bargain day, —and the American people and departmental stores have shown the success of bargain days—why should our national railways not have a bargain day? Why should these empty cars be sent out West and left on sidings there for days and weeks when they could be utilized during the slack time to bring coal east to Ontario at a bargain-day or cut rate? I purpose showing in detail how this national policy can be carried out, and this is a constructive policy which I would urge on the government of Canada.

The war has not changed Canada's national status. Canada still remains where she did in the days of Upper and Lower Canada. In time of emergency we can say: "We will go to war," or "we will not go to war," or "we will ask for further information," as we did recently in the case of the Dardanelles. I am not afraid of danger to Canadian autonomy from Downing street. But I am alarmed about the possibility of danger to Canadian autonomy from the hard and soft coal fields of the United States. The account between the people of Canada and the people of the United States is not one-sided by any means. The Americans are our own kith and kin; blood is thicker than water; and they stand for the same high principles of civilization just as much as we do. But in America, to-day, the coal supply is purely a business arrangement and the United States will soon adopt a national policy and place on us a coal embargo. The other day the Secretary of State (Mr. Copp) brought down an answer in the House which shows the situation very clearly. Canada's national autonomy is a myth as long as a great part of our country depends for its coal supply on the United States. This account which I have made up from the return shows that in 1921-22, the last year of which we have record, the imports of bituminous coal from the United States to Canada amounted to 9,734,041 tons, the cash value being $34,305,964. Imports of anthracite coal from the United States to Canada in the same year amounted to 12,515,014 tons, valued at $22,042,584. If you add together the values of the bituminous and anthracite imports into Canada for 1922, the total value of that tonnage of 12,249,055 tons is $56,348,548.

Every dollar of that amount of money which Canada sends to the United States should go for the payment of wages of Canadian or British workmen in the Maritime provinces, Alberta and Wales, and every pound of coal required in Canada should be mined and coked and under the British flag by British miners, not only in Wales, but in the Maritime provinces and Alberta. The people of Toronto have shown that they can bring coal from Wales at a cost of $15.50 per ton, even when freight rates were high; and the people of that city will not wait for any government to act, because they are to-day considering measures to get coal themselves from Wales, the Maritime provinces and Alberta. I should like to see the government carry out a similar national policy. I do not say that this can be accomplished in a day, but the government can work up to it in the years that are to come.

[Mr. Church.]

In addition to this tremendous amount of money going to the United States in payment of coal imported from that country, the people of Canada have been charged on this coal by American railways the highest rates known in the history of railways in this country. We are told by some people that American coal is a necessity for the industrial life of this country. Industrially, American coal is not more necessary to the industrial life and domestic comfort of this country than the Canadian electricity from our water-powers is necessary to the industrial life and domestic comfort of the people of the United States. It is the duty of the government and of parliament to assist in removing our dependence upon United States coal by substituting for these 12,249,055 tons of anthracite and bituminous coal imported every year from the United States into Canada, coal coked or mined under the British flag; and the day when that is accomplished cannot come too soon.

There are in the United States great areas that are dependent for their electric power on the 158,000 h.p. of energy generated from Canadian water-powers and exported to the United States every year. Exports of Canadian electricity supply power equivalent to the power that could be generated by the consumption of 1,400,000 tons of American coal every year. The cash value of American coal that would be required to produce the energy from Canadian water-powers is not less than $8,000,000. Canada gets no credit for these imports of electricity from the United States, and they are not recognized as an offset to exports of United States coal to Canada. The mayor of Buffalo and the mayor of Boston, have their officers counting the cars of coal crossing to Canada. Why does the mayor of Buffalo not order his officers to count the units of Canadian electricity that go into Buffalo to keep the factories of that city from dependence on United States coal? Sitting near me is the hon member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin), one of the Niagara Falls Park Commissioners. What do you see on the Canadian side of the Niagara river to-day except around Niagara Falls, Welland, Thorold, and Inland? You see a boulevard and very few factories except those which are coming into being on account of the cheap power supplied by the Hydro-Electric Commission. But across the river from Lewiston as far as Buffalo, you see a regular chain of factories, every few hundred yards. Why are those factories there? They are there because of the magnanimous and generous policy of the people of this country in exporting electricial energy to the extent they do, thus enabling these large American concerns to locate on the borders of the river. The mayor of Buffalo does not give us any credit for that, nor for the $56,000,000 in wages which the people of Canada are sending over annually to the United States for coal, wages which might go into the pockets of the miners of Nova Scotia, Alberta and Wales. As I said, in addition Canada has to pay the American railways the highest rates that can be charged for the transportation of American coal. But we get no credit for all this; the chorus of protest suggests that Canada is a Lazarus, prone in the dust, the coal dust, and prostrate beside the tracks of American coal roads, waiting to pick up lumps of anthracite or bituminous fuel from United States coal cars. The United States coal barons pick pretty easy money out of the pockets of the people of Canada—they pick it a good deal faster than Canada picks free coal off the United States freight cars.

Canada does not need to throw American coal overboard as the tea was thrown overboard in Boston harbour on a certain historic occasion. Canada does need a government that will work out a declaration of independence that would free the homes of four millions of this country's population from their present dependence on United States coal. It is true the United States has been worse in word than in action. It is true also that these repeated threats to cut off our coal supply are also humiliating. In a word, we should adopt a truly national policy in the matter of coal. It is true that the American people are friendly to us, but their papers are not at all sympathetic in dealing with the export of coal to this country. For instance, the New York Times says editorially:

> As Canada, though she won't admit it, is "Our Lady of the Snows," to deprive her of the American coal to which she has been accustomed would be cruel. But it is reasonable to ask the Canadians why they do not use their own coal, of which they have in Cape Breton as much as they choose to dig.
>
> It is soft coal, to be sure, and not the best of soft coal at that, but it is quite good enough to use at a pinch, even for the purposes called "domestic," and as most of us down here have been driven to the supplementing of our scanty anthracite by means of such sorry stuff, there is no reason why our neighbours should look across the border for help they can get at home.
> That they like hard coal better than soft is no reason for pretending that they will freeze if they do not share our inadequate supply. Besides, there still is wood in Canada, and good hardwood at that, and it is not so many years since no Canadian ever thought of warming himself and his family with anything else.

I submit that no part of this Dominion should be left dependent on the United States for its coal supply, and the only way in which we can become absolutely independent in this matter is to adopt the good old Conservative way, the national policy, the policy of protection put into force by Sir James Whitney and other leading Conservative statesmen in their hydro-electric development. It was this policy which gave us our hydro-electric system in Ontario, which to-day is supplying over 1,000,000 horse-power to the towns and cities and country districts of that province. The demand for power from the Chippewa development is growing at such a rapid rate that by next September the cities of Toronto, London and Hamilton will be able to get no more and will go begging for more power. Now, had it not been for the national policy we would have no hydro-electric power. I think we should extend the principle of that fine old national policy so as to encourage the coking of Nova Scotia coal and the importation of Welsh coal.

The question may be asked, where would we find the money for the adoption of such a policy, money to pay bounties on the production of coke from Nova Scotia coal and to adapt our systems of land and water transportation to the delivery of Welsh anthracite? I reply that we should extend the principles of protection, apply the good old national policy, and so secure a supply of fuel coked and mined under the British flag as a substitute for the 12,249,055 tons or $56,348,548 worth of anthracite and bituminous coal now purchased in the United States and burned in Canada every year. I would take the money not out of the pockets of Canadian coal consumers, but out of the pockets of the American consumers of newsprint. Canada's pulp resources are almost entirely in the hands of Americans. The last pulpwood lands of Canada have become the happy hunting-ground of United States operators. All Canada gets out of her enormous pulp resources is the price of the comparatively ill-paid labour employed in converting the pulpwood into paper. These wages are almost as low as the conditions of the labour market will permit.

I would supply the bounty for the production of coke and the importation of Welsh anthracite by putting an embargo of ten per cent on the newsprint exported to the United States. According to a return laid on the Table of the House the other day our newsprint exports in 1921 reached a total of $62,860,142. A duty of ten per cent ad valorem on this value would yield $6,286,014 per annum. Therefore the proceeds of that export duty would supply a yearly bounty fund of over $6,000,000, from which could be drawn bounties to encourage the production of coke from Nova Scotia coal, and to aid in the freighting of Welsh coal, or of our eastern and western coal to Canadian markets.

Canadians would not consider that the state of Pennsylvania was guilty of an unfriendly act if it exercised the powers that state has, and confirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, and placed an export duty on every ton of coal mined in Pennsylvania. Nor would we be guilty of an unfriendly act towards the United States if we imposed an export duty on our newsprint.

Canada must face this issue of an all-British coal supply. We cannot go on shirking the obligation to deal with the condition that confronts us—a condition that must become more and more a menace to our national life. The question of Canada's coal supply becomes simply a question of whether Canada shall live in the strength of an all-British coal supply or die in the weakness of dependence on an American coal supply. The miners of Nova Scotia are bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh, so are the miners of Wales. I am told that Nova Scotia coke makes an almost ideal fuel—better than American coal, anthracite or bituminous. Canada's coal supply must be put on a permanent and national basis. The government should encourage the production and organize for a supply of Nova Scotia and Welsh or western coal. Such a supply would displace our present annual importation of over 12,000,000 tons of anthracite or bituminous coal from the United States, and would divert the $56,000,000, now paid into wages or profits taken by men under the Stars and Stripes, into the pockets of workers under the British flag.

The Geological and Mines department of the government can tell you that there are millions of tons of good steam and coking and other kinds of coal east of the Rockies and in Alberta—enough to supply Canada for more than a century. The only reason why none of it comes to Ontario and the East is found in the high transportation charges, because the coal is immediately accessible to or within fifty miles of the railroads in the districts of Lethbridge, Jasper, Brazeau, Edson, Nordegg and Edmonton. Now that the National railways are owned by the government, for patriotic reasons a government commission or committee should investigate the tonnage of coal that exists, the cost of mining and transporting it, and report upon the Canadian fuel situation generally. It should be shown how much Canada spends annually outside of her own country for fuel, and ways and means should be devised of making us independent of the rest of the world for our fuel supplies.

[Mr. Church.]

It is only proper that the expenditure made by Canada on fuel should be distributed in our own land, and provision should be made to ensure an adequate supply of coal for Canadian manufacturers and Canadian citizens generally; the matter should not be left to the cupidity of foreign coal miners and railroad owners. The matter of the supply of coal is a national question, and the freight charges should be so adjusted as to ensure the movement of Canadian coal from one point to another in our own country so that all our communities can get it. If steps can be taken to loosen the shackles which at present encumber us in this connection; in other words, if the necessary arrangements can be made whereby we in this part of the country can secure an ample supply of Alberta coal, the benefit conferred on the people will be second to none. There are possibilities in the use of peat, oil, Welsh coal, Nova Scotia coal; there are many ways in which we should be able to make ourselves independent of the United States for our ordinary fuel supply. There is no doubt about the fact that the day of anthracite coal is practically gone; it will never be cheap again. The coal measures are running out; as time goes on the cost of operation will increase, strikes will be frequent, and transportation difficulties will make themselves more felt. Let us therefore bring this coal down from Alberta to the head of the lakes; let the shipping men tell us what it will cost to distribute this coal in car lots to the ports of the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence.

Now, I sympathize with the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart); he has this matter of the coal supply to deal with as well as his other extensive duties, and I think he is doing very well. But speaking on the subject the other day he quoted a freight rate of $16 a ton on Alberta coal. The figures I have show that it can be brought down here for $6 a ton if coal got the same rate per ton as grain. I have a letter here from a gentleman who is an officer of the Canadian Institute of Mining and Metallurgy at Edmonton. I will quote only a few words:

> I submitted a memorandum to Sir Henry Thornton with a view to the inauguration of a through fast coal freight train service from the coal fields of Alberta to Ontario.

With the letter he sent me copies of educational material being used in the Alberta fuel campaign at Winnipeg during the past winter. I may say that Alberta is entitled to a great deal of credit for the propaganda it has carried on in this respect in Manitoba, and we ask the people of Alberta to come down to Ontario and make a success of that same policy here. Alberta is very anxious to make Canada entirely independent of any other country in the matter of fuel supply. This communication states, in support of that position:

One reason being that we are good citizens of Canada in the West, and the other that the elimination of $11,000,000 for United States coal would reflect itself enormously in all industries of Canada, as well as establish the coal of Alberta.

This gentleman goes on to point out that in connection with getting coal from Alberta, ninety per cent of the difficulty is in the transportation end of it. He says:

The Hon. Mr. Stewart stated in the House that "Canada must depend largely on the United States for its fuel supply," and suggested that plants for coking American bituminous coals be set up in various points in Ontario. The matter has been taken up here by many public bodies, and particularly the Alberta branch of the Canadian Institute of Mining and Metallurgy, which sent on Saturday a telegram to Hon. Mr. Stewart, copy of which is enclosed. This telegram was also sent to the Canadian Institute of Mining and Metallurgy which is now meeting in convention in Montreal. . . . .

It is felt here that a very determined effort on the part of the Dominion government should be made to make Canada independent in the matter of her fuel supply, and by so doing add materially to the prosperity of the country as a whole, assist in stabilizing the coal industry of Alberta and largely increase the earnings of the Canadian National Railway. It might be pointed out that there is at present in effect a freight rate from Coal Spur, a branch of the C.N.R. west of Edmonton, to Prince Rupert on the Pacific coast of $3.40 per ton. If this rate were put into effect from Edmonton to Toronto we would then enjoy a rate of $8.02 per ton instead of $12.50 as at present.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): May I be permitted to correct the hon. gentleman? I did not say that $16.40 would be the freight rate on coal from Alberta. I said that Alberta coal should be sold in Ontario at about $16.40. I may say that is a mistake the people made out West with respect to my statement.

Mr. CHURCH: I do not wish to misquote the minister, because I think he has been very fair. I realize he has done a great deal to assist this matter. However, this is the statement made in this letter; I shall be glad to give the minister a copy of it. The letter continues:

It might further be pointed out that this Prince Rupert rate is on a mountain haul and on car lots. The suggestion made to Sir Henry Thornton was that coal should be transported from the various fields of Alberta to Ontario in train lots and if this mountain rate is profitable, which it presumably is, it seems reasonable to suppose that it should be possible to transport on prairie haul in train lots on a fast schedule at considerably less.

The minister said the other day that it would cost $4,000,000 to build a connecting line from the existing right of way of the railway to the coal mines. But I would say that even that expenditure would be relatively small. The fixed charges would be $250,000 a year, and when you consider that Canada burns over 12,000,000 tons of United States hard coal annually, the fixed charges on this railway extension would be saved a thousand times over. I believe it would be good business for Canada generally if a low freight rate on this coal from Alberta to Ontario and the East generally could be obtained. A gentleman in Alberta, one of the largest rate-payers in Edmonton, writes me as follows:

It is certainly a move in the right direction for Ontario to secure a supply of coal independent of the United States. It struck me, however, that possibly you were not familiar with Alberta coal and that Alberta contains about 17 per cent of all the known coal of the world. We have the Canadian National railway tapping the greatest portion of the coal area and reaching a large part of Ontario. The C.N.R. has a number of idle cars from say March first to September first of each year. Hundreds of train men are laid off during this period owing to lack of freight to haul. The cost of upkeep of the 2,200 miles of road-bed will be about the same whether coal is hauled or not, as if idle the rails and ties will rust and rot out instead of wearing out. Would it not be good business for Canada generally to secure a low freight rate on this coal to Ontario on train loads if necessary, during the period mentioned, and give the residents of Ontario a chance to use the best coal in the world for domestic purposes.

I believe for the Ontario climate, the best grades of Alberta coal will prove superior to even anthracite, as it can be controlled more readily, will hold fire for a longer period without going out, and quickly respond when heat is required. A freight rate of not more than $6 to $7 per ton from the mines in Alberta to any point touched by the C.N.R. is feasible and should be secured. I do not claim to be a railway expert but am informed by experienced railway men that coal in train lots can be hauled profitably at $2.65 per train mile with half of this for the returned empty cars. On a 2,000-ton train of coal from an average point in Alberta to the average point in Ontario, mileage 2,200 would leave a profit of almost 25 per cent at $6 per ton. This matter is, I believe, being taken up by the various boards of trade, the Rotary Club, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, and by many others.

I shall not go into the history of Nova Scotia coal, as that was referred to in the House the other day. I am glad to see the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. McKenzie) present. I appreciate what he is doing to educate the public as to the vast importance of Nova Scotia coal and coke. It is true that there is not a market at the present time for any more Nova Scotia coal than can be disposed of in Quebec and other places, but as an Ontario man I want to say that we can take millions of tons of Nova Scotia coal. I believe Nova Scotia coke is superior to any other coal in the world, and if the government would give part of the bounty of $6,000,000 or $7,000,000, such as I mentioned a few moments ago, and, coking furnaces were established, I believe that Nova Scotia coal would go a long way towards solving our fuel problem, and Ontario would certainly welcome such a step and would take all the Nova Scotia coke it could get—it would keep our merchant marine busy.

I shall touch on just one other matter and then I am through, and that is the development of a national policy as to water-power. I have referred to the Hydro Electric System, and a return has been brought down to the House by the Minister of Interior which shows the development along that line. It is only within the last two hundred years that scientific discoveries have given to the world the power inherent in fuels, namely, coal, gas, oil and falling water, distributed in the various forms of heat, light and electricity. It has been estimated that the total water-powers of the world amount to about 100,000,000 horse-power, of which only about 17,000,000 have so far been developed. The Dominion of Canada possesses about 20 per cent of the world's total water-power, and also approximately the same percentage of the world's water-power already developed. The people of Ontario and Quebec are especially interested in this power situation. In Ontario we have no coal. We have to depend for our coal suppy on the Maritime provinces, and the far West and the United States. The United States will run out of coal in about forty years, as has been shown by the report of the Conservation Commission of that country. The first of these stores of energy to be utilized by man was coal, as we all know. This fuel is very widely distributed and exists in immense quantities in various parts of the world, but there is no denying the fact that the supply is limited and that the world is not any too economical in its expenditure of coal. The supplies of oil and gas are also limited, and prices very high. Our remaining source of energy, then, is water-power. Sir Adam Beck, speaking at Belleville the other day, said that eastern Ontario next year could have no power, and he is urging the immediate development of the Morrisburg dam—by the municipalities east of Belleville. It cannot be constructed any too soon. As was said the other day by the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Lapierre), and by the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Deslauriers), American capitalists to-day not satisfied with grabbing the timber wealth of this country, are now trying to get control of our water-powers not only in the St. Lawrence river but in other parts of Canada. They know that their own country will run out of coal in a few years, and that is why they wish to get control of the main water-powers in this country. I think it is the duty of the government to lay down a national policy with regard to the export of our power.

In conclusion, I believe that an educational campaign should be conducted to educate the people as to the necessity for a national fuel policy along the lines I have suggested. The people have accepted a national policy as to food and clothing, and I say that the time has come for us to lay down as a national policy the using of our own coal from coast to coast—close our ranks, declare a closed-door policy, develop the mines of Alberta and the mines of the Maritime provinces, and use our merchant marine to bring out coal from Wales and Nova Scotia. If the Mother Country can send about fifteen millions of coal to South America and South Africa and parts of the world not under the British flag, it can afford to give Canada five or six million tons of Welsh anthracite to help replace the 12,000,000 tons we get from the United States. We have a merchant marine in this country with deficits. What is it doing? It could not be put to any better service on behalf of the people than to bring out coal from Wales, and to transport Nova Scotia coal up the St. Lawrence through the Welland Canal to the head of the lakes. Alberta as well can do its part, as it is doing now, to supply Manitoba, and then they can come over and help us in Ontario. If Alberta will do that, she will find us good customers. I send to the Solicitor General also the Macedonian cry—to come over and help us in Ontario with Nova Scotia coal. Let us lay down here and now a national policy with regard to fuel, so that every ton of coal used in Canada shall be mined and coked under the British flag. Not because we do not want to trade with the Americans; they are good neighbours, and we want to keep on friendly terms with them; but we should not sponge on them any more for our coal. If we have a merchant marine, let us use it, and let us use the national system of railways and develop a national coal policy. The National Railways and merchant marine will prove a great asset to the people of the country if they will engage in this work, instead of being unsuccessful as at present and going behind millions of dollars. Let us not wait for commissions to report but let the government now give notice to the mine owners of Alberta and the mine owners of Nova Scotia to get ready now, to wait no longer, but put on extra men and get the coal out. The time to get ready for next winter is right here and now. Let us notify them to put on their extra men and work night shifts, if necessary, in order to get out the coal required. Let us utilize the National Railways and the merchant marine. I hope the minister—and we have a good one—will lay down a policy in this House when his railway estimates are before us of utilizing these national transportation means along the lines I have suggested. The government should first ensure a supply of all-British coal, and then invite this parliament to enforce and extend the glories of the good old national policy and put on a duty that would keep every pound of American bituminous and anthracite coal from being sold in Canada.

I want to thank the House for the kindness and courtesy with which they have so patiently listened to me, and on my own behalf I want to thank them for their patience.

Mr. SPEAKER: I wish to remind the House that though the motion is quite in order and the principle involved in it quite an important one deserving to be debated, yet one phase of this same principle, namely the shortage of coal, has already been debated in this House the other day in Committee of Supply, under item 368 of the Main Estimates, and quite properly, I think, because the question then was a vote for the Honorary Advisory Council of Industrial and Scientific Research. What I wish to remind the House is that there is a rule in our parliamentary procedure that debates must not be anticipated, and there is another rule that debates must not be repeated. That is one of our unwritten rules. While I do not wish to prevent anybody from speaking on this question of the shortage of fuel, I would remind hon. gentlemen that their remarks should be limited to the essentials, as the question has already been largely debated by this House.

Mr. W. F. CARROLL (Cape Breton South and Richmond): I think the thanks of the House and the country are due to the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Church) for his very interesting and instructive speech. I did not intend to make any remarks upon this question. When the debate on the Address was before the House, I made a few remarks with reference to our coal supply and pointed out at that time that although we had in this House a standing committee on Mines and Minerals it had never functioned in the last twelve years, and I suggested that perhaps it would be the proper thing for this whole question of our fuel supply to be referred to that committee during this session of parliament. Had I known, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church) would reach his resolution so early in the day I would have consulted him regarding a possible amendment, or an addition, which I would like to make to his resolution. There is no doubt in the world that the question of a fuel supply for Canada is, perhaps, the most important domestic and national proposition that this country will have to deal with from now on. I am sorry to say that the people of the large cities of central Canada—Montreal, Toronto, Ottawa, Hamilton and other great centres—are, for some reason or other, prejudiced against the use of soft coal as a domestic fuel. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the minister entrusted with the administration of the Mines branch would be doing a thing of national importance if, next summer or during the course of next year, he would get his coal experts at work in the large centres referred to and have the public instructed in the use of bituminous coal as a domestic fuel.

Now, the resolution in its present form may not get us anywhere, and I would like to suggest that the following words be added to it:

> And that the whole question of fuel supply for Canada, together with the question of costs, transportation, desirable interprovincial action, and other means whereby Canada may be made self-sustaining and self-supplying as regards fuel, and to inquire into the necessity and possibility of supplying substitutes for coal, be referred to the standing committee on Mines and Minerals, and that said committee report to the House.

Mr. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It had not been my intention to speak on this resolution, but I cannot allow the offering of the amendment to pass without making some reference to it. I am very strongly of the opinion that this whole question should be referred to the standing committee on Mines and Minerals, and that they be empowered to investigate the matter and make a report to the House during the present session. We have in Canada supplies of coal that are very valuable in my judgment and I have given some study to the question. Making these supplies available to our people is, however, very largely a question of transportation, coupled with the ability of our mining and fuel experts in this country to disabuse the public mind in Canada of the prejudice which it entertains against the use of bituminous coal. I think that the question is of sufficient importance to warrant a considerable amount of time being given to it by this committee.

We are facing in Canada a condition which will become more and more acute from year to year, inasmuch as the supply of anthracite coal from the neighbouring states in the country to the south is becoming scarcer each year. Therefore it behooves this House to take some steps that will ensure a supply of fuel to our people, especially to those of the central provinces of the Dominion. One of the members of the government speaking on this question the other day stated that the matter was one for commercial houses to handle. I think the situation has now gone beyond that stage and, in view of the fact that it has become of national importance, requires different treatment. In my own community, in New Brunswick even within a few miles of bituminous coal mines there has been, at times, a great scarcity of coal, especially of anthracite coal, and the people, of necessity, have had to turn their attention to the use of bituminous coal for domestic purposes. The possibility of using this coal resolves itself into a question of transportation. But even with the present rates in force on the railways and although coal be made a low grade commodity in the rate classification of railways, it is not feasible commercially to ship Maritime province coal by rail beyond Montreal. Unless that condition is remedied, and the railways are willing to accept a smaller return than they do at present, I do not see much prospect of coal from either the Maritime provinces or Alberta ever reaching central Canada. It is true that shipments of coal are made by water from Cape Breton collieries. That, of course, is a benefit, and reduces the price but not very materially, especially in view of the fact that there is no control over the rates of the shipping companies. Aside from any small benefit derived in that way the people of the central provinces of Canada have not reaped the benefit they should have reaped from the presence of large deposits of fine grade bituminous coal in the Maritime provinces. For this reason, and for others with which I will not weary the House by reciting, I very cordially support the principle of the motion, and the concrete principle contained in the amendment moved by the hon. member for Cape Breton South and Richmond (Mr. Carroll).

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): I want to say a few words on this subject which is very important to the people of Ontario, and to the people of other provinces as well. One suggestion of a practical character I would make is, that there should be created in Canada, in connection with the government, a department of fuel and power which would give its main attention to the study of the production of power from our waterways and the procurement of fuel for our domestic and industrial needs. No outsider can imagine the hardship which the people of Toronto suffered owing to the lack of fuel last winter. I know something about it. I have seen the lines of people in front of the coal offices endeavouring to get coal, when many individuals offered as high as $20 a ton for coal but in vain. And yet we have immense beds of coal in our own country to supply all our needs, and there are new fields to be opened up. I hope that in the province of Ontario, northward in the direction of Hudson bay, some new fields will be opened up in the coming year; and there are other fields in the different parts of Canada where coal can be got. As a matter of fact, however, we have great fields of coal in Nova Scotia and Alberta where supplies can be obtained. The hon. member who preceded me went to the very heart of things when he explained the reason why this coal is not at present available for use. In connection with our transportation problem we must insist on a new freight classification on essential commodities like coal and grain, and some others. It is not feasible to carry fuel for long distances at present freights; and in the matter of wheat perhaps one of the main prospects of relief to the farmers in the West would be found in placing that commodity under a lower freight rate. And it is in measures of this kind that relief will come, but the relief will have to come from Parliament. The responsibility to take care of this question will be on the government. It will not do to trust the profiteers of the United States. We know that they will sell coal at a high price and make enormous profits. I am sure that as much as $6 a ton absolute profit has been made out of the anthracite supplied to the people of Ontario and of Montreal in connection with this coal famine. They will take any price they can get, and they are only like other business people in that respect. The government must intervene and must have a policy in regard to coal, and that policy must go so far as to request for instance the directors and the management of our National railway to consider the question of a new classification of freight rates, on the lines of a lower freight rate for basic commodities, like coal, ores, and articles of that kind. If we adopt that course we will get some relief. Canada should be independent of every country in the world in regard to fuel.

The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church) referred to water-powers. We should prohibit the export of water-powers when it comes to be a menace. The suggestion the hon. member made in reference to bounties is well worthy of consideration. If there is that immense export of our pulpwood which is absolutely necessary to the people of the United States they should perhaps pay an export duty on that. In that way we could get sufficient money to pay a bounty on the shipment of coal, or we might lower the freight rates and reclassify all these articles such as I have mentioned, especially coal and wheat. If we adopt that course and the government and parliament realize their responsibility, we will get relief in a short time, in regard to a matter which promises to be a menace and to cripple the interests of the country. If it had not been for Sir Adam Beck's hydro-electric policy in Ontario, I do not know where we would have been. There are four millions of horse power on the northern slope of the Hudson bay which could be utilized to electrify the National railway and other railways from Winnipeg to Quebec, and give enough power to work all the mines and probably save fuel in other ways.

I heard some of the details of the proposal to establish coke ovens using bituminous or soft coal. The cities of Montreal, Toronto and Winnipeg could very well afford to start immense coking plants there for the conversion of soft coal into coke, and the production of many other by-products, mainly gas, which may or will be used in five years in those cities for the production of heat. You can convert coal into coke and get an immense amount of gas, which can be distributed by pipes through a city. They have now a much better and simpler system for hot-water heating of houses by gas than by coal. All it requires is capital and science, and some kind of encouragement by the government, and our fuel problem will be solved. I hope some one on behalf of the government will tell the House that this question is to be considered, and that an effort will be made to remove a great public grievance at the present time.

Hon. D. D. McKENZIE (Solicitor General): This matter has been very ably discussed by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church), the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Carroll) and the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean). The question is not at all new to this House. It has been said to-day that it is of a national character, and it certainly is. While speaking for myself, I cannot say that I have not a more or less selfish interest in the matter, as I come from a province where they sell coal. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker I assure you that I am sufficiently broad and sufficient of a Canadian to have the widest possible national interest in this question, and without boasting in any way, I am sure my record in this House will show that for the last fifteen or twenty years I have always endeavoured to bring home to the Canadian people the necessity of being independent in regard to their fuel supply. It is impossible to accomplish that independence without using the fuel supply we have within our borders. It is only a question of bringing the fuel to the place where it is now most needed. It is a great satisfaction to be able to say that the quantity of coal which we possess both east and west is not a matter of speculation or doubt. There is in Nova Scotia to-day—and this is not mere miners' talk about prospective minerals—to be seen and handled enough coal to last for many generations yet to come and supply the whole country. Can you imagine a territory along the northern coast of the county of Inverness, from twenty-five to sixty miles along the coast, of a virgin solid block of coal not yet touched? This stretch of coal area for sixty miles has an average width of four miles, with seams 13 to 16 feet. one underlying the other. Those who are familiar with coal mining know that it is not only one seam of coal that is usually found in these places, but one underlying the other, and it is only a question of cutting through the upper one to get to the lower, or to all the seams that you may require. This coal area in Inverness is not regarded as the largest coal area. In Cape Breton there is the virgin territory of which I have spoken. There is an equally large coal area in the county of Cape Breton and other counties. So that we can speak with assurance of the quantity of coal we have in Nova Scotia. Our coal fields in Nova Scotia are not confined at all to Cape Breton. Coal fields exist in Pictou county and in Cumberland county as large as in Cape Breton. I am making these observations to encourage our friends in Ontario and Quebec, and to show them that we have the coal and that we have the proper facilities for the bringing of that coal to the place where it is required. Let me say that from a national standpoint we have not been treated quite properly by the people of Ontario, the people of Quebec, and of other parts of Canada, in relation to our exports during and after the war. Our miners in the county of Cape Breton and in the whole of the province of Nova Scotia, but particularly the county of Cape Breton, are sturdy, loyal, fighting men. As soon as war broke out, they were immediately ready or got ready, left their work, threw down their tools, and as quickly as possible they were found in the trenches in France and Flanders. We were all glad to see them go, but nevertheless the result was that we could not produce the coal. In our province, every man is not permitted to take up the pick and go and cut coal. He must pass an examination, like any other professional man; he must be permitted by license to cut coal, and for that reason, when our miners went to the front, we were crippled as regards producing the quantity of coal required. Moreover, the ships which we had for the conveyance of coal from ports of the island of Cape Breton to Montreal and other ports, were commandeered. In that way, our miners and our means of conveyance were taken away, and we could not meet the contracts which we undertook to fill. The result was that the Americans got our markets at Montreal, Toronto and every other place in which we had a market, and people when they start dealing in a certain direction, are not very ready to break off dealing in that direction when the old source of supply again becomes open to them. The difficulty was that after the war was over, we lost connection with the ports and places which I mentioned. It also took some time to get our ships back, and in that way we were largely crippled in our coal industry. I am glad that our capitalists, our miners and the men generally engaged in that business have fought with that difficulty and are back again pretty much to the condition in which they found themselves before the war. The reason why I mentioned that we were not treated fairly in that regard was that because our miners left their vocations and went overseas for the protection of Canada and the Canadian people, and the reason for which our ships were taken from us was also of a national character. Therefore, stock should have been taken of this situation by our friends, and as rapidly as possible we should have been restored to normal conditions as they existed before the war.

We have the coal east and west; the market for it is in the great centre of this country, and we must provide the means of utilizing the resources which we have for the benefit of our own people. As regards the places where this coal is produced, supposing, for instance, Nova Scotia could provide the major part of this coal which now comes from the United States. The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church) informed us that over $56,000,000 goes out of this country every year for the purchase of coal. Let us suppose that at least 75 per cent of that money could be expended in Nova Scotia. It is only a matter of calculation to show the number of men that could be employed, and the advantage that would come to our people through keeping this money in Canada and utilizing the resources of our province. This would be good, not only for the workingmen, but for Nova Scotia which derives a revenue from the sale and production of coal.

I am glad that this question is once more going to a committee. If I were not as well acquainted as I am with the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Carroll) and the mover of the motion, the hon. member for North Toronto, I would be disposed to think that they are sidestepping this question and shelving it for a while. But I am sure that such is not the case, and I trust that no time will be lost in the committee submitting to this House and to the government whatever practical decisions they may reach upon this subject.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Is there a committee on this subject now in existence?

Mr. McKENZIE: There is a standing committee, appointed not especially for this purpose, but for the purpose of dealing with mines and minerals, to which committee I understand it is the intention to submit this matter. I was just going to say, in conclusion, that two years ago we had what was known as the Fuel committee, or a committee for the investigation of the fuel resources of Canada. There was a very exhaustive and full investigation lasting over quite a number of weeks. A late member of this House, Dr. Steele, an excellent gentleman, who was very much in earnest about this question, was chairman of that committee. They made a report, and gave very useful information as to the quality of our coal; the means of transportation and so forth, received exhaustive attention before that committee. Let me inform the hon. member for North Toronto and the members of that committee that this report is in the form of a blue book, and that they will find in that book very useful information. I trust they will take advantage of it. I see that the Senate is at present taking an interest in this matter, and that it has a committee at work gathering information in connection with this very question. Let me suggest that there should be no overlapping in connection with this matter; that there should be no estrangement of any kind between the committee of the Senate and the proposed committee of the House of Commons. If possible at all, they should work and co-operate together, and let parliament and the country have the full fruition and benefit of what conclusions they may reach.

5 p.m.

We used to hear the expression that "somebody could not wait." It is an old expression in this House that "somebody could not wait," for the emergency was too strong for time to be lost; but I need not assert in my own way that the people of this country, both those who are producing and those who are in need of coal, cannot wait very much longer, for the time is at hand and fully mature for practical and active co-operation and the producing of satisfactory results in this country.

The hon. member for North Toronto hoped that some member of the government would speak on this question. I am speaking, not as a member of the government, but simply as the representative in this House of Cape Breton North and Victoria, one who has the good fortune of representing many sturdy, hale and hearty good miners and producers of coal. I have been representing them in this House for many years, and I am glad as such, not as a member of the government, to have this word to say on a question which, I think, is of vital importance to them as well as to the country generally.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the mover of this resolution (Mr. Church) for having brought before this House a question of such vital importance to the Dominion, I was inspired by the attitude of mind he expressed in approaching this subject. I was inspired by his great Canadianism and the fact that he hoped we would develop a Canadian policy, all-British, all-Canadian. With everything that he has said in that respect, I wish to associate myself. Also with what has been said by the hon. member for Cape Breton South and Richmond (Mr. Carroll) and the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie). The resolution as introduced appeared to generalise to a great extent, the nature of the subject would, of course, render that necessary. It was therefore with pleasure that I heard the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Carroll) introduce a concrete proposal that a committee go into this whole question. I think it is vital that this should be done. A mere platitudinous expression of opinion with regard to policy, will hardly get us very far; but I think if such a committee is appointed to consider all the various factors to be taken into consideration and report to this House we shall make decided progress.

I may be permitted, without, I hope, the stigma of sectionalism applying to my remarks, to present to this House, the point of view of the province of Alberta, just as the last speaker did that of his own province. In Alberta we have every known variety of coal from the anthracite of the Hoppe fields —fields that I hope will be preserved to Canada—to the lignite deposits in other parts of the province. In the Cadman field we have a variety of steam coal unequalled anywhere in the world. It has passed every test of the British navy, and we have a sufficient supply to coal every vessel on the Pacific ocean continuously.

Whether it is a westward or an eastward development of our coal resources, the question boils down after all to one of freight rates and storage facilities, and to a lesser extent to hampering impediments to the industry. To one of these impediments in particular I would call the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). Under the Fordney tariff a duty was placed on any class of coal from Canada that bears a duty if imported by us from the United States. Anthracite coal is admitted into Canada free of duty. There is therefore no retaliatory duty in this instance. Unfortunately the greater part of the coal mined in Alberta at the present time is a sub-bituminous variety and this, being on the N.O.P. list at the present time, is being charged a duty of 53 cents a ton going into the States. Now, our operators being enthusiastic and energetic business men have developed quite a coal market in the Dakotas, Minnesota, Idaho and Washington, and they could still further develop this market if this impediment were removed. I would therefore appeal to the Minister of Finance to take into consideration the requirements of the coal industry in my province when he brings in his budget. I have here a resolution from the Red Deer Valley Coal Operators Association which I will read to the House. It is as follows:

> Whereas the United States government has recently enacted tariff laws of such a nature as to impose a customs duty of fifty-three cents per ton on domestic coal from the Drumheller field, being exported to the United States.

I may say it applies to the whole province, not merely to Drumheller.

> And whereas the said United States tariff on coal is only made applicable to coal from countries imposing duty on coal from the United States such as Canada and
>
> Whereas the schedule of customs duties of the Canadian tariff, admits anthracite and coke when imported into Canada, free of duty, but imposes a duty of fifty three cents per ton on "Bituminous round and run of mine and coal not otherwise provided" and
>
> Whereas the coal from the Drumheller field is not anthracite or bituminous and cannot be classified under either head, but is classed by all governments and competent mining authority as "sub-bituminous" or lignite and therefore does not come under either of the specific classifications mentioned in the Canadian schedules, but is covered by the general clause "Coal not otherwise provided for" of item 588 and
> Whereas all coal imported into Canada from the United States is either anthracite or bituminous and little or none of such imported coal could be put in the sub-bituminous or lignite class with Drumheller, Edmonton or Lethbridge domestic coal, it follows that the duty levied by our government on this grade of coal under the general clause "Coal N.O.P." of item 588 in not productive of any revenue to our government and the placing of this grade of coal on the free list in Canada would not cost the government any loss of revenue, but would automatically operate to place our coal on the free list in the United States and admit coal exported by us to the United States markets without payment of duty and

Whereas the general market conditions in the states of North Dakota, Minnesota, Idaho and Washington, have recently developed opportunity to secure outlet for our excess production and the production from Lethbridge and Edmonton which is now being marketed in the above named territory in growing quantity and

Whereas the railways serving the coal fields named are now ready, willing and able to furnish cars for transportation to this territory in greater quantity than they have ever been able to do in the past and are now soliciting this export business as a means of augmenting their own earnings.

Therefore be it resolved by the Red Deer Valley Coal Operators Association, of Drumheller, Rosedale and Wayne, Alberta, in session this 9th day of January 1923—

And, I may add, by the Edmonton Board of Trade and other influential bodies.

—that we petition the government of Canada, to amend the schedule of the customs tariff of Canada, items 586 and 588 of schedule "A" group "2", by striking from item 588 the words "and coal N.O.P." and by inserting the same in item 586 along with anthracite coal and coke, so as to put coal of the class of Alberta domestic coal on the free list in Canada.

I trust the Minister of Finance will take that question into consideration, for it is of vital importance to us out there now, and it will continue to be of vital importance even after we have developed the entire Ontario market for coal.

I was surprised a little while ago to observe that apparently some hon. members are under the impression that Alberta coal cannot be economically placed on the Ontario market. It is my opinion that with a very slight reduction in the freight rates on coal we could supply the entire demands of Ontario with Alberta coal. And not only would the lower freight rate not reduce the revenue of the railroads in my opinion, it would probably increase them. During the months of April, May, June and July, traffic from the West is practically at a standstill, but of course there is a continuous westbound movement of supplies. During those months why could we not have a reduced rate, say 32½ cents per hundred pounds, that would enable our Alberta coal to be laid down in Ontario in unlimited quantities? At the present time the mines there are operating only at half time. Such a reduction of the freight rate would enable our coal to be laid down in Ontario at about $11 per ton. This is a sub-bituminous coal of excellent quality that would compete with the anthracite coal of the States and be very satisfactory to the people of Ontario.

I do not need to go into this question very much further now because I hope the proposed committee will be instructed to consider the matter in detail. But touching the question of transportation again, I would call the attention of the House to a resolution passed by the Red Deer Valley Coal Operators Association in reference to the fixing of the freight rate to enable Alberta coal to be sold in Ontario at competitive prices. The resolution reads:

Whereas there is a great shortage of coal in Ontario and Canada is paying millions of dollars for American coal, and

Whereas the province of Alberta is in a position to supply any quantity of coal suitable for both domestic and power purposes as shown by its success in supplying the market as far east as the Great Lakes, and

Whereas the mines in Alberta are only running part time on account of insufficient trade;

Be it resolved that this association make representations immediately to the Dominion government to secure a freight rate that will enable Alberta coal to be sold in Ontario at competitive prices.

When the proposed committee is appointed I hope it will be empowered to consider the feasibility of the appointment of a permanent fuel commission—a commission to sit continuously and be ever watchful of the fuel interests of Canada. We require such a commission I believe to deal effectively with our fuel needs. The question has too many ramifications; it lends itself too easily to the influence of monopolies, combines, and so on; and to protect the people I think it would be essential to have a federal commission. If the powers of the committee are to be broadened to that extent I suggest that it should consist, we will say, of a mining engineer, one of the best you can get in the whole Dominion—indeed, if you cannot get a good one there, go where you can get the best; a freight expert, a business executive, a representative of the miners, and a representative of the operators. That commission would not be a very large body; it could sit continuously and guide the destinies of Canada so far as coal matters are concerned—and that, surely, is an important consideration.

One more word on the freight rates question: I took the matter up some time ago with the province of Alberta. Mr. A. Chard, supervisor of freight and traffic for the provincial government, states:

If a $6 a ton rate on train load lots could be provided from mining centres in Alberta to Toronto, this coal could enter competition successfully with the American product. The present rate is $12.70 a ton, which makes the price of the product in Ontario prohibitive. American bituminous, a coal very inferior in quality to Alberta coal, is selling in Toronto at $7 a ton. Anthracite is selling at $18 a ton. If Alberta coal could be put on the market at Toronto at $13 a ton, it could compete successfully.

I believe that could be done by putting into effect a rate of 32½ cents per 100 pounds.

I do not wish to delay the House any further in this matter, especially as I hope that the amendment offered by the member for Cape Breton South will be adopted. I hope we shall have an opportunity of going into this whole question in great detail and that as a result of the investigation carried on by the standing committee, a satisfactory solution of this national problem will be arrived at.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, I represent a constituency which for over fifty years has produced large quantities of coal. By a strange dispensation of Providence the coal supplies of Canada are situated at the extreme east, at the base of the Rocky Mountains, and in British Columbia. When in the past it had been urged that a duty should be imposed to enable coal from the east to come to central Canada, the two great central provinces took the ground that that should not be done, and seemed to be anxious to trade with our friends in the United States. I am very glad indeed that the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church), in his resolution, indicates that he is in favour of a new national policy, one which will mean that the people of central Canada will purchase the coal they require from Canadians.

The figures show that in the year 1920-21 there were imported into Canada 15,902,632 tons of bituminous coal and 4,912,964 tons of anthracite. These importations were almost entirely into the two central provinces, central Ontario importing approximately 10,000,000 tons and Quebec nearly 4,000,000 tons, the balance largely going to the head of the lakes. This means that the Canadian people have annually sent to the United States about $100,000,000 of good Canadian money that ought to have remained within our own borders and would remain if the fuel supply of the central part of the country could be obtained from our own eastern and western districts. Last year, for the first time in years, nearly 850,000 tons of coal were purchased by Canada in Great Britain. It was possible to get this coal owing to the fact that shipping rates were lower than they had been for years and return grain cargoes were available from Montreal. But the rates laid down by those in charge of the Canadian National Railways have been prohibitive so far as internal trade in Canada is concerned. The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) has stated the rates that have been charged from the west, and the same conditions apply in respect to our eastern coal. In the summer months we are able to ship by water from our mines which are on the seaboard to Montreal; last year we shipped in this way over 2,000,000 tons of coal, a portion of which, for the first time in years, went to Toronto. But during the other portions of the year we are entirely dependent upon the railway for the shipment of our coal to other parts of Canada. The management of the Canadian National Railways have in the last four years increased the rates upon coal by practically 300 per cent, and it does seem to me that this is a matter that will require the closest examination by the committee which I trust will act as a result of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Carroll). These enormous increases—and I assume the same condition prevails in the west—have made it impossible for us to promote interprovincial trade. It cannot by any process of reasoning be urged that such action will make for the prosperity of the railway, or will achieve what the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) used to tell us was the aim and object of the Canadian National Railway system. I find, for instance, that in 1921-22 the Board of Directors of the Canadian National Railways purchased, for the purpose of the operations of the railways, over $12,000,000 worth of coal, of which $9,000,000 was bought in the United States. In other words, at the time the road was under the direction of Mr. Hanna, $9,000,000 went to the United States for coal, while in my province the miners were walking the streets, unable to get employment of any kind. Now the situation has changed; our friends in central Canada are animated by the proper idea. They ought to be able to get coal either from the east or from the west to take the place of this tremendous importation of 20,000,000 tons that was made last year and that is made practically every year. Public sentiment, I say, is changing in respect to this matter. I notice a very marked change in the attitude of hon. members of this House. I am quite sure that the committee on Mines and Minerals, to which the matter will go, ought to be able to inquire into all the facts, to point out where the difficulties are and where a remedy ought to be applied, so that we may have, as suggested by the hon. member for North Toronto, a national policy under which the coal producers of Canada may supply this material to those of our own citizens who desire it.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I just wish to remind the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) that the argument adduced by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) as regards the duty on lignite coal in Alberta also obtains in respect to British Columbia as regards bituminous coal. So far as I know, practically no bituminous coal is imported into British Columbia from the United States. But the fact that there is a duty of 53 cents a ton on bituminous coal allows the United States, under the terms of its fiscal policy—indeed, compels them—to impose a duty of 53 cents a ton on our bituminous coal mined on Vancouver Island, which would otherwise find a market in the western states through Seattle and San Francisco. The result is that without any apparent advantage in the way of revenue to Canada we are seriously handicapping the operations of our mines on Vancouver Island, which are already seriously handicapped by the competition of fuel oil. I am sure that the member for the Nanaimo district (Mr. Dickie) would, if he were here, endorse my attitude on this very important question.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I did intend to go into the question of fuel supply at a little length, but now that it seems to be the unanimous wish of the House that the matter be referred to a committee, I am quite satisfied to let the committee go into the details.

I want to direct the attention of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) to this point: He asks the government to assist in developing a market in the United States for Alberta coal. But that cannot very consistently be done without our saying on the other hand that we do not care to trade with the United States in other parts of Canada in the matter of coal. We have to be consistent, or we shall not get very far in the matter of our fuel supply.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Does the minister mean that anthracite is not admitted to this country, as it is into the United States, free?

Mr. GRAHAM: That is not what I was saying. We want to be consistent. We will do everything in our power to make the country self-sustaining in the matter of fuel, but we must be careful about passing resolutions under which we shall direct our efforts against the sale of coal to us by the United States, and at the same time endeavour to sell coal to them. It may not amount to much, but we have to be consistent as a parliament in working out these problems.

As to the question of rates, there are two ways by which railway rates can be brought down. One is by lessening the cost of operation, and I see no great prospect of any considerable reduction of the cost of operation for some years. The cost of operating railways will never be what it was before the war. The men who are engaged in this operation will never again accept the rate of wages that they accepted in pre-war times, and it would be unreasonable to expect them to do so. The other way to bring about a reduction of rates is to have more produce for the railways to carry—in other words, to increase traffic. And how are we to increase traffic? By having more people in Canada. We cannot one day say, "Do not bring immigrants into this country," and the next day say, "We want the freight rates or the passenger rates reduced." In the United States with the same territory they have 110,000,000 people; we have 9,000,000 people. Their density of population to railway mileage is very much greater than ours. The only possible way, to my mind, by which freight rates can be reduced is by having greater traffic for the railways, and that greater traffic can only be secured by having more people to carry on production in this country. If Canada cannot support more than 9,000,000 of people, then the Creator made a mistake in flinging it across so vast a territory—and I believe in the Creator. This country can support at least 50,000,000 people and our object—this is only by the way—should be to go about this settlement of many of our difficulties, including the railway problem, in the fundamental way, and that is by producing more traffic for the railways, and to do that you must have more people in this country to produce it.

What I rose particularly to do was to call the attention of the House to the work that has been done during the past season by our own Fuel Committee. In July last the United States government appointed such a committee, and a little later they appointed what they called a Fuel Distributor. In July last the government of Canada appointed an Advisory Fuel Committee, composed of Mr. Magrath, the late Mr. Kennedy, Mr. McCourt, and Major Bell. These gentlemen have not used many billboards in advertising, but they have done a great deal of work just the same for the benefit of the people of Canada. Each day during several weeks this committee was in touch with dealers in Welsh coal, finding out the quantities on hand, the quantities that could be shipped, and the prices that might be expected to be paid. Some people have asserted that there is not real anthracite coal in Wales. I must differ from that view, because in a test some Welsh coal that was brought to Canada this winter proved to be in every particular a little superior to the Pennsylvania coal.

Mr. COOTE: Does the minister know whether that particular brand of Welsh coal was brought to Ottawa or not?

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not know whether it reached Ottawa or not, but some of it was brought to Canada.

In addition to their work in connection with Welsh coal, the Advisory Fuel Committee was in constant touch with the Fuel Distributor at Washington as well as with a similar body in Pennsylvania. Some person has said that the state of Pennsylvania passed a law prohibiting the export of coal, which law had been upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States. I am not a lawyer, but I cannot quite grasp how the state of Pennsylvania would have the right to pass a law prohibiting the export of coal. They might pass a law in reference to mining leases, which leases might contain a clause in effect against export unless certain conditions were complied with, but my own view is that no state could pass a law prohibiting export, that that would rest with the federal authorities at Washington, just as it rests with the federal power at Ottawa in this country.

Our Advisory Fuel Committee met several times with the Pennsylvania body having the same work in hand. Their task was not an easy one because there was in the United States as every person knows a feeling among a class of the people that coal should not be exported to Canada during the time there was a scarcity; but this same scarcity applied to the New England states as much as it did to Canada, and at a meeting held at Washington in the autumn, I think it was, it was arranged that Canada was to have about sixty per cent of her regular quota of coal. Later it was thought that that amount should be reduced to fifty per cent in order to encourage the people to use substitutes for coal, but as a matter of fact by the end of this month, March 31, it would appear that Canada will have received sixty-three per cent of her usual quota of hard coal. I am speaking altogether of anthracite.

It will be remembered that the Interstate Commerce Commission had an investigation at which Mr. Magrath appeared, and that about December 16 an order was passed restricting the export of coal to Canada until such time as relief would be had in the New England states. But feeling ran strong among some classes, and I want to call the attention of the House to a bill that was introduced at Washington on February the 17th. It reads as follows:

A Bill

Authorizing the President to declare an embargo on coal.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That whenever the President shall find that the public interest so requires he is hereby authorized to declare an embargo on the exportation of coal from the United States to foreign countries; such embargo may include either anthracite or bituminous coal or both and may be complete or partial: Provided, however, that without further authority of the Congress no such embargo shall continue in operation for a period of more than six months at any one time.

It is needless to say that that bill did not become law. I now wish to read some of the evidence given by Mr. Bermingham, President of the Delaware, Lackawanna, and Western Railway,—who appeared before the Interstate Commerce Commission just as Mr. Magrath did—in order to show that all the people in the United States are not of the same mind as the gentleman who introduced that bill into the House of Representatives. Here are the answers given by Mr. Bermingham to questions put to him:

Q. Mr. Bermingham, have you any information as to whether, assuming there was an embargo against any further shipments of coal by your company in Canada, you would have any difficulty in sending that into New England, over lines leading into New England instead of sending it to Canada? The question is, do you think you have enough information on that to answer the question?

A. I think, as a matter of record, I would refuse to ship any coal any place, if any such purpose as that was put over, after the record that I have made in the 32 years I have been in this game. I tried to ship coal to New England last year. Why did I close down the mines? Why did we only produce 400,000 tons in December instead of 750,000 tons? Why did I carry $11,000,000 worth of coal on hand? New England didnt come to me with any open arms for coal.

Q. You are not prepared to speak as to any operating difficulty; any traffic congestion that you might encounter if you tried to divert your Canadian allotment to points in New England?

A. I don't quite catch what you mean by diverting my Canadian allotments, when I shipped over 1,000,000 tons and have only shipped 300,000 tons below my allotment. I hope I am going to play just as fair with everyone in the United States as I do with the people in Canada, and also the fellow in Canada. His money has been good all these years, and I needed his line of business there. These sizes of coal—I had barley coal there that nobody would take six weeks ago, and I shipped some of it to Canada, and was awfully glad to get the order.

I could read more along the same line, but I am merely trying to point out that the American coal operator is very happy because he has had a good market and that, outside of a few legislators and some mayors of cities, the United States coal operators, as well as the transportation men over there, were glad and anxious, so far as possible, to give Canada the amount of coal to which she was entitled in other years. A good deal of this happy feeling, I may say, was due to the work of the Advisory Fuel Committee that I have named.

Now, just one more word as to the question of freight rates. I forgot, however, to mention this: My hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Church) said there were a lot of empty cars going west. Well, that is the trouble with the situation. We have so few people, comparatively speaking, occupying such a vast expanse of territory that when you bring a car of coal east that car has to go back empty instead of returning full of goods. It can readily be seen that the longer the freight car has to be hauled the more difficult it is to get a cheap freight rate; because, unless the railway is to go behind more and more, and eventually go into bankruptcy, it must obtain the cost price of operation at least, and that cost price is the cost, as figured out, of hauling a ton of coal from one point to another point; it is the cost price in a great many cases of hauling a ton of coal from point to point, and hauling the empty car back again. A numerous and well distributed population would remedy this to a large extent.

Mr. SHAW: Does the hon. gentleman give it as his opinion that the people of Alberta, for example, cannot reasonably expect a train load of coal to be hauled from that province to central Canada at a rate that will permit Alberta coal to compete with coal from the United States?

Mr. GRAHAM: I would not like to be put into the position of saying that; but the people of Canada cannot continue to pay the price for coal which they have been paying for the last three or four years. At the present time it might be possible to do that; but when coal gets back to its normal price again, or nearly so, unless some means has been found of reducing freight rates in one way or the other it will be a difficult matter for coal hauled from a point 1,800 miles away to compete with coal hauled from a point 500 miles or even 800 miles away, that is the situation. It is a matter of economics and freight rates. Everything else being equal, coal can be hauled from mines only 500 miles away and brought to your door more cheaply than coal hauled from a point 1,800 miles away. However, I want to say this: I am in favour of the National Railways, as far as I can control the system, doing everything possible to help to assist in developing the coal areas both east and west in the Dominion. We have coal deposits in the East and we have coal deposits in the West. The coal in the East, in recent years, with few exceptions, only came as far as Montreal; on one occasion it did come as far as Brockville. The steamship haul from the Cape Breton mines is comparatively cheap; it may be utilized also for coal from other mines. Nova Scotia coal is brought to Montreal, I think, by that route at the rate of 85 cents to $1.10 per ton and thus, so far as freight rates are concerned, comes within reasonable distance of the consumer.

But one of the difficulties of the whole situation is that in the summer months when we could haul the coal cheaply there is not —there has not been in past years at any rate—a demand for it.

There would be a prospect of a reduction in coal rates, particularly in trainloads, if the hauling could be done in the months in which there is not a very great traffic in other products. But the trouble with freight originating in the West is that it is nearly all eastward. Perhaps I should not put it that way, but the major portion of the traffic is east bound, so that when we bring coal east we add to the traffic without having any return traffic to carry back. Notwithstanding these difficulties I believe something can be gained by referring this matter to a committee for investigation. We have no coal in central Canada but I am not despondent. I believe that anthracite coal will yet be found in the province of Ontario. At any rate we have coal in the East and coal in the West and the time has come when we ought to take active measures without spending too much time upon rediscussion of theoretical ideas, to ascertain if there is a possibility of getting the unity of action between the East and the West to the end that may become self contained in case of needs. That cannot be done in a day or in a year; but as scientific processes are improved and developed there must be some way by which if we cannot use the soft coal itself we can use the products of that coal. Some person has compared bituminous coal to hard coal. There are, of course, different grades of bituminous coal, but a first class bituminous coal, properly fired, will dispense as much heat as a ton of anthracite. At any rate that is my opinion. That being the case we ought to be able in this Dominion to devise a means of transportation and so improve our processes of handling and of development, to make use of our bituminous coal to the best advantage. Because the time may come in future when it may be imperative for us to use our own coal for domestic and industrial purposes.

I believe the Canadian National Railway, and in fact the Canadian Pacific and all the railways, will find it to their advantage to develop Canada first, not as against other countries, but to develop Canada first, and one of the things that will assist in doing that will be the intensive development of our coal areas for our own consumption. I would not be in favour of doing anything that would imply our saying to the United States "We do not want to deal with you in coal because Alberta wants to sell her coal in the United States", and rightly so as the haul is short and the demand likely to increase. But while being on terms with our neighbours across the border, it is a sign of true friendship and an evidence of hope for a strong nationality, that we should, so far as possible, use our own materials for the benefit of our own people, and I believe the Canadian National Railway will be found ready to do all it possibly can to bring that about.

Mr. WILLIAM A. BOYS (South Simcoe): I am in absolute accord with the purpose of the resolution, and believe that it raises one of the most vitally important questions for the people of Canada, and particularly the people of Ontario. I am also in accord with the suggestion contained in the amendment moved by the hon. member for Cape Breton South and Richmond (Mr. Carroll), but it seems to me that the two propositions are contradictory. The amendment proposes to add the following:

> And that the whole question of fuel supply for Canada, together with the question of costs, transportation, desirable interprovincial action and other means whereby Canada may be self-sustaining and self-supplying as regards fuel and to inquire into the necessity and possibility of supplying substitutes for coal be referred to the standing committee on Mines and Minerals and that said committee report to the House.

It will be borne in mind that the member proposes to add this paragraph to the resolution of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church). The latter part of the resolution proposed by the hon. member for North Toronto reads:

> That further in the opinion of this House, the government should immediately consider the initiation of an all British and Canadian coal supply and that such a policy is both a social and economic necessity and in the best interests of the future of Canada.

Suppose the amendment carried and these words were added to the motion, it seems to me you would have a double-barrelled proposition. You have in the resolution a reference to the government of Canada and in the amendment you have the very opposite—a reference to the standing committees of this House—and unless there is a recasting of either the amendment or the resolution, the one is inconsistent with the other and would be out of order. It is highly probable that this debate will continue till six o'clock and the hon. members interested might get together. I do not rise to place any impediment in the way of either the passage of the resolution or the appointment of a committee. So far as I am personally concerned, I believe it would be better that this matter should go to a committee, where witnesses could be called and the whole matter could be thoroughly investigated, but as the matter stands, I cannot come to any conclusion but the one I have mentioned, namely that the amendment is inconsistent with the motion.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Argenteuil, Minister of the Interior): I am very glad that this matter is to be referred to a committee, notwithstanding the objections raised by the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Boys), who however, has expressed the hope that some way will be found by which this course can be taken. It has been represented in western Canada that in my previous utterances in this House I have said that it was impossible to bring western coal to Ontario. Nothing is impossible, Mr. Speaker. Having in mind the statement made by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church) that during this winter strong efforts were being made to capture the market at Winnipeg for western coal, I might point out to my hon. friend that during the years of 1917, 1918, 1919 the Alberta government kept representatives in Winnipeg to make an attempt to capture that market against the product of the United States. One of the great difficulties we had to contend with was transportation. Another difficulty was that the cars carrying wheat eastward to Fort William and the ships carrying grain to Buffalo and lake Erie ports brought back coal and this naturally gave a very low freight rate to the actual products coming from the United States billed to western Canada. We had a great deal of difficulty with the rate of $4.25 per ton from the Alberta coal fields, to meet the strong competition upon these occasions. I am glad to say that has been abolished and Alberta coal is firmly established as far east as Winnipeg, and not only established, but giving entire satisfaction in a field where formerly it was looked upon with suspicion. As the hon. member for North Toronto has referred to this question, I may say that after looking up the reports from Alberta I find that there are 370 mines in that province, which are sufficient to supply the whole of Canada, let alone Ontario. So far as western coal is concerned, it would not be necessary to build another mile of railway, or to open another mine so far as production is concerned, to meet all the requirements to satisfy this market. Then it comes down to a question of rates in its entirety. Therefore, I am glad that, for the purpose of disseminating information this matter may go before a committee, that you may call the rate experts and the officials of the Department of Mines who have made an attempt to study this matter, hear what they have to communicate and give that information to the public. We as westerners will be delighted to send the coal, which is our great natural product, from the province of Alberta as far east in Canada as possible and to sell it in competition with coal from any other portion of the world. I have been intensely interested in the scheme for bringing coal from Nova Scotia principally by water during the summer months as far west as possible. That is a matter to which we are giving a great deal of attention in the Department of Mines at the present moment, and we hope that by the coking process great results will be obtained, because already we have large interests who are prepared to back this project relying on the success of the work which has been done in this line in Minneapolis and other places in the United States. We hope to serve the market with coke where there is a possibility of the consumption of the by-products, thereby cheapening the cost to the consumer.

I want to add to what the Minister of Defence (Mr. Graham) has said with respect to the Fuel Board. These men have given their services freely and have met a difficult situation. By their tact and consideration they were able to overcome what at times promised to develop into rather a serious situation in Ontario and Quebec, and they did this without remuneration.

My department is one of investigation rather than one dealing with the situation as it exists at the moment, but we had hoped to assist in a very material way in solving the problem, in so far as it is possible so to do with regard to the Canadian people, with the products of their own mines.

Mr. EULER: Is there any real anthracite coal in Alberta?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I do not know. If you put it on a comparative basis with the anthracite of Pennsylvania, the answer would be, yes. But undoubtedly, we have a very high grade of semi-anthracite coal in Alberta, west of High River, in the foot hills and in the area known as the Hoppe leases on the Smoky river in northern Alberta.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. D. W. WARNER (Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to discuss this problem at any length, but I wish to support the first part of the resolution and the amendment. I should like this problem to be referred to the select standing committee on Mines and Minerals to gather information on the subject and lay it before the House. In fact, there may be available to the committee all the information that is needed.

I do not think we should do anything that would make the cost of coal higher to the consumer in the long run; on the contrary, our efforts should be directed not only to securing an adequate supply of fuel from our own mines but at no higher, and if possible at a cheaper, rate than we are now paying for American coal. Therefore it is important that we should have an investigation of this problem in order to ascertain what we can do for the advantage both of the consumers of coal and of those who have it to sell in Canada.

Several hon. members have referred to the necessity of having a back haul for the cars bringing coal from our mines. I grant that it is desirable to have just as much return traffic as possible, but I have wondered in this connection how much we have benefited in the case of cars sent back to the coal mines in the States. That would be something for the committee to investigate. It seems to me that when those cars reach the boundary line and are taken over by the United States railways our benefit ceases. Consequently it apapears to me that it would be worth considering that our coal miners would not only be advantaged by the fuel needs of the central portion of the Dominion being supplied by our western and eastern mines, but this traffic would also enure to the advantage of our National Railways. That is another factor that the committee might investigate for our information.

We need all varieties of coal. In Alberta good lignite, bituminous, and steam coal is being mined. Each of these varieties is required for domestic and industrial purposes, and it should be our purpose to make it economically possible to bring this coal to meet the domestic demand at the maximum distance from the source of supply.

I understand that a new railroad is being asked for running from Grand Prairie to connect west of Edmonton with the main line of our National railway to the coast. That road would enable us to tap extensive anthracite deposits in northern Alberta. There is a great quantity of anthracite within fifteen or twenty miles of that projected road, which, I believe, will be built in the near future. If that is the case, anthracite coal will be mined there before very long, and we shall be able to send quantities of it to Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. If we can send it to Ontario to compete with coal coming in from the United States, we want to see that done. An analysis of that coal shows that it is practically as good as Pennsylvania anthracite.

I mentioned in this House some time ago in discussing the Hudson bay project that we were sending out of our country $60,000,000 annually for coal. If that be true, and I believe it is, to save only half of that by using our own coal would be a good thing for Canada. I want to see Canadian coal used in preference to coal from any other country. The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church) asks that we have an all-British supply, but I do not know that we can do that. I do not know that it is feasible or possible to bring coal from the Old Country entirely to take the place of the United States coal. We shall want to send a considerable amount of coal from Alberta to the United States, and I understand that considerable quantities are going into that country from British Columbia. I do not know that I would go so far as to say that I would favour bringing British coal in instead of the United States coal, in view of the conditions, but I do want to emphasize the importance of our using Canadian coal wherever it can be used to advantage. I support the amendment. I want to see this matter inquired into by the Mines and Minerals committee so that we may know what is best to do in the interests of Canada as a whole.

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention to occupy the time of the House at great length; I simply wish to make a few observations on this coal question before the resolution comes to a vote. I was afraid for a moment that the hon. Minister of Defence (Mr. Graham) was going to branch into the immigration question, but fortunately we got back to coal before very long. I quite agree with him, as I think all from the West do, that this country is capable of supporting a population of 50,000,000 people. But, Sir, there will have to be some economic readjustment and perhaps some changes in our fiscal system before that condition can be attained. An increase in the traffic does not necessarily mean a reduction in the overhead charges of our railways. An increase in the amount of grain handled on the western prairies might not mean a decrease in operating costs, because the railways are taxed to their utmost during the grain handling season. But one way, I should think, of reducing the cost of handling goods on the railway would be to have something to handle during the seasons in which ordinarily, most of the equipment and a great many of the men are idle. Mr. Hanna, former president of the Canadian National Railway Board, giving evidence before the freight rates committee here last summer, pointed out that grain was the most profitable commodity that the railway handled, and that the ideal situation for the railways would be to have a sufficiently large quantity of grain to handle all the year round. Grain is handled to-day much more cheaply than many other commodities; it is the long haul in large quantities, solid trains of grain, with very little switching between divisional points—that makes for minimum cost of transport. It seems to me that on the same basis coal could be shipped from Alberta to eastern Canada, but it would have to be done in the season when the railway equipment was otherwise more or less idle.

The Minister of Defence pointed out that coal was not needed during the summer season. That is something like the Irishman who had a leaky roof and was asked why he did not repair it. He replied that when it was raining he could not fix it, and when it was not raining it did not need to be fixed.

Mr. GRAHAM: Do I understand the hon. member to quote me as saying that we did not need coal in the summer?

Mr. CAMPBELL: Perhaps the hon. minister misunderstood me—that it would not be needed so far as the railways were concerned.

Mr. GRAHAM: I did not say that.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I am sorry I misunderstood the minister.

Mr. GRAHAM: I said the experience was that the western people themselves did not order their coal in the summer.

Mr. CAMPBELL: That is what I meant; perhaps I did not express it quite clearly—that so far as the railways were concerned the coal was not available to be handled. It seems to me that the only way to bring that about would be to have lower rates in the summer season. If the householders in the East found they could save four or five dollars a ton on their coal by buying it in the summer, undoubtedly they would put in a stock of coal during that season. The rate on coal from Drumheller to points in Ontario is 63½ cents per hundred pounds, or $12.70 a ton. Taking the rates on grain from the western prairies on the same basis, it would figure out about $9 a ton. We can assume that if the railway can handle grain in large quantities at $9 a ton over that mileage, they could handle coal at the same price; and the longer the mileage, the cheaper it could be handled. In the summer season, with the more favourable conditions of transportation then prevailing, I believe, Sir, that the coal could be handled at the rate of $6 a ton. In Alberta the coal is put on the car for about $4 a ton, and they have facilities for handling a great deal more coal than they have orders for. If the output is increased the cost of the coal on the cars will be greatly reduced. I believe that is one of the solutions of the difficulty to-day. If we can keep our railways occupied in the summer; if we can get something that will be the equivalent of grain—taking Mr. Hanna's word for it—the railways could be busy all year round and engaged in a profitable business. I suggest that the rates should be increased in the fall when the cold weather comes on; the railways would be kept sufficiently busy during the summer in transporting coal both ways between Alberta and Nova Scotia. That would very largely reduce overhead costs, because no extra equipment and no extra men would be needed.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I just wish to refer the mover of the resolution to a point that was made by the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Boys) this afternoon, who mentioned that the motion as it stands with the amendment proposed, is somewhat contradictory, the first part of the motion having special reference to the government, and the second part referring more particularly to a reference to a committee. If my hon. friend who moved the resolution is agreeable to dropping the second part of it, that will remove the conflict that has been pointed out. The motion would then stop at the word "supply" at the end of the first sentence.

