GRAIN

OATS—DIRECT SALES TO EASTERN FEEDERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wished to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) but in his absence I should like to direct it to his parliamentary assistant. In view of the plentiful supply of feed oats in western Canada and the apparent shortage of this feed in Ontario, would the minister advise whether the government is planning some method by which direct sales can be made at lower prices than that presently prevalent, which is about $1.05 per bushel?

Mr. Robert McCubbin (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, that matter comes under the Department of Trade and Commerce. I have asked the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) to answer the question.

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the answer is that it is the policy of the Canadian wheat board to move sufficient quantities of grain into position to supply the demand in the domestic market. There is no method, however, whereby the board can make sales at prices lower than those prevailing on the market at the time of purchase.

Direct sales from western producers to eastern feeders can be made under special arrangements with the wheat board. The quantity involved must be within the western producer's delivery quota and the difference between the initial payment and the prevailing selling price must be paid to the board. The selling price of such direct sales would be subject to agreement between the buyer and seller and there is no indication that any saving could be effected by adopting this method.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

REQUEST FOR AIR CONDITIONING IN CAFETERIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Would the Minister of Public Works, Mr. Speaker, see what can be done as soon as possible about putting an air conditioning unit in the parliamentary cafeteria? The heat there is excessive, not only for those who eat in the cafeteria but I would think it would be unbearable for those who work there.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): I will take that as notice, Mr. Speaker.

PRIVILEGE

MR. HOWE, PORT ARTHUR—CORRECTED STATEMENT RESPECTING ORENDA ENGINES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I am rising very briefly to correct a statement I made that is recorded in Hansard for yesterday, May 29. In replying to a question of the hon. member for York West (Mr. Hamilton) regarding the cutback of Orenda Engines Limited, I referred to the F-86 aircraft as "becoming obsolete". In these days of rapid technical advancement in the science of aeronautics and aircraft armament, this statement is commonly applied to almost every military aircraft as it leaves the drawing board. I would, however, like to correct the impression which I may have left that the F-86 aircraft is reaching the stage of obsolescence at any greater rate than any other fighter aircraft now in use, since the opposite is the case. In point of fact, the F-86 Sabre with Orenda engines is recognized as possibly the best day interceptor now in a full operational role. The reduction in the rate of production of Orenda engines at Malton merely represents the fulfilment of current requirements for the Sabre VI, which is still in production at Canadair Limited.

Mr. Dufresne: The minister is completely out of order.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): You are nuts.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Perhaps so, but this is a question of privilege.

Mr. John B. Hamilton (York West): Since I asked the original question about Orenda engines, perhaps I could ask a supplementary question. Does the government's contract schedule for supplies from Orenda indicate that the men who are being laid off now have a prospect of re-employment as a result of the continued schedule of purchases?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Orenda is a private enterprise but I would expect that when the new engine gets into production, that is the engine now being designed and developed, certainly the present staff can expect re-employment—at least I assume everyone now employed will have a priority when that time comes. On the other hand, while the immediate requirements for Orenda engines are satisfied, it is quite possible that further orders for aircraft will be placed which will call for further engines, but it is difficult for me to make a definite statement now in that regard.

PIPE LINES

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINE—SASKATCHEWAN SUGGESTION FOR PUBLIC OWNERSHIP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister arising out of the text of a letter made public in the Leader-Post of May 26 wherein the premier indicates the Saskatchewan government is strongly in favour of a publicly-owned pipe line and the suggestion is made that Ontario, Quebec and Manitoba be sounded out as to their support for this proposal. Can the Prime Minister state whether any consideration has been given to this proposal?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): No, no consideration has been given to it.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Can the Prime Minister state what provinces, if any, have been asked as to their desires in connection with the method of constructing the pipe line?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): There have been no consultations with provincial governments about that question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Can the Prime Minister say whether any governments besides Saskatchewan have indicated their wishes in connection with this trans-Canada pipe line, as to whether or not they favoured private or public ownership?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): That question has not been directed to any provincial government.

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES—SALE PRICE OF GAS IN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Roland Michener (St. Paul's): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the figures tabled by the minister yesterday, does the minister concur in the statement made on the C.B.C. news broadcast at eight o'clock this morning that the prices to be charged by Trans-Canada for gas would be less on the Canadian side of the border than on the American side?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I did not hear the broadcast at eight o'clock, but under the terms of the pipe-lines bill the gas cannot be sold for export to the United States at a price lower than it is sold in a comparable position in Canada.

Mr. Michener: The statement was that it would be less on the Canadian side, and that was what I wished to draw to the minister's attention.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I have said several times the price would be less on the Canadian side than the price for export.

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES—PURCHASE OF PIPE IN BRITAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, in view of the dispatch quoted yesterday by the Minister of Trade and Commerce to the effect that Trans-Canada has placed orders in Britain for $32 million of pipe, if this is true does that mean it is Trans-Canada which is now assured of building the pipe line across the northern Ontario section?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): No, Mr. Speaker. Trans-Canada Pipe Lines did place the order. They were advised that if they did not do so the position would be taken by another buyer. I have been anxious and I think all hon. members have been anxious that any pipe we had to buy outside of Canada would be bought in Britain and therefore I suggested to Trans-Canada that it place the order, which it has done with the understanding that if it is not in a position to build the line the government will take over the pipe. That is clearly understood. As a matter of fact, under the terms of the agreement the government will take over Trans-Canada.

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce somewhat along the same line as the question asked by the hon. member for Saskatoon. Would the government consider delaying the construction of the trans-Canada pipe line until pipe made in Canada by Canadian labour is available early in 1957?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, the pipe that will be made in Canada is not pipe that can be used for the western section of the line in any event and the reason is that the widest steel plate that is rolled in Canada is steel plate that would be suitable for 30-inch pipe. I sincerely hope that the 30-inch pipe from the projected mill in Welland will be available early in 1957 and I can assure the hon. member that every pound of pipe that can be turned out within Canada will be purchased and used in the trans-Canada project.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Did I understand the minister to say that Welland Tubes were not able to produce the type of pipe which is required by Trans-Canada for the western section?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Whether or not it will be able to roll 36-inch pipe remains a question. I have had two contrary sources of information. I notice that the paper this morning said Welland will be able to roll 36-inch pipe. My point is that no steel mill in Canada can turn out plate of width sufficient to be rolled into pipe larger than 30 inches in diameter. The width of plate required for 34-inch diameter pipe is 110 inches and that width of plate is not rolled in Canada. As I said the other day, my information is that it is rolled in only three mills in the United States, one in England and one in Germany.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, I have a telegram in my hand from Welland Tubes Limited saying that they can roll it.

Mr. McCann: Yes, but what about making the plate?

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES—REASON FOR USE OF 34-INCH PIPE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact the latest available figures show that only 227 miles of gas pipe line in the United States are over 30 inches in diameter out of a total of some 100,000 miles, will the minister tell the house why it is important that this pipe line in question be of such an excessive size?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the fact of the matter is that 34-inch pipe has been purchased and is being rolled in two pipe mills in the United States in sufficient quantities to build the entire line from Alberta to the vicinity of Winnipeg. The pipe is on order and has been on order for some time and the orders are being implemented. The reason 34-inch pipe is specified is that the volume of gas that can be put through a 34-inch pipe is the volume of gas which we believe should be made available at Winnipeg when the line is built.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER INTERIM SUPPLY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the action that has been taken in the other place ostensibly to make it possible to get interim supply through in one day, can the minister now say when he intends to move for interim supply?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): I cannot, Mr. Speaker, but as is customary I shall consult with the opposition groups before making the proposal.

Mr. Knowles: May I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister? Can he say whether there was any consultation between the government leader in the Senate and any other cabinet minister before the motion was made to suspend the rules in the other place?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

QUEBEC—ALLEGED ACCUSATIONS AGAINST EDITOR OF LIBERAL PARTY PUBLICATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. Wilfrid Dufresne (Quebec West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice, but in his absence I would direct the same question to the Prime Minister. Is the Prime Minister aware that a radio commentator and newspaperman by the name of Jean-Louis Gagnon, who has been closely associated with Fred Rose and other well known Canadian communist leaders, is presently one of the main publicity agents of the Liberal party in the province of Quebec and chief editor of the party's official publication in that province? If so, would the Prime Minister at this time, in the interests of the people of Canada, care to comment on the serious accusations which he and every member of this house received a few days ago by registered mail concerning the said Jean-Louis Gagnon?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I would not care to make any comment.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

INDIAN AFFAIRS—INQUIRY AS TO CONFERENCE IN OTTAWA MAY 29

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Did the hon. gentleman address a meeting of Indians at a conference yesterday afternoon in Ottawa?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): The answer is yes, sir.

Mr. Bryce: Did you say "yes"?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes.

Mr. Bryce: Mr. Speaker, arising out of that answer I want to raise a point of privilege. On May 4, 1956, I wrote as follows to the hon. gentleman:

Dear Mr. Pickersgill:

I have had some letters regarding a conference that is to be held in Ottawa very shortly in connection with the Indian affairs branch.

Would you be good enough to inform me of the date of this conference or convention, and who has been invited to it.

Thanking you in anticipation,

Yours sincerely,
W. Scottie Bryce.

I have the hon. gentleman's answer of May 8, in which he says:

I have received your letter of May 4. I have no knowledge, nor has the director of Indian affairs, of any official conference to be held in Ottawa, in the near future, to deal with Indian problems.

Now I find the hon. gentleman addressed that delegation or conference, or whatever you call it. I say, Mr. Speaker, that he deliberately deceived me when I asked for that information. The hon. gentleman has no right to refuse me such information. I again say he deliberately deceived me.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I think I can disabuse the hon. gentleman very easily. This was an annual meeting of a private organization. It was not an official conference at all, and it had no official connection whatsoever with my department. I was merely asked as a courtesy to come and speak to them, just as I might have been asked to go and speak to a Kiwanis club, and occasionally have been.

Mr. Speaker: May I ask the hon. member for Selkirk, because he knows it is against the rules to say that an hon. member of this house has deliberately deceived another hon. member, to take the corrective steps? In the circumstances will the hon. gentleman be good enough to take the corrective steps?

[Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East).]

Mr. Bryce: Mr. Speaker, why should I take back anything that I believe is true?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Because the Speaker of the house—

Mr. Bryce: I am going to stick—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. gentleman will take back the expression because the Speaker of the house is asking him to do so, and I understand him always to be respectful of the authority of the Chair.

Mr. Bryce: Mr. Speaker, I hope you understand that if I withdraw it is for your sake; it is not for the minister's sake. Never did I think I would be subjected to such a thing as that.

Mr. Speaker: Order. One should not generate more indignation than one can control—

Mr. Castleden: Can't help it.

Mr. Speaker: When I say something from the chair I would ask hon. members not to interject remarks that at times I do not hear and which I find later in many instances are remarks that are disrespectful, and which I should ask hon. members to withdraw. Now, this must stop.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, do I understand from your remarks that you are now suggesting that offensive words be not used in this house? If so, Mr. Speaker, I would like to know why it is that offensive words used in the past with respect to myself were not drawn to the attention of the house by the Speaker, nor asked to be withdrawn by hon. members who used them?

Mr. Speaker: I have no knowledge of the incident to which the hon. member is referring. Is it one of recent date? Would the hon. member be kind enough to explain the incident to which he is referring?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Perhaps I can save time by saying that now the heat of the moment is over I shall quickly withdraw.

SHIPPING

GREAT LAKES—LICENSING OF SMALL BOATS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the news report over the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation news this morning which referred to the remarks of a senior official of the Department of Transport made before the great lakes search and rescue organization in Toronto last evening, is the government contemplating the licensing of small boats on the great lakes and also contemplating any regulations that apply to the movements of such boats?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman was good enough to tell me that he proposed to ask this question. All I can say in reply is that I have been unable to obtain any report of the matter and I shall have to make inquiries.

NATURAL RESOURCES

SASKATCHEWAN—DISCOVERY AND PRODUCTION OF GAS AND OIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Victoria, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. Would the minister care to give the house any information he might have on the discovery and production of oil and gas in the province of Saskatchewan?

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, I think that question could be very well discussed when the estimates come before the committee in the very near future.

Mr. Hodgson: I guess you don't know.

NORTHERN ONTARIO PIPE LINE CORPORATION

CONSTITUTION OF CROWN COMPANY TO CONSTRUCT PIPE LINE, MAKE SHORT-TERM LOANS, ETC.

The house resumed, from Tuesday, May 29, consideration in committee of Bill No. 298, to establish the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation—Mr. Howe (Port Arthur) —Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 4—Body corporate.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Dauphin. As this is the second time I seem to have got myself into an embarrassing position, perhaps I might be permitted to make a short statement to the committee. When the committee rose last night the hon. member for Dauphin had not completed the 30 minutes which is allotted to him. I do not know, and I am making no statement, whether or not he is entitled to pick it up now, but I expected that he would claim that right. I saw him first for the simple reason that I was looking for him. I called "the hon. member for Dauphin" and the hon. member will now address the committee.

Mr. Zaplitny: Mr. Chairman, in the limited time still at my disposal all I can do is to summarize the arguments I was making at ten o'clock last evening and to point out the position in which we find ourselves at the present time in this debate. I think it is amply clear to all fair-minded citizens that the only way in which the public interest of Canada can be safeguarded and the whole project of this Canadian trans-Canada pipe line kept under Canadian ownership is to have it constructed under public ownership. It is now perfectly clear that the government has only one excuse which they have given to this house and to the country for having set this deadline of June 7 and for the way in which they have handled this whole measure before this house and the committee, and that is their claim that that is the only way in which the pipe line can be built. Of course that is a phony excuse because if there has been any delay in commencing construction of this pipe line that delay lies squarely upon the shoulders of the government.

They have had this project under consideration for the last five years. They have been told, at least by members of this group and perhaps by others, that the proper thing to do if we are to have a national pipe line, as it has been described by the government itself, is for the government to proceed to construct the pipe line without waiting for a private company to dip into the public treasury and then own the pipe line.

I think every excuse which the government has brought forward as to why they must meet this deadline of June 7 is full of holes and will not hold water. Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited have been the recipients of all the favours from this government that one could dream up. The company has had several postponements when they were not able or were not inclined to meet deadlines which they themselves had agreed upon. Certainly this pipe line company does not have to hold a stick over the heads of the members of this house and of the government of this country by saying that either we put this through by June 7, or else. I think that is a shabby way in which to treat this parliament and it is a shabby way in which to carry on public business. Certainly the government should have the courage to say to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines and to all concerned, "We consider this to be a national project of great importance. We are going to let the members of this house give their full and mature deliberation to the question, and then, when we have received the verdict of parliament, we shall proceed with the construction of this project."

Instead of that, they used this phony deadline and this excuse about the availability of pipe and so forth as a big stick to try to force members of the opposition, and incidentally the private members who support the government also; they are in exactly the same position as we are, they are gagged and bound, being forced to support a government on an issue about which they themselves are not very happy.

Thirdly, I would make this statement, that whether the government is successful in bulldozing this measure through parliament, in the manner in which they are attempting and have been attempting to do so, they have already lost on this issue. The people in the country are aroused and resentful. The people in the country are resentful not only of the fact that the government is asking this parliament to give them permission to dip into the public treasury to the extent of $130 million for the purpose of setting up a private monopoly but they are perhaps even more resentful of the fact that the government has the colossal nerve to come to this house and say, "We have made an agreement, which is not even part of the bill before us, we have made an agreement which can be changed and varied at the will of the government itself, without the wishes of parliament being consulted; and because we have made that agreement, then you who are the representatives of the people will have to be bound and gagged and, after a certain date, to have no more opinions to express."

The people of Canada are not going to stand for that and they are going to express their will in no uncertain terms when they have the opportunity to do so. I think the people of Canada also are resentful of the fact that the only role that has been played by the private members supporting the government and by my Social Credit friends to the left of us is the role of Murchison's minions and Tanner's tomboys.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Mr. Chairman, some hon. members who have spoken in committee have indicated that they did not fully understand what was really meant by the statement I made at the opening of the sitting on Monday about the time available for debate on the pipe-line bill when I used the words, "there will be all this week for it to be continued on its remaining stages."

The remaining stages of the bill were the consideration of all the clauses in committee and the third reading of the bill. In that connection I want to make it quite clear that it would have been possible, and it would still be possible, for hon. members opposite by the simple expedient of postponing successively the consideration of the remaining clauses of the bill to bring the committee back, in a quite regular fashion, to the consideration of clause 1, if that is what they feel would be the most effective way to continue the debate.

Now, it must be apparent to all members of the committee that since the government did not give notice yesterday under standing order 33, we are not now in a position to bring on a vote on the third reading of the bill earlier than Monday evening, which is one day longer than the time I indicated on Monday last would be available. In other words, the opposition is now in a position to prolong the debate on the bill for one day of next week, whatever the government's wishes may be in the matter.

The government has been anxious from the moment this measure was proposed to give the opposition the maximum time consistent with the deadline the government has to meet to consider the bill in all its stages, of which consideration in committee of the whole is an important one. We had hoped to have the bill under consideration in committee last Wednesday, and at the close of Tuesday's sitting, hon. members will remember, the house had ordered it for consideration on Wednesday. And it was certainly no fault of the government that it was not considered on Wednesday afternoon.

But all that is past, and I want to tell the committee now that in order to increase the time available for the committee stage we, on this side, are prepared to sit this evening and to sit all day Saturday, if hon. members will agree unanimously to a special order of the house which would provide for the conclusion of the committee stage at the close of the sitting on Saturday and for the conclusion of the remaining stages of the bill at the close of the sitting on Monday next.

Such a procedure would provide another two days in committee stage, if hon. members opposite so desire.

Mr. Fleming: On those terms.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I noted, with some surprise, what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said in concluding his speech in committee on Monday, as reported at page 4399 of Hansard in the following words:

> I very sincerely hope, because it is not in the best interests of Canada, that the opposition will be strong enough to prevent this bill from going through before the deadline.

Now, sir, if all the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar meant was that he hoped the opposition would be able to convince, by its arguments, those of us on this side of the house the bill should not be passed, I take no exception to that statement.

But if, on the other hand, he meant that he felt the opposition had a right to prevent hon. members on both sides of the house from expressing by their votes their opinions on this bill in time to make the bill effective, then I suggest, sir, he was claiming for a minority in this house the right to override the majority.

I am confident that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar will admit every member on this side of the house has just as much right as any hon. member on the other side of the house to express his opinion on this measure and I feel he should have an opportunity to express it in time to be effective.

I am not unmindful of what was said by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway in his moving speech on Monday as reported at page 4377 of Hansard:

> May I tell hon. members, government members, official opposition members, C.C.F. members and Social Credit members, that I favour closure. The government has a perfect right—not only a right but a duty—to invoke closure at the right time; that is, when it has been demonstrated that the business of the house cannot be carried on in any other way but by closure.

I hope it will be possible for the house to agree on this additional time for discussion of the bill in the committee stage, and I invite the leaders of the parties opposite to authorize those who customarily act for them to seek to arrange, through the usual channels, to make this additional time available.

Meanwhile, I have no choice, if the deadline which the government faces is to be met, but to give notice and I hereby do give notice pursuant to standing order 33 that at the next sitting of this committee of the whole house on Bill No. 298, an act to establish the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation, I will move that the further consideration of clauses 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, the title of the said bill and any amendments proposed thereto, shall be the first business of the said committee and shall not further be postponed.

Mr. Fleming: The axe again.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I hope, Mr. Chairman, that an understanding can be reached which will make it unnecessary for me to make this motion.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Knowles: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. My point of order, which I am prepared to argue now or to argue at another time if you think it more appropriate, is that the notice which the Prime Minister has sought to give is invalid and cannot be acted upon at the next sitting of the house. I am prepared to give my reasons based on the wording of standing order 33; based also on the explanation of closure given by Arthur Meighen in 1913; based also on three precedents, one of them in 1913 and two in 1917; and based also on my answer to the mistaken use of closure perpetrated by Mr. Bennett in 1932. Whether you wish to have that argument now or when the Prime Minister attempts to make the motion I leave in your hands. However, I felt that unless I registered objection immediately you might tomorrow say that I had no right to object. My point of order is that this motion could not be moved without the remaining clauses, namely 5, 6 and 7, having been called at least once and postponed.

The Deputy Chairman: I realize entirely what the hon. member is announcing. I think he will agree with me that there is nothing before the chair except clause 4. I have no motion to put before this committee. The house has been advised that such motion will be moved at the next sitting at which time, of course, the question of whether or not it is in order and whether or not it falls out of any order because the preliminaries which are required to put it in order were out of order, will be the subject of debate. But I cannot rule out of order a notice of a motion which is not before the chair—it is admittedly before the committee of the whole under the standing order—as I think it would be fair to say perhaps that a motion or a question which appeared in the appendix to the Votes and Proceedings of today announcing that it was going to be moved the day after tomorrow would not be a fair subject for a ruling until such time as it reached routine proceedings and was presented to the house.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, that is quite satisfactory to me. I just wanted to be sure that you would recognize me on the point of order if the Prime Minister attempts to move that motion tomorrow.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, may I just rise on a point of privilege? The Prime Minister referred to a remark I made at the conclusion of my speech. May I say to him that I believe that, if one feels as strongly as I do that this is not in the best interests of the country, anything I can do to stop this going through, under proper parliamentary procedure, I am right in undertaking.

Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, the notice that the Prime Minister has given reduces to a complete farce—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Sinclair: Obstruction.

Mr. Drew: —the earlier suggestion that he was in fact making any proposal that had behind it any earnest desire to have a discussion of this measure. In effect what he says is this: "Look at this nice sharp axe. I shall withhold that axe if you submit to the terms I place before you". The velvet which he places over the edge of the axe renders the edge no less sharp. I would hope that there is no hon. member on this side of the house who would be prepared to follow the course of action suggested,—

Mr. Fulton: Or on the other side.

Mr. Drew: —and I would hope that there were some on the other side of the house who would not be prepared to follow it;—

An hon. Member: You will not find very many.

Mr. Drew: I would hope there would be some on the other side of the house who would not be prepared to follow a course of action suggested by the Prime Minister when it is backed by a threat of closure of this kind.

We have had different kinds of closure already. We first of all had closure moved by the Minister of Trade and Commerce when we had before us the motion that it was expedient to introduce this bill. The notice of that closure was given before a single member of the opposition had been given an opportunity to indicate in any way what his position was here in this house. Then we had closure on second reading. Then when we came into the committee stage we had a type of closure never even attempted before in this or any similar parliament, when the Minister of Trade and Commerce rose on the calling of section 1 and moved postponement of the consideration of that section.

An hon. Member: Further consideration.

Mr. Drew: I should say further consideration of that section. That was indeed an affront to this house. There had been no consideration and therefore there could be no further consideration. We were allowed no consideration of any kind on section 1 where the opportunity presents itself to elicit information by direct questions. We were offered no opportunity to consider section 2. We were offered no opportunity to consider section 3. We were then given the opportunity to consider section 4 which, in a large measure, had become a futility because we had already passed over the definition and operative sections of the act.

Now, the Prime Minister suggests that we agree to sit tonight and Saturday, provided we will agree to their terms.

Mr. Sinclair: Just sit and talk.

Mr. Drew: The Minister of Fisheries has interjected, "Just sit and talk".

Mr. Sinclair: That is all you have done for the last 19 days.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, the difference is that I have stood in order to make my speeches whereas the Minister of Fisheries has sat and made his interjections.

Mr. Fleming: And rather senseless interjections too.

Mr. Drew: May I add that there have not been 19 days of discussion or anything like that. I would suggest to the hon. member he go back and examine Hansard to ascertain the limited opportunity there has been.

Mr. Sinclair: There have been 19 days of filibustering by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Kamloops, and the country knows it.

Mr. Fleming: That is the man who fell off the ladder.

Mr. Drew: There have not been 19 days of discussion, as the minister knows quite well. I simply place on the record the fact that his statement is without any foundation whatever.

We have before us here perhaps the most offensive proposal that has been made yet. Under the guise of a gesture of generosity to this house the Prime Minister says you can discuss this until the end of this week as long as you abide by our terms as to how we will force this bill through. Well, Mr. Chairman, we are not going to accept any terms of that kind. This government has taken the responsibility of making these proceedings completely ineffective from the point of view of a proper discussion of this bill in committee. I repeat, never before in this House of Commons have the members of this house been denied in this way the opportunity to proceed. Do not let any member opposite refer back to precedents where sections were bulked in one motion made as is now suggested. On the one occasion where something of the same nature was done, section 1 had been discussed and the opportunity had been presented to ask questions and to get answers. We were denied that opportunity which is the very beginning and the real foundation of the discussion in committee. This was denied for the deliberate purpose of preventing us from obtaining the kind of information which might have brought out some of the facts the public in this country have a right to know about this strange procedure which has not yet been explained to us in any way.

This, Mr. Chairman, is adding insult to injury. Parliament has been denied its ordinary rights. Parliament has been injured by the course followed by the government on this occasion, and now to add insult to injury we are told, if we will meekly submit to the terms now imposed by this arrogant government you will be permitted to debate this to the end of the week. Then, what happens? We are going to have one day next week for the discussion of third reading. Mr. Chairman, this government cannot stop us discussing this until the end of the week. We are going to discuss it until the end of the week. They must accept full responsibility for whatever course is followed. Any pretence that we had it in our power at any time to guide the course of this debate through our actions is misleading.

What does the Prime Minister mean when he says it would have been possible for members opposite to have let the sections pass so that we could have got back to section 1? How much control have we been permitted over these proceedings? We asked the Prime Minister to give us an opportunity to get back to section 1. I asked that immediately when I pointed out the other day that his gesture meant nothing unless he was prepared to say immediately he would take the appropriate steps to return us to a discussion of section 1. When the Prime Minister's willingness to see a real discussion of this bill was tested by a vote, he voted against our opportunity to discuss section 1. What utter pretence it is for the Prime Minister to come here this afternoon and in this way suggest that we, in some way, could have obtained a discussion of section 1. We made one proposal that would have made that possible. We offered a vote on the subject which the Prime Minister might have supported and we could have been discussing section 1 for the last two days and perhaps actually getting the rights in that way to which we are now entitled. No, it was not within our power at any time to escape the shackles placed on this parliament by this arrogant government in the course that has followed.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there may be a number of hon. members opposite who have forgotten that they are members of a party which still describes itself as Liberal. They may be willing to submit to arrogant terms of this kind but we are not. There will be no consent to any arrogant proposal of the nature that has been put before us.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Sinclair: What you mean concisely is that you do not want to talk about the pipe line bill.

Mr. Coldwell: If the Minister of Fisheries wishes to speak, I will sit down and give him my place.

Mr. Sinclair: I do not want to filibuster on the bill. I would rather vote for the bill than filibuster on it.

Mr. Coldwell: Would the hon. gentleman care to stand up and say what he has to say? I will sit down while he does it. I am going to support the Leader of the Opposition, Mr. Chairman, in his approach to this proposal which has been placed before us by the Prime Minister. I do not think in the 21 years I have been in the House of Commons I have felt quite as keenly about this parliament as I have during the last week or 10 days. As I said the other evening, I am one of those who have always respected this institution, because I believed it to be the very best kind of institution that was yet devised for our self-government. But when, on the initial stages of this bill, at the very first opportunity, the Minister of Trade and Commerce when speaking on the resolution introduced closure, and then on the various clauses of the bill made a motion to postpone further discussion, I felt we had come almost to the end of this institution as a democratic parliamentary institution. I today am saying that we will not consent to sitting tonight nor, under the threat of closure, will we consent to sitting on Saturday.

The tension in this house has been severe on all of us. Already three members on this side of the house have broken down.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Coldwell: Hon. gentlemen opposite laugh. That shows the extent not only of their democracy but of their human feelings. That is the kind of thing that you would expect to see, as I said the other day, in the old German Reichstag when they rejoiced as men broke under the persecution of Hitler in Germany.

I say this debate has got to the stage where I hope the people of Canada are taking some notice of it. This government has been in power so long that it has become arrogant, and the time has come when the people of this country should have an opportunity of exercising some judgment over what has been done in this house over the last while. If the government believes that the Canadian people are taking this, then let it test it out in a general election. I am convinced that this is, as I said, a travesty on democratic procedure, an abomination, an outrageous thing, and I am surprised that the Prime Minister, for whom I have had, through the years he has been in the house, the very deepest of respect, would come here this afternoon with a proposal of this description and over the last two or three weeks would have allowed this kind of thing to happen that has been happening in this house. Mr. Chairman, I can hardly say any more so I will sit down.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, during the time when the Leader of the Opposition was speaking and more recently while the leader of the C.C.F. was speaking the house gave them ample opportunity to say what they wanted to say with very little interruption.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Low: I am sincerely hoping—

Mr. Pallett: You are supposed to tell the truth there, you know.

Mr. Low: I am sincerely hoping that the two parties on this side of the house who feel so keenly about this situation will grant me the same privilege.

Mr. Coldwell: Hear, hear.

Mr. Low: It is not my intention at the moment to enter into any recriminations; but I do think it is necessary at this time to consider the Prime Minister's proposal calmly and sensibly and not attempt to generate a whole lot of heat and no light.