Mr. CHURCH: That is quite satisfactory.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion as amended will then read:

That, in the opinion of this House, the time has arrived for Canada to have a national policy in relation to its coal supply and that no part of Canada should be left dependent on a United States coal supply, and that the whole question of fuel supply for Canada together with the question of costs, transportation, desirable inter-provincial action and other means whereby Canada may be self-sustaining and self-supplying as regards fuel, and to inquire into the necessity and possibility of supplying substitutes for coal be referred to the standing committee on Mines and Minerals and that the said committee report to the House.

Motion as amended agreed to.

EQUALIZATION OF RAILWAY RATES

MOTION OF MR. CLARK STANDS FOR MR. SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. J. A. CLARK (Burrard) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, railway rates westward from the prairie provinces should be reduced to an equality with railway rates eastward from said provinces for similar goods and distances.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before the hon. gentleman proceeds with his motion, I am informed that the question which is involved in it is presently sub judice and a question being sub judice must not be discussed in this House. The practice is well known. You will find in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, under rule 19:

Besides the prohibitions contained in this rule, it has been sanctioned by usage both in England and in Canada, that a member, while speaking, must not:
(c) refer to any matter on which a judicial decision is pending.

But in order to do justice to the question, if the hon. gentleman would agree to suspend the presentation of this resolution at the present moment, I would like to refer to the Railway Act to see whether or not an appeal from the Railway Commission to the Privy Council would be considered sub judice. If it was an appeal to the Supreme Court, then there would be no hesitation on my part in saying that the question was sub judice, but the appeal, I am told, is from the Railway Commission to the Privy Council, that is to say, to the government. I have not the Railway Act under my hand at the moment and have not had time to study the question. It is rather a fine point, and if the hon. gentleman would kindly suspend the discussion of his motion for the time being, I will take the opportunity to look up the Railway Act and be in a position to give a ruling later on. Meanwhile I would like to invite the opinion of the Acting Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) and that of the ex-Chairman of the Railway Commission (Sir Henry Drayton), as I would be largely guided by the opinion of hon. gentlemen who are absolutely au fait with the powers of the Railway Commission. Just at the present moment I am not ready to give a decision and I would not like a debate to start which would be irregular and contrary to the rules and practice of the House.

Mr. CLARK: If this motion might hold its place and be called in this order, if it is found on consideration to be in order, I would be very pleased to have it stand under those conditions, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not wish to prevent the hon. gentleman from bringing the question before the House, but I want to be quite sure that the motion will be brought regularly before it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As to the hon. member's request, the government will be only too happy to comply with anything that will help to serve the purpose he has in view, and to meet your wishes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CLARK: And keep its order?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Motion stands.

TITLES, HONOURS AND DECORATIONS

MOTION BY MR. LADNER TO DEFINE INTENT OF ADDRESS TO HIS MAJESTY

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South) moved:

Whereas a certain address respecting titles, honours and decorations was on motion of this House (May 22nd, 1919) forwarded to His Excellency the Governor General praying him to transmit the same to His Majesty the King.

And whereas it is expedient to define more clearly the intent and effect of said address in certain respects.

It is therefore the opinion of this House that an address should be presented to His Most Excellent Majesty the King, in the following words:—

To the King's Most Excellent Majesty

Most Gracious Sovereign:

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the House of Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled, humbly approach Your Majesty, praying that Your Majesty may be graciously pleased to accept the request of this House that the effect of the said address shall not henceforth preclude the granting by Your Majesty, or by any foreign ruler or government, of decorations (save those carrying titles) for distinguished service or high attainments in education, literature, art and science.

This House is also of the opinion that appropriate action be taken by legislation or otherwise to correct the last paragraph of the report of the committee on titles, honours, and decorations made to this House 14th May, 1919, and adopted 22nd May, 1919, so that the said paragraph shall not henceforth preclude the granting by any foreign ruler or government of decorations (save those carrying titles) for distinguished service or high attainments in education, literature, art and science.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in 1919 a committee was appointed by this honourable House to consider the question of titles, honours and decorations. On the 14th of May of that year that committee brought in a report dealing with the question which in substance recommended the conferring of no more titles or titular distinctions on British subjects ordinarily resident in Canada, and the extinction of hereditary titles of honour or titular distinctions. In order that the House may be accurately apprised of the wording of that recommendation, and in order that they may understand the purpose of this resolution, I propose to read the two paragraphs which deal substantially with the problem of that day. In the petition referred to it was recommended that an address be presented to His Majesty the King praying that His Majesty might be graciously pleased:

(a) to refrain hereafter from conferring any title of honour or titular distinction upon any of your subjects domiciled or ordinarily resident in Canada, save such appellations as are of a professional or vocational character or which appertain to an office.

The other important portion of the petition is contained in paragraph (b) which it is unnecessary for me to read but which practically disposes of the granting of hereditary titles in the future. Then at the end of this report is a recommendation that is responsible for the resolution I am bringing in this evening. That recommendation is thus worded:

Your committee further recommends that appropriate action be taken by legislation or otherwise to provide that hereafter no person domiciled or ordinarily resident in Canada shall accept, enjoy or use any title of honour or titular distinction hereafter conferred by a foreign ruler or government.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it was never intended that the wording of that resolution should go to the extent of precluding the granting of such decorations without titles as would be given to a student or, let us say, to a scholar of high attainments in science, literature, art and education; but subsequently we had an actual instance in which the working and interpretation of that clause was determined. In that case—and there are several but I will take one in order that the House may understand the effect of this resolution—we had in British Columbia the case of Dr. Ashton, who is Professor of French in the University of British Columbia. That gentleman engaged for some years in research work in French literature. In the course of his investigations he produced a book, and several other works, that surpassed the other authorities at that time upon certain features of old French literature. The result was that the French authorities in recognition of the scholarly attainments and literary achievements of this professor made him a member of the Order of the Legion of Honour, but in the process of passing the declaration formally through the foreign office and the British Embassy it was found that owing to the Nickle resolution, and owing to the latter portion of the committee's report which I have read to you, it was impossible for the French government to confer this honour upon this distinguished professor. In reading the debates of that period in the Dominion House, it is very clear that it was never the intention of the House that men of such standing should be denied the right of being honoured in a manner such as this. I have read carefully the speeches of that time. The present Solicitor General discussed the matter very fully and it is very clear from his remarks—it is clear from the remarks of the members of the opposition—that what was really intended in Canada was to do away with the abuse which it was alleged appertained to the granting of titles and hereditary distinctions at that time, but the wording of the report created the impression that something further was intended. Accordingly it was held, in this actual case, that the award of the Legion of Honour by the French government to this professor came within the prohibitory section of the report in question. Rulings have been made by the proper department of the government on the subject, and I wish to assure the House that that is the effect.

The purpose of this resolution is to change it so as to make it possible for men like Dr. Banting and Mr. Best, who discovered the insulin cure for diabetes, and who perhaps in the future, we can hope, will make other discoveries that will benefit mankind, to be honoured by any government. Because, after all, competition in the intellectual world is a competition of a world wide nature; and I submit, Mr. Speaker, there is no reason why eminent men who distinguish themselves in such activities should be deprived of the rewards which come in the nature of honours. We all know that scientists, educationalists, and other men of that class, do not work and slave for the material reward derived by other people engaged in business, who win for themselves affluence and the comforts which go with it. Their chief reward is the honour of their intellectual attainments. I am therefore appealing to the House that it may correct the error which was involved in the Nickle resolution, and make it possible for Canadian students in the intellectual world of Canada to be recognized by another country.

It is contended in some newspapers that this resolution may be a measure for the renewing of the granting of titles. I wish to assure the House—after considerable investigation, after consulting with the Under Secretary of State, and after making other inquiries in reliable quarters—that there is no intention of that kind, nor does the wording of the resolution permit of such an interpretation. The resolution is very clear. It simply says that the British government, or a foreign government, may grant decorations, save those carrying titles, for distinguished services or high attainments in education, literature, art and science. It is an impossibility for persons to receive a decoration with which a title is connected. They can only receive the decoration, or the recognition for their accomplishments, or the good which they do mankind. It can only be a recognition which has no title, and it must be limited to distinguished services or high attainments in education, literature, art and science.

Some may ask, why should not men work for the honour without the recognition? The simple answer is that it is not in accordance with human nature to do so. If you make it impossible for Canadian scholars and Canadian students to be honoured by foreign governments—for after all the intellectual kingdom is world wide, it is not limited to Canada—if you make it impossible for them to be honoured by foreign governments you create a situation as a result of which these men will be disinclined to pursue their educational or scholarly careers in Canada. We might take the instance of patriotism. It may be said that patriotism should not need a flag, but I submit that a flag does no harm to patriotism; it serves as a rallying point. You may say that services to humanity should need no bauble; but decorations do no harm, they serve as a rallying point for public appreciation. Again, Mr. Speaker, I submit that if this country continues in a course—either out of prejudice, narrowmindedness, or any other cause—when it becomes necessary for our professors to journey to the Old Country they will not be able to stand on the same plane as the men from the United States, and you prejudice and handicap the future of the university world of Canada. Because at the present time men may go over to Europe, they may engage in congresses and conventions of various kinds there and they are confronted with an anomalous situation. The United States which is alleged to be the most democratic of all countries—although it is not admitted by all of us to be so—can send over their representatives to Europe and they are able to take a stand in the congresses and conventions of the literary, scientific and educational world, superior to that occupied by the students and scholars of Canada.

I submit that hon. members of this House will not be so prejudiced, that they will not be so narrow minded, and that they will not be so ungenerous, as to deny our own Canadian scholars the privilege which is accorded to those in the United States and in every other country in the world. It is an unthinkable thing to me, and I do not believe hon. members here, upon reflection, even from the fear that there may be some question of titles or honours involved in this resolution, will be so prejudiced as to deny our men the rights other people enjoy. We need in Canada just as much of the brain as we do of the brawn of the world. We have lately listened to an address by the hon. Acting Minister of Immigration (Mr. Stewart) in which he advanced quite a comprehensive scheme with regard to immigration and with regard to bringing into Canada by the thousands people that have the muscle and the arm, and I submit you should give them equal advantages with the men who have the brain and intelligence to direct the affairs of this country. You will find—and I think it was well proven during the war—that in Great Britain and in France it was the intellectual power of the leaders of the men which made victory possible for the allies. It combined necessarily the brawn and the muscle, but both go hand in hand.

It can be truthfully said, I submit, that decorations are purely democratic. Democracy has always recognized and rewarded personal endeavour, as distinguished from inherited privilege. It is purely democratic to reward self-sacrifice and abnegation in the work of peace, just as we reward those qualities in time of war. Why should the people of Canada extend to the eminently successful citizens of the country great distinction in time of war, a rare period in our national history, and then during a long period of peace, turn a deaf ear to the men who have become benefactors of their country and mankind, merely because of some prejudice or perhaps some abuse of the granting of honours or declarations in the past. I do not think hon. members here will allow their minds to be perverted into a prejudice that will draw a conclusion of that kind.

I submit there is no homage so true and unprejudiced as that which the foreigner or the foreign government offers. A foreign nation in conferring an honour anticipates the verdict of posterity and is impersonal in its judgment. There is no intrusion of personal feeling. It gives a fair verdict which is neither won by favour nor withheld by prejudice. Whatever has a tendency to make great nations forget those things in which they differ and remember those only in which they have a common interest is a benefit to them both, and such is the granting of honours of this kind mutually by great nations of the world. Proceedings of this kind and recognitions of this class by the citizens of different countries make us blind to the faults of each other and make us kind to their virtues. This is an appeal on behalf of the men who rank high in the intellectual world of our country.

We have examples, as I mentioned, in the case of Dr. Banting and Mr. Best. We have also Dr. McLennan, who has made some wonderful discoveries with regard to helium. We all know of Dr. Alexander Graham Bell and I will draw the attention of hon. members to such men as Pasteur, who made the wonderful discovery of a certain serum, Professor Roentgen the discoverer of the X-rays, Monsieur and Madame Curie, the discoverers of radium, and Dr. Flexner, the discoverer of a serum for spinal meningitis. The names of many others will readily be called to recollection. The activities of these men are world wide. Their great discoveries are for mankind. They are not for nations, but for the whole people of the universe, and I wonder if to-day there are hon. members here who on account of some bogey imagination with regard to the question of titles will rise in their seats and say that the Canadian scholars shall be denied recognition by every other country of the world.

Mr. JACOBS: Would the hon. member be in favour of a Canadian accepting decorations from the Chinese or Japanese governments?

Mr. LADNER: The hon. member's question is easily answered. I most certainly would. It is not the Chinese or Japanese government that the people of British Columbia have a contest with. It is the inferior and lower class of people who come into our country and make economic conditions under which it is impossible for the working classes to exist. The problems are different. My hon. friend seeks to inject just a slight political jab which is not relative to the subject matter of my discussion.

I wish, Mr. Speaker, to act upon the advice of a speaker whom I once heard—and perhaps other members of the House would find it useful and enlightening to follow the same course—and to limit my speech to the smallest possible amount. This is a broad subject but it is not very involved. The purpose of my resolution is very simple. It seeks to interpret and to correct an error which unfortunately crept into the report of the special committee in 1919. It is confined to the intellectual world of Canada. I appeal to hon. members to forget their prejudices, to be generous to Canadian scholars, students and members of the universities from Vancouver to Halifax, who are looking to parliament for enlightenment by the example of their decisions, to realize the attention which is being given to this question, and to rise to the occasion and say to those who work, not for any reward in life, but for the service of Canada and for the service of humanity, that they will recognize their claim for special consideration, and that the spirit of this resolution and this debate will be understood, so that the people of this country cannot say that the lawmakers of Canada denied them the right of being recognized in the intellectual world and of receiving the honours to which they may be properly entitled.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I should have preferred to have heard some general expression from members of the House before venturing to express an opinion of my own on this question. However, the absence of any expression of view by any hon. member would seem to suggest that the subject is not one which is greatly concerning parliament at the present time, and the question which I would submit to my hon. friend is whether any circumstance has arisen, since the House, after investigation by one of its committees, reported against the acceptance of titles and decorations by Canadians, which affords reason why at this time the House should alter the decision it then made.

Mr. LADNER: Does my hon. friend not understand from the resolution and my remarks that the proposal in no way conflicts with the Nickle resolution? It is merely interpreting it for the benefit of the classes of whom I spoke.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There are two observations which I would like to make with respect to this matter. The first is that I am entirely in sympathy with my hon. friend in his desire to have all possible recognition given to intellectual attainment and scholarship. By limiting, however, decorations to scholarship alone, to art, letters and science, there is established a somewhat invidious distinction between that particular class of attainment and attainments in other directions. If decorations or titles are to be given for service, the recognition should be made general. It would appear it should apply to public service in all fields as well as to service in what my hon. friend calls the intellectual world.

But that is not the only observation I wish to make. The one I regard as being more important is this. Distinctions of the type to which reference is made in the resolution are largely of two classes—titles and decorations. Of the two, decorations are of an inferior order. The effect of the resolution being passed would be to limit recognition of Canadians as regards the intellectual world, to the lesser order of distinction. It would still be impossible to give to any Canadian, no matter how meritorious his public service might have been or how high his intellectual atainments or achievements, the same high distinction which would still be open to citizens of other parts of the British Empire or to citizens of other countries, for service in the field of letters, science or art. That, I think, is possibly one phase of the question which may have escaped my hon. friend's notice. I confess I had not thought of it particularly until it was drawn to my attention, because I am sympathetic with him in his endeavour to find every possible avenue for the recognition of the class of merit to which he refers in his resolution. Realizing, however, that the effect of his resolution will be to limit our scholars and men of science to a recognition of a lesser order, but yet to have them denied the higher recognition which men in other countries and in other parts of the British Empire would still be entitled to for a possible lesser service, I am inclined to think it would be just as advisable to have matters remain as they are at the present time, and not to recognize either titles or orders of any kind. For that reason I shall not support the resolution.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I take a different view of this question from that expressed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). I wish in what I have to say to confine myself to the merits of the resolution alone. But I want to be perfectly frank with the House; so far as my views go on the general question, they would not be expressed by the mere terms of the resolution. I was a member of the House at the time of the debate of 1919, at the time of the report of the committee referred to in the last paragraph of this resolution, and at the time of the decision embodied in an address to His Majesty, praying for a cessation of all titles and decorations to Canadian people.

I did not vote for the acceptance of the committee's report. I voted against it. I did not think it was a fitting act on the part of the Canadian parliament; I did not think it did honour to the people of Canada; nor did I think it embodied a becoming attitude towards the Throne. I would not for a moment argue that in our country, as in other countries, there had not in the past been abuses of the title-granting privilege, and particularly that there had been too much confining of the honour which titles bring to those engaged in what is usually known as public life and as well to those engaged in business life. Because of those abuses, because of that error of policy, a very considerable agitation arose against the entire practice, and in 9 p.m. that wave of so-called democracy that succeeded the war and that swept this, as other countries, like a hurricane, we took in 1919 the step that brought us where we are now. I was of judgment myself that the solution of the question proposed by the then Prime Minister in one of the ablest state papers that, I think, I ever read, was a solution that met all the exigencies that were reasonable, a solution that was based on sound common sense and that as well brought into conformity with present democratic ideas, the title-granting privilege. I thought it was a solution that would have done greater credit to our parliament than the course that was finally adopted. That is only by way of expressing my general opinion on the subject.

Coming to the resolution, I want to say something more definite. I do not agree at all with the Prime Minister in either of the reasons he advances. He says that it is illogical to confine this to this class of men or of women, those who attain eminence and do great service in the cause of education, literature, art and science. He says that to admit them to the privilege of decoration at the hands of our own country or another, is to do for them something to which they are no more entitled than would be other classes of people, and he cites particularly those engaged in public service. With that position I do not agree, to begin with; but even if that were the case, it would not be an argument against doing justice to some, that at the same time, we are not doing the same justice to others. We are doing no injury to any. But in the next place, I want to impress this. The class, the admission of which would be the best for the whole country, is just the class denominated in this resolution. There is no reason, to begin with, why recognition by a decoration should not be the reward of service, just as much as the attainment of money should be the reward of devotion to duty and toil. Whatever reasoning gets to that conclusion, for myself, I cannot comprehend.

What might be the division of peoples in respect of this subject? One might say: Some attain eminence, do great service in public life; others attain eminence, great success, and do great service in business life; others, on the contrary, do their work in less remunerative fields. The latter come under the terms of this resolution. But those who attain success in public life get a reward that none of those obtain who do service to their country, their race and their time in the spheres that are named in this resolution. There is a certain claim; there is a certain glamour; there is a certain obvious honour which all or, at any rate, most human kind loves, in the reward of public life. Public men are not without those incentives to activity, aside from money, that animate and inspire mankind. Nor is the business man without rewards that appeal to our race. The reward of money is perhaps more within his reach than it is within the reach of the man engaged in any other pursuit. The business man therefore does not need recognition by other methods as do those who are in the class named in this resolution. I always thought that far too many of these recognitions came to men in public life and to men in business life, although they were already in the enjoyment of rewards which, if not wholly consonant and adequate to their success, were at least something in the way of recognition.

But coming now to this class, no man enters the field of education, no man enters the field of science, no man enters the field of art hoping that the reward of great wealth will be for him if he succeeds; no man enters any of these activities save out of love of the service that the activity brings. Consequently I arrive by that method at the conclusion that it is men and women engaged in these pursuits whereby they serve their fellows to whom a denial of recognition by the usual decorations means the most. So I think if it is impossible to be somewhat broader, let us at least do this. Why should we say to a Canadian scholar or to a Canadian scientist who toils day by day and week by week, who denies himself that remuneration which his fellow, perhaps not half as well endowed, perhaps not half as strenuously at work, gains—why should we say to him, "Because you live in Canada we will not allow you to accept the ordinary recognition that your fellow across the border is entitled to receive even in republican United States."

Now, it seems to me that the spirit animating this attitude is not a spirit that becomes the Canadian people at all, I do not know that I could improve on the class of those who would here be admitted to a responsible degree of recognition by the terms of the resolution. I think it is wide enough to include all who enter the service of art, literature or science, and who, as a result of that service, have been successful but have been denied those rewards that wait on men in public and business life. So I say, let us be big enough to open the gates so far. If we do not want to go any further, all right, I am not going to complain; but let us go at least far enough to say to those who are engaged in these unselfish walks of life, "Though others may not be admitted to these rewards, to you who are in walks of life that mean the greatest sacrifice and the greatest service we will not deny them."

I have in my mind—I cannot mention his name—a man who has served his fellows, not only in our country but in the world, perhaps as few others, if any, of this generation have. That man might have entered other work, and was qualified by powers of concentration and application to attain the distinction and reward of professional activity. Instead he laid before himself a scientific goal which, if he reached, he believed would be a great boon to his race. For five years he denied himself almost everything save the bread of life, for five years he denied himself not only those things that go to make for human comfort, but those things that go to make for human society, those amenities of social life which we all love so much. I cannot tell the House all that that man went through, though I have the information. He ends by a great success. At the time of his success and for the future, so far as ordinary rewards of the world are concerned, he is just where he began. And we say to him—though I did not doubt for a moment that he would be the last to seek anything of this kind—"We are so desperately democratic that we won't let our own country nor any other country in the world put a few letters after your name or give you an insignia of honour in recognition of the services you have done the world." Is that democracy? Is that common sense? For that reason I am not in accord with the first argument advanced by the Prime Minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before my right hon. friend proceeds, I understood him to allude to the United States and to intimate that Canadians were denied recognition which is permitted in the United States. Does my right hon. friend say that titles and decorations are permitted by the United States government?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not say titles. The resolution does not refer to titles. Decorations are permitted.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Are they granted by the government of the United States? That is the real point.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps it is. This man could get a decoration if he lived in the United States; but because he lived in Canada he could not.

Mr. JACOBS: My right hon. friend does not pretend that the United States government hands out decorations?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I do not so pretend. But if I were a citizen of the United States I would rather have my own government hand out such recognition than have a fellow-citizen honoured by a foreign government. At any rate, if a man lived in the United States he would not be denied a decoration at the hands of those who were big enough to give it to him. That is the statement I make.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Well, it is a mistake.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The second reason given is that because this resolution does not admit men to titles it is illogical to admit them to ordinary decorations. Really I cannot follow my right hon. friend's reasoning. I do not know how to put that reason in a sufficiently plausible form to make it appear serious. If we cannot admit a man to a title, why in the world should we prevent a man from accepting an ordinary decoration not carrying a title? It seems to me it would be just as illogical to say: Do not admit a man to a title because you do not admit him to any hereditary titles. No one wants hereditary titles here. That is not the point. There is no reason behind the suggestion that because you cannot go further and allow a man to wear a title, you are not using good judgment in letting him accept a decoration. Both reasons seem to me unsound.

Therefore because I think the purpose is right, because I believe in incentive, because I believe in rewards other than mere money in this world, I support the resolution.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, as I had some little share in bringing about the result in 1919 which is questioned to-night, I desire to say only a word or two. My right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) states that this step was actuated by a spirit of so-called democracy. May I assure him that it was actuated by a spirit of real democracy, and that the parliament of Canada in 1919 did not commit any mistake? I do not think that the people of Canada have ever regretted the decision then arrived at, and I do not think this House should reverse that decision to-night. My right hon. friend says that he voted against it. I understand his position to-night, but the resolution of Mr. Nickle was adopted by an almost unanimous vote and well represented the sentiment and public feeling of the country. If there is one thing for which I am grateful to the parliament that was elected in 1917—and there were few things in that parliament, of course, that I admired—it is that it made possible the abolition of titles of honour in Canada. Titles had been lavishly bestowed throughout the country and the people became aroused; a spirit of resentment was manifested everywhere, and the result was the abolition of a practice that had certainly had a demoralizing effect.

The mover of the resolution says that the purpose of his motion is merely to interpret the resolution of Mr. Nickle. Surely the mover of the resolution adopted by the House in 1919 knows as well as my hon. friend what he meant, and Mr. Nickle himself has indicated his opposition to the motion now before us. The reason why the committee which studied the question reported that in their opinion these decorations should be abolished at the same time that titles of honour were abolished is a very simple one. The Imperial government could not very well allow foreign governments to carry on a sort of propaganda in this country by distributing decorations or orders of high standing in their own lands while the Imperial government was prevented from conferring titles of honour which really corresponded to those foreign decorations. After all, has anybody in Canada suffered because these titles and decorations were abolished in 1919?

Mr. BUREAU: Some have, in their pride.

Mr. JACOBS: The Tory party has.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not know that any person has really suffered. But let me tell you another thing which perhaps is a little personal. I had the honour, with my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) to represent my country at the meeting of the League of Nations. We attended certain functions, dinners and other things, where almost everybody present was decorated with ribbons, medals, and so on; only two had none—the Minister of Finance and myself. And let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, we were proud to represent Canada there; that was sufficient for us; and we were well received by everybody, without any titles or medals or ribbons. I admit that real merit deserves special recognition, but I deny that that recognition should take the form of titles or empty decorations. The people always discern real merit and recognize it. When I spoke on this question in 1919 I referred to the case of M. Thiers, of France, who had been created a baron by King Louis Philippe but refused to wear the title. But, Sir, the French people, who knew the real merit of Mr. Thiers, called him the "Liberator of the Territory" after he had delivered his country from the Germans in 1870. That title, given him by the whole people, was better than the title of baron which King Louis Philippe had bestowed upon him against his will.

I really think, Mr. Speaker, that this resolution should be rejected by the House. It is the thin end of the wedge; and I do not think the country will suffer very much if we go on without any titles.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): Mr. Speaker; I think the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) missed one point in his remarks with regard to this resolution, namely, the great joy of success and achievement that comes to anyone who has done something worth while. To add a few letters to a man's name when he has really achieved greatness is simply trying to paint the lily and adorn the rose. I have noticed that all the great men of past days were not known by their titles. The people generally have shown a peculiar tendency even to drop the courtesy of titles and speak about men like Gladstone, Disraeli, Napoleon and other great men by their surnames, forgetting all the trappings that their admirers or posterity tried to wrap around them. I am proud to think that Canadians are quite content with their simple names; they are satisfied to be known by those names and by any achievements they may have accomplished, without any extra adornment. The hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Lapointe) stated it well when he said that abuses crept in when such titles or adornments were given to individuals; favouritism and special notice began to breed jealousy and ill feeling. I think, therefore, we can safely leave it to the people themselves to place the laurels upon the proper heads.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I hope this resolution will pass, if only to afford a measure of honour to a celebrated British Columbian.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. NEILL: I assure my hon. friends that I have no anticipation of receiving the Order of the Yellow Dragon in the near future. But I am surprised at the moderation of the hon. member who introduces this resolution (Mr. Ladner); it is not characteristic of him. He is less than modest; he is inconsistent. Both the leader of the Government (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) rather indicated their appreciation of that fact. I would go further; indeed, I would be frank and go the whole length; I would abolish what is known as the Nickle resolution in its entirety. If we accept the resolution now under consideration, then it is logical to go on to the conclusion and abolish the whole thing. I always did think it was churlish that we should get up upon a pedestal and say to our honoured ruler: "We do not want the honours you may be pleased to confer upon us." We might well have provoked the retort; "I never intended to give you any." I do not think there is any other dominion that has taken the same attitude. New Zealand, and I think Australia, object to hereditary titles, as I am sure we all do, but they do not object to the granting of life titles in recognition of the honour a man may achieve in one form or another.

One hon. member suggested that we might be flooded with foreign propaganda in the form of orders and decorations. That could easily be prevented by having those honours bestowed only with the permission of the Canadian government. There would never be any refusal of them under reasonable circumstances, and under that arrangement foreign propaganda would not be possible.

The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe) spoke of the banquets and so forth that he attended with his colleague and how they sat among lords and dukes, and all did them honour, and I have no doubt they too well upheld the honour of Canada. But they would have upheld it just as well if they had had a title of distinction. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries said that they had received the greatest politeness and courtesy from these other men and I am quite sure they did. But I am quite sure that they would have received the same politeness and courtesy if they had appeared at these functions without a dress coat but there was no honour to be gained by going without a dress coat nor was there any honour to be gained by going without a decoration if they had earned it. But there are disadvantages when our representatives go abroad without having some honour or title of that kind and move amongst men who have such distinctions. As the hon. gentleman has said they invariably have a prefix to their name. If we are going into this thing of abandoning titles let us go into it in its entirety. Why allude to an hon. member as the hon. member for so and so? That is a title of honour. Away with it! Why write to our constituents as so and so. Esquire? That is a feudal title. Away with it! Why should a gentleman or his wife be referred to as Mr. or Mrs.? That is another title. Let us go back to the days of the French Commune and refer to them as Citizen and Citizeness. It is only carrying out an illogical position to its conclusion. Do we not feel a certain amount of pride when we hear Sir John A. Macdonald or Sir Wilfrid Laurier alluded to or see their names recorded in the pages of our history? We do not feel any indignity associated with that, surely. Would not any of us feel honoured if this resolution were to be passed as I suggest, and we saw the venerable leader of the Finance department honoured in the evening of his days with a title of honour? We would not feel that there was any shame attached to a title given to such a man. We would all be proud of his distinction.

I am entirely against any hereditary titles, but I think my position is sufficiently obscure to do away with any suggestion, as I said at the outset, that I have any personal interest in this matter, and to put the thing to an issue, if any hon member will second my resolution I would move to strike out the words "save those carrying titles" and the words "in education, literature, art and science."

Mr. SPEAKER: May I ask the hon. member to put his amendment in writing?

Mr. NEILL: I will do so, Mr. Speaker. Are the rewards of public life so great that we should begrudge to any man who has given the best years of his life—and they are not gained by a few years in office—recognition of this kind?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William and Rainy River): As one of those who were here in 1919 when this question came before the House on the Nickle resolution, I should like to say what I think I said then, that there seems to be very frequently some confusion between titles and decorations. Those who went to the front, for example, and were given the Victoria Cross were given a decoration, but it carried with it no title. Take, for example, the hon. gentleman who represented Skeena in the last House, Colonel Peck; he was given the Victoria Cross, but Colonel Peck was still Colonel Peck. He carried his military title, it is true, but no title went with the decoration. I think as one of those who voted I quite well remember with my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe) that there is a confusion between titles and decorations.

My hon. friend for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner) stands up in this House and takes the attitude that those, for example, who distinguish themselves in literature, if they should receive from the French government the decoration of the Legion of Honour, such as you, yourself, Mr. Speaker, carry, should be permitted to accept it. That is the position of my hon. friend for Vancouver South. But the Legion of Honour, as you well know, Sir, does not carry with it a title. It is a decoration in virtue of the fact that some man has distinguished himself from the standpoint of literature; or in the case of Colonel Cy. Peck of whom I spoke a moment ago, the Victoria Cross was awarded for gallantry on the field, and it is the highest decoration that any man could receive.

The idea of the Nickle resolution, to my mind—though Mr. Nickle did not vote for it, and I did—was to cut out the giving of knighthoods in this country whereby some men were called Sir so-and-so and their wives Lady so-and-so. I do not wish to mention names, but that was the idea of the Nickle resolution, to cut out the titles but not the decorations. My hon. friend for Vancouver South takes the attitude, and I think he is perfectly right, that decorations might well be given, but he distinctly says in his resolution "save those carrying titles." So far as I have been able to see, and I have tried to understand the question in a general way, I do not think that I would be voting against my vote of 1919 at all in supporting my hon. friend for Vancouver South on this resolution. What he is suggesting is that you give decorations, but not titles. The whole idea of the Nickle resolution, if I understood it aright at that time—and if I did not, I voted without understanding it—was to do away with the title of Sir and Lady and so do away particularly with hereditary titles. I think my hon. friend the Minister of Marine will agree with me that that was the idea.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But does not my hon. friend know that the report of the committee was in favour of doing away with all these decorations except those awarded for military or naval valour?

Mr. MANION: I understand that was the effect of the report, but certainly that was not my understanding of the report, and the debates do not show that that was the understanding of the report. My understanding of the report was that the report as presented did away with all titles or decorations of any kind which conferred a title on the people who received them—the K.C.M.G., Knight Commander of St. Michael and St. George, for instance which carried the title of Sir. Take, for instance, the decoration which you, Mr. Speaker, so well deserved and received the decoration of the Legion of Honour of France. It confers no title. Therefore that was not done away with. I remember reading just a few days ago an article in one of the papers—I think it was an English-speaking paper, but I am not sure, perhaps it was a French paper—to the effect that a number of learned gentlemen in the province of Quebec, had received decorations. I am sorry I did not cut it out at the time, but at any rate a number of learned gentlemen in the province of Quebec, professors, received decorations from the French government, but they carried no title with them.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Those gentlemen were citizens of France living in Canada.

Mr. MANION: I did not know that. The paper did not say that. I do not dispute it for a moment, but if these gentlemen were citizens of the republic of France, is there any harm in giving to a citizen of the Canadian nation, since we now speak of the Canadian nation, the same decoration? I assuredly do not wish to speak about myself but, I have the privilege of using certain letters which were given to me at Edinburgh, for example as doctor of medicine—

Mr. BUREAU: That is different. That is not a title conferred by a government.

Mr. MANION: —but I assure you I do not wish to speak of that in any spirit of vanity. Yet I have the right to use those letters which give me the title of doctor. Is there any reason why the French republic should not be able to give a decoration to some worthy gentleman such as he who was spoken of by my hon. friend for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner)—providing it does not carry with it a title which places him on a different footing from the ordinary citizens of this country.

Now, I think I can vote for the amendment; if I cannot then I am mistaken. I certainly can vote for the resolution of my hon. friend which, as he distinctly pointed out again and again, does not mean that a decoration will carry with it a title. I think I can vote for the resolution without incurring any such reflection as is contained in the speech of the Minister of Marine. Certainly I have no idea of changing my point of view of 1919. I have no hesitation whatever in supporting the attitude of the mover of the resolution. I cannot see that there is anything wrong in it. I care not whether it is a decoration conferred by the French republic, the English monarchy or some other country. I see no wrong in any citizen of Canada accepting it so long as it does not place him, in a general way, above the ordinary citizenship of this country.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is moved by Mr. Neill, seconded by Mr. Bancroft, in amendment to the main motion, to strike out the words "save those carrying titles" and the words "in education, literature, art and science."

Mr. MANION: May I just say one word. I did not hear the amendment distinctly when it was moved but now, having heard it read, I certainly shall vote against it. So far as the resolution is concerned I still adhere to what I said. I shall unhesitatingly suport the motion of my hon. friend for Vancouver South.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (North Toronto): If we are going to pass this motion we might as well repeal the Nickle resolution altogether. The Nickle resolution does not apply to professional men who aid science. It would be far better, instead of granting decorations along the lines proposed in this resolution, to do something financially practical for men of science, like Dr. Banting, and not leave them to apply for the benefits of the Rockefeller Foundation or the Carnegie Institute. I read the other day a newspaper article in a British medical paper alluding to the neglect of men of science by the country, and perhaps it would not be inappropriate for me to make a quotation from that article here:

London, February 28.—The world's neglect of its men of science was the theme taken by Col. Sir Ronald Ross, the eminent authority on tropical diseases in addressing the British Science Guild here yesterday.

"You throw your geniuses on the dust heap," said Sir Ronald scornfully. He recounted the brief recognition accorded to those who solve important scientific problems although he made no complaint of his own treatment, which the record shows, has been liberal.

"The genius who saved countless lives in India by discovering methods of inoculation against cholera and plague," the speaker asserted, "is not employed by Great Britain in any capacity whatever to-day."

Sir Ronald added that he was not at liberty to divulge the name of this man, but his hearers assumed that he referred to Waldemar M. W. Haffkine, former bacteriologist with the government of India. Continuing, the speaker said:

"Walter Reed, the young American, who discovered that yellow fever is carried by the mosquito, was given a menial medical job after his discovery, seeing people's tongues and prescribing castor oil. He was allowed to fall ill and die feeling the greatest apprehension as to the future livelihood of his wife and children."

Sir Ronald referred to Sir David Bruce, who discovered the cure for sleeping sickness. "England doesn't even think it worth while to employ him now," the speaker declared.

He added that there were three or four other eminent scientists in this field who were equally neglected, and continued:

"It has often been said that the man who could find the cure for tuberculosis or who could discover the cause and cure of cancer would become a millionaire. On the contrary, it is more likely that he would die in the workhouse."

Sir Ronald urged that the country liberally pension such men, encouraging them to pursue their investigations.

I maintain that even under the Nickle resolution there is nothing to prevent the monarch, or government of any outside country conferring degrees or honours on men renowned in medicine, science or art. No government went further than the Union government in the tin-pot title business. I was a member of the executive of the exhibition board at Toronto. We had nine members on the executive and I was the only one who was not an honorary colonel. There is nothing within the four corners of the Nickle resolution to prevent the conferring of honours for any such purposes claimed in the resolution—and there is nothing in international law to stop it.

There was a commission of inquiry in Great Britain which made an investigation and brought in a report on the subject of granting of titles. Our Canadian public men seek titles more than those in England. The leading public men over there do not want them. Gladstone and Bright did not want them. Mr. Asquith, Mr. Lloyd George, and Mr. Bonar Law are not asking for titles. There is no demand for such action as this resolution proposes. I repeat that if you pass this resolution you might as well repeal the Nickle resolution in its entirety; you might as well go back to the days of the Union government when they conferred titles on everybody. If there was any person who did not receive a title from that government all he had to do was just to stand up and ask for one; he could get it for the asking. The commission which investigated the matter of titles in the Old Country did not recommend any extension of the present system of title granting, but a huge curtailment. In that respect the committee displayed admirable common sense.

Mr. R. J. WOODS (Dufferin): We are today living in very strenuous times. Efficiency is one of the most important qualities required of men, but I cannot see how the granting of titles or decorations is going to add in the slightest degree to the efficiency of those engaged in education, science, art or statesmanship. I am opposed to the resolution on this ground. I do not think it is going to add anything to the efficiency of individuals in this country, or that it is going in any way to make this land better than it is at the present time.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): In my opinion the inevitable result of doing what is proposed here is for Canada to assume the responsibility of setting up a bureau of decorations. That is not democratic. They have not done it in the United States and they do not intend to do it. For that reason I do not think we should do it here. That is the whole issue. One would infer from the arguments advanced here to-night that we had a poor system of democracy in Canada, because there are certain services rendered to the public that are not recognized by the awarding of decorations. If the state is to make any recognition of such services it should be in a financial form rather than in the form of decoration. If that is not expedient then there ought to be an expression of appreciation by this House as representing the people. The proper thing to do is to recognize by resolution the services of those who have won distinction, and not recognize any services by the conferring of a decoration. Decorations do not count in a real vote of confidence. But recognition is something that should be forthcoming in this House. Mention has been made of Canadian scientists and doctors who have rendered great service to the public, and I believe they should be recognized in parliament or in the legislature, but it should be, not by a decoration, but by a vote of recognition or grant of money.

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (George Etienne Cartier): It will give me great pleasure to vote against both the resolution and the amendment. I can do so without torturing my conscience very much, seeing that in 1919, the time of the Union government, I voted for the resolution abolishing titles. Any person who has read the English newspapers must remember that a short time ago the question was discussed in those papers respecting the purchase by English gentlemen of titles at so much each. Knighthoods had a certain price and the cost of baronetcies was a little higher.

An hon. MEMBER: What about dukedoms?

Mr. JACOBS: I do not know what the price of dukedoms was. They were not hocked about as the others were. That being the case in England, does the mover of the amendment not think that such a condition would obtain to a more or less degree in Canada? We had had a large number of titles conferred upon Canadian citizens; why, the Lord only knows. Those gentlemen who were decorated during the closing days of the war were Tories, and during the Grit days it was the Grits that were decorated. But those of the Grit party found that when we needed these gentlemen at certain periods in their career they were all Tories. We scratched the Grits and we found they were Tories. I have in my mind's eye half a dozen Grit gentlemen who were decorated and later, deserted us.

Mr. MANION: Name them.

Mr. JACOBS: I am sure their names will suggest themselves to my hon. friend. When we needed them they were not there. They became so loyal to the Crown that they felt it was almost treason to vote for the Liberal party on certain occasions. I was reading in the reminiscences of Sir Charles Tupper's life some rather interesting stories respecting the conferring of knighthoods upon Canadian citizens in his day. Any person interested will find that Sir Charles Tupper boldly and bluntly tells us in his own reminiscences written by his own hand, that on one occasion it was found impossible to appoint a gentleman to the Senate although he had the promise of it in his pocket a year or two before the vacancy occurred. He says: "I consulted Sir John Macdonald and a letter was written to the gentleman in which we asked him if he would forego his right to be nominated to the Senate provided we would make him a K.C.M.G." The letter was sent, and in due course a wire was received saying that he was willing that his eminent services should be withheld from the Senate and from the people of Canada, in consideration of his being made a Knight Commander of St. Michael and St. George. That is a very high honour in certain cases, but not a very high honour in that particular case. We find a rather amusing incident about Sir John himself which Sir Charles relates. In 1885 or 1886, when Sir John Macdonald was in England, Sir Charles said, "I think it only right we should advance you a grade in the order which you hold." He was at that time, I think, a Knight Commander of the Bath, and Sir Charles thought he should be a Grand Commander of the Bath. He said "I saw Lord Derby about it and he acquiesced that there should be an advance in grade. The next day I notified Sir John Macdonald what I was able to do, and in due course before Sir John left London he was made a G.C.B." The following is the substance of a letter from Sir John Macdonald written to Sir Charles Tupper—

Thank you very much for what you have done, in seeing to it that I was advanced a grade in the order which I hold. Would you be good enough to see the correspondents of the Montreal Gazette and the Mail Empire and have a cable sent across to Canada, something to this effect.—

"Appointment was altogether unsolicited and was made by Mr. Gladstone"

Sir John said it would make the Grits so mad. I will say for Sir John Macdonald that he had the saving grace and the gift of humour, which my hon. friend who is moving the resolution has not developed to the same degree. I cannot see the consistency of asking that we give permission to foreign governments to decorate Canadian citizens when we have taken away from these people the right to receive decorations at our own hands or at the hands of the British government.

Mr. LADNER: Does my hon. friend understand that my resolution is limited only to foreign governments? If so, he has not read the resolution.

Mr. JACOBS: I understand that it applies only to foreign governments.

Mr. LADNER: That is a wrong understanding.

Mr. JACOBS: I may be wrong in that respect. But once we have laid the axe at the root of the tree, and have felled the tree, we do not want to let any part grow again. We did a good day's work in 1919, and I do not know that the members composing this parliament are any wiser than the members of the House in 1919 in that respect. The vote at that time was, I think, 96 to 43 or 44 in favour of the Nickle resolution. We do not want to encourage the camel to put his head into the tent, because he will end by getting his entire body in. My hon. friend evidently is oblivious to the famous words of Robert Burns:

> The rank is but the guinea's stamp,
> The man's the gowd for a' that.

I have very much pleasure in opposing both the amendment and the resolution.

Mr. H. A. FORTIER (Labelle) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I well remember the debate which took place, in 1919, on the resolution moved by Mr. Nickle, then member for Kingston. However, after glancing over the Hansard of that date, I perceive that I was not present in the House when the vote was taken. I therefore feel perfectly at ease today in expressing my views on the present resolution and amendment before the House.

The purport of the resolution moved by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner) is that Canadian citizens may accept only such decorations as might be conferred upon them by Great Britain or by foreign countries. I do not like the phraseology of his motion. It strikes me that the hon. member is too modest in respect to Canadian citizenship. In his modesty he wants Canadians to accept decorations; only he will not grant other countries permission to bestow higher honours, such as those, at present, bestowed by Great Britain on her citizens. If we admit that Canadian citizens have a right to decorations, to my mind we should also allow them to accept all honours that might be conferred either by Great Britain or foreign countries.

In certain countries, decorations have no titles attached to them, and perhaps the hon. member had in mind such decorations, which are the highest honours that these countries can bestow. But, on the other hand, among the royal honours conferred in the British Empire, are to be found decorations bearing titles, and I state that the resolution of the hon. member is certainly too humble, since it runs shy of these decorations. I therefore cannot support this resolution. I would rather favour the proposed amendment. I think Canadians should be allowed to accept the highest honours that the British Empire or foreign countries can confer. In my opinion all decorations should be acceptable or else none whatever. As Canadian citizens we are not strangers in the British Empire and since we form part of the latter, we should stand on equal footing with all British subjects. If we adopt this resolution, it would be admitting that we, Canadian citizens, may but accept certain decorations carrying with them no titles, while those domiciled in the British Isles could, themselves, accept titles. I think that this implication of inferiority which this resolution carries with it should not be endorsed by the Canadian parliament. Again I state, since we are part of the British Empire, we have a right to all the honours that are therein conferred, and we should not be content, because we are domiciled in Canada, with a little second or third rate decoration. To my view, we should accept all that is forthcoming or nothing whatsoever, and this is why, I am rather in favour of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill).

At the time we took up the question of titles, a spirit of democracy seemed to sweep over this country. We then desired to abolish certain titles, and, considering ourselves democrats, we wanted to follow the example of the United States which from times immemorial, never conferred honours on their citizens. Was it wise for us, in 1919, to follow the precedent of the United States and deny to our distinguished men well deserved honours and who certainly formed an elite in our country? Was it fair, in 1919, to abolish titles? I think this question has been in the past and is at present much debated both on the floor of the House and all over the country.

A further argument in support of my views is that, in all civilized countries, a legion of honour imposes itself so as to create an elite which becomes an object of admiration for other nations. How do you expect to choose this elite? Who is going to raise it above the common level of all citizens? It behooves the authorities to do so. To my mind, the principle involved in honours and titles is one that has been acknowledged by all civilized nations and it is still necessary to perpetuate it so that there be an elite within the nation. It is quite proper for Canada to have an elite including not only those who have distinguished themselves on the battlefield, but also those who have devoted themselves to the public service in the field of science, art and literature, in fact in all spheres of human activity. These people certainly are deserving of recognition and I state that honours emanating from the sovereign should be conferred, unreservedly, to any eminent citizen who has given his services to the country at large, and not exclusively to the army or universities. We have no right to discriminate.

For the reasons enumerated, should we be called upon to vote on the two motions, I shall support the proposed amendment because it agrees more with my views.

I do not advocate hereditary titles. The latter are perhaps not necessary in a colony and probably not as popular as the others. I am aware that the general feeling in this country, is that hereditary titles be not conferred here; but so far as other royal honours that have been granted to eminent Canadians, for many generations past and have been honourably borne by them, we should still retain the right of accepting such titles and decorations as it was the usage of conferring upon those who have proved worthy of them. Canada, like other nations should have the privilege of creating this elite necessary to all civilized countries.

Mr. LADNER: Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to observe that the trend of this debate has centered on the question of titles. Whether that has been a deliberate in-

10 p.m. tention on the part of some hon. members or not, is not for me to say; but this is not a resolution affirming the principle of titles. This is not a resolution, in the words of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe) a moment ago, to reverse the decision of 1919, approving the abolition of titles of honour in Canada. The question is asked: Has anybody suffered because titles have been abolished? Mr. Speaker, this is not a question of titles at all. It is an effort to draw as clearly as is humanly possible a line of demarcation between men who earn recognition by their outstanding ability and men on whom honours are thrust without justification of personal merit. I submit to hon. members to-night that if they reject this resolution—I stated it before and I re-affirm it now—they are simply saying to the scholars of this country: "We who sit in authority in parliament are afraid that if we allow some great scientist to receive nominal recognition for his work at the hands of a foreign government it will mean"—to adopt the simile used by an hon. member to-night—"the camel's head entering the tent and soon we will have his body inside". My hon. friend took his information from a newspaper report of Mr. Nickle's remarks and from one other quotation which he did not very accurately give. But I submit that the point there stated is not the point in this debate at all. I would ask hon. members to direct their attention to the wording of the resolution. It refers simply to—> decorations—save those carrying titles—for distinguished service or high attainments in education, literature, art and science.

Mr. JACOBS: Who is to decide whether the service is distinguished or not. The foreign government?

Mr. LADNER: That is a matter which must pass through governmental hands.

Mr. JACOBS: The party intended to be honoured would not have to pass an examination to ascertain whether his services were distinguished or not. I should fancy he would get the distinction because he had "pull".

Mr. LADNER: My hon. friend's mind runs in pulls. He has been pulling around so much that he cannot pull straight. With all due respect to him, he has distorted my words and has presented arguments that are not pertinent to this resolution at all. As I was about to say, Mr. Speaker, the decorations I refer to are purely academic, and I must confess that I am somewhat amazed to find an hon. gentleman in the position of the Prime Minister of Canada, eminent in the world of letters and possessing a few decorations to which he is worthily entitled—I have had the honour of reading some of his works—take the attitude that because the resolution goes in the direction of giving recognition to our scholars and students, and because it does not go further and give recognition to another class—which I submit is less worthy—therefore the resolution should be rejected. I submit that this is no argument against the resolution.

Mr. MARTELL: If my hon. friend will permit. It is all very well to speak about academic decorations and so on, but so long as we are a portion of the British Empire why should not citizens of the Empire be permitted to accept honours from their sovereign?

Mr. LADNER: Mr. Speaker, that question is an example of the ideas which have been injected into this debate and have, I think, confused many hon. members. That is not the question before the House. I am not arguing whether or not we should interfere with the right of the sovereign to confer titles.

Mr. MARTELL: If my hon. friend will permit me again. Is it not preferable that a man should receive an honour from his sovereign, who is the head of his country, rather than that he should accept an honour, whether academic or otherwise, from the head of any foreign country? That is my idea.

Mr. LADNER: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is asking the same question which another hon. member put and which I answered. Apparently my hon. friend has not been following the debate.

Mr. MARTELL: I was out; that is the reason.

Mr. LADNER: The resolution is not of the intent the hon. gentleman suggests. It covers both British and foreign governments. Now, I wish again to emphasize what the point of this resolution really is. It is to enable the scholars and students of our country—and the wording is confined to them—to have the right to receive a distinction conferred on them by the British government or by any foreign government. What right have we as members of this House to say to the intellectual giants of this country: "We will not permit you that right; we are afraid that you will become some sort of a camel and get your head into the tent and later we will have your whole body in."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my hon. friend really believe it will be adding to the standing of any Canadian in the intellectual world to confine his recognition on the part of governments to an inferior order of merit, if I may use that term, which I think is correctly applied? The orders that my hon. friend's resolution covers are second or third class, so to speak. A Canadian who received a second or third class honour would be judged in European circles by that recognition and would be prevented from receiving anything higher. That is the point to which I should like my hon. friend to direct his attention.

Mr. LADNER: That is a question for the recipient to determine. If he wishes to accept a second or third class degree of the Legion of Honour instead of some higher degree in that order, it is for him to say whether he will or will not. But what right have we as members of parliament to deny him the privilege of receiving even an inferior order?

Mr. JACOBS: We want to save him from himself.

Mr. LADNER: Mr. Speaker, I have seen many generous gentlemen of that kind, but we do not always take them at their word.

Mr. MARTELL: Will my hon. friend permit me again? If that is the case, what right has parliament to come in and say to a citizen of the British Empire that he shall not receive from his sovereign, if the latter sees fit to honour him, the highest honour in his gift?

Mr. LADNER: The hon. gentleman is back again to the old question of titles, and that is what is confusing this debate. This is not a question of titles; this is a question of academic distinctions. I would point out to hon. members that throughout Canada there are in our universities many professors from all parts of the world helping to build up our institutions. They slave all their life and the only thing they can expect in return for their unstinted effort and distinguished service is what? It is not money. It is recognition in honour of distinguished accomplishment in their particular field of work. But is there anything wrong in asking that that honour should be ear-marked by a decoration from some foreign government or from the British government? I am at a loss to understand any reason why hon. members should exercise their authority here to preclude the granting of such decorations to our academic world. In my judgment it is a blind submission to a prejudice of mind which arises from the old Nickle resolution. I am frank to say that I think it is a very narrow viewpoint, for it is ungenerous in our law-makers to deny to our educationalists, our artists, our scientists and our authors any recognition of their merits.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me say that this resolution relates only to the distinguished accomplishments of men in the fields of education, literature, art and science, and it does not permit them to receive a decoration which in any way carries with it a title. I appeal to members of this House to throw away their prejudice, to be more generous, and to give to the classes to which I have referred the opportunity to receive honours. The right still remains with parliament to correct any abuses which may arise if this proposal is adopted. From the days of titles the pendulum has swung very far to the other extreme. Let us be moderate; let us be sensible; let us be reasonable. Let us do justice to the men who are struggling in the educational fields of Canada.

RULES OF THE HOUSE

MOTION BY MR. JOHNSTON FOR A SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. J. FRED. JOHNSTON (Last Mountain) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House a special committee of eleven members be appointed to inquire jointly with Mr. Speaker into the advisability of adopting a rule of the House which will provide that an amendment to an amendment be allowed on the motion that the Speaker leave the chair for the House to resolve itself into committee of Supply or Ways and Means; with power to send for persons, papers and records, and to report from time to time.

Mr. SPEAKER: May I draw the attention of the hon. member to the fact that the motion calls for a special committee of eleven members to inquire jointly with Mr. Speaker into the subject matter of the resolution? As the Speaker is called upon to give rulings on questions of this nature, he would prefer not to be included in the committee. But I shall see that while the committee sits, if it is agreeable to the House, the Clerk and the Assistant Clerk will give all the assistance needed.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I am quite agreeable to that, Mr. Speaker. In drafting the resolution in the form in which it now is I thought I was following the best procedure. My remarks at this time will be very brief.

The resolution that you have just read, Mr. Speaker, is, to my mind, self-explanatory and needs very little comment from me or from those in support of it, but its subject matter is one of very great importance to those of us in this quarter of the House. The House will remember that last session the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), then leader of this party, moved a certain amendment, which you, Mr. Speaker, ruled out of order. While we are hopeful that the budget to be brought down by the Minister of Finance will be of such a character that we can give it a wholehearted support, we do not want to find ourselves in the same predicament that we were in last session. If the government's proposals, as set forth in the budget, do not meet with our approval we want to be in a position to place our opinion before the House and that, under the existing rules, we will be debarred from doing. It may be thought that in asking for this special committee at this time we are asking for a great deal, but in my opinion the work of such a committee should not be unduly prolonged. As a matter of fact I think the object sought could be accomplished in a very few hours. Therefore, in view of the importance of the subject I feel no hesitation in asking the House to grant this request.

Conditions have changed. The rule which governs in the case of amendments to a motion to go into Committee of Supply, or to go into Committee of Ways and Means, was drafted when there were only two parties in this chamber. To-day we have three.

Mr. FIELDING: Five.

Mr. GRAHAM: Four or five.

Mr. JOHNSTON: At any rate we have three great parties. The opinions of a great many of the electorate of this country are represented by over sixty members sitting in this quarter of the chamber. We should, therefore, be able to give expression to those opinions by way of resolution and formal motion, and yet we are debarred from doing that by the rules of the House. In a procedure debate in the British parliament, in 1861, Lord Palmerston used these words:

> This House has another function to discharge and one highly conducive to the public interest—namely, that of being the mouthpiece of the nation, the organ by which all opinions, all complaints, all notions of grievances, all hopes and expectations, all wishes and suggestions which may rise, may be discussed, examined, answered, rejected or redressed. This I hold to be as important as the other two (namely legislation and the granting of supplies.)

I hope, therefore, the House will accede to our request and grant us this special committee.

When this matter was brought up last year the Finance Minister said this in reply to the leader of the Progressive party:

> If I may be permitted to make a comment on what my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Crerar) says, I would remind him that being the second largest group in the house it was his undoubted right to take the place of the official opposition if he had so desired. Of his own motion and for good reasons, satisfactory to himself and his friends he elected not to take that position. There is an advantage under the British practice in occupying the position of the official opposition. My hon. friend waived his right to that advantage, and I do not think he ought now to complain of the consequences of his action.

Had the hon. member for Marquette chosen to take the position of leader of the Opposition in this House, which no doubt was his right by virtue of the number of members he represented, we would have found hon. gentlemen to my right in the position we occupy to-day; and I for one would not want to see them so placed that it would not be possible for them to put their views before the House in a concrete form. Yet that is exactly the situation in which we find ourselves at the present time. Without offering any further remarks at this stage, I hope the House will grant our request as set out in this resolution.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): If I felt, as my hon. friend from Last Mountain (Mr. Johnston) feels, that by the rules of the House, he and his colleagues are precluded from an opportunity of giving expression to their views I should be willing to join him in the desire for a change. But I think he is mistaken in that respect. It is true that on this particular motion in relation to the budget, and in certain other cases, it is only possible to have one amendment. I think there is a good purpose in that. The object is that you shall concentrate the attention of the House upon a particular matter, whereas if you are to have various amendments brought forward confusion would be created. This rule is one of long established practice in this parliament and, I think, in the Mother of Parliaments as well. There are many opportunities where hon. gentlemen opposite, any hon. member in fact, may find means of expressing their views. Every time the House is moved into Committee of Supply on certain days of the week it is the right of any hon. member to move an amendment setting forth his views on any particular question. Therefore the opinion entertained by my hon. friend that there is no opportunity under the rules for these hon. gentlemen to give expression to their views is, I am sure, an erroneous one. The rules of parliament have been well established for a good purpose. I think it is not wise that we should too hastily change them. In the present case I am quite sure that every time the motion is made for the House to go into Committee of Supply there is abundant opportunity for any hon. member to bring forward a resolution giving expression to his views. Feeling, therefore, that there is not that lack of opportunity that my hon. friend has in his mind, feeling that the rules that are established have been established for good purposes and should not be hastily changed, and feeling assured that under the existing practice there is ample opportunity for any hon. member in this House to bring forward a motion to give expression to his views, I hope the hon. member will not press his motion for a change in the rules.

Mr. A. B. HUDSON (South Winnipeg): When this matter came before the House at the last session I supported the motion moved by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) and supported it on this basis: that under the rules and practice of the English House of Commons a second amendment was permitted. I think I am correct in saying that it is still permitted. However, some 50 years ago there was an apparent misapprehension, and a different rule was adopted in this House, and that rule was subsequently followed. It seems to me that the practice as established in England should be adopted, particularly under the existing composition of the present House.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Perhaps it is incumbent on me, owing to the special privileges of the leader of an official opposition, referred to by the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Johnston) in his quotation from the Finance Minister, to declare myself on this matter. If I had regard only to party advantage I would be in favour, while I am in opposition, of the motion of my hon. friend and the object he has in view. The more amendments that can be moved the easier for an opposition to make the position of a government difficult. I am against the object of the motion, and being definitely against it, I cannot consistently support the motion itself looking to the appointment of a committee. I agree with the reasoning of the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) and agreeing with it. I think I should say so.

I do not know that it is the British practice to have an amendment to an amendment to the motion for Supply. I am not affirming that it is not. I have not looked into the question for some time. Even if it were, it would not persuade me that we should adopt that practice here. It must be recalled in this connection that in Great Britain they have not only a closure rule but a more drastic—I might almost say, a destructive—closure rule. They have not only one but several. They have powers vested in the majority that we never dreamed of exercising in this parliament—powers of forcing to a conclusion any debate, no matter how many amendments may be moved. For that reason there is not any particular danger in admitting of an amendment to an amendment to Supply, in the British House. We however have not in our parliament seen fit to adopt the extreme closure rules they have there and which they exercise almost daily. They do not always go to the last limit to exercise it, but they would, only for the fact that it is there, and members, knowing it is there, accede to a condition that does not require its exercise all the time. But as a matter of actual practice their control over the debate is exercised in a way we know nothing of in this parliament.

Parenthetically let me say I have been waiting now for eighteen months, or almost that, for the members of the government and the members of the party who support the government to come forward and destroy that awful monster against which they railed some years ago when the mild form of closure we have now in our rules was first adopted. I can recall how there were predictions of the collapse of the institution. Freedom was at an end, and it must be remembered that at that time these hon. members were in opposition; they rose and followed the lead of one distinguished orator among them who declared that in matters of trade, as well as in matters of rules of the House, he was for freedom on both counts of the indictment, and he demanded that this awful closure preventing freedom of speech be voted down. Even since the closure rules were adopted in 1913 up to the going out of power of the late government they were a constant subject of denunciation at the hands of hon. members opposite who saw in them something that really meant the destruction of free parliamentary government, or responsible government as they called it. I have been looking then for this government to bring in an amendment to the rules abolishing the closure that was adopted in 1913. So far I have waited in vain for any sign. Why? Because in every party, as the duties of parliament multiply, it becomes necessary that there be some control over the lengthening of debate and of discussion, if the business of the country is to be attended to and despatched, and we in this parliament have, I think, a rule that bears less heavily and harshly on oppositions than that adopted in any other parliament either in Great Britain or in any country where parliamentary government prevails.

Having regard to the nature of our closure rules, I think it would be a mistake to admit of an amendment to an amendment to Supply. I believe at the hands of an unscrupulous opposition business might be blocked. Such things have been known in this House, although hon. members to my left have had no experience of that kind. I have often wished they had sat in this parliament and known what it was to have an opposition conducted without any regard at all for any principle of fairness to the government, without any regard of the public interest. I often wished they had witnessed it. But if an amendment to an amendment to Supply is to be permitted, under our closure rule it seems to me that it would be possible to so block public business that reasonable expedition could not be exercised and reasonable progress could not be made. Nor do I think any hardship results under the present rules. I followed the reasoning of the hon Minister of Finance in that regard. There is no special right on the part of the official opposition in regard to amendments. The right to move an amendment to Supply is open to any group or any member just as it is open to me. It might be moved by myself or any hon. member behind me. It might have been moved by any member of the Progressive party at least a score of times this session, but no such motion was made. Hon. members say "But when a motion is made we cannot find ourselves just satisfied with either the amendment or the main motion". Then if they are not satisfied the thing to do is to vote against it.

Mr. SHAW: My right hon. friend, perhaps, does not quite understand. Suppose an amendment such as the one proposed last year by the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) were voted upon, and we presume voted down, would it not then be in order for anybody else to move an amendment at that time, after the disposition of the first amendment?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think that can be done on an amendment to Supply, or Ways and Means. Supply Ways and Means are in the same category as respects the rule. This motion calls for a committee to inquire "into the advisability of adopting a rule of the House which will provide that an amendment to an amendment be allowed," so that the point brought up by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Shaw) would not be pertinent to this resolution.

Mr. SHAW: I quite agree to that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was confining my remarks to the resolution. I think if the resolution read differently, I would oppose it too; but we do not need to discuss that now. The resolution as it reads calls for permission to move an amendment to an amendment. I do not know why there is any embarrassment. What hon. members vote on as regards an amendment to Supply is this; they vote on the merits of that amendment. If my hon. friends to my left, on a motion to go into Supply, desired to move an amendment, I am sure that that amendment would contain no embarrassment for me, nor, I believe for any member of this group. If it were an amendment such as was proposed by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Shaw) some time ago, in line precisely with what we had urged ourselves, we would support it. If it was opposed to that, inconsistent with that, we would oppose it. We would not need to express our views by moving an amendment to it. We could simply wait for Supply the next time and then move our amendment. There are no restraints that fall on us particularly, and consequently we have nothing we can complain of. For that reason, I do not see why there is any need to amplify the rule in this regard. I think it will tend to prolixity of discussion, to the hampering of public business, and for that reason I am opposed to such an amendment to the rule, were such an amendment to the rule before the House. Being of that opinion, I do not see why I should support the appointment of a committee to consider arriving at a result, which result I do not think would be beneficial to the business of the House.

Mr. ALFRED SPEAKMAN (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I rise on this occasion with a good deal of diffidence, because I recognize that a large part of the debate upon this question, if there be a debate must centre around parliamentary procedure of the past, and from that point of view, I acknowledge myself incompetent to speak. I shall not attempt to discuss the matter from that point of view at all. I shall endeavour rather to give the reasons why we feel it would be fair and right that we should be in a position to move an amendment to the amendment if we so wished; or that if we were not in a position where we were debarred, any other considerable body of opinion as represented by a third party in this House, should be placed in that position. We believe it would be in the public interest that any considerable body of opinion as represented by any large party in this House, should be given the right, not only to express their views by way of debate, not only to advance their views by way of argument, but to be able to put their ideas forward in concrete form and to back those ideas by their vote at the time that they wished to exercise that right. That is the reason why we have now moved for the appointment of this committee.

We recognise to some extent the objections. During the debate of last year, objections were brought forward very eloquently. We also presented our point of view, and I am not going to repeat what was said at that time. But we felt then that we were placed in an almost impossible position. I do not mean, as is suggested, that we were embarrassed by either the amendment or the budget itself; but we were placed in this position, that our vote had to be a purely negative vote, not a positive vote. We were not voting for something in which we believed; but we were giving a purely negative vote, voting against two things, neither of which were satisfactory from our point of view. We do not believe that is a fair or just position in which any large body of opinion in this House or in this country should be placed, and that again is our reason for bringing this matter forward at this time. During the discussion, it was pointed out, and I have no doubt quite correctly,—we have no quarrel with the decision rendered at that time— that it was impossible for us, under the rules of the House, to bring in such a second amendment, and while we, of course, challenged the decision, this was merely for the purpose of reaffirming our position in the matter. But we were also told at that time that if we wished to have the rules of the House amended, the proper procedure was to bring the matter forward by way of resolution and to have the matter discussed on its merits at that time. That is the form which our motion is taking at the present time. Several objections have been advanced to that. One is that it would so lengthen the discussion on the budget as to hamper public business; that there would be a great deal more discussion, more debate on the point, if we were allowed to introduce a second amendment To my mind, that is hardly consistent with the view that has been expressed that we are at liberty to advance our arguments at as great length as we wish on the budget itself. A discussion would take place; a discussion, no doubt, will take place whether we are allowed to move a second amendment or not. The only point will be that without our amendment on which we can speak and vote, the discussion will have to be largely academic, and we wish to have it to the point.

If I understood the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) correctly, he stated that the right to move that amendment was not confined to the leader of the official opposition. Possibly not; but most certainly we, the new members in this House, believed it was the custom of this House to accord that courtesy to the official leader of the Opposition, and to give him the first right to move an amendment if he so wished We felt this was so much in accord with procedure that we did not criticise that right at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Conceding that for the moment, was the hon. gentleman or his leader not in a position the very next day, when Supply would come up again, to move the exact position of those he represented? So, where is the hardship?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: That is quite possible. I am not, of course, going to get into an argument on the matter of rules and procedure with the leader of the Opposition; but we feel that the one time when our views can be advanced with force is at the time when the budget is brought down and the amendment to the budget brought in. We can no doubt bring our views forward at other times; but we wish to bring them forward when we shall have an equal opportunity for discussion, and when our amendment will carry the same weight in the country as the budget or the amendment to the budget. It is for that reason that we ask this House to appoint a committee to go into this matter and, if possible, to amend the rules of the House so that they will conform, not so much with the ancient practice of this House, but with actual conditions which now confront this House. We may be correct or incorrect in believing that the day of the purely two-party system has gone; but that is a matter of conjecture. It is not, however, a matter of conjecture that at the present time the two-party system has ceased to exist, and it is in order to bring the rules of this House into accord with actual conditions as they now exist in this House and in the country, that we make this motion.

Mr. T. W. BIRD (Nelson): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter of very great importance to the party in this corner of the House, and I fail to see the force of the argument of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) as to the need for concentration. As I apprehend it, the only way to centre the mind of the House upon a question is to eliminate in an orderly fashion the minority views that prevail on a given question. If you do not permit us by an amendment to the amendment to do that, to discuss our views, the result will be that when we get back to the main motion we will express our views just the same. Then where is your concentration? I have great faith in the time-honoured rules of order that have obtained in debate from ancient times, methods of accelerating the business of a meeting or of a legislative assembly by eliminating one by one the views of the various elements therein.

With regard to the argument of the right hon. leader of the Opposition, (Mr. Meighen) relative to the closure, I do not see why the privilege of moving an amendment to the amendment need be abused and become a tool in the hands of an unscrupulous opposition, as he says, for dilatory purposes. If there is any danger of this happening, cannot we overcome it by permitting not many amendments to the amendment, but only one? So long as there are three parties in the House I think it is a fair proposition to allow an amendment to the amendment. This need not invite trouble from an unscrupulous opposition. Oppositions have not any right to be unscrupulous anyway. Therefore I think this objection could be overcome in the way I have indicated.

Mr. MORIN: My hon. friend says there are three parties. What about the Labour party.

Mr. IRVINE: Hear, hear.

Mr. BIRD: Well, as soon as the labour party attains to such dimensions that it can reasonably claim the right to another amendment I would be very glad to extend that privilege to it.

Mr. IRVINE: What are the dimensions?

Mr. BIRD: With respect to the argument of the right hon. leader of the Opposition as to the privilege which any one of us has of moving an amendment to the amendment, will not that fact place the Speaker in rather the awkward position of having to discriminate between the two oppositions? Will it not put him in this position, that one year he will have to permit the official opposition this privilege and the next year the unofficial opposition? Now, I do not think we ought to place the Speaker in that position. I think it would be more consonant with the dignity of this House to frame a rule to permit the third party to move an amendment to the amendment.

Then in regard to discussing the merits of a motion, what are the merits of a given amendment? What were the merits, for instance, of the amendment moved last session by the official opposition? Did its merits consist in its verbal construction or in the motive that lay behind it? I guarantee that under the circumstances in which we are at the present time the official opposition carries on its duties with no other purpose than some day to attain power at any price, because after all that is the time-honoured duty of an official opposition. Under traditional usages an official opposition is not expected to offer any constructive suggestions that may be of benefit to the country, but is always to direct its energies to destructive criticisms, to a strenuous effort to oust the government from power. Therefore I say it is impossible for a third party to judge of the merits of an amendment moved by an official opposition. The amendment last year, while it was agreeable to us verbally, was so disagreeable to us in its motive that we could not support it. We believed that its purpose was not only to embarrass the government but also to embarrass us. Undoubtedly its purpose was incidentally to align us with the official opposition as being in favour of what practically amounted to a resolution of want of confidence in the government. I repeat, it is impossible for a third party to decide at a given moment upon the merits of an amendment moved by an official opposition, because this official opposition is actuated primarily by a desire to attain office.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will my hon. friend permit me a question? He was arguing a moment ago, was he not, that the duty and regular practice of an official opposition is to oppose the government's position irrespective of the merits? Am I right in that?

Mr. BIRD: Yes, that is what I was arguing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman reflect on what is being done at the present moment? Am I not supporting the government and is he not opposing?

Mr. BIRD: The exception sometimes proves the rule.

Mr. RINFRET: There are other cases.

Mr. BIRD: But I was arguing not the present position of the leader of the official opposition, but his usual practice, which I think bears out what I was setting forth as the traditional attitude of an official opposition.

Mr. CALDWELL: There is a morganatic alliance once in a while.

Mr. BIRD: Under the two party system as it has obtained here and in Great Britain, the duty of the official opposition is to obstruct and criticize, never to help, and under all circumstances its one motive is to oust the government from office. So long as the right hon. gentleman occupies his present position he will have to approximate to the traditional standard, otherwise I think he will not be fulfilling the duties that his party will demand of him.

If this usage had any reasonable tradition behind it one would hesitate to suggest its removal, but so far as I can see it came into being through pure accident and has maintained itself simply by its own inertia. For that reason, for its lack of support in tradition and in general usage, and for the injustice it works on this party in muzzling and preventing us from expressing our views on the merits of a question, I certainly shall most cordially support the resolution.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall not take up the time of the House in speaking at any length on this resolution because I realize that in our rules and practices there is nothing which counts for so much as experience in parliamentary affairs, and in comparison with that of many hon. members my experience has been exceedingly limited. I would feel that the House was entitled to give every consideration to any expression of view by so old and distingushed a parliamentarian as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). And may I also say that I think the House should receive with great respect and consideration the views of one who has been a member for so long a time as the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) and who takes so thoughtful and so keen an interest in all matters pertaining to parliamentary procedure.

The hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Johnston) proposes a change in a rule which has been in existence ever since confederation. I would draw attention to the circumstance that the support likely to be given his motion comes almost exclusively from hon. members who have been at most one or two years in parliament. I think our experience thus far goes to show that many hon. members sitting opposite are beginning to find that many rules and practices which at the outset they were inclined to look upon as irksome or cumbersome, have, after all, the weight of experience behind them and are not by any means useless or burdensome, but that, on the contrary, they make for expedition in the work of parliament, and, indeed, for clearness in all matters pertaining to public discussion.

Reference has been made by the hon. member for South Winnipeg (Mr. Hudson) to what he alleges to be a somewhat different practice in England; and the last speaker (Mr. Bird) has suggested that in our present practice we are not following the English rule but are taking a less enlightened view. May I quote from a decision which was given by His Honour the Speaker on June 6, 1922, a passage which is pertinent to this point. At that time Mr. Speaker said:

> In Great Britain, more than one amendment may be moved on the motion that the Speaker leave the chair for the House to go into committee of Supply or Ways and Means, but it is done on conditions quite different from the practice in this House. Whenever an amendment is moved striking out all the words after "That" from the main motion, the Speaker puts the question "That all the words proposed to be left out stand part of the question." If this is voted in the negative, amendments and sub-amendments are allowed, but if it is voted in the affirmative, they are not.
> The practical meaning of this procedure is that the House grants leave to move the amendment. In another sense it is nothing more nor less than the previous question.

When one comes to look into the rules of the British House and compare them with our own, one will see that the same object is sought to be obtained by both.

The hon. member who has just taken his seat and the mover of the resolution have urged that conditions are different at the present time; that we have three groups in the House, whereas the rules were intended to meet conditions where there are only two. There are one or two observations I should like to make in this connection. First, there is no reason why a subsequent parliament might not have four groups, each of which may wish to press its particular view at the same time and in much the same way as hon. gentlemen opposite who belong to the present third group. The danger of amending the rules to meet any particular situation is that they then become applicable for all future occasions, and the possible mischief that is being worked in an unseen direction may be greater than the evil it is attempted to cure. The circumstance that we have three groups at this time does not, it seems to me, justify our changing practices which have been established ever since the days of confederation.

Moreover, having three groups in the House is not a thing which is entirely new to British parliamentary institutions. In the British parliament there have been at different times large and important groups, and the British government and parliament have been called upon to consider what was the best practice to adopt to meet such situations. They have not, however, on that score altered their procedure. May I in this connection quote a further paragraph from the decision of Mr. Speaker to which I have just referred, and which seems to be very pertinent to the subject. It is to the effect that, after all, the duty of the Speaker is not to recognize groups but to regard all individuals in the House as having equal rights in his presence. The paragraph I wish to quote is as follows:

As to the suggestion—

It refers to the case that was alluded to a moment ago.

—to give the hon. member for Marquette and his supporters the opportunity of expressing their views upon the budget proposals, I must say that the Speaker, in his interpretation of the rules, is not at liberty to recognize the existence of parties or groups in the House. Although he has to observe certain amenities in giving precedence to leaders in debate, he presides over an assembly of the people's representatives where every member has an equal right of using the rules and usages to express his views on public matters.

In England, although the Home Rule party under Mr. Parnell and his successors consisted of a large group, it never was given an official status in parliamentary procedure. Even to-day, there are at Westminster several groups or parties, but they are all subject to the same rules of procedure. All the members are on an equal footing. I think our rules and practice based on precedents, traditions, and usages give every hon. member ample opportunity to put himself on record upon any question.

That, I think, summarizes conclusively the position we have been discussing, and the force of that view ought to carry weight with hon. members in considering whether it is wise at this moment to endeavour to meet a present situation by changing rules that have been found to be of advantage in the carrying on of the business of the House for some fifty or sixty years.

I would like to say this further word. There are already a number of special committees of the House at work. The time of a good many hon. members is taken up in that connection, and if there is to be a special committee to consider this matter it would seem advisable that other rules—and there are some that would stand revision—should be taken into consideration at the same time. I submit it would be better for the House to examine all the rules which it thinks are in need of revision, and when appointing a special committee give to the committee the work of an entire revision.

However, coming to the main point, namely, the opportunity of hon. members to express their views, I can only repeat what has already been said so effectively; that the rules of the House are such as to permit every hon. member and every group, not only in one particular but in many, to present the views they wish to put forward either as individual members or as expressing the sentiment of the groups to which they belong. The old established rule of the limitation to one amendment on the budget has been in existence, as I have said, for a long time without a change, simply because of the virtue it holds in itself—and that, I trust, the House will not readily sacrifice.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. SPEAKER: The reply of the mover will close the debate.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Mr. Speaker, despite all that has been said, I still think that the rules of this House are made to serve the purposes of hon. members of the House, not the government. This being the case, I still feel that the House should grant our request and give us a special committee.

The right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) referred to the fact that there was no rule—I am afraid I shall not be able to state this in exact language—that the Speaker should see the leader of the official opposition first in case of an amendment to any motion being moved. Well, it would seem to me that if our request were granted and we were given the right to move a second amendment, it would relieve you, Sir, from a very embarrassing position. Having seen the leader of the official opposition first last year, I would take it that it would be only just and fair under existing rules if you were to see the leader of this group first this year. If that is the case, I would for the time being accede to the request of the right hon. the Prime Minister and withdraw my motion, with a view to having a special committee appointed to inquire into the whole matter of the revision of the rules at another session. But this particular rule, Mr. Speaker, is not so well founded as some hon. members would make it appear. In 1855 Mr. Speaker Smith gave a ruling that but one amendment could be moved when the House was moved into Committee of Supply, but in 1860 he reversed that ruling. So we have precedent for the change we are asking for at this time.

The hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Shaw), put a question to the right hon. leader of the Opposition whether if one amendment had been moved and voted down could a second amendment to the main motion be moved? We have a direct ruling on that to the contrary. No second amendment to the main motion may be moved. I feel that if these rules are to serve the purpose of this House at the present time an amendment is necessary. The Minister of Finance in speaking on another matter in this House this session made use of the phrase "We are dealing with a condition, not a theory." That is what we are confronted with here to-day. There is no use conjecturing about how many parties may come to this House in the future. There may be a score. We shall have to deal with that condition when we meet it. At the present time we have three parties, and I think it is only right and fair that a group consisting of sixty members of this House should be given the right to move a second amendment when the House is moved into Committee of Supply or Ways and Means.

Motion negatived.

EQUALIZATION OF RAILWAY RATES

STATEMENT BY MR. SPEAKER

Mr. SPEAKER: Before I leave the chair I would ask the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen), who was not in his seat when this matter came up, to study with some of the older members of the House the point which was raised when the motion of Mr. Clark came before the House a short while ago. I have examined the question since, and my mind is perturbed. I am not decided to give a ruling, and I would like to have enlightenment from the older members of the House. The question will likely come up on Wednesday, if I mistake not, and before giving the ruling I would like to hear the opinion of some of the older members of the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In that point, Mr. Speaker, I think it has been arranged that the motion will come up on Monday instead of Wednesday.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 11.27 p.m.

Tuesday, March 20, 1923

The House met at three o'clock.

REPORT

First report of the select standing committee on Marine and Fisheries.—Mr. Duff.

GREAT LAKES DISARMAMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I beg to lay on the Table copy of papers, correspondence, documents, etc., passed between the government of Canada and the government of the United States relative to the Great Lakes disarmament question. This is the correspondence asked for by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) a few days ago. The return includes only such correspondence as took place betwen the termination of the war and the taking of office by the present administration. The correspondence that has taken place since relates to matters still under negotiation and is therefore not brought down at present.

ALLEGED INCOMPLETE RETURN

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. STEVENS: On March 12 the House passed an order for return of all correspondence, etc., between the Attorney General of British Columbia and the Solicitor General. The return contains one letter from the Attorney General in which the following occurs: "With reference to the above matter and my letter of the 16th," etc. Another letter indicates that a communication not included in the return had been sent by the Solicitor General; the reference is to "your letters of the 16th and 26th." I would respectfully direct the attention of the ministry to the fact that this return is incomplete and that the letter of the 16th ought to be brought down in compliance with the order of the House of March 12.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Solicitor General (Mr. McKenzie) is not in his seat at the moment. I shall have pleasure in directing his attention to my hon. friend's remarks.

PRIVILEGE—MR. BANCROFT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. BANCROFT: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. In the morning papers it is suggested that I supported the amendment moved last night by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) to the titles resolution. I think you called my name, Mr. Speaker, as seconder, but I did not understand that that implicated me in any way. I may say that I took a geat deal of satisfaction in voting against both the amendment moved by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and the main motion moved by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner). I may say also that I take a great deal of pleasure in sharing this desk with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, but I do not want to be put in any postiion where I have to support all his amendments or all his resolutions, or his bills on immigration.

Mr. SPEAKER: I may say that I read the motion in amendment as being moved by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bancroft). The names were written on the motion.

Mr. NEILL: I took the precaution, Sir, to write the name on the motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: As we say in French, "L'honneur est sauf." The incident is therefore closed.

HALIBUT FISHERIES TREATY

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to refer to a return brought down on Friday evening, for the purpose of asking a question of the ministry. The return embodies the correspondence relating to the recent signing of the Halibut Fisheries Treaty. By the return it is disclosed that the government has attempted to make a treaty binding only on the inhabitants and nationals of Canada on our part and on the inhabitants and nationals of the United States on the other, and it appears that in respect of the execution—the negotiations having been, properly, conducted by the Dominion—the courtesy of signature by the British Ambassador was denied by the Prime Minister and denied in the name of Canada. The result of the terms of the treaty and of its execution in this new fangled manner appears to have been a rider on the part of the United States Senate in its resolution of ratification, which rider provides that the treaty shall be applicable on our part as respects not only our nationals and our inhabitants but as respects also those of Great Britain. What I wish to put to the government is this: as the correspondence, according to the file brought down, closed on the fifth of March, and as the United States ratification is conditional on its application to Great Britain, whose sanction, of course, does not appear, owing to the absence of any signature representing the British government, what is the present position of the treaty? Will there be a treaty upon ratification by this House, and what is the intention of the government as respects the United States Senate's proviso on ratification?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): I do not think that what my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) has called the rider will create any difficulty as to the ratification of the treaty. The United States senate ratified the treaty on the understanding that the nationals of "other parts of Great Britain"—the phrasecology is rather queer—would also be prevented from fishing for halibut in those waters. This is very easy to do. As far as the territorial waters are concerned both countries, the United States and Canada, will by legislation prevent any halibut fishing. As far as the extra-territorial waters are concerned no vessel from any country can carry on halibut fishing without using either United States or Canadian ports. It will be easy in the legislation which will have to be enacted by the United States Congress and by the parliament of Canada to close Canadian and American ports to any vessel carrying on halibut fishing. Consequently, I do not see any difficulty in the ratification of the treaty.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Do I understand that the Canadian government proposes to carry out the terms of a treaty which by the ratification is applicable to British citizens generally and not to Canadian nationals alone, by means of prohibitive Canadian legislation against other British citizens and not by securing the voluntary concurrence of those other citizens by means of the signature of the ambassador of Great Britain.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The Canadian legislation will apply to all the countries of the world. The fishing of halibut will be prohibited in those waters and the restrictions which will be enacted by the parliament of Canada will apply to everybody in the world.

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (George Etienne Cartier): I see a statement in the press this morning to the effect that this convention will not be considered completed until such time as the British government ratifies it. Will the government give us any information on this point?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I think probably there is a great deal of misuse of terms in some of the expressions that appear. Ratification is an act of the sovereign. No treaty will be complete until the sovereign has ratified it. I presume in regard to this treaty that His Majesty will act upon the advice of his government in this country, and such advice as the government will give His Majesty will be based upon the approval by this parliament of the legislation that is brought down.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I observe as well that in the correspondence the assurance is given by His Majesty of the prevention to the utmost of his power of all infringement and of all acts on the part of his subjects contrary to the terms of this treaty. Is that assurance still relied on inasmuch as the British government's representative at Washington has since been denied the right to sign?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not know that the expression is correct that my right hon. friend uses, that the British representative at Washington was denied the right to sign. The government asked that one of its ministers be given full powers to sign. The British government aproved of that request and gave full powers to the minister to sign. These full powers were regarded as sufficient both by the Canadian government and by the British government. I think that ought to answer the point which my right hon. friend raised. As to any assurance which the British government or His Majesty has given, there is no doubt in the mind of anyone, I presume, that that will be carried out.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Just one statement—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is nothing in the correspondence to indicate—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: —that the British government approved of this new method of signing treaties.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I have allowed the questions so far because this is an important matter which may well be brought up before the Orders of the Day, but I would ask hon. members to kindly reserve any further questions on this subject until we come to discuss the various clauses of the treaty.

OLEOMARGARINE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. MEIGHEN: I want to ask the government whether, having regard to the resolution passed by this House last session on the subject of the admission of oleomargarine, and to the fact that the bill subsequently introduced expires in its effect on the 31st of August, it is their intention to introduce legislation providing for an extension of the time, permanent or temporary, for the admission of oleomargarine? Perhaps I should address my question to and ask for reply from both the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Finance.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As these two gentlemen could not reply at once, I might answer my right hon. friend on their behalf. There is on the order paper a resolution on the subject, and the government has been withholding its decision in the matter until the subject has been discussed. After it has been debated the government will be in a better position to answer my right hon. friend's question.

MR. JAMES LARKIN

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Perhaps the government is in a position now to answer the question I asked several days ago as to why Mr. James Larkin was refused admission into Canada.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Mr. James Larkin was rejected at Highwater, P.Q., on the 13th instant because he refused to answer questions put by the examining officer. He was rejected because of refusal to answer the ordinary questions that are asked those seeking admission to Canada. He appealed, and I was somewhat doubtful whether the proper grounds had been taken. I consulted with the Justice department, who are of the opinion that Mr. Larkin was properly rejected under subsection 2 of section 33 of the Immigration Act, which reads as follows:

> Every passenger or other person seeking to enter or land in Canada shall answer truly all questions put to him by any officer when examined under the authority of this act, and any person not truly answering such questions shall be guilty of an offence and liable on conviction to a fine of not more than one hundred dollars or to a term of imprisonment, and if found not to be a Canadian citizen or not to have Canadian domicile, such offence shall in itself be sufficient cause for deportation whenever so ordered by a board of inquiry or officer in charge, subject, however, to such right of appeal as he may have to the minister.

The Justice department found we were quite correct in our contention. In addition, Mr. Larkin had just been released from serving a prison sentence, and on that ground I confirmed his rejection.

BANK ACT REVISION

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

> Resolved that it is expedient to revise the law relating to banking, to continue until the first day of July, 1933, the charters of the several banks to which the provisions of the Bank Act apply, to authorize the payment out of Consolidated Revenue Fund of remuneration to auditors for special examinations of the affairs or business of banks which the Minister of Finance may require to be made, and to provide for the charge of fees in connection with the registration of securities taken under the authority of the provisions of the act.

Motion agreed to and House went into committee, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mr. FIELDING: Mr. Chairman, the resolution before you is a formality, necessary under our parliamentary practice, as the basis of a bill which is to be introduced immediately on the adoption of the resolution. I think, perhaps, the House will be convenienced if I proceed at once, on the motion before us, to state the nature of the bill which I shall have the pleasure of introducing shortly. In that measure the government will bring the best possible judgment they can to bear upon a question of the highest importance, and one of wide-spread interest. I cannot venture the hope that the conclusions we have reached will be received with unanimity. I am well aware that the question is one concerning which there there will be differences of opinion, but I am going to ask, and I think it reasonable to do so, that hon. gentlemen reserve their judgment in the matter, until they have had an opportunity of examining the bill, and, what perhaps is of more importance, an opportunity of participating in or observing the inquiry which will take place before the committee on Banking and Commerce. So soon as the early stages of this bill are disposed of, it is my intention to ask the House to refer the bill to the committee on Banking and Commerce, where there will be abundant opportunity for raising every question in relation to it, and the fullest possible opportunity for inquiry and discussion.

The Bank Act is the fruit of the study of a long line of ministers of finance, of governments and parliaments, and I feel that in the main it has served a good purpose; it has proved itself adapted to the needs of Canada; and I venture the opinion—which, possibly, will not be shared by everybody—that any radical change in the act at present would have a disturbing effect upon the business of the country; it is a class of question upon which we shall do well, I think to go slowly.

At every revision of the Bank Act a question of paramount importance has been raised concerning government inspection. Every minister of finance who has preceded me has, after consideration, reached the conclusion that it was not wise to adopt a system of government inspection. I have myself—in my own experience where I have had to do with a former revision—taken that view, and I adhere to that view at present. With our wide-spread system of branch banks any adequate system of inspection would call for a small army of officials; it would involve large expenditure, and my own impression is, that in the end you would have no better guarantee of the soundness of a bank, after government inspection, than you have under the present system. If the auditors who passed on the affairs of the Merchants bank had had a label on their caps denoting that they were government officials I have no reason to suppose that they would have been more capable, more intelligent, or more energetic. I have great respect for government authority in some cases, but it may be overdone. I do not believe government inspection would give you any greater real protection than you now have, but it would, I think, give a false security, it would create the impression in the minds of the people that the government were guaranteeing the transactions of a bank, and whenever trouble might occur—and it is worth while remembering that where government inspection prevails bank failures are not rare—wherever trouble might occur and a bank failed, then, if you had a system of government inspection, there would unquestionably be a desire to hold the government responsible. Embarrassment and trouble, perhaps material loss to the government, would follow. In declining at present to concur in the idea of government inspection I want to protect the public—that is the people at large, and parliament—against the responsibility which I think they should not be willing to bear. So, after much reflection and with the knowledge that that is one of the big questions of the day, I am not of the opinion that we should advise parliament to adopt a system of government inspection.

I have said that I believe the general framework of the Bank Act is a good one. Nevertheless, with every revision we learn something. We have learned something undoubtedly during the past ten years, and we will endeavour, in the suggestions we offer, to show that the lessons of these years have not been lost. We will endeavour to improve the Bank Act while not making any radical departure from its general outline.

While we are not going to adopt a system of government inspection, we will endeavour to improve the present system of audit, and I think that is an important point. The present system of audit, shareholders' audit, is that a list of proposed auditors is prepared by the Canadian Bankers' Association and sent to the Minister of Finance. He has the right to strike off from that list any name of which he may not approve. I am proposing to adhere largely to that system but to make it, I think, more rigid, so that the public will have a better audit, a better guarantee of audit, than they have at present. Under the law of to-day the Bankers' Association forwards this list of persons who desire to be auditors, but there is no particular qualification required of them. I propose that the Bankers' Association shall still prepare a list, but that that list shall be confined strictly to chartered accountants; that those who are to act as auditors for the shareholders must be chartered accountants, and must have practised their profession as chartered accountants for a period of six years in a city or town in Canada where there is a head office of a bank. I think when we put that condition in we go a long way towards obtaining capable auditors. Many of the firms of chartered accountants comprise quite a number of members. I propose that in no case shall more than three members of any one firm be allowed to have a place on that list. We think that in this way we shall get capable auditors, members of the Chartered Accountants' Association of Canada. I believe there are chartered accountants' organizations in the various provinces, and they are federated into a Dominion association. We propose that the Dominion association shall supply a list of the members who are eligible under the condition I have laid down. I think it will necessarily follow that if you take chartered accountants who have been practising their profession for some years in one of our cities where there is the head office of a bank you have a reasonable assurance that you will obtain capable men of good standing. I think in that respect we shall give to the House and to the public a better guarantee of audit than we now have. We propose that every bank must have two auditors; under the Bank Act to-day you may have one or more. We propose that there shall be two auditors chosen by the shareholders, and that they shall not both be members of the one firm, they must belong to different firms; and they shall not be auditors for the one bank for more than three years in succession. We think these several suggestions will give to the public a guarantee that the auditors will be capable, that they will be independent; and the auditors will be changed with sufficient frequency to guard against anything going wrong.

Another question that is of very much importance, upon which I am going to make, shall I say?—a disappointing remark, is in relation to bank mergers. Bank mergers are not popular. The merger of any two banks, particularly the merger of two of the larger banks, undoubtedly makes towards a restriction of banking operation. It tends towards the creation, if there be such a thing, of a banking monopoly. I know that usually bank mergers are not popular. I know that more than one suggestion has been offered that no bank should be allowed to amalgamate with another unless they obtain authority by a special act of parliament. Some members may be disposed to approve of that suggestion; my own judgment is that it is too drastic a change. There are times when mergers may be useful, and not only that but I know of a case where a bank was beginning to get into trouble, but the matter being taken up in time it was amalgamated with another bank, the situation was saved and all went well. So I think there will be occasions when, if you do not use the power which exists under the present law to authorize a merger through the Treasury Board, the Minister of Finance, and the Governor in Council, you may have a financial disaster which could have been avoided had you dealt with the situation in time. I am willing to have the matter fully threshed out before the Banking and Commerce committee, but my impression is that you must trust the government of the day, the Minister of Finance of the day and the Treasury Board, to exercise due precaution and to see that mergers are not approved of, unless they are clearly and undoubtedly in the public interests. I am persuaded that to deny the government, and the Minister of Finance and the Treasury Board that power and to say that there can be no merger until you have a special act of parliament, is an arrangement that would not work well and might at times prevent a merger which is really desirable and necessary in the interests of the public. On this point there may be disappointment in some quarters. When we talk about protecting the public in banking matters, we had better stop and think, who are the public we want to protect? There are various interests in the public, when we use that word.

In the first place, you have the note-holders. If the government and the parliament of Canada give to the bank the right to issue notes for circulation, then surely the government and the parliament of Canada must take measures to see that the notes are protected. That is done; the notes to-day are secured in two ways. In the first place, they are a first charge upon all the assets of the bank, and that is usually almost in itself a sufficient protection. Then, besides, there is an insurance fund created by all the banks, to which they all contribute in order to create an additional guarantee that the notes will be protected. Thus the notes are protected, I think I may safely say, beyond any question.

Then you have the depositors. They are not as well protected as the note holders. The protection in the case of the depositors is the protection given to any creditors who have a claim against the bank. But then you have besides the double liability of the shareholders, which stands between the depositors and loss. In most cases it will be found that the existing provisions with regard to depositors work fairly well. If something can be found in the course of discussion which is better than these provisions I am willing to receive it with an open mind. The depositors do not often suffer. There have been eight bank failures in the last 20 years. In the case of five of those failures the depositors never lost a penny. In three of those failures the banks which were smaller institutions, are still in liquidation, but the depositors stand to lose. I think it is desirable we should protect the depositors, and if anybody can suggest, in the course of the inquiry, any better method of protecting the depositor, I am quite willing to receive it and give it due consideration, though I do not think there is as much danger of the depositors losing now as in former days. However, that is a fair matter for consideration.

You come then to the shareholders, who are the bank. The shareholder is not exactly in the same position as the depositor. He is the trustee of the depositor, He is after all only a member of a trading corporation, and I think we have as much reason to ask the shareholder in the bank to look after his own interests as we have to ask the shareholder in any other corporation to do so. We are giving the shareholders—that is the banks—large privileges in the way of circulation, but I do not think that creates a special obligation whereby we should look after them, except in the general way that all corporations are supposed to have the protection of our laws. I do not think we can undertake to make the shareholder's position as good as we do the position of the note-holders or the depositors. I am afraid the shareholder must be asked, as in any other corporation, to look after his own interests as much as he can, and not to expect the government to give him exceptional and special protection.

There is another clause in the Bank Act which has given rise to much discussion, commonly known as section 88. That section gives a prior lien to the bank in certain cases. There has been much discussion of that clause in time past. There has been much criticism even in Canada, and outside of Canada it has frequently been the subject of criticism. It is claimed that the merchant abroad—and it might be true of those at home—who sells goods to a merchant in Canada, and is not able to look after his own interests, finds, when trouble occurs, that the bank has prior claim to everything. When the unpaid vendor comes to assert his claim, he finds the bank, by its prior right, has possession of the goods. When I was in England recently I was waited upon, by a deputation of the Bradford Chamber of Commerce, who made strong representations in that respect. They claimed that many English exporters had suffered severely in recent years. I think some measure of their loss was probably due to their rather reckless method of selling. However, there is some room for criticism in the fact that the bank has priority. There are men who would advocate the total abolition of section 88. I do not think such a course would be wise. That provision has performed a large and important part in the development of Canadian business, and I believe the repeal of that clause would work injuriously. What I am proposing now is not to repeal the clause, but that he who desires to operate under section 88 shall give notice in a public way, so that all who are concerned shall know what he is doing. I propose that any merchant or manufacturer in Canada who desires to borrow from the bank under the provisions of section 88—that is the provision which will give the bank a prior claim—must give notice in the registry office of his intention to do so. The registrar will be the Assistant Receiver General in each province. The bank will see that he registers, otherwise they will not give him the money. If the merchant at home or abroad is concerned about section 88, all he has to do is to write or telegraph to the Assistant Receiver General in the province and ascertain whether any registration has been made. If the man who is proposing to do business has been registered under section 88, all who do business with him will know that they must recognize the priority of the bank. If he gives no such notice, the bank will have no priority. I hope we shall go a long way in removing the criticisms that have been made of this section 88.

There have been questions regarding the allotment of stock, by a bank. It has been alleged in some cases that it has been contemplated that stock dividends should be declared. I do not think it has actually been done. The question has been raised whether dividends of that kind could be declared. We propose to make it clear that, whatever stock of that kind is issued and allotted, the shareholder who purchases the stock must pay in cash. and that no stock dividends shall be allowed.

There are quite a number of small amendments with which I shall not deal. Amendments will be printed in the bill in italics when it is presented to the House. I do not think I had better detain the House by referring to more than the important sections. There are some clauses which have become obsolete, and which are omitted. For example, there is the clause respecting the bank of British North America, which was an institution operating under exceptional conditions. That institution has been amalgamated with another bank, and so the conditions regarding it no longer exist. There were also provisions regarding fifty-dollar shares, which are no longer necessary, as the banks now generally conform to the custom of issuing hundred-dollar shares. In the returns that are made showing the banks' property we are asking a change, we are asking that the bank, in dealing with the value of their property shall include not only the property which stands in their name, but the property which stands in the name of any corporation which they control. The banks have formed subsidiary companies which are practically branches of the bank and controlled by the bank in every way. We propose that, as respects the holding of property and as respects assets and liabilities, the returns shall show the operation of these companies the same as the operation of what I may call the bank proper. That will apply to any corporation that is controlled by the bank.

Most of the banks now have a pension fund for their employees—I am not sure whether they all have. It was found in the case of a recent bank failure that moneys designed to protect the pension fund were invested in bank stock, and when the bank stock took a tumble, the pension fund took a tumble, too. We propose that hereafter banks having pension funds shall not be permitted to invest money for the pension fund in stock of their own bank or any other bank whatsoever.

As regards bank directors, it is sometimes said that "directors do not direct." There are cases in which men who have long and honourable association with a bank desire to have their names retained on the board of directors, even when they have reached a condition where it is well known that they are not able to give close attention. I think there is an honourable purpose in that, and I would not say that it should not be done. We are proposing to introduce a clause to the effect that a record shall be kept of every bank board meeting, showing what directors have attended the meeting, and that before the next annual meeting is called upon to elect directors, that record, showing how many meetings were held and how many meetings each director attended, should be placed in the hands of the shareholders, who can then judge whether they wish to continue those directors in the service.

Some troubles have arisen owing to officials of a bank kindly lending themselves the bank's funds. We propose an amendment by which we declare that no general manager, assistant general manager, bank manager or any official, clerk or servant, can have a loan exceeding $1,000 without the consent of the directors, and he cannot have more than $10,000 even with the consent of the directors. If a bank manager or any one associated with him wants to do a little speculation, he will have to go to another bank and not get the funds out of his own bank.

There is one other provision of some importance. The bank law says, and has said for many years, that the word "bank" shall not be used by any person or corporation other than a chartered bank. This is a wise precaution. But though the word "bank" cannot be legally used, there are men engaged in what is practically banking business, who do not come within the operation of the law, and more than once disastrous failures have occurred. One occurred in Winnipeg within the last few weeks, where a corporation having no bank charter was actually doing a banking business with disastrous results. We are proposing that whoever desires to receive money on deposit in Canada, shall obtain a license from the municipality in which he proposes to do business, and that he will have to make a substantial deposit with that municipality as a guarantee of his good faith. The local knowledge which is possessed by a municipality will enable the authorities to know whether the party is of good repute. We aim to prevent an irresponsible person establishing a private banking business and taking deposits, and then, by and by, having a disaster follow. We exempt from this certain co-operative and agricultural organizations, the character of which is well understood; but all these people who have been undertaking to receive large deposits and then involve depositors in heavy losses, will, we hope, be reached by the clause which we propose.

Those are the main provisions of the bill which I am presenting to the House. There are many minor things which I do not propose to mention now. Again, I want to say that I realize the fact that there are strong views held by many hon. members of this House and many citizens outside as regards the need of material changes in the Bank Act. I hope and believe that on a thorough inquiry such as that which will take place before the Committee on Banking and Commerce, some of the erroneous impressions regarding the present banking system will be removed. At all events, with the assurance of the desire of the government to have as full an inquiry as possible into the matter, I am going to ask hon. gentlemen to reserve their judgment until that inquiry takes place, and in the meantime to see their way clear to let this bill progress so that it may reach the committee on Banking and Commerce at any early date.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I entirely concur in the procedure outlined by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). There is no use in discussing this bill at present and in advance of the evidence. I think we shall serve our common purpose, which is to get the best results we can out of this bill, by letting the matter take the course which my hon. friend now proposes, passing it through its initial stages and referring it at once to the committee on Banking and Commerce.

Mr. GOOD: This resolution on which the bill is to be based, calls for the full ten-year period. The date as stated in the resolution is 1st July, 1933. It might appear in the course of the investigation that it would be better to have charters extended for less than the full ten years. If this resolution carries, would it be possible to make such a change?

Mr. FIELDING: The bill will propose the ordinary ten-year period; but there is no reason why the committee might not adopt a suggestion along the line of my hon. friend's proposal.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Or in any other direction.

Mr. FIELDING: Yes.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Fielding thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 83, respecting Banks and Banking.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the bill be read the second time?

Mr. FIELDING: Does my hon. friend desire to postpone the second reading or to take it now?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Now.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 83, respecting Banks and Banking.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the select standing committee on Banking and Commerce.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): It was intimated last night that we should go to-day into Committee of Supply on the Post Office estimates, and after that on the Immigration estimates. There is no objection to the Immigration estimates. The minister (Mr. Stewart) is here. The Postmaster General (Mr. Murphy) is not here, there is an acting minister in his place. If the government is in a position to say that it is impossible for the Postmaster General to be back this session, then, if it is also impossible to appoint someone in his place, there can be no objection to our going on. But it is very unsatisfactory going on with estimates in the absence of the responsible minister, particularly in a department where so much has taken place in respect of which the element of patronage has so violently entered in.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I regret to have to inform my right hon. friend that the Postmaster General (Mr. Murphy) has been anything but well for some time past, and has been advised by his physician that he must have a prolonged leave of absence. I doubt very much whether he will be back in the House for some little time; certainly he will not be back until after the Easter recess, and it is indeed a question whether he will be back for quite a while after that. Under the circumstances, therefore, I think it is best to proceed with the estimates.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not satisfied with the statement of the Prime Minister. If there is any reasonable chance of the Postmaster General being back this session, I think his estimates ought to stand. There are lots of other estimates that we might proceed with besides those of the Postmaster General. But to go on with that minister's estimates in his absence is not advisable. If there is a reasonable chance of his being back after the recess, or at some time during the session, his estimates should stand, and we might go on with the estimates of the Department of Immigration.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have no objection to having the estimates stand.

Mr. BUREAU: Leave an item open for discussion, but do not delay the progress of the House.

Motion agreed to and the House went into Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

SUPPLY

IMMIGRATION AND COLONIZATION

Immigration and Colonization—immigration outside service—salaries, $700,000.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not intend to discuss the whole question of immigration at great length or in any general way, but I desire to direct a few remarks to the minister (Mr. Stewart) and to his colleagues on this very important subject. I am sure the House will have noted that the discussion which has taken place during the past week is receiving a great deal of public attention. It is generally recognized, I think, that the immigration policy of the government is a matter of primary importance to the country at large. My particular intention in rising to-day is to advise the minister and the government that in taking this important step which they propose in connection with their declared policy on immigration, they must do so with their eyes open. I should not like to sit silent in my seat and allow these estimates to pass and then next year, perhaps, find myself called upon to bring to the attention of the minister some of the results that might ensue from a policy of this character not in the best interests of the country. If I sat silent and allowed estimates to go through without any comment upon this important subject, the minister might well say afterwards that the hon. member having refrained from giving any expression of opinion, he was justified in regarding that silence as consent. In my estimation the bargain, or arrangement, or contract which the minister has entered into with the Canada Colonization Company is fraught with very grave possibilities. I think my hon. friend is entering upon a road that will lead him to possible chaos and perhaps even worse. I am not suggesting at this moment that there is any intent on the part of the minister or of those associated with him to commit any act of a dishonourable character, not at all; but what I do see in this bargain is, as I have stated, the danger of grave possibilities, and I want the minister to be fully apprised of my views on the subject, as also, I trust, the views of hon. gentlemen in the House generally.

Now, let us briefly examine this matter. The Canada Colonization Company has entered into an agreement or, as I choose to call it, a bargain, with the government. By virtue of that bargain, the government must accept, whether it does so in specific terms or not, the responsibility for the actions of the Canada Colonization Company, its agents and servants. And whether the government willingly accepts that responsibility or not, let the committee be assured of this, that if anything does occur that is calculated to be an injury to any of the expected immigrants, or any other people of the community, the public will place the responsibility on the government after the difficulty or trouble is discovered. The minister himself stated that the Canada Colonization Company and the government had fully discussed this matter. He informed the House that several conferences had been held; and I find in a statement by the company itself, set forth in a very great detail in a full-page advertisement in a newspaper I have under my hand, certain facts which I purpose bringing to the attention of the committee, so that hon. members may properly judge of their importance. For instance, there is a statement, which confirms what the minister says, that the whole project has been fully discussed with the government, with the minister, with the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) with the hon. member for South Renfrew, minister without portfolio, (Mr. Low), and with a committee of the cabinet. I recite this merely to show that the matter has apparently been the subject of concurrence on the part of the government as a whole. The minister says that a committee of the cabinet "have had many conferences with the association." The statement of the Western Canada Colonization Association shows that the working capital of the company has been over-subscribed to the extent of $1,500,000. Why should they, under those conditions, find it necessary to receive from the government a grant of $40,000 and further sums at the rate of $10,000 a month for the purposes of carrying out their project? That is a pertinent query, and one in respect to which I think the committee should be furnished with the fullest possible information. The association claim also that their project has been approved by the imperial government, the Dominion government, and the Canadian railway companies—meaning by the latter, I presume, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railways. If that is the case, do these three bodies share the liabilities of the colonization company? Are they jointly responsible? If so, in what way? Has the Imperial government definitely entered into this agreement? If it has, the documents showing to what extent they have accepted responsibility should be laid on the Table. The same applies to the railway companies; if they are equally liable we should know just to what extent that liability goes.

The next thing claimed by the association is that they expect to spend—I am quoting their own figures—$30,000,000 or $40,000,000 in the next five years. I want the committee to note this fact, because it is evidence of the enormous scope of this movement. To what extent has the government, which is a party to the association's activities, supervision or control, in sight or knowledge, of the expenditure of this large amount within five or ten years? That is another query that should be fully and satisfactorily answered to-day. The chief reason why I at least am a little alarmed about this part of the agreement is because the association states that the major portion of this $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 will be expended on commissions. The significance of that will be better understood if I point out to the House the nature of those commissions. In a full-page advertisement the association declare that they are securing in the United States and other countries efficient real estate agents to push the sale of Canadian lands. I will quote the minister at this point. He says, page 1148 of unrevised Hansard of this session:

> They—

That is, the association.

> —have in the United States to-day sixty agents who are operating on a commission basis, who receive for their service something like ten per cent per acre.

I am not questioning the bona fides of this association, but here is a body with which the Dominion government is closely identified, which has in the United States what are known among real estate men as high pressure salesmen, out selling Canadian lands on behalf of the Canadian government and this association, and receiving a commission of ten per cent. When you turn loose an accomplished real estate agent who has in view the possibility of a ten per cent commission, his main object is to make as much as possible—to earn the commission, no matter how he earns it. He will tell any story that he can "get by" with in order to earn that commission. I want the government to appreciate that point. Has the minister any supervision over these agents from the United States? So far as I can discover, he has none whatever. Does the minister know the names of these "sixty agents"—I quote his own words—"who are operating" in the United States to-day? Does he know their bona fides, their qualifications, their trustworthiness? Or is it not reasonable to assume that this great army of agents, which will multiply very largely as business proceeds, are not known to the government at all? On the face of it we must conclude that the government is wholly ignorant of the detailed administration of the association. But the government must be prepared to assume responsibility for the activities of these agents. My experience—which is not inconsiderable—in connection with salesmen who are working on a commission basis is that even though they intend to be honest, they very frequently, if not almost generally, overdraw the picture and seek to earn the commission rather than give accurate information. At the rate of 200 families a year, $10,000 a month for ten months means a cost to the government of $500 per family. If any figure of that kind is to be paid by the government for these settlers, the country will be put to a very large expenditure indeed. I strongly advise the government against the expenditure of large sums of public money for the importation of immigrants. I do not think an examination of the records respecting immigration will encourage the minister very much from that point of view. The Atlantic Trading Company, for instance, and other institutions of that kind, the movement of the Doukhobors to western Canada, and such like, where there was encouragement, bargaining, or any assistance given, rarely resulted in any benefit to the country.

Let me take another point. Under this agreement, according to the minister's statement, and verified again by this full-page advertisement, it is purposed to arrange for 32-year agreements of sale with the intending settler, and an illustration is given in the advertisement to this effect. Take a 160-acre farm at $20 an acre; that would cost $3,200. The cash payment asked is $320—I want the committee to follow this bit of information. There is an agreement made for $2,880, and under the scale of payments set forth in this advertisement, and referred to by the minister himself in his speech, at the end of ten years the settler would still owe $2,883, or more than the face value of the agreement when he started out. But that is not all. What becomes of the $320 of cash payment? The whole of that $320 goes into commission.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I would like to understand how my hon. friend arrives at that figure, that the amount would be $2,883 at the end of ten years.

Mr. STEVENS: I have the statement worked out here on an actuarial basis by this company. The first year it is $2,880. There is a $320 cash payment, which, deducted from $3,200, leaves $2,880. I will not read the figures for each year, but will take one or two at random. The first year the principal balance is $2,880; the sixth year there is still owing a balance of $3,095.71; the tenth year it is $2,883.15; the twelfth year $2,756.77, and so you go on down till in the twentieth year it is $2,074. In the thirty-second year the principal is wiped out with the final payment, but for the first three years no payment is made at all, and the interest is added to the principal and it takes up to the tenth year for the purchaser to catch up what he has lost in the added interest in that period. So the statement I make is quite correct that at the end of ten years the settler still owes $2,883.15.

What I wish to draw attention to is that the minister has apparently accepted the scheme. He is so quoted here, and has so stated himself, and I am pointing out that this is not a very satisfactory agreement. Although the 32-year payment scheme sounds all right, if you say it quick and do not examine it too closely, you find when you come to examine it closely, that there is very little advantage to the settler in that regard.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It is exactly the same as any other amortization scheme of that character. It is no different. There is nothing new.

Mr. STEVENS: I quite agree but I am pointing out what the result is.

Mr. GOULD: The hon. member argues that at the end of three years these conditions readily lend themselves to a man leaving the organization?

Mr. STEVENS: Certainly. I have a few more observations to make in regard to this bargain. I am trying to give to the committee the facts. What becomes of the $320 cash payment?

And this presents to my mind what is really an absurdity. The $320 goes to the Colonization Company, and not to the vendor. Here is where the vendor receives a blank cheque, as it were. The vendor who is asked in this advertisement to list his property with the government, and who must enter into an agreement for five years gets nothing at all. He cannot get anything at all for some three or four years, and then he receives at the end of the three years $40.80 out of this liability of $3,200. The first $320 cash payment goes to these high-pressure salesmen. It goes through the association to their agents. They are paying to their agents in the United States and elsewhere ten per cent, or something like that, but it all goes to the association. The vendor gets nothing at all. Does the minister think for a moment that the vendors of these properties who are expected to come under this scheme will permit a condition of that kind? According to this advertisement, there is a very clever inducement held out to vendors to list their properties, and it is this, that the Imperial government, the Canadian government, and the railway companies are behind this scheme. Now the average person with property to sell will say: They are the people to whom I should entrust my property. But they will wake up very shortly to the fact that they are getting little or nothing out of their property. The association deducts one per cent of the six per cent interest in addition to the $320, and that lasts for eight years. That is another very extraordinary charge. Then we go further. The Dominion government have certain responsibilities.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Is not that one per cent for the purpose of acting as agent for the vendor, if they so act?

Mr. STEVENS: Quite so, but what I am getting at is the unsatisfactory nature of this so-called agreement. The association get one per cent of the interest, leaving five per cent to the vendor.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): In the event of their continuing to act as agents. If they do not they get nothing.

Mr. STEVENS: Oh, certainly, but the object of my hon. friend's bargain and the expenditure of public money is that the thing is going to be a success.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I will discuss that later. What I want my hon. friend to point out to the committee, if he will do it—and I am quite certain he wants to make a fair presentation—is this, that if they act as agents for the vendor for whom they have sold the land, for that service they will get one per cent.

Mr. BOYS: Of the money they collect?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: No, one per cent of the six per cent interest. That is where the purchaser pays six per cent per annum, the association acting as agent for eight years, following the three years where no payment is made, and it is allowed to take one of the six per cent paid in interest. That is its charge for acting as agent. I want to say to the minister that that arrangement will fail, and I think it will fail in two ways. First, I think it is simply inviting trouble and disappointment for those who purchase under this scheme, and secondly, I am certain that once the vendors realize—what shall I say?—the shabbiness of it, and I do not use the word offensively, as far as their interests are concerned, they will withdraw their property unless they become involved for five years before they properly understand the conditions. I think my hon. friend is simply laying up a peck of trouble, if I might use that expression.

Now then, what about the government? The government are asked not only to assume a vast responsibility as to this association's activities, but they must extend and maintain agencies in all countries of the world, or virtually so,—that is to maintain and extend agencies in the United States, in Europe, and in Great Britain at the expense of this country, and for which we are being asked to-day to vote some million-odd dollars. In addition to that the government, not only gives to this association these enormous and valuable privileges and its whole moral support—and I believe actual responsibility—must pay for the advertising, must carry on an effective advertising campaign. I would think that out of the ten per cent or twenty per cent that this concern get they might at least pay for the expense of maintaining agencies and the expense of advertising and publicity. But no: the government pay that in addition to its grants and its gifts to this association.

Now, I want to read to the committee what appears to me to give a fair interpretation of the meaning of this whole scheme. At the bottom of this full-page ad of the association are these words in leaded type:

> Owners of vacant agricultural land within 15 miles of railways in the western provinces are requested to list their properties immediately with the Canada Colonization Association, Bank of Hamilton Building, Winnipeg.

That seems to be really what is at the bottom of the whole business. Here is a magnificient opportunity for this Canada Colonization Company to induce people to list their property with them, and, if they did list, they would be bound for five years; their property would be listed with the company for that period of time. Is it fair—I put it to the minister very frankly—to use the name of the Imperial government, associated with the Dominion government and the big railway companies of Canada to induce property holders to list their property with these agents? I do not think it is. Because, after all, these people—I care not how estimable they may be as citizens—are nothing more or less than a real estate association. You cannot escape that point, there is no escape from it. Their whole activity is based upon the very revenue that they expect to derive from the sale of lands; —it is on a commission basis, they pay their agents on a commission basis just the same as any land company does. My hon. friend referred to the general manager in quite glowing terms and his qualification, quoted by the minister was that he was the successful manager of the Luseland Company. Now, this is the point I want to warn the government and the House against. Not that these people are not honest or honourable, not at all, but that the whole proposition is largely a real estate listing and sale proposition, and the government is entering into that rather than into an immigration policy. That is what I want to warn the government against.

Now, to summarize the situation very briefly, we have these facts: The government subsidizes this company to the extent of $100,000 annually; the government is to maintain its offices all over the world at the cost of the public treasury of Canada; the government is to pay for the advertising, or to maintain the advertising; and must turn over all their emigration machinery to the use of this association; every move made by the association, in so far as this scheme is concerned, must be supplemented by the organization of the Immigration department. And the association is to get ten per cent on the sale price, plus the one per cent interest for ten years. The association employs the agents, the government does not employ them; and the association alone controls the agents, the government does not control them. I doubt if the minister has any idea of the extent of the provision with respect to these agents. I feel very much alarmed about this point in particular: the turning loose of agents in all quarters of the world. And with what guarantee? Simply this: Go out and sell Canadian western lands: the Dominion government is behind you: this association—with the backing of the Dominion and the Imperial governments—is behind you; and you will get ten per cent in respect of any lands you sell upon which immigrants enter. That means, the agents will be telling pretty roseate stories. My hon. friends to my left have been telling us some very doleful stories. I am not altogether agreeing with them, although there is much in what they have said; but it would be the height of folly for this government to associate themselves with the high-pressure salesman's story as to the conditions that obtain in the Canadian West. Most of them—certainly ninety per cent of them—have never seen the Canadian West I venture to say.

I now wish to reiterate what I said a moment ago. In fact, my purpose in rising to-day is to press home upon the government that they must be prepared to accept full responsibility for whatever results may come from this campaign.

Let me say just a few words more before I take my seat. It is not to my mind so much a question of immigration; the problem is one of emigration. That is not a new statement, I merely reiterate what others have said. I think my hon. friend the minister would be well advised to turn to his colleagues and put some very pertinent questions to them. My hon. friend is the Acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization. It appears, to me at least, that he has separated himself and his department from the government. He is going out with this colonization scheme, and other measures, to carry on an immigration policy and he has ignored the fact, apparently, that there are some sound reasons for the emigration from Canada of so many people during this past year or two. Why does he not tell the Minister of Finance that one of the reasons why people are leaving Canada, one of the reasons why there is such hard times in the industrial world, is because of heavy taxation? and in some regards, as I have stated before to the House this session, unfair taxation. This is not an attack I am making upon the Minister of Finance, I am simply stating what I think to be a problem—a problem that ought to be faced before we enter into any extensive scheme of immigration. Stop this emigration before dealing with this problem. I invite him, therefore, to bring to the attention of the Minister of Finance, who ought to co-operate with him in this matter, the necessity of meeting this problem of taxation, solving it—simplifying it if you like to use that term—so as to promote industrial activity and more contentment in the country.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Does my hon. friend include customs duties in that "heavy taxation?"

Mr. STEVENS: I felt sure that question would be put, but I hardly expected the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe) to ask it; I really expected it to come from hon. gentlemen to my left. I do not wish, nor do I purpose, being side-tracked into a discussion of the tariff policy. My opinions on the tariff question are well known. The problem that I am propounding—namely dealing with the financial situation as regards industry and agriculture—is the responsibility of the Minister of Finance and not mine. I am prepared at the proper time—and when it comes in a few weeks I shall avail myself of the opportunity—to state my opinions very clearly and I shall have no hesitancy in doing so. But I say that is the problem to be dealt with; and the minister, before entering into this scheme, ought to have addressed himself to the Minister of Finance, in regard to it. He should also have addressed himself to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and asked him to co-operate in the promotion of trade. I know he has done something, I know he wants to do something; but it is only by the co-ordinated activity of the government that these things can be done, and not by one minister framing a policy for his department alone.

It would appear to me as if the ministry were all at sixes and sevens, and not co-operating at all. Referring to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell), upon his shoulders, as the head of the Agricultural department of Canada, rests the responsibility of solving or leading in the solution, of the problem of why agriculture is not successful to-day. I do not say he is responsible for the problem, but I say he is responsible for its solution, or for the lead in attempted solution. My hon. friend (Mr. Stewart, Argenteuil) should have addressed himself to the Minister of Agriculture before he propounded this policy, which, I am certain in my mind, will bring nothing but pain, suffering, disappointment and discord. My hon. friend has the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to fall back upon. It is true that he stated the other day that the Prime Minister was consulted in the matter. To my mind at least, there is little evidence that this scheme were properly considered by the government as a whole. It might have been, but if it was, then it reflects but little credit on the government. My hon. friend for Fort William (Mr. Manion) the other day made a very excellent suggestion to this House. He made an excellent speech, and he made a reference that merits the closest consideration of the government, and I hope it will receive such consideration. One of the great difficulties in Canada is a thousand-mile gap between eastern and western Canada. It is a geographical difficulty, but the fact is that a barren, almost depopulated, or unpopulated, area exists and while it may not be caused by the government, yet I believe the first responsibility of a settlement scheme in Canada should be towards bringing the eastern part of Canada together with the west. There you have a wide barren territory, with no traffic developing or little traffic, very little settlement, and with a lot of splendid land, and it would behoove the minister, I think, in co-operation with the Ontario government, to study how he could populate that hinterland of Ontario, or that gap between the East and the West. The speech of the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey) the other day was one of the best expositions of this problem given in the House this session. He referred in a different way altogether to this same problem which my hon. friend for Fort William mentioned. Here you have an hon. member from Ontario and an hon. member from Manitoba, both recognizing that the difficulty was to bring the population in their respective districts, bordering on this gap to which I have referred, to a level commensurate with means that exist there to sustain a large population. Therefore, I say to the minister if he wants to inaugurate a first-rate, a fundamentally sound, scheme of immigration, there is where he can find scope for his activities. Why should he at this moment seek to force, through high-pressure land salesmen—I want the minister to get that—upon the three prairie provinces, whose representatives in this House tell us there is no use putting more settlers there at the present time because of the difficulties they are placed in—why should he force this immigration? Why should he, through the high-pressure salesman and through this scheme, force immigration into the provinces, when we know perfectly well that in northern Ontario there is just as fine opportunity for a different type of agriculture, but for agriculture waiting for assistance? I would certainly be more than willing to vote money direct to assistance of settlers in that area, rather than to vote money to be expended in connection with this enormous, and, I think, highly painted visionary scheme, presented to the minister by the Canada Colonization Association, and accepted by him.

I rose for the purpose of impressing, if I could, upon the minister and the government, the dangers that confront them and the government, the parliament and the country in the acceptance of this contract. I fear the minister has made a serious mistake, and I do not think it is too late now to retreat from the position in which he finds himself. It is true that this project was precipitated some time last fall, and there may have been negotiations carried on some time since, but parliament has not yet approved of it. I would not want to be one who would say to the government "we must resist absolutely your policy in immigration". I have grave doubts about it and serious apprehensions as to its effect, and I want the minister, if he persists in going on, to realize that these dangerous waters lie ahead of him and what the results may be; so that he cannot come back to parliament next year and say that parliament as a whole participated in the scheme.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I think it appropriate that at this moment I should give the committee some information with respect to the organization in regard to which my hon. friend for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) has just offered his criticisms. The Canada Colonization Association is not a new organization and was not a new organization when this government took office. It had the endorsation of the government which preceded this government through their Minister of Agriculture. It has been in existence for some two or three years to my certain knowledge. I do not desire to cover that ground, but I want to point out to the committee that in the very difficult situation in which I found myself with respect to this question of immigration, I felt that this organization, patriotic as they called themselves, which my hon. friend denies this afternoon—

Mr. STEVENS: I do not deny it.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): If the hon. member does not deny it directly he denies it by implication.

Mr. STEVENS: I made no such statement. I said I did not question the bona fides of the association, I am not in a position to do so. Next year we may be in that position.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Nor is it my intention to give a certificate of character to these men, but simply, if I can, to place my position before this committee.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. minister referred to the former government having approved of the organization—I think he used the word "approved." I hope he does not mean to imply that the former government in any way approved of any plan by which this organization would get any advantages or any special assistance from the government.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I was not inferring that a letter had been given them by the Minister of Immigration, and in fairness to him I need not deal with some changes that have transpired since the occasion of that letter. This organization was started some three years ago. I well remember the propaganda carried on throughout Canada. It was heralded as a patriotic endeavour on the part of the citizens to settle privately-owned lands along our existing railways. I mentioned the other day they had difficulty about their land listing proposition, inasmuch as they were asking for legislation to validate listing over a period of two years, if I remember the circumstances properly. At that time, as Premier of the province of Alberta, I refused that, and I have had some personal experience in land selling and the dealing in land, and one of the very practical difficulties that a Minister of Immigration or any government is faced with in connection with immigration to-day is that we have no longer available, within reasonable distance of our railways, land that we can offer freely to attract settlement to Canada. That was the great lure in the past; but although there are millions of acres of land still available, we cannot advise people to go into outlying areas and to take up land for themselves, as they did formerly when coming to Canada.

Mr. GOOD: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): If my hon. friend will let me make my statement this afternoon, I shall be glad to answer all questions that anyone may wish to ask at a later date.

That is the situation we have to face. I said the other day, and I repeat, that we must have our propaganda, our advertising and our discussion confined very largely to encouraging incoming settlement amongst agricultural classes. There can be no doubt about that. There is at the moment undoubtedly a place for people in Canada within the boundaries of our urban centres, and that is becoming more apparent every day. The organization we have at the moment throughout Canada would indicate that there will be a fairly lively demand for mechanics to engage in the building trades in the various cities of Canada, and we are ready, willing and glad to make that known in countries from which we hope to attract settlers. But when I mention the great railway problem and the difficulty that has been mentioned by my hon. friend, namely, the burden of taxation that is bearing down upon the shoulders of the people of Canada, one way in which this can be relieved is by getting additional people into this country. That is not the only way, it is true, but that is one of the ways. The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) stated the other day that one of the lures we were offering to people to come to Canada was to come and assist us with our very heavy burden. Let me answer my hon. friend in two ways. We are not overpersuading people in the countries from which we hope to attract settlers, and there is no difficulty about convincing them that their opportunity in Canada is better than in the country in which they are living to-day. I am speaking of people engaged in agriculture in those countries, and I speak of Great Britain, Scandinavia, the European continent and the United States. Therefore, I think we can say with caution and safety, that we are offering a better opportunity, if we confine that settlement within reasonable distance of railway facilities. Thus, we are not asking them to come to Canada, primarily to assist us in carrying our burden. If I thought we were doing that, I would be the last one to advocate that our agents scattered throughout the various countries I have mentioned, should offer the advantages of Canada to incoming settlers. Moreover, I have been very careful, in discussion with agents at Chicago, with Colonel Smith, who is in charge of twelve agencies in Great Britain, and with Mr. Willans, who has recently gone to the Continent, to ask them to be sure not to over-advertise, and not to overpersuade—if that is the proper way to put the matter—people to come to this country, but to offer the advantages that Canada is ready to offer, to all who intend leaving countries in which we are engaged in settlement work to-day. I hope that answers some of the questions raised by some hon. members with respect to the propaganda that we are carrying on. First, it is to the advantage of these people to come, because I believe they can better their condition. Second, they can undoubtedly—no one will deny the fact—be of a great deal of assistance to the people of Canada.

As regards migration, as near as I can discover, that has been going on since 1885 in greater or less degree. That it has gone on during the last year, no one will deny, and probably to a somewhat greater degree than on former occasions; but the unprecedented prosperity in urban centres of the United States has been the attraction. Whether that will continue is problematical; but at all events, I am getting assurances from the agencies of the United States that a very considerable movement will come to Canada this year.

As regards the Canada Colonization Association when they first approached me, they were endorsed by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, by the Canadian National Railway Company, by the banking institutions of Canada, and by boards of trade from one end of the country to the other. And let me say to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) that those institutions, those boards of trade and those individuals who lent their endorsation to this scheme, did so on the scheme outlined by my hon. friend this afternoon. That was the scheme that was endorsed almost universally, as I stated the other day, from Montreal to the Pacific coast.

Mr. STEVENS: Do these railway companies, boards of trade and banking institutions accept any responsibility for the results of the activities of this company?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): That is another question. I will come to that later on. I simply want to state this afternoon that, as Minister of Immigration, I felt that this organization had the backing of the people of Canada who were anxious about land settlement. I do not propose to discuss at any length this afternoon the question of the basis of settlement, or the scheme outlined so well by my hon. friend. Responsible organizations in Canada have stated both publicly and privately that immigration is the great question in this country. I say that it is one of them, and I have repeatedly said that, it is, perhaps, not the greatest one, because some of my hon. friends who are sitting across the floor of this House and many on this side will, I am sure, agree with me, that many other things could be done that would, perhaps assist the situation. I have great respect for the opinion of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). I think, perhaps, something might be done by way of tariff reduction that would help the situation materially. But, while I say that, let me say that I cannot forget that there is upon the shoulders of this government the responsibility of raising a tremendous sum of money annually, and the thing that the Immigration department could best advertise would be the fact that we have at last reached a point where our revenue covers our expenditure. I am not unmindful of these facts. As I say, I have a great deal of respect for my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) who has to deal with matters of this kind, and I am prepared to support him when he has to take into consideration the situation as it exists throughout Canada. My hon. friend for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) had a different idea from mine altogether; and throughout Canada different views are held. But I say that the one paramount thing we must consider, the one question we have to face at all times, is how we shall raise the revenue. My hon. friend (Mr. Stevens) said—and I am not going to say anything on that point—that it was the method of raising this revenue that he objected to. Undoubtedly, his view in regard to this matter is different from mine. Now, I do not believe that it is within the province of a government to go into the real estate business; and I want to keep as far away from it as does my hon. friend for Vancouver Centre. I do not want to see the government of Canada implicated in any scheme in which it has to act as agent between the vendor and the purchaser of land. Indeed, I do not believe that the government could ever occupy that position, either through the agency of the Soldier Settlement Board or of any other organization that might be in its direct pay. My hon. friend may say that because we are offering to assist this organization, which is backed by the money of private interests and private individuals throughout Canada and which has the endorsation of all the people and all the responsible bodies I have mentioned, that we are nevertheless making a serious mistake. Well, I think that you, Mr. Chairman, as well as other members of this committee, so far as this debate has progressed, will agree with me that the man who could evolve an immigration policy that would satisfy all the members of this House would be a second Moses.

An hon. MEMBER: Greater than Moses.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Possibly. That, at any rate, is my opinion, and I form that opinion after listening to the speeches of hon. gentlemen on all sides of this House. It is a fair assumption, I think, that the members of parliament are representative of the feelings of the people throughout Canada. And whatever our views may be, I think there is one thing about which we are all agreed, and that is that we must get people into Canada. I say, therefore, let us bring into the country people who have a fair chance of making a success. My hon. friend says that we should have a well rounded out policy and should beware of the difficulties that beset us. I said the other day that I was aware of the conflicting opinions throughout Canada; which I had heard from all quarters; and I am well aware also of the difficulties under which the agricultural population of Canada is labouring. But I still think that there is an opportunity for saving the situation and giving a decent chance to the people who come amongst us. Let me repeat again, most emphatically, that if I did not feel that way I should not be advocating immigration to this country.

My hon. friend makes the statement that this organization may get the government of Canada into difficulties. Now, I said the other day, and I want in all fairness to repeat, that from what I know about the organization it has not the entire approval of all the people who have subscribed their money to it; that is, I mean, the scheme under which this organization is operating at the present moment. And when I make that statement I want to deal with the objection that has been voiced in reference to this matter. I stated that the Canadian Pacific Railway lent their endorsation to the scheme, and when I spoke of the scheme I meant the 32-year plan of land selling. Colonel J. S. Dennis, who is a strong advocate of the scheme which my hon. friend has criticized, as it affects the vendor and the purchaser, does however object—and in fairness to him I make the statement—to the taking of the ten per cent commission by the organization; and that is one of the reasons why he to-day is not an advocate of this particular scheme. He does not approve of the taking of that commission. But let me explain.

Mr. BOYS: I understood the minister to say that the scheme had the approval of the late government and also of the various institutions to which he has referred; and his latest interjection raises that very question. What scheme was it that had their approval? Was it the scheme now before the people, or some previous scheme? I hold in my hand an early prospectus of the company, and there have been no fewer than three variations in it since last September. One important variation, and one that has prompted me to rise now and interrupt the minister, is the very point of commission. The prospectus I have in my hand, and which I am given to understand was issued about September last, with two variations since, provides a commission of fifty cents an acre on the land actually sold. Taking the illustration which appears in this flaring advertisement referred to by my hon. friend for Vancouver Centre, we find that 160 acres rated at $20 per acre produce a commission, not of $80 as would be the case on a fifty-cent basis, but of $320. And the same thing would apply to the sale
5 p.m. of the whole 900,000 acres if the same basis were adopted. What I want to ask the minister is this: Is he in a position to say that the gentleman he has referred to as the late president—in fact, he was the only president—Sir John Willison, who presided for a period of three months, did approve of the fifty cents an acre commission or the ten per cent commission, which is very much larger? There are many other features on which I should like information from the minister, but for the moment I will confine my question to this point.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Sir John Willison did approve of the scheme. He toured the western provinces and spoke to the boards of trade. I may say that he also addressed the Board of Trade in Toronto and outlined the very scheme my hon. friend has discussed this afternoon.

Mr. BOYS: The ten per cent commission?

Mr. STEVENS: What scheme?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The scheme you outlined this afternoon.

Mr. STEVENS: The ten per cent. commission?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes, the scheme as it is outlined in the advertisement referred to by my hon. friend.

Mr. BOYS: There are three variations in it.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Well, let us deal with the last one, because we shall only become entangled if we try to consider them all simultaneously. I will confine my remarks to the last scheme and try to give the committee a fair statement of the facts as they exist in connection with this matter. Colonel J. S. Dennis makes the statement that this organization was to be patriotic, to be supported entirely by private subscription. It was not to take any commission but was to be supported and paid altogether out of the moneys to be raised by the various subscribers to the organization. Now, I want to be perfectly fair and to make myself clear on the matter.

Mr. BOYS: Was not that the proposition that Sir John Willison lent himself to? In other words, did he not advocate a scheme that was to be patriotic, a philanthropic proposition. I am told that these gentlemen did subscribe $1,000,000, but that there was no real estate proposition for commission at all. They were to devote the money for a period of probably three years to the encouragement of the work of settlement, and when that was done, it was supposed that the company would carry itself.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): With the single exception of Colonel J. S. Dennis I do not know of, nor has there come to my knowledge, any other objector. And I presume that Colonel J. S. Dennis was speaking on behalf of the Canadian Pacific Railway. In fairness to Mr. Beatty I may say that several conversations took place between him and myself with respect to this matter prior to the visit to Great Britain of Mr. Brown and his associates to interest the overseas government. I had been pressed ever since July of last year to lend assistance to this organization on the ground that it would be in the best interests of the settlement of these privately-owned lands—in other words, the getting of these lands out of the hands of owners who could not utilize them and were not cultivating them.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Does the minister know why General McRae left this organization?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes,—well, perhaps I should not say that. I do not know why he left, but I do know that his scheme was not acceptable to the board of directors.

[Mr. Chas. Stewart.]

Mr. BOYS: Was his salary not fixed at $25,000 a year?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have no knowledge of that.

Mr. BOYS: I am informed on an authority which I do not dispute for a moment that for acting as president he was to receive $25,000 —and that in connection with a scheme which had been started for patriotic and philanthropic purposes. I understand that that was a source of dissatisfaction.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The only knowledge I have of the organization during the presidency of General McRae was when he asked me for legislation in Alberta to make compulsory the listing of privately owned lands. I do not know what salary he was paid or how long he was employed by this organization.

Mr. BOYS: I am not saying he was paid that, but I know that amount was fixed, and I am given to understand there was trouble over it. One does not wonder that there was.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister refers to Colonel Dennis, of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Do the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Canadian National Railways officially endorse this scheme?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Let me make a differentiation to my hon. friend. So far as the 32-year plan of land settlement is concerned, yes—all of them agree.

Mr. STEVENS: And the ten per cent to the company?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No. I have tried to point out that Colonel Dennis objected to that provision for the ten per cent to go to the company. An organization of this kind appeals to the Canadian Pacific Railway; they think it is in the best interests of Canada and that it ought to be supported by the government; and they are a unit in expressing approval. Now, have I made that plain to my hon. friend? So far as the purpose of this organization is to settle these lands, it has received entire approval. The one difficulty is the objection to the ten per cent taken by the company.