I know that the two opposition parties who have been fighting this thing right from the beginning feel very keenly. In fact, I have never in all my 25 years of experience in a provincial legislature and in the parliament of Canada seen so-called well-trained minds allow themselves to be whipped up into the kind of frenzy that I have seen here. For the life of me I cannot understand how grown men, so-called mature men, can possibly justify the attitude that has been taken.

The Prime Minister today started out by putting a proposition before the house and I thought I understood him to say—

Mr. Pallett: The word "proposition" is sometimes, as here, associated with evil deeds.

Mr. Low: If the brilliant young man over here who likes to say so much would just contain himself for one second he will have his chance to get up and speak.

Mr. Pallett: No, I will not.

Mr. Low: As his leader so eloquently said a moment ago, he likes to speak standing up; so do I. If they have the courage of their convictions, let them stand up and speak instead of sniping and trying to stop someone else from speaking.

When the Prime Minister put his proposition before us it seemed to me that what he was saying to us was this,—and I believe he used these very words: the leaders of the parties might get together, or representatives of the parties, and discuss whether or not an arrangement could be made to extend the time of this debate by sitting tonight and by sitting on Saturday and on Saturday night. He said that if an arrangement of that kind could be made it might not be necessary to apply any unusual rules to the debate, and I looked at it in that way. I felt that here was an opportunity if the members of this house really want to get down and discuss the pipe line and get the details of all the questions that may be in their minds. Here is a chance for them to have ample opportunity. If they do not want the information and if they do not want to discuss the pipe line, then, of course, they will not accept it.

I am indicating my determination to give every member of this house every opportunity he desires to discuss this matter and to get the information that may be available and that he wishes, and I am certainly indicating right here the stand that our party will take. We would like to join in such an arrangement as this if for no other reason in the world than to make it abundantly clear to the people of this country that we are anxious to give these parties every chance they want to discuss the pipe line and not something else.

Mr. Pallett: Are you voting for or against closure?

Mr. Low: There again we have our brilliant young sniper over here who has not sense enough to keep his mouth shut. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me there is some good judgment that can be exercised in this committee by way of keeping quiet. I never saw anyone listen himself into trouble yet, but my young friend can easily talk himself into it if he keeps up his interruptions.

I was very much interested in listening to the Leader of the Opposition speak of things that he and his party were not able to get by way of answers to questions. There were so many things they wanted to get, and he said that if clause 1 had been before the house for discussion there was so much more that they would have had on which to base a judgment. I wonder whether the Leader of the Opposition can name one single thing relative to this pipe line bill that he and his colleagues have had no opportunity of discussing that they would have been able to discuss if clause 1, 2 and 3 had been before the committee? I challenge him to bring forward one single thing. He cannot do it. It is easy to stand up here and say, "Now, I have said before and I repeat. Let me point out. I put on the record", and then expect that that makes it true. But it does not make it true. I think the Leader of the Opposition should be the last man in the world to expect that would make it true. I deny that the things he has been repeating and repeating and saying and putting on the record are true. They are not.

If these people are sincere in their desire to want to discuss the pipe line and all its ramifications, realizing that the government is up against the necessity of getting the thing through by a deadline, then they will show their good intentions by accepting the Prime Minister's proposal to sit tonight and to sit on Saturday and Saturday night. If they do not, there is no sense standing up here and calling it a travesty of parliamentary procedure, an abomination and all that sort of thing. It is easy to stand up and use exaggerated terms and try to get the press interested, but it does not make the thing true nevertheless.

I am just as anxious as anybody, Mr. Chairman, to have the freest and fullest discussion of this whole matter. I want to see this parliament given every opportunity to consider every part of this proposition, but I wish they would do so. We sit here day after day and listen to the worst claptrap and constant repetition of things that are simply silly for grown men to utter, and we do not hear anything about the pipe line.

An hon. Member: Except untruths.

Mr. Low: Yes, except a lot of foolish untruths. I would like to hear them get down to business and really discuss the matter on its merits instead of using every possible means to carry the thing beyond the deadline so that it will be destroyed.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not going to discuss what the leader of the C.C.F. said. He hopes that the people of Canada are taking notice; well, they certainly are taking notice of this debate. They are being given ample opportunity to take notice of this debate. I do not think they are insensible of what is going on here nor are they insensible of the way in which the rules have been used on this side of the house in an attempt to destroy what the government wishes to get through.

I would like to see hon. members on both sides of the house enter into a real down to earth discussion of the merits of this whole business, taking what time there is now to consider whether or not the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines proposals are worth while and whether they are possible. I would like to see them cut out this foolishness which I think has been the worst demonstration in this House of Commons in all its history.

I am going to close by saying that I would be glad if the whips of the parties would get together and agree to sit tonight, Saturday and Saturday night and give the house a chance to see if it is possible to finish the discussion without the application of closure. I do not like to see closure applied if it is not necessary.

Mr. McGregor: You voted for it.

Mr. Low: Yes, and there are some of the Conservatives who have been lying all over the country saying that we voted for it the first time.

Mr. McGregor: Perhaps they are following your example.

Mr. Low: They are not doing anything of the kind. The hon. member for Eglinton stood up and said we voted for closure the first time it was proposed. We did not because we felt at the time it was too early.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I want to make it quite clear that I did not say they voted for it the first time. I said they voted for it every time except the first time.

Mr. Low: You did not. If you go back and look at Hansard you will see that what I said is true. Anyway, let me explain, Mr. Chairman. We felt that the first time closure was moved in the house on this matter it was too soon. The hon. members of the opposition had not been given ample opportunity to consider the pipe line. We waited to see if they would take the opportunity and they did not. They discussed everything but the pipe line. They horsed around, they played with the rules, they brought up points of order and questions of privilege in every effort that could be made to destroy the chances of getting this thing through by the deadline, and when the next move came to apply closure we supported it then for the very reason the Prime Minister mentioned; namely, that no opposition group has the right to continue indefinitely to try to impose its will upon this whole parliament.

There comes a time in any parliament when it may be necessary to apply closure and I think in view of subsequent events the government quite rightly applied closure to start with. I believe the government, recognizing that it has to take the full responsibility for this measure, has proceeded step by step in the only way that was left to it by an obdurate and ornery opposition, and that was the reason, Mr. Chairman, that we felt we should support the government in their move. We want to see this pipe line built because there are tremendous things at stake not just in Alberta but in relation to the whole country. This is a national issue. This is a thing that is good for the whole of Canada and I think we should look at it from that point of view as we in this group are trying to do.

I sincerely hope that good sense will prevail and that the representatives of the three parties on this side of the house and of the Liberal party will get together and agree to sit tonight, Saturday and Saturday night in order to see if we can obviate the necessity of a further application of closure.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, as one of the whips who might be called to such a meeting if it were held I wish to give the answer to the Prime Minister's proposal in the form of a very brief answer that was made by Sir Wilfrid Laurier on April 9, 1913.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: I know that my hon. friends are sick and tired of hearing quotations from Sir Wilfrid Laurier but they are going to hear more of them before this is over.

On that occasion Sir Robert Borden speaking on closure said:

> . . . that the mere existence of the rule will itself prevent the necessity of its being brought into practice, at least very frequently.

And what was the reply of Sir Wilfrid Laurier? It is recorded in column 7407 of Hansard for April 9, 1913, and I throw these words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier back in the face of the present Prime Minister:

> Holding a terror above our heads.

Mr. Martin: It does not even deal with the point.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, the Prime Minister implied and the hon. member for Peace River asserted that we are being obdurate and ornery and trying to defeat and obstruct the passage of this legislation.

An hon. Member: It is true.

Mr. Knowles: They suggest that is something we have no right to do.

Mr. Lennard: What are we here for?

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the Prime Minister, the present member for Quebec East, to read again from some of the words of the former member for Quebec East, that great Canadian Liberal, Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

An hon. Member: He was the only one of his kind.

Mr. Knowles: This is what he said about the duty of an opposition:

> . . . there are occasions, I repeat, when an opposition or a minority owes it to itself, on account of the strong views it holds upon some public measure, to oppose that measure with all the force at its command.
> This is not a modern doctrine. This doctrine has been in force at all times in the British House of Commons. It goes back to the days of Charles I; the books are full of references to it. The leaders of the house in the time of Charles I, in the struggle against the king to uphold the constitutional rights of the people of England, presented to the King what they called the Grand Remonstrance, and the presentation of the Grand Remonstrance was opposed all night by some members until, it is stated in the books, the house looked like a starved jury. That was an occasion when obstruction failed of its purpose.

I ask the Prime Minister to note the next few sentences in particular. This is Sir Wilfrid Laurier speaking, that great Canadian Liberal whose kind we no longer seem to have. He said:

> On another occasion in 1771, the majority of the house—

An hon. Member: Whoops!

Mr. Knowles:

> —did not want to allow the publication of the debates. That strange position was opposed by a minority headed by no less a man than Edmund Burke, and Burke by whole days of obstruction succeeded in defeating the object of the majority,—

These are the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the former member for Quebec East, which I now direct to the present member for Quebec East:

> —and, as he himself said afterwards, 'posterity will bless the pertinacity of that day'.

Mr. Chairman, I believe the day will come when posterity will bless the pertinacity of those of us in this house who believe that parliament is still free and that we are not called upon to bow our necks to the tyranny of a despotic government.

After a few more choice instances from British history—hon. members who know the life and times of Sir Wilfrid Laurier know how heavily he drew on British history in his defence of the rights and privileges of parliament—he said this,—but before I give this quotation may I say that I support the challenge given by my leader that the Prime Minister take this matter to the country. I say that on the basis of what Sir Wilfrid Laurier said, and I quote:

> As I have said, there are some occasions on which there is a cleavage between the majority and the minority, and then there is an easy remedy, an easy solution. The remedy is not closure;

How many times have we to quote those words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier to get some Liberalism into the souls of hon. members opposite?

The remedy is not closure; it is not the application of brute force.

If I may interject and use those other words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, it is not holding terror over our heads.

The remedy is an appeal to the people. The people, after all, are the judge and the jury. The people, after all, are the parties to pass judgment as between the government and the opposition, as between the majority and the minority.

I say to the Prime Minister that if he feels the minority in this house is seeking to obstruct the will of the majority his answer can be found in the words of his revered predecessor. That great Liberal said that the solution was not to impose closure, was not to use brute force, was not to hold the terror of the guillotine above our heads, but was to follow the only democratic, parliamentary and Liberal course—take this issue to the country. I join in that challenge which my leader and others have made to the Prime Minister—dissolve this house and take this issue to the people of Canada.

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, after having heard during the closing hour of last night the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, who as a big corporation lawyer represents millionaires and defends them, I think it is only right that I as a representative of a labour riding should quietly interject the views of the people. My people being French-speaking, I shall continue my remarks in my mother tongue.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, to remove any misunderstanding on the part of those who would believe that Quebec members have nothing to say about the bill now before the house, I would like to follow the example set by my colleague from Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer) and bring my modest contribution to this debate.

In my humble opinion, not for years had a bill so momentous, of such far-reaching consequences, been introduced in this house. And although, in an attempt to prevent the opposition from properly debating this bill a motion for closure has been voted by a majority skilled in the abuse of its overwhelming power, we feel it our duty to use our few remaining minutes of freedom to express our opinion.

This pipe line project, a huge or even colossal undertaking, will entail an expenditure of $90 million, 90 per cent of which will be paid, for the present at least, by the Canadian taxpayers, while the remaining 10 per cent will be contributed by a foreign company chosen, designated and desired by the government.

Parliament is therefore asked to approve a loan of $80 million for a project which will cost $90 million, a loan that will bear interest at 5 per cent and which has to be refunded on April 2 next, that is April 2, 1957, by the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited, because that is the company concerned in the bill.

Mr. Chairman, this brings me to denounce at this time the blatant contradiction of our friends opposite; they seem to be fond of contradictions whether they be at Ottawa or Quebec.

Mr. Chairman, with the help of American capital, but for the benefit of our province, we have undertaken to develop the vast natural resources with which Providence has endowed the province of Quebec.

In Ungava, in northern Quebec, are the world's richest deposits of iron and other ores. We have thought that the development of these rich deposits would benefit not only the province of Quebec but the whole population of Canada. As we could not find elsewhere the hundreds of millions of dollars of Canadian capital needed for this development, and thanks to the excellent credit of the province of Quebec, we have succeeded, Mr. Chairman, in getting the necessary money from American investors.

I have said a moment ago that this will benefit the province of Quebec and also, I believe, the majority of Canadians.

Mr. Dupuis: And the electoral fund as well.

Mr. Dufresne: We could come back to that later if my hon. friend wishes to do so.

Mr. Dupuis: I will speak about it later.

Mr. Dufresne: If my hon. friend had at least the courage of his opinions, he would not stay in his seat; he would be bold enough to stand up when he speaks.

Mr. Dupuis: We will come to that later.

Mr. Dufresne: Some people claim that this is not to the advantage of the province of Quebec but this considerable development of our resources not only yields corporation taxes but creates thousands of jobs, ensures the continuous growth of our economy and helps to set up new industries in a district so long neglected by our Liberal friends. Corporation taxes would bring in still more money, Mr. Chairman,—

Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation

Mr. Boisvert: Tell us something about the pipe line!

Mr. Dufresne: —If the Ottawa centralizers were not depriving provinces of their best means of revenue. We, in the province of Quebec, welcome American capital to promote the development of our natural resources, under the control of the owners of those resources and in the best interests of the people of our province and of our country.

But what a contrast to behold now, Mr. Chairman! In Quebec, we are using American capital to develop our natural wealth for our own benefit. Therefore, over $300 million were earmarked and spent for the discovery and development of our iron ore, and over $125 million were used in the building alone of the railway between Seven Islands and Knob Lake. Some people claim that our ore is being sold at a cent a ton, but I challenge anyone to prove it, for in fact the province of Quebec gets 75 cents a ton for the ore now mined in Ungava.

Mr. Boisvert: What about the pipe line?

Mr. Dufresne: When I discuss it, you will probably be still less interested, and I shall ask my good friend, the member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Boisvert) not to tire himself in the meantime.

Mr. Boisvert: Nothing ever tires me when you are doing the talking.

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, here is what is happening now at Ottawa. With the help of a subservient majority, and contrary to the wishes of the Canadian people and in spite of their protests—one has only to read the newspapers to see that—the government takes $80 million of the Canadian taxpayers' money and lends it to foreigners, to Texas promoters, friends of the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), who will come to Canada to reap large profits and batten on the work and sweat of our fellow citizens.

We have there a blatant contradiction, Mr. Chairman; the time has come to let the Canadian people know on what side those men are sitting who, by a contradictory stand which I will not qualify because the words I would use would not be parliamentary,—do not care much and have no respect for truth.

The people of Quebec are developing, I repeat, our natural resources with the help of American capital, through a project approved by the people of Quebec and by all serious and thoughtful Canadians. Yet what seems very strange—and I wonder, Mr. Chairman, if you have noticed what is now taking place in the house and some distance from the capital—since the beginning of this undertaking, that is since American capitalists came to the province of Quebec and started to explore and develop our vast natural resources, a man stood up in this house to contradict those who criticize the undertaking, and to assert that it was the only possible solution to ensure the development of our natural resources. He then spoke with authority, because the right hon. Prime Minister and member for Quebec East (Mr. St. Laurent) thereby approved the development of those areas and lauded the perspicacity of the man who now administers the affairs of the province of Quebec by using that capital.

What did we see then? Following that statement, every Liberal member, particularly those from the province of Quebec, frantically applauded the words of their leader, the right hon. Prime Minister. What is the situation now? What do we see today? The same members who then applauded the Prime Minister are now taking, in the Quebec election campaign, a stand which is the very reverse of their former one, since they are supporting the provincial Liberal leader, who goes on making rash, foolish and ridiculous statements on the Ungava project, and they applaud him frantically—

(Text):

Mr. Boisvert: Mr. Chairman, on a question of order.

An hon. Member: There is no question of order.

Mr. Boisvert: Yes, there is a question of order. There is no question of the election in the province of Quebec with respect to that bill, and the hon. member is dealing with the provincial election in Quebec at the present time.

Mr. Dufresne: On the point of order.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Brown, Essex West): I draw to the attention of the hon. member that we are now discussing Bill No. 298, an act to establish the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation, clause 4. If he has something further to say on clause 4, he may proceed.

Mr. Dufresne: On the said point of order—

Mr. Boisvert: The point of order is decided by the chairman.

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, will I be allowed to answer the point of order that was raised by my hon. friend from Nicolet-Yamaska? I think it is the right of an hon. member—

An hon. Member: No point of order.

Mr. Dufresne: I am just trying to contradict —and I have succeeded in contradicting—the Liberals who are sitting right now in this House of Commons.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Brown, Essex West): Order.

Mr. Dufresne: I am just telling the people of Canada at this moment that they say one thing in this House of Commons and, when they are back in the province of Quebec, they say exactly the contrary to what they say here. It is about time that we had one policy throughout Canada from this party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: It is about time you had a policy.

(Translation):

Mr. Dufresne: That is why, Mr. Chairman, I hasten to tell my hon. friends opposite that it is high time they tuned up their fiddles, because they are making themselves increasingly ridiculous in the eyes of the public.

Mr. Chairman, the people of this country now realize only too well that the sole aim of the members of the Liberal party is to get into power and hang on to it, and nothing else. Little do they care about the welfare and prosperity of the people of Quebec or the whole people of this country. Somehow the Liberals of today remind us of the Hitlerian hordes, during the last war, who thought of themselves as of a superior race, descended from the gods—

Mr. Dupuis: That was Mr. Bennett's statement.

Mr. Dufresne: Well, he was talking sense, and my hon. friend from St. Mary might attempt to do as much.

Mr. Dupuis: Before he went over to England.

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, we are not opposed to the building of a pipe line. However, we demand that the representatives of the people, wherever they may sit in this house, be given a full opportunity to discuss this matter in a free parliament, under a truly democratic system such as we are supposed to have in this country.

In the last analysis, Mr. Chairman, it is proposed here to spend $80 million of the taxpayers' money. No doubt the right hon. Prime Minister will say that a million dollars is "peanuts", that such a sum represents perhaps one pound of "peanuts". However, we must admit that the taxpayer has to foot the bill; it is he who has worked to produce these millions levied as taxes by the government.

However, Mr. Chairman, we are in favour of private enterprise. Now, hon. members opposite will say that this is truly private enterprise but, in my opinion, it is irresponsible private enterprise. I am convinced that, on the 1st of April next, the government will again ask parliament to extend the powers which it now proposes to give to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited.

Mr. Chairman, what are the methods used to reach these objectives? It has been pointed out time and again that, even before the motion of first reading was adopted, the government applied closure. The representatives of the people, and therefore the people themselves, are being deprived of the right and privilege of expressing their views on the matter, a right and a privilege recognized in any democratic parliament or constitution. Moreover, what has happened in this house in the last week or so has seriously and considerably impaired the Canadian parliament. We had never seen a bill so undemocratic. The government invites a foreign company to come to Canada and tells them: "You are going to tell Canadians what they should do. You are going to tell the taxpayers, with unprecedented impudence: Whether you like it or not, we are going to lay our hands on 80 millions of your money," money earned through hard work, owing to the conspiracy of the government and, incidentally, through the influence of the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). The most objectionable means in a democratic parliament are now being used and imposed in order to block any discussion on this matter. And so those sharks will say to us: "Whether you like it or not, we will become multi-millionaires with the money of the Canadian people", that money as I say, which they earned through hard work.

Well, Mr. Chairman, let me define in my own words the present position of the government as far as the discussion of the bill that is now before us is concerned. It is a "hold-up" of the people's money to the benefit of foreign interests, a hold-up perpetrated with the sordid complicity of the right hon. Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Trade and Commerce and all those who sit in front of me and applaud the government's action.

Mr. Chairman, there have been many references, in this house, to centralization. Small wonder that all provincial powers are being centralized in Ottawa, in the face of all this striving to centralize all procedures and rules of the house. This closure rule, this gag, this guillotine, no matter how you choose to call it, is nothing less, Mr. Chairman, than a most shameful sabotage of our parliamentarian institutions. Those who claim to be the saviours of the race are now, more than ever, the worst threat to our beloved freedoms. They have just made a gigantic step that will rapidly lead us to a shameful dictatorship, unless we use all the democratic measures at our disposal to put a stop to the slavery which awaits us.

In my opinion the position taken by the Liberal members is the most degrading deceit our parliament has witnessed since 1867.

Mr. Dupuis: Nonsense!

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, I shall not take the time to notice the interjections of the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Dupuis). We know that his interjections are intelligent, and I sandwich the word intelligent between quotation marks.

Mr. Dupuis: Well, what do you know!

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, I wonder who advised the cabinet to resort to that shameful procedure of closure, which now forces the opposition to fight with all its strength to get out of that concentration camp in which the government has placed it. It is surely not our taciturn Prime Minister who, but a few days ago, finally put an end to his silence and delivered his maiden speech, his first since last January.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Very smart!

Mr. Dufresne: It is surely not the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, although he has tremendous powers, which he uses and even abuses.

I asked myself a question, Mr. Chairman, and I would like to say it aloud this afternoon. Would it not be the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. St. Laurent), who stated himself last September that he was the adviser of the Prime Minister, the grey eminence of the government, who was supposed to make his baneful influence felt behind the scene. Would he not be the one who, some morning, softly whispered, in a very filial way, into the ear of the Prime Minister the word closure, because he was of course able to see the Prime Minister of Canada in his pyjamas.

Mr. Boisvert: Why don't you talk about the pipe line bill, which is before the house?

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Dufresne: The hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska does not like pyjamas!

Mr. Boisvert: Never mind my likes or dislikes, and come around to the pipe line, will you?

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, let us not try to fathom that mystery. Rather let us mournfully consider what will happen to our freedom, unless we react!

And then, those very people who resort to closure, who approve of this procedure which had never been seen in a Canadian government, who are undemocratic, go about in the province of Quebec talking about dictatorship, suggesting that a certain administration is a threat to responsible government for which Papineau and Mackenzie have fought! Is it not the very statement made the other day in Montreal by the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Pinard)?

Mr. Pinard: I was perfectly right in saying so, and you know it.

Mr. Boisvert: Talk about the pipe line!

Mr. Dufresne: It is clear that the Liberal party wants—

An hon. Member: Progress.

Mr. Dufresne: It seeks to grasp all governments, federal and provincial, to satisfy its thirst for power, to enslave us and to deprive the Canadian people of what is left of its national pride.

I have here, Mr. Chairman, a very edifying photograph. It was reproduced in Le Devoir and shows the provincial Liberal leader in the province of Quebec, the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) and the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Pinard)—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dufresne: My hon. friends' enthusiasm may cool down a bit when they have taken a good look at what two Ottawa ministers are doing to the one who represents them in Quebec. Does it not look as if they are in the process of putting handcuffs on the Liberal party leader in Quebec, just as if he were the slave of his Ottawa masters?

Here is another picture, Mr. Chairman, showing a free man, who does not belong to the Liberal party, who is not afraid to speak in this house to assert his own and every Canadian's right to freedom. I am speaking of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming).

Mr. Chairman, what the Conservative party wants is a committee to give full consideration to the matter, and to decide whether it is in Canada's interest to lend $80 million of our taxpayers' money to a foreign corporation. Why not appoint such a committee? Because they are afraid of questions, on the other side of the house. The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Pallett) asked some questions which will most probably remain unanswered.

An hon. Member: Why don't you speak about the pipe line!

Mr. Dufresne: We want a committee that will allow full consideration of the bill now before the house.

Mr. Dupuis: Three cheers for the Lacombe act!

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for St. Mary has just uttered a word that painfully struck home. For the past few years I have been sorely tried, and I am still beset by—

An hon. Member: Heavy expense.

Mr. Dufresne:—trials which Providence has seen fit to impose upon me and which I accept like a good Christian. That remark by the hon. member for St. Mary is a cowardly remark, and could only be spoken by a coward such as the hon. member for St. Mary. I hope he will have the courage to repeat outside the house what he just said. Fat-head! No wonder the people of Quebec keep repeating just now "Like father, like son". The hon. member for Dollard (Mr. Rouleau) is not quite as brave as he would have us believe. He is more often behind the curtains than in front of them.

Mr. Chairman, we have asked that the matter be referred to committee, and we will keep on asking it, in the hope that our request will be granted, if there is a little freedom left in this house.

Judging by the press reports we read every day, the people of Canada favour the opposition, the Conservative party, which is now fighting mightily to secure the necessary information in connection with the bill now before the house. If however, the government feels so sure of their strength, of their numerical strength that is, of their arguments which everybody denies, let them call a general election. It is their duty to consult the people on this important matter of public funds expenditure. Then all Canadians, not only those in the province of Quebec, but all over the country, will be able to look at the coat of arms of the province of Quebec and say: "Je me souviens" (I remember). If the government should go to the people, they would get the people's reply.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I have a correction that has to do with the figures I gave on the cost of gas. The figures appearing on page 4426 of Hansard for May 29, at the end of column 1 and the beginning of column 2, relating to interruptible gas are in error. They were quoted as being the current revised rates, but were read from an unrevised tabulation. The following are the figures quoted, followed by the correct current revised figures: For Manitoba I said 23 cents and it should be 18 cents; western Ontario, 28 cents should be 25 cents; northern Ontario, 32 cents should be 29·5 cents; central Ontario, 33 cents should be 30 cents; eastern Ontario, 33 cents should be 30·5 cents. Hon. members will find that the figures appearing on page 4428 are correctly stated.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You had better get Trans-Canada to revise its statement in Washington.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Michener: Arising out of what the minister has just said—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Brown, Essex West): Does the hon. member wish to rise on a question of privilege?

Mr. Michener: I was asking the hon. member who is taking the floor if he would permit me to ask a supplementary question.

Mr. Dupuis: You can ask your question afterward. You have been asking so many questions you should let somebody else speak, unless the minister wants to answer.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes, please.

Mr. Michener: I have been looking at the corrected figures and I should like to draw the attention of the minister to the fact that this statement appears on page 4428 of Hansard for May 29, in the second column:

> During the first three years only, gas may be accepted at Canadian-United States border at 75 per cent load factor, with price payable to Trans-Canada 27·27 cents per MCF.

Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation

I then call his attention to the corresponding price in Manitoba at the top of the first column at 75 per cent load factor, which is 28·3 cents. It seems to me this indicates that the price on the Canadian side will be higher than the price on the United States side.

I refer back to the question I asked the minister earlier in the day. Was not the C.B.C. wrong in putting the reverse interpretation on those figures in this morning's eight o'clock news broadcast? I find no case in the earlier prices which will be charged by Trans-Canada where the prices charged on the Canadian side will be less than the prices charged on the United States side.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I am glad you called my attention to that fact. If the difference is as stated, it must be corrected because the electricity and gas exportation act provides that Canadian gas cannot be sold outside of Canada at a price lower than the sales price to Canadians under similar conditions and at similar distances from the source of supply in Canada. I will have the situation looked into and any required correction made in the schedule.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Trans-Canada corporation is making that representation in Washington.

Mr. Coldwell: I wonder if the minister would permit one more question in regard to the prices he quoted? How firm are they, and for what period of time do they remain?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Twenty years in the case of Winnipeg and 25 years in the case of Tennessee Transmission in the event of that contract becoming firm. There is a proviso in the contract that unless the gas can be taken by a certain date the contract becomes void.

(Translation):

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Chairman, as it is urgent that this pipe line bill be put through, I wanted to avoid dealing with that question, in order, precisely, to allow the hon. members opposite to be heard so they might stop complaining at the top of their voices that they were being deprived of free speech, but when I chanced to overhear the ravings of the hon. member accidentally elected in Quebec West, I thought I should step into the breach.

Mr. Dufresne: Just go out in Quebec West and see whether I was elected by accident.

Mr. Dupuis: I thought I should step in and show up the game the hon. member for Quebec West is playing in this parliament. He plays exactly the same game as the Conservative and the C.C.F. members are playing now in the hope that their obstructionist tactics will have some effect on the provincial elections which are now taking place.

Mr. Dufresne: We don't need that.

Mr. Dupuis: But that at least will confirm my opinion to the effect that—

Mr. Dufresne: Have you ever had any opinions?

Mr. Dupuis: —that the Drew-Duplessis axis is a live factor in our province, and one well supported in this house by the hon. member for Quebec West.

Mr. Dufresne: This is not exactly brilliant.

Mr. Dupuis: Brilliant or not, let us go a bit into the evidence of the hon. member for Quebec West, which must be taken into account.

Mr. Dufresne: It was not evidence, it was a conviction.

Mr. Dupuis: Let us see what the Drew-Duplessis team really means: it is probably the reason for the amount of filibustering we are getting from that side of the house. Do you want to know what was published in the ridings of Bellechasse and Temiscouata during the last elections? I shall read it out in French.

(Text):

For the edification of my English colleagues I am going to translate the circular which was published by friends of, if not by, the hon. member for Quebec West. It will prove at the same time that there is certainly a union with Duplessis in our province, but I wonder whether there will be such a union after I read this to my friends which was again, I say, published by close friends, if not by the hon. member for Quebec West. Let us see what he was saying. I shall again revert to French, but please be patient; I am going to read it in English and hon. members will be edified.