I have stated that pressure was being exerted from all quarters in this matter, and that criticism was being made of the government and of the Immigration department in that they were not participating in the overseas scheme. It has been stated that we are urged largely by the transportation companies to bring settlers into Canada. That is not the case; I will deal with that in a moment or two, in connection with our propaganda for getting settlement. But I yielded to the extent of assisting this organization as we did last fall. They went forward; they listed in the neighbourhood of half a million acres of land. I cannot of course, take an affidavit on this floor that the vendor of these lands knows all about the provisions of the listing; I assume he does. I have heard those who own land privately, private individuals as well as corporations, maligned because of the very fact that they were holding it. As one who had something to do with taxation I endeavoured in the province from which I come to make it unprofitable for the absentee landholder or the owner of land out of use to continue to hold that land. We imposed an unearned increment tax and we gave to those who improved their land a reduction of 25 per cent from the rate applying to unimproved areas so far as local taxation went. There is no property tax in that province, so that the man who holds unimproved land is more than willing to sell it. The greatest criticism I received from our agents was that there was no responsible organization to which we could send prospective settlers to purchase land. I have pointed out that I did not think it was good business for the government to go into a land selling scheme. For these reasons I thought it wise to utilize this organization to a certain extent in our scheme of settling those lands. I hold in my hand a telegram from Sir John Willison sent to me on September 30. It is to this effect:

> Have just completed tour of West. Have had conferences with four western governments and with grain growers and held many public meetings. Interviews with all governments most satisfactory.

He interviewed the western governments and placed this scheme before them. The telegram continues:

> All meetings warmly sympathetic. At Winnipeg meeting five hundred representative citizens called by James Stewart adopted with enthusiasm resolution offering plan Canada Colonization Association. Everywhere we emphasized action government in uniting all forces for immigration and settlement. Beatty has appointed Col Dennis to represent Canadian Pacific on operating committee association, and Chipman of Grain Growers Guide with approval Crerar has agreed represent western farmers.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): May I ask whether any farmer's organizations in any part of Canada have endorsed this scheme?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Not to my knowledge, except that there is on record a letter from the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) endorsing it. In fairness to him I may say that except so far as this telegram goes I did not know what connection we had with the organization at that time. But that propaganda, if you call it such, that settlement outlined by my hon. friend, was then in existence and it was on that basis that this enthusiastic reception was extended. That is what I want to convey to my hon. friend, because I am being severely criticized in connection with this matter.

I sometimes wonder, Mr. Chairman, whether if I had turned this thing down I would not have been criticized just as severely by some hon. gentlemen of this House for refusing assistance to this organization. I realize full well the difficulties of a position of this character. I want to do the best I can for the people of this country. My business is to get people into this country, and to bring them honestly and legitimately if it is humanly possible so to do, to bring in citizens who will assimilate with the life of this country and assist in nation-building here, no matter whether I am here as minister or whether this government or some other government is in existence. I have endeavoured to do this in a careful, conscientious way.

As I stated the other day, one other factor in inducing me to listen to the proposal of this organization was the fact that I knew of the activities of Mr. Howard Everett. I have known of his activities for years. Does anyone in this House, does anyone in this parliament think that the activities of governmental agencies alone in Canada have brought all the settlers in this country? Let me ask my hon. friends who have lived in western Canada, some of them longer than I have, do they not think that in a very large way the settlement that is in western Canada to-day was brought in by men who came in and purchased cheap land, and then went out and spent money and sold it and placed settlers on those lands? I frankly admit that some of them did not always tell the truth, that they over-coloured the picture, because as my hon. friend has rightly said, there is always an inducement to do that kind of thing. But here is one organization, and I would ask any hon. gentleman representing the areas that this company operated in for twenty years in Saskatchewan and central Alberta, have they heard any complaints about it? So far, as I am concerned, I have never heard that Howard Everett or his company misrepresented land to any individual whom they settled, but I have heard this, that where dissatisfaction existed they made it their business to change the individual to more congenial surroundings, and perhaps to better land, believing, and I think it is good business, that to have a satisfied settler was a better advertisement for them than to make the small sum of money that might accrue from refusing to make that exchange.

Mr. Chairman, I am not unmindful of the difficulties that surround a situation such as this, but I have felt that as one of the agencies for settlement we might give this organization a trial, and I have recommended it to the government. My hon. friend has said that there is a signed agreement in existence—perhaps I should qualify that statement that there would be a signed agreement in existence. There is not. We have discussed this matter from time to time, and undoubtedly this organization have certain promises of mine that I hold more or less in respect. I believe from the experience that I have had in connection with western Canada that this organization can be a real factor in settling western Canada, and that is the reason I am asking for the consideration of this committee.

My hon. friend made one other statement, that the agents of the government are to act with this company's agents. That is not the case. Rather is it the reverse. They are to carry on their own work. True, if you pick up an advertisement of our government in the United States you will find reference in one particular to this organization, namely, that they are in Canada and that we think it is an organization upon which the intending settler can depend for information of a reliable character, but he is under no obligation to purchase from the company. Furthermore, they have not gone into Great Britain. They will confine their operations entirely to the United States. They will not even be in the eastern states. Their business, so far as this year at all events is concerned, will be bringing settlers from the western states to settle in western Canada, and I think that that is a task for which Mr. Everett is eminently fitted.

Our own immigration agents in the United States are working along the very same lines on which they have always worked. They are advertising Canada to the man who is intending to leave the United States and come here and settle, and I take it that there is no criticism of that. What I want to emphasize here and now is that the statement made the other day that we are endeavouring to bring people to Canada by false representation has not one tittle of foundation in fact. That is not true of our efforts in any country in the world, none excepted. We are endeavouring to advertise Canada as Canada exists, and the opportunities that are in this country for those who are desirous to come here.

Let me follow that one step further and say this: We do not approach any individual until he has first made application to the agent. In the United States, for example, where advertisements are carried in the newspapers, when we get an application for information from some individual a card is sent out asking him for certain information, which is filed when it comes back. A mark is made upon the map indicating where this individual lives, and he is invited to meet on a certain day one of our agents who will be at some convenient point to which he can drive in. He then interviews the agent and the advantages of Canada are placed before him, the conditions are depicted just as they exist. If he is interested, we hope to get him to come up to Canada. That is true of the American field, and true also of the English field except that we go into it a little more intensively over there. I had hoped this year to have a number of motor cars in Great Britain. We have one in the British field at the moment, and we hope to have two or three carrying advertisements and showing motion pictures and giving lectures on the advantages of this country. We have very strong competitors in the Old Land. The Australian government and the South African government are all in the field in the Old Land for immigration. One of the principal difficulties in connection with moving people from the Old Land to Canada is that a great many of those who are willing to come and would make very desirable settlers are financially unable to make the move; but I do not want to be led away into a discussion of that phase at the moment.

I welcome criticism from any hon. member of this House. I am not averse to it at all. My object is to recommend to the government, in the light of this discussion and the various suggestions that are offered by members of this House, what is the best thing to do under the circumstances, what will be in the best interests of the country in connection with immigration.

One hon. member the other day asked me to give him the personnel of this organization. I have the names here, but before giving them I had perhaps better say a word or two about Sir John Willison. Sir John Willison was in charge of this organization for a short space of time. I have said that he endorsed the scheme that has been presented to the committee by my hon. friend this afternoon, that he has retired, and that the reason for his retirement was a difference of opinion that apparently existed between some supporters of the organization here in the East and its vice president. In addition he pointed out to me that he does not feel that he understands all the ramifications of an organization of this kind; he feels that he cannot give his time to it, and that he is not warranted in taking a salary for devoting attention to an organization whose work he does not thoroughly understand. That is the purport of his statement with respect to this matter. I have said to the committee that I believe the success of this organization depends upon Mr. Howard Everett. I do not believe it depends upon Mr. Brown because Mr. Brown, with all due respect to him, has had little or no experience in the actual selling or disposing of lands. He has, no doubt, been valuable in stirring up public opinion and getting the subscriptions of those organizations that have backed this institution so far—and many of them are backing it to-day.

Let me read to you the names of the gentlemen who are in control of this association, although I think I shall have to make an exception in the case of my hon. friend the leader of the Progressives (Mr. Forke) whose name appears here. My hon. friend, however, made an explanation the other day with respect to his connection with the association, and I do not know that there is anything I can add to his statement.

Mr. FORKE: I am not at all ashamed to be in the association.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No. I want to give the committee all the information with respect to this matter that I am in possession of, and to be fair to all parties concerned. The officers and directors of the company are:

Vice-President, M. A. Brown.
General Manager, Howard Everett.
Secretary-Treasurer, F. D. L. Smith.
Directors:—
M. A. Brown, Winnipeg.
W. W. Evans, Winnipeg.
Robert Forke, Pipestone, Man.
Col. F. J. James, Regina, Sask.
S. W. Johns, Saskatoon, Sask.
J. F. Cairns, Saskatoon, Sask.
J. K. R. Williams, Regina, Sask.
Sam McLeod, Prince Albert, Sask.
Chas. McDonald, M.L.A., Prince Albert, Sask.
Hon. R. G. Brett, (Governor of Alberta), Edmonton.
Pat. Burns, Calgary, Alberta.
C. S. Noble, Nobleford, Alberta.
Brig. Gen. H. F. McDonald, Vancouver, B.C.
Col. Nelson Spencer, Vancouver, B.C.
Eastern Advisory Board:—
A. M. MacQueen, Toronto, Ont.
Robert Hobson, Hamilton, Ont.
Frank Cockshutt, Brantford, Ont.
Lt. Col. R. W. Leonard, St. Catherines, Ont.
F. D. L. Smith, Toronto, Ont.

That is the statement I have to make with respect to this matter. I think I have covered the field very well except to say this: I stated the other day that the association had half a million acres of land listed at the present moment, and that land is all listed within reasonable distance of the existing railways largely our own national railways. They are making some progress. The latest reports I have from them—and these reports are to be furnished monthly—denote that they have 200 intending settlers ready to bring to western Canada to examine the lands that have been listed. They have agents in the United States, a very large number of agents, and undoubtedly these men will be under the control of the manager, Mr. Everett. If there is an element of danger to this government in trying to utilize and use the services of an organization of this kind—as my hon. friend (Mr. Stevens) pointed out—backed by the people I have mentioned so far as I know—because I have had no contradiction of this telegram of Sir John Willison's of the 30th September that there was full knowledge of the scheme that is now before the House—I have had no communication or no objection with the single exception of the one gentleman I have mentioned, Colonel John S. Dennis. I still believe that a great many people in Canada think this is the proper method to handle privately owned land, along the existing lines of railway, which it is so desirable to bring under cultivation and have settled.

My hon. friend (Mr. Stevens) has suggested that we are not co-operating with the provincial governments. I think I told my hon. friend the other day that not only was I trying to co-operate with them, but that I visited them last summer and placed before them the very serious situation, in my opinion, that existed in Canada for the lack of an adequate population. I went to the province from which my hon. friend himself comes—I went as far west as British Columbia. I met the government in the Vancouver Hotel and discussed this matter with them. They are vitally interested, they are willing to co-operate; but they feel, perhaps, that it is a duty of the federal government to assume, in a large way, the financial responsibility of this work. With respect to the prairie provinces I did the same thing. Not only that but I called a conference last fall and asked representatives from every province in Canada to come here and discuss this very vital question in all its aspects; and these governments, so far as I know—I have had no intimation to the contrary—have endorsed this scheme outlined by my hon. friend. My hon. friend asked me why I recommend a scheme of this kind to the government? I felt, Mr. Chairman, that I had the backing, and that this government would have the backing, of the provincial governments; that we would also have the backing of these organizations that I have mentioned in a scheme of this kind when it had been so fully and clearly explained to them—as I was ready to believe had been done by this association and by so responsible a gentleman as Sir John Willison; because I think we can say with full assurance that Sir John Willison would make a fair presentation of the facts in a case of this kind. I felt too, and I think my hon. friends from western Canada will agree with me, that when a scheme of the kind was presented to westerners, who knew every phase of an enterprise of this character, they would be critical and examine the situation very carefully before lending support—such support as I have mentioned by way of resolutions passed by certain bodies—to an undertaking of this nature. Therefore, if I have made a mistake, if I have gone astray in making this recommendation, all I have to say is that I am in mighty good company.

Mr. SPENCER: Did the Alberta government fully endorse the proposition?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I know that the Alberta government was visited by these gentlemen and I know that previously they endorsed this scheme. I cannot say that I have in my possession letters from the Alberta government, since September 30, endorsing it.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the minister permit me one more question and I will not bother him any more. Has he official endorsation of this scheme, as set forth in their propaganda, from the Imperial government, the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Canadian National Railways, the provincial governments of Canada, and the banking institutions to which he has referred? If he has will he lay those endorsations on the table?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have not endorsations from those organizations in writing. I have an endorsation from Colonel Amery, who was in charge of the Empire Settlement scheme, after Mr. M. A. Brown and Mr. Smith had laid this matter before him. However, let me in fairness, say this: Colonel Amery pointed out quite properly that before they would be prepared to lend full support to the scheme it would have to be endorsed by the government of Canada. Have I made myself clear?

Mr. STEVENS: Not at all. My hon. friend has made himself clear to this extent—he will correct me if I am wrong—that he has no official endorsation at all from any of these institutions to which he has referred and to which the association's advertisement applies.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I followed very closely the press despatches at the time this visit was made to western Canada. I saw no statement in the western newspapers that what was contained in the telegram from Sir John Willison was not true. I have no direct communications from the boards of trade or these various institutions I have mentioned.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend does not catch my question. I asked him if he had the endorsation, as referred to in this propaganda, of the Imperial government, the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian government—never mind the telegram at all or the board of trade—these important official bodies upon which my hon. friend places so much importance and which he introduces in justification of his scheme.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have not the direct written endorsation of those individuals. I did not think it was necessary. Surely my hon. friend did not expect that, before an organization of this sort was started by private individuals, with the names of the gentlemen that I have mentioned as sponsors for it, they would require the written endorsation of every organization to which they gave an explanation of their scheme.

Mr. STEVENS: The hon. minister will persist in bringing in every organization. I limited my question to the official bodies and I will repeat them—the Imperial government, the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Canadian National Railways, and the provincial governments. My hon. friend says he has no endorsations from these bodies.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I will say, dealing with the Imperial government particularly, that they have written saying that the scheme as outlined appealed to them, but of course they did not deal directly with private organizations, and before accepting and supporting fully a scheme of this character it would require to be endorsed by the federal government.

Mr. STEVENS: Permit me to read to my hon. friend a portion of this propaganda. In the official statement of this association I find the following.

The Imperial government will assume a legal share of the cost of the welfare work.

And so on; inferring in this propaganda that the Imperial government, as my hon. friend's suggestion would infer, the Canadian Pacific and the other organizations, would assume part of the financial responsibility. Now apparently there is no such responsibility assumed by these bodies at all.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am not sure whether the report brought back by Mr. Brown was confirmed by letter or not. However, one should speak carefully about matters of this kind. I am not sure whether the amount of $100,000, which was mentioned as a contribution for the purpose of welfare work to be carried on amongst settlers who have come from the Old Country, was mentioned in the letter or not. All I am sure is that we have a letter of the character I have mentioned from Colonel Amery, then head of the Overseas Settlement Board, saying that the scheme appealed to them, but of course it would require to have the endorsation of the federal government. With that, I will leave it. I will be very glad to examine my correspondence, to see just exactly what was said about that matter. Of course I am not responsible in every particular for all that may have appeared in that advertisement, nor do I wish to be held responsible. In the main, I think, perhaps, it is correct. I have tried to make myself clear with respect to the railways and with respect to the other individuals who were backing a scheme of this character.

I believe that my hon. friend asked the amount of money subscribed and paid up. I think practically one million and a quarter were subscribed, and so far, $150,000 of that amount has been paid up and used by this corporation, and that they will continue to subscribe, and that they are continuing to receive subscriptions, I am assured.

Mr. BOYS: How much was paid up?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): One hundred and fifty thousand dollars is the amount mentioned in the report I got from this association. So far as I am concerned, I will try to throw around the attempt, at all events, to settle the land and settle it successfully, carefully and economically, all the safeguards that are humanly possible to be placed around it. For years the organization known as the Salvation Army have been given a grant as my hon. friend well knows, of $25,000. No investigation has been held into the affairs of the army. I was one of the members of this House who voted that sum of money last year, but I would be unable to say just how that money is used. I believe it is used well. I believe they can make good use of that $25,000. They do a splendid work, and I am again recommending that $25,000 be given to them. I have heard repeatedly commendation of the giving of this sum of money to this organization to engage in immigration work. So that the giving of a grant to the organization is not a new thing for the government which preceded us, nor for this government. This is in a somewhat larger way, and I say that I have not heard criticism of the grant to that organization. True they are religious. They are engaged to some extent in the land settlement scheme.

Mr. STEVENS: They are not getting a ten per cent commission.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No, they are not getting a commission; that is true and that is the reason of all my hon. friend's criticisms.

Mr. STEVENS: No, not all.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): And full assurance is given that this money will not be taken in the way of profit. Let me say that if an arrangement is made with the association, an accounting of the disposition of funds will be made monthly. My hon. friend will say that is no particular protection, but I wish to impress upon the committee that every means of protection humanly possible will be adopted to prevent people being mulcted of their funds, or cheated in their settlement, and I hope that nothing of that kind will happen. My hon. friend will say that that is a pious hope and will not materialize.

Mr. STEVENS: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): So far as I can see, I think this scheme has many advantages. It will help to settle a very difficult problem, because without it I fear we will have the same disjointed policy with respect to settling these lands and the same disappointment that we have had in the past. I have endeavoured to enlist every organization in immigration that was possible for me to enlist, hoping by the co-operation of all the people who are interested in this problem in Canada to work out a scheme of co-operation and co-ordination the effect of which would be advantageous to the people and government of that country. I stated the other day that any wide scheme of settlement involving huge expenditures of money would not be warranted at this time, and I am of the same opinion today. In the light of the discussion we have had, I sometimes wonder whether it would not have been well to have gone very slow. It would have been a great disappointment to certain people in Canada had we done so.

We have gone moderately with this thing; we have endeavoured to evolve a scheme that will embrace every phase of settlement, bringing in people where they are required in urban centres, where a demand appears to exist for them and endeavouring to prevent unemployment during the long winter months, because we have to face in Canada the problem of seasonal employment with those six months of winter. I have sought to avoid the pitfalls of the past, first, by careful selection, second, by careful placing, in order to give those whom we bring into this country an opportunity to succeed.

As regards emigration, so far as we are able to get substantial returns, these would indicate that it is not so much the people who come to this country who are leaving it—and people are not leaving the country in such large numbers from western Canada as from eastern Canada—but rather our own sons and daughters, born and reared in Canada, who are going to the United States. Therefore, it behooves us that we be more careful than ever; that we exercise due care in selecting those whom we bring amongst us, because I do not see that we can entirely stop that flow to the United States, much as we would do so.

In conclusion, so far as possible in carrying out this scheme of immigration, every aspect of it, I will endeavour to exercise due care, first, in selection and, second, in placing, in order that we may have a well-balanced colonization scheme for the whole of Canada, including the area in northern Ontario about which my hon. friend has complained. We stand ready at any moment to co-operate with any provincial government on any scheme that will appeal to the federal authorities for the settlement of any area in any province, more particularly along the area served by the Grand Trunk Pacific railway through the older provinces of Quebec and Ontario. We welcome co-operation, and we will co-operate and work hand in hand in any scheme. In saying this, I am speaking largely on behalf of myself, but that would be my recommendation to the government.

I think I have covered all the phases in connection with this matter as regards the Canada Colonization Association. I shall be glad to have further light on immigration matters, and if possible so to adjust them as to meet with the approval of all hon. members.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I had not intended to take any part in this debate; but the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) brought my name into the discussion, and he rather intimated that the Acting Minister of Immigration (Mr. Stewart) had taken upon himself to settle the entire question of the government's relation to the Canada Colonization Association, and that the matter had not been carefully considered by the government as a whole. I just want to assure the House that co-operation in this matter was not lightly undertaken by the government but that it did receive the most careful consideration in Cabinet Council, before the minister finally decided to give the approval which he gave as to a limited measure of governmental assistance towards this Canada Colonization scheme.

I should like to draw the attention of hon. members to the responsibility which the government had in this matter. A government has to accept responsibility, not only for what it does, but for what it refuses or fails to do. In the matter of immigration, as members of the House well know, there is nothing that, perhaps, counts for so much as an effective organization, an organization that will bring together large bodies of influence that may have means and methods which even a government itself could not possibly have of helping to bring about the result desired. When we came into office, we found that our predecessors had done little or nothing with respect to immigration, in the months immediately preceding their going out of office. As a matter of fact, the whole immigration work of the government had been practically stopped. There was a demand, very naturally and properly, from all parts of Canada, that efforts should be made to stimulate immigration; that advantage should be taken of every possible agency towards that end. We found an organization which was already in existence, an organization, let me say at once, not composed of friends of the government. I think almost every name identified with it was that of a gentleman who had not been associated, so far as I am aware, with the administration; but the names were for the most part those of men who rank high in public confidence in this country. We found that organization in existence, and it was represented to us that it had been able to bring together certain of the large financial interests, the large transportation companies, and to a considerable extent the entire press of the country, as a combined agency to help to further it in its purpose, which was asserted to be the patriotic one of assisting in getting settlers for the vacant lands of this country.

I ask hon. members: With an association of that kind in existence, representing to the government that our co-operation was required in order that they might get assistance from Great Britain under the British Empire settlement scheme, what position would the government have been in had it refused to countenance, in the slight degree in which we have countenanced it, this organization, and refused to agree to assist it in its welfare work?

I venture to say that hon. gentlemen who are condemning us to-day for some of the features of this organization which do not appeal to them, would have been the first and loudest in their denunciation of the government, had we at that time said: "We will not have anything to do with this particular organization." And what would have been said? The reason would have been very speedily alleged or the motive asserted that the government had declined its co-operation because the gentlemen who for the most part composed the company, were not of the same political persuasion as members of the administration.

I confess that when the whole plan was put before the government, I felt it was a serious matter for the government to lend assistance to an association as vast as this. On the other hand, considering the responsibility of refusing, and what a refusal might involve, namely, a possible complete crippling of the organization, and the destroying of the possibility of its securing assistance from the British government in connection with its work, I felt, on examining the personnel and above all having regard for the then president of the association, that the government was justified in lending the countenance it did to the association. I had interviews with Sir John Willison. The minister and myself met Sir John Willison and other members of the board at Toronto, and they outlined their plans very fully to us. The matter was thoroughly discussed in Council, and such assistance as we were giving, was given on the same basis as the British Empire Association was to give its assistance, and on a parity with what the organisation itself was also to give for its welfare work.

Let me again read this communication, because in a way it sums up the endorsation which the government felt it had from the different parties concerned. The minister has read it, but I shall refer to it again. The telegram was sent to me by Sir John Willison from Winnipeg after conversations we had had together on the subject, and after I had intimated in the clearest possible way to Sir John Willison that unless the government had the assurance that this scheme was one which appealed to the western governments, and that it was a plan which was likely to meet with the general approval of parliament, irrespective altogether of the groups of which it was composed, we could not undertake to lend our co-operation to what it was proposing to do. On September 30th Sir John Willison sent me this telegram:

> Have just completed tour of West. Have had conferences with four western governments and with grain growers and held many public meetings. Interviews with all governments most satisfactory and all meetings warmly sympathetic.

Now, I submit that no one who knows Sir John Willison and is aware of his standing, not only in this country, but throughout the British Empire, would suggest that a statement of that kind from him to the government of Canada was not equivalent to an endorsation of this plan on the part of the western governments and the people of the West generally. The telegram continues:

> At Winnipeg meeting five hundred representative citizens called by James Stewart adopted with enthusiasm resolution offering plan Canada Colonization Association. Everywhere we emphasized action government in uniting all forces for immigration and settlement.

That was the strong point urged upon us by this association. It was pointed out by Sir John Willison and his associates that they had succeeded in bringing together into one organization agencies which were prepared to co-operate and which were so essential to bring immigrants to Canada, namely, the transportation agencies, the financial backing that was necessary, and the press of the country—three powerful and mighty influences, all ready to work together for the settlement of the unsettled areas. That was the note which Sir John Willison sounded, not only in conversation with the government, but publicly wherever he spoke on the subject.

> Beatty has appointed Col. Dennis to represent Canadian Pacific on operating committee association,—

My hon. friend asks whether we have the endorsation of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I ask, in reply, what better form of endorsation could be given by this corporation than that which is implied in this statement, that its president had appointed Colonel Dennis to represent the Canadian Pacific Railway on the operating committee of the association. Then my hon. friend asks, have we any endorsation from any other source. What is the next statement in the telegram:

> —and Chipman of Grain Growers Guide with approval Crerar has agreed represent western farmers.

These are all names that are held in respect in this House and that carry weight with the government and with the country. I submit that with the class of representations that are contained in that telegram which were made to the government in regard to this association, had we refused to have anything to do with the organization, or to assist it to the small extent that we are—because in view of the fact that the organization has a subscribed capital of over a million dollars, $100,000 is relatively small when it covers everything for which we are obligated and which we have conditionally promised—our responsibility, in refusing to have anything to do with the organization would have been infinitely greater than the obligation which we have assumed in endeavouring to give the organization a start on its way, and to help it successfully carry out the large purposes for which it is intended.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the House took recess.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When the committee rose at six o'clock I had been speaking of the responsibility of the government in the matter of lending the assistance which it promised to the Western Canada Colonization Association, and the still greater responsibility we would have assumed had we refused to have anything to do with that organization. I hope I made it plain that in promising a limited measure of assistance for the welfare work of the Association, the government was influenced by the importance of the work, the personnel of the association, and the large and responsible interests represented by those gentlemen in this country.

I would like to say quite frankly that among the names that helped to inspire confidence so far as I personally was concerned was that of Sir John Willison, as president of the organization. I felt that Sir John Willison would not have associated himself as president with the Western Canada Colonization Association if its purpose was, as has been suggested in this debate that of some realty scheme, a land profits scheme of some kind or another, an agency other than of a patriotic and public-spirited character. Believing that the purpose of the organization was of a patriotic and public-spirited character, the government felt that it would justly incur a measure of disapproval, if it failed to encourage to the extent it did, an undertaking as vast as this, and which gave promise of such profitable results, possibly not all in a day, but in the course of time, by way of settling people on large tracts of land in this country.

When Sir John Willison retired from the presidency of the company, I confess that the members of the government felt a moment of concern with respect to the assistance that should be continued towards the organization, and we hesitated somewhat in our further relations with it. I remember particularly in the interviews I had with one or two members of the organization mentioning that we had gone into this matter to the extent we had, from purely public reasons, that if we had been governed by party considerations in any way, we would probably, as I indicated before recess, have had nothing whatever to do with the organization, as most of its personnel were gentlemen who were known to be opposed to the government. I stated that we had sought to take what we believed to be a broad patriotic stand and on this basis had recognized the association which our predecessors in office had been prepared to have dealings with. I pointed out that with the change that had come about as a consequence of Sir John Willison's resignation, it would be necessary for the company to give the government some further assurance of the confidence which it held in the minds of the people of the country. I spoke particularly of the complexion of the House of Commons and of the necessity in any great undertaking of this kind, of the government having the co-operation of the groups which were opposed to it. I pointed out that we had no desire whatever to deal with the immigration question on party lines; that we wished to have a policy broader than that of party and that we hoped and believed we could count upon the co-operation of hon. members in this House, in an endeavour to deal with this all important question, probably the most important we have, in a statesmanlike way. I received the assurance of the officers of the company that they had been in conference with the leaders of the groups opposite, and that the leaders were of the opinion that the government should give their support to the organization notwithstanding the change which had taken place in the presidency. I said that I would like to have some substantial evidence of that, and in the course of a short time I was presented with one or two letters which I shall read to the House, and I shall ask hon. members to consider from a reading of them whether the government was not right in believing that it was justified in continuing the co-operation which it had promised.

The first is a letter from the Right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen), dated at Ottawa, Ontario, as recently as February 5, 1923. It is addressed to Mr. M. A. Brown, Vice-President of the Western Canada Colonization Association, Ottawa, Ontario. It was given to me by Mr. Brown with the statement that he had the permission of the right hon. leader of the Opposition to give this letter to the government. It reads as follows:

Dear Mr. BROWN,

Western Canada Colonization Association

You have asked me to give you my view as to the above Association.

When your organization was under way, the Honourable Mr. J. A. Calder, who was at that time Minister of Immigration and Colonization, looked with favour upon the establishment of a voluntary non-profit sharing company designed to serve as a colonizing agency of western farm lands, and as such to help to place and take care of immigrants who were to be intending settlers upon such lands.

Mr. Calder's attitude in this regard, which I believe was put in the form of a letter to the Association, was in harmony with the attitude of the government of the time.

I regarded such an Association as having a useful purpose to serve and could see then as I see now, no reason why it should not succeed.

Yours very truly,

ARTHUR MEIGHEN.

At the same time I was handed by Mr. Brown a letter from my hon. friend the member for Brandon (Mr. Forke), and I may say that I had the same assurance from Mr. Brown at the time this letter was received by me, that it had been written with the expectation that the government would not hesitate to use it, if circumstances seemed to warrant its introduction into any of the debates. It reads as follows:

OTTAWA, February 3, 1923.

Dear Mr. BROWN,

Having taken into consideration the policy of the Canada Colonization Association, which is planned to effect the settlement of the vacant lands of the railway lines in Canada, I have no hesitation in endorsing the scheme so well suited to the requirements of the country. The need of new immigrants to settle our vacant lands is great and would tend to solve some of the problems that are now before us.

I am therefore of opinion that the government should do all in its power to assist the Association in this important enterprise.

Yours very sincerely,

ROBERT FORKE.

That communication is in entire accord with the speech which the hon. leader of the Progressive group made in this House a night or two ago.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that these two communications are to all intents and purposes an endorsation of the Western Canada Colonization Association, an endorsation given in the same spirit and with the same knowledge of the organization, as the government had. I think hon. gentlemen opposite who have given these communications to the Western Canada Colonization Association have done so with precisely the same motive as the government had, in giving such endorsation as it gave, in promising co-operation with the British Empire Settlement Association in its immigration scheme. May I say that I think that had all hon. members of this House the knowledge of this association, and the purpose of its work, and the information concerning what it has accomplished in bringing together the different elements whose co-operation are so essential to success in immigration, their view of its possible service would have been precisely what the view of the government has been and the view expressed also in the two communications from the respective leaders of the groups opposite., which I have read to the House.

If, as a matter of fact, it should now appear that in any particular the Western Canada Colonization Association is not fulfilling the spirit as well as the intent of the letter of the representations and the undertakings they gave to the government, that would be a good and sufficient reason for the government to consider at this time whether further assistance should be given to the organization. I submit that at the present time—

Mr. FORKE: May I interrupt for a moment? I understood just before we rose at six o'clock that there was another letter to which the Prime Minister had referred. It may not be proper to read that letter without the permission of the writer, but I understood there was another letter which the Premier would probably read to-night. If the Premier thinks it better not to read that letter I will not press the request.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I may say that I saw my hon. friend as I was going out of the House at 6 o'clock, and I mentioned to him that I intended this evening to read his communication to Mr. Brown, and that I had another communication from the leader of the Opposition. Those were the two communications which I referred to, they are the two which I have just read. Probably I read the one from the leader of the Opposition before my hon. friend came in. Is not that the communication to which he refers?

Mr. FORKE: No, that was not the one I refer to. However, I prefer to leave the matter where it is for the present. I think the Premier has another letter; he probably understands the one I mean.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, I am not aware of any other.

Mr. STEVENS: Let us have them all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would be glad if my hon. friend would mention the communication to which he refers; I have no knowledge of it. The only communications I spoke of to my hon. friend were the two which I have in my hand at the moment, and possibly the telegram from Sir John Willison. I did not refer to any other.

Mr. FORKE: It is all right; I am quite satisfied.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend recalls the conversation I had with him, he will recollect that I simply mentioned to him that I intended to read his communication, and also a communication from the right hon. leader of the Opposition, each of which had been given to me by Mr. Brown, and given on the understanding that they were to be regarded as public communications.

Now, all that I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, is this: I submit that the government, in the action which it took at the outset, was justified in lending the co-operation it did to this organization, from the representations that were made concerning its opportunities of service, from the nature of the organization itself, and the personnel of those who were responsible for its affairs. I submit further, that such changes as have taken place since would be a reason for the government moving with increased caution in the matter of any assistance it might give the association; that having taken the precautions that the government has taken to ascertain from the leaders of the groups opposite how far they also had confidence in this organization, and having before it the communications which I have just read, the government has, in this matter, acted in a manner which is best serving the interests of the country. But if it should now appear that this organization has in any way departed from its original purpose, if in any way it is departing from the representations which it made to the government—and on the basis of which such co-operation as we have given was given—then there would be good and sufficient reason why we should consider whether that co-operation should be extended any further. I confess, having regard to all of the circumstances, to the fact that the immigration problem is par excellence the great problem concerning this country at the present time, having regard to the fact that this association has brought together the different interests that should work in a co-ordinated fashion in the matter of immigration, that there would be a very great responsibility in the government declining at this stage to have anything further to do with the organization. But if hon. members have not confidence in it, if there is any reason to mistrust the organization at this particular stage, then I would say quite frankly that the government is prepared to consider just how much further, if at all, it should extend the co-operation which it has already promised in good faith, and in what it believes to be the best interests of the country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I had not the privilege of hearing the Prime Minister until the commencement of his reading of the letter addressed by myself to the Secretary of the Canada Colonization Association, nor had I, indeed, intimation from the Prime Minister that any letter of mine was to be read.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me say to my right hon. friend at once, if he will permit me that it was on the merest chance that when the House adjourned I saw the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke). I would have read the letter before six o'clock if there had been time. My right hon. friend was not in the House when I was speaking before dinner. Had he been I would have extended the same courtesy to him that I did to the hon. member for Brandon; I would have mentioned that I had received his letter and intended to read it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not making the least complaint. I did not write the letter with any idea of secrecy at all, and I stand by the terms of that letter to the last period. When the late government was in office the Western Canada Colonization Association, as it was then called, was formed. It was formed on the basis of a voluntary association to assist in the settlement of near railway western lands, supported by the voluntary contribution of those who desired those lands settled, and particularly by those who had a special interest in that settlement. The late government made no proposal, nor did it receive favourably any suggestion, looking to exerting its own immigration activities through the instrumentality of the organization. The late government merely looked with favour upon the formation of a voluntary non-profit sharing organization. That position we took then, that position I reiterated without hesitation in the letter that was read; but just as we looked with favour upon the organization of a non-profit sharing company for this work, just as we took that view of it we took, as well, the view that there should not be any system of assistance on the part of the administration, nor any system of inter-responsibility as between the Immigration department, the government of Canada and any land selling organization. That responsibility we declined to take; and my letter is not only entirely consistent with that position but emphasizes it from beginning to end. I do not favour any assistance by the government; I do not favour any inter-locking responsibility as between the government of Canada and any land organization whatsoever; I did not favour it at the time; I do not favour it now. That is the purport of the letter I wrote, and if the government feels that it can rest on any letter of mine as endorsing the policy that now is presented to this House, I am afraid it rests on a broken reed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Might I ask my right hon. friend whether, in his mind, the circumstance that his letter is headed "Western Canada Colonization Association", underlined and dated February 5, implies that he is referring to the Western Canada Association. as it was at that date.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That association was organized as a non-profit sharing, voluntary organization. As such it was looked on with favour; but assistance, by the government, and any system of inter-locking responsibility of the government with it was refused. Presented in the character it was then, for the purposes it then had, by itself and without any responsibility on the government's part and without any assistance from the government, it was favoured. In that sense I favoured it then; I have not changed my position in regard to the matter at all. But to say that because one does look with favour on the activities of a voluntary company, resting on its own feet, not asking to be supported by the state, not asking that the state share the responsibility of its work —favouring a company on that basis is one thing, the government policy is something else altogether. There is no word in my letter binding me, or intimating in the least degree that I favoured assistance by the government of Canada or that I favoured the government of Canada entering into some arrangement with this organization whereby government officers would assume a share of the responsibility for the work of the organization in the selling of lands, or in the purchase of lands by immigrants—nothing in the world in my letter favoured any such policy. I am quite prepared, I say, to stand by what I said then, because it is no doubt what we said when we were in power. But what we did when we were in power is wholly different from this proposal; and what I said at that time is wholly different from what is said by the Prime Minister.

Now, I have not had the advantage of hearing anything else from the Prime Minister himself, but in the course of the debate I have heard it said that nothing was done by the late administration in the way of immigration, and that there were great calls for immigration activities in the time of the late administration. Well, there were calls for many things during the time of the late administration. It was a time of calls all over the Dominion, but the only thing that was not called for was immigration. I do not remember ever hearing the call from anybody for special activities in immigration at that time. Here, as in every country in the world, the volume of unemployment was great—great in almost all classes of employment—and there was considerable suffering as a result. It is true we had the least unemployment relatively of any country in the world. It is true we had less unemployment even than the great republic to the south of us though one would expect that in the reaction and the relapse from the war we would suffer more than the great republic. Up to the end of 1921 our share of unemployment was less than theirs, but that is not the case to-day. Our share of unemployment now is much more than theirs relatively to population. Still we had large numbers out of work and there was no pressure for great immigration effort.

Immigration at that time though was not dead. Immigration at that time was all it could be expected to be so soon after the war. We had some 117,000 people come to this country in the year that succeeded the war; that is to say in the first fiscal year after the war. We had some 140,000 people in the succeeding year, and last year, part of it being in the lifetime of the present government, the number admitted to Canada was some 89,000 people. The number coming to Canada in the last full year of the late government was 148,000 odd. This country could not reasonably expect a more lively immigration. But with the advent of this government those things changed, and now the stream is almost dammed. Nothing has been done for a year and a quarter. What is proposed now is this method of using the Western Canada Colonization Company—at least that is the main feature of the present policy—but for a year and a half there has been absolutely no activity in the organization, and the drying up of the stream of immigration is at the door of this administration. It is for them to find the solution and it is for them to present the solution to parliament.

Now what they propose is before this House, but let them not try to rest their present proposals on any imprimatur of the late administration, and let them not try to account for the present dearth of immigration by any failure of the late administration. The largest immigration this country ever had was under us in the year 1913, when, I think, it was 446,000, or about that number. The year before the immigration was about the same. There could be absolutely no immigration during the war. That naturally and inevitably flows from the exigencies of war. But even during the period of the war, even during the full years of the war, when the submarines and all other war activities prevented immigration, when indeed the laws of countries prevented it, the average immigration was greater than the immigration we are getting now. These are the facts of the situation. I rose to-night only to draw attention to the actual effect of the wording and meaning of the letter which I wrote and to say that I have no objection whatever to any publicity which may be given to it. By that letter I abide, but I will not have read into that letter anything which is not there.

Mr. FORKE: I do not know whether I can make myself plain in any fewer words than the right hon. leader of the Opposition has taken to state his position. I have no apologies for anything I have done. I have not changed my mind in any particular. I wrote that letter in perfect good faith and I think I could write it with a clear conscience to-day. I had no idea at that time as to what the government was going to do, and understood nothing of the relations which existed between the government and the Western Canada Colonization Association. I do not know whether I drew my letter just as closely as the right hon. leader of the Opposition did, but I am certain the intention I had was the same as his intention. We had no difference in our idea, which was to convey to the people at large that we thought there was merit in the scheme. I think so yet. I may be wrong. I think I said when speaking in the beginning of the debate, that if the scheme could not stand criticism and investigation by all means condemn it, but what I had to find fault with, and do find fault with to-day, is that the scheme had been condemned without trial or investigation in any quarter. We know something about the scheme and understand something about its workings, and, as with every other scheme, unless the personnel of the men who are connected with it and who are carrying out its working is what it ought to be, then perhaps the scheme will fall down. I am quite prepared to stand on what I said in that letter. It had nothing to do with the arrangement proposed by the government at the present time. That will have to stand on its own merits, and in that connection it might be thought that there was something mysterious about the question I was asking the Premier about another letter. I know that Mr. Brown had two or three hundred letters from most of the prominent people in this country. It is part of the stock in trade in launching any scheme to get the endorsation of men whose opinions are worth having, and I thought perhaps the Premier would read another letter which I had in mind.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have no other letter.

Mr. FORKE: It makes no difference. I do not think the writer would have objected to it, but I think perhaps it is better not to read it when the gentleman is not here.

I have said all I wish to say on this particular question, and I will simply repeat the words of the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) that I have nothing to be ashamed of, or to apologize for, and I have nothing to take back from what I wrote.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The debate has centred recently around the question of the Western Canada Colonization Association. I do not desire to say very much with regard to that company, as I think there has been a great deal of criticism offered. I must protest against the government subsidizing any private company of this character. It seems to me that, with the Soldier Settlement Board in existence, with the government agents throughout this country and the United States and Europe, we ought to have sufficient machinery to do the work that is required to be done along these lines, and we ought not to commit ourselves to any private company that undoubtedly has, in one form or another, profit and gain in view. The Acting Minister of Immigration (Mr. Stewart) referred to the fact that the Salvation Army is receiving funds for which no accounting is required. It seems to me if this is so it is rather a thing in itself to be inquired into. We do not need to condemn any organization, the Salvation Army or any other, but we say there ought to be a strict accounting for every dollar that is spent by this parliament, and we ought to know exactly the purpose to which it is being applied.

In considering this matter we shall require to go a great deal more deeply into the question than simply dealing with one particular company. I cannot agree with the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) in his statement that the drying up of the stream of immigration must be laid at the door of the present government. I take it that there are larger economic and social forces at work, and that, whatever government was in power at the present time, we would have very similar results. Personally, I am not opposed to immigration as such. The member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey) told us the other day of the very great resources we had in Winnipeg and the western country. I think we all agree on that. Any man who has lived in the West is fully cognizant of the almost unparalleled resources that exist in that western country, and I think we all recognize that with those resources we have room for millions of people in the West. No one disputes that; but that is not the point that we are arguing at the present time. The question before us is whether we should adopt an active immigration policy in face of existing conditions at home. It seems to me that the first duty of this parliament is to safeguard the interests of those already in the country. It is not that some of us are opposed to immigration that we oppose such a policy as this; but we say: "Why go on with this policy when there are other alternatives that we might adopt?" We have been told that we ought to pump immigrants in. We, who question the policy are on the ground of common sense when we say that it is more essential to stop the leaks than to keep pumping people in. It might be all very well to pump them in if we proceed at the same time to stop the leaks; but it would seem the part of good, sound common sense to stop the leaks first. It is not good policy to continue to expend large sums of money while people are leaking out faster than we can pump them in.

We might clarify our thinking if we should ask who is really to benefit by this immigration policy. The hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler)) took rather high moral grounds when he said that we have no exclusive claim to this country, and that we ought to admit people who, perhaps, are in inferior positions in other lands. I am quite willing to admit that that is true, although I notice that the hon. member for North Waterloo was rather inclined to think we white people had exclusive claims to this country. I do not know how he reconciles that with the broader idea; but I do not think we can contend that we alone have exclusive claim to the northern half of this American continent. It is, however, laid upon us who are here to see to it that large floods of immigrants are not permitted to destroy or to lower permanently the standard of living of the people in this country.

Although we protest that we are doing this for the sake of the immigrant, again and again in those self-same speeches, we come back to the point that we are doing this in order that we may get more people to carry our load. Let us be frank and say that we are asking for more immigrants in order that they may help us in this country and assist this country. I am not sure that that is not a very good reason, for the adoption of such a policy; but let us be frank and say that we are looking after ourselves in this regard. That raises a still further question whether all people or all classes of people in Canada are to be benfited by such immigration, or whether we are benefitting only certain classes. It seems rather peculiar that the great masses of the labour people of this country and of the farming people of the western part of Canada should be opposed to bringing in immigrants. Under these circumstances we should ask ourselves whether the incoming of immigrants at the present time would not tend to benefit simply a few. Undoubtedly the transportation systems would benefit very largely, and I fancy from the telegram which was read twice to-day and which was emphasized, that the transportation interests and the financial interests have been exercising a very strong pressure upon the Acting Minister of Immigration (Mr. Stewart) and upon the government in this regard. It is two or three years ago since Lord Shaughnessy first told us that we ought again to adopt a progressive immigration policy, and about two years ago now, Mr. Beatty, president of the Canadian Pacific, came out very definitely with this policy which we are being urged to adopt. Mr. Beatty said:

> The most urgent and essential need to-day is increase in population, not only to provide traffic for the railways, but also to help pay our enormous national indebtedness.

He said further:

> In reference to the 300,000 Ukrainians in western Canada, in which it is stated that these people of sturdy farming stock from central Europe have four large educational institutes.

And so on. He claims that these are the people whom we ought to bring in—the sturdy peasants from Central Europe. Still further, not satisfied with this, Mr. Beatty urges:

> What progress can Canadian industry make if the skilled mechanic is to be practically shut out? And without Canadian industry where are we to find exports for the Canadian Merchant Marine?

I would like to ask: What attitude are these transportation interests themselves taking in this matter of retaining the people in this country and building up our Canadian industry? I have received a communication from a union of mechanics from my own city of Winnipeg, which states:

> The Manitoba Free Press of Friday the second of February carried a despatch stating that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company had let contracts in the States for the construction of sixteen locomotives, and that in the meantime their own plants were working to capacity, whilst as a matter of fact at that very time the Angus shops were closed down, and its working staff on the streets.

This organization passed the following resolution which was forwarded to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the Acting Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham), and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock):

> Whereas, continual attacks are being made upon the earnings of railway workers and,
>
> Whereas, the shopmen employed by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have been on continuous short time for the past two years, and,
>
> Whereas, the highest possible earnings of a skilled mechanic working every hour the shops were open during the last two years have averaged only $24.61 per week, and the highest possible earnings of a mechanic's helper have averaged only $16.90 per week, and,
>
> Whereas, according to published statements the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have during the last crop movement had the largest earnings in the history of the road, and notwithstanding, have kept the mechanical staff on short time and periodically closed the shops,
>
> Now, therefore, be it resolved that this mass meeting of Canadian Pacific shopmen strongly protest this action of the company, and demand that the transportation industry of the country be organized upon a basis that will ensure a decent standard of living for the permanent staff engaged in it.

If we turn from the West to the East, I have also from the International Association of Machinists in Montreal, a resolution along somewhat similar lines:

> We understand that contracts for some forty-eight lake freighters have recently been contracted for, by companies operating on our lakes and rivers, with firms outside the country and it would appear to us that such business methods are not in the best interests of the citizens of this country. The shipyard workers of this country have demonstrated their ability to build good ships and the boats they produced are, in their particular class, amongst the finest, in point of workmanship, to be found on the waters of the globe. Thousands of these workmen have been thrown out of employment, or have been forced to accept temporary work in other lines, through the closing down of our shipyards and this condition obtains, to a great extent, because of the failure on the part of shipping companies, operating in Canada, to patronize Canadian shipyards. It is also a fact that many of our best shipyard mechanics have left the country in search of employment in that line and, undoubtedly, many others will be compelled to do likewise, unless some action is taken to prevent it.

Mr. MURDOCK: What is the date of that letter?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: January 30, 1923. That was sent to me with a request that the matter be brought before parliament at the first opportunity. Now, when we have men in the employ of these transportation companies, both in the East and in the West, bringing in resolutions along this line, outlining facts that show a condition of affairs in which large numbers of our own Canadian citizens find it impossible to obtain a decent living in this country, it seems to me that there is something to be attended to before there is adopted any policy looking to the bringing in of more people. In my constituency of Centre Winnipeg, I think there have been thousands of people during the past year who have been forced to go south of the line in order to get work. Among these people there were the very best mechanics to be found in this country, and to such an extent has this emigration taken place that we are now told there may be a shortage. There is not yet, however, any shortage in Canada in this direction.

I might refer to the different classes of immigrants that we have had brought into Canada in the past. Roughly speaking, during the fifteen years in which our immigration was at full tide, one-third of the immigrants came from the United States, one-third from Great Britain, and one-third from the various countries of Europe. Undoubtedly those who have come to us from the western states have been amongst our very best citizens, from the standpoint of the farming industry. A very considerable number of them sold out their holdings in the United States at high prices and invested in our Canadian lands, which they were able to purchase comparatively cheap. A good many of them brought considerable equipment with them, and from the material point of view at least their incoming meant a great deal, especially to the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta. Those, however, who know these provinces and have experience of them in more recent years, know that very many of these American citizens are already travelling back over the boundary. Some of them are selling out their lands in this country because they want to get back to the homeland south of the line. A good many, of course, are remaining. But it would seem as though there are a sufficient number of people in the leading western states who now know of the opportunities offered by western Canada that, if our taxation could be brought down and implements could be put within reach of the farmers at reasonable prices, there would not be the slightest doubt that we should gain steadily a stream of immigration from the western states.

The second group of people to whom I referred came from Great Britain. These were of two classes: first of all, those who came from the rural districts. And we have never had a very large immigration from rural England; a larger number have come from rural Scotland. But I would suggest that those who come from rural England, if we can get any, are not going to solve our problems in western Canada; for I would remind my Progressive friends here that a good many of these people are accustomed to standards of living much superior to those which a large percentage of our farmers can afford to give them in this country. I would remind my hon. friends that these people, too, are accustomed to membership in unions of agricultural labourers, that they have worked much shorter hours than they would be required to work in this country, and have been used to very much better accommodation than can be found on a great many of our western farms. And I know that a good many of my farmer friends in the West feel that agricultural workers from England are rather a difficult class to handle to-day under present conditions.

Mr. GAUVREAU: What about their Scotch whiskey?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Well, in the dry territories that may be a very serious matter, too. There is another thing which I think a good many of our farmers are realizing more and more clearly. In the older days when immigration was flowing freely to this country and when there was a steady movement from eastern Canada to the West, it was comparatively easy for the western farmer to secure hired men for a short period. Young fellows without the encumbrances of a family were eager to get a start in the new land and were willing to be hired for a few months at a time; then if they so desired they could take up homesteads for themselves. To-day the farmers on the prairies are having to compete more and more with the manufacturers in the city for hired labour; and the labour men in the cities are accustomed to shorter hours than those customary on the farm. A good many of them have families and expect that provision shall be made for themselves and their families where they are expected to reside. In this way, we shall have to recognize that the problem of agricultural labour in western Canada is bound to be a very serious one in the days to come. We cannot depend upon a steady supply of transient labour which we can use for a few months and then get rid of. In the older countries farming has become fully self-supporting; it should be in no sense parasitic.

Now, although in my judgment at least the manufacturers and the transportation companies of this country have exploited the farmer, at the same time I think that in a great many ways our farmers have existed at all only by exploiting their hired help and their own wives and children. If I understand the temper of these western farmers, they are beginning to take the stand that they are not going indefinitely to exploit their wives and children. A great many of the farm labourers, too, are beginning to realize that they have a right to expect that if they are going to work on farms they must have the assurance that they shall work for twelve months in the year and, as my hon. friend (Mr. Hoey) implied, that some arrangement must be made to provide them with permanent homes. In some way we shall have to overcome the difficulty in connection with seasonal labour.

Anyone who has come into close contact with the immigration from the Old Land recognizes that a large proportion of our English immigration has come to us from the cities. It is quite true that a certain number of these immigrants declared that they were going to work on the farms; but again and again they have drifted back into the cities. The mere fact that they declare their destination to be the farm does not in any way bind them to stay there. Some of us who have lived in the cities for years, and who have had to do with the welfare work in those centres of our population, know perfectly well that a large proportion of the people with whom we have to deal are Old Country immigrants who came expecting to work on farms but who finally became dependent on relief in the cities. One scene particularly is fresh in my memory. There was a great gathering of several thousands of unemployed workers on the Cambie street grounds in the city of Vancouver two or three years ago. Word was brought that a large number of British immigrants were expected. Here were two thousand people, without work. Leaders of the unemployed drafted a resolution which they presented to the crowd, embodying a protest against the bringing in of more people while those at present unemployed were not looked after. Curiously enough, the crowd refused to pass that resolution. They said, practically in desperation; "No, the more the merrier; let them come in, and after we have enough Old Country workers here we shall be able to take things into our own hands." I would suggest, if I believed in that philosophy of despair, that the more you bring into this country from England the better. Expecting higher standards of living, they will force radical changes; unfortunately that might involve a considerable amount of trouble and even chaos in Canada.

I would like to speak for a few minutes about our third group, those from various European countries. The Minister of Immigration rather emphasized the importance of northern immigrants, suggesting that the government would seek to get a great many people from northern Europe. I have no doubt we would all like to get northern Europeans. They are much the same stock as we are—Scandinavians, French, Germans. They are hardy settlers and would do well in Canada. But unfortunately, for the past twenty-five years the stream of immigration has come to North American shores not so much from northern Europe as from southeastern Europe. That is true of immigration both to the United States and to Canada. We may get a few Belgians, Hollanders, and so on, who may help us in our dairy farming or truck farming, but we shall not get anything like the numbers from northern Europe that we might get or that we have got from southeastern Europe. A good many of the people coming to us from southeastern Europe belong to the trading classes. Hebrews, Greeks, and people of that character are coming in considerable numbers, but they are not the agriculturists about which a good many people tell us; they almost invariably go to the cities. I know a few farming colonies of Hebrews in western Canada, and some of them are doing very well. But on the whole they are city dwellers and they add to our commercial and financial classes. By the way, let me refer to the propaganda that is being carried on by the transportation companies with regard to immigrants to this country. I have in my hand a folder issued by Canadian Pacific Steamships, which reads:

> Prepaid passengers to Canada from Russia are coming forward on every sailing. Soviet Russia prepaids. Canadian Pacific steamships was the first transatlantic steamship company to open its own office in Russia. Canadian Pacific steamships was the first to be authorized by the Soviet government to book passengers from Russia to Canada.

Just why we cannot recognize Soviet Russia when the Canadian Pacific is already bringing over large numbers of immigrants from there is beyond my comprehension. A large number of people have come to us in the past from those eastern countries. We had from Russia itself, a good many of you may remember, a large number of Doukhobors—people who did well in Saskatchewan, but who unfortunately were driven from their lands by somebody who did not understand their peculiar religious beliefs and their ideals. A good many of them went to British Columbia, where they have done remarkable work—

Mr. SALES: Will the hon. member explain how they were "driven" from the lands?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I shall be very glad to do so. They were brought here on the express understanding that they should be allowed certain privileges, should be given the right to practise their own religious beliefs and to live in communities. It was against their religion to take the oath of allegiance; they were what might be called Eastern Quakers. For a time they lived in Saskatchewan, building up considerable communities there. Then there came into office another Minister of the Interior who insisted that they should register, each man for his own property, and should take the oath of allegiance. This was opposed to their ideals and to the understanding that they had with the government when they come to this country. The great majority of them, rather than give up their religious beliefs and their peculiar ideals, gave up their lands, valued, I think, at some $10,000,000, and, for the most part, went further west and purchased lands at the junction of the Columbia and Kootenay rivers. In this connection I want to suggest to the committee that certain problems were introduced into the country by the emigration of these peculiar peoples from other lands. We still have the Doukhobors in British Columbia, and we still have their peculiar religious and moral ideas to deal with. By importing large numbers of these sectaries and others we may increase our exports for the time being, but sooner or later we shall have to face the problem of absorbing them into our Canadian citizenship.

Take another group, also a peculiar people, the Mennonites. Of Holland or German extraction, these people had lived for a good many years in Russia. About forty years ago they came to this country and settled in southern Manitoba. They were among our very best settlers. From Manitoba they colonized certain sections of Saskatchewan. Then there came the question of the public schools, which became acute at the time of the war; and the action of the Manitoba and Saskatchewan governments on that question has driven thousands of these people away down into Mexico where they are seeking freedom in the exercise of their religious beliefs. Very recently the business men of Winnipeg, realizing the financial loss involved, got together in an effort to induce the government to change its policy so that these Mennonite colonies might be retained in Manitoba. I am not sure that we can gain a great deal by allowing tens of thousands of Mennonites who have been here for forty years to go to another country and then bring in fresh streams of Poles from another country. It may be quite true that Mennonites are a brand of Protestant while Poles are a brand of Roman Catholic. In other words, we have a change of religious belief, but we have the same European peasant to deal with; and that is a difficulty that we face throughout western Canada.

Take the Ukrainians, the largest group we have. I am not one who thinks that the Ukrainian people are undesirable settlers. There are some 300,000 of them in the West, and they have on the whole made good, especially when they were settled on anything like decent land. There are some of them in Manitoba on poor lands, but on the whole they came in with very little capital; they worked hard and now most of them have their lands with very little debt. They had low standards of living, but they persisted and a great many of them to-day own their own homes. During the war it began to dawn upon us in Canada, as it did in the United States, that this talk about all these people going into the melting pot was a lot of nonsense. As they said in the States, they may be put into the melting pot, but they refuse to melt; and unless we are careful in this country we shall have a Balkanized Canada. Down in eastern Canada you have had some trouble in the past, I understand, as between French-speaking and English-speaking people.

Mr. MARLER: When did we have any trouble between the English-speaking and the French-speaking people in the province of Quebec?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I speak largely from hearsay, but I live in the West and there has never been an election when I have not heard of considerable strain and stress between the English-speaking and the French-speaking people of eastern Canada.

Mr. MARLER: If the hon. member is referring to the province of Quebec, I absolutely deny any such charge. There is the best of feeling between the French and English in the province of Quebec.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think the hon. member has misunderstood me. I am not speaking of the province of Quebec. I spoke of eastern Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: You said Quebec.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If I did, then I withdraw. I had not thought of the province of Quebec. I was thinking of eastern Canada when I spoke.

Mr. MARTELL: Is the hon. member referring to Nova Scotia? If he can point to any trouble that has occurred between the French and the English in the province of Nova Scotia, it is more than I can.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not speaking of the province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. MARLER: What province is the hon. member speaking of? Let us know exactly where we are.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I was speaking of eastern Canada.

Mr. LEGER: There has never been any trouble between the French and English in the province of New Brunswick.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince, P.E.I.): I hope the hon. member is not referring to Prince Edward Island?

Mr. BUREAU: You must have a bad press out West.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think anyone who understands anything of the problems of Canada will recognize that sometimes at least in this country there has been in eastern Canada—I am thinking of central, eastern Canada—considerable strain between the French-speaking people and the English-speaking people.

Mr. BUREAU: In what province?

Mr. JACOBS: That was in the days of Wolfe and Montcalm.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I for one am glad to think that we have had a decided effort to promote something of a better feeling—and I think the effort has been very largely successful—between these two great races in Canada, so that we may sit here to-day in absolute friendship. But I would like to suggest that there are problems—religious, racial, and linguistic—that we must have in the West if we continue to import large numbers of people from all the countries of Europe. That is the point I wish to make, and we have to be careful on that particular score.

There is another matter to which reference should be made, and that is the relationship which exists between the people in the city and the people in the country. Here in eastern Canada—I hope I will not have to say whether it is in Ontario or Quebec—but generally speaking in eastern Canada, the farmers have stayed more largely on the farms than they have on the prairies. Out in the West there is a continual drifting backward and forward between the cities and the country. A very considerable number of people who have tried to homestead in western Canada have drifted back into our cities. I was in a little town in northern Manitoba a few years ago and discovered that no less than seventy Ukrainian farmers were living in that little town, bankrupt. They had gone out on a homestead, had tried to make a living, had failed, and had drifted back into this little town.

A few years ago in the city of Winnipeg we had a very careful investigation with regard to some hundreds of foreigners who were being more or less kept by the city. If my memory serves me, no less than ninety-four per cent of these foreigners had come to this country with the full intention of farming but had stayed for a little while in the city in order to get together a little ready cash. They had been induced to purchase homes in the city, to invest in real estate and that kind of thing, and had been diverted from their original purpose. Now it is all very well to suggest that it is comparatively easy for a man to start without capital on the western prairies. I know some of the pioneers have done that. I know some of them endured great hardships, and that some of them are to-day fairly well to do, and some people are inclined to say: What I did, others may do. But there are not nearly such good opportunities to-day in western Canada for starting to farm without capital as there were thirty or forty years ago. In the first place,at that time land could be got absolutely free or very cheap. I remember when you could buy land for three or four or five dollars an acre. That land to-day costs from $15 to $25 an acre. In the old days there was more or less of a local market, but to-day buying and selling has been so thoroughly organized into a great commercial machine that as soon as a man steps off his own farm he comes into the grip of that great machine, and it is not easy for him to make his own way independently. Further than that, in the old days it was comparatively easy for a man to work at something else until he could get a start on his farm. Many worked as section men and many worked as hired men for a few years. That work is becoming more and more difficult to get, and so it is not easy for a man to go out at the present time and make a start with a small capital. The Acting Minister of Immigration has suggested that the men with $1,500 or $2,000 might make a start. I may say that a committee that looked into this thing from a very practical standpoint in Winnipeg a few years ago came to the conclusion that a man could not make a start in this country on less than $5,000 or thereabouts, and maintain a decent standard of living, and keep clear of debt. A man must have his living for a year or two before his farm will begin to produce. We have heard some glowing words from the province of Manitoba. I have here a paper which came to my hand the other day. It is the votes and proceedings of the legislative assembly of Manitoba, and in a resolution on the order paper I notice this statement:

> And whereas owing to financial conditions existing in this province, more than one hundred and fifty of our elementary schools are closed at the present time. and children deprived of elementary education—

It is quite true, as the hon. member for Springfield said, that we have a magnificent parliament building in the city of Winnipeg, but we have also one hundred and fifty schools in the province closed, for lack of financial support. This is a serious thing when you consider the welfare of the next generation of Canadians.

Here is an extract from a letter which came to me the other day from one of the best informed social workers in the city of Montreal. He says:

> Why is it said to be so easy to find suitable foster homes for children imported from England, when every day of every year children already in Canada, many of them born Canadians, are being huddled like so many chickens into human chicken houses.
>
> I have been studying the history of the English poor law very closely this term, and I have become quite convinced that for both economic and social reasons the Dominion government will sooner or later have to establish a statistical department to collect information as to the extent and the nature of public and private assistance being given throughout the Dominion. If it is not done we are going to wake up some day and find that a very considerable portion of our population is always dependent, and then we shall wonder how and why it all happened.

I have a resolution here from an organization of the workers, also in the city of Montreal, which reads:

Be it resolved that we condemn the policy of inducing people to immigrate to this country whilst thousands of our citizens are unable to secure employment and are receiving no assistance from the governments, and that we take steps to notify the workers of Great Britain and Europe of the conditions they will be faced with if they come to Canada at this time.

I may say that I also have similar resolutions from the West, and I would like to inform the Acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization that there is to-day an active propaganda being carried on in the newspapers in the Old Country by the working people of this country to offset the proposed immigration policy of Canada. Further than that, I may say that on the floor of the House of Commons in Great Britain the opposition, which as you all know is the Labour party, is definitely opposed to this policy of overseas settlements and in particular to the scheme of taking Old Country children and shipping them out to the dominions.

Now, what are the prospects of the future. A good deal has been said about this policy being fostered by the financial interests and by the transportation companies. As to that I should like to quote a few lines from a statement by Sir Edmund Walker in the Financial Post of February 9.

We both wish to discriminate as to the class of immigrants we permit to land on our shores, and we surely should do so but our salvation throughout all North America depends upon a reasonably free supply of unskilled labour.

We must produce cheaper and we must produce more.

Again:

We cannot pretend that we did not know that because of war debts we must for a generation or more work harder for longer hours, and with more intense application not only because of the vast debt but because we have lost the labour of those who fell in order that we should live.

And again:

We are lucky among the nations who created war debts in owing ours mostly to ourselves.

And perhaps it is quite in line with that last statement when Sir Edmund Walker states in the annual report of the Bank of Commerce:

A domestic debt merely means the transfer by a tax of so-called money from one citizen to another.

Which is, as I understand it, that we must allow immigrants to come in here to help us to pay our debts. But we pay them to ourselves—one set of people, through the medium of money, pay to another set of people here in Canada. We have been told again and again that prosperity is just round the corner. We have been told that ever since the war stopped, and yet there are very few gentlemen who have come forward to tell us how that prosperity is going to come about, or what the basis is on which they found their predictions. It is said that in order to secure prosperity we must have larger markets. But where are those markets? It is said that we must be willing to compete. I would like to suggest to the farmers here that they may find it extremely difficult to compete with the Argentine, and with Russia and Roumania when those countries have begun to produce again. In order to compete we must rid ourselves of the loads with which we are now burdened.

The fact is that the time demands constructive measures, the time demands radical changes in our whole system, and the difficulty is that our government, and our governing classes, are, as the Americans say "standing pat," or they are trying to encourage us with the old slogans. Twenty years ago we were told that immigration was going to solve our problems, and it did to a very considerable extent help in opening up this country. But my question is: Are we going to be able to repeat what took place twenty years ago? The conditions are altogether different to-day. At that time we had a country largely undeveloped; at that time we were drawing our funds from Europe in order to build our railroads; at that time we were building every little village into a town, and every town into a city—there were all sorts of opportunities. To-day our railways are built; we have more mileage by many thousands of miles than we need. To-day our factories are built and many of them are standing idle. To-day our cities are built up; we say that we have altogether too large an urban population. It was because of this incoming of large financial resources, as well as of the incoming of large numbers of people, that at that time we had a chance to make such rapid development. But the whole world situation is changed. At that time we had markets which are absolutely closed to us at the present day. At that time we had a comparatively light load to carry; to-day we are overburdened with debt. Again I should like to ask, if in the West our very best English speaking people—many of them Canadians with farm training,—are not able to make things go, how in the name of common sense can we expect untrained Britishers to come over here without capital and make things go where the Canadian born have to a large extent failed.

Some of us—and I think I may say that in this regard I represent a very considerable section of workers across the country—suggest that there are other alternatives than those proposed by the government. The Acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization says that we have to back up a colonization company in order to get rid of our unsold and unused lands. I would like to suggest that there is another policy altogether. The fact is that our land policy in this country has been largely a failure. Those who first outlined that policy had the hope that in Canada we would have large numbers of people, each man living on his own land. That was the idea of the homestead—each man would be a freeholder. What is the situation to-day? A very considerable percentage of the farms are mortgaged; our farmers are not freeholders. The dream of those who founded these regulations has not been realized and worse than that—to those who would to-day come into this country we cannot offer the free lands that were offered years ago. I would like to ask, Mr. Chairman, whether we should not say that these great areas of agricultural land should be for the people who are actually going to live on them and proceed to do one of two things—either expropriate them, or else tax them so heavily that they would be forced into use. It is because we have been looking at this thing from the standpoint of the investor rather than from the standpoint of the settler that we have not achieved the success we should have achieved. I remember going a few years ago—it must be ten years now—to the then Premier of one of the western provinces and talking with him over a scheme for bringing settlement a little bit closer, and placing certain social opportunities within the reach of the settlers in the various districts. "Yes," he said. "this is very desirable. It would mean that the children would all get an education. It would mean that the women would have opportunity of having a doctor when they were ill. It would mean they would have some neighbours near them, and it would mean a great deal more production in the country." But he asked "How are you going to finance it?" I suggested that a few cents more per acre added to the wild lands tax would finance the whole proposition. Throwing up his hands he said, "You could never do that, the American investors are already protesting against the wild lands tax."

Mr. FORKE: Surely the hon. member is aware of the situation around Winnipeg, where no man will hold land to-day and pay taxes very long, if he can get rid of it. The hon. member knows that very well.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I know there are tens of thousands of acres being held to-day all over western Canada by men who are not using these lands, and if they were taxed heavily enough those people would be forced to get rid of them, and I would say that the duty of any government that is attempting to solve this problem—

Mr. MARLER: The hon. member says that if those lands were taxed heavily enough, you would get rid of them.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes.

Mr. MARLER: I would like to know who would be found to buy them.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The whole scheme of the Western Canada Colonization Association is to get rid of lands which are privately held. I would say that if settlers could secure those lands free or at a nominal price, there would be a great deal more inducement to go on them. We must recognize to-day that men have no inherent right to hold lands that they cannot use. This is the very point I would like to emphasize; that we have been insisting everywhere on dividends, we have been insisting on certain returns on investments, and that we are not going to solve our problem until we make radical changes in our ideals along that line. I am not going into the details with regard to various changes which would need to be made in order to bring that about. We have had a good deal of discussion in regard to our coal in this country. The fact is we have to pay an enormous sum for our coal, and get it in a very unsatisfactory state, and yet there are undoubtedly large coal areas in this country of ours. We shall sooner or later have to face the fact that the people of the country really own these coal mines, and that they should be used in the interests of the people and not for the profit of those who at the present time claim to own them. This may be considered very radical, yet I would like to quote a paragraph or two from the Montreal Star of March 7, and this a leading editorial. It is headed, "Isn't it time to wake up," and reads:

> If the King government and the House of Commons really want to do something to serve the Canadian public they will stop talking at large and get down to business on the fuel problem.
>
> There are in this district alone thousands of people living under conditions dangerous to health either because they cannot get sufficient coal to heat their houses or because they cannot pay the prices asked by those who have a strangle hold on the season's fuel supply. And what is true of the Montreal district is, no doubt, equally true elsewhere throughout the country.

The Canadian public is not going to stand for this sort of thing another season.

With less than one-half of one per cent of the world's population Canada possesses over seventeen per cent of the world's total coal supply. And yet the people of Canada have for the last four months been milked dry for the wholly inadequate supplies of fuel doled out to them by the commercial acumen of an adjoining nation.

Surely there are enough brains and initiative somewhere in Canada to develop the enormous fuel deposits within our own boundaries.

The government has no clearer duty to the people which elected it than this.

We are paying excessive freight rates and high prices, and the consuming public is not getting coal at reasonable rates. Here is an extract showing the proportions given to the miners and to the railways, and showing the high cost of distribution. This is from the American side. It says:

The total wage cost of producing a ton of anthracite and transporting it to the city where it is to be consumed amounts to less than one-third the price paid by the consumers. If mine owners were to reduce the wages of anthracite miners by 20 per cent, it would make possible a reduction of only about 75 cents in the retail price equivalent to approximately 5½ per cent of the selling price in New York, and 4½ per cent of the current quotation in Chicago.

A reduction of 20 per cent in the wages of both miners and railroad workers would make less than a dollar's difference in the price paid by the New Yorker for his domestic fuel.

Similar conditions prevail in Canada as I have the statistics here to show. My statements may sound somewhat radical in the ears of some of the hon. members of this House, so I should like to quote one more paragraph and this from the Free Press of my own city, an old quotation going back as far as 1920. In referring to our natural resources, the article says:

If there is money in it for the capitalist, ship our coal out of Canada to the highest bidder and let the Canadian people freeze; ship out our lumber and leave the people houseless; ship out our pulp and paper and leave them without newspapers, and so on all down the line. The fact that in all these cases the products are primarily the property of the people themselves would make no difference to the Gazette. On with the business of exploitation; the sacred system by which millionaires are turned overnight into multi-millionaires must not be tampered with.

I submit that to-day all along the line we are facing the necessity of adequately protecting the people of Canada. We are facing the problem, in the very first instance, of providing work for the people here in Canada. Notwithstanding the statistics given us —and I would not in any way imply that they are not absolutely accurate, but would suggest they do not afford a full picture of the conditions which exist, partly because of the fact that the workers will not register as they should—the fact is that there is a very large number of people who are unemployed and under-employed here in Canada. The fact is we have abundant natural resources, if they are only developed, but some way or another, under our existing financial and credit system, we do not seem to be able to develop them. The fact is that we have so overburdened our people with the high cost of living and high taxation that they are being driven out of the country, not by the superior advantages south of the line, but by the fact that they cannot possibly make an existence in this country. We can alter our system of taxation. We can shift the burden to those who are best able to bear it. But our government refuses to adopt any of these more radical policies. They say "ship in more people and let them help us carry our load," and do not think of lightening the load.

I want to close by re-affirming my belief in the possibilities of this country supporting an immense population. I would like to think we would be able to welcome a good many people from the countries of Europe. I think we shall do so in the years to come, but I do not think it is any kindness to prospective immigrants or that it is fair to our own children, under conditions which actually exist in this country, to call in more and more people, without making at the same time very very strenuous efforts to alter the conditions which are driving so many of our own people out of the country.

Mr. MacKELVIE: On two occasions in the last few days the minister (Mr. Stewart) who has charge of this very important Department of Immigration, has laid his policy before the House, and I am sure that it has been listened to with a great deal of interest by members here assembled, and that throughout the country a considerable degree of attention has been paid to his announcement. I do not care to level any particular degree of criticism against the special point raised this afternoon so effectively by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens). Perhaps enough regarding that particular aspect of the question has been said for the present. I may remark, however, in passing, that it seemed to require the united efforts of the minister and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to refute some of the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, and even then they did not cover them with any degree of finality, leaving entirely untouched the question raised by that hon. member regarding the tremendous amount in commissions which would be paid out by this government if they tied themselves up to this scheme, and the very large profits which would accrue to the Western Canada Colonization Association by means of the very liberal commissions which they would receive.

I wish to pass on to say a word or two regarding the general nature of the minister's policy. I do not find it pleasant work to criticise any hon. gentleman in a severe manner, and I do not fear that I shall transgress beyond the bounds of courtesy in dealing with this subject. But I must confess that I have been considerably disappointed by the announcement made, after a great deal of eager expectation on the part of the country, by the minister, who, I presume, has given very careful and studious consideration to one of the largest and most momentous problems which confronts this country at the present time. I do not think any person would, perhaps, be justly blamed for saying that "the mountain had laboured"—and hon. members know the rest of the proverb. However, much criticism may be levelled against the minister's policy, or lack of policy, from this quarter of the House, I do not expect any more severe strictures will be hurled at his head than those which have already come from members of the party sitting behind him. Very frank, very outspoken, and I might almost say, very bitter, were some of the criticisms advanced by the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill), who, in the frankest possible way, informed the minister that he was permitting the railways of this country to bleed the people white; that he was responsible to a large degree for the emigration of those Canadian citizens who have sought homes in the United States, from the fact that he and his government had not adhered to their pre-election pledges brought forward in such a forceful way through their election platform of 1919, and thus, after deceiving the people, had brought them to a state worse than their former condition had been. Then, following up that very acrimonious dissertation by the hon. member for Pontiac, came one couched in, perhaps, smoother language, but none the less with a barb concealed in it, or, perhaps, I should not say "concealed," for it really was very apparent, when the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) arose and also raked over the minister for several sins of omission and commission. So, perhaps, I am not altogether wrong in saying that however much criticism may be advanced against the policy of the Immigration department from this end of the chamber, nothing more severe is likely to be said during this debate than that which has already emanated from his friends.

What I am, however, particularly exercised about as regards this policy, lies in a point touched upon by the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth), who said that unfortunately—and I desire very heartily to concur in his adverb—during the last few years, immigration to this country from Europe has proceeded, not from the northern section of that continent, not from the British Isles, but from the southern and central portions of Europe. I do not consider that the present policy of the minister in this respect is altogether a wise one. If one sifts it right down, it amounts to this. He has permitted Australia and South Africa to skim off the cream from the British Isles of the immigration which we might expect to flow to this country, if proper efforts had been put forth in time to bring it here, and now he has recourse, through his agents in central and eastern Europe, to endeavouring to bring immigrants here from Hungary and Poland.

There is another, broader and more important aspect by far, to my mind, from which this question of immigration should be viewed by the people of Canada. We are building for the future; we must consider what is going to happen to this country of ours if we allow a very large section in the middle of it to be filled up by immigration which has been brought into the prairies for the past number of years. We in British Columbia have previously informed this House of our grievance as regards oriental immigration. Our principal, our vital objections to that class of immigration are that by no manner of means can it be made to assimilate into our population and become in any true sense of the word Canadian. I greatly fear that there is in the prairie sections of this Dominion, a very large element which it will be found very difficult to absorb into our Canadian population and to imbue with any true national spirit. Seventy-five or eighty or, perhaps, more languages are spoken by these people, and the greatest mistake we have made, possibly—

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I thought, perhaps, the hon. member would be referring to the subject again, but apparently he is leaving it. I hope the hon. gentleman has not taken from my remarks the inference that I was making it easy for the people of the Continent to get into Canada in preference to people from the British Isles. If he got that impression, I am sorry, for I never intended to convey any such idea.

Mr. MacKELVIE: I think it is only fair to say that that inference might very readily have been drawn from what the minister told the House, but I am glad to hear the statement which he has made now. Even so, the fact remains that he informed the House that he was endeavouring to procure immigration from Hungary and Poland, and that so far he has not apparently become enamoured of the idea of exerting any great amount of energy or of expending what might be called a comparatively large sum of money in encouraging immigration from the British Isles.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I should like to put my hon. friend right. There are twelve agencies continually working in the British Isles. Moreover, we have been putting on a propaganda that up to date has been bringing results. Within the past few days a very considerable number have been landed from the British Isles. There is no continental movement at the moment, and I want to add that there is no restriction on the people coming from the British Isles, while we have a restriction on those from the Continent.

Mr. MacKELVIE: I should be very much surprised indeed if any minister in this House did inform this assembly that there were restrictions to be placed on the people from the British Isles while freer measures were to be accorded those from other countries. I am quite aware of the fact the minister states. What I did say, however, was that the minister frankly admitted this afternoon that Australia and South Africa had got into the British Isles before this country and had diverted to themselves a large stream of British immigration; and that up to the present very few results have apparently come from any system of encouragement which the minister has been giving to immigration from that source. I very cordially endorse what was said the other night by the member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey) who spoke of the sources from which we should seek immigration. We should secure all the people whom we can get from Great Britain, France, Hungary and the Scandinavian countries including Iceland, and we should gladly welcome them. But going further than that into southern or eastern Europe, I should say that we have no room for immigration from these places. We have now in this country too many of these people whom we cannot properly assimilate. The United States has discovered to its cost what it meant to open its doors wide to southern and central Europe. That country has been called the melting pot of nations, and one of its humorous writers, Mr. George Ade, in an article which I read some time ago, said that this idea of the United States having become the melting pot of nations must be forever cast aside. It was, he said, more properly designated a churn. I think there is perhaps more force in that remark than some of us may imagine at first. At any rate, when you pour into a melting pot metals of various kinds you can hardly expect that they will fuse and that the product will be refined gold or anything of great value.

I am honestly concerned in the question as to the future of our Canadian West. I would gladly support any system that would possibly keep intact as much as possible in their purity of blood the two great races of this northern portion of the American continent. If we could retain as far as possible the purity of the French race, the race descended from the British stock and the people of northern Europe, we should be doing a great service to the future of this country. But if we allow, as has been done in the past, immigration to come in from among people who will not readily adapt themselves to our habits and customs, people whose racial peculiarities are, to say the least, not ours, I fear the time may come when we shall deplore the fact that we have been so generous in that respect in our immigration laws.

I have listened throughout this debate with no very great degree of pleasure, I must confess, to the somewhat doleful strains that have come from the members from the western provinces regarding the situation there. Now, I ought to have a very great amount of sympathy for the farming element in the West. for I suppose, unless I am mistaken, that I was in that country as a settler probably earlier than any man in this House. At all events, I was in Calgary in the spring of 1883, before the railroad reached that country, and I saw the first rush of settlers arrive in Alberta. I took up land there myself and attempted for two or three years to make a success of farming. However, whether through my own fault, or otherwise, I did not attain any degree of success in that province, and it was not long until I sought what I thought were conditions, climatic and otherwise, that would better suit me, and moved across the Rockies to British Columbia. And I have not greatly regretted that change. But I should sympathize with the difficulties which the prairie provinces have gone through; and I was glad to note that, after some distressing tales had been placed before the House by several members of that section of the country, a more optimistic and cheerful note was struck by the member for Springfield and others who followed him. I am not one of those who views with any great deal of apprehension the future of that country. I come from a section of British Columbia where we have had great difficulties and passed through times of stress and strain, and the people are now suffering from severe depression. But hope springs high among them and there is a steady tendency to courage and optimism; and I know they would not thank me if in this House I gave expression to any particular apprehension regarding the future which awaits them in that really favoured section of the country. I believe therefore that we are justified in bidding our friends from the prairies to be of good cheer and hope. Times are mending, I believe, and much may be done for them and for other sections of the Dominion by the pursuit of a sane, sound and reasonable policy of immigration.

Taxation of course bears heavily on every portion of Canada. In addition to the very serious and, as some may say, alarming burden of national debt, every province is hampered with a very heavy burden of internal taxation. Municipal taxes are high; they are now higher perhaps by one hundred per cent than they were ten or fifteen years ago in most parts of Canada. So that the burden of taxation presses heavily on the shoulders of all. Now, in order to increase 10 p.m. our wealth and lessen that burden it seems to me it is absolutely necessary to have further production; and to bring about increased production it is equally necessary to increase our population. Our railways carry a heavy burden of debt and deficit which bears heavily on the finances of the Dominion, and we know that the only way that burden can be relieved is by giving the railways increased business; and, in turn, the only way that increased business can be secured is through an increased population. I confess that we are almost on the horns of a dilemma in this regard. When we consider the question of unemployment, which is assuming large proportions in several parts of the country, to bring in indiscriminate additions to the population might be to increase that evil considerably. But after weighing everything as well as one may in the balance, we must be forced to one conclusion or the other; and the conclusion I have reached is that the time is now come to begin a more vigorous policy of immigration into this country than hitherto has been in force. I believe in my province. It is a province that has wonderful resources in the way of timber and mines and it has a vast coastal fisheries development, in connection with which more labour could be employed than is at present at work. I believe that in the industrial centres at least the time has come when more labour will be demanded; and I am sure that in all sections of Canada the time is here when more settlers can be found for the land.

I have no particular desire to protract the debate, which has already extended over a considerable time. But any time devoted to the discussion of this subject is, I think, well spent, for no more important question could engage the attention of parliament this session. While I cannot honestly congratulate the minister upon all the details of the policy he has brought down before the House, I will give him credit for having made an attempt to solve the problem with which he is faced.

I am sure he has given the matter earnest consideration, and possibly before his estimates are passed he will revise some of his decisions, which, he has candidly told us, are not as inflexible as the laws of the Medes and Persians. The discussion this afternoon has given him, no doubt, occasion to pause and consider whether to go ahead with the policy he has outlined or to proceed along different lines. Speaking only for myself, I am in favour of a more generous measure of immigration than has hitherto been effective in this country. The time has come when some of the restrictions which have been imposed may with safety be relaxed. We need more people on our land: in fact I believe that in nearly every sphere of activity more people will very shortly be required. I sincerely trust that before this discussion is concluded the minister will give serious consideration to some of the representations that have been made.

Mr. KELLNER: Mr. Chairman, the government went to a good deal of trouble this afternoon to justify the Western Canada Colonization Association and the stand they have taken behind it. But I do not believe that is the crux of the situation at all; what we should justly consider to-day is whether or not we should bring more people into Canada while those already here are having such a hard time to make a living. I do not think that the good faith of the government has been called into question, especially by the group of which I form a part. However, before entering upon a discussion of the question of immigration I would like to make a few remarks in regard to some statements that have been made by previous speakers—not with any intention of criticising them, but simply because they left the wrong impression upon the committee.

The other afternoon our colleague the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey) dwelt largely upon the over-institutionalized condition of the western country. That condition may exist in Winnipeg, but it does not exist in many portions of the West. The hon. member spoke about the fine, big parliament buildings in Winnipeg. Of these I know very little, and I would not like to tell what I do know. Then he told about their schools and their churches. According to his story they have plenty of room, there being very few scholars in each room of their schools. That is not the condition further west. The member for Swift Current (Mr. Lewis) also referred to the schools, and he made it plain that in Saskatchewan, school room was not quite as abundant as it was in Manitoba. I could not help wondering if that was a progressive broadening out, starting in the east and increasing as it went west, because I assure the committee that by the time you get to Edmonton the schools are very much cramped. I am advised that there are 15,000 school children in that city, in 64 rooms, an average of 51 in each room. There are 17 rooms in the high school, with 933 students, an average of 54 in each room. Twenty-five of these rooms are contained in basements. I mention this simply to show that if there is a large influx of people from outside, our provincial and municipal governments will have to spend considerable sums in order to provide the necessary facilities for them.

One hon. member made a remark about our scratching the ground out in the West. That is a very familiar remark; almost every speaker who does not know much about farming will fall into the same error. However, in this section of the House we could man quite a number of farms and put an experienced farmer on each one, and we could also man the pulpits of several churches and put an experienced preacher in each of those pulpits. But I doubt very much whether we would be well advised to start our farmers in the pulpits or to accept our preachers as authorities on agriculture. The West has proven itself time and again. We have produced big crops year after year—I am speaking of the West as a whole. I do not believe that the country can be criticised, or that the farmer can be criticised. During war years, when we were called upon for a large production, we furnished a production that surprised the world. The hon. member ended up with the statement that if we brought in other farmers to co-operate with us we would enjoy greater prosperity than any other part of the country. About the time he was saying that, our special committee on Agriculture was taking evidence and a sworn witness was stating that flour was being shipped from the United States to England at a lower price than from Canada to England, and further that it was the intention of the transportation companies to raise the rate on cattle. I think it is now $20 and they anticipate putting it up to $25. A good deal of other evidence of a similar character was given. We shall never be a prosperous community so long as things are so arranged that when the price of grain goes up the elevator companies will take advantage of it and when the price of cattle goes up some transportation company will increase its charges and the farmer will get no benefit from the advance in price. If that is the prosperity that we hope to enjoy in Canada, it is of very doubtful quality indeed.

I would like also to make a few comments upon some of the statements made by the minister when he was explaining to the committee his colonization undertaking. Speaking the other afternoon, he said that conditions were worse now than they were in 1892. Well, I do not see how it is possible to compare conditions now with those prevailing at that time; things have changed very considerably since then. For instance, in 1892 there was only a small amount of debt in the world, and that was particularly true of this country. It was a simple matter for everyone to make a living in those days. Your necessary expenditure was very low, and if a man was out of employment for several months or for any considerable time, he would not get greatly involved. To-day it is wholly different; when you get up in the morning you know that you must make several dollars before night in order to pay essential expenses. If for any reason a man's income is suspended for a little while, his overhead expenses will rapidly eat up a considerable amount of money. The minister further stated that twenty-five to thirty per cent of the settlers will be able to establish themselves when they come to this country. I am very sorry that he did not tell us from what country those settlers were coming. I do not believe you could point to any of the European countries at least that is sending out settlers who will be able to establish themselves when they get here.

His next statement was that from fifteen to twenty-five per cent of our western farmers were already in bankruptcy, that from fifteen to twenty-five per cent more are in a serious condition, and that many more are not on Easy street. Well, I would suggest that that probably means that in his estimation about half of the farmers are in bankruptcy or very close to it. Now it requires a long stretch of the imagination to think that these farmers the minister is going to bring out from Europe, who are unacquainted with farming conditions in our western country, who have little or no money save the $1,500 or $2,000 which I think was the amount he suggested, could establish themselves on, can go on the farms which our experienced farmers have gone into bankruptcy trying to operate, and make good. I ask you, hon. gentlemen, is there any prospect in this world of them making good?

Then he stressed the fact that three months ago the only workers we could consider bringing into this country were those who would engage in agriculture. But to-day that policy is changed, and we can admit some other classes. However, he advanced no argument whatever to show that conditions had bettered in Canada in the meantime, only that conditions had bettered in the United States, and that they had drawn part of our population there, and we could bring in others to take their place.

The question was asked, why the government always advertised the prairie lands. Why did they not leave some immigrants down through old Ontario and Quebec? The minister very frankly stated that it was because the natural resources of the prairie provinces were still held by the Dominion government, and they had been exploiting the western lands. I wonder if the government ever think that the day is not liable to come when an accounting will have to be given for these western lands which they have been exploiting. The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) speaking the other night made the statement that this government had spent about $30,000,000 in bringing immigrants into Canada, and that they had not an immigrant to show for it. The Prime Minister has spoken since that time, the Acting Minister of Immigration and several members of the government, but not one of them has attempted to refute that statement. Personally, I should like to know whether it is true or not. If it is not true, I should think it was up to the government to disprove it. We who sit in this portion of the House have been frankly criticised as calamity howlers. They tell us that we are stressing this condition, that we are over-drawing it. I do not think that we are worse than the rest. I have in my hand here a paper called The Mirror. I understand it is a new paper starting out on a very youthful career. On the front page is a picture of the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen). It is a very fine picture too, surrounded with a border of maple leaves.

Mr. CALDWELL: It looks like a mourning band.

Mr. KELLNER: It is a picture his supporters may well be proud of. In fact, I expect to see it framed and hung probably in their offices in this building. On page 2 of that paper I find this statement:

> One farmer who in 1919 had a surplus of $28,000 without liabilities was now offering to sell his equity for $1,000 to secure enough money to leave the country. . . . . Some grain shipped by the carload did not pay the freight.

I am very sorry the last speaker has left the chamber. He was one of those who stressed our calamity howling, but I do not think we have ever made it stronger than that. There is no question but that these conditions do exist, and it would be foolish to deceive ourselves and try to make out that they do not. If that statement I have read proves anything it simply proves this, that western Canada is a country where achievement and advancement can be made if we have a chance; else that man would not have had the $28,000. It also proves that certain well established arrangements have been made to separate him from any surplus money he gets from the opportunities he has.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): May I ask where this gentleman's farm is located that is mentioned in that interesting paper?

Mr. KELLNER: I shall be very glad to see that the minister gets a copy of the paper. I think the address is given, but I am not quite sure.

In my opinion there is not a member of this House who is opposed to immigration under favourable conditions, but we would do well to seriously consider whom we are liable to get if we embark on a policy of immigration at the present time. Most assuredly if we get the immigrant whom England and the European countries would like to see us get, we would get the present inhabitant of the bread line. That is the class they would like to send to us. We would also get the man who has probably been broken by the war, or the man who has found his occupation ruined by the war. He is more or less of a misfit. Another thing we will find when he comes to this country, undoubtedly he will have a lot more dependents than the like number of immigrants coming to this country ever had before. Most assuredly in a war where the majority of the young and strong men have been lost, those who are not able to work for a living will depend upon the remainder to work for them, and if we bring them out to this country we can expect their dependents to come with them. One thing we can be sure of and that is that the adventurous, the strong young man, the man who used to be our ideal immigrant, will not come in very large numbers at this time.

Probably the next matter for our consideration is what shall we do with him when we get him here? I understand that if this government policy goes through, it will be their aim to put these people on the land at considerable expense, and they will keep them there for a while. After a while, when men find out that they are up against a hopeless proposition, they will leave the farms. Some will go to the cities, and some will probably migrate to some other country. It is evidently the policy of this government to have an ever changing farm population. We will have one group of men from time to time moving off the farms, and we will be going over to Europe to get another group to come and take their places. There can be no stability whatever in agriculture under those conditions.

I think we might well stop and consider the spirit of these immigrants who are leaving our country. Let me picture to you what, to my mind might take place in some of those homes. The husband and the wife no doubt will meet in consultation. For months they have been considering ways and means which might enable them to keep going. Hope is fast sinking and finally it disappears. All this time the children have been eager listeners to their conversation. They leave our country and probably go to a foreign land. They make new friends and new acquaintances, and when these new acquaintances come to visit them and find that they have come from Canada, undoubtedly the conversation will again revert to this Dominion, and those children who were born upon our land and were in their early youth citizens of our country, will once more hear reproaches heaped upon this Dominion which gave them birth. I ask you, in all sincerity, do you think it is fitting that we should allow our people to leave our country and our young people especially to receive such lessons as that?

I think there are unquestionably two immigration policies before the people of Canada to-day. One is a policy which declares, although agriculture is in an impoverished condition: We will establish a certain number of farmers and we will keep them on those farms as long as we can; and when the task becomes hopeless they will leave and we will get another group to take their place. Ever changing and ever shifting we will go from one strata of society to another until eventually we will reach the lowest. The other policy contemplates a prosperous farming community, and that is what the group that sits in this corner of the chamber considers we are entitled to. We are convinced that if a man works ten, twenty, thirty or forty years on a farm and saves his money he should, at least, be entitled to a home to live in and a few hundred dollars besides.

In any other line but farming, when production exceeds the demand it is always considered good business to limit that production. For instance, out in the province where I live we produce a large amount of coal, and it is not an unusual thing at all to see a newspaper editorial advising the coal mine operators that the mines have the capacity of producing far more coal than there is any prospect of the market consuming. So the editorial would say "It would be a matter of good business for you operators to get together and decide on the amount of your production, because if you go ahead and produce without any regard to markets you will stall the thing and you are bound to lose money". That ought to be a good business policy for agriculture also. On the other hand they say to the farmers "You go out and produce every bushel that you can, raise every hoof that you can, and the Lord, in some unseen way, will provide a market for you". If I am any judge of conditions I would very seriously recommend that we go slowly in increasing our production at the present time. I would like any advocate of increased production to show me what country is in a position to buy our goods unless we are prepared to take the goods which they produce. Most assuredly there is no European country to-day that can afford to buy largely from us unless we are in a position to re-buy from them. And what do we do? We erect a good big tariff wall around our country and keep their goods out. It is a hopeless proposition: If we will not let their goods in most assuredly they cannot buy ours.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to suggest to this government that instead of spending this money trying to induce people to come here they would be justified in making an earnest effort to first put our people who are now engaged in agriculture on their feet, and there is a real opportunity to accomplish something along this line at the present time. I do not think there ever was a time in the history of the country when the agriculturists had the entire sympathy of the rest of the Dominion to the extent they have to-day. I believe that if the government would take the money it is proposed to grant to the Western Canada Colonization Association and with it go out and try to organize some form of marketing societies, that would look after the home market at any rate, they could do a real service. It seems to me, let me say here, the height of folly that the price of the wheat that we use in producing flour in Canada should be set in Liverpool. I never could quite understand why, if a miller somewhere in Ontario wished to buy a carload of western wheat he had to cable to Liverpool to find out how much that wheat was worth. I do not think there is any question but that an effort of the kind I have indicated would at least stabilize our home market. I have in my office a little booklet called, I think, Four thousand facts about Canada which states that 80 per cent of our production is used at home. I am not sure that that proportion is right, but it would not surprise me at all if it were. However, whether that proportion be right or not there is a large volume of it used here in Canada. It has been sold away under the cost of production; and if this government had the welfare of the farmers at heart they would be well advised to seriously considering something that would stabilize the home market.

In discussing this immigration policy the arguments which have been advanced so far in favour of bringing in immigrants, I think, to say the least, are very heartless. One of them—I do not know whether an hon. member actually said it or whether it just occurred to me—was that, "Misery loves company." I think it probably is the most impressive argument of all. The next one, and probably the one which is the most advanced, is that it is going to build up our railroads. I believe it is the first time any country, that claims agriculture as its basic industry has made the statement that agriculture should be made subservient to industry. If farming is our basic industry most assuredly it should not be made subservient to the railroads or to any other industry. Then we are told that a vigorous immigration policy and the bringing in of more people will help us to pay our debts; and over in Europe they say "If we could only get rid of our surplus population our debts would not bother us so much." This argument is identical with that upon which the tariff policy is based; I do not think it is necessary to stress it at all.

In conclusion I would call the attention of the House to the fact that the policy which has been laid down by the government is very similar, in many ways, to the old policy which was in force down in the southern states about half a century or more ago. They tell us that they will bring in immigrants and put them on the farms mortgaged to the hilt. For the next thirty-two years—we can say forty years because they will have four or five failures in that time—they will be busy paying the interest and trying to keep out of debt and in the meantime we will have the Soldier Settlement Board supervising their operations and keeping watch over them. Mr. Chairman, is it not very similar to what they did in slavery days in the south? It is true the system is gone; they no longer buy and sell human beings. Yes, the slave is gone, the black snake is gone, but the spirit is there—the spirit of slavery; and I do not believe, if you bring these people in and load them down with a debt such as is proposed, that there is any prospect whatever of their ever getting out of debt in forty years' time. Think of the attractive life which is before them. Every morning when they wake up they will know that through that day they will have to toil in order to get sufficient to pay the interest on their debts. I think it is the most hopeless outlook that any people could be asked to accept. For my part, I intend to vote against the resolution, and I hope this government will yet change its intention and decide on something at least a little more human.

Mr. McTAGGART: In rising to state my tale of woe in connection with this debate, I want to say I have followed the speeches delivered by hon. members from the beginning with much interest. My impression is that some of the speeches delivered here have been far-fetched, yes, almost weird. In this connection I recall the speecch delivered by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion), when he said that if Canada was to have free trade, the East must die. We heard the speech of the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Dickie), who told us about the streams of gold going to the United States and contended that the tariff should be placed higher and yet higher. We also heard the viewpoint of labour as expressed by the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Irvine), who told us that he was not in sympathy with bringing immigrants into Canada so long as there were many unemployed in our cities. If these statements mean anything, they mean that these hon. gentlemen advocate the continuance of a policy of exploitation, the same policy we have had in Canada for forty years, a policy the monumental stupidity of which has placed a blight upon Canadian agriculture and has retarded national development.

But, Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to deal with tariff or streams of gold or unemployment. To my mind the question of immigration must go hand in hand with the land policy of the Dominion. I believe that experience has demonstrated that the whole question of immigration is closely related to that of land settlement. That is the particular question I wish to deal with this evening. It is my intention to endeavour to make a survey of immigration and Dominion land policies in the past, to endeavour, if possible, to point out the mistakes that have been made, to suggest how these mistakes may be corrected, and to express the hope that we may benefit by this knowledge in laying down our immmigration and land policies for the future. We heard about the prosperity of the province of Manitoba, and I was very glad to hear it, but I recall in studying the early history of Manitoba, that previous to the eighties and nineties the industry of agriculture in Manitoba was in a very precarious condition indeed. As a matter of fact, western agriculture never was put on a proper basis until the discovery of the summer-fallow system of tillage. The discovery of the summer-fallow system of tillage was the signal for a tremendous improvement in the prosperity of western Canada, generally, but particularly the province of Manitoba and the eastern part of the province of Saskatchewan. The soil of the province of Manitoba and the soil of eastern Saskatchewan was found admirably adapted to the summer-fallow method, and as a result of that there came the development of agriculture to the westward.

In those days there were many millions of acres of Dominion lands in western Canada. Prior to 1908 I believe 32,000,000 acres of land were given in grants to the railway companies, and about 32,000,000 acres homesteaded. About the year 1908 the government changed their policy in regard to Dominion lands in western Canada. It was decided about that time to discontinue the policy of making grants of lands to railway companies, and because the Hudson Bay railway was then in contemplation it was decided to sell certain lands in the southwestern part of Saskatchewan and southern Alberta, in order to realize enough money to push that road through to Hudson bay. During those years the progress of our railway development was to the westward; as the branch lines extended to the westward, settlement followed the railways. We find that the railways selected in the main the choice land. They did not at that time select much land in the southwestern part of Saskatchewan or southern Alberta. The lands were selected along the northern section, and settlement followed the railways. About the time the Dominion Lands Act was passed in 1908 an area was set aside in southwestern Saskatchewan and southern Alberta, consisting of approximately 28,000,000 acres. Whether it was because of the fact that the railway companies had not selected lands within that area or not, I am not prepared to say, but at any rate there was a general feeling at that time that southwestern Saskatchewan and southern Alberta were not adapted to the industry of agriculture. Stock raising was encouraged in that district at that time. As a matter of fact, the stock raising industry gained considerable dimensions during those years. The Dominion Lands Act in 1908 was the signal for a tremendous inrush of settlement to the pre-emption area. Many of the settlers came from the Old Land and many also from the United States. In the years between 1908 and 1915 or 1916 many thousand immigrants came in from the United States and settled on those lands. Just here I would like to say, in connection with the question I am trying to deal with, that I have not gleaned my knowledge of it from reading departmental reports. I have passed through the experience of homesteading in that area, and in 1908 I also acquired a pre-emption.

At the time of the amendment of the Dominion Lands Act in 1908, the Hon. Frank Oliver, who was then Minister of the Interior, recognized the fact that within that area more land was necessary to constitute the average farm because of unfavourable climatic and soil conditions. In that country there is not as heavy an annual rainfall as there is in the province of Manitoba or in eastern Saskatchewan, and we find, if we look over the debates at the time of the passing of the Dominion Lands Act, that this was used as an argument why the pre-emption privilege should be extended to that area. There was one feature however which the Dominion Lands Act of 1908 did not recognize, and it was the fact that within that large area while there are many lands which are absolutely unsuited for tillage purposes, there are many thousands of acres of probably as choice land as you will find in the Dominion of Canada. I would say roughly that within that area the amount of choice land might be about 30 per cent. Then, perhaps, another 30 per cent of the land might be considered as fair, and probably 40 per cent of it might be considered as absolutely unsuited for tillage purposes. The latter lands have another use, namely for grazing purposes, and some of them have been used in that way.

The great mistake of the Dominion Lands Act of 1908 was in failing to recognize that fact. The land, the good and the bad, was thrown open indiscriminately, and because of the inrush of immigrants at that time, and the demand for free lands, all those lands were taken up and settled. After 1908, and prior to possibly 1916 or 1917, there was a period of marked prosperity. The years 1917, 1918 and 1919 were very dry years, and it was not until those years that the fact became apparent that there were within that area many lands which were not adapted for tillage purposes. In 1920, the provincial government of Saskatchewan, which has ever been alive to the necessities of agriculture in that province, instituted an inquiry into the deplorable state of agriculture in that part of the province. The result of the inquiry was the appointment of a commission to investigate conditions generally, and it was found that the great mistake as regards that area was the throwing open for settlement of lands which should have been kept closed, that is, which should have been used entirely for grazing purposes.

Just at this point let me say that over 14,000,000 acres of land have been sold within that area as pre-emptions and purchased homesteads between 1908 and the present time. The total revenue received from the sale of such pre-emptions and purchased homesteads, within the pre-emption area up to the present time, is aproximately $19,000,000. In 1922, the total revenue received from the sale of pre-emptions and purchased homesteads within that area was but $350,000, notwithstanding the fact that outstanding obligations by virtue of pre-emptions and purchased homesteads within that area are approximately $12,000,000 at the present time. The situation which we have been faced with within that area since 1918 is this, that on those poorer areas which I mentioned, after the first crop or two, when the humus was removed from the soil, the soil commenced to drift, to blow, and consequently our people began to move out. The people were driven off those lands, and many of them went to the States. Also from the lands which I stated were good to fair, there is a movement of population as well. Many of the remaining settlers find it impossible or next to impossible to continue on those lands; but notwithstanding this, the department are demanding from them the full payment of their pre-emption obligations, in spite of the fact that most of those obligations have now been running from eight to ten years.

[Mr McTaggart.]

One of the recommendations of the commission which the Saskatchewan government appointed, was the establishment of community pastures within that area. It was their recommendation that the small rancher farmer should be encouraged. The growing of grain exclusively within that area, it is felt, will not be found profitable. The profitable farm in that area, in the future as in the past, will be that of the farmer who has access to grazing lands. If there is a section or a half section of grazing land near a settler's farm, and if he could have access to that land for grazing purposes for his stock, that would be of great advantage. Where there are grazing areas too large for the private leaseholder, it is felt that such areas should be taken advantage of by settlers adjoining the area and used as community pastures. I hope the minister is familiar with the recommendations of the commission in that regard. As a matter of fact, I believe the department is familiar with the recommendations because, as I understand the matter, any large leaseholds which are to be thrown open in the near future in that district, are to be leased to the provincial government, in the expectation that the latter government will re-lease to associations of settlers, so that they may form community pastures.

As regards the exodus from that area, the figures which I have and which were brought down in the House, I believe, about two weeks ago, go to show that during 1922, 842 quarter sections, pre-emptions and purchased homesteads, were either cancelled or abandoned. So, we see from that the process of depopulation which is going on. The situation as we see it is that the department is forced from time to time to try to collect overdue obligations on those pre-emptions and purchased homesteads, and in this way the department is actually acting the part of driving those people out of the country.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We are not insisting and have not, since I have been in office, insisted on the settlement of payments on pre-emptions, hoping to give the individual every opportunity. But I would like to point out to my hon. friend that $16,000,000 have been paid in on pre-emptions, and the situation is a rather difficult one, inasmuch as all the pre-emptions which represent the payment of $16,000,000 have been paid for in full. To adopt a policy now to begin to readjust payments on pre-emptions would not be fair to those who are paid up. We are not, however, pressing for payment.

Mr. McTAGGART: I desire to thank the minister for the explanation. As a matter of fact, I was aware that of recent months there have not been as many letters going to holders of pre-emptions and purchased homesteads. The situation is one that we must face in the near future. What is to be done? Those payments have been running along now for many years, and although the extensions from time to time help us to stave off the day when this situation will have to be met, yet I feel that a complete survey of conditions there is very necessary, so that we may be able to clear up the unfortunate situation which exists in that area.

Some reference has been made to the blacklisting of this particular area. The area has been blacklisted to a certain extent. I believe some of the settlers in that area have been as much responsible as anyone else for that blacklisting; but as a matter of fact, the Department of the Interior have recognized that certain sections within that area are of an inferior quality, for they have withdrawn certain sections entirely from homestead entry. There are other areas within which restrictions have been placed upon homestead entry.

Now, the lesson which I think we might learn from the unfortunate situation in the southwest is that there should be, in the case of free lands thrown open for settlement, a classification of lands with a view to setting aside those areas not considered fit for agricultural purposes. And while I am not familiar with the areas of free lands which we have left in Canada, yet I am inclined to believe that we may have a situation similar to that which existed in the southwest. I feel confident to-day that had there been in 1908 a classification of lands in southwestern Saskatchewan and southern Alberta, and had those areas which were thought not fit for tillage purposes been set aside and withdrawn from entry, we should not have the unfortunate conditions which we have in the southwest at the present time. The result has been a hardship on the settlers on the good soil within that area; because when the settlers on the poorer soils were compelled to move out they left a burden of taxation in the shape of school and municipal taxes, the gravity of which I am sure all hon. members will be able to understand. The people who departed left an indebtedness by virtue of school taxes, telephone taxes and municipal taxes, which are adding to the burden on those who are left.

We have heard something about the burdens which agriculture has had to bear. As I mentioned at the outset, I am of the opinion that the tariff is one of the heaviest burdens which we have to bear now and in the past. But it is not the only burden. The burden of labour itself has borne very heavily on agriculture. The hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) told us this evening about how the farmers in the past had exploited labour. I am going to analyse this statement from the standpoint of the farmer. In 1905 I worked in the harvest fields at Indian Head in Saskatchewan, and at that time the average wage was $1.75 per day. The total cost of operating an average sized threshing machine in 1905, a machine with a capacity of say 2,000 bushels a day, was $62 per day; that is to say, the average labour cost, not taking into account repairs, or teams, or overhead, interest, depreciation, oil, fuel, or anything of that kind. I am referring entirely to direct labour cost. In 1915 I had an interest in a threshing machine in the district in which I live, so that I know whereof I speak, and in that year the wage had risen to $3.50 a day on the average in the harvest fields; while the total labour cost of the same sized machine as that I mentioned previously would be in 1915 approximately $95 per day. In 1922, I was still operating the same machine which I operated in 1915, and we find the labour cost in the year 1922 to be $160 a day, with wages from $6 to $7 a day. This certainly was not an exploitation of labour. Now, I want to know if any hon. member in this House will say that we do not need immigration of agricultural labourers into Canada. Since I have been in western Canada I have never known the time when there has been an over-supply of agricultural labourers. Perhaps at times in certain communities there has been a surplus, but to my knowledge, there has never been any time when there has been an over-supply of such labour.

We heard the statement the last day this subject was under discussion that one of the troubles with farming in western Canada was that the farms were too large. To me that statement is a very misleading one, because I fancy that after all the size of farms in any country must be controlled more or less by conditions of location, soil and climate. In this connection I wish to quote a few words from the report of the commission which the Saskatchewan government appointed in 1920 in regard to this matter, as applied to southwestern Saskatchewan. This is what the report says:

> Indeed it seems to your commissioners that unless range is found in more or less extensive blocks for community grazing the size of the farms in the southwest will have to be substantially larger than a half section in order to provide facilities for grazing.

Let me read in this connection the point of view of the Hon. Mr. Oliver himself as expressed in 1908 in reference to lands in the southwest. I quote from Hansard of 1908 at page 11142:

> Now, we believe that would be a very great deterrent to settlement in that part of the country. We believe that the conditions there, being such as I have described, a 320 acre farm is one of fair average size and means should be offered to new settlers to acquire such a farm, He cannot acquire it from the railway company, because the railway company is not there; the lands are in the hands of the government to-day, and the government is the only person with whom the settler can deal.

Now, we have heard much preaching about patriotism and unity, both in and out of this House, and I think the time is ripe for us to get down to something practical in connection with these professions. I am going to relate to this House the case of an immigrant who came to Canada about the year 1912, a British boy from the Old Country about 21 or 22 years of age. This young fellow, Harry Dawes, filed a homestead and pre-emption in 1912 or 1913, in the territory of which I have spoken. In 1914 he was in my employ when the war broke out, and shortly after the declaration of hostilities this young Britisher, who was an energetic boy, joined the colours and went overseas with the first contingent. He went across to France and was killed in action on the 24th of May, 1915. He left a widowed mother in the Old Land and to this day she has not been able to dispose of that pre-emption in Saskatchewan. I have a letter from the administrator of the estate which came just a few weeks ago and I am going to read from it a paragraph or two. He says:

> My point is this. The soldier who returned from the war was allowed to transfer his pre-emption to a soldier grant, meaning that he got it free. Surely the soldier who gave his life for this country earned equally as much as the returned man.

I took the question up with the department, but they could not do anything more than extend the time of the payment due on the pre-emption. I have no fault to find with the department; I wish to make that clear, but I feel that in this case injustice has been done.

As I stated at the beginning, I did not tell the story of the southwest with the idea of enlisting the sympathy of parliament for that part of the country; my object was to ensure that we should derive from the mistakes of the past something that might be of benefit to us in developing the new lands we expect to settle in the future. I am in favour of immigration of agricultural labour into Canada. I am in favour of the immigration of British and Scandinavian labour. I will try to sum up the observations I have made by offering the following recommendations:

1. That encouragement be given the immigration of British and Scandinavian workers with the view of ensuring a steady flow of desirable agricultural labourers for the farms of Canada.

2. That a thorough classification of all Dominion lands be undertaken by competent authority with a view of arranging for the disposition of these lands in a way which shall ensure the maximum of agricultural production, the greatest conservation of soil resources, and the utmost prosperity for the largest possible population.

3. That the minister give earnest consideration to the advisability of cancelling outstanding pre-emption and purchased homestead obligations with a view of arresting the unfortunate exodus of settlers from the pre-emption area.

4. That a thorough survey of the whole question of Crown land administration be carried out at an early date with a view of incorporating the recommendations of such survey in the long overdue revision of the Dominion Lands Act.

In conclusion, I have only this to say: if the minister earnestly desires to do some colonization work in Canada he might profitably turn his attention to the southwest, because in that district he could work in the way of correcting past mistakes that would be of great benefit not only to the West but to the whole of Canada.

Mr. GOULD: Mr. Chairman, this question which has now been discussed for a considerable time, has been well presented to the committee by hon. members from this corner. When I first came to this House four years ago I presented the case of the agriculturists; on many occasions I stated that I did not think due consideration had been given on the floor of parliament to the agriculturists throughout the Dominion. I was the subject of criticism on the part of hon. members, on the ground that I was an alarmist, but to-day all will agree that if at that time I was a missionary sent down here I have since been followed by a goodly number of "alarmists" who have told the same story that I tried to tell in 1920—the story of actual conditions pertaining to agriculture in our western country. The Minister of Immigration (Mr. Stewart) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) know that the conditions outlined by speakers in this debate actually exist. I firmly believe that the Minister of Immigration is doing what he believes best, perhaps, for all of Canada, but I also believe that upon his own initiative he would not advance this proposal. I do not wish my remarks to be interpreted as a criticism of the minister, for I sympathize greatly with him in his endeavour to arrive at a solution of this problem. But I doubt very much whether the solution is to be found through this western colonization scheme.

It has been stated on numerous occasions in this House that there is a leak in our immigration policy. Men and women leave our country after being brought here, and if money must be spent, it should be used to stop that leak. And what will stop it? Nothing more nor less than the making of conditions pertaining to agriculture what they should be. Speaking of the minister's attitude on this question, I have in my hand a reference which states:

> Hon. Charles Stewart, Minister of the Interior and Acting Minister of Immigration for Canada, in open frankness, speaking before the University Club at Ottawa, recently stated:
> "The market at home is overstocked with produce, which cannot be sold profitably because of the high overhead of those doing business. This is the result of deflation in some lines and not in others. Particularly affected by those conditions is the farmer. Extreme conditions of deflation in the farming communities of the West have resulted in the impossibility of making the farms pay there. What is the use of bringing people to this country if they cannot exist?"

No truer word has been spoken in this House or in any other assembly than those words uttered by the Acting Minister of Immigration. That, in my estimation, is the real thought that permeates the mind of the minister; he is so well advised regarding agricultural conditions in western Canada that he knows that an immigration policy based upon this principle cannot, of necessity, be successful. After thirty-two years' experience in western Canada I should know something about agricultural conditions there. I have seen many ups and downs in a national way; more have I seen from the individual standpoint. I recollect in the early days the possibility of a person going out, starting up and making headway. It is true that there were many evils in those days, but we fought them and persuaded the powers that be to legislate so that we could overcome them. In that connection I wish to compliment the minister in that he did, when connected with the government of Alberta, rectify many of the evils from which agriculturists suffered. I recall the days when we were not privileged to order a car to ship our grain but were obliged to shoot it through a hole in the side of an elevator. These things, and the principle of co-operation, we have brought about by agitation and by getting the ear of the government. I state that here at this present time in this Dominion parliament we likewise who represent agriculture should have the ears of the government. We maintain that we who do understand agricultural conditions in the West have a right to be heard. We are just as good in the giving of evidence as the Western Canada Colonization Association. I maintain that these gentlemen who are so philanthropic might better go out themselves and demonstrate the possibilities of agriculture in the West, than ask this government to provide them with a percentage to carry on their work of bringing in immigrants. It does seem to me that we have a right to be heard. No one can doubt our sincerity. No one will accuse us of wilfully making statements that have not been corroborated by evidence submitted.

I wish to state that I am in favour of immigration. I do not wish my remarks to be interpreted as disapproving of immigration. But I do not believe in the principle of patrimony or patronage. I remember so well when I was a small boy my father migrating from Hampshire in England and bringing out his family and establishing them without a dollar of assistance in the county of Lambton in Ontario. As his boys grew up they moved westward, and I am proud to say that each and every one of them has made a very fair success. Conditions were better then, but I would point out that no patronage and no patrimony was given, and I think we were proud enough to say that if it had been offered we would not have accepted it. We were prepared and willing to take our chances, and we did take our chances and whatever we became, the credit can be given to ourselves and to our upbringing. Thousands of others went into western Canada who to-day after long years of experience and effort may have a little equity, but thousands and thousands who have come in later under different conditions are finding it absolutely impossible to make a start upon land. They simply cannot do it, and their hearts are broken in a very few years. That is what will happen when you bring in settlers under this immigration scheme. Three years will be a sufficient length of time to break the heart of the immigrant who comes in under this scheme, and the government will find thousands of immigrants coming into the country as a result of this policy. What are we going to do then? Will the government assume another burden of debt? Will these lands be capitalized and another petition be made to the people of Canada, and another effort made to bring more immigrants into the country and settle on the land? I think that possibly that will be the only solution then.

If you will trace the history of governments at the present time in parts of the world where white people obtain and are engaged in agriculture, Australia, for instance, we find there that the people are lamenting, almost weeping because of the condition to which agriculture has been brought. In Great Britain we find that the same conditions obtain. Go to any civilized country in the world and you will find agriculture bleeding to death, the whole world over. Agriculture's successes are built on agriculture's failures. By that I mean that if we in this country have a good crop and some other country in the world has a poor crop, we have a proportionate advantage, and likewise the other country when conditions are the reverse. So agriculture's successes are based on agriculture's failures. We compete with the world. As Mr. J. J. Morrison says in an article:

> Labour to-day has better homes, better wages while we are at a standstill. Every jail farm in the country is in direct competition with your industry, but you do not object.

Such is the case with agriculture. I do not presume to argue that this government has the means to legislate against such conditions as that. Moreover, I do not think that agriculture is asking for any patrimony or patronage. But I ask this on behalf of agriculture, that when all the interests of Canada, and I care not what institution it is, have through all these years been showing in their anunal returns a dividend—I demand the same privilege for agriculture. I am prepared to take a one per cent dividend on my capitalization if that is sufficient for these other interests, but when they declare a ten or a fifteen per cent dividend, I ask for the same privilege for agriculture. I am not prepared to accept the position that they year after year shall declare a dividend of ten or twelve or fifteen per cent, and just leave me what is left, because I have had a very interesting part in the production of the wealth upon which their dividends are declared. That is only a square deal to all concerned, and surely, in stressing that point we are not asking for too much.

I was particularly interested in the remarks that were made by the hon. member for Springfield in the address which he gave the other day, and I wish to make a few references to them. The hon. member pointed out that in Manitoba, of which he presumed to speak with authority, they were overinstitutionalized, which is very true. In fact, all the grievances he mentioned were of provincial origin, but I would point out respectfully that the things which he cited were an added burden to the things we are debating at this time. We know full well of the over-institutionalism that has taken place in the western provinces, but in this federal House of Commons we have other problems, and I think it was quite beside the argument for the hon. gentleman to make those statements. His solution of the problem was to place cottages at a valuation of $2,400 on farms. That seemed to me to be something that carried us further, placing on us another burden similar to that placed upon us by Kaiser Bill when he declared war in 1914. I have made a little calculation here, and as the hon. member for Springfield spoke for Manitoba, I shall leave that province to him and take Saskatchewan and Alberta. I find that we have in those two provinces approximately 280,000 farms, which at $2,400 for a cottage, would amount to $712,000,000. That is the solution the hon. member for Springfield has for conditions in the West. I would ask hon. gentlemen of this House if they do not think I have enterprise enough myself to build a necessary house or cottage on my farm if conditions warrant it, and if conditions warrant it, by what means and in what manner I choose to do it. Am I to be told to accept a loan and to place this building on my land? That is not a solution. It only exaggerates the problem, makes it worse. But what surprised me most of all was that the hon. gentleman had departed from the stand that he took a year ago, and in that connection I wish to quote a paragraph from his budget address of last year. First let me say in passing that no gentleman from this part of the House spoke as earnestly about the conditions of agriculture in the West or more truthfully than did the hon. member for Springfield last year, when he said:

> So burden after burden was added until I am sometimes afraid, although I trust I am mistaken, that we have added the last straw so far as western Canada is concerned. I have no desire to be unduly pessimistic, but I wonder if we are not living in a fool's paradise when we speak of western Canada and its ability to come back, unless we have a complete reversal of policy in this country.

Those were his sentiments only last year, and I wonder what has brought about the change, so that when he took his seat the other day he sat down amid applause from the government side while the best sentiment in the Progressive group sat silent and sullen. The hon. gentleman spoke of prosperous conditions in Manitoba. He also said that he had been in this country fourteen years. I desire to state that I have been in Canada thirty-two years, and long before the hon.. member for Springfield was in Canada I trailed across the Riding mountains in a buckboard. I also forded rivers and streams and went into northern Manitoba looking out for suitable land. I stood upon that buckboard while it drifted down the stream but I got across eventually; there were no bridges in those days. I saw 500 of those immigrants who have been spoken of as successful to-day standing in the river stark naked bathing and washing. I went 300 miles further and I saw women hitched to the plough. I actually saw women drawing the plough in that territory in northern Manitoba. Those are the people the hon. gentleman described as being successful settlers. That is true, but the generations that have succeeded the people of those days are to-day in our agricultural colleges, and in our universities, and they are beating our own people in those institutions. But I want to ask the hon. gentleman whether he would ask the progeny of the members of this House—whether they live in the West or whether they live here—to go out there and compete with those people. I do not think, when you come down to realities, that we have got to work under such conditions to make agriculture a success. I do not believe, Sir, that those people could go into that same territory to-day and make a success of agriculture. Concerning the statements made by the hon. member it did seem to me that his whole argument was nothing but paternalism. I maintain that if conditions are right to-day that people can still go into our western country, with its potentialities, and make a success of farming. The hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) also discussed the problem and his solution was to have industrial centres in the West where our products could be absorbed. The argument recalled to me the days when I went to school and used to read the verse:

There's a good time coming boys,
A good time coming.
We may not live to see the day,
But earth shall glisten in the ray
Of the good time coming.

I want—after spending my life in an effort to produce something that I might leave to posterity, after spending my life working earnestly and vigorously—to see these good times arrive in my own lifetime. My father hoped to live to see them, I also hope to see them, and it is but a poor consolation for the hon. member to simply assure us that there is a good time coming. We are going to have a good time some day. We will have it all the quicker, I honestly believe, if the members of the government, will only hearken to the members in this corner of the chamber who have spoken in this debate, and endeavour to do something to remedy the evils from which agriculture is suffering. Those evils are economic, there is no question about it; and they are contributed to by interests of a predatory kind. That is where the trouble lies, I believe. There are individuals back of the Canada Colonization scheme who desire to have more people located on the lands throughout the West in order that they may climb upon their backs. Apparently they are on the backs of the people at the present time and we ask them to get off, rather than bring in more people so that they may continue their present operation. These may perhaps seem harsh words, but I am absolutely in earnest. I believe I know whereof I speak and when I believe a thing I have no hesitation in giving expression to that belief.

I have a few figures here that I wish to submit; I know them so well that I believe I could almost quote them from memory. The provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta were formerly known as the Northwest Territories. In 1898 the population of Manitoba and the Northwest Territories was approximately 400,000 people; in 1922 approximately 2,000,000 people. In 1898 the wheat production in the area known as the Northwest Territories was 32,000,000 bushels. In 1922 the production of wheat in that same area amounted to 375,000,000 bushels. In the period from 1898 to 1922 the population increased five times in what is now our western provinces; whilst the production of wheat increased approximately eleven times. And yet the farmers to-day, taking man for man, are poorer than the settlers were in that early period, although the production of wheat is so vastly in excess of the increase in population. We may well ask what the reason is for the existing situation. When one looks at these figures, and they are official, one can readily understand why hon. members in this part of the chamber deem it incumbent upon them to state the facts.

It has occurred to me that if copies of Hansard for the past week were distributed throughout the countries from which we hope to draw immigrants it would be quite enlightening; particularly if an individual received the copies of Hansard at the same time as he received the publications issued by the Western Canada Colonization Association, or even the literature sent forward by the present and previous governments. It would certainly be illuminating and yet I doubt whether we would accept the statements appearing in Hansard as facts.

From whence do we hope to attract immigrants? There is a difference of opinion in Great Britain at the present time as to whether the number of unemployed is 1,300,000 or 1,500,000. Ex-Premier Lloyd George accepts the latter figure. A lot of unemployed people are in the Clyde district; they are ship-builders. We know that the British government have a fund for sending immigrants to this country and I believe this government anticipates accepting the opportunities afforded by the Imperial authorities in that respect. I have wondered whether it would not be the desire of the Imperial government to get rid of as many of the unemployed over there as possible. But would they be desirable citizens for this country even with the backing of the Canada Colonization Association? Even with the support of this government can we expect those people to come in here and make a success of farming? I do not think it is at all possible, and I believe that even if they did come their experience would be such that in a very short time they would leave this country again.

I might cite as an illustration of what I mean the following: When living at home and thinking that perhaps my neighbour across the road is not enjoying as good a meal as my own menu provides, I might perhaps invite him over and when he comes and sees my fare he turns up his nose. That has been the case with the immigrant coming to this country. He finds out that we have nothing better to offer him than he considers he has at home. The result is that he is discontented and leaves this country as quickly as he possibly can. He finds out that conditions here are not as they were portrayed to him or as he felt he had a right to expect.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I would like to ask my hon. friend a question. I am sorry that he has got such an opinion of the proposed assistance that is provided for in the $600,000 that we are going to ask the committee to vote. No portion of that money will be expended except as the result of the nomination by people living in Canada of their friends, or someone that they know in England, whom they desire to have settle here. We are not indiscriminately offering people the chance to come to Canada. I merely want to put my hon. friend right in that regard.

[Mr. Gould.]

Mr. GOULD: I thank the minister for his explanation.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Are we abrogating the rule in regard to adjourning at 11 o'clock? I notice the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gould) rose to speak at 11 o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As far as the government is concerned, our desire is to adjourn, if possible, every evening at 11 o'clock, but at present we are not making much progress with the business before the House. I really do not see why these speeches should be made just on the one particular item before us. We should make progress. If the hon. member for Assiniboia has much more to say, we might adjourn at the present time, but we should have it understood that when the committee meets again unless we can make progress with supply, we must continue sitting much later than we have been accustomed to sit. I think everything that it is necessary to say might be said and still permit the business of the House to proceed with a little more expedition.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not for one minute object to sitting late. I just want to know where we are. If we are to depart from the 11 o'clock rule I think we should have notice of it. The Prime Minister has told us the next time this order is called we are to expect to sit late, and that progress will have to be made. We are not objecting to that at all. I assume, as no notice has been given of a late sitting to-night, the minister desires to report progress.

Mr. GOULD: I really did not know how long my remarks would take. I have some notes here yet that I might dwell on for some time, but if it is the wish of hon. members that we adjourn, I take pleasure in moving the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): We might adjourn now, and the hon. member could continue his remarks on some other occasion.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King, the House adjourned at 11.35 p.m.

Wednesday, March 21, 1923

The House met at three o'clock.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Explain.

Hon. Mr. STEVENS:

1. Did officers of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police who served in the rebellion of 1885 receive land scrip for 160 acres on the same basis as members of the military forces?

2. Did non-commissioned officers and men of the regular Royal Northwest Mounted Police force who served in the rebellion of 1885 receive land scrip?

3. If granted, was such scrip granted to the officers because they had been given the honorary title of an officer in the militia corresponding to the rank held by them in the permanent police force?

4. If not granted, was such scrip refused the non-commissioned officers and men on the ground that they were members of the regular police force and acting simply in performance of their duty in the rebellion of 1885?

5. Why was there discrimination between non-commissioned officers and men of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police and members of the militia in connection with the granting of land scrip?

[Mr. Copp.]

Sir LOMER GOUIN:

1. No.

2. No.

3. If any scrip was granted to the police, it was only to those few who may have served on the militia staff—but this department has no record of such scrip having been issued to the few.

4. The scrip was refused the police because their ordinary duties of maintaining law and order were within the disturbed districts. It appears they were considered to be regulars, permanently stationed in the disturbed territory.

5. Order in Council of the 30th of June, 1894, set forth the reasons for discriminating between members of the mounted police and officers and men of the militia, when the question of rewards for service during the rebellion was under consideration, from which the following is an extract:

The president of the Privy Council, to whom the matter was referred, reports that when the subject of rewards for services during the rebellion was under consideration of the government, a distinction was made between the mounted police, whose ordinary duties of maintaining law and order were within the limits of the disturbed districts, and the militia, who were called upon to leave their homes and occupations at great personal inconvenience, resulting in many cases in serious embarrassment to themselves and families.

That this distinction was marked by excluding the police from participation in the issue of scrip and by limiting the issue of the medal to those members of the Northwest Mounted Police Force who were actually under fire.

STEAMSHIP COMBINES

Hon. Mr. BAXTER:

1. By what minister of the Crown, or public official, or commissioner or other person was the interview given to a representative of the Toronto Globe which was published in the issue of that paper of January 20 last, relative to steamship combines on the Great Lakes?

2. Does the purported interview contain lengthy extracts from the report made to the government by Mr. W. T. R. Preston?

Hon. Mr. FIELDING:

1. The article referred to does not purport to be an interview, but it is in the nature of a news article containing information gathered, doubtless, from a variety of sources.

2. Answered by the answer to question No. 1.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—WAGES

Mr. KELLNER:

When the wages of the employees of the Canadian National Railways were reduced, in July of 1922, was a proportionate reduction made in the salaries of all officials?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

The employees' wages were increased from time to time in accordance with the McAdoo and Chicago awards and supplements thereto, but salaries of officers were not increased proportionately nor have they ever been paid at rates comparable with those enjoyed by officers of competing lines or in other branches of industry; therefore, no reductions were made.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—ATLANTIC DIVISION TERMINI

Hon. Mr. BAXTER:

1. Is it true as reported in the press, that Honourable J. A. Sinclair, a member of the Canadian National Railway Board, stated to members of the delegation of the St. John Board of Trade which attended a conference at Amherst, Nova Scotia, that "it was news to him that Cochrane and Brockville were not to be the western termini of the Atlantic Division as that was the understanding at the last meeting he had attended," or words to that effect?

2. If Mr. Sinclair has been substantially correctly reported, why was a matter of such importance dealt with in his absence?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. The government has no information as to the correctness of the report in question.

2. Answered by No. 1.

1. Did the postmaster at Clementsport, Nova Scotia, resign as such, in or about the year 1922?

2. If so, did the Civil Service Commission nominate Mr. Howard G. Potter as a fit and suitable person to fill the said position?

3. Was Mr. Potter notified of his appointment by the Commission?

4. Is the government aware that Mr. Potter is a wounded returned soldier?

5. Why has Mr. Potter's nomination not been confirmed and why is he not postmaster of Clementsport, Nova Scotia, to-day?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM (for Postmaster General):

1. Yes.

2. Yes.

3. Yes.

4. Yes.

5. (a) A temporary appointment was necessary on resignation of former postmaster, and an applicant with previous post office experience was placed in charge. (b) Mr. Potter was not resident in Clementsport at the time the vacancy occurred. (c) Acting District Superintendent, Halifax, reporting on various applicants, did not recommend Mr. Potter. (d) Department's duty is to give public service, and while a difference of opinion exists service is being satisfactorily performed by the present temporary incumbent. (e) When the position is definitely filled it will be filled strictly in accordance with the Civil Service Act.

2. What was the amount at which the work was let to the successful tenderer?

Mr. HANSON:

For a copy of all papers, writings, telegrams, affidavits or documents of any kind in the possession of the government relating to appointments of officers and men by the present government on the boat Pitot at Pointe au Pere, or relating to the conduct of the men so placed by the government in charge of such boat.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): As I said the other day there is no boat called the Pitot or Pilot at Pointe au Pere. There is, however, a boat for the pilotage service there; its name is Eureka. I suppose that is the one to which my hon. friend refers.

Mr. HANSON: I understand that is the name of the boat—Eureka.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House that the motion be amended by substituting the name "Eureka" for "Pitot" or "Pilot" in the motion?

SENATE OF CANADA

MOTION BY MR. DENIS (JOLIETTE) FOR AN ELECTIVE BODY

Mr. JEAN J. DENIS (Joliette) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that a humble address be presented to His Majesty the King praying that the British North America Act be amended so as to provide that the members of the Senate instead of being summoned by the Governor General should be elected by the people for a term of six years in special senatorial divisions, the election for one-half thereof to take place every third year or should be elected for any other period of time or by any other mode of election as may be determined by parliament.

He said: Mr. Speaker in moving this resolution I am not insensible of the importance of the subject which I have now the honour to place before this House, nor am I unmindful of the difficulties which lie in the way of any such project as this nor of the opposition which will be offered to it. May I also say, at the outset, that the question which I am now bringing to the attention of the House is by no means a personal one; it is constitutional in its character. I wish to assure the House that I have the utmost respect for the hon. members of the upper house, and that I am not bringing this resolution forward because I am in any way lacking in appreciation of the high status of that honourable body; my reason, purely and simply, is that I wish the popular Chamber to appreciate the constitutional question involved, which, in my judgment, is of the utmost importance.

Anyone who will study this question of the constitution of the Senate will realize not only that it is one of great importance but also that it is very difficult and complex in its nature. In dealing with this matter I propose to do this: In the first instance to examine our own constitution as regards the Senate; secondly to consider the constitution of the self-governing dominions of the British Empire as it relates to their Senate; in the third place to discuss the constitutions of the principal states of Europe in the same relation; fourthly to devote some attention to the states of America in the same connection; and finally to briefly sketch the constitutional nature of our Senate from the time of its creation to the present day, and the functions which the upper house of this country has performed.

In the first place it should be remembered that our Senate is but the continuation of the old Legislative Council. Under the union, and even before that time, there were two chambers in Canada—the Legislative Council and the Legislative Assembly. Under the union—for a certain period at least—the Legislative Council was nominative; and as far back as the early thirties this fact was the cause of much recrimination and many complaints. If we go back to that time we may recall a constitutional document of considerable importance known as The Ninety-two Resolutions. In that famous document the people of Lower Canada complained of several conditions in the administration of the country but laid special emphasis on the nominative character of the Legislative Council. They claimed—even in those early days, nearly one hundred years ago—that it was against the rights of the people and opposed to democracy in its truest sense that a legislative council should be nominated. I need not go into details as to the character of those ninety-two resolutions, or as to the events of those days; they are written in the history of Canada. Although the ninety-two resolutions were not given effect to by the Imperial parliament they undoubtedly had their influence in shaping the constitutional history of Canada because within a few years afterwards we had the Union government in this country, and the resolutions referred to undoubtedly conduced to the granting of responsible government in Canada. The ninety-two resolutions were not only submitted to the Governor of Canada at that time but were also forwarded to the Imperial authorities. The popular discontent led to the Rebellion of 1837 and other occurrences of an exciting nature. However, in 1840, the Imperial government decided to grant this country a new constitution, and the Union Act was passed. Under that act the Legislative Council was still nominated; apparently the time was not considered ripe to make it an elective body. If we consider that as far back as 1840 very few countries in the world had democratic governments, no one will be surprised that Great Britain, even with the generosity she has always displayed to her colonies, did not think fit at that time to grant Canada an elective Legislative Council. The Union Act was passed by the Statute 3-4 Victoria, Chapter 35. It provided:

> That there shall be one legislative council and one assemby which shall be called the Legislative Council and Assembly of Canada.

It was also provided in the act that Upper and Lower Canada should be represented by an equal number of members in the Legislative Council. The act provides also that the Governor is authorized in her majesty's name by an instrument under the Great Seal of the said province to summon to the said Legislative Council of the said province such persons, being not fewer than 20, as her majesty shall think fit; and that it shall also be lawful for her majesty from time to time to authorize the Governor in like manner to summon to the said Legislative Council such other person or persons as her majesty shall think fit. It is provided that every councillor shall hold his seat for the term of his life. Therefore 20 councillors were nominated for life with the option, on the part of the government, to name other councillors, the number of these councillors not being limited. Under the Union Act all political parties agreed that the Legislative Council which was given them was not what they wanted, and again complaints were heard, and the idea of an elective legislative council made progress until in 1854 the Imperial parliament saw fit to pass an act enabling the government of Canada to change as they might choose the constitution of the Legislative Council. Now, think of it—as far back as 1854 the Imperial government allowing Canada to make the legislative council elective! This was done by the Imperial statutes 17-18 Victoria, Chapter 118, which provides for an act to empower the legislature of Canada to alter the constitution of the Legislative Council for the province and for other purposes. Section I of the above-mentioned act provides as follows:

> It shall be lawful for the legislature of Canada by any act or acts to be hereafter for that purpose passed to alter the manner of composing the Legislative Council of that province and to make it consist of such a number of members appointed or to be appointed or elected by such persons and in such manner as to the said legislature may seem fit.

After the passing of that act in 1854 the then government of Canada decided to bring in a measure which had the effect of changing the constitution of the Legislative Council by making it elective. In the year 1856 the then government of Canada brought in a bill making the council of the time elective. It is well to remember—and I quote this as a very strong argument in support of my resolution—that as far back as 1856, not only did the government of the time pass an act providing that the Legislative Council should be elective, but they passed that act practically unanimously by a vote of 83 to 6. I want to know if the government of Canada will be less generous now than was the government of Canada over sixty years ago. An act was passed by which 48 legislative councillors were to be elected in Canada, 24 for Upper Canada and 24 for Lower Canada. The same act provides that 24 electoral divisions shall be created both in Lower and Upper Canada. These councillors were to be elected for the term of 8 years but they were to be elected in rotation, so that there would be elections every two years for one-quarter of the whole number. In that way they had elections in 1856 for 12 members of the Legislative Council; in 1858 they elected 12 other members; in 1860 they elected 12 members; and in 1862 they elected the last 12 members, making in all 48 elective members for the Legislative Council.

Now we have reached the year 1862, and we find that the Legislative Council is elective. They had the old council and this is how they proceeded with that council. The old councillors, to the number of about 24 at the time the act of 1856 was passed, were allowed to keep their seats during their lifetime, but at their death they were not to be replaced. Therefore, after a certain period of time, if confederation had not intervened we would have had in Canada an entirely elective council.