(Translation):

An election was going on in the ridings of Bellechasse and Temiscouata, and that is what his friends, or the representative of the Drew-Duplessis axis himself, published at that time:

What your vote means.

(Text):

Again I tell my English colleagues that I shall read it in French first and they will be astonished that such a thing should be published in the province of Quebec by friends of, if not by, the hon. member for Quebec West. The report is from his own party. They know about the circular.

(Translation):

Here is what the circular said:

Even if you have full confidence in the present federal administration, you do not know who will soon be at the head of this predominantly Anglo-Protestant government.

You cannot run the risk of having such a government, which would be hostile to the French and Catholic elements, and persecute the Quebec French Canadian race.

Under the present system of subsidies, the Ottawa government would have the necessary weapons to starve and crush the province of Quebec.

I skip a portion of it.

A vote for St. Laurent is a vote for slavery. A vote for Bérubé is a vote for freedom.

Mr. Dufresne: This was copied from the Liberals.

(Text):

Mr. Dupuis: I am going to translate this. Do you want to know what was published during the last election in Bellechasse and Temiscouata? "Even if you are entirely satisfied with the present government, you do not know who will be at the head of this government whose majority is composed of Anglo-Protestants".

Mr. Dufresne: Have you the courage to give names?

Mr. Dupuis: I say there is no name. You hide yourselves, as you always do. "You will not take the risk with such a government that will be hostile to the French and to the Catholics, who would prosecute the French Canadian race in Quebec". Again I am telling this to my Anglo-Protestant friends.

Mr. Michener: On a point of order, I want to thank the hon. member for St. Mary for yielding the floor to me a minute ago. Is it his contention that the pipe line is being extended to Ville Marie or Bellechasse, or some place beyond Montreal?

Mr. Dupuis: No, that is not the intention at all. I want to say to the opposition that one of their main reasons for putting up opposition in this parliament at this time is that there are two elections going on, one in Saskatchewan and one in Quebec, and I am proving that there is an alliance between Drew and Duplessis in my province.

Mr. Dufresne: You yourself spent the last two weeks campaigning.

Mr. Dupuis: It is true.

(Translation):

It is quite true that the Drew-Duplessis alliance will be celebrated at Quebec. This is what I read in Samedi-Dimanche of March 13, 1955:

An important political event is under way at Quebec. In fact, we have learned that friends of Mr. Wilfrid Dufresne M.P., of St. Sauveur, are preparing a celebration, to be held at the Little Coliseum of the Exhibition Park . . .

Just like a circus. That is my own word, and it is the only one.

The purpose of this meeting is to emphasize the great work done by Mr. Dufresne at Ottawa for his electors and his fellow-citizens of the province of Quebec.

I would also add for the Conservative party. That has not yet been denied and I defy him to deny it now.

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member for St. Mary has just said that there is in the province of Quebec what he has called the Drew-Duplessis-Dufresne axis.

Some hon. Members: Are you ashamed of it?

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, I wish to state—

An hon. Member: This is not a point of order.

Mr. Dufresne: I must have the right, in this house, to refute a statement which is inaccurate and groundless.

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I think the whole committee appreciates my position. The hon. member for Quebec West is rising on a point of order. I am going to ask him to do me a favour. I am not capable of following his point of order in French. I know he is able to give it to me in English. If he is rising to ask questions of the hon. member for St. Mary, who took his seat, then I have no desire to interfere with him.

Mr. Dufresne: For your benefit, Mr. Chairman, I shall refer to his comments in English.

Mr. Dupuis: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Dufresne: I am speaking on a point of order right now.

Mr. Dupuis: Go ahead.

Mr. Dufresne: I would like to tell my friend the hon. member for St. Mary—

Mr. Dupuis: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Dufresne: —that the axe he is speaking about concerning Drew, Duplessis and Dufresne is in his mind and in the mind of the Liberal party. If I am connected with my leader I have no objection at all, because I am proud of my leader and I shall continue to follow my leader, the Leader of the Opposition, no matter where he is in this country.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I would suggest to the hon. member for Quebec West that this is another case of an interjection because he did not agree with something said by the hon. member who technically has the floor. If the hon. member for Quebec West feels his remarks were misinterpreted or that for good reasons he should interrupt, I will assure him he will have an opportunity to make corrections—not necessarily to make another speech—at the conclusion of the remarks of the hon. member for St. Mary. The point raised by the hon. member for Quebec West is one of debate and not one of order.

(Translation):

Mr. Dupuis: Well, Mr. Chairman, I would not have thought that the hon. member for Quebec West would back me up so soon in proving once and for all, and definitely, that the Drew-Duplessis axis is a fact in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Dufresne: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member for St. Mary has no right to distort my words. I have spoken clearly enough, and I think that my statements in this house are clear enough to be understood. I said that the axis he mentioned exists only in the minds of the Liberals. However I am proud to follow my leader and to see my name linked with that of the greatest prime minister the province of Quebec ever had.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Chairman, I would not distort, as he said, either the words of the hon. member for Quebec West or the hon. member himself, for he is distorted enough already. If I can give him a piece of advice, I would urge him to keep cool. Otherwise he will join the three members who, they say, are ill for having taken part in that marathon which has been going on for so long in this house.

Mr. Dufresne: The same thing might be asked of the hon. member for St. Mary.

Mr. Dupuis: We will now go on with our remarks without paying any attention to those of the hon. member for Quebec West.

As I say, at the next elections he will get what is coming to him—

Mr. Dufresne: We will be waiting for you.

Mr. Dupuis: I will be ready to meet you whenever you wish, tomorrow, next week, where and when you wish.

Mr. Dufresne: Very well, it is a deal.

Mr. Dupuis: Don't forget to bring your leader, Mr. Drew, of whom you are so proud—

Mr. Dufresne: Sure I am proud of him.

Mr. Dupuis: He will then be able to make speeches on family allowances and tell us that we are a defeated race, as he once said. Bring along your leader!

[The Deputy Chairman.]

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Dupuis: Bring him on; we shall be expecting him.

I shall now continue my remarks. I had stated that, in my humble opinion, there is no doubt—

Mr. Dufresne: You do have an opinion?

Mr. Dupuis: —that the present obstruction stems from the provincial elections now under way in two provinces. I have not yet spoken of provincial elections—

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Dupuis: Let the hon. member for Quebec West bide his time; I am coming to that!

An hon. Member: You will lose nothing by waiting.

Mr. Dupuis: I come back to the gas pipe line. There have been many references in the province of Quebec, to the Prime Minister's statement that it was in the interest of Canada to bring in foreign capital. What the right hon. Prime Minister said—and I know that he can well speak for himself,—but if I understood him correctly—

(Text):

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order—

(Translation):

Mr. Dupuis: —he did not say, he did not approve—

(Text):

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order—

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order I would like to draw to your attention—

(Translation):

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Chairman, I would like to continue my remarks—

(Text):

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I must hear the hon. member for Quebec West on a point of order.

Mr. Dufresne: I would like, Mr. Chairman, to draw your attention to the fact that the hon. member for St. Mary has not very much respect for the Chair because instead of addressing his remarks to you he is most of the time talking to the gallery upstairs. I wonder if there is a delegation from St. Mary up in the gallery listening to the many things he is speaking about?

(Translation):

Mr. Dupuis: I can say at once to the hon. member for Quebec West that I first took the precaution to state that I had not intended to speak. As I am a truly great representative of the people, I am not afraid to turn to the people, to speak to people in the galleries, even to the press gallery, and to all those who honour me with their attention.

Mr. Dufresne: This is the climax of the comedy.

Mr. Dupuis: If you really mean to be the representative of the people, I presume that you will not shirk your duty. That is your problem. But, as I say, we are going to talk about pipe lines. Once again I say that we of the Liberal party were never opposed to foreign investments in that province, but we did oppose the policy of giving away our natural resources to foreign interests and of dilapidating the province according to the requirements of campaign funds of the party supported by the hon. member for Quebec West in the coming election.

Mr. Dufresne: I do not support it, I do not even take any part in it.

Mr. Dupuis: No, Mr. Chairman, the word has gone around to "Keep Dufresne under cover. He cannot be shown in public."

Mr. Dufresne: You make a handsome picture, yourself.

Mr. Dupuis: For the last few days we have heard much about closure which has been applied perhaps by necessity—in the first case, perhaps somewhat out of time—I will give here the benefit of the doubt—but definitely to prevent a filibuster. Members have talked about closure. Well, the members of the opposition have been given an opportunity to show that they were serious. Let us remember that, in my speech on the budget, I urged Conservative members to be consistent, to show a little logic. Well, I make the same request today. The right hon. Prime Minister has just asked, in a democratic way, in this house, to give more time to the opposition to state its case against the bill now under consideration.

Now, these very people who, in this parliament, are the official representatives of inconsistency refuse the additional time that we are ready to allow them by sitting tonight and all day Saturday. All I ask the members of the opposition is to be a little more consistent. Instead of claiming in season and out of season that democracy is threatened—

Mr. Dufresne: It is true.

Mr. Dupuis: We are making a democratic offer and the very people who claim that the rights of parliament are being scuttled do not want to sit here when they are offered the chance to do so.

They keep clamouring that this pipe line will be of no profit except to American financiers. There is none so deaf as those who don't want to hear. How many times has the minister of Trade and Commerce repeated in this house that 51 per cent of the equity capital of the company will be offered on the Canadian market? That is, to my mind, a sound assurance.

Secondly, this gas pipe line—as has been so often said in this house—will be built entirely on Canadian territory. It is certainly not a sellout of one of our natural resources, as when the premier of the province of Quebec sells out the ore for one cent a ton for shipment to the United States. We will have a pipe line all across the country, that will be a source of wealth for certain of the provinces, and at the same time of benefit to them all. That is all the difference.

But they say that the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines is an all American concern.

I can look at you; I can look at anybody. There is no standing order under which one may only look at the hon. member for Quebec West.

Mr. Dufresne: I don't like to be stared at in this way.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Chairman, it has been assumed in certain quarters that the main interests, or even all interests in the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines are in American hands—

Mr. Dufresne: 83 per cent.

Mr. Dupuis: The Hon. Edouard Asselin, attorney general of the provincial government of Quebec is a director of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited. Is he an American? Indeed, I have just been told that Mr. Asselin was a director of Trans-Canada. Is the Hon. Edouard Asselin, attorney general and the right hand of the Hon. Maurice Duplessis, premier of Quebec, and a director of the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines corporation, a Canadian or an American?

Mr. Dufresne: He is not attorney general.

Mr. Dupuis: I don't know just what position he holds. Is he attorney general?

Mr. Dufresne: Nor that, either.

Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation

Mr. Dupuis: Nobody knows what their responsibilities are in the National Union cabinet. At one time, they are here and, at another time, they are there. At all events, he is close to the premier of the province, he is his right hand man, he gives him advice, most of the time, when a decision has to be taken. I am being reminded that Mr. Asselin is a member of the legislative council. It may be that the hon. member for Quebec West never forgets anything, but I do admit that I am not infallible, and I correct the mistakes I make.

Therefore, Mr. Asselin—

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Dupuis: Am I through?

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. gentleman's time has not expired, but even though this debate has been extraordinarily general, if I may say so, the pipe line seems to have extended from Vancouver island to the far end of Newfoundland and I do believe that the hon. member who now has the floor is discussing matters which it would be extremely difficult to connect not only with clause 4 but with Trans-Canada Pipe Lines or Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation. I would ask the hon. member in the time which he has left to come back just a little closer to the bill.

Mr. Dupuis: I am sorry, and I really mean it, that you do not understand French. Hon. members on the other side have said that this is being done with all United States capital and by all United States interests. I am simply trying to prove that Edouard Asselin, who is the right-hand man of Hon. Maurice Duplessis, premier of the province of Quebec, is one of the directors of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines. He is not an American, he is a Canadian. That is all I was trying to prove.

Mr. Dufresne: Oh, oh.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Chairman, are you taking account of all this nonsense that is being said and allowing me time?

(Translation):

So, Mr. Chairman, we do not fear going to the people on this matter. However I am wondering, as was the other day a Social Credit member from Alberta, what our Progressive Conservative friends would do if the right hon. Prime Minister decided to call an election. They would surely be very downhearted and in despair; they would become so pale as to look quite like white sepulchres, as they are.

[Mr. Dufresne.]

Mr. Dufresne: We would come to power faster than is expected.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Chairman, I speak loud, but I keep calm and I am in a particularly good humour. We must, as I say, revert to logic.

Mr. Dufresne: True you had wandered far from it.

Mr. Dupuis: Are the opposition members sincere? Are they? Do they or do they not wish merely to have time to discuss this matter? Then, as pointed out a while ago by the leader of the Social Credit party, here is excellent opportunity to prove it. In a democratic gesture the Prime Minister tells the opposition: "You complain of not having enough time to discuss this question. We will give you the opportunity to debate it further, though you have spent your time interrupting the work which could otherwise have been done. We offer you the opportunity of further debate, by way of three extra sittings. We offer you the opportunity to make your point." But what, the opposition refuses this democratic offer.

How do they expect the people to believe them when they will say that we have gagged them, while we have followed the course of wisdom in adopting the bill within a prescribed time.

Mr. Chairman, before concluding my remarks, and in case there is a misunderstanding as to the closure rule to which my hon. friend from Quebec West referred a moment ago, I would like to state—

(Text):

An hon. member tells me that I have three minutes left. I believe I have six minutes, but I will leave that to the chairman to decide.

(Translation):

The hon. member for Quebec West cried out that, contrary to all democratic principles, we are refusing them the freedom of speech we cherish and which has been conquered by our forefathers and our great Canadian heroes who have died on the battlefields. We have used the right conferred upon us by the rules, which were imposed and referred to by the Conservative party. Well, we are using it to good purpose, and the difference between the decisions of the Speaker and the lack of freedom of speech in the Quebec parliament, and what is happening in this federal parliament, is that here it is not the prime minister who rules on points of order, but the Speaker himself, whose authority is adequate to maintain order and who, in support of his rulings, brings in recognized authorities on parliamentary procedure.

Moreover, if he happens to make a mistake, which is very seldom, he immediately corrects his error. That is why I wonder what would have happened to the Speaker of the legislature of Quebec if, like the Speaker of this house, he had made a decision not approved by the prime minister. What would have happened to the chairman of the legislature if he had called the prime minister of the province to order? That is the difference between the application of the closure rule which is in force in the federal parliament and the prevention of the freedom of speech in the parliament of Quebec.

In closing my remarks, may I say this: You want to discuss this matter, you do not want to waste time, then take the opportunity offered you by a democratic prime minister and show that you are not mere jokers.

(Text):

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Chairman, I think the committee appreciated your suggestion that the debate should come back to an area somewhere between the Saskatchewan border and Quebec. Even though there are elections pending in those extremities, perhaps it would be advisable to stress the matter now before us more than has been the case in some instances. I for one am quite happy to bring it back from the somewhat exotic and extraordinary happenings which take place during an election in Quebec to the equally exotic and extraordinary legislation which is before us.

The Prime Minister, during the course of this debate, has occupied his seat in the house for practically the full time. He has been most assiduous in his attention, and one would have thought he might have acquired during these many hours an appreciation of the feeling of the house, and indeed of this committee.

But unfortunately, if we are to judge from the statement he made today, he has lost touch completely with what is the feeling in this committee. He suggested to us that if we really want to discuss this legislation we should meet tonight and on Saturday.

On the face of it that was an offer which was perhaps reasonable. But what was the reason for it? The government had decided that this legislation had to go through by June 7. Why June 7 was chosen I do not know, but June 7, as far as the government is concerned now, is merely a date which affects its prestige and its pride. I am quite sure that were this legislation not passed until the 8th, 9th, 10th or 15th of June it would not affect the future of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines one iota.

We on this side might have listened to the Prime Minister when he suggested that we meet tonight and on Saturday, were it not for the unhappy fact that he bungled his opportunity. Behind his offer he had a threat. In one instance he asks us to bail his government out of the mistakes and bungling they have committed, and then he threatens us with closure if we do not assist them.

We are not prepared to negotiate with a club hanging over our heads, because we are not the sort of docile group which the Prime Minister has been in the habit of leading. We are not prepared to yield to threats. What my leader said today holds good. If we can stop this legislation in any way whatsoever within the rules of the house we intend to do so, and every time an error such as was made by the Prime Minister today is perpetrated again it will be of further assistance to us.

When I last spoke in this debate I dealt with other errors. I dealt not only with errors but with misstatements of fact, with broken promises and, indeed, with the lies of those who had been the sponsors of this pipe line and who made these misstatements and these lies to a committee of this house and to the board of transport commissioners. At the conclusion of my talk I was dealing with the financial situation of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines, and that is what I want to deal with now.

Before I go further, let me point out that there is not too much validity in the objections of the government to our statements that there is a subsidy involved in this. There is no subsidy in the loan to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines, but there is a partial subsidy to this foreign-owned corporation. We realize that the creature of this government, the industrial development bank, lends money to Canadian industrialists only at 6 per cent, yet the government are prepared to lend money to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines at 3½ per cent in one area and 5 per cent in another. It has been remarked on other occasions in this house that they are prepared to charge 5½ per cent to anybody who wants to build a home under the National Housing Act, but this company is being given money at 3½ per cent or 5 per cent. Were Trans-Canada to borrow money on the market it could not possibly do so at these rates. The differential, therefore, is the amount of subsidy.

There have been several financial statements presented, some to the board of transport commissioners, and those which I have in my hand to the minister last year. One of the documents is Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited's preliminary financial report dated September 22, 1955, which was produced as an order for return. I want to comment on certain aspects of this proposed company.

First of all let me deal with the proposed capitalization. The total is $376 million, made up of first mortgage and other bonds of some $282 million, subordinated debentures of $47 million and common stock of $47 million. The financing of this corporation is following along completely parallel lines the financing of similar corporations in the United States. The reason for that is very simple. The smaller the amount of equity capital, the greater the profits which can be distributed to the holders of that equity capital. These gas pipe lines in the United States have been notoriously successful financially. Large bond issues have been floated, the bonds have been paid off and those who held the equity stock, the common stock, the risk capital—call it what you will—have made really fantastic profits out of their venture.

There is a rather interesting aspect to this business of common stock. As I have said, it is going to be $47 million, or precisely 12½ per cent of what this company calls its proposed capitalization. This is made up of 750,000 shares at $8 a share to the founders. That is a total of $6 million. There are 4,208,800 shares at $10 to the public, but at only $9 to the company, which represents $37,879,200. Then we have a third type of share, and rather an interesting one. The company proposes to float what it calls subordinated debentures, and these debentures are going to cost those who can buy them $53.32. The debentures will cost $50, and attached to each debenture there will be a share of common stock in this company, which will be sold at $3.32. I am sure that there are not many Canadians who will be able to buy subordinated debentures with the privilege of buying shares at $3.32.

Now let us find out from the estimates given by the company just what sort of financial return is going to accrue to those who will invest their money in Trans-Canada Pipe Lines. At the back of this document there is a series of exhibits or schedules, and they are worth some examination. The first schedule I want to examine is that which projects income on the basis of sales of 183 billion cubic feet a year, which amounts to approximately 500 million cubic feet a day. We know that as of now Trans-Canada Pipe Lines has contracts for 340 million cubic feet per day: 200 million cubic feet south of the border and, on the minister's word which I accept, 140 million cubic feet already in Canada. If the need for gas in eastern Canada is as great as it is said to be, and I believe it to be so, then within a very few years, perhaps a matter of months, this discrepancy between 140 million cubic feet and the 300 million cubic feet which would be necessary to bring the total flow up to 500 million cubic feet a day will disappear. Within a matter of a year or so, I submit, this company will be carrying 500 million cubic feet a day, which is the equivalent of 183 billion cubic feet a year.

On that basis we have a projected financial statement. In 1960, on the basis of 183 billion cubic feet, the company expects to pay to the ordinary shareholders who invested $10 each, 5 per cent per annum, and to the founder shareholders 6 plus something per cent per annum, and to the preferred shareholders who bought their shares at $3.32 about 15 per cent per annum.

One would think that for a public utility that was an adequate and fair return. There is nothing at all wrong with this projection from the point of view of the safety of the whole proposition. After all, Trans-Canada will be a monopoly, and if it goes through it is going to be extraordinarily profitable—but even much more profitable than this projection would suggest, because there is still another projection, this time on the basis of 235 billion cubic feet a year. That would mean that approximately some 650 million cubic feet per day would be flowing through the pipe. We will have a pipe line in western Canada which can carry at least 720 million cubic feet.

Two hundred million cubic feet will disappear at Emerson. The other five hundred million will be used to service Canada. It might well be within the bounds of possibility, if the need is as great as we are told it is, that the sales of this company will be close to 235 billion cubic feet within a very short number of years. But in that case what happens to the profit and loss situation of this corporation on the company's own projection of income?

By 1962 they anticipate that the government will have been paid back and that after all depreciation has been charged, after all bond interest has been paid and after income tax has been paid, the sum of almost $10 million will be available to those who have invested their money in equity capital in this company. Those who were responsible for this projection suggest that the dividends in these years would be in the neighbourhood of 15 per cent to the person who paid $10 a share; almost 20 per cent to the founders; and to those inordinately fortunate people who bought the shares at $3.32 the dividend would be equivalent to 45 per cent.

Are we entitled to think those figures are correct? On the say-so of the Minister of Finance the other night I think we can accept them, because the minister was very optimistic about the future of this company. As reported at page 4141 of Hansard he said in part:

> Bless your soul, if this project gets going we will have enough money for all the things you have asked for.

He was dealing with the amount of revenue which the government would derive from taxation. When this undoubted exaggeration was checked up he said this:

> I shall enter my little caveat to say I was quite right; literally, we would have enough money for all the projects . . .

He was referring to all the projects which he had in mind at that particular time. Therefore the Minister of Finance thinks this is going to be an extraordinarily profitable operation. The only people who do not think it is going to be extraordinarily profitable are those who are behind it; those who have the capacity to put up the money but who refuse to do it; those who come to this house and to this government and, as indigent millionaires, ask the taxpayers of Canada to lend money to Trans-Canada which is going to be in a position to pay an average of almost 20 per cent on its share capital.

What is the catch in it? Where is the catch? One would think there must be something very wrong. There is not much catch. The answer is that these foreign corporations are playing Canadians for suckers. They are taking the government for a ride, and the government is trying to pass that ride on to the Canadian people.

Let us consider the assets of just two of the companies which are financially interested in Trans-Canada Pipe Lines. They own almost one-third of the shares in that corporation. I am not dealing now with actual Canadian creatures. I am dealing with the parent corporations in the United States, one of the parent corporations being Gulf Oil and the other being Continental. The total assets of these two companies combined, according to the last figures I have—and they are two years out of date—are almost $2½ billion. The earned surplus of Gulf Oil two years ago was $658 million alone. The earned surplus of Continental was $204 million. Here we have a total earned surplus of two of the companies which own one-third of the shares in Trans-Canada of $862 million. Yet they cannot find $80 million with which to finance even the western leg of this pipe line.

What about their cash and securities? Gulf Oil had $379 million in cash and securities; Continental had $70 million in cash and securities. That is a total of $449 million which could be almost instantaneously translated into cash. Yet they cannot find $80 million with which to finance the western leg of this company in which they have a 33 per cent interest. There is something more than rotten in the state of Denmark.

We are told that Canadians cannot finance this venture. I doubt whether Canadians have been given much opportunity to finance this venture, but willy-nilly Canadians are going to finance it; because the government have said, "We are prepared to put up the capital and we are prepared to subsidize this company from the point of view of interest".

Many arguments have been raised by the other side about national ownership, and the position of the government is legitimate from their point of view. We regard ours to be equally legitimate from our point of view. But we have been told that it will be difficult to secure permits for the export of this gas from Alberta.

Let us consider the situation. We have seen the Social Credit party weeping tears about the trillions of cubic feet of gas which are in Alberta just waiting to be sold. From what Mr. Manning has said and from what the hon. member for Peace River has said are we to infer that Alberta is not willing to sell gas to a nationally-owned pipe line? Is that the position that Social Crediters take? If it is, obviously Canadians may be Social Crediters but Social Crediters are not always Canadians. It would be quite close to treachery not only with respect to the interests of the province but with respect to those of the people of Canada as a whole to deny the sale of gas to a pipe line merely because it was publicly-owned. It would be an act so infamous that I do not think the premier of Alberta would dare to do it. Yet we have the hon. member for Peace River implying that such may be the case here.

He has done some odd things in recent weeks. I remember not long ago he told everybody who would listen to him that there was no connection whatsoever between his party and the union des electeurs in Quebec. Yet when the union des electeurs enters into an alliance with the Liberal party the hon. member for Peace River reads the riot act and condemns them for wrongful doing. What difference is there between what the union des electeurs is doing in Quebec and what the "socred" sycophants are doing in their support of the government here? They are bedded down with the Liberals in Ottawa just as they are bedded down in Quebec.

Mr. Hahn: Did you quote the hon. member for Peace River?

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I have quoted the hon. member for Peace River. I told you what he said.

Mr. Hahn: What page?

Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): There is another aspect of this matter. We were told last year that Gulf Oil—this United States owned, this United States dominated company, would not sell gas to a government-owned pipe line. I should like to know just how much truth there is in this statement. I should like to know in what way the government has genuflected toward this corporation and accepted their word for it. If the government wanted to go ahead and get the gas there is no question in my mind that they would be able to do so, despite the denial of these Americans of the sale of gas to a government-owned pipe line.

We have been told it would be difficult to get a permit from the board of transport commissioners, and that sort of argument is really reducing absurdity to the nth degree. The board of transport commissioners is another creature of this government. All that need be done would be for the Minister of Trade and Commerce to send one of his men down to the chairman and tell him to call a meeting of the board and approve the permit, and it would be passed.

There is another argument which has been advanced. We have been told that only Trans-Canada has the pipe. It is true that Trans-Canada has an option on the pipe. We are told that no other company can get this peculiar size, 34-inch pipe. But if Trans-Canada has an option on that pipe, I suggest that if the government are interested in public ownership—and unfortunately they are not interested—all they have to do is take over Trans-Canada Pipe Lines in the same way Eldorado was taken over during the war; buy out the shareholders, and then we have the pipe. The pipe is available to build that system under public ownership. There can be no question about that. The pipe may not be available to private entrepreneurs who wish to build their own pipe line, but to say the pipe is not available as an argument against public ownership is merely arguing against the facts of the situation.

We were told by the minister that a pipe line which was nationally owned would be difficult to operate, that there would be conflict between the producers and the consumers. Yet if the government were to take over Trans-Canada Pipe Lines it would take over its present contracts. This company has contracts with producers starting at 14 cents per thousand cubic feet and working up gradually by a quarter of a cent every few years. The contracts are already there. There might be some difficulty with contracts at the other end, with the distributors, but we also know there are already about 140 million cubic feet per day in contracts. We also know that demand in this province of Ontario is very great. I cannot see any great difficulty in finding other distributors who would be only too happy to sell that gas and pay for it. There would be no question about the price, because the price to the producer has already been settled. The only duty would be to see that the price to the consumer was not too inflated so that the majority of people would get the benefit of the gas. This could be done to some extent, in fact appreciably, through government ownership.

Then there is another aspect which has not been brought up in this house, and that is the inflationary nature of this legislation. We are told that we are in an inflationary period. The government has become somewhat alarmed about it and so, through the Bank of Canada, interest rates have been increased. The chartered banks' reserves have been cut down so that they, in turn, have reduced their loans to even the most legitimate borrowers on the Canadian scene. I have had case after case of house builders coming to me and saying, "I cannot get a loan from the bank, and I am finding it even more difficult to get loans from insurance companies to finance the housing which is needed in this country."

There is an inflationary spiral it is true, possibly to some extent under control. Does one imagine for a moment, if we accept the word of the Minister of Finance that the creation of this pipe line will lead to a capital expenditure of a billion dollars, that this will not add appreciably to the inflationary spiral in this country? Yet we have newspapers like the Winnipeg Free Press, whose economics are still somewhere in the dark ages, arguing that it may be inflationary in eastern Canada but it could not possibly be inflationary in the west. It is a fatuous argument to use in a closed economy. As a matter of fact, the income of farmers in the west may be much lower than it has been in other years, but the cost of those things which they have to buy is still as inflated as ever.

There have been arguments put up in favour of this proposition and we have answered them. We are prepared to continue to answer them, but we would like to hear some of the arguments against what we have to say. Instead of that we are faced with this legislation which is completely riddled with anomalies and that, of course, is the end result of a government which is confounded by its own confusion.

Mr. Hahn: Mr. Chairman, in taking part in this debate I may say I was somewhat surprised, not at the attitude taken by the leader of the official opposition or the C.C.F. in so flatly turning down the Prime Minister's proposal, but that the Prime Minister had not seen the depths to which these great Canadians on this side of the house would sink in order to deliberately do away with an enterprise that could be to the general advantage of Canada.