Now, having placed these facts before the House, one will naturally ask: If in 1856 the parliament of United Canada was practically unanimous in declaring the Legislative Council elective, how is it that at confederation the Senate, which is, as I have said, the body which follows the Legislative Council, was not made elective? Well Mr. Speaker it is very surprising indeed that the Senate was not made elective at the time of confederation, and I crave the indulgence of the House if I take the liberty of quoting a little, bearing to a certain extent on this subject. I think this is one point which needs explanation and which must be settled before this House. To summarize this question, I will say, first, that according to the Fathers of Confederation the scheme of confederation was a necessity; secondly that, starting with the principle that confederation was a necessity, the different colonies which were to unite in confederation had to make compromises, and surely no compromise should be too great in order to achieve the scheme of confederation, provided no principles of vital importance to one of the provinces should be sacrificed. It is on those theories that the Senate of Canada was made nominative at the time of confederation, instead of being made elective. I will try to prove those three points to the House.

First I shall show that confederation in the opinion of the fathers of confederation was a necessity. I will quote from some of the debates on confederation. I find the Prime Minister of the time, Sir Etienne Pascal Taché, said:

> On the whole, he thought that the confederation of all the provinces had become an absolute necessity, and that it was for us a question of to be or not to be. If we desired to remain British and monarchical, and if we desired to pass to our children these advantages, this measure, he repeated, was a necessity.

Secondly, confederation had to be taken as a whole—the whole scheme had to be accepted or rejected. The Prime Minister of that time said:

> The scheme, it was true, must be taken as a whole, or rejected, since it was not the property of the government of Canada alone, but of all the other provinces as well,

And on that point I might say this further, that it is admitted by all students of constitutional law that confederation is a pact and a treaty. Therefore, when a treaty had been made between the different colonies, it had to be rejected or accepted as a whole. No one colony could alter that treaty, because if Lower Canada, for instance, had altered the treaty in one clause, New Brunswick might alter it in another clause, Nova Scotia might alter it in some other clause, and in that way confederation would have been made impossible. Therefore, the scheme of confederation was presented to the House at that time as a whole, and it had to be accepted or rejected as a whole. No matter whether it pleased or displeased the parliament of Canada at that time, that the Senate should be nominative instead of elective, they had to take it as a whole or reject it as a whole. In view of the necessity for confederation, in view of the immense advantages which would, in the opinions of the makers of confederation, accrue to the different colonies, they decided to accept the scheme as a whole, notwithstanding the defects which in their judgment, might be contained in the scheme; one of those defects in the opinion of Canada—that is, Upper and Lower Canada —being, without any doubt, the fact that the Senate was nominative instead of elective because as I have just said, eight years before the government of Canada declared unanimously that the council should be elective

I have just said that confederation was a treaty and the product of a compromise. I have before me copious quotations from Hon John A. Macdonald, who was then Attorney General of Canada West and who was afterwards Prime Minister of Canada. I have at least half a dozen quotations on that point, and while I will not read them all, I will read one. This is what he said, and he had said it several times before:

> Let me again, before I sit down, impress upon this House the necessity of meeting this question in a spirit of compromise, with a disposition to judge the matter as a whole, to consider whether really it is for the benefit and advantage of the country to form a confederation of all the provinces; and if hon. gentlemen, whatever may have been their preconceived ideas—

Remember—"Whatever may have been their preconceived ideas," because all those men had the preconceived idea that the Senate should be elective and not nominative

> —as to the merits of the details of this measure, whatever may still be their opinions as to these details, if they really believe that the scheme is one by which the prosperity of the country will be increased and its future progress secured, I ask them to yield their own views, and to deal with the scheme according to its merits as one great whole.

This idea of making the Senate of Canada nominative instead of elective was, I must say, very strongly attacked by the minority in the House at that time. Although I would carefully avoid judging events which are not written down in history, I think one can be safe in saying that if it had been left open for one moment to Canada, that is the two provinces, the United Canada, to have an elective Senate, undoubtedly they would have voted for an elective Senate, because those very men who propounded the scheme of confederation, who asked parliament to vote a nominative Senate, admitted themselves, that while they did that, they did it as a compromise and because they wanted to make sure that the scheme of confederation should be adopted.

I have just said that many hon. gentlemen opposed very strongly a nominative Senate, and I will take the liberty of reading an extract from the speech of one of them. The Hon. Mr. Olivier, as reported at page 315 of the Debates of Confederation, expressed himself as follows, and one will see in that speech how far-sighted the hon. gentleman was, because in the few lines which I will now read, he depicted the Senate of to-day, he tells us exactly what is going to happen, and what did happen afterwards:

I took notice of an expression made use of by the hon. and gallant knight—

This refers to Sir E. P. Tache, Prime Minister.

—in speaking of the last moments of the Legislative Council appointed by the Crown. He told us that to restore the credit of the Legislative Council it had been found necessary to make it elective.

Think of this. To restore the credit of the Legislative Council in the year 1856 and before that period, it was necessary to make it elective. Now what will you do to-day to restore the credit of the Senate of Canada? I continue quoting Mr. Olivier:

But this was not the sole inducement for the change; there was another motive quite as reasonable for making the council elective, and this motive was that in causing the councillors to be elected, they would be taken from among all parties in the country, and would, therefore, represent the public opinion of the different parties in it. There was a time, under the old order of things, when the opinions of two or three men residing in the cities of Quebec and Montreal formed the public opinion of all Lower Canada. This had a bad effect, for the public opinions of the different parties in the country ought to be represented in this House as well as in the other. It was for the purpose of attaining this end that the country was broken up into divisions, that it was required that the councillors elected should be residents in the divisions, or should be the owners of real estate within their limits of the value of £2,000; but under the system of Crown nominations to seats in this House, the choice might fall, as it formerly did, on persons residing in the large cities; it would not be difficult for them to acquire £1,000 worth of real estate in the divisions, and the country would not be equally represented in this House. Another reason why the elective system is preferable to that of nominations by the Crown, is that on every fresh election the newly elected member represents the opinions of the people then prevailing, whereas councillors appointed for life may sometimes represent public opinion as it existed twenty years before. The progress of the country requires that from time to time men should enter this House as representatives of the opinions of the day.

Needless is it for me to say on that point, that the Upper House might represent an opinion different from that of the Lower House. We know that from confederation on—I am quoting from memory, but I think until 1903—the Senate of Canada was Tory, notwithstanding the fact that during that period we had the Mackenzie administration, a Liberal administration, for four years in power, and in 1903 we had had the Laurier administration in power for seven years.

What about the elective principle that was introduced in 1856? Did that work well or did it not? I have again the opinion of the Prime Minister of that time. Sir Etienne Pascal Taché, at page 240 of the Confederation Debates, said:

The measure was passed by a pretty large majority—

Of course, he did not want to admit all the truth, but he knew better than this. It was not a "pretty large majority;" it was practically unanimous—83 to 6.

The measure was passed by a pretty large majority, and I think that until now the elective principle has worked remarkably well indeed, and that the electors have sent to this House gentlemen who would do honour to any deliberative body in the world,—I care not where, whether in England, or on the continent of Europe, or in America.

Remember, Sir, that the gentleman who said that was Prime Minister of the time. And the Prime Minister who propounded the scheme of confederation with a nominative Senate did so of necessity. Why did he adopt a course which he knew was an absolute contradiction to the principle he had espoused? He had declared that the elective principle had been very successful and that under it we had obtained the best representatives that could be found in the country, men who could compare with those of any country in Europe or in America. But in the meantime, he said, there should be a change and a nominative body appointed. Now, why did he take that attitude? Sir Etienne Taché was a statesman, and he did this simply because he was bound to. And he says so elsewhere; he had to do it in order to meet the requirements of the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswisk. It happened that these two provinces—I am not sure about New Brunswick, but certainly Nova Scotia—wanted a nominative Senate. They called it a council at that time, but the two terms are synonymous; because in the Confederation Act we read that there shall be two houses, one, the upper house, to be styled "The Senate." For the first time in Canadian history the upper house was then styled the Senate; until the constitution was drafted it had been called the Legislative Council. Now, Sir Etienne Taché was in favour of an elective Senate; but on the principle of compromise, because confederation was a necessity, he agreed to a scheme which provided that the Senate should be a nominative body. This same Sir Etienne Taché was very much opposed to partisan nomination; and of course he knew that nominations to a nominative council could not be anything but partisan. It is quite interesting to quote what he says. At page 238 of the Debates we read:

Now, hon. gentlemen, what was the spirit which actuated the appointments to the council from 1841 to 1848?

It must be remembered that from 1841 to 1848 the council had been nominative and not elective.

It was a spirit of partisanship, and where there is partisanship there can be no justice. (Hear, hear). Where there is partisanship there can be no stability; —you can depend upon nothing. (Hear, hear). It is only when justice is rendered to all parties that you can reckon upon stable and permanent governmental institutions. (Hear, hear). To show the difference between the spirit which actuated these nominations from 1841 to 1847, and a spirit which exists now, it is only necessary to refer to the resolutions of the conference.

And he quotes them, the purport of his quotation being that in the first Senate the two parties should choose an equal number of members. That is how the first Senate was constituted; thereafter it was left to the government to appoint senators. Again I ask, because I consider this point immensely important, is it not obvious that the Prime Minister of that time, his government and the parliament of Canada were opposed to a nominative council, notwithstanding the fact that they voted for a nominative Senate? They were opposed to the principle, as Sir Etienne Taché plainly declares. But he had to vote for a nominative Senate in order that confederation might be possible. Now, if hon. gentlemen from other provinces rise in this House and say that to-day they hold the same opinions in regard to this question as their forefathers held in 1867, I am ready to accept their word. Confederation is a pact; it is a treaty; and if hon. gentlemen from other provinces say that they do not want a change there may be some argument in that position. I do not say that such an argument would be decisive, but it might be a strong argument. But times have changed, Mr. Speaker, and had it not been for the province of Nova Scotia at that period of our history we should have had from 1856 to confederation an elective Legislative Council and from confederation down to the present time an elective Senate. Now, I have said that the lower provinces were opposed to an elective Senate. This is what Sir Etienne Taché says:

Some remedy had to be found, and gentlemen of opposite parties wisely came together with the view of devising a plan which would not only cure our domestic difficulties but give greater power and force to the British North American colonies. To bring this about we determined that we would endeavour to obtain a federal union of all the British American provinces. Delegates from below, and the gentlemen composing the administration of Canada met together. Some of us might have preferred still to retain the elective principle, but then we had to meet those gentlemen from below and we had to give and take. We could not carry everything our own way. (Hear, hear). The gentlemen from the lower provinces were opposed to the elective principle and went strongly for the system of appointments by the Crown.

I think I can safely say that we have the secret, if ever secret there was in the matter, why the government of Canada voted for a nominative Senate after it had voted eight years previously for an elective Senate. The reason was purely and simply because they wanted to meet the wishes of the lower provinces, although they themselves had always been opposed to a nominative Senate. What was the population of these colonies at that time? I have not the exact figures, but Lower Canada was about 1,100,000 and Upper Canada 1,400,000, and the two together surely had a population three or four times greater than the lower provinces. Therefore, it was not the wish of the majority that prevailed, but that of the minority. The lower provinces were the minority, and when they succeeded in carrying the question and making the Senate a nominative instead of an elective body they imposed the views of the minority on the majority.

Mr. CARROLL: Was it not intended at that time that the Senate should be a protection for the minority?

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): It has been said, and we find it in the debates, that gentlemen from the lower provinces were of the opinion that they would be better protected by a nominative instead of an elective Senate. I must confess, however, that I cannot concede the point, although it has been given as one reason for a nominative Senate.

Mr. WHITE: What were the other reasons advanced by the Nova Scotian people in favour of a nominative senate?

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): I am glad my hon. friend has asked that question because the point I am about to deal with will enable me to answer him. Prior to the Quebec conference in 1864 representatives of the governments of the lower provinces—Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island—had decided to meet at Charlottetown to discuss a scheme of confederation, and as the governments and the people in the Canadas were favourable to a confederation, they feared that if the provinces by the sea formed a union it would be a good many years before they would be inclined to join a wider confederation. The government of Canada asked permission to send representatives to the conferences, which permission was generously accorded. The representatives of Upper and Lower Canada met the representatives of the Lower Provinces at Charlottetown on the 1st September and the conference lasted until about the 10th. Then the delegates adjourned to Quebec and continued their deliberations in that city on the 10th October of the same year. Now comes the answer to my hon. friend's question: What was said at that conference when the representatives from Nova Scotia asked that the Senate should be made nominative instead of elective. Unfortunately the report of the Quebec conference—which, after all, was the most important conference that preceded confederation—is very fragmentary, in fact all we can find are the resolutions which were discussed. I have carefully perused the report but I cannot find who was responsible for the change making the Senate nominative instead of elective. However, after the Quebec conference, when the question of confederation was threshed out in the parliament of Canada, and when members of parliament who were not present at the Quebec conference asked the government why the change had been made, the answer was: We made that change because the Lower Provinces asked for it. I take it for granted that the government in so answering spoke the truth, although in the proceedings of the Quebec conference the request of the Lower Provinces does not appear.

It was my intention to examine the various motions that have been brought before parliament since confederation asking that the Senate be made elective, but it would be altogether unreasonable for me to take the time of the House by going into these details. Suffice it to say that almost immediately after confederation there were complaints against the Senate being nominative, and similar complaints have been made from time to time since. Of course, constitutional law is not understood to-day in quite the same light as it was fifty years ago, and the reasons advanced soon after confederation against a nominative Senate are very much stronger to-day in view of the development of our constitutional rights than they were when advanced even so recently as fifteen or twenty years ago.

There is one fact, however, which I cannot pass in silence, namely, that the Liberal party at a national convention in 1893 passed a resolution declaring that the Senate should be elective instead of nominative. This is the resolution:

> The present constitution of the Senate is inconsistent with the federal principle in our system of government, and is in other respects defective, as it makes the Senate independent of the people and uncontrolled by the public opinion of the country, and should be so amended as to bring it into harmony with the principles of popular government.

Mr. HANSON: Would the hon. member please explain to the House and to the country why the Liberal party abandoned that plank in their platform?

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): I am sure my hon. friend thinks he is making a very strong point when he asks that question. I may tell him that the Liberal party at that time at least was animated by good intentions, and I believe there are in the Liberal party to-day men of equally good intentions who will be willing to carry out this proposal. But if the Liberal party held the principles of the Tory party to which my hon. friend belongs, the people of Canada would be certain never to see a change in the constitution of the Senate for the next hundred years. While I am on this point I wish to recall what was said a few days ago by the hon. member who in the last preceding government was Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton). When this resolution was called the other day he got up and said: Of course, we know how futile these resolutions on the Senate are. I was very much surprised, but after thinking it over my surprise moderated and I said to myself: This is only a Tory opinion; the hon. gentleman is a Tory, and he speaks like a Tory. The Liberal party has always been the champion of the rights of the people, but the Tory party has always attempted to thwart them. I consider that an elective Senate is a right that naturally belongs to the people, and therefore I am not surprised at hon. gentlemen on the Tory side being opposed to it. Not only is it to be expected that they would be opposed to it, but their eyes are so obscured by Tory tradition that they cannot see that there may be two sides to this question. They appear to think that a resolution of this kind is simply the sport of some hon. gentleman who wants to make himself conspicuous before the people and to please someone in the House. Let me assure my hon. friend that I am bringing forward this resolution to please, I hope, a majority of hon. members, although it may not be palatable to my Tory friends.

4 p.m.

Mr. HANSON: Mr. Speaker, I am very much obliged to the hon. member for replying to my question—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): My hon. friend is welcome to ask me another question if he chooses to. Mr. Speaker, I was dealing with the resolution passed at the Liberal convention of 1893. I do not pretend for a moment that when a Liberal government came into power in 1896 they were bound by an opinion expressed in a convention of the party in 1893, because many of the members of the Liberal cabinet, and many of their supporters in the House perhaps, were not present at the convention, and indeed might hold opinions on the subject different from those who passed the resolution. I am not quoting this resolution adopted by the Liberal convention in 1893 as an authority beyond which the government that came into power afterwards could not go; I presented it simply as the strong opinion of a representative body, the Liberal party. I entertain the hope, and I shall always entertain it until it is realized, that when the Senate of Canada is modified or reformed, that reform will come from the Liberal party.

I stated at the outset that I would pass over our constitutional provisions respecting the Senate. I now come to a subject which is very interesting indeed, that is, a comparison of our Senate with similar bodies in other countries. In matters of constitutional law we invariably find that authorities and others who are studying the question compare the constitutions of different countries for the purpose of demonstrating whether a particular constitution is good or bad, adequate or defective. If there is a sphere of knowledge in which it is necessary to proceed by comparison, it is certainly in connection with constitutional law.

I wish in the first place to compare the Senate of Canada with the senates of other self-governing dominions of the British Empire. There are at present five self-governing dominions, namely, Canada, the Commonwealth of Australia, the Union of South Africa, Ireland, and New Zealand. These self-governing dominions have about the same status as Canada has, so that it is very interesting to compare our constitution with theirs so far as provision for a senate is concerned.

The Commonwealth of Australia consists of six colonies, now denominated the original states of New South Wales, Victoria, Queensland, South Australia, Western Australia and Tasmania. The constitution was proclaimed at Sydney on the first of January, 1901. The legislative powers were vested in a federal parliament consisting of the King, represented by a Governor General, a senate and a house of representatives. It is provided that there must be a session of parliament at least once each year. The Senate is made up of six members for each of the original states voting as one electorate and senators are chosen for six years. In general, the Senate is renewed to the extent of one-half every three years, but in case of prolonged disagreement with the House of Representatives it may be dissolved and an entirely new Senate elected. The House of Representatives, with twice as many members as there are senators, continues for three years from the date of its first meeting unless sooner dissolved. Since the first parliament of the Commonwealth of Australia was instituted, an electoral act has united the franchise for both chambers on the basis of universal adult—male and female—suffrage. The population of the continent of Australia in 1921 was 5,436,794.

Let us take now the Union of South Africa —and I will give only the facts which refer directly to the Senate. The Senate of the Union of South Africa consists of 40 members. For ten years after the establishment of the Union 8 are nominated by the Governor General in Council and 32 are elected, 8 for each province. Four of those nominated by the Governor General in Council are selected mainly for their acquaintance with the reasonable wants and wishes of the coloured races. The white population of the Union of South Africa is 1,522,924, and the coloured population is 5,399,889; total, 6,922,813. In the statistics given, reference is made to the coloured people in regard to the nomination of senators.

The constitution of Ireland is perhaps the most interesting of the constitutions of the British dominions, in the first place, because it is new and also because of the troubles and difficulties which have arisen in Ireland during many years. Since 1914 three acts have been passed by the Imperial parliament giving a constitution to Ireland. The first act was entitled, "The Government of Ireland Act, 1914." Under that act each province was to have the following number of senators: Ulster, 14, Leinster, 11, Munster, 9, Connaught, 6; total, 40. These senators were to be elected every 9 years. The second constitution of Ireland was passed in 1920 and was entitled, "The Government of Ireland Act, 1920." This act provides for parliament for both Northern and Southern Ireland, and under it Ulster was divided from the rest of Ireland and was given a separate constitution. We find, again, that the provision is for an elective senate, both for Ulster and for the rest of Ireland. Then, the third constitution given to Ireland was adopted last year as "The Irish Free State Constitutional Act, 1922," which received Royal Assent on December 5, 1922. This, therefore, is the youngest constitution in the world, at any rate, in the British dominions. The constitution of 1922 provides that there shall be 60 senators elected for 12 years. One-quarter of the members of the senate shall be elected every three years from a panel especially constituted. The senators are therefore elected by an indirect or restricted vote. In many countries the senate is not elected by the popular vote. In France, for instance, the senate is elected by a selective or indirect vote, but it is an elective senate, just the same. The last quotation concerning the British self-governing dominions I wish to make refers to New Zealand.

In New Zealand the legislative power is vested in the Governor General and a "General Assembly" consisting of two chambers—a legislative council and a house of representatives. The Legislative Council consisted—as of September, 1921—of 41 members. Those appointed since September 17, 1891, hold their seats for seven years only, unless re-appointed. One life member was appointed before that date. Provision has been made for the legislative council to be made elective at a date to be fixed by proclamation. Twenty-four members are to be elected at the first election and forty at subsequent elections. Three Maori members may be appointed by the Governor General. Present sitting members hold office till the end of the term of their appointment.

Therefore, Sir, to summarize, taking the five great British self-governing dominions, Canada is the only one that has a nominative senate.

I will now proceed to make a comparison with some countries in Europe. I would like very much to place before the House the constitutions of the principal states of Europe at least but I now see that were I to do so I should occupy the entire afternoon. I will therefore only deal with some twelve or fifteen of those states, taking them in alphabetical order:

Austria. The new constitution has been in force since October 1, 1920, and her senate is elective.

Belgium. According to the constitution of 1831, the senate of Belgium is elective.

Czecho-Slovakia: The constitution of the Czecho-Slovak republic was passed by the National Assembly on February 29, 1920. The national parliament, which constitutes the only legislative body for the whole of the republic, is composed of a chamber of deputies elected for a period of six years and containing 300 members, and a senate comprising 150 members to be renewed every eight years. The franchise for the senate is open to all citizens who are over 26; and all citizens over 45 are eligible for election. The electoral system is based on proportional representation.

Denmark: Denmark is a kingdom, Christian X. being the reigning king since 1912. The house of representatives is at present composed of 149 members; 117 members being elected by the method of proportional representation in twenty-three districts. The term of the legislature is four years but the king has the power to dissolve the house of representatives before the end of the four years. The members of the senate are elected indirectly by the voters of the house of representatives of 35 years of age in the following way: In every electoral district electing a member of the house of representatives, electors in number corresponding to the population are elected by the method of proportional representation. The whole country is divided into six senatorial districts. In each of these the electors elect a number of the senate between ten and twelve. In this way 56 members are elected. One is elected for the Faroe Islands. Moreover, there are 19 members elected by the former senate according to the system of proportional representation. The members of the senate sit for a term of eight years. There are elections every fourth year for the half of those elected by the electors, while those elected by the senate go out all at once after an eight-year term.

France. The constitution of France is rather well known. It may be sufficient for me to say that in France the senate is composed of 314 members, elected for nine years from citizens 40 years old, one-third retiring every three years. The election of the senators is indirect, and is made by an electoral body composed (1) of delegates chosen by the municipal council of each commune in proportion to the population; and (2) of the deputies, councillors-general, and district councillors of the department. Besides the 225 departmental senators elected in this way, there were, according to the law of 1875, 75 senators elected for life by the united two chambers; but by the senate bill of 1884 it was enacted that vacancies arising among the life senatorships would be filled by the election of ordinary nine year senators, the department which would have the right to the vacant seat to be determined by lot. According to the original constitution there were 314 senators of whom 75 were to be nominated and the balance elected. That seems to be generous enough treatment for those who were in favour of a nominative senate—one-fourth nominated, and three-quarters elected. Only a few years after that, in 1884, they changed the constitution of the senate; they found that it was not reasonable, it was not necessary, it was not democratic to nominate even 75 members in the senate, or one-fourth of the whole number. I may say that the opinion of many authorities on constitutional law—English and German authorities as well as French—the French constitution as respects the senate, taking it as a whole, is, perhaps, the best in the world.

The German republic. Immediately after the Kaiser left Germany, Germany was declared a republic, and it is very remarkable indeed how the constitution of that republic was framed without any greater trouble than actually happened. However, my intention is not to speak of the German constitution otherwise than by describing the constitutional system which prevails there. The senate is called the Reichsrat and it consists of 66 members; 26 for Prussia, 10 for Bavaria, 7 for Saxony, 4 for Wurtemburg, 3 for Baden, and 16 for other states. Lest I should forget it, I should at this stage place before the House the fact that in almost every country in the world, consisting of a confederation or a union, the provinces elect their senators either directly or indirectly, either by popular vote or otherwise. I do not recall any country which does not elect its senators in that way. In the United States senators are elected by popular vote. The constitution has been changed but I will come to that in a moment. Two senators are elected for each state, but they are not elected for the whole United States. In Canada we have the anomaly of an appointive senate. For example, the senators from Prince Edward Island are nominated by the Dominion government. Those senators should be elected directly by the people of Prince Edward Island. Or they might be elected in an indirect way by the people. But each province should elect its own senators. In that way we would be doing what practically all other countries are doing, with one exception—no, I do not think there is even one exception. Our system of having senators for one province nominated by the whole government is an absolutely obsolete system. It is a relic of the Middle Ages and should not be longer maintained in a democracy like Canada.

Italy. So far I have not taken one single country where they have a nominative senate. None of these countries is in favour of a nominative senate, but my hon. friends directly opposite will be delighted to know that the senate of Italy is nominated. It is nominated by the king, and is chosen, I think from as many as 23 classes of citizens. If I mistake not, Italy is the only country or the only democracy in the world, except Canada, which has that system, and I may say that it is only half democratic. Italy is a kingdom, a constitutional monarchy. But it is the only country in the world that I know of besides Canada, which has a nominative senate to-day.

The Netherlands. According to the constitution in the Netherlands, they have a constitutional and hereditary monarchy. The upper or first chamber is composed of 50 members elected by the provincial states—I repeat, by the provincial states, not by the confederacy, not by the dominion, but by the provincial states. Although the Netherlands is a monarchy the senate is elected and not nominated.

Norway. This country is a constitutional and hereditary monarchy. Properly speaking there is no upper chamber in Norway. Every third year the people choose their representatives, the total number being 150. The country is divided into districts, each electing from three to eight representatives. The Storthing, which is the assembly, the Storthing, when assembled, divides itself into two sections, one composed of one-fourth of the members of the Storthing and the other of the remaining three-fourths being the second section.

The first section composed of one-fourth of the members of the Storthing might be compared in some respects to the upper chamber in countries where such a chamber exists. As I have said, in Norway, properly speaking, there is no uppper house. They elect one single house and divide that house, one-quarter acting as the upper house and three-quarters as the lower house, but the fact remains that both houses are elective. Therefore, if the first section be considered as a senate their senate is elective.

Portugal. This country is a republic, the republic was proclaimed there on October 5, 1910. On August 20, 1911, a new constitution was adopted, which provides that there shall be two chambers. In the first, which is called the national council, the members, 164 in number, shall be elected by direct suffrage every three years; the second or upper chamber, 71 in number, shall be elected by all the municipal councils and shall be renewable half at a time every three years. The president of the republic is elected by both chambers with a mandate for four years, but he cannot be re-elected.

Spain. Spain has 360 senators, one-half of them, namely 180, are nominated, and the other half are elected. I said a moment ago that Italy was the only country that had a nominative senate, and I maintain it, because although in Spain one-half of the members of the senate are nominated, the other half are elected. Therefore, they are better off in Spain than we are in Canada as far as that is concerned.

Sweden. This country is a kingdom. The first chamber is the senate. It consists of 150 members. Their election takes place by the members of the Landstings, or provincial representation, and electors of six towns, not represented in the Landstings. The constituencies are 19, arranged in eight groups, in one of which an election takes place in September every year. The manner of the election is proportional and is regulated by a special election law. Members of the first chamber are elected for the term of eight years. To summarize, the senators are elected for eight years, but there are elections for one-eighth of the total number every year.

Switzerland. Switzerland is a confederation with a constitutional government. The supreme legislative and executive authority is vested in a parliament of two chambers, a state council and a national council. The state council corresponding to the senate in other countries is composed of 44 members chosen by the 22 cantons of the confederation, with two for each canton.

In Switzerland, the last country I am quoting in Europe, they have an elective senate, and not only an elective senate, but they have senators elected for each canton, which might correspond to a small province or state. And I bring this forward in support of my contention that, at all events, the senators for each province should be nominated or elected for that province.

I have quoted so far thirteen of the principal countries in Europe, and we find that, with the exception of one country, Italy, and one other country where the senate is half elective and half nominative, in every other country in Europe the senate is elective.

I come now to America. In the United States, according to the original constitution, the senators were elected by the several state legislatures, two senators for each state. The members of the legislature voted openly, viva voce, to elect two senators for each state. That was fairly democratic but it was not found to be democratic enough for the United States. That would appear to be reasonable, but in their opinion it was not reasonable, and they changed it. There have been, so far, nineteen amendments to the constitution of the United States. They changed the constitution of their Senate by the seventeenth amendment, which was proposed to the legislatures of the several states by the sixty-second Congress on 15th May, 1912. The amending provision was in lieu of the original first paragraph of sections 3 of article 1, and of as much of paragraph 2 of the same section as related to the filling of senate vacancies. This amendment was declared, in a proclamation by the Secretary of State, under date of 31st May, 1913, to have been ratified by the legislatures of thirty-seven states, these states constituting three-fourths of the whole number of states. Therefore, since the 31st May, 1913, in the United States the senators are elected, two for each state, by the people at large.

I will name only the republics of South America to which I would refer. The most important republic in South America is the United States of Brazil. The United States of Brazil form a confederacy comprising some twenty states, if I am not mistaken, and all those states elect their senators by direct popular vote. In the Argentine Republic, the same condition exists, senators are elected by popular vote, either directly or indirectly. The same condition exists in Colombia, Peru, and Chili. Those are five countries in South America. I have not gone any further, but I feel safe in saying that in every republic in South America, the senate is elective.

I am coming to the last part of my remarks, and I hope the House will be lenient enough to bear with me for another five minutes. After making comparisons with other countries, in Europe, America and elsewhere, and between our constitution as a self-governing dominion and the constitutions of the other self-governing dominions, I think I have proved these points—1st that Canada is the only self-governing dominion in the British Empire that has a nominative and not an elective Senate; 2nd that in Europe with the exception of one country, namely, Italy, not one country has a nominative senate; 3rd that in America, there is not one country in North or South America that has not an elective senate, wherever they have a senate —because in some cases they have no senate, but only one house,—but wherever there is a senate, the senators are elective in every country.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): How many states in Europe have hereditary senates or houses of lords, as compared with those which have elective senates?

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): There is only one, Great Britain.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Does the hon. gentleman know that in Great Britain they have a way of electing some members of the House of Lords by votes? Although that is by votes of peers, still they have a recognized elective system there.

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): I am very glad that the hon. member has reminded me of Great Britain, because I was in such a hurry to conclude my remarks that I would have forgotten all about it. I will, however, say a word about Great Britain, and I will show my hon. friend what difference exists between our Senate and the House of Lords of Great Britain. I have no doubt my hon. friend knows well the constitution of the House of Lords of Great Britain; but as it is a little complicated, I will place before the House the constitution of that House as it now exists. The House of Lords consists of peers who hold their seats, first, by hereditary right; second, by creation of the Sovereign; third, by virtue of office,—that is law lords, English archbishops and bishops, the archbishops numbering two and the bishops twenty-four;—fourth, by election for life, Irish peers, twenty-eight in number; fifth, by election for the duration of a parliament, Scottish peers, sixteen. The full House would consist of about 728 members, but the voting strength in January, 1922, was about 708. I think it is sufficient for one to enumerate the composition of the House of Lords in England to prove at once that no comparison can be made between it and our Senate. But I have a better argument than mine on that point. I have the argument and the opinion of a man whom my hon. friend respected very much while he was living. That gentleman is Sir John A. Macdonald. Before Sir John A. Macdonald received the title, when he was simply the Hon. John A. Macdonald, Attorney-General for Canada West, in the debates on confederation he expressed his opinion as to what difference there might be between the Senate and the House of Lords. All those questions were threshed out, and Sir John A. Macdonald said that there was no comparison between the two. This is what he said, at page 37 of the Confederation Debates:

> In this country, we must remember, that the gentlemen who will be selected for the Legislative Council stand on a very different footing from the peers of England. They have not like them any ancestral associations or position derived from history. They have not that direct influence on the people themselves, or on the popular branch of the legislature, which the peers of England exercise, from their great wealth, their vast territorial possessions, their numerous tenantry and that prestige with which the exalted position of their class for centuries has invested them. (hear, hear).

It seems that everyone was of his opinion, and he continues:

> The members of our Upper House will be like those of the Lower, men of the people, and from the people.

I agree with that, with the exception of the last four words. "Men of the people," very well; but "from the people," never, until they are elected by the people.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I hope the hon. gentleman does not infer that I am in favour of the system as in the House of Lords in England. On the contrary, I agree with his view.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Will the hon. member tell us how, in the new Irish States, the second chamber is constituted?

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): The last one?

Mr. CHAPLIN: The two of them.

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): I have quoted three acts. Does the hon. gentleman mean the last one? I do not want to take too much time; I have been through all that already, and I do not want to repeat what I have just said.

When I was interrupted I was just about to observe that there is no other country in the world that stands in the same position that Canada occupies with regard to the Senate, unless we want to make a comparison between our Upper House and the House of Lords in England, which comparison in my opinion is out of the question. But there is no other country in the world that stands in the same position as Canada in this respect.

In the concluding portion of my address I had intended going into the question as to the way in which our Senate has functioned. I shall, however, very largely dispense with what I had to say on this point. Every hon. member knows how the Senate has worked, that is, I mean, constitutionally; for I am not referring by any means to the senators personally. How has the Senate worked constitutionally? This body, the Upper Chamber of the Canadian parliament, should be the most important of our legislative councils; it ought to be the more important of the two Chambers of parliament, the one that should command. But we must admit, without in anyway insulting anyone, that by far it is the less important of the two. Take the constitution of every country in the world and you will find that the Senate is the most important chamber; it is the most important because it has been made so by constitution. But here in Canada our Senate has simply drifted, and all the good that I can see in the principle of the nomination of senators is that it might serve some useful purpose perhaps for the government; and undoubtedly, it is a good thing for those who are nominated senators. Apart from that, however, I do not see what good it is. We all know, for it is a secret to no one, that, although in principle senators are nominated by the whole of the cabinet, they are in fact and in practice nominated by the ministers of the respective provinces which they represent. Hence we have had a system by which for eighteen years, under the Macdonald administration, a Tory administration, the government, I would not say usurped, because the word is perhaps too strong, but took to itself the right which was the people's, of nominating gentlemen to the Senate. The same thing happened during the Laurier administration and under the late Tory regime for a period of ten years. And now that this government is in power, who are going to receive senatorships? Those gentlemen who in the opinion of the government deserve the position. Well, as between the opinion of one or two or three members in the cabinet representing the different provinces, and the opinion of the people, I stand for the opinion of the people.

We must recognize, Mr. Speaker, that the democracies of the world have developed tremendously during the last few years, and particularly since the war; and if to-day a constitution were being framed for a new state, no one would think for a moment of imposing upon the people of that state a nominative senate. We are behind the times; we were behind the times at confederation. Canada was in line with events in 1865 when the legislative council was made elective, but since that time we have not progressed with the rest of the world; and the more democracy advances the further it leaves us in its wake. We find ourselves therefore to-day in a serious and, I would add, a humiliating position, for we have the unique distinction of being the only country among the nations of the world with a Senate such as we have.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): My hon. friend referred to the fact that in 1856 the then existing parliament in Canada was given the right to amend its constitution, and he has also mentioned a number of commonwealths in the British Empire that have elective senates. Would he tell us how many of these commonwealths have in their constitution a provision to change that constitution in order to deal with this very question under consideration?

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): I do not want to be in error, and as I have not studied that particular question very carefully I cannot answer my hon. friend with finality at the moment. But from the knowledge I have of the subject, and from the researches I have made, I think I am safe in saying that every self-governing dominion has the right to change its constitution in regard to its senate. That is my opinion. Now, I am drawing to the close of my remarks, and once again I crave the pardon of the House for having detained it so long; but as I said before, the subject is of immense importance, and as we discuss it to-day it is of even greater urgency than it was ten or fifteen or twenty years ago. From the debates that took place at that time we cannot get very much enlightenment, but the subject to-day is of the greatest importance and I think I am justified in devoting to its consideration the time I have given it. In closing I desire to say that I am not the guardian of the Liberal party; much less am I the adviser of the Prime Minister and the cabinet. But if there is one sincere wish I do want to express it is this, that the Liberal party as now constituted in Canada should take the lead and institute this wonderful reform of the Senate, because if the Liberal party does not do it somebody else will, sooner or later. You cannot stem a river, Mr. Speaker; you cannot stem democracy; you cannot keep Canada from forging ahead until she is in the same rank with the other nations of the world in regard to this question. So far as our Senate is concerned, our constitution is certainly obsolete; and surely Canada cannot remain in that position. She will move forward, and when she does the people of this country will take advantage of that magnificent privilege of electing their own representatives to the Senate. I hope, therefore, that when that privilege is exercised by the people of this country it will be through the instrumentality of the party to which I belong and of a government supported by that party.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): I do not know whether my hon. friend from Joliette (Mr. Denis) contemplates asking for a division of the House on this question. I hope he will not do so, because I do not think that the House is in a position, even after listening to his very interesting and instructive address, to come to a conclusion. I will say this, however, that the hon. gentleman has rendered a very valuable service to the country in opening for discussion a question of great importance, one that arises from time to time and one which, if not to-day certainly at no distant day, will press for a solution. I am glad therefore that the hon. gentleman has brought forward the matter to-day and has given so much time and study to it in order to place before the House the history of the movement with regard to elective and nominative chambers in Canada. I am not sure, however, that I can congratulate him on the accuracy of his study of the Nova Scotian history in this matter. He has intimated that the evil of a nominative senate—and the expression is his, not mine—has been brought upon this afflicted country chiefly because the Maritime provinces, and particularly Nova Scotia, insisted upon it. I can assure him that he is mistaken. From my reading of history and the little personal knowledge I have, if I may dare make the confession, of the events of that time, I can assure him that so far as the people of Nova Scotia were concerned they were not at all concerned about the question whether the Senate should be elective or nominative. Nova Scotia did not want a nominative Senate; she did not want an elective Senate; she did not want a Senate at all. Nova Scotia did not even want a House of Commons. What Nova Scotia wanted in regard to these things was pretty well illustrated at the first Dominion election that took place after confederation, when the people of Nova Scotia had their first opportunity to declare what they wanted. In the month of September, 1867, they elected nineteen members to this House of Commons, and eighteen of them were against confederation. They elected thirty-eight members to the legislature, and thirty-six of them were against confederation. Now, if we are reviewing history let us at all events not be mistaken as to what Nova Scotia was thinking about at that time. I can assure my hon. friend (Mr. Denis) that the people of Nova Scotia were not worrying whether the Senate should be nominative or elective.

Now, I have long entertained some views of my own on this question, and I thought I might have an opportunity of presenting them in concrete form—not necessarily to parliament, but on some occasion when I might invite public attention to them. I am sorry that I have not had that opportunity. Now that my hon. friend from Joliette has given me an opening I am going to use his resolution as a peg upon which to hang my own opinions. I cannot give my scheme to the House in detail, but I can give in outline what I think would be a wise change to make in the constitution of the Senate. Let me hasten to say that I do not undertake to speak for the government; these are entirely my own personal views.

[Mr. Fielding.]

I agree that the constitution of the Senate to-day is not satisfactory. I do not join in any condemnation of the Senate. I think even as organized to-day it is capable of, and does, very good work. But unfortunately the distribution of our legislative work is such that we do not get the best out of the Senate. For about a month after the Senate meets the chief business is to inquire what is on for the next day. There is nothing, and "Satan finds mischief for idle hands to do". Then, towards the end of the session the Senate is rushed and is not able to do properly the work for which it is specially designed; that is to say, the work of a revising body.

I do not agree with those who say that the Senate should be abolished. I know, some of my own friends take that view, and even among the Conservative party there are those who advocate the abolition of the Senate. For a country like Canada, with its wide distribution of almost conflicting interests, I think it is desirable and expedient that we should have a second chamber, a chamber that should act as a brake—not a block—on the House of Commons; a chamber useful in many ways. I think a second chamber is useful and necessary in these days of so-called democracy, to guard against hasty legislation. I think the Senate is necessary as being a second chamber, not necessarily in its present form, but always necessary as a part of our constitution. And I think it is more necessary in these days of democracy when we are most apt to act first and think afterwards. In a word, I believe the Senate is desirable and necessary as a revising body. I need not tell hon. gentlemen that most of our work in the House of Commons is done somewhat hurriedly and under great pressure, and that many measures will be the better for careful review by the Senate whose members have more time to deal with details. That is the purpose of a second chamber, and I should like to see the Senate continue that purpose.

If we admit the necessity of a second chamber, how should it be constituted? I would not disturb the present senators. I think they each have a vested right, and in my reform I would not disturb their tenure. But when they reach the age of, say, seventy-five, I would give them the right to retire, if they cared to, on a pension of two-thirds of their sessional indemnity. If they wanted to retire, well and good; if they preferred to stay on, all right, no harm would be done. Then I would give the government at Ottawa one-half of the nominations. My hon. friend from Joliette has playfully alluded to members of the House of Commons being appointed to the Senate. Many of those appointed to the Senate are chosen after service in the House of Commons, and some people laugh at this as unfair and undesirable. But I think men who have served on either side in this House have as a rule acquired a knowledge regarding public affairs which is useful to the country, and I would willingly see any government, whether Liberal, Conservative or Progressive—if the latter blessing is to come—appoint one-half of the senators including some who have served in this House, for in this way you are placing men of ripe knowledge and judgment in a position where they can still give good service to the country.

Then, as to the other half, I come to the point raised by my hon. friend. Why not recognize the provincial governments? I would not have any senators elected at all. I think we have enough elections in Canada to-day, and if we are going to have elections for the Senate we are going to create a chamber which will rival the House of Commons. My hon. friend thinks that the Senate is the superior chamber. We speak of legislation as being enacted by "His Majesty with the advice of the Senate and the House of Commons." The House of Commons theoretically is the inferior body. But we know that in the vital things of politics, of government and of legislation this House is the real body. I would have it kept so, and I would not put the Senate in a position where it would rival the House of Commons. I think the people of Canada have abundant opportunity of expressing their views when they elect members to the House of Commons, and therefore I do not want to call upon them to elect the Senate. I would give the provinces—not the provincial legislatures but the provincial governments, for executive power carries responsibility—the nomination of what I might call the provincial senators. I would divide the present senators by some method of balloting —that is a matter of detail—into two classes; one-half might be called federal senators and the other half provincial senators. Whenever a vacancy occurred among the federal senators the federal government would fill the vacancy, and similarly, whenever a vacancy occurred among the provincial senators the provincial government would appoint a successor.

One of the evils referred to by my hon. friend for Joliette is that under our present system there is too much centralization of power at Ottawa. He has pointed out that in 1896 when the Liberal party came into power they found the Senate mainly Conservative; in 1911, when the Conservatives came into power they found conditions reversed and the Senate crowded with Liberals; now it is overwhelmingly Conservative again. I think these conditions are not desirable. I do not think we have a single Conservative provincial government to-day. That condition is not going to last.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. FIELDING: My hon. friends cheer that remark. Well. I admit a change is possible, but I do not say it is likely to happen. In any of our provinces you may have a Conservative government—not in my own province; that never happens—but to-day we have several provincial governments representing my hon. friends of the Progressive party. If a vacancy occurred in one of these provinces, the provincial government would have the right to nominate a successor. In that way you would have some recognition of provincial rights. And it is better so. The original constitution of the Senate contemplated the recognition of provincial rights. It was taken for granted that it might be a danger to minorities and that the Senate might be needed for the protection of minorities.

I would appoint a senator for ten years. I would make him eligible for a second term, and retire him at, say, eighty.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Would that limited period apply to both classes, those nominated by the federal government and those nominated by the provincial governments?

Mr. FIELDING: Yes. If a man were appointed while still young he might, after ten years, be qualified for another term. If appointed well on in life he would probably not be re-appointed or he might reach the age limit. At any rate, if he at any time reached the advanced age of eighty—taking that for convenience—he should thereupon retire. Of course, the present senators would hold office to the end.

This is only a rough outline. I have thought sometimes that I could put it into concrete form, but I am not attempting this afternoon to elaborate it, I am not going into it in detail. I am simply offering a few thoughts for the consideration of those who are willing to take up the question. I believe the question is going to be thrust forward for consideration, for I do not think the country is going to be satisfied with the present constitution of the Senate. While I agree with my hon. friends of the Progressive party that Senate reform is desirable, I do not think it would be wise to increase the number of elections in the country by making the Senate an elective body. I want to say again, in answer to my hon. friend's comments with regard to an elective Senate, that if the people to-day have abundant opportunity of giving expression to their views through their elected members in this House, let us not have an elective Senate which would be a rival body and would undertake to interfere with some of the things we now regard as our sacred property.

Mr. HALBERT: Will the minister allow me a question? He points out that the people elect their representatives to the House of Commons. Suppose the majority of the representatives so elected adopt certain legislation; does he think it is fair that men who are not responsible, who are not elected by the people, should veto the wish of the people as expressed in that manner?

Mr. FIELDING: I used a moment ago a phrase which, I think, is an answer to my hon. friend. I said that the second chamber should be as a brake, not a block, to the locomotive. I think it is well to have a second chamber which can ask us to reconsider things. I do not complain in any case when the Senate says: You are in too much of a hurry; we want to wait for another year in respect to this particular legislation. That is a legitimate function of the Senate. If they attempted year after year to veto our legislation, I would agree with my hon. friend that that would be wrong. On the other hand, if you give the Senate, by electing its members, the same powers that this House has, the elected Senate may say: What right has the House of Commons to say it represents the people?—we claim to represent the people as well as it does. I do not want the Senate to represent the people in that direct way; I want the House of Commons to represent the people. I do not want the second Chamber, as I have already stated, to be more than a guard against hasty legislation. Again let me say I am not expressing any opinion of the government; I am simply giving an outline of what I had hoped some day I could present somewhere in more concrete form. It may not represent even my own finality of judgment. There will be much discussion of the question before the change is made in the constitution, and it is just possible that in the light of that discussion I would like to modify my views. But, for whatever they are worth, I am offering these suggestions, and would ask that they receive the consideration of all who may be interested in the subject.

[Mr. Fielding.]

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has made an excellent suggestion here to-day. In passing I wish to congratulate the member for Joliette (Mr. Denis) upon his careful presentation of his case. But what I want to point out to the Minister of Finance is that he ignored the point I raised in the question I put to the member for Joliette, whether Canada ought not now to have the right to make her own constitution. Until we have that right I do not think the minister or anybody else should put forward a proposal setting forth the manner in which the Senate should be constituted.

The defect in the proposal of the hon. member for Joliette is this: He was bound, in taking up this question, to give consideration to the powers vested in British dominions which have been given constitutions since we got our own, namely, the right to make or amend their own constitutions. What we should have had here to-day was a real substantive proposal that Canada should be given what Australia has—the right to amend and improve her own constitution in any way she likes. I agree with the hon. member for Joliette that the Senate as now constituted is the most irresponsible body known to the world. Yet it does a lot of good work; I agree with the Minister of Finance in the tribute he has paid to the Senate and his reference to the careful consideration it gives to many questions. But there is no reason why it could not be improved. One of the best legislative bodies in the world to-day is the Senate of the United States. That body has the power to originate expenditures, and I do not know why that right, perhaps, should be denied to a reconstructed Canadian Senate.

One of the unfair features of the present constitution of the Senate is that it does not recognize the group system. Hon. gentlemen to my left, members of the Progressive party, represent, I think it is, sixty-five votes in the House of Commons, but with the possible exception of one senator who has declared that he supports their views, they have no representation in the Senate. That is not a fair condition and it should be rectified in some way. Any group that goes into politics in this country is entitled to representation in both chambers, and I do not see how under the present system they can be represented unless they obtain control of the government of the country. While England has in many ways the best legislative body in the world to-day, its legislative system suffers under the great impediment of a more or less irresponsible House of Lords. But we know that England is rapidly moving in the direction of a reform of the House of Lords. The greatest thing achieved in that line was when the British House of Commons three or four years ago took away from the House of Lords the right to veto legislation originating in the Commons. The change thus brought about is one evidence of the pronounced constitutional agitation now going on in England for the reform, more or less, of their political system. I noticed in the press of yesterday that there had been a discussion in the House of Lords about the reconstitution of the various commonwealths of the Empire with a view to connecting them all up. That may be all right, and these questions are coming up, but before they are decided I want to see Canada have the full right to settle what her future is to be, in her own way, and in a parliament that represents all the people. I say the Senate to-day does not fairly represent the people of Canada. We have not come to a conclusion yet as to how we are to settle the problems that are before us. An irresponsible Senate is an important factor in the settlement of those problems. Certainly we ought to take up this question of having the right to amend our own constitution. Australia has it; South Africa has it; New Zealand has it.

Mr. FIELDING: Our own provinces have it.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Our own provinces have it; then why should we not have it? A great deal was said by the member for Joliette about democracy. I hope that when the Liberal party recognizes the principle of democracy as applied to the Senate they will recognize also the principle of representation by population in the redistribution measure that is to come before parliament.

While I agree with a great deal of what the member for Joliette says, and while I agree with the Finance Minister that the Senate can be greatly improved, I say that the paramount question before us to-day is that of the right of Canada, through its parliament to amend its own constitution and direct its own destiny.

On motion of Mr. Fortier, the debate was adjourned.

NATURALIZATION ACT

PROPOSED REMOVAL OF RESTRICTIONS ON REPATRIATION

Mr. W. F. CARROLL (Cape Breton South and Richmond) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the Naturalization Act should be immediately amended to the effect that persons of Canadian birth or British by naturalization under Canadian laws, who became subjects or citizens of foreign countries by naturalization or otherwise, and who returned to Canada during the war for war service or other patriotic motive, may again become British subjects by naturalization in Canada without the necessity of a five-year residence and without the formalities now required by the Naturalization Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am not going to take up very much of the time of the House in connection with this resolution. I have had communications from some hon. members and from persons outside the House to the effect that the resolution is ill-timed, owing to the fact that the period of five years following the conclusion of the war will expire some time this coming year. I pointed out to them, and I now point out to the House, that very many persons of Canadian birth who had gone to other countries, and in particular to the United States, had when the war broke out returned to Canada, joined the Canadian expeditionary forces, and gone overseas to fight the battles of the Empire. At the close of the war they returned to this country, were discharged here, and then went back to the United States. No inconsiderable number of men of this class were American citizens, Their residence in Canada, during the war, was very brief, but I have had communications from quite a number of such men as to the prospect of their becoming naturalized should they return to Canada again. I pointed out to them, of course, that under our present Naturalization Act a five years' residence in this country was required before they could become naturalized British subjects. Well, I take the ground, Mr. Speaker, that in the case of persons who were born in this country and who for some reasons,—valid reasons in their own estimation,—went abroad and became citizens of other countries there should not be the same impediment placed in the way of their being repatriated and becoming British subjects once more as might be necessary in the case of the naturalization of people of foreign extraction. I believe the Secretary of State would do well to investigate the whole question of repatriation and make it easier for persons such as I have described to again become domiciled in Canada as British subjects. The case of the returned soldier, of course, is somewhat different. If an American citizen, who had previously been a British subject, spent four years in the war and on his return remained in Canada for one year that would count as the five year term which is required before being able to become naturalized. However, as I pointed out, very many of those men did not remain in Canada on the termination of the war, but they are now anxious to return and acquire the status of British subjects. It is on their behalf that I am proposing this resolution.

I do not suppose that it is quite the proper thing for the mover of a resolution to move an amendment to that resolution. I entertain the hope, however, that some hon. member will propose an amendment to the effect that the resolution shall also apply to former Canadians who went abroad, especially to the United States, but who came back to Canada and afterwards served overseas, and who now wish to be repatriated—that they should not have to fulfil the five years' residence qualification in order to again become British subjects. Our naturalization laws have been very much changed in recent years, and the question arises here as to whether or not this parliament has any right of its own motion to amend the present statute dealing with naturalization, that is the act chapter 59 of 1920. The old Naturalization Act was chapter 77 of the Revised Statutes of Canada 1906. To this act there were various amendments. One amendment, made in 1907, performed for persons in the service of the government of Canada the very thing which this resolution of mine attempts to do for soldiers, former British subjects, who served overseas in the Canadian expeditionary forces. In that statute, I think the act was chapter 31, the five years' residence qualification in the case of persons resident in Canada and employed in the service of the government, was done away with. That is what I am asking to be done in the case of the men in question. Various amendments have been made to the Naturalization Act, dealing mostly with matters of procedure, until the advent of the year 1914. Then, growing out of negotiations and conferences between Great Britain and the dominions, which began, I think, in 1901, there was an understanding that we should follow along the lines of the Naturalization Act passed in Great Britain in 1914. Previous to that year the position of one who became naturalized in Canada, or any of the other dominions, was somewhat anomalous. For example, a person who came to Canada from some foreign country and spent the five years entitling him to seek naturalization did become naturalized under our law but he was not regarded as a British subject in the true sense of the term; he was not recognized as a British subject either in Great Britain or in any other dominion outside of Canada. However, as a result of the legislation enacted in 1914 by Great Britain and Canada, any person who became naturalized in Canada under the provisions of that statute also became a British subject in all parts of the Empire. That act had its advantages and its disadvantages. At any rate, the law of 1914 was, I think, in 1919 displaced by another statute. There were not so many changes made in the latter act; it had principally to do with the citizenship of persons who were enemy aliens, or were friendly to enemy aliens, during the war and therefore were not considered proper persons for citizenship. Coming to 1920 we find this legislation replaced by another statute. Now the question which presents itself to my mind is whether or not this parliament can amend the Naturalization Act without first having a conference with the Mother Country.

In this connection I might refer to a memorandum by the Under Secretary of State in which he says, that while there is nothing in the Imperial legislation of 1914 to that effect, he considers it has been the custom, since the enactment of the legislation referred to, for the Mother Country and the self-governing Dominions to confer with one another whenever a demand was made for an amendment to the Naturalization Act. I was in the House of Commons in 1914 when the act went through, and, of course, that was the first occasion on which this parliament took advantage of the Ontario Act of 1914. What happened in 1918 I do not know. I do not know whether the then government did confer with the Mother Country as to the various amendments which they made, for example the amendment of 1919 and the amendment of 1920. Notwithstanding that difficulty I suggest that it would not be a very difficult matter to confer with the Imperial authorities on the matter of amendment to this act. I do not think, however, that that is necessary. I think that Canada should have the right to say what her nationalization laws should be. The great principle involved in the Imperial act of 1914 was that it enabled the colonies to take advantage of this law to naturalize a person who would be a British subject all over the world, and I do not think it was ever the intention of the Imperial legislation of 1914, or that it was ever the intention of the Imperial parliament, or of the various colonies, when conferring regarding the matter, that if we wanted some slight amendment to our nationalization act we must confer with the Imperial parliament. I do not think it was ever intended, and if it was ever intended I think the intention was wrong, because surely we in this country, with our knowledge of our own land, know what our naturalization act should contain, and surely we have good common sense enough not to amend our nationalization act in any way which would be detrimental to the Mother Country, or detrimental to the intention of the Imperial act of 1914. I am not going to make any extended remarks as to the rights of soldiers in this country. I am simply saying that there are in my opinion, as a matter of fact I know there are, a large number of Canadian people who took part in the Canadian expeditionary force, and who returned to the United States, who would be more apt to come to this country to-day if they would not have to spend five years here before having a voice in the government of the country, and it is on their behalf principally that I move this resolution. But I say also that I believe that our naturalization law, as regards persons who want to become repatriated Canadian subjects, is altogether too strict, and I believe that the five years' residence should be eliminated, so far as they are concerned, provided, of course, that they are proper citizens.

To-day we are seeking for immigration. We want to get back all good Canadians who have gone to other countries. We are spending money to bring in the Irish and Scotch people to Canada. I do not know, but I do not believe we give sufficient attention to bringing back into this country persons who, for various reasons, left here and became citizens of other countries, and I believe it would be a step in the right direction if the government undertook to amend this act, so that the five years' residence in this country for such persons who had been Canadian citizens, and who had become citizens of other countries, would be eliminated, and these citizens could be repatriated. It would be some small inducement to bring some of our one-time good Canadian citizens back to this country. I am in hopes that steps will be taken, not only to fulfil the letter or the spirit of my resolution, but that some steps will be taken to extend the resolution in the direction I have indicated.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): I am not as familiar with the question of naturalization as I would like to be. My colleague has had the matter under consideration, and I would prefer that my hon. friend should move the adjournment of the debate, so that it may be resumed at a later date, if necessary. I do not wish to shut out any hon. member from speaking, and if any hon. member wishes to move the adjournment of the debate, I presume he can do so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): I recognize that, in some particulars, as the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) points out, questions may arise which may require grave consideration. It is a subject which I do not know very much about. I just rise to make one suggestion. The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Carroll) shows that the real object of the motion was that those soldiers who fought in the war, and who are at present out of the country, and who wish to return, ought to be allowed to do so in welcome at the earliest possible moment. The hon. member says that that is the chief object of his resolution. The hon. member makes suggestions in connection with matters of general policy. I would suggest to the hon. member that he confine the motion to just what he wants. I do not believe that any member of the House would or could object to his primary idea, which is the repatriation and re-naturalization of the soldiers. Of course, if the motion is adjourned we will never hear of it again this year. I would suggest an amendment be made in this motion. The latter part of it reads:

> —and who returned to Canada during the war for war service or other patriotic motive.

I suggest that he should make it read:

> —who returned to Canada during the war and entered into war service.

He would then absolutely cover all the cases he wishes to cover, and I am quite sure no one could object to it.

Hon. A. B. COPP (Secretary of State): The question my hon. friend has brought before the House is one of very great interest unquestionably, but the House probably very well knows that during the past number of years conferences have been held from time to time between the representatives of the Imperial government and representatives of the colonies on this subject of naturalization. Formerly each colony had its own naturalization act. We passed our own naturalization act relating to Canadian subjects. In 1914 an act was passed, after several conferences with the Imperial authorities, in order to make uniform the naturalization laws of the British Empire and all her colonies. Since that date from time to time, amendments were made to the Naturalization Act, for the purpose, as my hon. friend has said, of making uniform the naturalization laws, and making us all British subjects in any part of the British Empire. The only difficulty I see in the resolution moved by my hon. friend is that we undoubtedly can pass any naturalization law, in so far as it affects Canada, and make any person we like a Canadian subject. But if we do that this person is only a Canadian subject, and not a British subject, unless we continue along the same lines as we have been acting for a number of years, by conference and agreement with the British government along the same lines, and make the law uniform throughout the British Empire. Last year the British parliament introduced an extensive amendment to their naturalization act, which was passed, I think, in August, 1922. Before passing that act they sent a copy to Canada, and we conferred by correspondence and cables, and agreed to that act.

I want to say to my hon. friend that I will present to this House in the course of a day or two a bill to amend our naturalization act, to conform entirely with the British act passed last year. I do not think the bill I have prepared covers the point which the hon. member makes entirely, but I can assure him, and I can assure this House, that the government will be very glad indeed to make very careful inquiry into the matter the hon. member brought before the House this afternoon, and if it is at all possible, in the interests of returned soldiers, particularly referred to by my hon. friend for South Cape Breton as well as my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), by inquiry and investigation to accomplish the re-naturalization of the soldiers returning to this country, particularly for repatriation purposes, we will be very glad to do so.

As far as the department over which I have the honour to preside is concerned the matter of naturalization has been under consideration for some time and I can assure my hon. friend that I will have my officials make a very careful investigation into the matter, and irrespective of whether this motion passes or not, I assure him that the question will be given every possible attention. If any scheme can be worked out by which this matter can be furthered and it be made more easy for the soldier who has come back to this country after doing service at the front, the department, the government, and, I am sure, parliament will be very glad to co-operate and assist.

Hon. D. D. McKENZIE (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the matter which has been brought forward by the hon. member for Cape Breton South and Richmond (Mr. Carroll) is very important, and he has put his case very well before the House. The Secretary of State (Mr. Copp) has dealt with the question of law, and for that reason I do not propose to say anything beyond this. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) suggested that the hon. member for Cape Breton South consent to the adjournment of the debate; but in view of the observations of the Secretary of State and the bill which he has under consideration, and which will be introduced in this parliament, I would expect the hon. member to withdraw his resolution altogether and let the subject matter of it be dealt with in connection with the bill which the Secretary of State proposes to introduce.

Mr. CARROLL: I have no objection if the House is agreeable, to withdrawing my resolution with the suggested amendment of the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton).

Motion withdrawn.

OLEOMARGARINE

On the proposed resolution of Mr. Carroll:

Resolved, That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend The Oleomargarine Act, chapter twenty-four of the statutes of 1919 (second session), and the amending acts, by providing that notwithstanding anything contained in The Dairy Industry Act, 1914, or in any other statute or law, the manufacture in, and importation of oleomargarine into Canada, and the offering for sale, the sale and the having in possession for sale, of oleomargarine, shall henceforth be permitted, subject to the provisions of the said Oleomargarine Act and to such regulations as are now or may hereafter be established by the Governor in Council.

Mr. CARROLL: I am ready to go ahead, but I do not wish to do so at this hour of the afternoon. I am willing to let the motion stand if I have the assurance that it will be allowed to go ahead on Monday.

Mr. FIELDING: I am not sure that anyone can give any assurance that this resolution will be taken up on Monday. As regards the government, we have no objection; but the matter is one for the House to determine when notices of motions are called.

Motion stands.

INCOME TAX—EXEMPTION FOR CHILDREN

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Verchères) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the Government should consider the expediency of amending the Income Tax law by increasing the amount of the exemption for each child from three hundred dollars to five hundred dollars, and by exempting altogether the father of five children, under eighteen years of age, who has an income less than five thousand dollars.

He said:

Mr. Speaker, I cannot be accused of having taken much of the time of the House this session; following the principle, that nature having given us two mediums for hearing and only one for speaking, I believe it is much wiser to listen than to talk. The motion which stands in my name asks for an amendment to the income tax of 1917. I made a similar motion in 1920, which was lost then through the opposition, I believe, of the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton). Last year I had the same motion again on the order paper. Unfortunately we did not reach that order; but I was successful in convincing the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) that he should increase the exemption for each child from $200 to $300. Needless to say, I approve the amendment which was introduced by the Minister of Finance and made law, but it does not go far enough. Everyone who is blessed with children knows that it costs more nowadays than $200 for the upkeep of a child. I have made a careful calculation of the amount necessary, and it is far above $500. The principle at the basis of the section of the income tax law which exempts the married man for $2,000, is that this amount is necessary to provide for the upkeep of his wife and himself. If that principle is good—and nobody will deny that—it follows that the principle should apply also if the man needs more money for the upkeep of his children. The cardinal idea of the income tax is that a man should be taxed only in respect of his net income. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it is a bad principle to enact laws that tend to discourage the raising of large families. We have at the present moment tremendous financial difficulties and we can hardly meet the expenses of the administration. Nearly every economic student of the situation believes that the best way of meeting our expense is by increasing the population. The government has brought in a policy of immigration which has been under discussion for some days and which has been criticised by both sides of the House, and I give credit to the Liberal party for the fact that a man can stand up on this side of the House and state his own views without fear of expurgation from the party as was the case under the old regime. I may say that I am in favour of a sane and select immigration with the examination of the immigrant at the port of departure. But after all the most desirable citizen—and I say this with due respect for those who are not such—is the Canadian-born. He is preferable to the European, the American, or even the British, because he has sprung from the soil to which he will be always attached. And there is no hyphen appended to his nationality; his only country is Canada.

This legislation which I submit to the government for consideration has been approved by all countries. I read the other day an article by Dr. Mareli in reference to France in which he stated that laws had been adopted in that country against depopulation in virtue of an act of 1913. There is a monthly subvention given to families who have more than three children, and there are also subventions to the workingmen for their children, with a reduction of the tax on their revenue. There is also a special tariff for large families. Since 1920 laws have also been passed aiming at the removal of all conditions that might tend toward depopulation. The Montreal Gazette of March 9, 1920, contained the following article:

> France's new inheritance tax will be a novelty. It will be based upon the principle that the more children man has the less estate should be taxed, and vice versa. the fewer children he has, the more tax should be levied. If a man dies without children, the state will take fifty per cent of his estate. If there is one child, the state will take 33 per cent. If there are two children to be provided for, the tax will be 25 per cent. Should there be three children the tax will be 18¾ per cent. In the case of four or more children there will be no inheritance tax. Fiscal experts estimate this new tax will bring in 3,000,000 francs annually.
> The French government statistics show that half the French army in the World War came from families having four or more children. The same statistics show that one family in five has as many as four children. Further, more families whose estates are the largest are not those who have four or more children as a rule.

When I brought this motion to the House in 1920 the principal argument advanced against it was that the amount allowed in the United States was not over $200. Since then, however, the law has been changed. The exemption is now $400. I have here a copy of an act to reduce and equalize taxation, to provide revenue, and for other purposes, and section 216 reads:

> That for the purpose of the normal tax only there shall be allowed the following credits:
> (d) Four hundred dollars for each person other than husband or wife dependent upon and receiving his chief support from the taxpayer, if such dependent person is under eighteen years of age or is incapable of self-support because mentally or physically defective.

In England, it is true, the tax for the first child is $200, but there are other exemptions. There are allowances for life insurance premiums on the life of the taxpayer and his wife. I have in my hand Pratt and Redman's Income Tax Law, 9th edition, and at page 19, I find:

> Allowance for life assurance premiums—Subject to the restriction imposed by the Finance Act 1915, the acts allow the general reduction of premiums up to one-sixth of the gains of the person chargeable, paid for life assurance by the person on his own life or that of his wife, or on any deferred annuity in a British company registered under the Joint Stock Companies Act.

And at page 218 of the same work, section 3, the following appears:

> As we have seen, a taxpayer who has insured his own or his wife's life, or contracted for any deferred annuity on his own or his wife's life, or who shall under any act of parliament be liable to the payment of an annual sum or to have an annual sum deducted from his salary in order to secure a deferred annuity to him, or provision for his children after his death, is entitled to the extent of the annual sum so paid by him or deducted from his salary, to deduct the same from the duties to which he is assessed under any of the schedules of the act (16 and 17).

Then there is relief for small incomes. I may also add that England does not seem to care at the present time for an increase in population. On the contrary, there is such unemployment there that means are being taken and money is being expended for emigration to different parts of the Empire particularly.

I should have liked to touch upon another point regarding those who are married under a contract which does not call for the separation of property as we have in our province. This is a very interesting point, but as I have such a short time at my disposal before the House adjourns, I will not take it up now; also because the House will adjourn in three minutes I will not read the numerous resolutions which I have received from important bodies supporting my proposal.

I congratulate the minister on the amendment he made last year, and I hope he will adopt my suggestion this year and still further increase the exemption. Everyone acknowledges that the family is the basic element of a well co-ordinated state. By this legislation we would reap results beneficial to the country both morally and materially, and we would put our official approval on the teaching of nature and God—crescite et multiplicamini.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): As my hon. friend has stated, the representations he made last year were so effective that we did make a change along the lines of his recommendation. All he is asking now is that we consider the question. Well, we are always ready to consider, so we can all vote for this resolution. I am prepared to consider it. An alarming situation, however, presents itself to my mind—alarming at all events to the Minister of Finance—and that is the many demands for exemptions, reductions and so forth. My hon. friend wants an exemption from income tax. I have many deputations—some of them have already appeared, others are coming—all wanting different forms of exemption. One wants to be exempt from the sales tax, another from some other tax, and so on. It would be very pleasant if I could say to these deputations, "Oh, surely you are all paying too much tax; you are exempt." But I am afraid I shall have the disagreeable duty of telling them "We need the money." I have come back always to that old formula. I hope my hon. friend does not expect that I may do more than that. However, I will consider what he has asked for.

[Mr. Archambault.]

Motion agreed to.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question being put, pursuant to rule.

Thursday, March 22, 1923

The House met at three o'clock.

REPORT

Second report of the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. McGiverin.

MINES AND MINERALS

Mr. W. F. CARROLL presented the first report of the select standing committee on Mines and Minerals, as follows:

Your committee beg leave to recommend that their proceedings be printed from day to day for the use of the members of the committee, when deemed advisable, and that rule 74 be suspended in relation thereto.

MARINE AND FISHERIES

On the motion of Mr. William Duff the first report of the select standing committee on Marine and Fisheries was concurred in.

NATURALIZATION ACTS AMENDMENT BILL

Hon. A. B. COPP (Secretary of State) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 85 to amend the Naturalization Acts, 1914 and 1920.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

ICEBREAKER MIKULA

Mr. HANSON:

1. Is it a fact that the Icebreaker Mikula, formerly known as the J. D. Hazen, went ashore at Cap a la Rouche, near Quebec, during the present month of March?
2. Has any investigation been held by the Wreck Commissioners, or any one else, as to the cause of the stranding of this ship?
3. Who was the Captain in charge at the time of the stranding, and when was he appointed?
4. Has the officer in charge at the time of the stranding been suspended?