In so far as this matter of completely sabotaging the pipe line is concerned, as was proposed by the leader of the C.C.F., I say that he definitely was opposed to any plan which would make it possible to bring the parties together as suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. I suppose this was understandable because the C.C.F. are such strong adherents to the socialistic principle of nationalization of everything they can get their hands on.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North who just spoke attributed, in typical C.C.F. style, certain statements to Premier Manning. They were to the effect that Premier Manning would not make gas available to the people of this country if the pipe line were nationalized. I know of no instance in which the premier indicated such an attitude. When I interjected and asked the hon. member to let us have the reference he failed, quite deliberately again to tell us exactly what the reference was, but in typical C.C.F. fashion he did make statements and reiterated them time and again in regular Hitlerian fashion, hoping the people of this country would believe him and the C.C.F. It is the typical smear method.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in reference to the alliance between the Social Credit group in Quebec or the union of electors, with whom we do not associate ourselves, and the Liberals, there is a great deal of difference between two political parties aligning themselves for election purposes and a political party or group supporting a bill in which they have full confidence and which they feel the people of the country actually want.

I have frequently heard the phrase used in this house that an argument has degenerated into a debate. I believe I am right in saying that this particular debate has gone from the sublime to the ridiculous. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister and other cabinet ministers as well have indicated that there is urgency in passing this legislation if the proposal is to become a reality. These realists in the opposition who oppose the bill have indicated they do not believe there is any urgency. They can see no value to it.

On the other hand, provincially speaking, the premier of Ontario, the premier of Manitoba and the premier of Alberta have indicated that they feel there is urgency in having this legislation passed. They feel that natural gas would be a great asset to every province through which that line would be built. Until today apparently the premier of Saskatchewan has been silent. I noticed with particular interest that one of the most vocal C.C.F. members, who from time to time has suggested to the members that this thing was going to be filibustered to the greatest extent possible and that we had seen nothing in so far as the defence production bill was concerned, has failed to say anything in this debate. I am referring to the hon. member for Assiniboia. I am wondering now whether the fact that he happens to represent the same area federally that the premier of Saskatchewan represents provincially is an ominous factor in that respect. Possibly the premier has suggested that they want the pipe line but you boys go ahead and fight it on a public ownership basis; the big majority which the Liberals have will put it through anyhow.

The hon. members for Spadina and Peel indicated in their speeches that they know nothing about natural gas. Some of the things they said certainly indicated they have never used it, have never seen how it was run in production and have very little knowledge of what it can do. While I can appreciate that some of the questions were being asked by reason of the fact this is a new substance so far as they are concerned, I could not help but feel that they were talking through a gas line most of the time. They were groping in the dark so far as that matter was concerned.

A suggestion has been made from time to time that this should be a Canadian investment. The Conservatives particularly, and the C.C.F., have said that Canada should build this line. They have said, "We want it for Canadians and Canadians alone." No party in this house is more desirous of seeing every Canadian have the privilege of using natural gas than the group in this corner, for many of us have experienced in our time the joys of having natural gas in our area. I am looking forward to the day when the Westcoast Transmission line will be built through my own district so that I too will enjoy that privilege once again.

I am going to refer to the speech of the hon. member for Spadina of yesterday, which is to be found at pages 4448 and 4449 of Hansard. He had this to say with respect to investments:

> I have been in the mortgage business for a long time, and I can tell you that the deal before us right now is one with respect to which I can easily understand why these people do not want to put their money in it. No one knows anything at all, and yet the government want us, the people of Canada, to put money into a thing like this. I would not touch it with a 10 foot pole.

Now, Mr. Chairman, here we have an honourable Canadian who says he would not touch this thing with a 10-foot pole. On the one hand he clamours and clamours for Canadians to invest, or to have the privilege of investing, in a pipe line in Canada. On the other hand he says we have not the money in this country for it. Let us have investment. That is the picture. Let us invest. What for? For political purposes only.

That is all we have had from this side of the house in opposition to this bill. The great Conservative party, or the once great Conservative party—probably I should modify it—stands up in this house day after day and for political purposes states that it is for Canadians. They say, "We want this for Canadians and for Canadians only." They have the chance to invest up to 51 per cent, and it has been said up to 60 per cent, in this line; yet those who have the money are not willing to come forward and invest a 10-cent piece in it. They, the great emancipators of the Canadian way of life, the great parliamentarians, deliberately went out of their way time and time again to try to get kicked out of the house for defying the chairman.

There is no man who enjoys freedom and who wishes for it more than I do, but at the same time I feel there is a time and a place for everything. At the beginning of the discussion of this bill we opposed closure, and we would do it again under similar circumstances. Along with the opposition we would oppose the invoking of closure if they had continued to devote their time to discussing this particular bill. Oh, no; we spent two full days discussing nothing but procedure.

I am satisfied that it is up to the opposition to protect our rights. I am also satisfied that I must make up my mind on one of two things. We want this bill for the people of the country. Possibly we can show our good faith by not supporting closure, as we did at the beginning. Perhaps we should give the government the opportunity to bring in this legislation and discusss the merits of the bill, and then go back to the people and let them know what an arrogant government we have and that they should reduce the majority or eliminate it altogether. Certainly we should not use the method that has been used here day after day, particularly after the Prime Minister has been good enough to suggest that those of us who are prepared to support the bill are willing to sit here Wednesday night and all day Saturday.

It will be noticed that none of the Social Crediters spoke yesterday. Why? Because we wanted to give the opposition a chance to talk about the bill. What did they do? They talked about closure and procedure for most of the time. In so far as we are concerned the matter now rests on this base. The opposition do not want the natural gas line built. We have heard time and time again foolish utterances from children on this side who say, "Oh, this pipe-line bill could wait a couple of years; it does not mean very much to the people of Canada."

Well, let me read to them—perhaps they are not listening and will not be able to understand if one does read—the report of the royal commission on the metropolitan development of Calgary and Edmonton. Their findings are found in chapter 10 at pages 14 and 15. I do not intend to devote the whole of my time to reading this report, but I think it is important that they understand that this report is based on the development of the oil industry in the province of Alberta. It tells us something about what its effect might be upon the rest of the people of this country. Section 7 says in part, in dealing with resource development and urban growth:

> What is forgotten however, is that every great development of natural resources causes the cities and towns to grow much more than the farming, forest, and mining frontiers which are being developed.

There we have the matter of indirect growth. I am satisfied that those areas in which farm implements are manufactured realize there would not be any farm implement industry if there were no agricultural west. Reading on we find that the same thing is going to apply and does apply in the oil industry. I continue:

> In the post-war oil and construction boom in Alberta too, the bulk of the population increase so generated has been elsewhere, especially in the United States and eastern Canada.

The province of Alberta has not enjoyed the great increase in population, although it has enjoyed some of it. Its effect has been elsewhere, especially in the United States and in eastern Canada. Do not let anyone here tell us that the oil industry does not affect the rest of Canada, and particularly the eastern part of Canada.

In the last paragraph on page 15 we read this:

> Again, out of the oil investment in 1952 in the province, of some $360 million (excluding payments to the government) only some $44 million appears to have been spent directly within the province.

Where do you suppose the rest of it was spent, in Timbuktu or in some place like that? It was spent right here in the eastern part of Canada and in the United States. Let us not be so childish in our attitude toward this thing. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway suggested that they were challenged, and I am satisfied he did so in good faith. He came back to this house and tried to talk us into some sense of sane reasonableness instead of childish bickering over procedure. At this time we have a job to do in this country, and I am saying it should be done and it must be done now, not 40 years from now after the atomic age has come into effect, at a time when Alberta sits, as it does, on one-seventh of the world's coal and still has a 50-year supply of gas in the ground.

I say the opposition are holding up this bill for political purposes. From time to time they have read political extracts from great newspapers across this country. I find that a newspaper editorial is the opinion of one man only, and I am going to read the opinion of another editor. It is true he comes from the province of Alberta; he publishes his newspaper there. Fortunately—I almost said "unfortunately"—both in British Columbia and in Alberta we have been blessed with not having the newspapermen support the Social Credit party, so no one can accuse me of reading a Social Credit version of this thing. This comes from the Camrose Canadian, and is dated May 23, 1956. It deals specifically with this problem. The editor of a small paper said this. He is just a small home-town man and knows the views of every householder in his area. The editorial reads in part:

> We do not profess to know the whole story, but we do know that if Alberta gas is to be transported to Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec without the tragic delay of some three or four years, the federal government must come to the rescue. While nominally conservative in our political thinking, we cannot subscribe to opposition leader Drew's opposition to the legislation.

Mr. Ellis: You took time to find it.

Mr. Hahn: No, I did not. It was sent to me. The hon. member quoted the Regina Leader-Post the other night, and read an editorial about Saskatchewan socialism and its gas policy and compared the price of 90 cents paid in Rosetown-Biggar for natural gas. Ask the people of Maple Creek about their natural gas situation.

You, the hon. member for Regina City, do not have to tell me anything about Saskatchewan. I lived there for a few years, and I know the gas situation there as well as in Alberta, and that is a great deal more than I can say for you because you are going to enjoy it for the first time while I enjoyed it for many years past.

I read again:

> While nominally conservative in our political thinking, we cannot subscribe to opposition leader Drew's opposition to the legislation. We think it is well for the opposition to stand out for all the facts and figures to be laid upon the table for all parties to investigate,—

That is the reason we are in committee. I think that is the reason the Prime Minister today suggested we should have four days left as a committee to discuss this bill, but that has been turned down.

An hon. Member: There is no chance to discuss the first three clauses.

Mr. Hahn: No, not so long as we continue in this ridiculous fashion and will not permit the whips of the parties to meet and come to some determinate action so we can get in and ask questions about this thing, instead of continuing in this foolish fashion.

Mr. Ellis: You voted to postpone the clauses.

Mr. Hahn: Not at all. I continue:

> —but to obstruct the progress of the legislation for apparently political reasons alone, we cannot endorse at all. If it were practical at the moment, we think the C.C.F. approach is preferable to that of the Conservatives.

Here is a Conservative who feels that the C.C.F. approach would be more practical than is the present approach of the Conservatives. I can understand the editor's feeling in that respect, as I am sure any truly honest Conservative in this house today can. What is their policy? They endorse the McMahon proposal which will take 400 million cubic feet of gas into the United States instead of 200 million.

I am told that the hon. member for Broadway—or rather Broadview, although possibly he comes from Broadway—says that his party endorses the McMahon proposal. The hon. member for Prince Albert early in the debate said they wanted this gas for Canadians but their endorsation is to send 400 million cubic feet of gas to the United States and to retain 100 million cubic feet for Canadians. That was the McMahon proposal, as I understood it.

Continuing with this editorial:

> The main thing to be considered is to get a Canadian fuel to the doors of millions of Canadian consumers. Alberta has the natural gas in sufficient quantities to last for fifty to sixty years, even if no further fields were tapped than are now known. By that time scientists will have solved the problem of converting Alberta's abundance of coal into gases that can be transported by pipe line.

Mr. MacDougall: Attaboy.

Mr. Hahn: It has been suggested from time to time, Mr. Chairman, that the matter of getting the pipe line built is not important and that we can wait for two or three years. Why not wait for 40 years? We did with the shipment of Albert coal out here, with the result that they still have it in that province.

Mr. Ellis: You waited five years for Trans-Canada Pipe Lines.

Mr. Murphy (Westmorland): Down, Wimpy.

Mr. MacDougall: Quiet, Wimpy.

Mr. Hahn: We have waited for a beginning on this line, I am not denying that. I am pleased that you brought it up. I believe the government is largely responsible for that delay and I would support you in that, but I will not support you in the tactics you are using today.

Mr. Knowles: Is the hon. member addressing the Chair?

Mr. Hahn: I beg your pardon, sir?

Mr. Knowles: Is the hon. member addressing the Chair? Is the Chair responsible?

An hon. Member: Enough of your childish technicalities, Stanley.

Mr. Hahn: Pardon me, Mr. Chairman. I have been brought to order again by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who no doubt looks forward to sitting in your place some day. It has now been pointed out to me that the hon. member has been appointed as assistant to the chairman. I am told that this is his new vocation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I said earlier I am interested in finding out exactly what the Conservatives do support. Do they support the McMahon proposal? It is a very simple matter to come into this house and be critical but let us have something else to offer in place of it.

I hear that the Conservatives want natural gas in this area but apparently they do not want it very quickly. Here again I wonder quite seriously if we are not beginning to feel the effect of the United States coal lobby and the United States gas lobby in this house in delaying this bill at this time. It is quite possible in view of the particular methods that are being used, Mr. Chairman. The United States coal and gas industry is willing and prepared, as I understand it is doing in the United States today, to stop natural gas from this country going into the United States. They want this very lucrative market that we have in this area as well. They want to keep it for their own. Certainly the expenditure of a few more millions would not stop them, I would say.

Coming back to our Tory friends, I would like to pose this question: Where will another pipe-line company get the necessary pipe? Hon. members of that group have tried in their own way to answer that question. Another question I would like to ask is: Where will this man McMahon, or anyone else, get gas? You have to have contracts for these things. Surely it is for sale and there is no denying that, and I would not doubt that McMahon or anyone else who is prepared to build the line could eventually obtain contracts, but it takes time and you just do not draw up contracts overnight. As far as the people in the province of Alberta are concerned, time is of major importance. This is also important to the rest of Canada, because this is an urgent problem today.

Has any other company purchased a right of way to build the gas pipe line? Where have these honoured gentlemen been for the past five years, three years or even two years? How is it that they come in at the last moment each of them saying, "We have a new plan. This is the thing. Take this. This will keep everything in Canada". No, Mr. Chairman, I cannot go along with that kind of reasoning.

An hon. Member: Trans-Canada was not asking for a handout two or three years ago.

Mr. Hahn: As I began to say earlier, this is not a question of natural gas alone. This important project also involves by-products, propane, butane and sulphur. I feel that my own province will benefit very directly from the fact that sufficient sulphur will come from this particular project to supply the whole of this country with all its sulphur needs. We speak about saving Canada for Canadians. Here we have an industry which will be built up. We will have rubber plants—

An hon. Member: And rubber money.

Mr. Hahn: I regret that I did not hear what the hon. member had to say. With the passing of the present bill petrochemical plants will be set up on the prairies and in Ontario and there will be an increase in population. All these things should be taken into consideration when we are considering postponing the construction of this line for two years. By building this line today we are going to create in Canada at least 20 new industries, and our economy requires these secondary industries.

I forget the exact figure used by the minister the other day in discussing our imports. I believe four million tons of coal per year was the figure used. A bit of computation will show that that works out to about 109,500 million cubic feet of gas on the basis of b.t.u's. One ton of coal is equal to 27,375 cubic feet of gas, and if the price of coal is $28 per ton in this province a bit of simple arithmetic will show that the consumer could be charged $1 per thousand cubic feet for natural gas and still be saving money. That in itself is an important factor. The price quoted is much below that and will be much below that.

In closing may I suggest that if hon. members will just take time to think this thing out reasonably we will all be cooking with gas.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, the first thing I should like to bring to your attention today is the rather unusual and desperate tactics which have been used by our friends of the Social Credit party. Apparently they have been selected by the government to be the hatchet men for the Liberal party. Some of the tactics used and some of the expressions and terms we have heard from them directed toward members of the other opposition parties make Senator McCarthy seem like a babe in arms. This business of guilt by association, which the hon. member for Macleod dealt with yesterday, is based on the simple logic that if Mr. Bulganin and Mr. Khrushchev like bacon and eggs for breakfast, then if you like bacon and eggs for breakfast you are a communist. That is exactly the logic used by the hon. member for Macleod.

Apparently some hon. members of the Social Credit party, particularly the last speaker, the hon. member for New Westminster, seem to think that parliamentary procedure is of no importance, that the important thing is getting things done. That indicates the respect for parliamentary institutions which the members of that party have. It almost reminds me of some of the neo-fascist parties that spring up in other countries from time to time.

The discussion of Bill No. 298 has two aspects. First of all there are the merits of the bill, and second there are the shocking methods used by the government to force this bill through parliament, both this house and from what we heard this morning the other place as well. We all want a pipe line, let no one misunderstand that, but we do not want it under the present conditions. We do not want this pipe line built with the money the Canadian people are being asked to put up to enable United States financiers to make enormous profits. If they want to put up their own money to build it, as they said they would in the first place, let them do it. They have broken their promises and the government is now trying to bail them out.

Bill No. 298 is being rushed through on the pretence that there is great haste required to build this line, but the end certainly does not justify the means being used in this case, particularly when that need for haste as an excuse is supported only by Social Credit members for vague and invalid reasons.

With regard to the bill itself, I do not intend to repeat some of the things that have been said by hon. members. This party and the C.C.F. party have been accused of repetition and I am not going to make any repetitious remarks. One of the principal shareholders in Trans-Canada Pipe Lines has been aptly described by a United States magazine as a "wheeler-dealer" from Texas. Mr. Clint Murchison's connections with Trans-Canada Pipe Lines have been well described. The various aspects of his connections have been well described by other hon. members and I do not intend to repeat them.

However, I think it might be of interest to hon. members to find out just what happens when Mr. Murchison gets control of a public utility. I have before me a copy of the Indianapolis News of April 6, 1956. Apparently Mr. Murchison controls the Indianapolis Water Company, a public untility which presumably supplies water to the citizens of Indianapolis. I quote from this newspaper as follows:

> The Murchisons of Dallas, Texas, have sold 25 per cent of their common stock holdings in the Indianapolis Water Company at a profit which may be close to $1 million.
> Sale was made "about April 1", according to James H. Clark, Dallas, a major stockholder and an executive assistant to the Murchisons.
> Clark refused to disclose the sale price, but the stock has been quoted at about $39 a share. John D. Murchison and Clint Murchison Jr., who made the sale, bought the stock in 1952 when it was quoted at $18.
> The shares sold, which went to unidentified Indianapolis investors, were "about 25 per cent of the stock" held by the two Murchisons, Clark said.

Then the article goes on further to deal with the control of this utility by saying:

> Clark told the News, in response to a question whether the Murchisons still owned "working control" of the company:
> "That's a fair statement (that the Murchisons do have working control). When it comes to the orthodox things, we do have working control. But if we tried to do something silly, we wouldn't have."

I have been told that the reason the shares of this water company in Indianapolis rose in value was that the rates were increased when Mr. Murchison got control, which forced up the price of the stock because it then became a more lucrative investment. I know perfectly well that hon. members opposite will say that the board of transport commissioners would control the rates charged by Trans-Canada Pipe Lines. We have heard that before and it is quite true; but the fact is that this government has done everything it could to assist Trans-Canada Pipe Lines during these last few years. I do not think there is much doubt that if some time in the future Trans-Canada Pipe Lines were operating this pipe line and wanted the rates increased and could advance any kind of argument, the board of transport commissioners would undoubtedly permit the rates to be raised.

Many methods have been used by this government to force this legislation through parliament. Since this debate started we have had various types of closure applied. The first closure was applied before the discussion had even started, which was a most unique and significant happening in Canadian parliamentary history. We are now in the committee stage and are faced with the fact that clauses 1, 2 and 3 of the bill cannot be discussed. As hon. members know, if the first clause of a bill is foreclosed, to coin a phrase which has been used several times, it simply means that the questions you would like to ask in respect to financing cannot be asked.

Now we are getting around to a different type of closure which was proposed today by the Prime Minister. It really is not a different type of closure; it is the same old thing, but it has a rather shocking corollary.

I wonder if anyone really believes that the date of June 7 set out in the agreement between the government and Trans-Canada Pipe Lines was not put in at the instigation of the government. As hon. members know, the agreement provides that if the money is not voted by parliament by that date Trans-Canada Pipe Lines is not obligated to finish the job by the end of this year. Does the government really believe this is an excuse for the haste it is harping on at this time? No, not at all. This was merely an excuse by the government to use the device of closure in a new and vicious form so that debate on this bill could be cut down, and so an excuse could be found to prevent the reference of Bill No. 298 to a proper committee where all the devious and mysterious goings-on and activities behind this bill with Trans-Canada Pipe Lines could be brought to light.

Only before such a committee as that would hon. members of this house be able to find out the answers to a great many questions. For instance, we heard the hon. member for Middlesex East, my colleague say that a telegram had been received from a company in Welland saying that by the early part of next year they would be able to make 34-inch pipe, and we heard from the government that nobody could make this pipe except certain companies in the United States and so forth.

That is the kind of thing about which we would like to find out. Very few hon. members, apart from the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Public Works and perhaps one or two others, are engineers. We are told that 34-inch pipe is the size of pipe that is necessary. Perhaps it is. I am not saying it is not; but if we could call witnesses before the committee, if this were referred to a committee, we could find out what would be the optimum size. Maybe some other size would be just as good, or it might be better to use two smaller sized pipes. It might be more expensive, and again it might not. There are many questions like this to which we should like to know the answers. Unless the bill were referred to a committee, there is no possible way of finding out.

With all respect to the front bench of the government party—and I know quite well, as I have said, that some of them are engineers—nevertheless hon. members could find out the answers to these things if we were to call experts and get the opinion of other experts. I imagine some of these things are not necessarily facts but are very often matters of opinion.

Certain members on the government side have said that the Minister of Trade and Commerce gets things done, and that is why he should be allowed to go ahead with this. I believe the hon. member for Mount Royal in his speech the other night made that reference, and I know it is the attitude of many other hon. members opposite. It is the attitude of the senior member for Halifax and the hon. member for Waterloo North that the important thing is to get things done. That is their opinion, but it is not the opinion of other hon. members.

This excuse of expediency and efficiency all throughout history has cost the lives of democratic governments. If the only excuse were expediency and efficiency, hon. members would be well advised to set up the type of government they have in Russia and formerly had in nazi Germany. Those governments were certainly efficient and expedient but certain other things, which I think hon. members realize, were lost in the process. Throughout history we have had plenty of examples. I have some of them before me. I am not going to waste my time or the time of other hon. members of the house in quoting lengthy examples from history to show how expediency and efficiency have destroyed democratic governments in the past, but I should like to make one or two references, and I would point to the example of Athens, Rome and Venice, where they had democratic governments, and to the parallel case in England in the time of Oliver Cromwell.

I see there is a little time left before six o'clock, and I should like to refer to the experience of Athens. There is a remarkable parallel in the way Athens originally lost its democracy to the situation of today. I should like to refer to a book by Basil Hammond called "The Political Institutions of the Ancient Greeks." I shall quote briefly one paragraph concerning the time when Athens was threatened. It reads as follows:

> The part of Alcibiades in the revolution consisted only in giving it a start by raising false expectations of a Persian alliance. His agents went to Athens, and there Pisander, who took the leading part among them, addressing the assembly of the citizens, urged that the only hope of salvation for Athens lay in an alliance with Persia, and declared that that alliance would be made if they would invite Alcibiades to return, abolish their democracy, which was not to the liking of the king of Persia, and set up in its stead an oligarchy which the king could trust. The assembly was grieved at the prospect of losing its democratic constitution, but under the stress of circumstances gave some kind of provisional approval of the proposed change.

That was in ancient Athens. That was the first step they took to lose their democracy. They received a proposition they could not investigate. They were told they had to hurry up to get it through in order to make the alliance, and so they hurried it up without investigating it properly, and that finished off their democratic government.

A little later we had the same situation with the Romans. Again the Romans were compelled time after time to use dictatorial powers of government to expedite matters because it was more efficient. What happened? As all hon. members know, the senate of the people of Rome became so used to the undemocratic processes that it was an easy mark eventually for the dictator, Julius Caesar, to take over.

Hon. members may think such a thing cannot happen here. We may wear different clothes and we may have automobiles and television; the physical things such as that may change, but human nature does not change one iota from one generation to the next. Once the thin edge of the wedge—and in this case it is a not so thin edge of the wedge—is inserted, it is the beginning of the destruction of democratic processes. When expediency and efficiency are the arguments used to destroy the rules of parliament, it is the first long step toward the destruction of democracy itself.

It is six o'clock. May I move the adjournment of the debate?

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: We shall continue with this tomorrow, sir.

PRIVILEGE

MR. HANNA—REFERENCE TO REMARKS IN DEBATE THIS DAY

Mr. R. F. L. Hanna (Edmonton-Strathcona): May I rise on a question of personal privilege. Earlier this afternoon the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the leader of the C.C.F. party, made reference to the unfortunate fact that certain members of this House of Commons have fallen ill in recent days. He followed that up with the accusation that this announcement by him was greeted with laughter from the Liberal benches.

Mr. Fleming: It was, too.

Mr. Hanna: I wish to deny that I laughed at the misfortune of any hon. member who is unfortunately taken ill, nor do I believe that any member on this side of the house did or would laugh.

Mr. Fleming: They did.

Mr. Hanna: My point is that I challenge the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar to name the people he accused of laughter at this report. If he cannot name them, I suggest that he withdraw that remark and have it stricken from the record.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I heard the laughter, as everyone else on this side did. I did not pay any particular attention as to the gentlemen, or the men, who were making the noise, but it was largely over in that corner of the house, and I point over there now.

Mr. Claude Richardson (St. Lawrence-St. George): If I may, on a question of privilege I certainly deny any laughter.

Mr. Bell: We are narrowing it down, anyway.

Mr. Speaker: At this moment we should not take the time of the house to try to identify who has or has not at a certain moment of our proceedings been laughing. Has the leader of the house announced the business?

Mr. Harris: I did, sir. I said that this debate would be continued.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Question

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

HEALTH AND WELFARE—SCIENTIFIC RESEARCH

Question No. 449—Mr. Huffman:

What has the Department of National Health and Welfare done in the field of scientific research during the past year?

Answer by: Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare):

The scientific research program of the Department of National Health and Welfare for 1955-56 involved a total of $2,500,000. Of this $570,000 was made available for intramural medical research, $205,000 for socio-economic research in health and welfare, $1,620,000 for grants under the national health program in aid of medical research and $105,000 for cancer research sponsored by the national cancer institute of Canada.

INTRAMURAL PROGRAM

The intramural program encompasses those investigations carried on by the various technical and scientific units of the department and in general is aimed at devising new or improved methods of performing the service functions of these units. It refers particularly to detection and assay work, e.g., that associated with the administration of the Food and Drugs Act, and studies of new techniques such as in the control of biological products or the investigation of occupational hazards. Additionally however it may be aimed at gaining new knowledge of public health importance or related to urgent national health problems of a nature not ordinarily undertaken by a single province, university or research institution, concerning which the department may be looked to for leadership and guidance.

Allocations for the intramural research program totalling $570,000 were distributed as follows: civil aviation medicine division $2,500; dental health division $18,000; epidemiology division $31,000; food and drug directorate $112,000; laboratory of hygiene $257,000; nutrition division $35,000; occupational health division $114,200.

Throughout the intramural program there is an almost inseparable relationship of research to service function and this makes it difficult to define precisely the proportion of the cost which can properly be designated as research expenditure. In many instances the research is a by-product of the service function. Highlights of the intramural program will illustrate this relationship.

Civil Aviation Medicine

In civil aviation medicine, for example, the principal study involves the practicability of audiometric screening in so far as hearing requirements of airline transport and commercial pilots are concerned. This is aimed at establishing audiometric records to determine hearing deterioration as a result of flight duties and investigating effects of continued exposure to noise in civil aviation pilots. Additionally presently effective standards in hearing are being evaluated. Information obtained from these studies will be used in formulating new standards to be applied in assessing fitness for civil aviation licences.

Dental Health

In the field of dental health, investigations are centred chiefly around water fluoridation and topical fluoride therapy. Continuing studies on the dental effects of water fluoridation, studies on the effectiveness and safety of fluoride compounds and the simplification of techniques of administration of topically applied preventive agents, as well as the effectiveness of such applications, make up the main lines of investigation in this field.

Epidemiology

In the area of epidemiology, an extension of air pollution studies will involve the observation of the effects of air pollutants on a more sensitive population, i.e., persons with cardiac and respiratory disabilities. Continuing studies in infectious diseases will involve the further evaluation of the poliomyelitis vaccination program, as well as the measurement of the protective effect of B.C.G. vaccination against tuberculosis. In addition epidemiologic studies of accidents are being broadened.

Food and Drugs

In the food and drug directorate research projects are conducted in different sections of the laboratory services with the object of providing modern and exact methods of identifying and assaying food and drug products with the highest degree of precision consistent with economy of time, material and effort. Other projects are carried out to provide the directorate with basic knowledge on the action and effects of various constituents on food and drugs for the protection of public health and the prevention of fraud. Numerous basic disciplines are involved in these studies, including pharmacology, physiology, food and organic chemistry, animal pathology and biometrics. These cover a wide variety of individual investigations including toxic residues in foods and beverages, the assay of various drug products and the stability of therapeutic materials.

Laboratory of Hygiene

Research in the laboratory of hygiene embraces a broad range of subjects in the fields of bacteriology, biologics control, clinical chemistry, biochemistry, virology and the zoonoses. Staphylococcal infections, coliform bacteria and the salmonella organisms receive particular attention in the bacteriology laboratory. Assay techniques and immunization studies are prominent in the biologics control section, while serodiagnosis and the treponema pallidum immobilization test are under intensive consideration in the clinical chemistry laboratory. Tissue culture, which is so important in the production of poliomyelitis vaccine, and the cultivation of various types of tissues through the development of synthetic media are the principal interests of the biochemistry section, while in virus research the development of safety and potency tests for vaccines against poliomyelitis and new methods for producing stable viral antigens for diagnostic laboratory procedures head the list of research projects. The zoonoses section concentrates its attention upon animal, tick and insect borne diseases, particularly with respect to incidence, serological tests and disease vectors.

Nutrition

In the nutrition division research involves the evaluation of nutritional status in Canada, health effects of specified foods, increasing the nutritive value of foods served in quantity and the continuation of the project on Canadian average weights and heights. In the preparation of a table of food values, collection of new data is continued in an effort to keep pace with the appearance of new foods offered to consumers. The consideration of chemical additives to foods becomes of increasing importance as food technology develops new products.

Occupational Health

The research activities of the occupational health division are extremely varied relating chiefly to waste products in industry and injurious and toxic materials which may be encountered. Under the radiation services studies in radioactivity and low level radiochemical research form an important segment of the program with the supervision of radioisotopes and the development of the film monitoring service receiving particular attention. This division also provides a consultant service to federal and provincial agencies on air pollution problems.

Research and Statistics

The research and statistics division carries on a program of analysis and evaluation of basic information on health and welfare matters, with special reference to their social and economic aspects, prepares reports as required and generally acts in an advisory capacity to senior officers of the department.

Research and Statistics

Its work is done in close co-operation with other divisions of the department and close liaison is maintained with organizations in Canada and abroad engaged in work of interest to the department.

The division took an active part in the planning leading to the recent federal-provincial hospital insurance talks and is engaged in planning and carrying out research in such varied fields as health care, rehabilitation of the disabled, disability pensions and child welfare in addition to studies on health and welfare manpower problems, welfare services, income security and the extent of illness in Canada.

In the past the division has taken a prominent part in research leading to the introduction of old age security, old age assistance, disability allowances and the national health program, and in connection with the development of rehabilitation services as well as a variety of other projects with which the department has been concerned.

NATIONAL HEALTH PROGRAM

The extramural research program consists of grants-in-aid of a wide variety of studies in the health field conducted in universities, hospitals and other research institutions from funds provided under the national health program. This began in 1948 with an amount of $100,000 initially in the public health research grant. Each succeeding year this was increased by a like sum up to a maximum of slightly over $500,000 at which level it now stands. Additionally, allocations from other health grants have been made in support of medical research centred generally in the field for which the grant is specifically designated.

During 1955-56 funds devoted to medical research under the national health program grants amounted to almost $1,620,000. The largest single amount was $577,000 under the mental health grant. $505,000 was made available for public health research, $325,000 for research under the general public health grant, $100,000 for tuberculosis control, $70,000 for child and maternal health, and $42,000 under the crippled children's grant.

It is not possible to define clearly individual areas of study because of the general overlapping which occurs and the consequent difficulty in categorizing projects. For example, some studies which may be designated as primarily biochemical in content may also have a definite relationship to cardiology or to psychiatry.

In broad general categories, however, according to the field of medicine, investigations which could be described as clinical accounted for about 40 per cent of the total funds or some $650,000. In this group those in the fields of cardiology, neurology, geriatrics and internal medicine covered about one-half, while psychiatric and psychological research took up the remainder. Basic studies such as those in biochemistry, pharmacology and therapeutics, pathology and physiology involved more than 23 per cent or $350,000 in allocations and studies in the general field of bacteriology, including virology, B.C.G. and the tubercle bacillus, made up better than 16 per cent of the total or $260,000. Those related to the birth period, infants and children totalled $110,000, while research on administrative aspects, medical economics and epidemiology about equalled that involving the special senses, approximately $50,000.

A re-grouping of these studies according to general fields of interest as related to leading causes of mortality and morbidity, shows that of the total program a little more than one-third of the funds or $548,000 are provided in support of research in mental diseases and related topics with an additional amount of $53,000 being made available for studies in neurology. A total of $184,000 has been allocated for studies in tuberculosis, both clinical and bacteriological, including the preventive aspects with B.C.G. vaccine. Research in diseases of the heart and arteries has been assisted in the amount of $172,000, with an additional $111,000 for the purchase of special equipment for cardiovascular centres in Montreal and Toronto. Virus diseases, including poliomyelitis and influenza studies, received support in the amount of $138,000, research in arthritis and rheumatism —some $94,000, conditions affecting the newborn—$79,000 and obstetrical studies an additional $31,000. In respect to diseases of the eye, a total of $68,000 has been provided for clinical services and research, and $22,000 for similar activities in dentistry. Studies in the field of hypersensitivity have been supported with a total of some $47,000, while investigations in administrative aspects of public health, including nursing and environmental hygiene have been allocated in excess of $40,000.

To indicate more accurately the accomplishments of the reasearch program, it is necessary to examine the individual research studies and to evaluate these in the light of their achievements in the reduction of mortality and in the alleviation of ill-health and disability.

Mental Health Research

With a total of 46 individual projects, mental health research covered such studies as fundamental laboratory investigations of fractions of the blood and other body fluids which might be accountable for mental illness, comprehensive exploration of a variety of clinical problems, related to mental illness, and field surveys of social situations and the investigations of children relating to hereditary and environmental factors involved in the development of mental disorders. Also included were psychological studies involving behaviour patterns, motivation and other related factors. The study and improvement of apparatus used in the diagnosis of mental illness, special drugs and advanced surgical procedures which have demonstrated benefit in therapy have received intensive study.

In the field of neurology, there were a variety of studies dealing with cellular structure, neurophysiology and biochemical activities in the brain. The metabolism of the brain was given particular attention as was the effect of pharmacologically active substances on this vital tissue.

Heart Research

As the leading cause of mortality, accounting for one-third of all deaths, disease affecting the heart and blood vessels received most intensive attention in terms of research expenditures and the provision of special equipment. Two cardiac centres have been now established in Montreal and in Toronto with assistance under the national health program. The institute of cardiology at Maisonneuve hospital in the short period of its existence has already distinguished itself and is achieving wide recognition for its activities in the treatment of cardiac conditions and for its research effort. Under the able direction of Dr. Paul David and with such prominent surgeons and research workers as Dr. E. D. Gagnon and Dr. Arthur M. Vineberg associated with it, rapid strides are being made in experimental heart surgery, dealing particularly with coronary artery disease, valvular defects and follow-up studies in patients having received the benefit of such treatment. Dr. Jacques Genest who directs the clinical research department at the Hotel-Dieu Hospital is conducting a study which offers great promise in the solution of problems associated with high blood pressure, while at McGill University in addition to Dr. Vineberg, Drs. Ronald Christie and D. R. Webster have combined their efforts and interests in the development of a centre for cardiovascular and respiratory research.

Question

At the University of Toronto, a similar research and treatment centre has been formed under the eminent leadership of Dr. W. G. Bigelow and, in collaboration with his associates at the several teaching hospitals in Toronto, with Drs. John D. Keith and W. T. Mustard at the hospital for sick children, Dr. G. W. Manning at the University of Western Ontario and other prominent physicians associated with these institutions and Queen's and Ottawa universities a broad program of investigation is going forward in a variety of fields. More particularly coronary artery disease, valvular disorders, hypertension, rheumatic fever and congenital heart afflictions are receiving intensive consideration. Included also is the investigation of apparatus of a highly specialized nature for use in the diagnosis, evaluation and prognosis of cardiovascular disorders. In all, in the province of Ontario, $100,000 annually of national health grant funds are being provided to be combined with funds raised by the Ontario heart foundation for the advancement of research and scientific investigation in this field.

In addition to the cardiac centres already established, interest is becoming aroused in the extension of similar facilities for treatment, training and research, ultimately to provide a country-wide development of strategically located centres to bring the benefits of these new therapeutic techniques to the Canadian people. By providing these facilities, the development of additional young surgeons in this field will be stimulated and further research advances encouraged which will, in turn, contribute progressively to the improvement of treatment procedures.

On January 16, 1956, the Minister of National Health and Welfare convened a meeting of heart specialists and other authorities in Ottawa to consider the problem of heart disease in Canada and to devise means to deal with it. The conference was called at the behest of the Canadian Heart Association and with the full endorsation of the Canadian Medical Association. It was attended by professional and lay representatives of both heart and medical associations, the college of general practice of Canada, the Quebec heart society, the Ontario heart foundation, the B.C. heart foundation, the national research council and the Canadian life insurance officers association, as well as medical specialists prominent in this field. As a direct outcome of the meeting it was decided to proceed with the establishment of a Canadian heart foundation and a committee of eleven under the chairmanship of Prof. R. F. Farquharson of Toronto was designated to proceed with its establishment, including the granting of a federal charter.

Cancer Research

Cancer research in Canada comes generally under the supervision of the national cancer institute. Financial support is derived from the national health program, the provinces and the Canadian cancer society. In total, in the nine years of its existence, over $900,000 have been provided for cancer research from the cancer control grant, with an equal amount being obtained from provincial sources. Research of a fundamental nature into the still unrevealed secrets of cancer causation and related problems formed the basis of the program, with fellowships being provided to develop and support research workers in this field.

Tuberculosis Research

While rapid and impressive strides have been made in all public health aspects of tuberculosis control, there yet remain many problems to be solved before this disease can be considered conquered. Particular attention was given to preventive measures involving the use of B.C.G. vaccine, research on the pathogenesis of the disease, exploration, of improved techniques for the isolation and culture of tubercle bacilli and the study of methods of treatment with special reference to chemotherapeutic drugs.

Virus Research

Virus research is another field which presents a multitude of challenging problems. Here emphasis was placed on studies in poliomyelitis and influenza. In the former disease, the dramatic advances of the past few years adequately testify to the value of the research effort expended, and it has been possible under the national health program to make contributions in the development and production of poliomyelitis vaccine and to improvement of measures employed for the determination of its safety and effectiveness. Particular reference might be made to the work being carried on by Dr. Andrew J. Rhodes, noted authority in this field, on the antigenic types of virus which are responsible for the occurrence of poliomyelitis in Canada, basic knowledge which is essential in preventive efforts. Both at the Connaught medical research laboratories in Toronto and the institute of microbiology and hygiene in Montreal intensive studies are going forward on the polio virus itself, the improvement of methods for its inactivation and the study of antigenic strains in human beings. A special laboratory diagnostic survey of neurotropic viruses in the Atlantic provinces is being carried on by Dr. C. E. van Rooyen at Dalhousie University.

Question

Arthritis and Rheumatism Research

Arthritis and rheumatism, the leading cause of physical incapacity and time lost from productive effort, received their share of research attention. The studies are of a fundamental nature relating to causation and the metabolic and biochemical changes which occur in the presence of arthritic involvement. In addition however the influence of hormones on the incidence and prevention of arthritis and specific clinical studies on the effects of A.C.T.H. and cortisone in various forms of the disease are the subject of exhaustive study.

Other Research

There was in addition a wide variety of topics each of which received merited attention. These included afflictions involving the eye and vision, studies in the field of dentistry, the investigation of phenomena associated with hypersensitivity, or allergic manifestations, and the alleviation of disorders related to pregnancy and the neonatal period. Administrative studies in the epidemiology of certain diseases, in environmental and occupational health, and in the practice of nursing also made up a group which promises most useful findings. Of particular importance at this time is the survey of general practice in Canada being carried on under the auspices of the college of general practice and the school of hygiene at the University of Toronto with the support of funds under the national health program. The outcome of this and related research should contribute invaluable knowledge in the extension and development of health care programs in Canada.

CONSTITUTION OF CROWN COMPANY TO CONSTRUCT PIPE LINE, MAKE SHORT-TERM LOANS, ETC.

The house resumed, from Wednesday, May 30, consideration in committee of Bill No. 298, to establish the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation—Mr. Howe (Port Arthur)—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 4—Body corporate.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Mr. Chairman, pursuant to the notice given yesterday in accordance with the provisions of standing order 33 I move:

That at this sitting of the committee of the whole house on Bill No. 298, an act to establish the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation, the further consideration of clauses 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, the title of the said bill, and any amendments proposed thereto, shall be the first business of this committee and shall not further be postponed.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rowe: Why not call it one o'clock tomorrow morning?

Mr. Drew: Dissolve parliament and really face the issue.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman—

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Fulton: On a point of order, I submit to you, sir, that this motion made by the Prime Minister is not in order and cannot be received or put to the committee. In what I shall have to say I shall be asking hon. members of the committee to consider the position of parliament itself. We have all witnessed scenes here in the past ten days or so about which all of us must be gravely concerned. It is my earnest submission to you, sir, and through you to the committee and through the committee to the house, that the house itself, in connection with the point of order I am about to raise, should give very serious consideration to its position with respect to the procedure we are now being asked to follow and must assess the point of order I raise from the point of view of the interests of parliament itself which, I submit to you, sir, transcend the interests of party or of government and are inherent and essential to the interests of the nation itself.

My point of order is based upon standing order 33, and I shall read standing order 33 because it is necessary to consider the terms of that whole order in order to appreciate just what the Prime Minister is asking us to do and to what extent it is out of order and a contravention of our rules by which the government is bound just as much as any member or other party in the house.

Immediately before the order of the day for resuming an adjourned debate is called, or if the house be in committee of the whole, or of supply, or of ways and means, any minister of the Crown who, standing in his place, shall have given notice at a previous sitting of his intention so to do, may move that the debate shall not be further adjourned, or that the further consideration of any resolution or resolutions, clause or clauses, section or sections, preamble or preambles, title or titles, shall be the first business of the committee, and shall not further be postponed;

Now, sir, I have not read the whole of the standing order. I have read the part of it which is applicable to the point of order I intend to raise. I wish to emphasize to you and to the committee the operative words. Since we are in committee of the whole considering a bill of seven clauses, of which we have only had three called and immediately postponed without consideration and then embarked upon the consideration of the fourth clause leaving three clauses and the title not yet having been called, I wish in that context to emphasize the operative words that the minister moves that further consideration of any clause or clauses, title or titles shall be the first business of the committee and shall not be further postponed.

It is of course impossible, in my submission, to argue that you can divorce any one of those words from the others because the rule must be looked at as a whole. Therefore, in order to comply with the provisions of this rule it must be interpreted with the utmost strictness because it has a limitation on debate, a limitation on the ordinary rights of members. In order to comply, therefore, with the strict provisions of the rules you must have regard for the question of whether or not the clause or clauses, title or titles have already been postponed because the motion is that they shall not be further postponed.

The argument I have to submit to you, sir, is in three main parts. First, I wish to call to the attention of the committee and deal with the situation arising by virtue of the fact that there have been three clauses only postponed, clauses 1, 2 and 3, and that those clauses were not, in fact, considered although they were postponed and therefore it is not possible to move that further consideration be not further postponed. Second, I wish to deal with the situation arising from the fact that there are three clauses, numbers 5, 6 and 7 which have not been called and upon which, therefore, it is impossible to hold that the committee has embarked upon their consideration. Third, having made what I might call an argument based on a strict interpretation of the rules I wish to make an argument, and I appeal to you that since this is an institution in which progress cannot be made in the interests of the nation unless we proceed by common sense, I wish to appeal to you on the basis of an argument on common sense as to what we are being asked to do here today.

I would then remind you, Mr. Chairman, of something I have already brought to your attention, and that is that if Your Honour finds himself in doubt as to the ruling he should make, then it is in accordance with the precedents and propriety of our proceedings that you should refer the matter to His Honour the Speaker for advice and direction. On that point, however, I will leave the argument to be developed by others of my colleagues.

As to the first of the three branches of my argument, namely that because the three clauses, 1, 2 and 3 which have already been postponed have not been considered no matter what form or words may have been used in the motion by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I submit that we are up against the strict interpretation of the closure rule and it must be interpreted strictly. Therefore, I suggest to you that we should rule that the postponement of clauses which have not been in fact considered in an ordinary and sensible interpretation of those words cannot be made subject of a motion that their consideration be not further postponed. I say to you at the outset with respect to this particular branch of the argument, it was developed previously, quite extensively and ably by my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and I shall leave the further development of that argument to him and others of my colleagues in the house. This branch of my argument does come in later. I shall submit to you: On the basis of common sense, how can anyone say, you included, sir, that clauses 1, 2 and 3 have been considered in such a sense that their further consideration can be made the subject of a motion at this time? In other words, clauses which have not been considered so that the judgment of this committee might have been expressed upon it, and there has been no opportunity to express the judgment of this committee on those three clauses, cannot, in that situation, be made the subject of a motion that their further consideration be postponed. Having said that, I shall leave the details of this argument to be developed in the main by others.

May I proceed at once to the second and perhaps the main branch of my argument dealing with the situation confronting us by virtue of the fact that clauses 5, 6 and 7 of the bill have not yet been called for consideration of the committee, and therefore cannot be included within the ambit either of the notice given by the Prime Minister yesterday or of the motion made by him today that their further consideration be not further postponed. They have not been called and they have not been considered. I am satisfied, therefore, that you would not expect me, and it is not necessary for me, to elaborate further any argument that they have not yet been called or considered.

We are left with the situation that what the Prime Minister is asking the committee to do today is to apply the closure rule to clauses which have not yet been before the committee. I say to the Prime Minister and to you, the Prime Minister particularly as a lawyer and you as chairman of this committee, the one charged with the interpretation and applications of the rules, that on the basis of the clear precedents established by this house the Prime Minister's motion falls to the ground. Let us consider the precedents which are applicable under the circumstances in which we now find ourselves, and we will find that they are against the Prime Minister by three to one. The only precedent that can be cited in support of the hon. gentleman's proposition is the precedent of 1932 when the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett was Prime Minister and invoked closure on a bill in committee. I want to make this point quite clear. I do not admit the validity of that precedent, and I shall give my reasons in the course of my further arguments.

I do not think that the government of that day was right in saying—perhaps I had better go back and say the bill contained three clauses. It had been considered for some two weeks at the resolution stage, a vast difference from the bill now before us, and it had been considered for two days in committee and when the closure motion was made only one clause had been called before the committee by the chairman.

The argument was then put forward that the discussion on clause 1 had been of a general nature and, therefore, in effect the other two clauses of the bill had been before the committee and it was a justifiable motion applicable to clauses 1, 2 and 3. As I say, I do not accept the validity of that argument because clearly clauses 2 and 3 had not been called before the committee on that occasion.

Secondly, I submit that the point of order I am now raising was not raised in a clear manner and brought before the committee clearly for decision and, as has been said by one of my colleagues here on a previous occasion, accepted, as I understand it, by the Chair. A precedent that has not been tested is not as strong a precedent as one that has been examined, tested and approved. This is a point that was not raised and was not clearly brought before the committee and established on that occasion. It is true that one of the hon. members present in the committee did ask the chairman whether the only motion that could be made was for the further postponement of clause 1. The chairman, not in the form of a ruling, but in the form of a general observation, said in effect that he did not think that question was before him to decide or before the committee to decide. He said, the motion is that further consideration of the three clauses be not further postponed, and, after one other query from an hon member, he put the motion and it was carried.

Therefore, sir, there was no clear issue raised as to the propriety of the motion and its propriety was not tested. Therefore, I submit that this precedent, tenuous as it is, is not a precedent tested, established and embedded firmly in the practice of this house. It is the only precedent that the government can bring in, in support of its position. There is another very important difference, even accepting the validity of this 1932 precedent as a precedent, which I question. There is, however, the clear difference between the situation then and the situation before us now on the basis of which that precedent can be clearly distinguished. That was a bill of only three clauses, and virtually the whole bill was contained in clause 1. It was a bill to continue in force the employment and farm relief act. All the provisions of the act, when clause 1 had been enacted, if it were enacted, covered the other two clauses which were entirely concerned with matters of detail. They depended upon clause 1 as a matter of course. In this case we have a bill of seven clauses. The Prime Minister himself said, as recorded at page 4365 of Hansard, that we have not yet in committee got to any one of the main operative clauses. Remember that in the case of the 1932 precedent clause 1 was the main operative clause. May I place before the committee the words of the Prime Minister as recorded at page 4365 of Hansard when he made the statement which he asked us to take seriously but which his subsequent action made known that he himself did not intend to take seriously, and I doubt indeed whether he felt for five minutes that the country would take his so-called offer seriously. This is what he said:

> No, Mr. Speaker, I say that, as soon as the motion before the committee has been disposed of, debate can begin either on clause 4—

I interpolate, we were then on the motion to postpone consideration of clause 3. I continue with the Prime Minister's remarks:

> —or, if hon. members wish to postpone clause 4, on clauses 5, 6 and 7, those we had thought would be the operative clauses on which it would be most interesting to have the debate develop.

By the admission of the Prime Minister himself we have not even got to the operative clause in our consideration in committee, and yet he is moving that further consideration be not further postponed on clauses that we have not even considered for one moment. There is the distinction between the 1932 precedent and this situation, if further distinction were needed. In 1932 Mr. Bennett made the argument that clause 1 embraced virtually the whole bill. That was the argument upon which he based the validity of his motion. Here the Prime Minister has admitted that the bill does not depend on clause 1, clause 2, clause 3 or even clause 4. The operative clauses, the main clauses, are 5, 6 and 7, which have not yet been before us. Therefore, I say to you, sir, the 1932 precedent is not a valid one, is not a sound one, even in the circumstances in which it would apply; but if it were held to be sound, then it is not applicable in this situation because it is clearly distinguishable.

As I have said, the only precedents for the situation we have now with respect to closure are four, and they are three to one against the government. Let us look at the other three, the one case of 1913 and the two of 1917, the only other occasions upon which closure was applied to a bill in committee of the whole. In 1913 it was on the naval construction bill; in 1917 one case was the wartime elections act and the other case was the Canadian National Railways bill. In each one of these cases all the clauses of the bills had been called and had either been adopted by the committee or had their consideration postponed by the committee before the closure motion was introduced. Therefore, in the three cases, every clause of the bills had clearly been before the committee for consideration before the closure motion was introduced. Even if we accept the government's arguments that they were justified in postponing the consideration of clauses 1, 2 and 3 even before they had in fact been considered by the committee, their argument and their conduct last Thursday and Friday would only have been valid and have had any basis for justification if they had followed the same procedure with respect to clauses 5, 6 and 7. Therefore, their whole course of conduct in calling for the postponement of clauses 1, 2 and 3 recognized and accepted the validity of the proposition that you cannot apply closure in committee unless you have all the clauses of the bill before the committee. Otherwise, why did they go through the farce they did last Thursday and Friday of calling the clause and the Minister of Trade and Commerce moved that further consideration be postponed? Why did the minister make himself look ridiculous and make the government look ridiculous and subject parliament to ignominy and insulting procedure unless they themselves in their minds and hearts admitted at that time that the only way they could get closure applied was, in fact, if every clause had been called, brought before the committee and its postponement then moved. Therefore, their conduct establishes the validity of the argument I now make and emphasizes that the precedents of 1913 and 1917 are the precedents that should be followed in this house rather than the tenuous and shadowy substance of the precedent of 1932.

It may be, sir, that the Prime Minister will attempt to make an argument that it is not necessary for each clause to be called separately in order for it to be before the committee. He may say: The bill was before the committee for one and one-half days and, therefore, in our grace we permitted you to have a general discussion and in effect every clause has been before the committee. There is not a shadow of substance for that argument. I contend that in order for a clause of a bill to be before a committee it must be called as a separate question by the chairman. Every authority I have been able to find supports the proposition that it must be called and placed before the committee by the chairman.

May I refer you to a few of these authorities. I start first with Campion and refer you to pages 215 and 216. I do not know what edition it is but it is the one that is in the library. Here Campion is discussing the proceedings in committee on a bill and at the foot of page 215 you find the following:

> The chairman calls each clause by its number and, if no amendment is offered, immediately proceeds to propose the question "That this clause stand part of the bill".

It is true, I admit, that the English procedure in committee is slightly different from ours, but Campion and May have been cited as authorities and used as a basis for ruling against us in previous arguments in committee and with respect to the point I am now making I submit the English proceedings in committee are absolutely applicable and the authority is exactly in point.

Campion continues:

> On this question a debate on the provisions of the clause may take place. After it has been proposed it is no longer in order to move an amendment. As soon as the first clause is disposed of the Chairman calls the next clause and so on. Strictly, a separate question is necessary on each clause, but on uncontentious bills it is not unusual to save time by putting the question on groups of clauses.

This can hardly be described as an uncontentious bill. It is clear from this that a separate question is necessary on each clause and each clause must be called and considered separately before it can be held to have been before the committee.

Next I would give you the authority of May, fifteenth edition, at pages 526 and 527. At page 526, again in a passage discussing proceedings in committee of the whole House of Commons, we find the following:

> Order in which bill is considered.
> The text of a bill is considered in committee in the following order:
> (2) New Clauses.
> (3) Schedules.
> (4) New Schedules.
> (5) Preamble (if any).
> (6) Title (if amendment thereto is required).

Clearly, sir, you must call the clauses separately and you must call the clauses separately before they are before the committee.

Furthermore, at page 527 of May, you find the passage which has been quoted to us before which says:

> The calling of a clause by the chairman brings it under the consideration of the committee, but does not entitle a member to speak generally upon the clause—

And so on.

It is clear that you, sir, have to call the clauses before they can be under the consideration of the committee, and remember, the words of the closure rule are "postpone the further consideration of these clauses".

Then coming to a Canadian authority, I refer you to Bourinot at pages 521 and 522:

> The preamble is also postponed in both houses until after the consideration of the clauses. The bill is then considered clause by clause. The chairman usually calls out the number of each clause, and reads the marginal note, but he should give the clause at length when it is demanded by the committee. He will then put the question, "shall the clause be adopted," or "stand part of the bill". Each clause is a distinct question, and must be separately discussed.

There is no question on the basis of the authorities, both English and Canadian, that clauses must be called and put before the committee by the chairman before it is possible to argue that in fact they have been before us for consideration.

Now, as to the basis of what was done in this house and the authorities applicable here, I have already referred to the one case in 1913 and the two in 1917. I would like to refer you, sir, to the statements made by the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen in the year 1913 when the closure motion was exhaustively discussed in this house. To Mr. Meighen has sometimes been attributed the authorship of the closure rule. Whether or not that is so I do not know but I have noticed that on one occasion he denied it. However, it is universally admitted that he clearly understood its application, he was a sound parliamentarian, he knew how to apply it, and he knew all the formalities that had to be observed in its application.

We find in column 9359 of Hansard for the session of 1912-13 the following statement from Mr. Meighen. When Mr. Meighen was discussing this very point of order he said:

> . . . there is really no such thing as adjourning a debate in committee; it is the consideration that must be postponed in committee, as he will find in May.

Then he went on to discuss the basis of the closure rule and said as follows:

> . . . the very basis of these new rules is that there shall hereafter be an order of consideration in committee, and that a bill shall be considered after this, clause by clause. That is the underlying principle of the new rules. Whether there has been an order of consideration in committee or not, there must be hereafter, in order to make the new rules intelligible.

We have not had clauses 5, 6 or 7 before us for consideration and yet the Prime Minister is trying to make this motion apply to the whole bill and all the clauses in committee.

Again Mr. Meighen said, as reported in columns 7535 and 7536 of Hansard for 1912-13, when dealing with this subject—here is the question. I will read the question and the answer in extenso:

> Mr. German: Could they not give notice as to the whole bill and stop the discussion on every clause?

Which is what the government is trying to do here.

> Mr. Meighen: This is what can be done: clause 2 is under discussion, say for two weeks or three weeks or five weeks—

And I pause there to say how very different from what we have had here; clauses 1, 2 and 3 under discussion for one day; clauses 5, 6 and 7 not even called; clause 4, for a day and a half—but Mr. Meighen went on:

> . . . for two weeks, or three weeks or five weeks, as would suit hon. gentlemen opposite; clause 2 is under discussion and the motion to postpone the consideration of that clause is made. Then it would be in order I would think, for the committee to pass to clause 3, and clause 3 would then have to be discussed and a separate motion would have to be made as to clause 3.

Then I go down a little further:

> A motion is made that consideration be postponed on one clause; then, after the other clause has been discussed, another motion is made, of course all within the responsibility of the government, that the consideration of that be postponed. Then notice is given that the clauses so postponed be on a certain day not further postponed. That is to say, notice is given that a motion will be made on some subsequent date stated, that the consideration of these clauses, so postponed, be not again postponed, and these clauses then must be taken up on that day.

The motion is clearly applicable only to the clauses that have been postponed.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. member. I permitted him to complete his quotations but he has exceeded his 30 minutes.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, do you rule that in committee on a point of order there is a time limit fo 30 minutes?

The Deputy Chairman: Yes. My recollection is that this matter came up about a week ago. I find that the standing order says that no member except the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition shall speak for more than 30 minutes at any time in any committee of the whole house. I know of nothing to the contrary and I rule that that applies to any member, even though he be arguing a point of order.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Mr. Chairman, I am sure we have all listened with much interest to the argument which has just been submitted by the hon. member for Kamloops upon the proper application of standing order 33. I think that it is hardly possible to discuss the technical points he has raised without first considering what is the purpose of this standing order. Standing order 33, as I indicated yesterday before giving notice of this motion for today, I think was designed to enable every member on both sides of the house to express his opinion on a measure by his vote in time to make that decision effective.

Mr. Drew: On every section.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): On every section. Even under closure that is what is required. Some form of closure has been found to be necessary in all parliaments and in 1912 it was found to be necessary here. Although the rules have been revised from time to time it has been found desirable to retain that standing order in the form in which it was first adopted.