5. What is the estimated cost of the repairs of the ship, now in drydock at Lauzon?

6. Did the government have during the present season, a supply of coal at Three Rivers for this ship?

7. Is it not a fact that if a supply of coal had been on hand at Three Rivers at the time of the stranding, there would have been no necessity for the ship to travel to Quebec for coal and return, a distance of 180 miles, and thereby have avoided the possibility of stranding?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. The steamer Mikula while proceeding to Quebec on March 13, was overtaken in the narrow channel at Cap a la Roche by a heavy snow squall and grounded.

2. No investigation has been held but the engineer of the river St. Lawrence ship channel who was on board the vessel at the time has submitted a full report.

3. Captain John Hearn, appointed master C.G.S, Montcalm 25 March, 1919; on April 15, 1922, Capt. Hearn was appointed master to bring the Mikula out to Canada. Capt. Hearn took charge Mikula again 16 December, 1922.

4. No.

5. The ship is not in dry dock and as the extent of the damage is as yet unknown no estimate of the cost of repairs has been made.

6. A supply of coal for the vessel was available at Three Rivers.

7. The vessel was returning to Quebec not for the purpose of obtaining a supply of coal but to make an examination of difficulties that had arisen with the port propeller. Inasmuch as the vessel had to return to Quebec for this purpose it was deemed more advantageous to obtain the necessary coal requirements there, the price per ton being $8.50 as against a price of $9.50 per ton by the Dominion Coal Company at Three Rivers and a price of $12 per ton offered by J. H. Giroux. Investigation in the meantime reveals the port propeller as having two broken blades.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

QUESTIONS AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS—QUESTIONS AND THEIR ANSWERS

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Either on this order or on the order "Questions," I desire to enter a protest against such question as No. 12 being passed as an order for return. If the length of the answer and the cost of inserting it in Hansard is the reason for this procedure, I would say that the answer might be only one word.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): That is not passed as an order for return.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was so called. Perhaps it was a mistake; I hope it is.

While I am on my feet I desire also to call attention to the fact that a great number of answers to questions this session, particularly of late weeks, have not been answers at all; they have not even been evasions; in many cases they have been simply a mass of irrelevant words. It seems to me there should be a discussion in this House at an early date of what the obligation of the government is in relation to answering questions. I have questions that I can bring to the attention of the House the answer, or supposed answer, to which does not even bear relation to the subject.

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (West Edmonton): I understand that question No. 4 has been passed as an order for return. The answer would not be a very lengthy one, and I think the question ought to be answered in the ordinary way.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am informed in regard to that question that the information has to be gathered from different parts of the country, and that that is the reason why it is passed as an order for return, rather than have the question repeated day after day while we are waiting to get the information.

Mr. T. W. CALDWELL (Victoria and Carleton): I would like to say a word further with regard to questions passed as orders for returns. I spoke of this matter once before this session. The answer to a question that is passed as an order for return is not incorporated in Hansard and is not available in that way to members of the House. True, a copy may be had by applying to the proper authority, but I would point out this: I had a question that was passed as an order for return and the information was brought down, but since then I have had numerous inquiries for a copy of the return and I have had to have a stenographer make several copies. I do not think that is economy at all. Questions that can be answered without being passed as orders for returns, I think should be answered in the ordinary way, so that the information will be available in Hansard to members of the House, especially such questions as No. 4, relating to the Purchasing Commission of Canada which is very important.

Mr. SPEAKER: The remedy is by applying to the proper officer, as the hon. gentleman did. If a number of copies are required for distribution the hon. member might well apply to the committee on Printing. I am quite sure that an application made by the hon. member would be granted by the committee.

Mr. CALDWELL: I have no fault to find with the treatment that has been accorded to me personally in this matter, but I think you will realize Mr. Speaker, that members who are sitting on three or four committees and attending committees during the time the House is in session have very little time to spend in galloping around, if I may use that expression from one office to another to hunt up these matters. I think the answers to questions should be prepared as fully and as expeditiously as possible, and should be made available to the members with the least delay, because we are certainly putting in pretty full time as it is.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): Perhaps I might suggest that members in framing their questions should show equal care, because sometimes questions are needlessly extensive and serve no good in the end, I venture to think.

Mr. CALDWELL: I realize that is so in some cases, but generally questions are to the point.

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. MEIGHEN: May I ask when the House may expect the report of the last meeting of the International Labour Conference?

Mr. MURDOCK: The report of the last meeting was issued in the Labour Gazette of December or January. I am not sure which.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman, maybe, refers to a report of a conference held at Ottawa. I refer to the International Labour Conference.

Mr. MURDOCK: I was referring also to the International Labour Conference.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The report has not been laid on the Table, has it? I made inquiry and I was told it had not been.

Mr. MURDOCK: I will ascertain as to that.

SUPPLY

IMMIGRATION AND COLONIZATION

The House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Marcil (Bonaventure) in the chair.

Immigration—outside service—salaries, $700,000.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Might I make a brief statement before the discussion begins? A very large portion of the discussion so far has hinged upon the next item, and it has become apparent to me that on this item, which covers a very wide range of grants and votes of moneys a great many questions are coming up which I am not in a position to answer at the moment as I have not the material at hand. I propose to the committee that this item stand if we can make progress with the others. I am not suggesting that we stop the discussion, but simply that this item, which includes the vote to the Canada Colonization Association, and a number of other items upon which I have not full information, should stand for a few days, as it will have to do in any case until I am in possession of the material necessary to give answers. Some of this information has to be got from the United States and some from Great Britain. If we let the next item stand for a few days I will then be in full possession of all the facts and can give the committee the information it desires. I am not suggesting that we cut off the discussion now. I am merely stating that so far as the Canada Colonization Association is concerned, I may wish to make some statement about it when that item comes up again.

Mr. GOULD: As the one who adjourned the debate on the evening of 20th March, I shall be glad to co-operate with the minister. I may state that my further remarks would have particular reference to the Canada Colonization Association, but assuming that I shall have the privilege of speaking when the question comes up again I am prepared to accept the minister's suggestion and let the item stand in the meantime.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have no objection to the item standing; I think that is the minister's right, but I do not like the Chairman to call it "carried" if it stands.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It was the second item, No. 53, that I was speaking of. That is not the item under consideration and we have really not reached it yet.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The first item, No. 52, stands?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No, the next item, No. 53, over which the controversy arises.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then what is the minister asking about the item under consideration?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am quite prepared to give all the information with respect to it. It is the second item, No. 53, that I was referring to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The committee then is open for discussion of the first item?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

The CHAIRMAN: Do I understand that item No. 52 stands?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No. I was simply informing the committee that I did not intend to press for the passing of item No. 53, but proposed to let it stand for two or three days, until Tuesday next at least, in order that I might be in possession of the necessary information to enable me to answer questions. I am not now in possession of that information.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I understand that. I thought the minister asked for item No. 52 to stand.

Mr. SHAW: If I understand the minister correctly, he is simply making application that item 53 be allowed to stand; but as regards general remarks on the subject of immigration, I do not imagine for a moment that he intends to limit the discussion at this particular time. If I am mistaken, of course I have no objection to that particular procedure; but I have some few general observations to make which I would like an opportunity of making, and which, I think, should be made at this time.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have no authority to prevent discussion; that is the prerogative of the Chairman. I simply stated to the committee that I was desirous of having item 53, to which so much of this discussion that we have been having really refers, stand to-day and of bringing it up on Tuesday next, or at some later day, when we might discuss it fully.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Where the confusion arises is in this. We are having the discussion on item 52. The minister says that much of the discussion would better come under item 53, which he proposes should stand. That may be reasonable; but we have had the discussion on item 52, and I think it would be better to finish it. If we get to item 53, and if there is any particular information the minister is waiting for, that item can stand; but the general discussion, now that it has gone so far, had better be closed.

Mr. GOULD: Practically all the remarks that have been made on this subject have been in the nature of a general discussion on the principles of immigration. Evidence has been adduced to show that the state of the present immigrants in this country is not what it should be; and while some may endeavour to interpret our efforts to show to the minister and to the government what those conditions are, particularly as regards the West, as being designed or intended to be obstructive, my firm conviction is that on the part of any hon gentleman with whom I am acquainted or have conversed, there is no intention to obstruct. It is certainly my belief that the evidence I propose to adduce as well as that of my colleagues is evidence that should be placed before the country. I have endeavoured time and again to point out the conditions that obtain, and we believe these conditions are not generally known throughout Canada. Consequently, we believe it is in the interest of Canada and the Canadian people as a whole that these things should be placed upon Hansard.

As I was stating, when I was on my feet before, to me fell the task of adjourning the debate on the night of March 20. It is rather difficult to co-ordinate my remarks of that night with the few remarks which I shall make to-day; but it seemed to me that we were then jockeyed into a position where, at a late hour of the night, it was left for three successive members of the Progressive group to carry on the debate. That is the reason why I rose and was making extensive remarks when it was suggested that the debate be adjourned and that I continue my remarks to-day.

At that time, I had stated that it was my belief that the evidence that had been placed upon Hansard during the last few days of the debate in regard to this question, would make really good evidence if it were handed to our prospective immigrants. I was not advocating that this should be done; but if, by chance, it was taken to those countries from which we hope to draw immigrants, it would at least be very enlightening for them to read those speeches, particularly if in one hand they had the pamphlets that were printed by the Western Canada Colonization Company, or those beautiful lithographed booklets which the Immigration department from time to time send into foreign countries to persuade people to come to Canada and settle.

Speaking more or less in a local sense—and I notice that is the habit of the majority of hon. members who have so far spoken on this question—I wish to place a little more evidence on Hansard to-day. One of the latest letters I have received comes from a hard-headed Scotchman in western Canada, a man whom I have known for twenty years, a good conservative Scotchman. In his letter he complains that he had sold a carload of oats which he had sent to Fort William, and he had likewise sold some oats on the street. He received sixteen cents per bushel less for the oats which he sold on the street than he received for the carload he shipped. His shipping point is only 730 miles west of Fort William, and he wonders why with a freight rate approximately of ten cents per hundred pounds, sixteen cents per bushel should be subtracted from the amount he received on the carload sent to Fort William. I point this out only to show that what I have complained of many times, namely, that some of these institutions in the West seem to be almost laws unto themselves.

Of course, remedies have been suggested from time to time for these evils that we complain of. I do not wish to condemn, nor to have this interpreted as a desire on my part to condemn, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell), for I have great faith in him; but we are told at the present time to produce a better quality of pork, beef, butter, cheese and all other farm products, so that we may be able to compete with Denmark, Belgium, and all other countries that export these commodities. For the past forty years in western Canada we have been producing the best quality of grain known in the world, namely, No. 1 hard wheat, and when we had produced a commodity of one hundred per cent value, what happened with our wheat? Why, immediately vested interests in this country came to former governments and obtained the right to rob us by mixing this grain. That condition obtains to-day, and that is what we get when we produce a hundred per cent article. That is one thing that is the matter with agriculture in the West at the present time, and one reason, by the way, why I have always pleaded that the producer should have an opportunity of presenting his case before commissions appointed from time to time, so that their grievances may be remedied.

These are only small items, but they affect each and every individual in the West who is engaged in raising grain. I cited this case to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb) last year. I regret sincerely that the minister is not in his seat at this time; but I cite the case of a neighbour of mine who sent a carload of wheat to Fort William asking that it be stored. The wheat was presumably stored, and anyone who stores wheat knows that it is cleaned wheat that is stored. This man received a bill amounting to $2.29 for storage, and he was paid 33 cents for 26 bushels of screenings, cracked wheat, that were taken out of his grain. That is the condition I pointed out to the minister from my place in this House, and his reply was that he would look into the matter. The man who owned the grain has never heard anything about the matter since, nor have I, and that is only another illustration of conditions that obtain in our western country. I would tell prospective immigrants that there are hundreds of schools in western Canada closed because of the inability of people to pay taxes. That is a well-known fact, and it is a truth that applies to very large areas not alone in Alberta and Saskatchewan but elsewhere as well. I would also tell them that in nearly all judicial districts in western Canada in sheriffs' safes there are from 1,000 to 4,000 judgments. That too is a well established fact. If we told the prospective immigrant that such a state of things existed, he would ask; What is the matter with agriculture in Canada that such conditions can prevail? There is something else also which hon. members may regard as of little moment, but which I can assure the committee is, on the contrary, of much importance. Our Dominion government in the past have sold school lands, entering into contract with the purchaser and selling those lands at a capitalization of five per cent. This has happened, for instance, in the district from which I come where a goodly number of people bought lands under these terms. We all know very well that there were visitations of Providence in the way of drought, hail, rust, grasshoppers and all the other evils which have afflicted the people and which have gone to affect the proceeds of their crops. What do we see? Those people who were unable, through these Providential circumstances, to meet their obligations found themselves compelled by the Dominion government to meet an additional two per cent on their obligation, their indebtedness being thus capitalized at seven per cent, as though the visitation of Providence were not a sufficient burden. It does seem to me that the government were not in any way obliged to add that two per cent, and considering the circumstances of the case I think they might well remit this seven per cent which was inflicted upon the people at that time in connection with these lands.

In short, if we are going to send out any propaganda, I would advise that we tell the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth, and then see how many people we could get by so doing. I have here the figures in connection with immigration to and emigration from the United States alone. I might inform the committee that the figures in regard to this country I have obtained from the Canadian Year Book for the year 1922, while for the other figures I am indebted to the records of the United States Department of Labour. The first figures I have are for the year 1911, and it would be well for us to remember that they relate to a country where conditions are supposed to be very much the same as they are in Canada. And while we thought that we were drawing immigration from the United States it turns out that in the final result there has been a distinct, a decided, loss to the people of Canada as compared with the country to the south of us. In 1911, we had a gain of 52,000; in 1912, a gain of 68,000; in 1913 a gain of 55,000; in 1914 a gain of 12,000. Hon. gentlemen will remember that in 1915 we had one of the largest crops in Canadian history, particularly in the West. I mention this fact only to show that because there happens to be a big crop in the West it does not necessarily follow that the population will be beneficially affected. In the four instances I have cited it will be seen that we had gains. But in 1915, when this big crop occurred, what happened? We had a loss of 30,000 people; in other words, 30,000 people left Canada more than came into the country from the United States. In 1916, another year that was not bad, we had a total loss of 68,000 of people going to the United States. In 1917, there was a total loss of 48,000 from Canada; but in 1918 the tables were turned and we had 36,000 of a gain. In 1919, however, we had again a loss of 22,000; in 1920, a loss of 47,000; in 1921, a loss of 30,000; and in 1922 a loss of 17,000. To sum up, we lost by actual emigration to the United States alone, in the decade I have mentioned, 39,000 people. Now, there is something wrong; and each and every one of these 39,000 people will testify to just what is the matter with colonization conditions in Canada. And whether it be a matter for rectification on the part of the government—and I believe that the government can do very much to make conditions better and more equitable in this country—, the fact remains that 39,000 of our people have gone to the United States, 39,000 missionaries who will tell the truth, perhaps too luridly. And that is the reason or at least one of the reasons, why we may not expect a large influx of immigration from the United States—a country which, by the way, gives us our best settlers—until such time as conditions are, in their estimation at least, as good in Canada as they are in the country to which they are going back. I made the statement that in all civilized countries, at least where the white peoples have come from, agriculture was bleeding to death. And I have authority for the statement. In Australia, they have borrowed moneys for the purpose of settling people on the land, and as nearly as I can ascertain, capitalizing it at only five per cent, which I may say is my own estimate, the amounts borrowed will produce the sum of $250 for every settler going into Australia. In the plan we contemplate we provide approximately $500, or twice the amount which in Australia the government, or whatever patronizing source it comes from, is prepared to give. Now, I do not see why Canada, with all her potential wealth, should be obliged to pay $2 as against $1 in comparison with Australia for the immigrants that come into the country.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The point is very interesting and I should like my hon. friend to tell me how he arrives at his conclusion with regard to cost.

Mr. GOULD: I have taken the figures from the Journal of the Empire, and the five per cent at which I capitalize the moneys is my own estimate. I believe that the government, of western Australia particularly, applies the interest on every £1,000 to the initial assistance of the settler.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): How does the hon. member arrive at his figures with respect to Canadian immigration?

Mr. GOULD: I made a computation of the value of the lands and the ten per cent commission which it is proposed to give.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I beg your pardon, I did not understand you were speaking of one particular point.

Mr. GOULD: In the United States there has been before congress a bill asking for $300,000,000 to assist agriculture there. Now, in spite of their high tariff wall, the purpose of which we are told is to protect American agriculture, it seems that they still realize that agriculture is not receiving sufficient encouragement and it is now being given patronage from the government. Three hundred million dollars is a huge sum, and I am not advocating such financial assistance to agriculture. All I contend for is that we may have equal opportunities to take the potential wealth from the soil—opportunities which I believe have been largely denied us, or at least if we have not been actually denied them we have been prevented from retaining what we consider our fair share of that wealth when produced.

In the western country we have vast areas which are still unsettled, and I think that any settlement scheme should be carried out under the supervision of the government and not through the Western Canada Colonization Association. The Minister (Mr. Stewart) is well aware of the conditions in the West, and he knows the importance of community life to those who settle there. I have often considered a community plan which would concentrate the people and give them the opportunity of having their schools and other public institutions close in. One of the great drawbacks even in the organized districts in western Canada to-day is the lack of school facilities and the difficulty experienced in securing the attendance of children from remote farms. Consolidation has been tried in a few places, but I would like to see it attempted in a broader form whereby townships or divisions of townships might be brought together and roads and other conveniences provided so that the people would receive more of the benefits of community life, the absence of which is one of the great drawbacks to settlement in western Canada. Imagine a man taking his wife and family into a remote district two or three, and very often five or six, miles from his nearest neighbour. Naturally enough the woman's heart is broken. I recommend this important feature to the attention of the minister and I hope something will be done along these lines to make prairie life more attractive.

I have under my hand an advertisement sent out by the Bank of Montreal in which it is stated:

> Canada in the past three years has exported surplus vegetable and animal products to the value of $1,900,000,000.

That naturally would strike the mind of the immigrant as a huge sum, indeed it would impress anyone at first sight, but when divided up among our agriculturists the sum per capita is comparatively insignificant. Taking the farming population of Canada as approximately fifty per cent of the total, and multiplying it by three, the number of years covered, we have as a result 13,500,000 farmers, each of whom would receive out of this huge total of $1,900,000,000, the small sum of $140.75, or taking it on the basis of a family of five, the sum of $703.75. Neither sum is such as to cause the average farmer or his family to go into ecstacies. And yet this represents merely his gross return. I submit that transportation costs and taxation must be deducted say, $100 per capita, or $500 per family. Deduct this from the figures I have already given and we find how little the agriculturist has left to provide clothes, fuel and the other necessaries of life. It is at once apparent that the farmer is faced with an absolute physical impossibility in attempting to make a living under such conditions; and yet these are the conditions that obtain.

Mr. CARROLL: What do the exports consist of which are included in that aggregate of $1,900,000,000?

Mr. GOULD: The statement in the advertisement runs:

> Canada in the past three years has exported surplus vegetable and animal products to the value of $1,900,000,000.

Mr. CARROLL: Does that include wheat?

Mr. GOULD: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It also includes whisky, brandy, liquor, beer and so forth.

Mr. GOULD: Possibly. If further evidence were needed regarding the conditions prevailing in the West I could furnish it in plenty. I have here a statement issued by the Canadian Bank of Commerce which is illuminating. It declares Canada to be suffering, like many other countries, from over-extension of the functions of government whose financing calls for greater taxation than can be borne, and it instances the total taxes in Manitoba for the year 1921 at $57,190,000, against the total value of cereals produced in the province of $40,500,000. That bears out my assertion that nothing can be left for the farmer when these figures are analyzed.

In passing, may I recommend these figures to the consideration of the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey) who spoke so slightingly of the farmers of Manitoba "scratching" the soil. That statement rather stuck with me because the majority of my relatives live in that province and on their behalf I resent the suggestion that they merely scratch the soil. As a matter of fact they carry out the instructions issued by the Department of Agriculture, which are to the effect that the first seven inches will produce the best results from an agricultural standpoint.

Mr. GOOD: Mr. Chairman, I would suggest that perhaps my hon. friend was taking the hon. member for Springfield a little too literally. He might have been using the word "scratch" metaphorically.

Mr. GOULD: But when that statement was backed up with the illustration that a hen was supposed to cover two hundred eggs I think I have good reason to take the hon. member very literally.

Mr. HOEY: It was a pictorial illustration.

Mr. GOULD: I cannot bring myself to believe that the Western Canada Colonization Association is at all necessary. A few days ago letters were read by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) which had passed between the Western Canada Colonization Association and certain hon. members. I think, Mr. Chairman, that further evidence might be submitted in regard to at least one of those letters, and I propose to make this statement, not because I have been instructed to do so, but because it is common knowledge. Upon three occasions the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) has asked the association to remove his name from the list of directors, but they have paid no attention to his request.

Hon. members who were in this House during the last parliament will recollect the earnestness and ability exhibited by the then member for East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) when he spoke in condemnation of the Canada Shipping Company. He stated that some four or five years prior to that time the Canada Shipping Company had been capitalized at $8,000,000, and that they proposed to enter the British Empire Steel Corporation, the promoters of which were then anticipating a merger of $500,000,000 embracing the Canada Shipping Company, the steel and coal industries of Nova Scotia and even the Western Canada Colonization Association. Not only was the Canada Shipping Company over-capitalized at that time, as the then hon. member for East Lambton stated, but he added that the company, not satisfied with this capitalization, was entering the merger at a capitalization of $40,000,000. Now, it seems to me that I have a right to believe that the Western Canada Colonization Association had the same ambitious ideas. Incidentally I may say that they certainly thought they could afford to pay $35,000 salary to their manager. It is well known in the West that a certain person was offered $50,000 to act as manager of that organization. There is no area of land in western Canada that can yield one-fifth of that amount by way of salary or dividend. But gentlemen who have big ideas in the way of extracting huge sums from the people for the purposes of salaries in connection with this organization have not the ability to extract these sums from the soil; they find it much easier, perhaps with a little assistance or patronage from the government, to extract them from the poor prospective settler. Let these enthusiasts go out and demonstrate to me their ability to extract that profit from the soil. I defy them to do it. Knowing they cannot do it, I stand in the way of their taking it out of persons whom they want to get the wealth out of the land. I stand in the way—

Mr. MARLER: What does the hon. member stand in the way of? He stands in the way of our ever bringing any immigrants into Canada, through the attitude he is taking now and the kind of advertising he is giving to the country.

Mr. GOULD: The hon. gentleman, in his address on this subject, said, I think, that he personally knew nothing about the conditions in the West, but that he had read some papers on the subject. Surely he will admit that one who has lived thirty-two years in the West should know what he is talking about.

Mr. MARLER: I am not disputing my hon. friend's knowledge of the subject. But what my hon. friends on the other side are saying will go all over the world and we shall never get anybody to come here. People who are here might as well pack their bags and go out of the country if that is the attitude we are to take.

Mr. GOULD: I do not wish to say anything that will irritate my hon. friend; I want to be very peaceable. But I would like nothing better than to have him come out west and work beside me; I will pay him $3.50 a day and let him demonstrate his ability to make good. I warrant he will sleep his solid seven hours per night, and I question whether his horses will be very well cleaned in the morning.

Mr. MARLER: I am not questioning my hon. friend's statement at all in regard to farming. I am simply saying—and I repeat it—that if he has any constructive suggestion to make, let him offer it. Everything that has been said from that side has been destructive in its character.

Mr. GOULD: Does the hon. gentleman contend that the figures I have given the House are false?

Mr. MARLER: I think some of the figures given respecting the migration of Canadians to the United States are very questionable. They have been questioned during the course of two separate investigations made at the instance of the government, and it has been held on two occasions—the hon. member can see it in the Canadian Annual Review for 1921—that many people going to the United States did not stay there although they were counted as having stayed there. I question those figures very much indeed.

Mr. GOULD: The hon. member will have to admit that for all the $30,000,000 that has been expended for the purpose of bringing immigrants to this country, there cannot be shown to-day one per cent of increased population.

Mr. MARLER: What I admit is that this country is a good country, but what my hon. friends have been telling us in this House for the last week is such that it will be impossible to put any policy of immigration in force. That will be the result if the kind of advertising we are getting from our hon. friends across the way is continued.

4 p.m.

[Mr. Gould.]

Mr. GOULD: Notwithstanding the remarks of the hon. member, I consider I am doing my duty to the people just as well as he is. Moreover, I think I know the subject better than he does, for I have actually lived in that country. Will the hon. member produce any figures which will substantially contradict those I have presented? Of course, the figures I give may in some respects be only approximate, but I do not think my hon. friend can challenge them in any material respect. No one on this side has ever stated that he objected to Canada as a country. I have positively asserted on a dozen occasions that the potential wealth of Canada is great, but something stands between. For instance, the hon. member stood up two or three times and interrogated hon. gentlemen on this side, asking them whether they would take dividends from the Canadian Pacific Railway. That is what is the matter; the attitude is taken that organizations of this character should have the right to extract their dividends first and let those who produce the wealth of the country take what is left. That is my interpretation of the attitude of the hon. member; that is possibly his concern at the present time. We have heard many statements that there is to be a trade revival in Canada; that better times are coming. But I want hon. members at the first opportunity, to look at the individual who makes this prophecy and see whether he himself sits on the mourners' bench. It is safe to say that those who prophesy better times are not among those who sit on the mourners' bench.

Mr. MARLER: No; the hon. member himself is sitting on the mourners' bench.

Mr. GOULD: Mr. Chairman, I have expressed what are my firm convictions in this matter, and I think I have said enough to make my position clear.

Mr. SHAW: Mr. Chairman, the question of immigration has since confederation been an important and pressing problem. We have through the years framed various policies with a view of increasing the numbers of our people, and whether our efforts have achieved a measure consistent with the amount of public money expended is perhaps open to some question.

In announcing his proposals the minister indicated that he was not bringing before the House any, as he described it, brand new policy; he informed us that he was taking the middle course. His position could perhaps have been more adequately described had he suggested that he was sitting on the fence, and I am sure he has earned the attacks which are usually made upon those who assume that attitude, because. if I mistake not, his emotions must have run through the whole gamut of human sentiments when one considers the reluctant expessions of appreciation which came to him from some members of his own party and, in addition, the sledge hammer blows which have been directed at his policy by other members supporting the government. I think, perhaps, the minister must have had in his mind the injunction which many years ago was given to one of the leaders of the Jewish people when he was enjoined not to make "any graven image, or any likeness of anything that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth." It seems to me, that the position of the minister can only be compared to that of the heroine who was "There twixt heaven and earth suspended while the bell tolled to. and fro."

I think it is desirable, Mr. Chairman, that we should pay some attention to the census statistics in so far as they may be of value in determining the policy of parliament in connection with this problem. The House, I think is indebted to the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) in indicating the exact history of our emigration problem. I would like to suggest that the statistics of Canadian emigration, so far as they are disclosed to us by the United States, show that in the decade between 1901 and 1910 some 179,226 people left this country; whereas in the following decade, between 1911 and 1920 some 742,000 odd emigrated from Canada. We find also, if we take the decade—and I do not intend to weary the House unduly with figures—from 1911 to 1921 that, allowing for the natural increase, according to the figures there must be a loss to this country of something like, 1,200,000 people. Now let me quote one or two other figures with regard to immigration during the past two years. In the fiscal year ending March, 1922, approximately 90,000 people came to Canada; the year previous the arrivals numbered 148,000 odd; and in the year 1920 some 117,000 odd. So that last year, if we except the war years from 1916 to 1919 the low water mark in inmmigration was reached taking our history as far back as 1902.

In connection with these facts I want to make a few observations. It seems to me that we have two problems to solve—the problem of emigration and the problem of immigration. I have already indicated the extent of the emigration to the United States as indicated by the figures I have given. I would like to point out that that emigration is a voluntary emigration; it is not induced by any advertisements on the part of the United States government. That is a distressing feature of the situation because experience shows that that sort of emigration, that is voluntary emigration, is made up of the young, the industrious and the ambitious. That is an unfortunate fact. What is the reason that the best of our manhood and womanhood are leaving the country? Occasionally in former days people in emigrating were influenced by religious considerations; at other times they were influenced by political considerations. To-day there can be no question at all but that the reason for the emigration to the United States is due to the fact that our economic conditions are not all they should be. It is quite apparent that the emigration to the United States is due to the desire either to escape the existing economic conditions, or else to obtain better economic conditions. I mention these facts not because I am discouraged; on the contrary I am not; I mention them because they constitute an appalling and a tragic fact that our own people—our own Canadian and Canadianized people—are unable to obtain that measure of satisfaction which they look for in this country and are therefore seeking a refuge in a foreign land. That is not an easy thing for a Canadian to do, it is not an easy thing for a Canadianized individual to do, because it necessarily means the severance of the ties of kinship, the severance of the ties of devotion which binds everyone to this land. Therefore, I say, Mr. Chairman, that the primary duty of this government is to investigate this condition with regard to emigration.

In this connection I am reminded of the statement of Sir Andrew Macphail. Speaking some time ago at McGill university he said; referring to the government:

> You put a little less stress on this policy of immigration until you are quite sure you can keep the immigrants you pay for.

After some further references to the number of people leaving the country he said:

> The people of Canada cannot save themselves by this process of immigration any more than could the Romans by their system of slavery.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I would like to point out to my hon. friend that the United States have an embargo against all other nations except Canada.

Mr. SHAW: I quite appreciate the fact but my point is that the United States, as a government, is making no effort to induce immigration from this country. It seems to me that the government should take this matter of emigration into consideration, not in any panicky mood because there is no necessity for panic. I think they should ascertain, as far as it can be humanly ascertained, the existing cause and then fearlessly apply the remedy whatever it may be. I am not going into the causes for emigration; it is not necessary to do so at this particular time. I do suggest, however, that if you want to keep people in this country there must be a determined effort to reduce the cost of living, there must be a determined effort to reduce the burden of taxation under which this country is reeling at the present time. Now what is the government's attitude toward this question of emigration? What is their policy in regard to this important matter? I suppose that if I were to ask the Minister of Finance he would tell me in Asquithian language "Wait and see." It appears to me that the government are assuming the fatalistic position that little can be done to stem the tide of emigration. I do not agree with that view at all. Personally I would vote for a very definite, a very clear cut, and a very courageous programme for the purpose of stopping the emigration from our land.

There is another interesting fact to which I would draw the attention of the House in connection with the census figures. At the census of 1901 the figures indicated that 62.3 per cent of our population was rural. The census of 1911 indicated that 54 per cent was rural, a decrease of some 8 per cent in that decade. The census figures of 1921 indicate that 50.3 per cent was rural, a further decrease of something like 4 per cent. There must be some reason for the rural depopulation that is evidently going on. I mention that because I am impressed with this fact: That every person who migrates from the land into an urban centre becomes a potential emigrant from the country. The person who leaves the land and endeavours to compete in the city necessarily finds difficulty in carrying on there owing to the specialized conditions prevailing, and therefore I think it is important, if we can check the rural depopulation, that we should do so. At least we should make some determined effort to ascertain and remedy the cause, and thus to my mind shut off one of the potential taps leading to emigration from Canada.

May I be permitted to mention what occurs to me as one or two important reasons for rural depopulation? There is, of course, the lure of the city so-called, but more important than that are the hardships incident to a pioneering land, the difficulties and hardships which must be overcome. I for one regret that during our entire history we have never seen fit, or at least on very few occasions, to pay any honour to those who pioneered in Canada. We have multitudes of honours, titles and otherwise, for those who have achieved political success, and we have the same conditions prevailing for those who have achieved some measure of commercial success, but for the man who lives on the frontier we have never been able to award or accord to him what seems to me his fitting recognition.

The second cause for rural depopulation is necessarily the high production costs, and I use the word "high" as compared with the amount received by the producer in return for his efforts. It seems to me that these causes can be ascertained with a fair degree of accuracy. What are the causes which create high production costs in relation to the returns received. First of all I want to suggest, and I know my friends to the right will entirely disagree with me, that chief among these deterrents, chief among the difficulties is the tariff. We have built for forty years on a policy designed to put tall chimneys in eastern Canada. It seems to me that our policy for a time at least should have that degree of orientation which will enable farmers to reap the just reward for their efforts. Some hon. gentlemen may think that the farmers do receive a just reward for their efforts. But I presume that no one will dispute the view taken by the president of the Dominion Bank in his annual statement for the year 1922. He says:

> Of the unfavourable features, immigration returns are most disappointing and, so far, it appears that no sound measures have been devised by governments, or others, that will bring any improvement. The many attractive features that Canada has to offer to settlers have been more than offset by the poor results that farming operations have shown in the past two or three years.

He goes on:

> Excessive taxation is a great detriment, and there can be no relief while provincial governments and municipalities so freely spend money which they obtain from the public with astonishing ease.

Why he eliminated the Dominion government from his observations I do not know.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What was the date of the speech?

Mr. SHAW: It was in December, 1922. I say that the question of the tariff and its bearing upon the primary producer is a matter of vital importance, and I think our policy should be changed in so far as the tariff is concerned.

Another important element, and I propose to give the government credit for having made some progress, lies in the fact that our whole country, our whole transportation system at least, seems to be in the hands of combines, combinations which have as their avowed purpose apparently the raising of rates to the extent that the traffic will bear. I am sure that hon. members of this House cannot but be impressed with the evidence that has been given before the Lake Shipping Commission and the evidence also taken before the special committee on Agriculture, from which it appears that not only the railways and the ocean companies, but also our own National Railways and our own Canadian Government Merchant Marine have been to some extent at least implicated in this effort to maintain rates at what they deemed to be a proper standard instead of, as the people have a right to expect, competing with other railways and other transportation systems. The government, I think, is entitled to some credit for having undertaken these investigations. I think, too, they are entitled to credit for having inaugurated or at least given promise of inaugurating a policy which will do much to eradicate combines when and where they are found.

Another important element, it seems to me, that must be considered before an immigration policy can secure that measure of success which is desirable is to free western lands from the group of exploiters and speculators who now have them under control. I think that perhaps in consultation with provincial governments a progressive and scientific system of taxation could be undertaken with regard to the speculatively held lands in order that they will either be put to productive use or come back into the hands of the state, and thereby be of service to intending immigrants.

These, Mr. Chairman, are only a few of the difficulties which confront the farmer in western Canada, and I believe, for that matter, in all parts of Canada to-day. I think some effort should be made in order to relieve him of these burdens which, to my mind, unnecessarily make his position perilous.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I think I agree with my hon. friend very largely so far as the unoccupied lands are concerned, but is it not a fact that in our own province these lands are coming into the hands of the government very rapidly, much more rapidly than the government would wish, and is not that also the case with the municipalities, so that taxation is almost a burden to-day on account of the large areas of land owned by the municipalities? I am not inferring that the speculator should get one cent. I am just pointing out the actual conditions.

Mr. SHAW: There can be no question that large areas of lands are coming back into the hands of municipalities and of the government as well, but that is not true of the lands adjoining the railways to the same extent as it is of lands further removed. What I should like to see is a progressive and scientific system of taxation applied to these lands adjoining the railways, which, if they were in the possession of the government, could be used for colonization purposes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am aware personally of lands adjoining the railways the taxation on which is now ten per cent of the value, or something near that. How much higher does the hon. member think the taxation ought to go?

Mr. SHAW: In my judgment it ought to go to the point where the speculator or exploiter will either turn to production or forfeit his right to the land.

Mr. MEIGHEN: These lands have been bought from and paid for to the province, of which the whole people got the benefit at, say, $10 an acre. The taxes now have amounted to more than the land is worth and are still at the rate of ten per cent. In a word, the whole value has already been confiscated and the province has got the money. How much further would he have the province or the municipality go than that?

Mr. SHAW: If the province has the lands and they are now in a position where they can be turned to productive use—

Mr. MEIGHEN: The province got the $10 an acre, and because it does not pay to hold at a ten per cent tax the province gets the lands too. I am asking how much further he advises they go.

Mr. SHAW: I do not very well see how with regard to that particular parcel of land, the government can go much further.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member knows that in a few years taxation takes back the whole thing. Then, of course, payment of that rate of taxation for the future is impossible, for no human being will pay it, and the man turns the land back too. Thus the province gets the land and the $10 an acre. The poor fellow who bought it gets nothing at all. I ask, how far should the province go beyond that?

Mr. SHAW: There is no necessity of the province going further.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SHAW: I certainly would not for a moment suggest that the province, by confiscatory legislation, should seize all the lands simply by imposing an excessive rate of taxation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That already exists in at least two provinces, if not three.

Mr. SHAW: I have no desire to join issue with the right hon. gentleman with regard to that matter But I know, regardless of whether the taxation be high or not, there are, adjoining railways in Saskatchewan and Alberta, vast areas of land which are unproductive, which are not put to any proper use and which are simply being held by speculators against the great day when, perhaps, boom conditions will again exist. I think the government should direct its best energy, and give primary consideration to that particular problem.

With regard to the question of immigration itself, I have no objection to a vigorous immigration policy. I have not the slightest objection to bringing people into this country who can, if conditions are favourable, make themselves into efficient citizens. I have no objection to a well-considered immigration policy, provided that that immigration policy is synchronised with an efficient. if I might so call it, emigration policy, or a policy designed to prevent emigration. I do not ask that all immigration must be stopped until the emigration problem is solved. I think these two problems should go side by side. If this House will give to the problem of emigration its serious and undivided attention, and at the same time co-ordinate that with a policy of immigration, progress will be made.

As regards the problems which touch the farmers of western Canada, the problems to which I refer, and which are the exciting cause of the emigration which exists to-day, I do not ask the government simply to look in the direction of a solution of those problems; I do not suggest to them that there should be what the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) called a mere "molecular movement" in the direction of reform. They should courageously undertake the solution of those problems in order to accomplish some results in preventing further emigration from our country. After all—and I have said this before in this House—the best immigration advertisement is a contented and prosperous farmer. I ask the Acting Minister of Immigration how he can expect farmers or others brought in from foreign lands, unacclimatised to our conditions, unfamiliar with our life, to succeed where we have to-day men who have had the advantage of free land and who, despite their strenuous efforts, have not achieved that measure of success which, at least, would constitute them the best of immigration agents for this country.

There is, however, one point in regard to which I have very serious objection to the government's policy. I refer to the Canada Colonization Association. This scheme was born in the heads of various transportation and manufacturing interests. The Canada Colonization Association is the subsidiary and the inheritor of the Western Canada Colonization Company. It is now, as the minister has indicated to us, a headless organization. The government has apparently no written agreement with that organization; but it has agreed to pay them $100,000 this year, of which $40,000 has already been paid. I have looked with some interest at the advertisements of this association, and I find amongst other things that they tell us that the whole wide world is their field of activity for immigration purposes. They tell us that, as regards the United States, there will be hundreds of agents canvassing on behalf of this country, drumming up immigration, I think they call it, before the snow flies. May I say, just in connection with that, to show that that was the situation, that I have had the advantage of reading a copy of a letter directed by the Minister of Immigration to a gentleman by the name of Mr. Crawford? Mr. Crawford wrote to the minister on the 11th October last in these words:

> We are leaving for Europe this month to arrange for agriculturists to come to Canada, and as we have a letter from Ukrainia asking us if we can make the necessary arrangement for fifteen thousand families to come here in the spring, we would like to have a letter from you saying what assistance we can have from your department, and one that we can show them when we arrive in Ukrainia.
>
> These people are Christian agriculturists and will have plenty of means to start farming. Some of them we intend to settle on Canadian Pacific railway western land, Canadian National railway land and some on homesteads in the Peace river block.
>
> Through our paper the "Friend of Ukraine" we are receiving many enquiries about Canada as besides the western Canada distribution we are mailing a large number to the United States and Europe. The paper is printed half in Ukrainian and English, which will be a means of education to these people in Canada.
>
> We are enclosing some of the recent issues of this paper, and we would ask that you advise the Post Office department that we should have the 1½ cent rate as we are now paying 8 cents per pound. We have over 2,000 subscribers although they are not all paid up.
>
> We would like an appointment to talk this matter over with you, and although we have been trying for weeks to do this we have not been successful. We think our work will be a benefit to Canada.

Yours very truly,

CRAWFORD and KURDYDYK.

These gentlemen are apparently not asking for anything. They are asking simply that certain regulations of the Post Office department be applied to them, and they give indications of bringing to this country some 15,000 Ukrainian families who have adequate means. The Acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization on the 14th October last answered these gentlemen in these words:

I have your letter of the 11th. instant, enquiring what assistance the Department of Immigration can give in connection with bringing out a number of Ukrainian families to Canada next spring.

In reply I may say that the question of assistance to immigrants coming to Canada has been given careful consideration, but it was felt that, in view of our present financial condition, the department would not be warranted in asking for an appropriation for this purpose at the present time. However, I may point out that the Canada Colonization Association, with headquarters in Winnipeg, Manitoba, has rather elaborate plans for assisting immigration, and I wish to suggest that you get in touch with Mr. M. A. Brown, the vice-president of this association, at the Bank of Hamilton building, Winnipeg.

For your information I am enclosing herewith copy of the Immigration Act and regulations, which will give you full information of the qualifications required of immigrants coming to Canada at the present time.

So that it is perfectly clear that on the 14th October last the minister had made no restrictions, and, in fact, the Canada Colonization Association had made no restrictions, with regard to the field of their activities. But the situation seems to have been changed, because we find now, according to the words of the minister, that this association is restricted to the United States, the most fertile field, the best field for immigration for this country, and it has no authority or apparently exercises no authority beyond the confines of the North American continent. We also find that although this company had advertised that hundreds of agents would be carrying on, drumming up the work of immigration in the United States before the snow commenced to fly, according to the minister only some sixty agents are operating to-day. Now why this state of coma that characterizes this organization at the present time? I suggest that in this vital and important matter the government has no right to abdicate its function to the Canada Colonization Association, a headless organization of this character, which has in no measure lived up to the promises it made, which has no written agreement with the government, or perhaps if anything only a verbal contract, and whose responsibility is based on such verbal contract. Therefore I most strenuously object to the government carrying on any further negotiations with that association. I am quite satisfied that that position represents the feeling of a large number of members of this House. The promoters and associates of this organization have themselves withdrawn support from it. Then why should the parliament of Canada now bolster it up further with an appropriation of $60,000? I think that the government can without any loss of dignity simply refuse to subsidize the organization further and put this matter of possible immigration from the United States into the hands of its own responsible agents. In addition to that, those members of the House who have written letters expressing, to some degree at least, confidence in the organization have repudiated the suggestion that they meant to convey that the government should give any financial assistance to the organization. I say, therefore, that the government can and should have no further dealings with the association; In any event I am perfectly satisfied that after the publicity this association has now received its work will be of little avail in the future.

Let me say in conclusion that, if I judge rightly, the country does demand a vigorous policy designed to prevent indiscriminate immigration but which will bring into the country those who can make a success under the conditions that prevail to-day. Personally, I have the greatest faith in this country. I see no reason why we should at this time be discouraged or why we should lose faith. I think there is great hope for the future; and I believe that if we bend our energies to the consideration of these problems we can accomplish something of real service to Canada. We are fortunately situated. We are not embroiled in the many difficulties and entanglements which are so typical of European and other countries to-day. We have a great opportunity in this country, and we simply need to apply ourselves to the task. I am confident, as a Canadian, having in mind the lofty type of patriotism, characterizing our citizenship and believing that our people have courage and devotion to their country, that we can achieve success even though some hon. gentlemen seem to think that that is out of the question nowadays.

Mr. LUCAS: I doubt whether much more can be said in this debate, as the field has been pretty well covered. But there are a few observations I want to make, as some hon. members have misconstrued some of the ideas which we in this corner have tried to place before the committee. I think I can safely say that there is not a member in this group who has not the greatest faith in this Canada of ours; and in painting the conditions as they exist, hon. gentlemen on this side have had no intention of advertising this country other than as a place of splendid opportunity, but which opportunity is handicapped by the artificial conditions which surround us; and I claim, furthermore, that there is no one who can possibly have a greater love for this country than the man whose feet are firmly implanted in the soil.

With regard to our population, I think that anyone who travels over this vast country must be convinced that it is necessary that we should have more people. Personally I am sincerely anxious to see more people come into the country in order that we may develop the immense resources which we possess. But what do we find when we look back over our history during the past forty years or more? We find that as a result of the pursuit of a certain policy, our population instead of increasing has actually subsided. During the past generation at least we have been boasting about our great natural resources in Canada, and as yet we have only three persons to the square mile as compared with thirty in the United States and 903 in England and Wales. And we find that the stream of population is not increasing but actually subsiding.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is my hon. friend not aware that the last census returns showed the largest percentage of increase in Canada, over the ten years before, of any country in the world?

Mr. LUCAS: That may be quite true, but the fact remains nevertheless that in the last ten years, in spite of the immigration that has come into the country, we have lost more people than have come in.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not referring to emigration, but to the actual increase in population. The percentage of increase in Canada is the largest of any English-speaking country in the world, indeed, I think, of any country, as shown by the official census returns. I know that it has been pretty bad since 1921, but the condition I speak of prevailed for the ten years before.

Mr. LUCAS: I do not wish to take issue with the right hon. gentleman on the question, but I believe that the facts as we have them from our own Bureau of Statistics will bear out the statements I have made. I was about to remark that the facts suggest two or three conclusions. We have either misrepresented our natural resources and grossly exaggerated them, or we have proved that we do not know how to handle a great estate. We know as a fact that we have not exaggerated our resources; and we know also, that we have as industrious a class of people in Canada, and as good a class of farmers, as can be found anywhere in the world. And speaking of our farmers' achievements, we know what they have been able to do in competition with outsiders at any of the great expositions that have taken place, especially on the American continent. I speak from memory, but I think I am safe in saying that at the great international fat stock show at Chicago last year Canada carried off 19 out of the 25 prizes. So that the trouble rests not with our farmers or with the country itself; there must be something wrong with the policy which we have had since confederation. We have heard a great deal, and I know that much has been said from this corner, in regard to the conditions in this country; and hon. members have stood up in this House and told us practically that we did not know what we were talking about. Those hon. members have offered us sympathy. Well, Sir, I want to tell hon. gentlemen that the farmers of western Canada are not coming here looking for any sympathy; they are asking for a square deal, for a chance to make good, for an equal opportunity with others. My hon. friend (Mr. Marler) the other night in an excellent speech told us that what we wanted was courage. I would ask hon. gentlemen of this House to consider for a moment the character of the men and women who have carried civilization into those western plains, who have endured the hardships and the toils of a pioneer life, who have combatted through hail, frost and insect pests and other natural afflictions, and then say whether these people are lacking in courage.

We are told that one of the solutions to remedy our adverse conditions is to reduce our standard of living and do as our forefathers did in the old pioneering days. It is even suggested that the peasant type of settler should be brought in from Europe. Mr. Chairman, since when have the British stock become such weaklings. Are we going to admit that the combination of the two greatest races that the world has ever known is about to fall down in the development of this country and is to be supplanted by the peasant type of immigrant from Europe? I think it is time that we as Canadians woke up and faced this matter squarely.

We hear a great deal about the necessity of the farmers reducing their standard of living and undergoing the privations of pioneer days. Perhaps we have all gone a little too far in the high standard of living. But why should we expect the farmers to be the only class to reduce their standard? Would it be unfair to say to our manufacturers, for instance, that perhaps they could do something along this line as well and so be able to produce goods at a price which we could afford to pay?

The hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey) last week in a very eloquent address told us about an ingenious young Irish immigrant who by following out a course of semi-starvation rose to a very high position in our public life. Well, while he was talking I wondered to what heights that immigrant might have risen had he remained at home and applied the same ingenuity and ability. He might not only have become member of parliament, but he might even be the ruling power in the Emerald Isle to-day. I think some hon. gentlemen were led to believe that such a successful career as depicted by the hon .member for Springfield was only possible in Canada. Let me remind the committee that in Great Britain notwithstanding her great burden of debt and other troubles, there are still possibilities for the individual who possesses ability and application. In this connection we cannot forget the wonderful career of that little boy in a Welsh village who rose by sheer ability until to-day he is regarded as one of the greatest statesman the world has ever known. It is not the material resources of a country that make for great statesmen. Recently I read an article by Mr. Otto H. Kahn concerning British-American relations, in the course of which he said:

> It is not the possession of raw materials and other latent resources, it is not the bounty of nature, it is the qualities and efforts of its people that make a nation great.

The immigration estimates now before us show a large increase for the purpose of bringing in new settlers. The question naturally arises, what have we got to offer our settlers to-day. Comparing present conditions with those of twenty years ago, our settlers were then able to take up free land. If a man took up a quarter section and was not able to make his farming operations pay his overhead was not piling up. At that time we had a very energetic railway policy, and the workmen engaged on railway construction provided ready purchasers for anything the settler produced and if in the fall season he needed some ready cash he could go out with his team and work on the railway grade and thus secure enough ready money to carry him over the winter. We hear a great deal to-day about the men who put up with hardships in those days, and that they were not even able to secure postage stamps. That may be true, but while they were waiting for postage stamps their overhead expenses were not accumulating to any alarming extent. Now immigrants are to be placed on land of an average value of $18 to $20 an acre, and unless he has the requisite amount of capital to purchase his farm outright he must be successful from the very beginning, otherwise interest charges, taxes and the high cost of living are going to force him out of business.

I am not going to relate in detail the conditions now prevailing in the West; those have been already presented at sufficient length. But I would just like to say that conditions are undoubtedly bad, and our people are getting so discouraged that unless this government can give us some policy which will instil fresh hope into our people, I fear for the results. I do not suggest that we should not allow anyone to enter Canada until we get conditions perfect, but I do say that if the government could give us some ray of hope for these people so that we can tell them: The government is honestly endeavouring by bringing in a new policy—because it has been amply demonstrated that our present policy is not producing the results expected—a policy that we hope will improve your condition, such a message would mean a great deal to these people and they would take fresh courage, because I believe there is not a single farmer who would not dig in and work harder to pull through if we could give him some ray of hope that he would succeed.

After the arguments that have been advanced in this House the government and the minister (Mr. Stewart) should be fully seized of the fact that we are not in favour of the colonization scheme which he has placed before the committee. I hope the government will fully realize the responsibility they will be assuming in letting it appear to the country that this Canada Colonization Association scheme is being backed by the Dominion government. It may be safely assumed that the high-powered salesmen who will be engaged to drum up settlers, having in view only their commission of $320 if they land a settler on a half-section, will paint some very rosy pictures to prospective immigrants, and when these immigrants find conditions have been misrepresented naturally they will look to the government to assume responsibility for the statements which they were led to believe were true.

I do not believe in criticizing any scheme without endeavouring to offer some suggestions along constructive lines. I believe that the first essential in keeping settlers on the land is to have the right kind of land settlement policy. The next is the reconstruction of rural life around various forms of co-operative enterprise. The old policy of bringing settlers into the country and leaving them to shift for themselves will not do. They must be taught the best methods to ensure success. And, furthermore, hand in hand with, or rather in advance of an aggressive policy to obtain this type of settler, there must be action by the federal government to ensure that those already on the land and those about to come may have adequate markets and marketing facilities, to the end that they may obtain some reasonable profit for their labour and investment.

I have made a note here of four suggestions that I think might well receive the serious consideration of the government. In the first place, there is the question of a reduction of the tariff. The people are getting discouraged because they have always felt that the Liberal government stood for a low tariff. The very fact that the people turned out the old government indicated their dissatisfaction with the then prevailing conditions, and they are looking for a change.

Another suggestion would be a reduction in our transportation costs and equalization of our freight rates so that we may be able to get our goods out more cheaply. I would submit also the desirability of considering a long term credit scheme for agricultural loans. I do not offer this suggestion with the idea that the farmers should be given more credit; possibly one of the things we have been up against in the past is the fact that we have had too much credit. But a three months' loan to the farmer is of no use. The United States is realizing the necessity of taking some action along this line. If the government could do something to assist in the providing of capital with which we could replace the present loans that are piling up at a high rate of interest, the effect of which in the end will only be to drive us out of the country; if we could have these extended over a long term so that we might have some hope of ultimately getting out of debt, I am sure it would mean a great deal.

Another suggestion is that there be some encouragement of co-operative enterprises. I do not refer now merely to the little co-operative store; we must get some method of pooling our grain and our live stock. After all, this is not purely a farmers' question; it is a national question, and if the government could offer encouragement along this line the result would be very beneficial indeed. The hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey) expressed the view the other day that his part of the country at least was over-institutionalized. I largely agree with that view, not as respects schools, but as respects almost every other line. Speaking about our grain, any hon. members who have travelled through the West will bear me out when I say that in every little town along the railway—and they come every seven or eight miles—one is impressed with the large number of elevators that have been built I think I am safe in saying that in practically every little town there are from three to five elevators. That means that, in the first place, there is the capital outlay; then there is the local buyer, who is actively engaged only about three months in the year but who receives an annual salary; then there are inspectors going up and down the country, and there are the head offices with their general managers and staffs of clerks. That load is getting too heavy for the farmers to carry. The same conditions exist in our banking system; in every little town there are two or more banks; there is hardly a town in the West which has only one. Going from here to Toronto via the lake shore route one cannot help being impressed by the fact that three lines of railways paral. each other, requiring three stations and three sets of employees in every little town. That is what our competitive system has done for us, and it is something I think the government should take into its serious consideration.

5 p.m.

I hope that the government will bring in some policy that we may be able to take back to our people with the view of giving them a little hope and inspiring them with fresh courage to go on for the future. I believe we have in Canada, not one of the finest countries, but the finest country in the world. It is a matter of regret for me to see hon. members, as has sometimes been the case in this House, seek to obtain party advantage rather than face squarely the issue before the country. The time of the House was taken up noticeably last year in an effort to place the responsibility for our railway situation upon one party or the other; in fact, we fought the election campaign of December 6, 1921, all over again. I do not think that is what we are here for. If we could get away from that sort of thing; if we could forget who is responsible for what has happened in the past and get down to a solution of the problems actually before us, it would be a good thing for the country. The people are demanding that we give them a lead in the matter of bringing them out of the very serious conditions now prevailing. I hope therefore, that hon. members in every quarter of the House will lend their ability to the solution of the important problem we are now considering and do their best to make this Canada of ours a place we would love to live in.

Mr. LAPIERRE: I wish to interject only a word or two into the discussion on this important subject, I would begin by calling the attention of the committee to at least one section of the good old province of Ontario where the farmer still has confidence in the resources of our great country. New Ontario offers to-day the greatest field in the world for colonization. The constituency that I have the honour to represent has nearly doubled its population in the last two decades. Throughout that broad section of the northland the farmer is happy and prosperous and new land is continually being taken up by a hardy type of settlers who have gone into that country to remain. Our colonization problem has more to do with the getting of a suitable class of immigrants.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Are these people we would call immigrants— people from outside of Canada?

Mr. LAPIERRE: Not for the most part. Most of them come from elsewhere in Canada. The most prosperous and the happiest in that north country came from the province of Quebec.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: You would not class them as immigrants, then?

Mr. CASGRAIN: They are French; they do not emigrate.

Mr. LAPIERRE: Let me illustrate what occurred in my own constituency. Twenty-five or thirty years ago Father Paradis went to Michigan and induced fifty or sixty families to come into the district which is in the vicinity of Verner. The second generation of these hardy pioneers comprise to-day the most prosperous farmers in Ontario. I invite hon. members, either of the Progressive party or from among those who represent the cities, to look through the train windows as they pass through Nipissing and see what has been accomplished by settlers who were reclaimed from the United States. The same conditions obtain along the three national railways. These hardy settlers followed the lumbering concerns into the wooded lands of the north. They cleared those lands and developed their farms under the most difficult conditions; but, endowed as they were with courage and possessing large families, they have succeeded in transforming that lumbering country into a prosperous and happy farming community. This process of colonization is still going on, but let it not be thought for one moment that the difficulties which the settler has to face in northern Ontario are any less than those which the settler in the West has to overcome. The farmer who has gone into New Ontario has had many obstacles to surmount, and one of his greatest handicaps has been the forest fires from which the western farmer does not suffer. All through that northern section the farmers have established comfortable homes, with large outbuildings, and the value of their lands is constantly growing. In my own constituency the population in 1901 was 24,931; in 1911, it was 43,679; and in 1921, it had risen to 58,525. This constituency is largely rural, and thirty years ago it was almost a wilderness. At the present time the lands contiguous to the three railways which traverse new Ontario are gradually being taken up by settlers of the same class. There has also been a continuous influx of the same type of farmers across the border into the district of Abitibi, in the province of Quebec, and to-day that section of Quebec is peopled by from fifteen to eighteen thousand happy and prosperous farmers. Again I say that if we are going to settle our immigration problem in a satisfactory manner, the class of settlers brought to the land is a paramount consideration; to my mind it forms the crux of the whole situation. The French Canadians in northern Ontario have had to face other difficulties besides those attendant upon the development of the land. The province of Ontario does not give the French Canadian minority the same privileges or the same treatment that the English minority enjoys in the province of Quebec. Nevertheless, those men have clung tenaciously to the lands they have developed, and to-day they still have confidence in the good will of the English speaking majority of Ontario and look forward to an early settlement of this disability which presses upon them so heavily.

There has been no exodus from the farms in northern Ontario. We have there a class of farmers who, during the days of prosperity, laid aside a sufficient amount to carry them through the period of depression. The prosperous farmer in the north listened to the counsels of those more familiar with our economical conditions and to-day are passing through the prevailing hard times without complaint.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): Does my hon. friend mean that the class to whom he refers took the advice of financial organizations and others to provide for the future?

Mr. LAPIERRE: They were largely advised by an independent press, who, knowing their conditions, urged them to prepare for the reaction which must ultimately follow the period of prosperity.

In connection with disabilities from which the farmers in that district may suffer there is one matter to which I wish to draw the attention of the Acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization. At the outlet of lake Timiskaming, during the past winter, lumbering operations have been carried on on a very large scale. At a point on the Ottawa river on the Quebec side, where the stream is quite narrow, six hundred men have taken out 200,000 logs. On the Ontario side, since the 4th of October, one thousand men have taken out 450,000 logs. The results have been that on both sides of the river there are two great areas covered with from four to six feet of slash. On the Quebec side, is located Kippawa Pulp and Paper Company's plant which cost fifteen millions to build and which would be jeopardized were a fire to take place in these immense quantities of slash. I wish to go on record as stating these facts because there is at the present moment a great deal of anxiety among the people of that section of Ontario on account of the conditions I have described.

In conclusion I wish to say that there is one feature about the agricultural conditions in New Ontario which has contributed a great deal to the prosperity of that country; it is the fact that they have a market practically at their own doors. The mining industry has undoubtedly helped very largely towards the successful development of that north country. But even so the government of Ontario have unlimited confidence in the possibilities of the northern district and are now extending the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway to within 130 miles of James Bay. It is safe to say that as soon as this railway is in operation we will see a continuous inflow of immigration into that northern country. There never was a more opportune time for the farmer who is prepared to accept the hardships that necessarily accompany the development of northern lands to go in and settle in that country. Mother nature has been generous but she does not easily give up her treasures. Still we invite that class of settlers to go into the north where the prospects of creating a home under the most favourable conditions now exist and advantages of the most promising character may be reaped.

Mr. CAMPBELL: The feeling that I entertain towards the Acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization cannot be described as sympathy as so many hon. members have expressed it—it can only be expressed as commiseration. Pressed as the minister is on one side by the business interests of the country, to a vey large extent by the press, and by a large section of the population, to institute immediately a vigorous and an energetic immigration campaign, and knowing as he undoubtedly does the inability of the agricultural industry either in eastern Canada or in western Canada to absorb any very large immigrant population at the present time the position he is in is not a very pleasant one.

This debate has been very interesting and instructive. I must congratulate particularly the hon. member for Springfield and the hon. member for Pictou for the very eloquent and very able addresses that they have contributed to this debate, and let me say, Sir, that if to stir up enthusiasm in this chamber, if to disseminate into the atmosphere a spirit of optimism is the most effective way of contributing to this debate, then I would hand the laurels to those two hon. members. But, Sir, it seems to me that a more serious, a more solemn duty rests upon the members of this House than merely making optimistic speeches. I think it is much more important to lay before the committee the facts as we know them in our particular districts than to camouflage the issue in any way. After all, what has this optimistic spirit brought us to in the past? It has been responsible for the building of a third transcontinental railway. It has been responsible for the erection in the city of Winnipeg of that edifice to which the hon. member for Springfield referred, a legislative building that stands the people of Manitoba to-day about $11,000,000. That, Sir, is what some of the people of the West, and of the East too, have experienced, and they want no more of that kind of optimism. I quite realize that to make a speech in what is considered a pessimistic vein, such as was made by the hon. member for Bow River, and in which tone perhaps to a certain extent I will also present my case, is not one that will receive the plaudits of the multitude or the commendations of the press, but I feel it is much more important for me to express the actual feelings of my constituents and for the government to know before it launches actively on any particular immigration policy just what are the conditions prevailing in each section of the country.

The hon. member for Springfield—I regret he is not in his seat—stated that he had been studying agricultural conditions for upwards of fifteen years. Now, Sir, there are two distinctly different schools in which agricultural conditions can be studied. One is in an arm chair in a library, and the other is out in the fields, battling with the elements and trying to make farming pay. He referred to the large farms, to the burden of land that the farmer had bought, as perhaps the principal reason for his present position, and he referred to farming operations as "tickling the soil." I am prepared to grant that there is some force to the contention that the farmer in the West is overloaded with land, but I will not admit that it is entirely his own fault, because what was a proper sized farm three years ago, and could then be made to pay very well, with the large machinery with which they operate in the West, will not pay at the present time with the high rates of interest and the low returns from the products of the farm. During this year, 1922, the farmers of the West, in spite of frost, in spite of hail, in spite of drought, in spite of sow thistle and a thousand and one other difficulties and enemies with which the farmer has to contend, have raised in the three prairie provinces 400,000,000 bushels of wheat. I think that should be sufficient answer to the charge of any uninformed hon. gentleman who says that the farmers of the West are merely tickling the soil.

As to some of the reasons why the farmer is in his present position, let me refer to a chart drawn by Professor Jackson of Toronto University. He takes twenty-five basic manufactured articles and establishes the price of them at 100. Then he takes the price of wheat, and he shows the purchasing power of wheat in so far as these manufactured articles are concerned. This chart covers the years 1919, 1920 and 1921. At the beginning, in 1919, we find the line starts at 85; that is 85 of wheat would purchase 100 of these manufactured articles. In other words, wheat was above its normal purchasing power. Professor Jackson explains that by the fact that the wheat market was then controlled and the price set, and the farmer got in that way a little better than the normal price. From that time the line steadily rises, with an occasional drop, until in December 1921 it reaches 150. By the end of the year it drops to 145, and I think you will find that it is pretty near that point to-day. This means that the farmer who incurred liabilities in the spring of 1919 for which perhaps he had given notes payable in the fall of 1921—and that farmer's name is legion,—found that whereas he could have paid that debt at the time he purchased the goods for 85 bushels of wheat, it took 145 bushels by the time the debt came due. In his observations on this matter Professor Jackson says:

> The recurrence of similar conditions in the wheat market, at any future time, is likely to produce the same result; and the reasoning which has here been applied to Canadian experience is evidently no less applicable to any other young country which fulfils two conditions—whose principal crop is wheat; and whose manufacturing industries are restricted, by protective tariffs or otherwise, mainly to the home market.

It seems to me, Sir, this is perhaps the crux of the situation. When the period of deflation came, the farmer was deflated but the manufacturer was not. The law of supply and demand operated on the farmer's product, but the manufacturer, having a preserve of the home market, having that market guaranteed to him through the protective tariff, was not affected by the law of supply and demand, so that the farmer's purchasing power and his ability to pay off debts already incurred was automatically cut in two.

I might observe that while the farmer is still obliged to sell his wool, his hides and other products in the open market in competition with wool and hides from the Argentine and the United States or any other country, he has to pay approximately from 40 to 50 per cent duty and sales tax on the manufactured articles coming into this country. I think that one of our real difficulties is the heavy tax that lies on the necessaries of life, and I think that is one of the principal reasons why people are seeking new homes in the United States and leaving here by thousands because even if there is no increase in the wage received that same wage will purchase the essential articles of life over there at a very much lower price.

A great many hon. gentlemen have referred to the fact that the United States is a high tariff country. Undoubtedly it is, but I would point out this, that within the confines of the United States is to be found the largest free trade area in the world, and the competition within that country itself is sufficient to give to the consumer and to the producer to a large extent the full benefit of competition.

In comparing the speeches of the hon. member for Springfield and the hon. member for Bow River—and they have been frequently compared in this House—I want to point out that there are geographical differences between the position of the province of Alberta and that of Manitoba. The farther west the farmer lives, the less he gets for his wheat and the more he is obliged to pay for what he buys. Therefore, in that regard Manitoba is in a much more favoured position than Alberta. The farmer of Manitoba is also provided with a fairly good home market, with a city of 300,000 at his door, which supplies him with a very good market for dairy and other small farm products. But even if we take into consideration these facts, are the farmers of Manitoba in such a prosperous condition as one might infer from the speech to which I refer? I have in my hand a copy of the Manitoba Free Press of February 6, 1922. The Free Press is a western paper, imbued with the western spirit, a paper that is always boosting for the West, a paper that believes to-day in a vigorous and energetic immigration policy. Yet, in that issue some very illuminating figures are quoted. After referring to the budget of the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) for the fiscal year 1921-22, it observes that Manitoba's share of the taxation contained in that budget, on a basis of her population, is $28,800,000. To that is added interest on the provincial debt, $8,140,000, taxation in the city of Winnipeg, $9,500,000, and also taxation of the municipalities within the province, $10,750,000, making a total of $57,190,000. It goes on to quote some figures in regard to the cereal crops. I will not weary the committee by quoting them all; but the total value of the cereal crop of Manitoba for that year is shown to be $40,500,000. The paper subtracts this from the total amount of the provincial taxation and interest, and this leaves a deficit of $16,690,000. I do not propose to be an alarmist; but these figures are rather startling when we see that the whole cereal crop of Manitoba in the year 1921 came nearly $17,000,000 short of paying her taxation and interest. It seems to me that the question that we should be considering to-day in all its seriousness is not immigration, but emigration.

I have in my hand a clipping from the Yorkton Enterprise, a paper published in my constituency, and in an editorial in a recent issue, it states:

> Although thousands of people have left Canada for the United States during the past winter, from the self-complacency and indifference exhibited by our legislators at Ottawa—once again ensconced in their magnificent quarters for the transaction of the nation's business—one would imagine that all was well with the country.

Let me say that the handwriting is on the wall for this parliament. This is what the people of western Canada and, I believe, of eastern Canada as well, are thinking of to-day, namely, the problem of emigration, and not that of immigration. From Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island on the east to British Columbia on the west, people are leaving this country in thousands. In a recent newspaper article, I saw the statement that fifty families per week were leaving Nova Scotia. I was reading the Charlottetown Guardian a few days ago, and it stated that in twenty years that island had lost all its natural increase and 1,000 of its population per annum in addition. We have not heard very much from Ontario or Quebec as to these conditions; but I noticed that the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Deslauriers) in his speech a few days ago—this speech was in French and I have just recently read it in English—refers to the very serious emigration from Quebec. There are some illuminating figures in that speech which I would commend to the consideration of some hon. gentlemen in this House.

I have a clipping from this morning's paper, a despatch from Windsor, Ontario, dated March 21, which states:

> Lured by high wages, hundreds of young Canadians are emigrating to the United States. According to the railway and ferry companies, no fewer than eighty families a day are entering the States at Detroit.
>
> On one train arriving here this afternoon from the East there were forty-five young men who said they were on their way to Michigan industrial centers. A majority of the men are between 25 and 40 years of age. Most of them came from Toronto, Hamilton and other cities of eastern Ontario. Lack of work and prospect of high wages, they explained, induced them to leave the Dominion. More than half of the 45 are mechanics connected in some way with the building trades.

We come to the prairie provinces again, and tens of thousands of people have left those provinces for the United States. If I might be pardoned for making a brief reference here to another article in the Free Press, it is a report of a meeting of the United Farmers of Manitoba at Elm Creek on November 14. I notice the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) was present at this meeting. The article states:

> The president read a letter in which the Hon. D. L. McLeod, provincial secretary, suggested co-operative help from the local for distressed and needy farmers, it being understood that in some districts this year, there are many in need of aid. This subject was freely discussed, and a motion carried that local secretary notify the central organization to the effect that Elm Creek is anxious to help.