The need for a provision similar to that provided by standing order 33 was expressed in words which I feel should commend themselves to all hon. members on both sides of the house. I should like to read what Mr. Attlee said in 1945 shortly after he became Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, and I quote:

> I have sat too long on the opposition benches not to be sensitive of the rights of the opposition and of the rights of private members. It is the right and duty of the opposition to criticize the administration and to oppose and seek to amend the legislation of the government, but it is nonetheless the right and duty of the government to govern and to pass into law the program which it has been elected to carry out. The successful working of our parliamentary institutions depends on harmonizing these conflicting rights and duties. It will be the object of the government to preserve the rights of minorities as an essential feature of democracy while, at the same time, ensuring that democratic institutions are not wrecked by a failure to carry out and implement the will of the majority.

That is a fair statement of what is endeavoured to be achieved by the enactment of standing order 33. The hon. gentleman has said that there are four precedents, but there are three that were similar in form for the application of standing order 33 on a bill in committee of the whole. One was followed in all cases but the more recent case of 1932. The government would have preferred to have followed the earlier precedents because their application would have given the committee, if hon. gentlemen so desired, an opportunity before the rule was suggested, for a discussion of each clause separately. As the hon. member has clearly indicated, to follow the earlier precedents it is necessary to have each clause postponed once before the motion for the application of standing order 33 is made.

We believe that clauses 5, 6 and 7 are the really important clauses of the bill, the other four clauses being largely formal. We intended on Wednesday last to move the early postponement of the first four clauses so that debate could be focussed on clause 4 and the subsequent clauses before going back to the earlier ones. Those clauses contained the purposes for which the corporation was being set up and if those purposes were not acceptable and were not provided for there was no point in having the other clauses considered or discussed because they would have provided merely an empty shell.

As you will recall, the order of the house to proceed to the consideration of this bill in committee on Wednesday last was frustrated throughout the whole sitting of Wednesday. The house finally got into committee on Thursday and the government undertook to have the early clauses of the bill postponed after a brief explanation in order to facilitate the immediate consideration of the really important operative clauses.

Once again a concerted effort was made by hon. gentlemen opposite to prevent any progress being made. On Thursday evening when the Minister of Finance, as leader of the house, rose on a point of order to explain the procedure being followed by the government, hon. gentlemen opposite, who had been professing to uphold the rights of members to speak, were not willing to listen to the explanations of the leader of the house and frustrated those explanations by raising further technicalities.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Are the rights of parliament a technicality?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): No, the rights of parliament are not technicalities. There was a formal objection raised, not in respect to the rights of parliament but in respect to the rights of the leader of the house to exercise what is usually regarded as one of his rights as a member of the house.

Mr. Fleming: It was not a right; he asked for an indulgence.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Perhaps it is that in the estimation of hon. gentlemen opposite—

Mr. Drew: It is in the estimation of anybody with any sense.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): —when an hon. member of this house is prevented from participating in the discussion of a question before the house.

Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation

Mr. Fleming: He asked for indulgence to be heard.

Mr. Drew: He had no right to be heard at all.

Mr. Fleming: The ruling had been made that it could not be debated.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): This was before the ruling had been made; this was on a point of order.

Mr. Fleming: The Chair had ruled that the motion was not debatable and nobody could speak on the motion. He asked the indulgence to speak.

Mr. Rowe: Indulgence for one side and no indulgence for the other. That is this parliament.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): The following day, as hon. members will remember, was another very frustrating day and the government came to the conclusion that the only effective course open to it was to follow the precedent of 1932 which was the most recent and seemed to us the most pertinent case in which standing order 33 had been applied. At that time it was standing order 39 but it was readopted during the course of last session in its present form. Lawyers admit that it is a principle that when a statute is being consolidated and the language which has been acted upon has been construed, that construction, if it is not acceptable, is avoided by making some change in the form of the rule.

There was no change made in the form of this rule. On that occasion a motion similar to the motion I have proposed was made by Mr. Bennett, who was then Prime Minister and whom I would expect hon. gentlemen of the official opposition would accept as one having great authority, both as a lawyer, and as one having proper respect for the rights of parliament. But what is even more important to us on this side of the house is that when points of order similar to those suggested by the hon. member for Kamloops were raised by the leader of the U.F.A. party, Mr. Gardiner, Mr. King, to whom gentlemen opposite have been making very frequent references, especially on these questions of closure, did not see fit to join in attempting to support those points of order, and the house adopted the motion submitted by Mr. Bennett. It seemed to us that that was the most recent precedent and that it was a valid precedent upon which we could rely.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Had not consideration been given for several days to the matter before closure was adopted?

[Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East).]

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): There had been several days' consideration given to a resolution that was on the order paper, because it was argued very strenuously during many days that that resolution would not lead to any effective legislation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Argued for many days?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Finally there was a notice of closure made to bring that resolution to a vote, and hon. gentlemen will remember that at that time the motion that the Speaker leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into the committee of the whole was a debatable motion. As soon as that motion was adopted, and the form of resolution, about which they had been complaining as not apt to lead to any effective legislation, was changed and something quite different was substituted for it—when that was done, their objection having been met, the resolution was adopted—at an hour that very closely resembled one that we witnessed on that clock not so very long ago, 4.42 a.m., and the bill was read a first time.

Mr. Knowles: The clock had better be kept wound up, too.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Then a bill that was quite different from that which had been foreshadowed in the resolution was put before the house. Yes, the resolution provided for a bill to amend chapter 58 in order to replace the word "March" by the word "May". Whilst the resolution that was finally adopted provided for a bill which became the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, which contained three clauses—

Mr. Diefenbaker: After many days.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): —that could become operative. That bill got its second reading on division and went into committee. I am sure the hon. gentleman has read—perhaps more than once, as I have done—the whole debate that took place there.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have also counted the days.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I did not count the days, because the first notice for closure was made on March 23, at the time the house was rising for the Easter recess, and the house did not meet again until March 29, and it was on March 29, 30 and 31 that the proceedings on the bill were discussed and that on a closure motion they were disposed of. That is what occurred at that time.

There can be no question that no clause of that bill had been referred to the committee. The hon. gentleman had submitted, in support of his point of order, that before the clauses are before the committee they have to be individually called. They certainly have to be individually called before they are passed by the committee, and closure does not bring about the passage of any one of those clauses. I think that there was no objection raised at the time that the putting of the three clauses in one motion was not a procedure that would establish a precedent, but I submit to you, sir, that when we have here a precedent set by the presence and discussion of the matter by as eminent parliamentarians as Mr. Bennett and Mr. King, we are entitled to regard it as a valid precedent and we are entitled to ask that it be applied to future cases.

Now, it has been stated that there was not even technical consideration of clauses 1, 2 and 3. On each of those clauses there has been a reference to the house, and the house has by its vote asserted that they had been considered in such a manner as to justify—

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): If you will refer to the Journals, you will see that that is so in fact. As far as the operative clauses are concerned, of course, we shall admit that there were not many gentlemen on the other side of the house who have deigned to discuss any clause of this bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rowe: Nobody has been allowed to.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): They have preferred to concentrate upon their discussions of the procedure that was being recommended to the house by the government. But all those who have, even in discussing the procedure, referred to the bill have referred to the purposes of the crown corporation, to the method of financing the crown corporation, to the loan the crown corporation might make to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines, and those are the purposes of clauses 5, 6 and 7, which have not been specifically called for the consideration of the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We have not been able to get any answers at all. You have been as silent as the tomb.

Mr. Rowe: What is the load factor on the steamroller?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): The load factor in the house has been 100 per cent.

Mr. Drew: One hundred per cent tyranny.

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I do not know that we advance the business that is before the committee at this time, or even advance the respect each one of us has for parliamentary institutions, by the use of violent language.

Mr. Rowe: There are not many left.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): There are methods by which one's opinions about the procedure that is being followed can be expressed—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why don't you follow that?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): —without reverting to the kind of language we have heard, I think, all too frequently in the course of this debate—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): We realize the responsibility we are taking in doing our best to bring this matter to a division where all members of the house will have, and be able to exercise, their right to express by their votes their opinions upon the measure.

Mr. Rowe: Just by their votes.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): We do not dispute the rights of hon. members to try to persuade. We do not even dispute the propriety of the statement made again yesterday by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar in which he said, as found at page 4465 of Hansard:

> . . . I believe that, if one feels as strongly as I do that this is not in the best interests of the country, anything I can do to stop this going through, under proper parliamentary procedure, I am right in undertaking.

Mr. Rowe: Is that not all right?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): We do not dispute that—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Just deny it.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): —but we do think that the opposition should not question the right of the government, feeling as strongly as we do that this is in the interests of the country, to do everything we can—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): —under proper parliamentary procedure—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): —to give every hon. member the opportunity to vote on this measure.

Mr. Rowe: You will let us vote on it, will you?

Mr. Sinclair: If you are here.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): We do think that the precedent set in the time of Mr. Bennett and Mr. King as to the manner of applying properly this closure rule is a valid precedent and one we are entitled to rely upon.

Mr. Rowe: They never closed it like this.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Perhaps the hon. gentleman—

Mr. Rowe: I was here. You were not.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): —is relying upon his memory as to what took place at that time. Many of us have been reading the official reports of what took place at that time, and there the situation is on all fours with the present situation—

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): —subject only to the exception that there are seven clauses here while there were only three in that case. But there is a title here as there was in the other case. There are clauses here that have not been individually called as there were clauses in the former case that had not been individually called.

Mr. Rowe: The first one was called.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Well, I do not know that there is any very special difference arising out of the fact that the first one was called.

Mr. Rowe: There certainly is.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): If the argument submitted has any validity at all it has as great validity with respect to any one of the clauses as it has with respect to the first clause.

Mr. Rowe: We understand why you did not call it.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Well, I do not know what the hon. gentleman has in his mind in saying that we did not call it. I have said we did call it and we moved that its further consideration be postponed because we wanted to get as soon as possible to what was more than the shell so that those hon. members who really did want to discuss the purposes, the method of financing and the powers of this crown corporation could have an early opportunity of doing so.

Mr. Fleming: Your solicitude is most touching. You did not want a general discussion and the right to ask questions on clause 1. That is what you wanted to avoid.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Has there been any objection raised from this side of the house to the general discussion that has been taking place on the part of those who wanted to discuss the bill?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fleming: Scores of questions that have been asked remain unanswered.

Mr. Sinclair: Martyred St. Donald.

[Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East).]

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Perhaps the hon. gentleman might indicate what are those questions that have been unanswered. There were some questions submitted the other evening in a quite amusing speech by the hon. member for Peel.

Mr. Rowe: None of them answered either.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I think if the hon. gentleman will read the report of the questions asked by the hon. member for Peel he will realize that if all those matters had to be ascertained in advance this country would not have reached the stage it has reached in its development at the present time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Some persons have some faith in the future of this country, the kind of faith that Sir John A. Macdonald and his associates had when they attempted to build a railway right across the country.

Mr. Rowe: He would have been ashamed of you today.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Well—

Mr. Rowe: So would Sir Wilfrid.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East):—I do not know about that. That is the hon. gentleman's opinion. I have my opinion about the propriety of our conduct and I will be prepared to defend that conduct in every quarter where it may be challenged.

Mr. Rowe: Let us go to the country and ask the people.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): We will be going to the country in due course—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): —and I am prepared to meet such criticism as is being offered at the present time. The hon. gentleman says: Why not go now? Well, we have asserted and we firmly believe that it is in the interests of the country to get this project started this year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I am wandering from the point of order, Mr. Chairman. I am sorry and I do apologize. I have submitted to you that we are proceeding upon a valid precedent that is applicable to the present situation and that on the strength of that precedent you should not entertain the point of order that has been submitted.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the contention that the Prime Minister's motion is out of order. Indeed, in doing so

I am pressing the point of order notice of which I gave yesterday just after the Prime Minister indicated that he would move this motion of closure today.

At the outset, Mr. Chairman, may I deal with what the Prime Minister has said. Frankly, I wonder whether the right hon. gentleman realizes the full implications of what he has told this House of Commons. Although I tried to take down his words I may not have them exactly but I am sure I have their import. He said to us that the government would have preferred to follow the earlier precedents because they would have made possible a more complete discussion of the individual clauses. Having said that, he then recited what he referred to as the obstruction with which the government was met on the floor of the house.

Mr. Fleming: Frustration.

Mr. Knowles: I am sorry, I am told that the word was "frustration" rather than "obstruction". Does the right hon. gentleman realize what he is saying? He is telling the House of Commons that it was the government's preference to follow the correct precedents, to follow the ones that can stand up, but because they were frustrated by the bad boys of the opposition, because their timetable was upset, they changed their minds and decided to follow a bad precedent. Frankly, Mr. Chairman, I am shocked—

An hon. Member: Who cares?

Mr. Knowles: —at a great lawyer like the Prime Minister telling us that that is the kind of leadership he is giving his party in the House of Commons.

An hon. Member: Good leadership.

Mr. Knowles: The Prime Minister told us that Mr. Bennett's precedent was that of a constitutional lawyer and a man versed in parliamentary procedure. That is not usually the kind of compliment the Liberals pay Mr. Bennett. Since happily I belong to neither of the old parties I can speak the truth about what Mr. Bennett did in 1932. I think he perpetrated a fraud on the House of Commons—

Mr. Harris: Careful, now.

Mr. Knowles: —when he moved closure as he did before clauses 2 and 3 had been called at all. The Prime Minister says today that Mr. King registered no objection, that the only objection was raised by Mr. Gardiner who was a member of the U.F.A. I think it is very clear from a reading of the debate that at that point there was a bit of play between the two sides. It almost looks to me as though Mr. King wanted the government of the day to impose closure, for once closure had been imposed the Liberals kept up the debate for only a very short time. There was not a great deal of point in making a formal protest and appealing the ruling, but I do ask the Prime Minister, the Prime Minister who says that Mr. King did not object to what went on on that occasion, to note that on pages 1610 and 1611 of Hansard for April 1, 1932, Mr. King did have something to say about what was happening at that time. The closure motion had been moved on the same day, as reported on page 1609. On the very next page, Mr. King said this:

> —the Prime Minister comes along in the first minute of proceedings in committee today and applies closure, affecting all three sections of the bill, though as you, yourself, Mr. Chairman, well know, even the first section has not yet been passed. I quote from yesterday's proceedings at page 1557 of Hansard as follows:
> "The Chairman (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): I would ask the hon. gentleman, who knows the rules, to observe them. We are discussing section 1 of this bill."
> As you yourself have said, Mr. Chairman, section 1 of the bill is the only section that has been discussed, yet by the most coercive and arbitrary act of which a government is capable, we are being prevented from discussing sections 2 and 3 of the measure and discussing at any further length the first section.

The Prime Minister says Mr. King made no objection. There is his objection, over on the next page, that this was the most coercive and arbitrary act of which a government is capable. Later, on third reading of that bill on the same day, as recorded on page 1615 of Hansard, and I admit this refers to the whole proceedings which Mr. Bennett had employed in connection with that legislation but it included what had happened that day, Mr. King said this:

> I can only express the hope that some of the rulings and decisions may never be cited as precedents by any subsequent parliament in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear hear.

Mr. Knowles: I continue:

> I believe the members of the ministry will themselves be the first to blush when, in calmer moments, they review what the records disclose of the means which were taken to bring into being this particular measure.

I note that the hon. member for Kamloops, although he is neither a minister nor was he a member of that cabinet, is blushing.

Mr. McCann: It is the colour of his hair.

Mr. Knowles: The Prime Minister stands up today, a great lawyer and a great defender of the rights of parliament, and says to us: "We would much rather have followed the earlier precedent, the correct ones, the ones that stand up, but we were frustrated by these bad boys on the opposition side of the house so we have fallen back on Mr. Bennett's precedent." He says that, despite the fact that Mr. King, who, the Prime Minister says, did not say anything, said within the next two or three pages he hoped no future parliament would rely on the precedents that had been established in the course of getting that legislation through the House of Commons.

I am not going to take a great deal of time, Mr. Chairman, because I am limited to a half hour, in getting involved in the intricacies of standing order 33 which is difficult to discuss without getting mixed up in double negatives and further this and further that. Even so, if one takes the time to look at it carefully I say it is clear that the kind of motion that the Prime Minister can make under standing order 33 in committee of the whole is one that falls into two parts. The first part is that he must move that further consideration of certain clauses be the first business today. The Prime Minister, under that part of the standing order 33 has sought to move that further consideration of clauses 5, 6 and 7 be the first business today. I am omitting any reference to clauses 1, 2, 3 and 4 because I am not going to get involved in confusing technicalities about those clauses, even though I do not think what was done with regard to them was proper. However, no one can deny that clauses 5, 6 and 7 have not been called, have not been discussed or considered and have not been before the committee. How then can the Prime Minister stand up today and move a motion that the further consideration of clauses 5, 6 and 7 be the first business of this committee today? It is utterly unthinkable. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that though by relying on a technicality you could accept the first part of the Prime Minister's motion, the part with respect to clauses 1, 2, 3 and 4, you cannot possibly accept the part that asks that the further consideration of clauses 5, 6 and 7 and the title be the first business today.

The hon. member for Kamloops has developed it so I will not go into it, but the second part of standing order 33 permits a motion saying that consideration be not further postponed. Obviously if we have not had previous postponements of clauses 5, 6 and 7 there cannot be a motion that consideration be not further postponed. It is crystal clear from the wording of standing order 33 and it is crystal clear what happened in 1932, that bad precedent on which the Prime Minister is trying to rely today, and crystal clear from the opposition Mr. King registered to it which the Prime Minister did not bother to tell us about, that the action he is taking today is completely out of order.

I may say, Mr. Chairman, that yesterday we did not know what was going to happen when the house met at 2.30. It was one of those rare occasions when there had been a Liberal caucus from which there had been no leaks. We did not know what was going to happen. I confess if there was a look of amazement on my face which the Minister of Finance and others may have seen, I was shocked when the Prime Minister gave notice of a motion which was so completely out of order. I am glad the Prime Minister got into this debate on a point of order, but I wish he would recall the stand he took on an equally difficult matter back in 1946. I am not going to read any more from what Laurier or Lapointe or Mackenzie King said, because those great Liberals do not seem to move the Prime Minister. Rather I intend to read St. Laurent to the Prime Minister.

On June 18, 1946, the Prime Minister was asked a difficult question. He made an answer which I still remember because to me it was one of those classics that sometimes reach the pages of Hansard. It took courage, honesty and integrity to make it, and he made it well. He had been asked by the late Arthur Smith, in a discussion on redistribution which got over into a discussion of the British North America Act, whether or not section 133 of the British North America Act, relating to the status of the French and English languages, could be amended without the consent of the provincial legislatures. One could hardly imagine a more difficult question to be put to the present Prime Minister, who was then the Minister of Justice. This was his courageous reply in terms which, I say, represent a classic on the pages of Hansard. On page 2621 of Hansard for that date, I find this:

> Can that be dealt with without the consent of the provincial legislatures? Legally I say it can. The situation appears to me to be this. There are persons and nations who reach a high estate in the affairs of men, and the high estate they reach imposes upon them high obligations. There was no obligation on the Tribune Festus to say to King Agrippa that he could not deliver Paul to the Jews when they requested that he be put to death. It occurs to one, however, that they also had reached a high estate, which imposes a corresponding obligation. I copied out of the Bible on the table of this house, from the Acts, the quite natural statement of Festus:
> "It is not the manner of the Romans to deliver any man to die, before that he which is accused have the accusers face to face, and have licence to answer for himself concerning the crime laid against him."

There was no statute; there was no law which required that this be done; but there was the concept in the Roman conscience that it was the proper thing to do.

Then, after reciting one or two sad instances in the history of this half of the North American continent when there were certain unfortunate developments regarding the language question, the Prime Minister concluded his statement with these words:

If it is fair; if it is just; if it is proper according to the standards of human decency, it will be done; if it is unfair; if it is unjust; if it is improper, all members of this house will say, "It is not our manner to do such things."

The Prime Minister has it in his power to put this motion and if you, sir, do, as I feel you should, rule it out of order, he has the power to challenge that ruling, marshall a majority and win a verdict in favour of this improper motion. He can do it; he has the power; he has the majority behind him, out of whose souls all Liberalism seems to have gone. Frankly, Mr. Chairman, despite the obvious fact that this is a clear violation of standing order 33; that it is based on a bad precedent which Mr. King criticized and abhorred, nevertheless, he can do it; he has the power and the majority. But I did not think it was his manner to do such a thing.

The hon. member for Kamloops has already referred to the clear-cut statement that was made by Mr. Meighen in 1913 when the Conservatives were putting the closure rule on the books of this House of Commons. I will not take the time to read the particular passages he read, but I will read another one, which is in column 7537 of Hansard of April 10, 1913. It is admitted that Mr. Meighen had something to do with the drafting of the closure rule. After the explanation that he had given had been questioned by some of the Liberals who did not quite understand it, Mr. Meighen sought again to explain it. This is what he said:

Mr. Meighen: Yes. Nothing more, however, is done at that time and they pass to clause 3. That is the next thing to do, without a doubt. Clause 3 then becomes the subject of discussion in the committee. Clause 3 is under consideration and the committee discusses it also for a time, and the government takes the responsibility for the length of that time.

Then, Mr. Meighen goes on and moves in his explanation from clause 3 to clauses 4 and 5, and so on, and sums it all up in these words:

A debate has taken place successively on each clause and then when we have got all through the bill and all has been debated clause by clause, the government, or a member of the government, may give notice that he will move on a certain day that these clauses, all of them, be the first business of that committee and be not further postponed, and then all the clauses must be taken up on that last day and concluded by two o'clock. I think that is absolutely clear.

The only change, of course, is that now "two o'clock" would have to read "one o'clock". Mr. Meighen, who is credited with being one of the draftsmen of the closure rule, made it crystal clear that the only time you can move a motion such as the Prime Minister sought improperly to move today is after all of the clauses successively, one by one, each and all of them, have been discussed. I am sure the Prime Minister has read this, as I have read it. I am sure he understands it just as I understand it, but I confess again that I am shocked that he flies in the face of it, as he has done today.

The hon. member for Kamloops has indicated that there is the one terribly bad precedent that Mr. Bennett perpetrated against this house in 1932; but there are three precedents the other way. There was one in 1913 and two in 1917. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that in at least two of these cases the issue was far more contentious in parliament than is even the issue that is before us at the present time. Remember that on each of those occasions it was the Conservatives who were in power, and the Liberals like to think that the Conservatives were a little dictatorial, a little high-handed. But I ask the Prime Minister to go back and do some more homework on those precedents and admit to us, as he should, that on both of those occasions the House of Commons painfully, laboriously, at the risk of taking a great deal of time, went through and considered every clause in those bills before the government of the day sought to move closure. In fact, on one occasion there was even a discussion of a couple of paragraphs on the title so that the rule would be met completely.

In the case of the naval aid bill in 1913—hon. members can find this in volume V—after considerable discussion clause 1 was carried. Clause 2 was discussed for a considerable time and then was postponed, as recorded in column 9276. Clause 3 was moved in that column and postponed in column 9339. Clause 4 was moved on that page and not postponed until column 9348. I could go on right down to clause 6. It was only after all of the clauses had had some discussion in the committee—I am not confusing the issue by pointing out the kind of so-called discussion we had on clauses 1, 2 or 3; I am letting that go because the issue about clauses 5, 6 and 7 is so much more important, and I am sure the chairman realizes that—it was only after there had been consideration and discussion recorded in Hansard and motions carried under protest and by votes and divisions, and so on, that the government of the day sought to move closure.

Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation

In 1917 there were two instances. The first was the bill having to do with the Canadian Northern Railway, which had four clauses and a title. I have in my hand the page numbers on which those various clauses were called and postponed. Clause 1 was postponed on page 4990; clause 2 was called on that page but did not get postponed until page 4996, and so on. As I say, I have all the information, but the point I am making is crystal clear. I have left nothing out. It is crystal clear that before the closure motion was moved all of the clauses had been considered by the committee.

Then, Mr. Chairman, in 1917 there was that extremely contentious measure, the wartime elections act. What historic memories, what a terrific battle it brings back, and yet the House of Commons, painfully, laboriously, went through the task of seeing to it that every clause, 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5, and the schedule, was considered before any attempt was made to move the closure. In fact, on that point, since I am rushing along and not putting all the figures on, may I say that on pages 5701 and 5702 Mr. Meighen said, in reply to a question:

> I do not know what the arrangement is, but I want to remind the hon. gentleman who is leading the opposition that all the clauses can be considered now and the notice given. I do not think the notice need apply to any particular day, as long as it is given at a previous sitting.

That statement of Mr. Meighen means that the notice of closure was given after all the five clauses and the schedule of the wartime elections act had been considered.

I am not a lawyer, Mr. Chairman; the Prime Minister is; but for the life of me I cannot see how he can stand up as leader of this House of Commons and ask us to rely on that detestable precedent of 1932, which the hon. member for Kamloops at least goes so far as to call invalid, and which Mr. King criticized so strongly. Yet he stands here and asks the house to fall back on that when we have these three clear-cut precedents in which Mr. Borden and Mr. Meighen, who were the draftsmen of closure, followed the rule to the limit. I call upon the Prime Minister to read again what he said to us in 1946 when he quoted scripture to us as well. I say to him, he can do these things; he has the power; he has the majority, but I did not think it was his manner to do such a thing.

I also point out, Mr. Chairman, that in addition to the statement the Prime Minister made today to the effect that the government would rather have followed the earlier, the better, precedent, it is also a matter of fact that the government started out to do it that way. Whatever explanation the government may now give about the frustration it experienced at our hands from this side, the fact of the matter is that last Thursday the Minister of Trade and Commerce sought to move to postpone clause 1, and then to postpone clause 2, and so on. There is no doubt what they were trying to do. They were trying to abide by the rule; they were trying to do it the right way. They were trying to do it the way the Prime Minister preferred them to do it. It was only when it became inconvenient to do it the right way that the government said, "Well, it looks as though we will have to pull Mr. Bennett out of the shadows and deify that precedent as something we can fall back on," despite what Mr. King said about the whole proceeding in 1932. As I say, the government started out in this instance to follow the rule as it is set out in standing order 33. They set out to follow the practice outlined clearly by Mr. Meighen back in 1913. They set out clearly to follow the precedent of 1913 and the two in 1917 but faced with frustration, faced with the fact that it was going to be difficult and inconvenient, it was decided that the rule book could be thrown in the Ottawa river.

Mr. Martin: Why do you say, "inconvenient"? You made it impossible to discuss.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): It is not impossible to obey the rules.

Mr. Knowles: My hon. friend the Minister of National Health and Welfare suggests that we have made it impossible.

Mr. Martin: To discuss.

Mr. Knowles: Without going into the question of whether or not we made it impossible I say to you sir, and I say to the government, no matter what road block or difficulty the opposition puts in the road of the government that does not give the government the right to break the rules. It does not give even the Prime Minister the right to urge this house to accept as in order a motion which I am sure he knows in his heart of hearts is not in keeping with the definition of the rules spelled out by Mr. Meighen, or in keeping with the three clear-cut, well-established precedents that were worked out in 1913 and in 1917.

I would say to the government that back in 1913 when this matter was being discussed there was a Liberal of that day who later became a unionist—and I guess that means he was eventually a Tory. I refer to Mr. Guthrie. Mr. Guthrie was a pretty critical Liberal in 1913 and he did not like the closure rule, nor did his leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier. At that time he tried to build up a case to the effect that it might be possible under this closure rule to avoid any discussion from the opposition side of the house at all. Sir Robert Borden said it was an absurd position but Mr. Guthrie, a Liberal at the time, worked it out by saying that we might be met by:

. . . a minister disposed to go the limit—

How little Mr. Guthrie realized he was prophesying the coming of a certain minister. He suggested that a minister might go the limit:

—and the committee stage can be passed without a syllable being uttered on the opposition side in the way of comment on the bill.

I am trying to find where he spelled it out that the committee could do it in committee of the whole in a minute of time going from one resolution to the next. Mr. Meighen replied to Mr. Guthrie and these are his words as recorded in column 8258 of Hansard of April 22, 1913:

Does the hon. member really seriously say that a minister moving the second reading of a bill, who during the course of his speech moves the adjournment, is moving that adjournment after debate? Is that his position?

Mr. Guthrie said yes and Mr. Meighen's reply was:

I will leave the hon. member to rest in that absurd position.

I am speaking quickly, and I am not able to pick it up readily but it is here, the corresponding discussion of the situation in committee where Mr. Guthrie suggested that the government might abuse this rule by having the committee go from one clause to another without any discussion.

Mr. Rowe: Exactly what they have done.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Meighen, Mr. Borden and others who were piloting the closure rule through the committee said that was impossible and that it would not be debate, that it would not be consideration, that under standing order 33 it would not be possible for one person only to speak and move the adjournment or postponement at the end of a speech.

Mr. Rowe: They never dreamed of 1956.

Mr. Knowles: How little Mr. Guthrie realized, when he used those words that there might some day be a minister prepared to go the limit, but he was uttering a prophecy that has been fulfilled in our day.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I urge you to consider this matter very seriously as I know you are and have been since you realized it might come up. There have been occasions in this house—I remember one particularly in 1948 when a predecessor of yours stood firm despite an appeal from the government side that a ruling be made the government's way. I refer to the time when Mr. Golding, who was in the chair, was faced with our contention that a ruling he made was correct whereas Mr. Abbott challenged that ruling and eventually appealed it to the house. This is even more serious than that. The whole question of the rights of parliament, despite what the Prime Minister tries to say, is at stake; not just our right to speak but the practice of the majority by its superior numbers in declaring that black is white. It can, by sheer weight of numbers, be done, and I am still dumbfounded that the minister of justice in 1948 who said it was not our manner to do such things—

Mr. Fleming: 1946.

Mr. Knowles: Yes, June 18, 1946—is today asking this house to take on something which, it is clear to everyone, is completely out of order.

Mr. Fleming: How the mighty have fallen.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I realize my time has expired and with one sentence I will sit down. Another great Liberal, Frank Oliver—I call the attention of the hon. member for Athabaska to this because he is a great devotee of his—said that closure is not a blow at the opposition of the house, it is a blow at the rights of the Canadian people. When closure is imposed in this way, by the moving of a motion that is out of order—

Some hon. Members: Time—

Mr. Knowles: —it is a blow that strikes at the very heart of our democratic system.

The Deputy Chairman: Before the hon. member for Prince Albert speaks I had intended to state this to the committee. I think I am in a position to make the very difficult ruling which it is my duty to make. I am going to hear the hon. member for Prince Albert but I am going to request him to advise me of new material. The material that has already been submitted by the hon. member for Kamloops, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the Prime Minister I have before me.

I am also going to indicate that perhaps I have been too lenient with hon. members on both sides of the house this afternoon in permitting what should be advice to the Speaker or the chairman on a matter of order to become a debate on the advisability of whether or not the motion should be passed, a matter which is not debatable.

Perhaps in order that I should make it clear why I say this to the committee I might point out that there is no debate on a point of order in that sense. The chairman takes the responsibility of permitting or asking, as the case may be, members of the house to assist him with their advice and it is his—that is, it will be my—responsibility to decide when that stage has passed. The hon. member for Prince Albert.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I start by reverting to the motion made by the Prime Minister, that at this sitting of the committee of the whole house on Bill No. 298 the further consideration of clauses 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7, the title of the said bill and any amendments proposed thereto shall be the first business of this committee and shall not be further postponed.

Now, sir, I listened to the Prime Minister today with all the interest which the prestige of the position he occupies demands, and I feel that in the course of his argument he realized how specious that argument was when he endeavoured to show that further consideration of clauses 5, 6 and 7 could take place when they had never been considered.

I ask the Prime Minister, through you, not believing at this time that there is any prospect of any change in his view, nor am I any more hopeful than if a seed were dropped on a glacier that it would become productive, but I do make this appeal on the basis of all the authority of British tradition. All the authority of British tradition is that this has never been done in a British parliament except in 1932, and then how different the matter was to the one now before this committee.

I am no authority on the rules, and I say that to begin with, but I have gone through all the British Hansards and gathered all the instances in the last 100 years. I have four of them here but I am not going into the details. I shall simply place them before the committee. To begin with, I say that never in all British history under a parliamentary system have the rules been juggled as they have in this case or have the rules been changed as it were between innings.

I go back nearly 60 years and start with the Ireland bill in 1901; then there was the education local authority bill in 1904; the military service bill in 1916, and the tithe bill in 1918. In every one of those cases motions were made similar in nature, that further consideration be postponed, and in every case the ruling was that there was no authority under British tradition for such a course to be followed.

Today the Prime Minister paid a tribute to our system and the need of preserving parliament. I say to him that the responsibility cannot be dissolved by saying that the majority is with him in the stand he has taken. Parliament and the preservation of its prestige are paramount to a pipe line or to a prime minister frustrated. In every one of the cases to which I have referred, and I have the authorities here, the hon. gentleman occupying the position that you now occupy decided without question against any similar move being made. It is interesting to read what some of the participants in that debate had to say. At that time they did not report verbatim but rather in narrative form, and I refer hon. members to volume 139, page 1220 of the British Hansard for 1904, at which time Mr. Lloyd George was taking part in the debate on the education local authority bill. I quote:

> Lloyd George joined in the debate and stated that "It surely was the duty of the chairman to protect the minority in this respect. It was obvious that the object in thus drafting the bill with only one section was so as to be able to closure it in one motion."

And later:

> Again Lloyd George warns the Prime Minister, A. G. Balfour, that everything had been compressed into a single clause in order that the matter might be rushed through.

But parliament decided otherwise through the chairman. I am not going to do other than simply state as a member of this house that I have gone through British Hansard and I find that never has such a devious course been accepted at any time. The mere ruling that the words "that further consideration be postponed"—I ask the Prime Minister, through you, if he would advance the argument in the Supreme Court of Canada that further consideration be postponed with regard to something that had not been considered? I am going to quote one who has a distinguished son as a member of this cabinet. In 1932 the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, the leader from the province of Quebec whose successor is the Prime Minister, had this to say as reported on page 1497 of Hansard for that year:

> It means that parliament is being asked to abrogate its position as the predominant factor in legislation. It means that we are being asked to agree to be dragged at the wheels of the Prime Minister and to make parliament an appendage of the executive.

Mr. Harris: He was not talking about closure.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will read it all.

> This attitude of the Prime Minister makes our duty to resist this legislation more imperative.

I am glad the minister suggested that because it is more applicable having regard to the Prime Minister's conduct in the last day or two.

The first duty of parliament is to remain a parliament, not to become a subservient and ornamental body. Parliament has a right which is certainly paramount to the convenience of the Prime Minister, the right to live.

May I interpolate, it is also superior to the frustration of a prime minister.

It has the duty to defend itself and not to allow anybody to invade its rights and privileges. It is the will of parliament, not that of the government, that is the will of the nation. When the Prime Minister says that he speaks for the whole of the country, he is mistaking the echo of his words for the voice of the Canadian people. It is parliament which is and must remain the authorized exponent of public opinion and of the public will.

And then later on:

The sovereignty of the people is delegated to parliament, not to the executive, and when I say "parliament", it means the minority as well as the majority in parliament.

I have given you the authorities and I am not going to reargue the points which have already been placed before you. However, I do make an appeal to the Prime Minister. This parliament, this institution should be a temple of freedom, not a place where frustration becomes the means whereby rights are swept aside and whereby rules are misinterpreted in order to achieve a temporary advantage. There is no interpretation that anyone can give that there can be further consideration of a clause that has never been considered.

Mr. Chairman, no matter how the word "further" is misinterpreted, the dictionary or any other meaning cannot be contrived to expand it to mean that further can have reference to something that has not yet been done or achieved. The Prime Minister could certainly act even now. There is no reason why he should allow himself as Prime Minister to be made an instrument to perpetrate on parliament a ruling which if achieved could be extended beyond the present limitations. If the present interpretation as advanced by the Prime Minister is correct, then all that would have to be done would be to bring in the bill and have the minister introducing it simply say, "Clauses 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6 and 7 and the title; I move that no further consideration be given to these clauses." How ridiculous can we become. How spurious an argument can be advanced. I quote further from page 1498 the words of Mr. Lapointe:

The duties of an opposition are, as he says, to discuss the measures which are submitted to parliament on the various stages of the bills, certainly not to obstruct. He says that would be a crime against the state. But, Mr. Speaker, when the measure is one that has the effect of making parliament extinguish itself, when it is a measure for the purpose of taking away all the rights, privileges and powers of parliament, it is then the duty of the opposition to try to prevent its adoption and those who perpetrate a crime against the state are those responsible for bringing down such a measure . . .

I read that because I did not want to leave any portion out.

What he would conceive as a parliament is that we should stand at attention and salute when the Prime Minister wants us to do so, a parliament that would be ready to goose-step at the behest of the Prime Minister. Sir, the methods of the czar have produced bolshevism, and we do not wish to introduce that in Canada. It is an evil work, I claim, on the part of those who are in this way undermining the authority of parliament . . .

Those were the words of that tribune of democracy who, regardless of whether one agrees with him or not, at all times knew his sincerity, his capacity and his statesmanship. I ask the Prime Minister even now, even on the basis of a simple mathematical formula, if he were arguing a case in the Supreme Court of Canada, and there were three judgments along one line and one along the other, would he argue that the one should be preferred to the three, particularly when the acceptance of his interpretation of No. 1 would have the effect of emasculating parliament? Surely this government will not pursue its stubborn course. I join with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in saying, what I have said in this parliament and outside, that I never believed that this thing would take place, with a man like the present Prime Minister in this position. I have always said, "After all, while one may disagree with him, he will endeavour at all times to uphold the sacredness of parliament". I ask him even now to make, or at least endeavour to make, and restore it as a temple of freedom instead of a place of majority repression.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I have one further ground to bring forward and on which to base new argument, as you yourself invited, and that is the ground of commonsense. What are we being asked to do if we establish the precedent on the basis of the motion made by the Prime Minister today? We would be asked to emasculate the committee and to prevent the committee from doing that job for which it was set up, namely, to help the House of Commons, which has referred this bill to us.

I refer you to a citation in an old book but an authoritative one, Palgrave's "Chairman's Handbook", where you will find at page 87 the following passage under the heading "Duties and Powers of a Committee":

The assistance of those who appoint the committee is its legitimate function.

In other words, the function of this committee is to assist the House of Commons who appointed us and referred this bill to us. It continues:

> And this assistance is generally rendered by the conduct of an inquiry through the reception of evidence, the drafting of a document, or the consideration of papers referred to the committee.

What has been referred to us is a bill of seven clauses. We cannot consider that bill adequately unless we consider each clause. We are being asked now to accept closure on a motion moved by the Prime Minister when we have only had four clauses actually called and placed before us.

On the same subject, what Mr. Meighen said as to reasonableness is very appropriate. In column 9367 of Hansard for 1912-13, he said this. He had been asked by Mr. Guthrie what would happen if the government tried to close off all debate before the matter had even been considered. He said:

> I endeavoured to meet that position and I said that within the reasonable meaning—

I am appealing here to common sense.

> —of that rule the government would not be acting correctly or within the spirit of the rules if they did not permit the opposite side to speak.

He went on to answer a member who had asked him a question, by saying:

> His difficulty is that he forgets that all sentences in law or anything else and all rules in the House of Commons as in law, must be interpreted in the stern light of commonsense. When the rule says that there must be a debate before the motion to postpone it is made, the word debate must be interpreted in a reasonable way in the light of the sentence.

Here we have the word "consideration" as applicable to committee. Let us apply this question to common sense. We are asked to use the precedent of 1932 in which, after one clause had been before the committee, all the other clauses were brought under closure. Although four clauses have been brought before us we are asked to apply that precedent today. What would that establish? It is the precedent that we have to consider, the ruling that would be made and embedded in the authorities of this house.

Supposing that we had a bill of 50 clauses, this would establish the precedent that one clause might be called and postponed and then the other 49 put under closure. Supposing we had a bill of 150 clauses, with one clause called and postponed and 149 put under closure without any previous discussion, or supposing we had the Criminal Code or the Canada Shipping Act, with 600 or 700 clauses —we have statutes of that magnitude on our statute books and we very probably will have them again—are we to establish a precedent—is that what the right hon. gentleman asked us to do?—that would say that when one clause has been called and postponed after 15 seconds discussion, and others not called, the other 699 can then be put under closure? That is what the right hon. gentleman is asking us to establish here today. What is to be the average? Four out of seven? One out of five? One out of 20? It becomes impossible of interpretation, and the full absurdity and unsoundness of the proposition now placed before us is made self-evident.

Therefore, I should like to conclude, Mr. Chairman, by referring you to one other statement made by Mr. Meighen when he discussed the closure rule and made it clear that it must be interpreted and applied in the light of common sense. He was asked whether the very sort of thing or a similar sort of thing to what is being done today could ever be done under this rule. Here is what he said, in column 7533 of Hansard. He was asked by Mr. German:

> I did not say it should be done. I was asking the hon. gentleman if, under these rules, it could be done?

Mr. Knowles: The Prime Minister should listen to this one.

Mr. Fulton:

> Mr. Meighen: Yes, but it would be absurdity itself if it were done and I do not think that any hon. gentleman could suggest any method for guarding against what some hon. members may think is a terror but which I think could not be perpetrated except by a government which was at once insane and vicious.

Mr. Fleming: That day has come.

Mr. Fulton: If this goes through, it will be an affront, a precedent fastened upon the House of Commons, which can only be described as an insane and vicious act.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, there is one point, before you make your ruling, which I should like to refer, and which I do not believe has been dealt with, and certainly not emphasized. It seems to me, quite apart from the interpretation of the words, which certainly has great importance, that there is an extremely important question arising as to the interpretation of what was done in 1932. In 1932, which is the precedent upon which the Prime Minister now relies, an act of three sections was before the committee. The first section had been discussed and there was a wide discussion of the first section. I think it is important to note what that act was because the nature of the act has something to do with the argument that the subsequent sections had also been discussed while section 1 was under consideration.

The act of 1932, when closure was moved under a blanket motion such as we have now, was an act respecting unemployment and farm relief. That was an act which had as its purpose the validating of certain steps taken under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931, following the expiry date of that act on the first day of March, 1932, and making all the various steps that had been taken valid and also continuing the act in full force and effect. It was simply in its purpose the continuance on the statute books, with such necessary other powers as there might be, of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act of 1931.

There was not much question in anyone's mind about the necessity of continuing the act. There were certain discussions as to the details with regard to the procedure, but the whole core of the act that was before the house, the whole weight of the argument, rested on the discussion of section 1. Sections 2 and 3 only referred to the placing of all orders in council and regulations made under the provisions of the act before the house and also providing that the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931, and this act, that is, the act of 1932, should be read and construed as one act.

In other words, sections 2 and 3 were simply definitive sections which followed in the natural course of events from section 1. Section 1 had been discussed; and I am not going to argue about the desirability of this precedent. As we look back on this precedent of 1932 we realize how dangerous it is to move from one precedent to another which narrows and restricts the rights of parliament. In this case, if there are objections to the arguments that were made in support of this procedure, they can be made on the ground and only on the ground that sections 2 and 3 had not been considered within the meaning of the rules because they had in fact not been discussed separately. I certainly do not like the wrapping together of sections in this way but at least it can be said that in discussing section 1 of the act in 1932 the effect of sections 2 and 3 was embraced in that discussion. In any event, it was simply an act continuing another act already on the statute books and in three short sections making such provisions as were appropriate for the continuance of that act.

This is a very different situation, different in every way. Section 1 was not discussed. Section 1 was not considered in any ordinary meaning of the word "considered". Whether "consider" means to discuss or to examine or to debate, in this case there was none. The section was called and it was postponed. The same applied to section 2 and the same applied to section 3. Then for the first time we came to section 4 and there was some discussion but only then under the limitations of having passed over the earlier sections.

The Prime Minister made the extraordinary contention this afternoon that there was in fact no difference in the situation resulting from the absence of any consideration of section 1. Mr. Chairman, by practice and by tradition the first section is the section where discussion can take place, where there can be questions and answers, and it opens the broad discussion of the legislation generally. That was denied to us. So also was any discussion of section 2, and when the Prime Minister says, with some suggestion of a desire to meet the wishes of the members, that he thought we might well discuss the later sections, that really is the unkindest cut of all.

After all, here were section 2 and section 3 that were important sections and we were not allowed to discuss them. We got into section 4 without even having had a chance to define what the words meant that were going to be used in the act or to know what kind of corporation it was that we were going to discuss in section 4. The two situations are entirely different. No matter how far one may strain the application of the decision in 1932, Mr. Chairman, I submit that it would be straining the English language in a way that would make any ruling a mere fiction if it were said that the precedent of 1932 was justification for the acceptance of the motion now before us. That would be so even if it were said that there has been consideration of all the sections of this measure in the limited debate that has taken place on one section after closure on section 1, closure on section 2, closure on section 3 and no opportunity whatever even to have sections 5, 6 and 7 brought before us.

No, Mr. Chairman, there is no possible parallel between the two cases. It would be a shameless distortion of the meaning of simple and understandable words if it were said that those words embraced such a procedure as that which we have here and I submit, Mr. Chairman, that you now have it in your hands to restore to this parliament some of the dignity, some of the honour, some of the tradition which have been the rich heritage of those who now sit here as the successors of those who built a great institution over the years since 1867. Upon you is now imposed the opportunity and the responsibility to return to this house the meaning of words in the language that we use and to give to those words a sensible and understandable meaning that does not place in the heart of every member of the house uncertainty as to whether or not the rules are really to be applied in the strict meaning of the words.

It has been said here that there has been reason for concern on the part of every member about the nature of some of the exchanges that have been taking place. Let there be no uncertainty, let there be no pretence that the chair and the chairmanship of the committee have not been called into question by the members of this house. They have by votes which have tested the rulings that have been made. If on this occasion the words of this ruling are now extended to embrace the interpretation that is sought by the Prime Minister, then I submit it would be most difficult for members of the house at any time to refer to any rule and to say that it meant what it said in the plain language in which it was printed. On this occasion, Mr. Chairman, I submit there is a great opportunity to restore in their full meaning the acceptance of the rules we have, and to restore to the chair the dignity it should possess in this house.

The Deputy Chairman: I preface this ruling with a reference to the last remarks made by the Leader of the Opposition. It is always the duty of a chairman, I take it, when a ruling is to be made to make a ruling which will be unpalatable to one side or the other. I have every respect for the warmth of feeling on both sides of the house on this occasion, but I think I am entitled to express some regret that it should be indicated to the chair in advance that you either think as we do or—I will go a little farther than the Leader of the Opposition went—you are not worthy of the office you hold. I am sorry to say that, but I can put no other interpretation upon his remarks.

Mr. Drew: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman; I would hope that we would not continue the nature of the discussions which have disturbed this house in recent days. I do not think what I said was open to that meaning. I am suggesting that it would greatly add to the confidence of this house in the meaning of words if the chair, on this occasion, came to the conclusion that words had their simple, ordinary meaning.

The Deputy Chairman: I thank the Leader of the Opposition for that clarification paragraph. I suppose it would be a very small compliment coming from me if I were to say that those members who have spoken today should be complimented on the work that they have done in connection with this case. I have done a little myself, but I have had considerable help from those who have spoken.

[Mr. Drew.]

Now, as this matter has aroused so much debate I presume it is my duty to give some reasons for the ruling that I am about to make. I do that knowing full well that it is said so often in the legal profession that many a judge's case would stand up against appeal if he had not given written reasons to support his decision. The whole question really seems to revolve around the interpretation to be put on the words "further consideration" found in standing order 33. It is submitted by those who oppose the legality of the Prime Minister's motion that further consideration cannot possibly be interpreted as applying to the two different classes of sections which we have before us, the first three of which were called and which certain members of the opposition claim did not receive consideration worthy of the name, and the last three which admittedly have not yet been called.

I think that decision has already been made. I think the position I am in at the moment is not to indicate to the committee what I think the rules of this house should be but what they are. In most, not all, of the submissions made this afternoon there has been a great deal of quotation from statements made in similar debates to this in previous years. While the people who made those speeches, perhaps by their prominence in the life of the country, are entitled to be quoted and listened to with respect, those quotations none the less were arguments and not decisions. We have been told, and it is so, that four somewhat similar incidents have been before this house. In three of those four the question which has been raised as a point of order never came up. In those first three the clauses had been considered and therefore the question as to whether or not it was necessary did not come up and was not argued.

This leaves only the case of 1932, and incidentally in point of time the most recent case of this kind to come before the house. I believe it was the last time closure came before the house, but I am not sure about that. On page 1605 of Hansard for March 31, 1932, Mr. Bennett made this statement:

> I beg leave to give notice that, at the next sitting of the committee of the whole house, I shall move that the further consideration of the title and clauses 1, 2 and 3 of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Continuance Act, 1932, shall be the first business of the committee and shall not be further postponed.

There was some discussion at that time, but of course that was the notice and the matter was not before the Chair.

On page 1609, the following day, when the committee resumed Mr. Bennett said:

> Before the order is proceeded with, Mr. Chairman, I desire to make the motion of which I gave notice last evening, that further consideration of the title and clauses 1, 2 and 3 of Unemployment and Farm Relief Continuance Act, 1932, shall be the first business of the committee and shall not be further postponed.

He made some further brief remarks and the chairman put the question. Then Mr. Gardiner, not the present member of the house, rose to a point of order as follows:

On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, is not clause 1 the question that is before the committee at the present time?

The chairman, who was Mr. Hanson of York-Sunbury, said:

Technically speaking, clause 1 was before the committee, but the committee considered every clause of the bill. As a matter of fact, therefore, all the clauses of the bill have been before the committee.

Mr. Gardiner: On another point of order: Is it possible to have three clauses of a bill considered in committee at the same time? Is it not more correct to say that in accordance with the ruling of the Chair, the committee will now proceed to the consideration of clauses 2 and 3.

The Chairman (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): I do not know that I should advise the hon. member touching the suggestion which he has just made. I do not understand it to be a point of order.

The chairman then put the question that clauses 1, 2 and 3 of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Continuance Act shall be the first business of the committee and shall not be further postponed. It has been agreed, I think, by all—I mean all in this committee—that clause 1 had been called and debated and clauses 2 and 3 had not been called, but it seems to be generally agreed in the discussion here that their subject matter was discussed during the debate on clause 1. In this committee clauses 1, 2 and 3 have been called;—I leave aside for the moment the question of whether they have been considered because this house has made a ruling on that—clause 4 has been called and debated at length. I do not think that it could be seriously contended that the discussion on clause 4 did not range pretty well over clauses 5, 6 and 7 and 1, 2 and 3. At any rate, I find that it did for the purpose of this section.

Now, I am not in the least unmindful of the not only impassioned but impressive appeals which have been made to me by members speaking for the opposition in their argument that the Prime Minister's resolution is out of order. I accept that responsibility, as I accept what I consider to be my only responsibility at the moment; not to rule upon the merits or demerits of a motion, not to rule upon the desirability or otherwise of procedure or of a standing order, but to try to come to a conclusion as cold-bloodedly as I can as to whether or not the motion submitted by the Prime Minister is in order. In accordance with the rules and the practice of this house, based on the last decision in 1932, I so rule.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I appeal your ruling to the house.

Mr. Nowlan: They are all the same.

Mr. Drew: Tear up the rule books now.

Mr. Rowe: Precedents are established for anything. You can do as you like in the future. If any of you young fellows ever become Prime Minister, you can do anything.

Mr. Harris: We like you around.

Mr. Rowe: You have precedents for anything. Close parliament; throw away the key; throw away the rule books. Everything is set. Things that are of interest to the country, don't debate them.

The Deputy Chairman: For the information of the hon. member for Kamloops and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—the hon. member for Kamloops raised the point of order—I propose, before officially submitting it to the house, to read them the report I propose to make on this ruling I have made.

In committee of the whole, with respect to the Prime Minister's motion, Mr. Fulton raised a point of order that the motion was not in order on the ground that certain clauses of the bill had not been before the committee and also that other clauses were postponed before being considered by the committee and, therefore, in accordance with standing order 33, the said clauses could not come within ambit of the proposed motion. The chairman ruled that in accordance with rules and practices of the house the motion is in order.

Mr. Speaker resumed the chair, and the chairman of the committee made the following report:

Mr. Speaker, in committee of the whole, Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East) moved that at this sitting of the committee of the whole house on Bill No. 298, an act to establish the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation, the further consideration of clauses 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, the title of the said bill, and any amendments proposed thereto, shall be the first business of this committee and shall not further be postponed.

Mr. Fulton raised a point of order that the motion was not in order on the ground that certain clauses of the bill have not been before the committee and also that other clauses were postponed before being considered by the committee, and therefore, in accordance with standing order 33, the said clauses could not come within the ambit of the proposed motion.

The chairman ruled that in accordance with the rules and the practice of the house, the motion is in order.

Whereupon Mr. Knowles appealed to the house from the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows:

The question before the house is an appeal from a ruling of the chairman of the committee of the whole.

Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation

In committee of the whole, Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East) moved that at this sitting of the committee of the whole house on Bill No. 298, an act to establish the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation, the further consideration of clauses 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, the title of the said bill, and any amendments proposed thereto, shall be the first business of this committee and shall not further be postponed.

Mr. Fulton raised a point of order that the motion was not in order on the ground that certain clauses of the bill have not been before the committee and also that other clauses were postponed before being considered by the committee, and therefore, in accordance with standing order 33, the said clauses could not come within the ambit of the proposed motion.

The chairman ruled that in accordance with the rules and the practice of the house, the motion is in order.

Whereupon Mr. Knowles appealed to the house from the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, before you put the question will you hear me on a point of order? My point of order is, sir, that on other occasions when an appeal has been made from the committee of the whole house you have based your action on citation 428 of Beauchesne, third edition, which reads as follows:

> In case of an appeal to the house, it is the duty of the chairman to leave the chair immediately and report in writing the point of order which he has decided. The Speaker must then submit the matter to the determination of the house in the language reported to him and put the question. "That the decision of the chairman be confirmed." No discussion is allowed on the appeal.

The point I want to bring Your Honour's attention to is that you appear to be overlooking something which has been an established practice of the house and simply has been in abeyance because the issue has not been raised for a great number of years. This method of appealing from the committee of the whole house to the Speaker in days gone by followed two courses and, as Bourinot points out on page 395 of his fourth edition:

> If a question of order arise, the chairman will decide it himself, unless it be deemed more advisable to refer the matter to the speaker in the house itself.

Then he quotes rule 14, which was applicable at the time this book was written.

> Rule 14 provides: "The chairman of the committee of the whole house shall maintain order in the committee, deciding all questions of order, subject to an appeal to the house; but disorder in a committee can only be censured by the house on receiving a report thereof."

Then in a very interesting note at the bottom of the page the editor of this book, Mr. Bourinot, says:

> The first appeal to the house under this rule occurred in the session of 1885, and there have been several since that date, but it has inconveniences, since the house is called upon suddenly and without debate to decide a question of order which many of its members may not have heard discussed in committee, and the result is, in many cases, a political, rather than a judicial vote, which might not stand the test if strict parliamentary rules were applied.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that in considering matters such as these one has to take very carefully into consideration whether or not a separate group of decisions may be established in committee of the whole house apart from decisions established by Speakers. As I understood Your Honour on other occasions when we were having this type of appeal, you stated or implied that you had no part other than simply to put the vote to the house. I am suggesting for your careful consideration that you have two courses of action to follow. The first is to consider the motion itself, the point of appeal, and give assistance or advice to the chairman of the committee of the whole house who may then revise his ruling in committee of the whole house. Your second course of action is that if you are satisfied the rules have been satisfactorily obeyed, that the precedents have been followed, you may proceed to put the vote as you have done on several occasions in the past.

Bourinot goes on to discuss this on page 396. He deals with the first matter which is now in front of you, the report in writing from the chairman of the committee and the fact that the Speaker will put the question, and then he says:

> If the committee wish assistance or confirmation on a point of procedure on which they are in doubt, or on which the chairman has not expressed or does not wish to express an opinion, they may ask the advice of the Speaker.

Dealing with that further down he says:

> In the former case, where the committee refers to the Speaker for advice, progress is reported on motion duly made, and when the Speaker has given his advice, the committee resumes in accordance with regular practice.

Now, sir, that matter came up for discussion in the House of Commons here on June 6, 1899. The point at issue in committee of the whole house then was whether or not a document which had been referred to in the course of debate should or should not be tabled. The Deputy Speaker, the chairman of the committee, ruled that it was not necessary in his opinion because of a lapse of time that had occurred since it had first been mentioned. Then a procedural dispute developed as to how the appeal should be made to the Speaker.

Sir Charles Tupper was interested in the matter and he said, as reported in column 4448 of Hansard for June 6, 1899:

> I understand, Mr. Chairman, that you have given your ruling, and I desire to appeal from your ruling to the Speaker. It is a very important point.

You will note, sir, that he did not say he was appealing to the house. Then considerable discussion occurred. After Sir Charles Tupper had claimed the right to appeal rather than having to go through the business of moving a motion that the committee rise and report, the Deputy Speaker said, as reported in column 4449 of Hansard of that date:

> The hon. gentleman will find in Sir John Bourinot, at page 483:
> "If it be found expedient in either house to refer a point of order to the Speaker, a member will move that the chairman report progress and ask leave to sit again that day. When the Speaker has resumed, the chairman will report that the committee wishes to be instructed as to the point in question."

Then the committee had a little trouble with regard to the motion to rise and report, which was defeated and they were left in a state of suspended animation.

It appeared then that things had come to an impasse. In column 4451 of the same volume Sir Charles Tupper spoke at some length with regard to this matter and read from Bourinot of that particular period, an earlier volume than the one I have here. He also referred to points of order similar to that which had occurred in 1885 and 1886. This is what he read from the Bourinot that was in his possession in 1899:

> If a question of order arise in committee, the chairman will decide it himself, unless it be deemed more advisable to refer the matter to the Speaker. Rule 76 provides that a question of order arising in committee of the whole shall be decided by the chairman, subject to an appeal to the house, but his order to the committee can only be censured by the house on the Speaker receiving a report thereof.

May I indicate here that rule 76 has come down to us with only the slightest modification and appears as standing order 59 (4), which reads:

> The chairman shall maintain order in the committees of the whole house, deciding all questions of order subject to an appeal to the house; but disorder in a committee can only be censured by the house, on receiving a report thereof.