When the situation in parts of Manitoba is of sufficient seriousness for the provincial secretary to circularise the locals of the United Farmers of Manitoba, soliciting aid on behalf of indigent farmers, surely this is something that should not be ignored and evaded by this House. It seems to me that in considering this situation we are taking a position not much better than that of a certain Emperor of Rome who fiddled while his city was burning. We are playing in this regard a policy of equivocation. I do not want to be understood as opposing a policy of immigration; I do not understand that any hon. gentleman in this section of the House opposes immigration; but what we do stress is the inadvisability of bringing people to Canada under false pretences. I remember some years ago reading in an English paper an article which told a story of a young English immigrant who had been lured to this country by the tale of high wages on the farm and of how easy it was to start farming. He came to Canada and wandered over the prairies and this eastern country looking for work which he was unable to obtain. Finally he worked his passage back to the Old Country, and almost his first act was to shy a brick through the window of a Canadian immigration office in the city of London. Taken before a magistrate, he told his story and he was allowed to go free, I think rightly. In the western prairies to-day there are thousands of people who are harbouring a sense of injustice, who will feel as long as they live that an injury has been done to them; that they were brought to this country under false pretences. This is a spirit that is poisoning their lives and something that they will pass on to their children. Some of them left much more comfortable homes in the Old Country than they will ever hope to obtain here. Some of them threw up good positions, the like of which they cannot obtain here. We should leave the door open for any good sound, healthy immigrant of a good type who wants to come to this country. Let us invite them here; let them come; but do not carry on a campaign in England, Europe, the United States or anywhere else, because then a distinct responsibility rests upon the government for bringing those people in, very often under false pretences. If we refuse to spend money in this way and let things take their natural course, a considerable number of immigrants will come to Canada and become absorbed without any particular difficulty.

Many hon. gentlemen have stressed the fact that in the period from 1900 to 1913, in which we enjoyed unprecedented prosperity, we were able to absorb a very large immigrant population, and they see no reason why that should not be repeated at the present time. Conditions obtaining at that time do not obtain to-day. We were constructing a third transcontinental railway which opened up millions of acres of good arable free land. The immigrant coming to the country was able to secure, without any particular measure of difficulty, a very good farm adjacent to the railway. He was able to establish his family there in a little cabin in which they lived in fair comfort; then he went out to work on the railway or in one of the many building gangs that were operating in the country and was able to come back in the fall with a very substantial bank account. In that way he was able to purchase some horses and the necessary machinery and in a short time he became fairly well established on the farm. During that period it is true he was keeping the farm; the farm was not keeping him. But to-day conditions are reversed. The immigrant coming to this country must purchase his land and he has not the privilege of going out and securing work at good wages as in those days. So far, thank Providence, we have had no breadlines in the country; but if a policy of immigration on a vigorous scale were prosecuted we might very easily have those conditions. It is pointed out regularly that by additions to our population we could reduce our debt. That, however, does not always hold good. I can indicate some concrete instances in the West where additions to population by the opening up of new districts have resulted in actually increasing the taxation per head. When a new district is opened up the first few settlers are able to find their way in by wagon trail and there is not much expense. In a little while some more people come in; the roads are fenced off and a highway must be built through a country that is partly timber and partly swamp. This is a very expensive undertaking. The provincial governments are appealed to and a large amount of money is expended on the work. Then a municipality is organized and large sums are borrowed. Later on, come schools, with a borrowing of more money, and still later a branch line, accompanied by the opening of new towns and the building of new elevators, involving further borrowing with increased indebtedness.

The member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler), who, I am sorry, is not in his seat, has a suggestion to make by way of solving the troubles of the West. He advocated the bringing in of settlers and the building up of industries in the West that would absorb our agricultural products and build up home markets. Is the hon. gentleman aware that in the province of Saskatchewan alone this year we raised six times the amount of wheat that can be consumed by the whole population of Canada, and in the three prairie provinces ten times as much wheat as all the Canadian people would require? In these three provinces the total wheat produced was about 400,000,000 bushels, which would feed 80,000,000 people. Now, supposing that we got 80,000,000 people into the country and that we started manufacturing industries on a large scale, I would ask my hon. friend where we would sell all those manufactured goods. As to the urgent needs of the country there can be no question. Our public debt is over four and a half billions of dollars, for the federal debt is only a part of the public debt.

One phase of the situation that appears serious to me is the fact that so much of our debt is owed in other countries. Of the Canadian Pacific Railway common stock alone only twenty per cent is held in Canada, and so far as my information goes practically none of their bonds, debentures or preferred stock. It simply means that we are taxing ourselves very heavily, to pay dividends to this corporation, while practically all that money goes out of the country. It is therefore patent that if we are ever going to get the country on a safe and solid foundation, its basic industry, agriculture, must be placed on a more prosperous footing than at present obtains. "There can be no prosperity", said Sir Wilfrid Laurier, "that does not have its genesis in the soil of our country." The hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey) suggested the extension of the housing scheme to the farms, and the erection of $2,500 cottages for the use of farm labourers. One of the real difficulties of the farmer in the West, and the hon. gentleman pointed it out himself, is the fact that the farm is already unable to pay its way. I quite agree that the farm labourer is as much entitled to live in a $2.500 cottage as is the worker of the city. But, sir, the farming industry cannot afford to make this possible at the present time. If the government wish to undertake a real colonization policy I am not opposing it; but it will have to be on the basis of financial assistance to the settler. The farmer who comes in and buys land has to struggle against short payments and a high rate of interest, and thousands of these men are being foreclosed on to-day, or, seeing that it is impossible to meet their payments, are moving to the United States or to our cities. It appears to me that if some means were provided by which these men could liquidate the debts with which they are faced to-day, and could have their total indebtedness spread over a period of years at a low rate of interest, thousands of the settlers now leaving Canada could be saved to the country, while on the other hand a great many others could be induced to come in. We hear a great deal about the trek of the young men from the farms to the cities. I think the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) referred to this as the lure of the arc lights. I know hundreds of young men of that class, and in the great majority of cases they would be only too willing to remain on the farm could they but see any opportunity of owning a farm of their own. But anyone desiring to obtain a farm must pay down a considerable amount of money; and in addition he is faced with high taxation, a short term and a high rate of interest. So that it seems an utter impossibility for him to establish himself. I know that thousands of young men would come back to the farm to-day were they offered an opportunity to purchase farms at reasonably low rates in districts already settled, and provided their payments were spread over a long term of years at a low rate of interest.

The extension of the Soldier Settlement Board system was advocated by my hon. friend the member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) and I heartily agree with him. I think that is the only policy which is possible to-day. It is not a new policy; it has been successfully carried out in New Zealand, and it is the policy that has made Denmark what she is to-day, one of the most prosperous agricultural countries in the world. This policy was tried out with unqualified success in the province of Prince Edward Island. Between the years 1866 and 1875 the province bought out most of the land in the island and re-sold it to the tenant farmers, giving them a long period of years in which to pay and fixing the interest at a low rate, and the history of that policy shows that it re-established the whole agricultural industry in Prince Edward Island.

In conclusion, I want to say that I am not an alarmist, neither am I a pessimist. I have an abiding faith and abounding confidence in the future of western Canada. We have the richest of soil, and in the north we have an abundance of fuel and timber and as well a bountiful rainfall. Nature, indeed, has been most lavish in her gifts. So that with some economic readjustment, with the fiscal changes that must come about if we are to get upon a proper basis of prosperity, and with a sane colonization policy such as has been advocated by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, I have no fear for the future. But, Mr. Chairman, we must shun this false optimism as we would avoid the plague. It was a spirit of this kind that left not only over western Canada, but some years ago also over eastern Canada a path of ruin and destruction in its wake such as we find in the track of a cyclone. Real estate oil and mining booms brought ruin in their train. The people have had enough of them. Ill-founded optimism is a wily, elusive will-o'-the-wisp that leads not to the high road of prosperity but beckons us further and deeper into the bog and the morass. Let us rather face the future with courage, tempered with caution, taking due note of the handwriting on the wall, paying due heed to conditions around about us, and I have no doubt we shall see a way through.

Mr. COOTE: Mr. Chairman, this has been to me the most interesting discussion which I have heard since I became a member of this House. I think no speaker has taken part without adding at least something new. I suppose some members would think that nothing new can be added at this late stage of the debate, but I think I have something which is at least a little bit original.

It is always interesting to me to hear hon. members, particularly ministers and lawyers, discuss the problems of the farm and attempt to explain why people leave the country for the city. It is especially interesting if you know the study such gentlemen have devoted to the problem has been, as the last speaker (Mr. Campbell) said, from an arm-chair. I do not know that I am very well qualified to discuss the question of why people leave the farm, as I have only been on the farm for about ten years.

It is impossible to refer to all the statements made during the course of this debate with which one may have disagreed, but one statement which struck me as needing some discussion was that made by the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke). It is given at page 1153 of Hansard, where he says:

> The one depressing fact in the prairie provinces is that farmers are loaded down with debt. Were it not so, there would be nothing disheartening in the situation, but that is in reality the position.

Now, Mr. Chairman, with the first sentence I do not disagree, but the second I cannot allow to go unchallenged, namely, "Were it not so"—this debt—"there would be nothing disheartening in the situation." I think there is something very disheartening in the situation, and I shall endeavour to prove it. I do not wish the committee to take my word for it, and I shall quote first the opinion of the hon. minister himself (Mr. Stewart). Speaking at Ottawa, recently, he said:

> The market at home is overstocked with produce, which cannot be sold profitably because of the high overhead of those doing business. This is the result of deflation in some lines, and not in others. Particularly affected by these conditions is the farmer.

As I want to be as brief as possible I shall leave the quotation right there, and quote very shortly from the annual report of the Bank of Commerce, in which Sir John Aird, the general manager, states:

> It is said that if we are to secure outside assistance it must be in the form of selected immigration of men who will go on the land and help to bring our large areas of unsettled, fertile lands under cultivation, thereby providing traffic for our railways and a home market for our manufactures. But of what avail will it be to place these newcomers on the land if those already settled there are unable to make farming pay?

If hon. gentlemen do not care to listen to farmer members, they might at least listen to the opinion of Sir John Aird and try to visualize the conditions that would cause him to make that statement. To bear out the correctness of his view, I propose to show the chances that an immigrant going on the land has to-day compared with the chances which we had ten years ago. I have here a statement containing the prices of four implements which any farmer must own if he is going to make a living on the land. The prices are for 1912 and 1922 respectively, and I want to tell hon. members how many bushels of wheat it took to buy these implements in 1912 as compared with 1922. First of all, comes a gang plow—

The CHAIRMAN: I would draw the hon. member's attention to the fact that the item under consideration is for salaries, and I am afraid he is getting dangerously near the point of his remarks becoming irrelevant to this particular vote. I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member in the midst of his address, but there is the danger to which I have referred.

Mr. COOTE: I am quite willing to bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: I am not giving a ruling. I am making the suggestion that there may be some danger of irrelevancy.

Mr. COOTE: Well, Mr. Chairman, I notice that this item asks for an increase of $25,000 for outside salaries. I do not think there is any sense of our increasing this vote unless the committee is prepared to change the policy under which the country is retrogressing at the present time, and for that reason I think that anything which bears on the chances of success of an immigrant is relevant to the discussion. But I am quite willing to bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, if you will so rule.

The CHAIRMAN: I am not making any such ruling. I am merely suggesting that it is quite possible for the hon. member to go too far in the illustration he is about to give in support of the position he takes in regard to the policy of the department. But if he wishes to make his illustration and draw an inference from it there can be no objection.

Mr. COOTE: The statement I have prepared is made up from prices of implements which I obtained last October from the manager of a wholesale implement warehouse in Calgary. The prices of grain which I have used in this calculation I secured from the United Grain Growers of Calgary. They are the prices which prevailed at Cayley where I happened to sell my own wheat. These are the average October prices. In 1912 a gang plow could have been purchased for 142 bushels of wheat; in 1922 it would take 210 bushels. A single disc drill, 20-run, could have been purchased in 1912 for 220 bushels; in 1922 it would take 301 bushels. An 8-foot binder could have been purchased in 1912 for 264 bushels; in 1922 it would take 386 bushels. A Moline wagon and triple box could have been purchased in 1912 for 158 bushels; in 1922 it would have cost 256 bushels. Taking the total number of bushels to purchase these implements, we find in 1912 it would require 784 bushels, whereas in 1922 the amount would be increased to 1,153 bushels.

I have also worked out in pounds of prime butcher steers the purchase price of these same four implements. I shall only give the totals because I do not want to unnecessarily take up the time of the committee. In 1913—I could not get the figures for 1912 in this case—taking the average November price on the stock yards in Calgary, 8,560 pounds would be required as against 19,831 pounds in 1922. If the price of cows were used, the comparison would be much more startling, as choice cows were quoted: November, 1913, at $5.35 per hundred pounds; in November, 1922, at from $2.25 to $2.50 per hundred pounds. I have another statement showing the number of bushels of rye it would have taken to purchase a threshing outfit in 1914 and in 1922. In this statement the price used for rye is the average price from 1910 to 1914. To purchase a separator with 40-inch cylinder, it took in 1914, 2,775 bushels of rye, and in 1922, 4,445 bushels. To purchase a 40-horsepower tractor in 1914 it took 7,017, bushels and in 1922, 9,181 bushels. To this 1922 price, sales tax of 2¼ per cent would have to be added; it is not included in this calculation.

A great many farmers, particularly in western Canada, make most of their purchases from mail-order house catalogues. I have made up a list of articles which the immigrant coming to this country might order from Eaton's or one of these houses. There is quite a list of articles, from implements to clothes and shoes.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. COOTE: Mr. Chairman, before the committee took recess I was warned by you that I was liable to get out of order by reading certain statements. I do not wish, of course, to have any disagreement with the Chair, and I will try to limit these statements as much as possible. I think, possibly, I did not explain sufficiently why I wish to present these statements. If I might refer again to the statement, which I think was made by the minister in Ottawa some time ago, in reference to the difficulty in which the farmer finds himself, I want to show why it is so difficult for the farmer to exist, and to argue from that that the immigrant coming to this country would have a hard job to exist. The reason for that, Mr. Chairman, is this: The farmer is in a class by himself to this extent; he can only purchase what he needs for his living by the products which he raises on his farm, and I was endeavouring, through the statements I was presenting to show that the produce of the farmer had lost in purchasing power compared with ten years ago. One reason why I do that is because the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) said here a few days ago that:

> Before the war tariffs were not ruining the West, the West was getting along fairly well; and as soon as the conditions respecting prices, particularly of eastern products, get back where they should be the farmers of the West will prosper, there will be no ruining of the East to help out the West or vice versa.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to refer hon. members to a statement made in 1911 by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition who was then the member for Portage la Prairie. As reported at page 1931 of Hansard for that year he said:

> I do not say that a reduction will, to any very enormous extent, affect the price—

That is the price of agricultural implements.

> —I believe it will materially, and I think it will render some relief to, particularly, the farmers of the West, many of whom, notwithstanding any statements that have been made here, are struggling between success and failure every hour.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if many of the farmers of the West were struggling between success and failure some ten years ago I want to try and give this House an idea of the position those farmers must be in to-day. I think

I will be in a position to show that the man who was struggling ten years ago is in such a position that he will almost have to cease to struggle. I will not read the list which I referred to before recess, except to say that this list covers quite a lot of articles that are required by every immigrant and by every farmer. In making this list I have taken from the catalogue to which I referred a similar article in almost every case or if not similar, one as nearly similar as it was possible to find, and I will give you very briefly the purchasing power of a farmer's produce in buying this list of goods in 1912 as compared with 1922. To purchase this list in 1912 would have taken 795 bushels of wheat; to-day it would take 1,132 bushels. If he purchased this list with the proceeds of his barley it would have taken 1,386 bushels in 1912 and in 1922 it would have taken 2,075 bushels. If he purchased this list with oats it would have required 1,816 bushels in 1912, and to-day 2,490 bushels. If he purchased it with the proceeds of his steers it would have taken 8,430 pounds in 1912 and in 1922 it would have taken 20,511 pounds. If he purchased it with the proceeds of his fat heifers it would have taken 9,580 pounds in 1912 whereas to-day it would take 29,058 pounds. There is one bright spot in the farmer's market to-day and that is the price of hogs compared with ten years ago. Hogs are now about $2 per hundred pounds higher than they were when I made this list out. Nevertheless it would have taken but 7,520 pounds of hogs in 1912 to purchase this list of goods whereas in 1922 the amount required would be 9,686 pounds.

I could give some more statements along that line but I do not want to occupy the time of the committee unduly; I simply want to impress upon hon. members the position that the agricultural immigrant is going to be in when he comes here as compared with the position which we homesteaders were in ten years ago. If the position is as I have tried to describe it, through the medium of these statements it seems to me that it is economic folly to spend money to bring farmers here under present conditions. Surely no intelligent class of people can be induced to invest their money in agriculture until such times as there is a possibility of securing at least some small return on the investment made. Nevertheless I do not wish to give the committee the impression that the situation is hopeless. We can still produce as much as we ever did and we are willing to do it if we can in turn get our living out of farming. Even if we were producing without a profit, but simply not making a loss, I would be willing, for my part to go on producing. I do not think it is wise at this time to spend a lot of money trying to bring immigrants into this country, particularly if it is imperative that they shall be agriculturists. We already have settlers from every country from which we can hope to secure these immigrants; and if you make the people who are now here satisfied, and provide for them better conditions than in the countries from which they came, they will send word back to their friends and we will have a satisfactory flow of emigration from other lands into this country. But we cannot get immigration unless we make conditions better.

The next question which would naturally arise is, how is this to be done? How is the cost of living going to be brought down to where the agriculturist of this country can purchase his living with the produce of his labour? Let me give one example to show how we are suffering from high prices as compared with the price of our own produce. I sold my wheat this year for less than a cent-and-a-half a pound. A few months later I had occasion to buy some rolled wheat and was charged eighteen cents a pound for it. That is a serious condition of affairs surely, when the price for rolled wheat is twelve times higher than the price of the whole wheat itself. Surely it is time for the manufacturers of this country to take some notice of that fact. If I might again quote from Sir John Aird's speech at the annual meeting of the Bank of Commerce:

> The cost of our manufactures cannot indefinitely continue to be higher than the farmer and the majority of the consumers in the home market can afford to pay. Not even a revival in foreign trade, unlikely as this appears to be on a large scale in the near future can avail to benefit us if the cost of what we have to sell is higher than in other countries as well or better situated with regard to foreign markets than we are.

He goes on to say that both capital and labour must co-operate in seeing that costs are reduced. It seems to me there is no body of people in Canada who could bring about a reduction in the cost of living so soon as the bankers themselves if they would do it. If they would mete out to the manufacturers of this country the same treatment they mete out to the farmers, we would soon have a reduction in the price of manufactured goods. The banks say to the farmer when he has his wheat produced: You had better sell your wheat and pay off your loan. If the banks would say that to the manufacturer, tell him to sell off his stock of manufactured goods for whatever the market would stand, we would be able to get the goods at a price we could afford to pay. I do not suppose the banks will do this because in this country the banks are controlled by the same class of people that control our manufacturing establishments. I am rather afraid that the same set of men are controlling this government, and if that is the case, we shall not get much relief. Possibly I am mistaken: I hope I am. I hope that the government before this session closes will by the legislation it brings down, and particularly the budget, show that it is going to secure for the people of this country a lower cost of living. You will find in the 1919 platform of the Liberal party that they believed a lower cost of living can be secured in this way, because that platform contains this plank:

> That the best interests of Canada demand that substantial reductions of the burdens of customs taxation be made with a view to the accomplishing of two purposes of the highest importance: first, diminishing the very high cost of living which presses so severely on the masses of the people; second, reducing the cost of the instruments of production in the industries based on the natural resources of the Dominion, the vigorous development of which is essential to the progress and prosperity of our country.

I would suggest to the minister that he might very well postpone the consideration of these estimates for the Immigration department until after the budget has been brought down. Then we would know whether there was any use spending money trying to get immigrants into this country or not. I am glad he has allowed the second item to stand for some time, and I hope he will see his way clear to postponing consideration of the Immigration estimates until after the budget is down.

There have been so many remarks made during this debate as to the necessity or desirability of filling up the vacant lands in this country that I want to refer briefly to that. I think it is only fair to ask those hon. members who are so anxious to have those vacant lands settled, why they want these vacant lands occupied. Have not the farmers who are here now done pretty well? Is it because we have not produced enough? I have a table here which I would like to present, but I am very much afraid of the Chairman so I will just point out that the production of the farms of Canada last year in grains, field crops, cattle, hogs, sheep and milk totalled $1,399,241,527. You will notice that this does not include fruit and a great many other small items produced on the farms. The value of this production gives no adequate idea of the amount of our production. Let me give just one instance which I have taken from the report of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. It shows that for the year ending March 31, 1921, we exported to the United States cattle to the number of 295,000 odd, at a total value of $21,000,000 odd, or an average of $73 per head, and for the year ending March 31, 1922, we exported 172,981 head of cattle to the United States, valued at $3,980,801, making an average of $23 per head. I hope hon. gentlemen will consider what that drop in the value of cattle in one year from $73 to $23 means to the farmers of Canada. Yet hon. gentlemen get up in this House and ask why our farms are mortgaged. What is the reason for that big drop in values? It is because the farmers of Canada are dependent on a foreign market for the price of their products. The hon. member for Fort William dwelt at some length on the value of the home market. I wish to assure the House that we would like very much to have a home market, but we have not got it. We have glutted it so often that no one can blame us for being very skeptical of the ability of the home market to absorb our products. In spite of the fact that we have not got this home market some hon. gentlemen are anxious to fill up our vacant lands. When that is done, what are you going to do with the produce from those lands? That is the question we want answered, and no one in this House has answered it so far in this debate. I have the opinion of an experienced grain man to the effect, that if we had had this year the same average yield of wheat that we had in 1915 the price of our wheat would be 20 cents a bushel less than it is to-day. Some hon. gentlemen will say that that is a very unlikely thing to happen, but let me tell you, on my own farm this year—I happen to live in Alberta—I had a crop of wheat averaging 34 bushels to the acre. I do not believe any hon. member in this House had a better crop. I have no objection to the Acting-Minister of Immigration putting that statement in the literature which he sends out to the countries from which he hopes to get immigrants. I am ready to back it up with my affidavit.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): What will the hon. member for Bow River say to that?

Mr. COOTE: I will be very glad if the minister will see that he is made acquainted with that fact. But the sorry part of it is that if we all had a crop of 34 bushels to the acre the price of wheat, almost as sure as we are here, would drop down to the price of stock feed. There would be nothing to stop it till it got down to that point. I think it is only a fair proposition that if we are to have our vacant lands filled up with agriculturists, you should at least open to us on free terms every market that is available. The only foreign market that amounts to much to-day as regards our wheat and cattle is the market in Great Britain. I do not think I need remind the committee that Great Britain to-day is in fairly hard circumstances, because she has an immense debt to pay to the United States; she is largely dependent for her prosperity upon foreign markets, and the markets to which she usually exports much of her goods have had their purchasing power very seriously curtailed on account of the trouble in Europe. I do not wish to stress this point too far, because I think it is an unpopular one. There are in this House many who seem to believe that all we need to do to get prosperity back to Canada is to produce; but we do not have that example set to us by the manufacturers of this country. When they have produced a little surplus of goods, they lock the door; they tell their workmen to stay away until they get some of those goods sold. The farmer has not done that. The farmer has produced to the very limit of his credit, without any guarantee of even seven per cent dividends, and I do not know of any other class in Canada which has done that. In spite of that fact, the only solution that is offered for our difficulties in Canada seems to be to bring in more farmers to compete with us who are already here, because if you can bring in enough to increase our production of wheat and cattle by 30 per cent, you will succeed only in lowering the price. A gentleman whom I met in my constituency who was a member of the former parliament and who is generally credited with being a hard-headed business man, said to me two years ago: "I do not see why farmers complain so much about so many people leaving the land." He said: "The more that leave the land, the better for the rest of you who are left on it." Hon. gentlemen can easily understand his line of reasoning, and that is the line of reasoning adopted by almost every other class in Canada. That is, they want their own numbers limited, but they want the farmers' numbers unlimited. We have heard a great deal in this country, particularly in the last year and a half, about class legislation; but I think this proposal is getting very near class legislation.

I have no objection whatever to immigration. I think every man who is a good, moral, physically sound and decent citizen, should be allowed to come into this country; but I do not think people should be brought in here under false representations, and I do not think the efforts of this country should be limited to securing immigrants of one particular class. That is most unfair. If I were looking at the matter from a strictly farmer's standpoint—and I hope I am not—I would say that what we need in this country is, not immigration of farmers, but immigration of people who will eat what the farmers are now producing. We can produce; I think we are producing almost enough now in this country to feed 20,000,000 people, and we can produce enough to feed an almost unlimited number. We produced in Alberta this year, although Alberta has a bad name, more wheat than the people of Canada can eat. You must find some place to put that produce, and until you do that, why lay the stress on immigration of farmers? I really cannot see the fairness of this, and more than that I cannot see where much profit is going to come from it.

Mr. MacLAREN: Is there nothing but wheat that the farmers can grow? Do they not grow other products as well as wheat?

Mr. COOTE: Yes, they do; but I have given the committee to-night the purchasing power of many things that the farmers produce, and in none of those that I quoted have we got back within even a reaching distance of 1911. I would refer the hon. gentleman to the statement of his leader which I quoted a little while ago, that in 1911 many farmers, particularly in the West, were struggling between success and failure every hour. I would also refer him to the fact that the cattle market is worse than the wheat market, and as regards cattle production, I will guarantee that Alberta, if you give us two or three years' notice, can furnish all the cattle that all the people in Canada can eat. I am not one whit afraid to make that statement. I am going to anticipate another question at this point. I presume some hon. member will tell me that we should make butter; but if all the farmers of Alberta go into the dairy business, they can supply Canada with all the butter that she can eat. I do not think the proposition is a hopeless one. I believe, if every other class in Canada would do as well as the farmers who are now here are doing and have done for the last five or six years, we would soon return to prosperity in this country. But as I said before, the farmer is the only man who has produced to the limit, put his produce on the market and taken what he could get for it. He has hoarded up no farm produce, and very few farmers have hoarded up any money.

The immigration policy of this country has always been, so far as I have any recollection, directed to bringing into Canada more farmers. We had the soldier settlement scheme in this country to put soldiers on the land. I always thought that was a little bit unfair to the rest of the soldiers, and I am not going to enlarge on that now. But I want to point out that in Canada we have always laid great stress on production in agriculture. We have spent millions of dollars every year on experimental farms and the promotion of agriculture generally, and the emphasis has always been on production. Practically all our efforts have been directed to greater production, with apparently no effort being made to get us a market.

To keep strictly in order, I want to say just a word or two about retaining people in this country. That has been gone over pretty thoroughly; but one question has not, so far as I know, been touched on, and I want to deal with it very briefly. It is in regard to the people who are leaving this country to get rid of their debts. I know I am on dangerous ground as regards this; but you will find, I think, in the minister's own speech, some reference to a certain percentage of farmers who are bankrupt. Quite a number of our people are leaving this country with the idea that that is the only way in which they can get away from their debts. They know they are bankrupt and that if they stay here and should be able to make some money, it is liable to be garnisheed by their creditors. Under present conditions many men, when they go to a trustee in bankruptcy are advised something to this effect by the trustee:

> Before we could undertake to handle an assignment in bankruptcy in this matter, we would have to be advanced the sum of fifty dollars for the payment of preparation of documents, registration and advertising of notices, mailing of notices to creditors and the drawing of statutory declarations. If you are prepared to forward us this amount we shall, upon hearing from you, send you the papers duly prepared for signature.

The only difference is that some trustees will not accept fifty dollars; they ask seventy-five dollars, or maybe more. The unfortunate part of it is that a great many of these people have not even the $50 to hand to the trustee in bankruptcy in order to have their assignment taken over by him. I would appeal to the government to appoint trustees for certain districts, to be paid by the government and to whom a man might make an assignment in bankruptcy if he so desired. I believe that money could be better spent that way than by paying or assisting to pay the passage of some immigrant to this country, because many people who are here already would be glad to remain in the country if they could get some relief from their debts, debts which in many cases have been contracted not through any lack of industry on the part of these people but more by reason of poor crops, drought and so forth. The minister I think will realize the necessity for something of this kind. I do not know whether he will agree with me that this trustee should be paid by the government, but in any case I would invite him to consider the point whether it would not be better to spend money in the way I have suggested than in trying to bring new people to the country. I would call attention to a statement that appeared in the Ottawa Journal last night to the effect that this year's quota of 77,000 immigrants from the British Isles will be exhausted by next month, according to Harry Landis assistant commissioner of immigration at the port of New York. Perhaps it would not be out of place for me to suggest that the minister might arrange with the United States to have all immigrants whom they cannot take in sent here for examination and admittance if they should prove desirable. This article goes on to say that a number of Russian immigrants to the United States have been refused admission, and it might be possible for some of these people to come here if they should prove desirable citizens.

In closing, I would make a suggestion to the government, particularly to the Minister of Finance, (Mr. Fielding) because I think the matter of success or failure of the farmer immigrant lies very largely in his hands. I think his success depends upon his having a lower cost of living and access to a larger market than we have at present. The only large market outside our own to which we have free access is that of Great Britain, and I believe that my hon. friend, if he would do his duty, should give Great Britain free access to our market in exchange. That would help the farming industry in this country more than all the other legislation I can think of that could be brought down at the present time. If the Minister of Finance does anything less than this he will not be doing his duty to this country.

Mr. STANSELL: Somewhere, Mr. Chairman, I have heard the remark "I had not intended to speak on this subject, but it does seem to me that an item of this kind should not be rushed through the House without discussion." I have no desire to embarrass the minister, because I think he deserves sympathy. It has been suggested that no man in Canada to-day could administer his department with entire satisfaction to this House and to the country. I believe that is correct. I do think, however, that it could be administered with a little more satisfaction to the House and the country than we have promise of so far. I have a recollection that a wish has been expressed by the minister himself during the progress of the debate that he had some of the qualifications of a noted leader mentioned in Scripture. Most of us will readily recall that when Moses was surrounded by difficulties, amounting in some cases almost to rebellion on the part of his followers, it was a common thing for him to take counsel of his brother Aaron; and when I saw the serious and prolonged conference this afternoon between the minister and the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) I wondered whether history was repeating itself. I sincerely hope that this conference between the minister and his political relative once removed, will provide him with that necessary information to enable him to deal with this question with finality next Tuesday.

There is no question that the matter of immigration is of the greatest importance to-day. This is well demonstrated by the interest that has been evinced in the subject during the course of this debate. I must admit at once that it is a question of such importance that had I the ability, I could not deal with it in the limited time at my disposal to-night. However, there are one or two phases of it upon which I wish to touch briefly. Undoubtedly, there is a feeling of nervousness on the part of some interests, and individuals in this country, who take the view that at the present juncture immigration is not desirable in the best national interest. Some have said that owing to Canada's financial situation immigration is not desirable now. This may or may not be true, but I can say without hesitation that, unpleasant as circumstances may be in regard to many lines of endeavour, in regard to many interests and professions in Canada, I still believe that conditions in this country are very much better than they are in any other country in the world, notwithstanding all that has been said to the contrary. There is some apprehension on the part of labour, I believe, that immigration would produce more unemployment, while agriculturists fear that it might result in over-production. The suggestion has also been made to-day that the cause of the trouble is to be found in the tariff. This opens up a large question with which I do not propose to deal. It is possible that my views would not accord with those of some hon. gentlemen in this House, yet I fancy that if we could wipe out our tariff at one stroke conditions in Canada still would not be anything approaching the millenium. While there have been some objections to immigration, I believe myself that in the national interest we do need more people to-day, although I am not prepared to say that immigration should be directed entirely toward the farm. I believe Canada is, or is destined to become, a country almost entirely self-supporting. Therefore we need a balanced immigration. Immigration of this kind would be less likely to disturb conditions and lead to the results that some hon. members evidently fear.

In advancing a few reasons why I personally am not apprehensive in respect to immigration at the present time, may I be pardoned if I mention a few immigrants with whom I have become more or less familiar? During recent years twenty-four immigrants, mostly from the United Kingdom, came here to seek their fortune in a country which they believed provided greater oportunity for their ambition than the Old Land offered. Most of them came without means and without having friends here—practically strangers in a strange land. Yet they have not only made a living, they have prospered to a considerable extent and to-day are in comfortable circumstances, if not in affluence. In adition to that they have been honoured by the constituencies in which they have made their homes, and now ocupy seats in the House of Commons. I should like to know if any one of these twenty-four gentlemen, most of whom are members of the party seated to my left, will get up to-day and say that the country that has so welcomed and honoured them should now put up the bars and say to the world: No one else need apply; conditions are so bad that we do not recommend anyone else to come here.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Does the hon. member suggest that anyone in this quarter of the House has advocated putting up the bars and keeping immigrants out?

An hon. MEMBER: Certainly.

Mr. STANSELL: I did not say so. I asked if any of those twenty-four gentlemen would advocate such a policy. However in attempting to answer the question of my hon. friend, I would say that some of the speeches made on this subject sounded dangerously like the advocacy of such a policy. I am willing to admit that conditions are not as bright in Canada to-day with our farmers as we would like to have them. I am willing to go further: I submit that if we in this House attempt to deal with the question of immigration, or with any other question affecting our national interest, it is of the highest importance that we first try to understand, as far as may be possible, the difficulties under which each section of the country labours. There can be no satisfactory solution of the problem so long as we each feel that the other party in interest does not know what he is talking about. This question must be approached in the same spirit as all other national questions—a spirit of compromise and sympathy.

I have heard during the course of this debate and in other debates too, a great deal about the wonderful natural resources possessed by this country. Undoubtedly we are greatly blessed in this respect. But, Sir, is there any possible way in which we can even approach the proper development of these vast natural resources without a greater population than we have at present? As this question affects our farmers, let me say there are two opportunities open to men engaged in any line of production, and particularly to farmers. In order to make farming profitable we must secure wider and better markets, or else lessen our cost of production. I believe that the prospects for higher prices in the near future are not very bright. Therefore it is up to us by all means possible to reduce our production costs. I know that in my own section—and surely the same condition must apply to the West—if we had more men on the land wages should be a little lower, resulting in a little lower cost of production than has obtained during the last three or four years. So viewed from any angle a properly balanced immigration should be beneficial to Canada.

There may be a difference of opinion as to how we should proceed to secure such immigration. Personally I believe an immigration policy to be effective should not be spasmodic but should be a steadily continued policy conducted along sound lines. I think the Acting Minister of Immigration (Mr. Stewart) stated in answer to a question that about $269,000 was to be expended this year in advertising. At the moment I do not propose to question the wisdom of this expenditure, but I want to point out a factor that I think is vitally necessary and supplemental to advertising, and that is to see that the quality of our goods is such that our customers will continue to purchase. In other words, no government should attempt to deal with this important question of immigration without bearing in mind these two aspects, each complementary to the other, namely, the desirability of attracting immigration; and the retention of the immigrants so attracted. To attempt to deal with immigration from the one angle alone is in my judgment simply an admission of incompetence. I have a high opinion of the energy of a man who attempts to fill a bottomless pail with water, but a mighty poor opinion of his judgment. Therefore, I believe it is the duty of the government before attempting to stimulate immigration to study first the conditions which cause the loss of immigrants after they reach our shores. No doubt in all countries immigration is accompanied by a certain amount of emigration; and while Canada has suffered from emigration in the past, still I believe lately we have been losing in greater proportion than is consonant with our national welfare. Therefore, while I do not wish to depreciate the value of advertising, no money spent upon it at the present time can compare in results with the money spent on a stamp that carries to the Old Land a letter from a satisfied immigrant. A satisfied customer in this, as in all other businesses, is the best advertisement.

Now, in my judgment this question should be handled entirely by the minister and his department, and not by private enterprise. I have not a great deal of faith in a combination of the two. I have seen the results of immigration to this country due to private enterprise. Circulars depicting conditions in the most glowing colours were distributed in Great Britain and other countries and a very desirable class of immigrants was attracted here, but they were settled in localities where success was practically an impossibility, and the main welcome extended to them was a scramble to relieve them of surplus cash under the guise of supplying them with necessary equipment. They were, in short, bled white by the very speculators who brought them here. The advertising that that class of settler distributes from this country is of the most damaging kind.

There is another class of advertising, of which I speak, perhaps, with some reluctance. We have had during last session and this, a kind of advertising distributed throughout this House and the country by the representatives of the people. I do not for a moment doubt the truth but I do very much question the wisdom of it. I do not know how any country or any business could make a success if in connection with it the kind of advertising was carried on that we have distributed in the last year and a half. If I were engaged in a business, which, as it likely would be at this time, was labouring under financial difficulty, I would not send out salesmen at a salary of $4,000 a year to proclaim everywhere my financial condition, and then have any hope of surviving. I am in sympathy with those who are subject to the conditions that I believe exist in the West, but I am not in favour of publishing our family troubles to the world, because I believe, as I said at the beginning, that conditions in other countries are worse than they are in Canada. The vital need of the Canadian people to-day is a little more faith in themselves and their country, and an inclination to dwell a little more on the bright spots than is the case at present.

We have heard some very doleful tales with respect to conditions in the West and also in other parts of Canada, but I am sure that we could at the same time make public accounts of outstanding successes on the part of farmers in all sections of the country. I am willing to admit that conditions may not be as good now as they were formerly, but surely in this great country, with all the resources it has, it is not the part of wisdom, it is not the part of good business or good judgment, to advertise to the world that we are in the deplorable condition that some hon. members feel impelled to portray to the committee. There are certain conditions which may accelerate this movement of people from our borders, and it should be the duty of the government to study the whole question from every angle and attempt to apply a remedy. I venture to suggest that if by the exercise of stringent economy there could be a slight lessening of the burden of taxation resting upon the people to-day; if there could be even a small surplus reported by the hon. the Minister of Finance, it would be a hopeful sign that would do a great deal to attract attention to us and bring us a most desirable class of immigrants.

I am not, Sir, a believer in immigration attracted by over-coloured advertising, because that kind of inducement appeals to a class of people—unfortunately, to be found in almost every country—who wish to get rich quickly, who wish to get something for nothing. The class of people we want in this country, the ones who will do the most good, are those who come without capital, if you wish, or better still, with capital, but with plenty of ambition and a determination to work and to succeed. There is room in this Dominion for thousands, yes, for millions of that class of people. Many of them have come to our shores in the past and have succeeded here and contributed a great deal to the building up of our nation, and still more could be accommodated. We need therefore a policy of immigration not based on financial exploitation—or corporationist greed—but rather do we need a national policy based on sound business principles and having in view the best interests and requirements of Canadian citizenship.

Mr. HALBERT: My first word—and you, Sir, and practically all the rest of the members of this committee will be glad, I know, to hear it—is that I shall not detain the committee for more than ten minutes. I had not intended to enter into this dis-
9 p.m. cussion, but I do so now for two reasons. The first is that I thought the minister might become convinced, from the speeches he has heard, that all the hardships among the farmers exist in the West, and observing the yearning and pathetic look on the face of the minister I was afraid he might decide to spend the money asked for in his immigration estimates on the prairie provinces before I could tell him that there were a few farmers in Ontario who were not making ends meet.

The hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Stansell) said that the immigrants who came to this country a few years ago had been bled white. A few days ago I happened upon a Canadian government report giving information on immigration for the year 1881. One paragraph interested me, and it might be of interest to the committee. Speaking about immigrants, it states:

> The sum of £125 sterling, which is in round numbers about $600 of Canadian currency, would enable a farmer to begin on a moderate scale of comfort. That sum would be divided, perhaps, in some cases, with a little variation, as follows.

This is what the immigrant would require:

> One yoke of oxen, $120; one wagon, $80; plow and harrow, $25; chains, axes, shovels, etc., $30; stoves, bedsteads, etc., $60; house and stable, $150; provisions for the year, $135.

A total of $600 to set him up in business on a farm in Canada. To start on a farm to-day requires a great deal larger investment than that. However, those of you who have read the evidence given before the Agriculture committee no doubt noted the reference to the experiments conducted on seventeen farms in my home county—not my constituency, but that of the member who has the honour to sit beside the lady member of this House, the member for Dufferin (Mr. Woods). As a result of the experiments carried on on these seventeen farms it was shown that the farmer in raising beef cattle got 26 cents per hour working 10½ hours a day the year round, Sunday included. Out of that 26 cents an hour he had to pay the rent of his house and meet the cost of all the supplies for his table and the general upkeep of his family. Under those conditions the farmers, of course, did not make any money; at the end of the year, according to that experiment, he had to draw $460 out of his capital to break even.

I am not going to say that the farmers of Ontario are doing a great deal of grumbling about immigration, but a certain amount of immigration can be used to advantage in that province. They need help on the farm. In some cases it would not be necessary to build houses for the help because on a great many farms in Ontario that are being pastured there already exist empty houses and good houses at that. There is no question about it that the farmers in Ontario to-day cannot get help. On the Toronto train recently I met a neighbour of mine who was going down to the city to hunt for a man. I saw him in town afterwards and asked him how he had made out. "Well," he said, "I got one man who promised to meet me at the station; I am not sure whether he will be there or not. The rest all told me that they would go to the farm just when they could get nothing else to do. They were going to stay in the city a while longer and see if they could not get something there before they would go to the farm."

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am going to say something with which I do not think the committee will agree to the extent they agreed with my first statement. I concur in a great many things that have been said as to what is wrong with agriculture—that is high freight rates, the tariff, and a lot more things are responsible for present conditions. But I am going to mention one thing, which has not yet been mentioned and which may not be popular in this House; nevertheless I think it is time that somebody said it and I am going to be the one. That is one of my reasons for taking part in this debate. Along with other things that are wrong my opinion is that we have too many people in Canada to-day who think that Canada owes them a living. I believe that Canada owes a living to the returned men who are disabled and their dependents; that is one of the responsibilities the war has brought upon us. But I claim that outside of that class Canada owes no man a living who is able to work; it does owe every man a chance to make an honest living. The trouble is we have a class of people in this country who want to work shorter hours for more pay. If a farmer goes to work with his team on the roads he can get $5 a day for himself and his team. He supplies the team, the wagon and the harness. He furnishes the grease for that wagon, boards the team, repairs his harness, and furnishes the whole outfit for $5. He also has to board himself as well as the team. Now, if the chimney blows off his house in a storm and it is necessary for him to get a bricklayer to rebuild that chimney he or his man will have to work with the team, and he will have to board that team and himself, and perhaps his help, for two days in order to pay the bricklayer for a day's work in rebuilding that chimney.

I believe in every person getting a chance to make an honest living. I do not believe, as some do in bringing in immigrants to compete with the farmers in order to produce more potatoes and thus make potatoes cheaper and at the same time keep out artisans for fear they may bring down the wages of plasterers, bricklayers, or other mechanics in this country. I believe it was the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth), who said there were 6,000 unemployed in Winnipeg and therefore we should not bring in any more immigrants. If the present conditions continue we will always have unemployed in Winnipeg and other large centres. If the present Acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization is going to wait until we have no unemployment in Winnipeg, or other cities, before he makes a move he will have to wait until our population is only one-half of what it is at the present time, and perhaps longer. I think the government can change the existing conditions, although I will not dwell on that point at the present moment. The people themselves can change the conditions if they are willing to go to work, but we do not want immigrants who want to live without working. I was surprised to hear even some of the hon. members on this side complaining. When I look at the hon. members from the western provinces in whose ranks I sit I observe practically that one-half of them were immigrants. I think we can also put in that category three premiers of the western provinces. Now, if a carefully selected immigration policy has provided Canada with men of that type, I think that policy has done a great work for this country.

Now as to the class of people that we want, a case was brought to my attention not long ago. A young American came over to a town near the border, between here and Toronto, and rented a garage shop. He paid three months' rent in advance in order to secure the shop and then returned to the other side in order to make his arrangements. This happened last winter. He went back home and packed up his belongings and started with his wife for Canada. But when he got to the border he found that he could not be admitted unless he would sign a statement that he was a farmer. This he absolutely refused to do because he was an honest man; he declared he knew nothing about farming. The matter was discussed for two weeks, from December 28 until January 10, and then the Immigration department decided to let him enter the country. By that time, however, he had gone back home and started a garage shop there. I think that man would have made a good citizen. In my opinion we might have admitted him to Canada; his entrance into the business might have brought down the price we have to pay for getting our cars fixed.

What do we need to-day in order to boost our cities and towns? We have heard a great deal about the value of the home market; it has been mentioned several times in this debate. It reminds me of a story I heard about a woman who had six boys. She said her boys all made money on a wet day trading in old clothes with each other. The old clothes were all in the family in the morning and they were all in the same family at night. If we consume all we produce how are we going to pay our liabilities abroad and keep out of debt? What is necessary in order to make our towns prosperous—and I think the business people in the cities and towns have not yet realized it—is this: You want a contented industrious Canadian citizen on every one hundred acres around each town in the province of Ontario. As the result of such a policy the business men in those towns will do better, and the manufacturers, the wholesale men in the large cities will ship more goods to those towns, and the whole country will be benefited thereby.

A great deal has been said about our natural resources. We have those resources and we are very proud of them. But if you take a ton of coal from a coal mine you have reduced your natural resources to that extent; if you cut down a tree our forest resources have been reduced by that much; if you take a fish from the ocean, lake or stream, our fishery resources are to that degree lessened; but when you produce from the land, provided your farming is properly conducted, you have not diminished nature's storehouse to any appreciable extent. Therefore what is necessary, as I said before, is to get farmers on every one hundred acres, or you might make it one hundred and sixty acres in the West.

The farmers have not much to do. They only have to clothe and feed and shelter the people of the world—that is all. I said I would not speak for more than ten minutes and my time is about up. How can we help in these conditions? I would say first, that we should relieve the agriculturist of the heavy burden he is carrying at the present time by taking off his back the plutocrat and the profiteer. Mr. Chairman, this is not the wail of an infant industry for protection which we have heard so often in this House. This is an appeal, and an appeal from the mother of industries, that she may be relieved of those whining infants that are clinging to her skirts and have grown bloated. Remove them, and you will help her to recover. I have faith in agriculture. I have faith that she will soon recover, and more than that, I have faith that she will assist the Finance Minister in paying not only the interest on our national debt, but in paying off that debt.

Another thing about which we should think very seriously is this: The time has come, yea, I might say it has passed when the people of this country should live within their revenue. I would go a step further and say that the time has come when the government of this country should live within its revenue. I am a believer in this country. I believe in Canada. I have not lost faith yet.

It has been said that the minister might tell the immigrants whom he hopes to induce to come to this country what they are coming to. I would not like him to tell them all. He might tell the immigrant that he wants to have come out here from the Old Country that we have a heavy debt and want him to help pay it. But do not tell the immigrant's wife that if her husband happens to die she will have to pay a tax on the rough lumber that goes into his coffin. Do not tell her that she will have to pay a tax on his shroud. Do not tell her that she will have to pay a tax on the screw nails that fasten down the coffin lid, and that the man who digs the grave will also have to pay a tax on the shovel he uses for that purpose. Do not tell the immigrant that if his wife should have to make a living by sewing, before she can earn five cents to buy a loaf of bread with, she will have to pay a tax of $13.05 on her sewing machine. Do not tell her that if she has to earn her living by washing she will have to pay a tax in Canada on the washing machine she uses. The minister had better keep these things from them. But he might incidentally let them know that in a few years we may have a Progressive government in this House that will take that tariff off.

Mr. LADNER: I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he has not conceived of this answer from the wife, that she has far worse things to do in the Old Country.

Mr. HALBERT: There is one thing the minister might tell the wife, and that is that when the immigrant passes to the Great Beyond, where no doubt he will be sure to go if he has been on the farm in Canada, there will be no tax on his royal robe up there because the Dominion Textile Company did not make it.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should just like to quote these few words from Earl Grey:

If Canada will only keep her judiciary pure, her politics clean—

Mark that well.

An hon. MEMBER: What about Moose Jaw?

Mr. HALBERT:

—her administration honest, nothing can prevent her one day becoming the controlling factor in the empire of self-governing nations.

Mr. Chairman, what Canadian would shrink from such a destiny as that?

Mr. HOCKEN: Mr. Chairman, may I first tender my profound sympathy to the Acting Minister of Immigration. I have been somewhat surprised as I have sat here this evening to see how cheerfully he accepts all the objections to his policy. In the first place, he must not bring out any artisans; too many artisans here already. He must not bring out any farmers; too many farmers in the country. If he attempts to bring out any lawyers or doctors or artists or preachers I would not be surprised if the same objections were raised. Nobody wants competition. Everybody seems to be afraid of it, and yet our whole life has to be lived in competition, and the man who is afraid of it, whether he be a farmer, artisan, business man or manufacturer—

Mr. IRVINE: What about magazines?

Mr. HOCKEN: I can say this, Mr. Chairman, in reply, that if there is any one set of people in this country that have shown they are not afraid of competition it is the publishers of magazines. No weaker illustration could have been chosen. Is it not a fact that everybody in this country wants to get away from competition? But if you allow that sentiment to prevail, you will never get any immigration at all. There is not any class of people working in Canada that does not think there are already too many of that class here, and that sentiment has prevailed in this country for forty years. I can go back that far, and a little farther if necessary, but I can remember the complaints that were made forty years ago against bringing immigrants to Canada. Yet every man that comes to Canada, with or without a family, creates a demand for something else that Canadians are making.

I was surprised at the mortuary allusions of the hon. member for North Ontario. You know one can go over the tariff and pick out a whole lot of striking allusions of that kind, but they do not mean anything.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SALES: Don't they, just!

Mr. HOCKEN: They do not mean anything more than that other striking statement he made that we should take the plutocrat and the profiteer off the back of the farmer. I presume that that was meant to refer to the manufacturers. It it was, I can tell him that the manufacturers are not upon the backs of the farmers to-day. They are on their knees praying for some relief from their difficulties

Mr. GOULD: On the farmer's knees or their own?

Mr. HOCKEN: On their own. They do not get on the farmer's knees to pray. I sometimes think that if the farmers would get on their knees and do a little praying it might do them good. It might at least inspire them to endeavour to acquire that feeling of contentment to which the hon. member for North Ontario referred when he said "What we want is a contented and industrious man on every hundred acres!" He is anticipating the millennium. There is not and there never will be in any part of the world a contented man on every hundred acres in a township. Contentment does not come because a man has so much goods; contentment comes from work largely and from some internal qualities that are not supplied by government. If the men who come out here learn to take what comes to them until they find their feet, they will be an asset to this country just as our fathers were. As regards everybody on this side and most hon. members over there, if they are not immigrants themselves their fathers were. My father was an immigrant; he came out here when he was a young man of nineteen, and nearly everybody in Canada has sprung from stock that came out here as young men to seek their fortunes and to establish themselves in Canada. They have established themselves in Canada. But this everlasting protest against competition is something that we must take account of only to disregard it, and that is the position I take about the matter. There is room in this country for every industrious man with right ideals. He will make a place for himself, and if he crowds some other fellow out, the latter is a man who does not want to work, or who will not work. It goes without saying that he is not a good, industrious, vigorous man, or he would not be crowded out. We have so many protests from the farmers. I sympathize with the farmers; I sympathize with the artisans; but whom shall we class in comparison with the farmers? The business man or the artisan? Perhaps both. I can tell my hon. friends to my left that if they were artisans working in any big city in this country in a period of unemployment, they would suffer a good deal more than they are suffering on the prairies to-day. The artisans of this country are not half as well off as the farmers who are struggling in this country. They have to go and live on charity if they get out of work too long.

An hon. MEMBER: They do not mind that.

Mr. HOCKEN: The men who do not mind that are no good. There may be some who do not mind that; but if a man has any tittle of self respect in him, he will mind it. The point I am trying to make is this: If the farmer classifies himself in comparison with the artisan, then I say he is a long way better off than an artisan. If he classifies himself with a business man, he is better off than most business men. Farmers think it is an easy thing to go into business and succeed, and they try it sometimes. I have known many men who have sold their farms, worth ten or twenty thousand dollars, and have gone into business where they would have a nice time, just buying and selling. It is so easy to buy so much at such a price and to sell it at so much more, and the record of failures contains the names of hundreds and thousands of men just like those. It is not every man who is fit for business, and even those who are fit for business have difficulties to overcome and problems to solve. They keep those to themselves for the sake of their credit, as the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Stansell) said, but many sleepless nights are caused thereby. The business men of this country have just as much to contend with as our farmers have.

Mr. SPENCER: Does the hon. member know of any business men who have made a success of business, who have gone on to a farm and made a failure?

Mr. HOCKEN: If the hon. member will come to the neighbourhood of the city where I live, I can show him many business men who have undertaken to do farming. Some of them have succeeded and some have not. This depends altogether on the man, and it depends altogether on the man whether he is a good or a bad farmer. If he is a good farmer, he will be successful, and if he is not, he will not. A few years ago, we had a very interesting committee on the cost of living. We had many distinguished men giving evidence, and that committee had a series of stock questions which they submitted. Dealing with agriculture particularly, the witnesses were asked in every case: "Now what is the principal factor in making a success of dairying, stockraising?" and so on. The invariable answer was: "The man." That is the principal factor. We had in the town of Belleville a man running a dairy and making so much money that he asked us not to make him expose the fact. He was taking his cream from Renfrew where a co-operative dairy was running which had never paid a dividend in its lifetime. The man is the factor, and my hon. friends to my left and their friends in Ontario, who think it is an easy thing to go into business and to make a great deal of money, have had their experience in Ontario. If my information is correct, they are gaining some experience purchasing it at somewhat higher prices. Even out on the prairies, some of the co-operative schemes have not panned out because of the fact that the men who are trying to run them are not good business men. To be a good business man one must have capacities that are not found on every farm or in the mind of every artisan.

I was interested and somewhat amused at the speech delivered by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote). He painted a very gloomy picture. Things were bad because the crop was not big, and even if the crop was big, things would not be any better! Even if all the farmers got 34 bushels of wheat to the acre, that would not make any difference to them; they would not be any better off! That is not the kind of talk we should hear in parliament, and to my mind that is somewhat stupid. Anyone who argues that a man with a good crop cannot make any more than a man with a poor crop, has no basis at all upon which to stand; but that is the argument the hon. member put up.

My hon. friends do not want farmers to come out. The Trades and Labour Council do not want artisans to come out. I believe we ought to have more artisans come to Canada. I believe every man who comes out here creates a demand for the goods that are made by other people, and if hon. members want proof of that, let us take the experience and the prosperity of Ontario farmers adjacent to good-sized towns. Some of my hon. friends flouted the home market. The home market is the most valuable thing an agriculturist can have. I was down recently in the county of Prince Edward, and there is not a poor man in the whole county. They have only a few towns but they grow stuff for canning, and that makes them all prosperous. Without the canning factories established there,—those Dominion Canners' factories, about which my hon. friends complain so much at times—the farmers of that county would not have the prosperity they are enjoying. I could take my hon. friends to counties in western Ontario in which are situated good-sized towns or small cities, and there they will find men, with ordinary degrees of intelligence, not only making a splendid living, but putting away a competence through their work on the farm. Farming is hard work, I admit, but it is not as hard as working in a factory. The farmer can work twelve hours outdoors more easily than an artisan can work eight or ten hours indoors and without so much loss of health and strength.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): Are you speaking from experience?

Mr. HOCKEN: Yes, I am. I worked until I was thirty-four years of age indoors and then I got another job and worked outdoors. So I know exactly what I am talking about.

Mr. KELLNER: I would ask the hon. gentleman if he is prepared to submit evidence to the special committee sitting with regard to those prosperous farmers?

Mr. HOCKEN: I have not a catalogue of those farmers but if it is the wish of the committee I can get them the names of men in western Ontario that have made a large amount of money out of farming and who are making good money to-day. And I say that the tariff which is denounced so much by my hon. friends is the reason why they are making money in Ontario. The farmers of Ontario believe in protection.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HOCKEN: Yes, they do.

An hon. MEMBER: Never.

Mr. HOCKEN: Well, we had that voted on in 1911 when 72 seats were carried by protectionists. That I think is pretty good evidence.

Mr. LEADER: Then how do you account for so many members in this group having come from Ontario, although this party has a low tariff plank in its platform?

Mr. HOCKEN: I will tell you all about it. In the last election in Ontario the farmers were not voting on any public issue.

An hon. MEMBER: How do you know?

Mr. HOCKEN: What they were voting on was whether a farmer would represent them or someone else. The issue of the tariff did not appear in the last election in Ontario; that is not what the farmers of Ontario voted on.

Mr. ROSS (Simcoe): What was the issue? So far as I can remember, the leader of the government of that day made the statement that the tariff would be the issue.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman is quite right. I made that statement, but every other party ran away from the issue.

Mr. ROSS (Simcoe): That was the issue in my riding.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Michaud): Order. The hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Hocken) has the floor, and hon. members have not the right to interrupt him.

Mr. HOCKEN: I still venture to assert, Mr. Chairman, that in the rural constituencies in Ontario it was the occupation of the man and not the tariff that was the issue in the last election.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. HOCKEN: That is my declaration and you can dispute it if you wish; but I am satisfied from the evidence I have that that is so.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The subject under discussion is immigration.

Mr. HOCKEN: I will come back to the subject, Mr. Chairman, but I hope you will not accuse me of being the chief offender. I have been forced to step aside from the question under discussion. Now, dealing with the subject of immigration, I might say that our friends to our left have had in power for four years in the province of Ontario a Farmers' government. Are they satisfied with the immigration policy of that government?

Mr. McMASTER: What has that to do with the immigration policy of this government?

Mr. HOCKEN: I am asking the question by way of analogy. I say they have had a Farmers' government in Ontario for four years.

Mr. GOULD: And it will stick.

Mr. HOCKEN: I am sorry to dissappoint my hon. friend, but I can assure him upon the most positive evidence that it will not stick. But, Sir, if this Dominion were ruled to-day by agriculturists, if the treasury benches were filled by farmers, the government might present a very distinguished appearance, but I doubt very much whether anything more would be done for the farming industry than is done to-day or that was done by the previous government. These hon. gentlemen talk about the necessity for reducing the tariff, in order to encourage immigration. But they know very well that if they sat on the opposite side they could not reduce the tariff, and would not, because they could not get the revenues necessary to run the country. So that all this play on the tariff is purely for home consumption, just as it was two sessions ago. At that time free trade was promised by my hon. friends across the floor; they went out into the West and spoke of how they would give free trade. But my hon. friends to my left know how they gave it to them, and if those hon. gentlemen were over the way they would do no better.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Give us a chance.

Mr. HOCKEN: I will give you a chance if my hon. friends opposite are willing. In my judgment the best thing that can be done is to encourage the immigration of farmers. I think that farmers ought to be encouraged to come to Canada because there are millions of opportunities for farmers here as compared with any other class of the community. There are millions upon millions of acres of unoccupied lands in the country, and what other class of people could we induce to come who would have such an opportunity of making a living and a competence as those men whom we could put on the farms? I think therefore that this is the right class. I believe, however, that a substantial number of artisans should also be induced to come into the country and that this could be done to the general advantage of the people. One of the ways of doing that is in my judgment to improve every possible means of transportation. I can tell my hon. friends that the immigrants who come in to take up land in competition with them will obtain a greater advantage from the improvement of the transportation system than they will in any other direction. I should like to see the Vancouver and the St. Lawrence routes improved and the Hudson Bay railway built, not because I think it would be a good thing, but because I think it is necessary, to allay the dissatisfaction that exists in the West, to spend that money and demonstrate that the thing cannot be done.

By every other conceivable means we ought to make it possible for the men who come here as immigrants to have that much better chance of making not only a living but a competence within a reasonable period of time. Half the members here already have a competence. There are men sitting on this side of the House who have made a competence in a few years. My hon. friend from North Ontario is a retired farmer. You can go into towns all over Canada and find retired farmers by the dozen. But you do not find many retired business men, you do not find retired artisans. The farming industry is the only one that enables a man to retire unless he has a bee in his bonnet and starts into business, in which event he would soon have to retire to the poorhouse. But so long as he takes care of the money he made in agriculture to keep him in his old age he will be happy and contented and go down honoured and mourned into that wooden box which my hon. friend from North Ontario spoke of—and it will be the last tax he will ever have to pay!

Mr. WARNER: Mr. Chairman, I have been waiting for four days for an opportunity to speak, and have been getting hoarser and hoarser listening until now I can scarcely articulate. Therefore I feel quite gratified that I have the opportunity before I become any worse. I feel that I should almost offer an apology to the committee for attempting to speak to-night, but I shall do my best to make every one hear me, although I do not know whether I shall succeed.

During the course of this debate I have listened to a great deal that I approve of and a great deal that I doubt whether it was wise to have uttered. But at the same time I do not feel that as a member of parliament I should be restrained in saying what I conscientiously believe, so I am not going to question what any hon. member has already said on the subject of immigration. I am an immigrant myself, Mr. Chairman.

An hon. MEMBER: A good one too.

Mr. WARNER: I did not come to this country until I was forty-one years old. I had a family growing up and did not feel that where I lived I was getting ahead sufficiently to provide the kind of home that I wanted my children to enjoy, and I found that year by year it was becoming more difficult to realize my ambition. Therefore I looked around for some place where with energy and the exercise of what common sense I possessed I could get ahead and lay up sufficient to guarantee my children a home. I have done that in Canada, and I do not feel that Canada has treated me so badly, although before this House last year I expressed the opinion that after living twenty-five years in my constituency it was amazing to me to see some people in the deplorable condition they were in at that time. Now, last year was the poorest I ever saw in that district, although we had enough for the people to eat and enough for our stock. But a country with a record like that for twenty-five years, harvests year after year that provided plenty for man and beast, is not a very bad country to live in. However, we must make conditions that will enable the average man and woman to make good and secure a living on the land, for after all the dearest thing to every man or woman is a home. I think every industrious person should be entitled to acquire a home free from encumbrances—a home that is actually his or her own. All people in my district, I am sorry to say, have not been able to accomplish that. It is only fair to say that they have been handicapped by artificial conditions, which should have been and could have been altered for their amelioration, to some extent by the government, and to a greater extent by the people themselves if they had only seen it that way. And it may be added that during the war we learned to live so expensively that we are not willing to return to the old way again, but I think we have got to do so whether we like it or not.

I do not believe there is a man or woman anywhere in the world who is more entitled to possess a good home than the farmer and his wife. I do not believe there is any more useful couple in this world and a couple more needed at the present time than the farmer and his wife. Consequently I should like to see it made possible for them to be prosperous, and thus bring prosperity to Canada. In my opinion the government could go a long way towards helping along this line. Many opinions have been pronounced on this point, and I expressed my own pretty fully last year, so I shall not repeat them tonight, but I want the government to understand that the people are holding them responsible to do all that it is humanly possible for a government to do to help make the country prosperous at this time.

I have tried to learn to be practical. Now, I know that we are a party to debts that we must pay or repudiate. Once we understand that, then we must act with reason and with common sense. We have natural resources that we are unable to use because there are not enough people here to develop them. Members all over this House say they are not opposing immigration, that they are willing that people should come in. I go further and say that I want to see a reasonable and forceful immigration policy brought into effect. I say that because I believe all our troubles can be better solved with more people here than they can be with the number we have now. The bringing in of more people and the ameliorating of our difficulties through the application of remedies must go hand in hand.

I say to my hon. friends, with the best intentions, that I believe they have gone too far in telling of the difficulties in the West. There is no doubt that these difficulties exist, but they are not to be overcome in a day, in a year, or perhaps even in my lifetime. I want to do what I can to assist in overcoming them, but I do not go so far as to say what some hon. members have said, namely, that we must fix things up here before we can bring people into the country. I believe that to bring people here will help us fix things up. I would not go at that work, however, without a conscience. I claim to have a conscience in this matter, and I submit that we can invite people to come to Canada in the full knowledge that there are undeveloped resources here for them to work with and that they will not need to take those resources out of our possession in order to make good.

There are many hon. members who are afraid of the competition that will be created by those who are brought into the country. Well, I am in favour of having people brought here who are likely to become good Canadian citizens so that they may co-operate with us and help us pay our debts and become a prosperous nation. I would rather do that than say that would-be immigrants must stay out until we get rid of all our difficulties. If I thought that people who come here would not have an opportunity to make good I would not like to ask them to come. When I first came here I was offered so much per head—I did not know very well what it involved at that time—to bring people into the country. I was not willing to do it, because I ddi not know whether or not the people who came in would be able to make good. But having been this long in the country I know something about the natural conditions and I know they are good enough to enable people to be successful. We have problems to solve, and those who come in can help us solve them. I know what the conditions are both in Canada and in the United States. I spent a good many years in the United States; I have relations living there, and I am in close touch with what is going on. It is my opinion that many people who are going to the United States will be glad to come back here if we do what we can to alleviate our present difficulties. They will find out that Canada is the best place on this earth for anyone who wants to have a home of his own; that he can get it more easily and more quickly here than he can anywhere else in the world. Many people are going to the United States, I know, but they are not going on farms; in fact, they could hardly buy farms there, considering the prices that lands are being held for. Our land in Canada is just as good as the land in the United States; at least, it is in the part of the country in which I live—and I know of the conditions in the United States because I have been from east to west and as far south as Mexico. Hon. members will agree, therefore, that I know what I am talking about.

It will take a lot of money in salaries for immigration agents to offset what we have heard in this House during the last few days. If hon. members want to make those statements, if they want to deliver speeches of that kind, I am willing that they should do so; I am not trying to control them. But so far as their statements go about the conditions that prevail, I am not going to rest easily until I tell you, Sir, that the conditions are not as bad as that in the constituency that I represent. They may be bad artificially, but the natural conditions, the soil and the climate in the district where I live, are equal to those in the country in which I used to live a thousand miles to the south. Most people are afraid of the winters out in that country. Well, it is my experience that the winter at Edmonton is easier to stand than the winter in Nebraska or Iowa where I lived most of the time before I came here.

Mr. FORKE: Why did you not say Ottawa?

Mr. WARNER: I am not talking about Ottawa just now. I do not intend to talk about any part of the country that I am so little conversant with that I do not know what I am talking about.

I repeat Mr. Chairman, that I have faith in Canada. Canada is going to come out all right, but we may have to put Progressives on the other side of the House before we get things right. I hope our men will agree and work together until we can impress upon Canada the need of the changes that we have been asking for. There are several things that the farmers in the West need, and I judge they are needed in the East as well. One thing we must do is to live cheaper. We must be able to buy cheaply what we need to buy. But before going further I want to say this. I know of farmers living in the West who are buying practically all they need for their subsistence. They do not even cultivate a garden; they do not have a cow or pigs to furnish them with meat. And when a farmer is trying to carry on farming without a garden, or a cow, or pigs it does not look very good to me.

Mr. SHAW: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Michaud): Order.

Mr. SHAW: I merely want to ask my hon. friend a question.

Mr. WARNER: If the hon. gentleman wants to ask me a question that is all right; but if he desires to bother me he is not going to get very far.

Mr. SHAW: I do not want to bother the hon. gentleman I would simply ask him if, under the circumstances, he would suggest the use of oleomargarine instead of butter?

Mr. WARNER: I expect to discuss the oleomargarine question when it comes up later and I would like very much if my hon. friend would lend me his assistance when that time comes.

I was saying that farming without a garden, without a cow, without pigs does not look very good to me. Yet that is what is going on in some districts and it is not the right way to farm. My parents lived in Ohio a long time ago and raised wheat until the soil was so impoverished that wheat growing could no longer be successfully carried on; then they raised a crop of a different character. Later the family went into Iowa and grew wheat there until they could no longer make a success of it and had to turn their attention to raising something else. When I was ten years old I went with my father into Nebraska and we did the same thing there; we raised wheat as long as we could do so successfully, and then had to turn our attention to other crops. I do not think the raising of wheat can be regarded as a permanent agricultural operation, nor do I think that a man engaging in farming as a mere business proposition without any idea of making a home for himself, is a very good farmer. I think that to be considered a good farmer a man needs to go on to a piece of land with the intention of making a home there, of establishing there a place to live in and enjoy life. This argument of mine may sound rather strange to some of you who heard me last year; but if my hon. friends to my right would only get off our necks and give us a chance, we farmers would certainly make good.