I note that in the rule book of 1922 that ruling is substantially the same as it was in 1899 and as it is at the present time. Our present rule has modified the one of 1922 by leaving out two or three inconsequential words, and the rule that was then No. 14 read:

> The chairman of the committee of the whole house shall maintain order in the committee, deciding all questions of order subject to an appeal to the house; but disorder in a committee can only be censured by the house, on receiving a report thereof.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that in 1899 there was a firm course of action established in the House of Commons at this particular stage in its proceedings when the committee of the whole house asks for an appeal and expects in that appeal to get a decision or advice from the Speaker on a point of order that has been raised; or, failing that, the second course of action which is putting the question.

In column 4452 of Hansard for June 6, 1899, Sir Charles Tupper said these words:

> It is out of respect to the Speaker that the practice I refer to has been followed—

He had been referring to the practice of 1885 and so on.

> —because the Speaker is considered the appellate authority who settles the practices, not only for the house, but the committee, and the chairman of the committee has not the right to prevent the Speaker regulating, if desired by anyone in the committee, the point in dispute.

He goes on to point out how that appeal to the Speaker may be arrived at.

I said that on June 6, 1899, there had been a little difficulty and some uncertainty in the committee. On June 7 of that year the Deputy Speaker rising at the commencement of committee proceedings said this, as reported in column 4553 of Hansard:

> With the permission of the house, before we proceed with the consideration of this bill, I would like to make a full statement, in view of what occurred last night.
> With the view of preventing any such misunderstanding with respect to the procedure on the questions that arose during yesterday's sittings in committee of the whole, and on the appeal to the house from the decision of the chairman of the committee, I may state that I have referred to the authorities on such subjects, and find the following rules laid down authoritatively.

Then he gives the four rules which were the authority of that day and which should pertain to the present. Here they are:

> 1. If the committee wishes assistance or information on a point of procedure on which they are in doubt, or on which the chairman has not expressed or does not wish to express an opinion, they may ask the advice of the Speaker. But, as a rule of practice, the chairman alone is responsible for the business of the committee, and no appeal can be made from his decision on a point of procedure except to the house.

He then goes on to give the authority. The second rule is:

> 2. In the former case, where the committee refers to the Speaker for advice, progress is reported on motion duly made, and when the Speaker has given his advice, the committee resumes in accordance with the regular practice of the house.

The third and fourth deal with putting the question and what happens if the Speaker be absent. I bring this out to indicate the two courses of action which are open, to indicate that this is a practice which has been firmly established in the House of Commons but which has not been called into use for a great many years until just this last week or so. In the interval the collective memory of the House of Commons has forgotten the practice which was authoritative in the past and the present rule dealing just with appeals to the house, as it states, was in days gone by a reference to the Speaker for his decision and advice. If he was satisfied that the ruling made by the chairman was sound I presume he would simply put the question.

Mr. Speaker: Before the hon. member proceeds further would he be kind enough to give me the page in Hansard of 1899 where the Speaker laid down those rules?

Mr. Churchill: It was the Deputy Speaker and I think overnight between June 6 and 7 he must have consulted Mr. Speaker. This will be found in columns 4553 and 4554.

I suggest that the Speaker's duty, which I know he clearly understands himself, is to understand everything that comes before this house and to determine whether or not it is in accord with the rules and traditions of parliament. Beauchesne's 1922 edition refers to Hatsell at page 117 as follows:

> For the Speaker is not placed in the chair merely to read every bit of paper which any member puts in his hands in the form of a question; but it is his duty to make himself perfectly acquainted with the orders of the house and its ancient practice, and to endeavour to carry those orders and that practice into execution.

I suggest that while perhaps that practice may be called ancient, nevertheless it is sound. I took the trouble to investigate the English practice, and I would refer you to May's fifteenth edition at page 516. I find that in England they have used this method all along of asking advice from the Speaker, as well as simply putting the question as to whether the chairman's ruling should be sustained. I quote from page 516 as follows:

> In 1889 appeal was made to the Speaker regarding extensive alterations made by the committee on the tithe rent-charge recovery bill. He stated that, whilst he desired to safeguard the rights and jurisdiction of the chairman of ways and means in giving an opinion on a matter of committee procedure, and although he could not, as Speaker, stop the bill on the point of order that the bill was a new bill, he unhesitatingly affirmed that the practice of the house had been, in a case of this kind, to withdraw a bill which had been so dealt with, and to introduce another bill in an amended form on which the decision of the house could be obtained upon a second reading. The bill was thereupon withdrawn.

I emphasize the fact that this was an appeal to the Speaker for his advice. His advice was accepted by the committee and the bill was withdrawn.

> On 27 January 1913 the Speaker was asked to express his opinion as to certain amendments which it was proposed to move to the franchise and registration bill, then being considered in committee of the whole house. The Speaker—

I omit a few words which are not applicable.

> —said that the admission of any one of the amendments to which his attention had been directed would so alter the bill as to make it a new bill, and that he would advise the house under the circumstances that the bill should be withdrawn and leave be asked for the introduction of a new bill.

I think that shows clearly that two courses are open to a committee of the whole house, in England as in Canada. I checked the British Hansard to see what happened, and I find that on January 24, 1913, Mr. F. E. Smith and Mr. Lloyd George were engaged in the discussion of a point of order. Mr. F. E. Smith is reported in column 879 of the British Hansard of January 24, 1913, as follows:

> I ask your ruling at once, before the right hon. gentleman proceeds—as it might have consequences no one would desire if the view I am submitting to you is right—as to whether that matter falls within your competence to decide or whether it is not a matter for Mr. Speaker, and Mr. Speaker alone.

He was addressing those remarks in committee to the chairman. Then Mr. Lloyd George, who was also interested in this point of order, went on to say:

> The question which I am putting to you, sir, is whether you will rule during the committee stage that the bill has been so transformed that you could not proceed with it during the committee stage. I certainly am not in any sense challenging the opinion of Mr. Speaker, because Mr. Speaker has not given a ruling upon the point, and I am certain that if he did I would certainly challenge it except with Mr. Speaker in the chair. What I want a ruling upon is whether you in committee may feel that the bill has been so transformed as to be a totally different bill that you could not allow any progress to be made with it.

Then the chairman said this:

> My answer to the right hon. gentleman is that, in my view, the only thing that concerns me as chairman is whether each amendment as it comes up in turn is in order—that is to say, within the scope of the bill—and otherwise in order. I have nothing to do with the question which appears to be raised, the question of what the cumulative effect of amendments may be with regard to future stages of the bill. That does not fall in any way within my jurisdiction. I should certainly not have any power to stop the bill in committee, however many amendments are proposed and carried, if each one individually was in order.

That was on Friday, and on Monday following the prime minister rose in his place and asked for the advice of the Speaker with regard to this trouble which had arisen in committee. Mr. Speaker is reported in column 1020 as follows:

> I believe I should be meeting the general convenience of the house if I were to state now what my view would be supposing certain amendments to the franchise bill were to be admitted. I will say this: If the amendments of which notice has been given by the government, and one or two of the amendments designed to grant women suffrage were to be inserted in the bill, my opinion is that under those circumstances the bill would be substantially a new bill. Therefore, in accordance with the practice of the house, it ought to be withdrawn and a fresh bill ought to be introduced.

I bring forward these examples to show, Mr. Speaker, that there are two courses of action open; that when you yourself are presented with an appeal from the committee of the whole house it is within your rights and obviously your duty to examine that appeal and decide whether or not the decision reached within the committee is in accordance with the established rules and precedents of the house. Otherwise, if that is not done, it is quite possible that a body of decisions made by the chairman of the committee of the whole house would be set up, which, I think, would be apparent if that practice had prevailed in the past or prevailed in the United Kingdom House of Commons now, in that all our reference books would contain precedents and citations from deputy speakers. There are none of those anywhere. The references are always to decisions reached by Speakers themselves. I think the Speaker has an overriding responsibility, and particularly does that apply when a new matter comes to the House of Commons in committee of the whole house.

When some new decision has to be made for which there are no Speaker's decisions to go upon, what position are we placed in at that time? I think that is the position we are in right now. We have something now in front of us on which heretofore in the House of Commons no decision has been made. Are we now simply to have a vote on the decision reached by the chairman of the committee of the whole house, without an opportunity for the Speaker himself to examine that ruling and see whether it is in accordance with established precedents?

I think not. I think that here the duty of the Speaker overrides the duty of the chairman in the committee of the whole house, as in any other committee, and that when a report comes from the committee of the whole house, such as this, he must first examine that report and decide whether or not he will advise the committee of the whole house, because it is obviously in difficulty or, having decided that the matter is in order, soundly based on precedent, then he may put the question.

If it is an entirely new matter, I think the Speaker should give it consideration and bring to bear upon it the benefit of his great experience, just as has been done in this example I have quoted from the United Kingdom House of Commons, where the Speaker himself was appealed to, to make decisions which were considered to be not within the competence of the chairman of the committee of the whole house. I use that word "competence" in the proper technical sense, because no matter how able a chairman of the committee of the whole house may be he is working within a restricted field.

The same would apply, surely, to other chairmen of committees, as we have seen here where the chairman of the committee of the whole house may be spelled off for a while. I would not say any one of the members of the house, but in rotation various members are given the opportunity to occupy the place of the chairman, and it is conceivable that trouble might arise in the committee of the whole house when someone of inexperience was in the chair. Could he then make a decision and simply have that decision upheld by a vote of the house without the Speaker, a man of experience, the custodian of the rules of the House of Commons, passing his opinion upon that ruling?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): I shall detain the house only one very brief moment. The wording of the old paragraph 58 (3), and I am quoting from the third edition of Beauchesne, is:

> The chairman shall maintain order in the committees of the whole house, deciding all questions of order subject to an appeal to the house;

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre rose and said, "I appeal your ruling to the house."

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I say a few words in connection with the point of order—

An hon. Member: We heard you.

Mr. Knowles: —raised by my hon. friend the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. In the course of my brief remarks I shall answer the point which the Minister of Finance has just made. In fact it is one of the points on which I have made a few notes.

It seems to me that the point the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre made about a body of rulings being built up is extremely important, as Your Honour is well aware, because it has been quite a chore for you at this session.

Mr. Speaker: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: Votes and Proceedings have to include all the rulings you make from the chair. Indeed, not only are your rulings on points of order included in Votes and Proceedings, but various other statements you feel called upon to make from time to time are included in Votes and Proceedings or the Journals. As hon. members are aware, the Journals occupy a more official place, so far as the records of the house are concerned, than is the case with respect to Hansard. However, rulings made by the chairman of the committee of the whole house do not result in the statement by the chairman being included in the Journals.

In other words, as the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre said, a body of judgments, which may have a very great bearing on the future proceedings of the house and of the committee of the whole house, is being built up without the sanction of being reviewed by Mr. Speaker and his opinions thereon included in the Journals. I recognize as the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre has had to recognize, that this is dipping back into a practice that has fallen somewhat into disuse, but it seems to me that an issue such as the one with which we are confronted today, important as it is, raises the question as to whether or not the Speaker should merely put the question to the house or whether he should examine the report and express his views thereon.

The Minister of Finance read from the old standing order 58 (3), which is now 59 (4), and which reads as follows:

> The chairman shall maintain order in the committees of the whole house, deciding all questions of order subject to an appeal to the house—

I do not recall the exact words I used, but I have no reason to doubt that what I said was that I appealed the chairman's ruling to the house. I would point out to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance that that is in the nature of an appeal to a higher court. I can imagine that in his practice as a lawyer he has had occasion to appeal cases to a higher court. For all I know he may have gone right to the Supreme Court of Canada in his practice as a lawyer. I do not think he would be satisfied if he took a case to the supreme court and all the supreme court did was vote among the nine justices on the appeal without hearing argument or considering the merits of the case.

Mr. Dickey: That is the best argument you have ever made.

Mr. Knowles: I hear support from my hon. friend from Halifax. That is support indeed. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, whether or not we have been following this practice in recent years, that the ancient practice to which the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre has referred is more in keeping with the importance of an issue such as this, more in keeping with the fact that we are appealing to a higher court. I think some really serious attention should be given to the request of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre that you consider examining the report that has been made to you.

In connection with this matter—and I have in mind the statement that Your Honour made on this matter a few days ago—may I point out that so far as our standing orders are concerned, which are, after all, basic to our practices, there is nothing in the standing orders themselves which says that you must merely put the question to the members of the house for a vote. The standing order which the Minister of Finance has read says that the matter is subject to an appeal to the house and I submit, now that we are in the house and Your Honour as a member of the house is in the chair, that it is up to the house to decide how it shall deal with this appeal. You now have a least two members of the house feeling that the way the house should deal with it is, first of all, by hearing from Your Honour as to your views on the report that has been placed in your hands.

Mr. Speaker: I have listened very carefully to the points that have been made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, the Minister of Finance and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I am inclined to agree with everything they have said except their conclusions.

Mr. Fulton: All of it?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre has gone deeply into the history of some of these precedents and I think he deserves credit for the work he has done. No doubt he will agree with me, because I have had occasion to go through the same paces myself, that except for the precedent he put his finger on in 1899 he did not find a single other precedent. I must correct myself immediately. I think he will find one that occurred shortly after the position of Deputy Speaker was created in 1885. I believe that shortly thereafter, perhaps a couple of years after the position had been created, a Speaker instead of putting the report to the house did review the ruling of the chairman, but that is the only time.

The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre made the case, and did so very well, that if the committee desire at any stage of their proceedings to have the opinion of the Speaker they move that the chairman report progress for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the Speaker on certain matters. That is not the case which is before me at the moment. I have verified that that is so by calling one of the clerks to the chair. I said: "Was there a request from the committee that my opinion be sought on this matter? Was there a motion that the chairman rise and report progress in order to ask my opinion?" He assured me that such was not the case. In any event, the report I have before me—and while I was behind the curtains I heard the chairman read it—does not contain anything to that effect.

The hon. member has indicated that the position is outlined in Bourinot at pages 395 and 396. Bourinot also outlines the procedure, and he does say you must move that the chairman report progress for that purpose. But the chairman has not been moved out of the chair for the purpose of obtaining my opinion. This procedure about moving the chairman out of the chair for this purpose was confirmed precisely by the hon. member when he read what the Deputy Speaker said in 1899. As found in columns 4553 and 4554 of Hansard of June 7, 1899, the Deputy Speaker said:

> With the permission of the house, before we proceed with the consideration of this bill, I would like to make a full statement, in view of what occurred last night.
> With the view of preventing any such misunderstanding with respect to the procedure on the questions that arose during yesterday's sittings in committee of the whole, and on the appeal to the house from the decision of the chairman of the committee, I may state that I have referred to the authorities on such subjects, and find the following rules laid down authoritatively:
> "1. If the committee wishes assistance or information on a point of procedure on which they are in doubt, or on which the chairman has not expressed or does not wish to express an opinion, they may ask the advice of the Speaker. But, as a rule of practice, the chairman alone is responsible for the business of the committee, and no appeal can be made from his decision on a point of procedure except to the house. . . .
> 2. In the former case, when the committee refers to the Speaker for advice, progress is reported on motion duly made, and when the Speaker has given his advice, the committee resumes in accordance with the regular practice of the house. . . .
> 3. In case of an appeal to the house,—

I submit this is the stage at which we are now.

> —there is no such motion made, but the chairman leaves the chair immediately, and refers the point in dispute to the Speaker, so that the house may decide thereon. . . ."

Then a fourth rule is set out but it has no bearing on the case before us at the moment. The two instances referred to in May by the hon. member, at pages 515 and 516, had to do with the case where amendments moved in committee of the whole destroyed the bill, changed the bill or altered the bill to such an extent that the future stages of the bill were likely to be affected. What was being dealt with there in those two cases was the cumulative effect of amendments in committee on the future stages of a bill. If the hon. member looks at page 515 of May, fifteenth edition, he will see that the heading there is, "Functions of a committee on a bill." Then it is set out that the committee is bound by the decision of the house given on second reading, and so on. It then says that the objects of a bill are stated in its long title, and then makes the third point that an amendment which is outside the scope of the bill is out of order and cannot be entertained.

Then May deals with such alterations in the bill as endanger the future stages of the bill, and says that in those cases it has been decided that the procedure to be followed is for the chairman to report progress and ask the opinion of the Speaker on the matter. But at this moment—

Mr. Fulton: Since it is now after six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that you reserve your ruling until eight o'clock?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Fulton: After six o'clock you cannot conduct any further business.

Mr. Sinclair: You cannot interrupt the Speaker when he is on his feet. Rule 1.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: I have no objection whatever to considering the matter between now and eight o'clock, but I want to tell the hon. member that I have listened to a case very well presented by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, that I have listened to the Minister of Finance and to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that I looked and nobody else rose, whereupon I rose. I am now making my ruling, and at eight o'clock I shall conclude it.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson), that this house do now adjourn.

Winters—149.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis). Had I voted I would have voted against the motion.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost. In connection with the subject matter that was raised before six o'clock and on which I had commenced to give a ruling, I did indicate that the theory referred to by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre had to do with the eventuality that when in committee of the whole the members wished, with the concurrence of the chairman of the committee, that a matter relating to procedure be referred to the Speaker. In order to obtain such a reference a motion must be made and if carried the matter is referred to the Speaker.

In cases where the chairman himself has doubts and does not wish to make a decision he may ask the committee to refer the matter to the Speaker, and upon someone making a motion to the effect that he leave the chair for that purpose, he makes a report in which he includes the subject matter on which he wants to have the decision of the Speaker.

The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre in speaking about authority—in that instance Bourinot—quoted from Bourinot's fourth edition which was published in 1916. He did say that in a footnote Bourinot stated since 1885 there had been several instances. By "several instances" I do not think he meant any more than four or five.

In 1885, as recorded in columns 1509 and 1510 of Hansard, there was an instance of an appeal from a decision made by the chairman of the committee of the whole where this matter of appeal, as to whether it is to the house or to the Speaker, was debated, and Mr. Blake indicated as follows:

That reference is not to this appeal. This appeal is one to the house, not to the Speaker. I know it is competent to move that the committee rise with a view of obtaining the opinion of the highest authority on a point of order. It is in the discretion of the Speaker to give an opinion or not. I remember an instance in which a committee rose with a view to obtaining the opinion of the Speaker, but the Speaker declined to give an opinion, and the house went back into committee.

Later on in the debate Mr. Blake again said:

I maintain there is no right on the part of any member of this committee to propose an appeal to the Speaker; there is no appeal to the Speaker under our rules. The appeal is to the house, just as the appeal from the Speaker's decision is to the house. But when the committee desires, as it may well desire to get the opinion of the Speaker upon any point, it has been ruled, and it is competent to the committee to pass a motion in order that the chairman may report that fact to the Speaker, therefore, our appeal under the rule is not to the gentleman who occupies the chair at all; it is to the House of Commons, just as the appeal from the Speaker himself is to the House of Commons, you occupy in that regard no inferior position to the Speaker himself. You are not a subordinate officer whose decision is subject to appeal at all.

He was referring, of course, to the chairman.

Your appeal is subject to the same appeal as that of the Speaker himself. But there is a practice, not of an appeal to the Speaker, but of a case in which the committee finding that they wished to report, or that the chairman has a doubt in his mind, and that it was desirable to get the opinion of the highest authority, then the committee report progress in order that the Speaker may deliver his decision.

Following 1885 there was an instance in 1903 and another in 1908. These two instances appear in the Journals; page 467 for August 3, 1903 and page 433 for May 8, 1908.

In 1911 the chairman made a ruling and Mr. Pugsley then appealed to the Speaker from his ruling. I quote now from Hansard, volume II, 1911-12, dated February 22, in column 3616. Mr. Speaker resumed the chair and said:

Mr. Speaker: The question before the house is, shall the ruling of the Chair be sustained?

Mr. Pugsley: I would like to explain to Your Honour—

Mr. Speaker: It is not open to debate. Those in favour of sustaining the ruling of the chair will please say "Aye".

Those opposed will please say "No".

I declare the ruling of the Chair is sustained.

Mr. Pugsley: Before you leave the chair would you allow me to say that there has been no appeal made to the house, but an appeal to Your Honour under the rules.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The appeal is to the house, not to the Chair.

Mr. Pugsley: I made no appeal to the house. Before you leave the chair—

Mr. Speaker: I cannot permit discussion, because the rules strictly forbid it.

I think I have quoted enough to indicate that although there is merit in the point advanced by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, the point he raises is one of academic interest.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Speaker: I say it is one of academic interest, but at this moment the report I have is that a ruling made by the chairman of the committee has been appealed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Therefore I come back to citation 428 of Beauchesne's third edition, and I repeat it:

From the chairman's decision no appeal should be made to the Speaker.

In the case of an appeal to the house, it is the duty of the chairman to leave the chair immediately and report in writing the point of order which he has decided. The Speaker must then submit the matter to the determination of the house in the language reported to him and put the question. "That the decision of the chairman be confirmed". No discussion is allowed on the appeal.

That is the situation as I see it, and now that the report has been placed before the house I suppose I will have to ask shall the chairman's report—

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, may I just ask if you are ruling on the point of order I raised?

Some hon. Members: Order.

An hon. Member: Read Hansard.

Mr. Churchill: I consider it a matter of very practical importance.

Mr. Speaker: Of course the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre rose to submit a subject to the Chair and at the time he did that he said, "May I rise on a point of order?" or "Will you listen to a point of order?" or something to that effect.

I could not conceive at that time what point of order could be raised on a report submitted to the house by the chairman of the committee on an appeal. The appeal under our rules is provided as an absolute right. In committee of the whole when the chairman makes a ruling hon. members have an absolute right to appeal to the house, and it is in the exercise of that right that I am called upon to perform this function of submitting the report of the committee to the house.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, would you please give me an opportunity to ask for an explanation? When we rose at six o'clock I understood you to say that you would give your ruling on the point of order which I had raised when we resumed at eight o'clock. I think that is what we were expecting and I think that is what should be given to the house on this occasion, a definite ruling on the point of order which I raised.

Mr. Speaker: I do not know what the hon. member thinks I have been saying since the previous vote was taken. I did give my ruling, and I did say that I had reverted to the position which was the only one for me to take and which is founded on citation 428 of Beauchesne's third edition, which reads:

From the chairman's decision no appeal should be made to the Speaker. In case of an appeal to the house, it is the duty of the chairman to leave the chair immediately and report in writing the point of order which he has decided.

That has been done.

The Speaker must then submit the matter to the determination of the house in the language reported to him and put the question.

So in the execution of that "must" I understand it to be my duty at the moment to put the question: Shall the chairman's ruling be sustained? Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Fulton: On a point of order.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Those who are opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: No. no.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, are you asking for the yeas and nays on your ruling on my point of order?

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. gentleman be kind enough to resume his seat. If he has any remarks to make I shall be glad to resume my seat and listen to him.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I raised a point of order which I think is fundamental to the procedure in this house with regard to appealing from the committee of the whole to the house. I suggested to you that the practice of the house in the past followed two courses, first counsel or advice by the Speaker as to the ruling made in the committee of the whole house and, second, the vote or putting the question to the house with regard to the chairman's ruling.

Mr. Speaker: I have listened to the hon. member's point most reverently and I think I have answered it. I think I understand the point.

Mr. Churchill: I am appealing from your ruling on that point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has said so, and I understood that was what he intended to do. What he does not understand is that in my view there is no appeal at this moment. I do not want this to be taken as a precedent in the future, but it is my considered opinion that on the matter raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre at this stage there is no appeal. That is my opinion. I have thought this over most carefully during the dinner recess that there should not be any appeal at this moment when it is my duty to take the report of the chairman of the committee and submit it to the house.

An hon. Member: Do that.

Mr. Speaker: However, I am sure we will advance much better if I allow the appeal, but I repeat that I do not want this to be taken as a precedent. The hon. member is appealing the ruling I have made?

Mr. Churchill: I appeal your ruling.

Mr. Speaker: Those who are in favour of sustaining the Speaker's ruling will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those who are opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows:

The question is on the following matter. Upon the receiving of a report from the chairman of the committee of the whole on Bill No. 298, Mr. Churchill raised a point of order to the effect that the decision of the chairman should be subject to review by the Speaker.

I ruled that in accordance with standing order 59 (4) the appeal contained in the report received from the chairman was not to the Speaker but to the house. Whereupon Mr. Churchill appealed from the ruling of the Chair.

The house divided on the question: Shall the Speaker's decision be sustained? And the decision of the Chair was sustained on the following division:

PRIVILEGE

MR. CAMERON (NANAIMO)—REFERENCE TO LETTERS IN OTTAWA "JOURNAL" OF MAY 30 AND 31

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. You will recall, sir, that some time ago I brought to your attention an attack upon Your Honour which appeared in a Montreal paper. You made an appeal at that time for some action to be taken on the matter. Since no action has been taken, it appears to have encouraged others to commit the same offence. I should like to call your attention to a letter which appears in the Ottawa Journal of Wednesday, May 30, of this year, which is headed, I presume by the editor of the paper, "They Will Pay". It reads as follows:

Sirs:

On May 15 Canada was sold "down the river" and democracy went with her, perhaps forever. This colossus of a government however, does not fear any adverse fate because it knows, as past elections have proved, that Canadians are incapable of moral indignation.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I ask the hon. member whether it is his intention to make a complaint against the newspaper?

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I am calling it to your attention and to the attention of the house for some action in the matter.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member himself going to take any action in this matter?

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I am taking action now, sir.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member wishes to take action in the matter he will be good enough to proceed, but he is not going to raise the matter as a question of privilege merely to delay the proceedings.

Mr. Nowlan: Perish the thought!

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I presume some kind of action must be placed on the order paper with regard—

Mr. Speaker: No. If the hon. member complains about a newspaper, the procedure is to send the newspaper to the Clerk so he can read it and it will be inserted in the Votes and Proceedings, and he must conclude with a motion that the content of the article is of a malicious intent, in contempt of parliament and a breach of privilege and therefore deserves the censure of this house.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): My proper order is to send this to the Clerk of the house now, is it?

Mr. Speaker: Provided that the hon. member wishes to go through with the motion I have indicated.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I have called this to the attention of Your Honour and—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member must understand that if he wishes to make a complaint against a newspaper he must, on a question of privilege, do it in the proper manner, and that is not to stand up only and call it to my attention, but to send the paper to the Clerk who will stand up and read the paragraph complained of, which will be inserted in the Votes and Proceedings; and the hon. member must conclude his question with a motion stating that the article complained of is in breach of privilege and deserves the censure of this house.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Yes, I will do that. Do I sent this to the Clerk now, Your Honour? Do I read it first?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member was going to indicate what is the paragraph he is complaining of.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): It is the whole letter.

On May 15 Canada was sold "down the river" and democracy went with her, perhaps forever.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I continue:

This colossus of a government, however, does not fear any adverse fate because it knows, as past elections have proved, that Canadians are incapable of moral indignation.

There is no scandal big enough to shock the Canadian people. Shackled by an inertia sedulously cultivated by a wartime government, transfixed by their T.V., captivated by their comics, eager only for their monthly baby bonus (soothing syrup divine), they are completely indifferent to the political scene and the methods employed by their rulers.

It means nothing to them that debate in the house has long been a farce, with the cat-calls and jeers of the Liberals, and the systematic garroting of the opposition by Mr. Speaker, making a mockery of this democracy for which so many of their fathers have died. They cannot see that for this they will pay, and in coinage even more bitter than that just minted on parliament hill.

Marjorie Le Lacheur,
Marlborough Avenue,
Ottawa, May 27, 1956.

Then, sir, I have another instance of the same offence which appears in the issue of the Ottawa Journal of today, in a letter signed by Eugene Forsey, 3 Lakeview Terrace, Ottawa, dated May 28, 1956:

Sirs:—Amid the many extraordinary features of the recent proceedings on the pipe-line bill not the least extraordinary is one that seems to have passed almost unnoticed—the strange conception of the purpose of the rules of the house, and the functions of the Speaker, suggested by two rhetorical questions asked by the present Speaker.

The first question was on May 14. Mr. Knowles was pointing out that in 1927 Mr. Dunning had used a certain procedure which required the unanimous consent of the house. The Speaker interrupted him: "Would the hon. member be good enough to say what the minister could have done if the answer to his request for unanimous consent had been 'no'?" (Hansard, p. 3849)

Mr. Knowles replied by asking "whether that is a good question". This is a classic of understatement. It was a fantastically irrelevant and improper question. What the minister could have done if the rules of the house prevented him from taking the step he wanted to take is the minister's problem, not the Speaker's. It is, or should be, wholly outside the range of that officer's consideration.

The second question came on May 23. Mr. Fulton had moved a motion to give certain instructions to the committee of the whole. The Speaker ruled that such a motion could properly be moved at this particular point, but that Mr. Fulton's motion was out of order for other reasons. Mr. Knowles then moved a second motion of the same kind. The Speaker admitted his right to do so. But he asked, rather plaintively (p. 4260), "How long am I going to act as if the Minister of Trade and Commerce should not have his motion put forward from the chair and therefore should not be recognized at all, so as to give how many hon. members the chance to move many intervening motions in the meantime?"

The answer is, of course, "Forever, if the motions are in order; not one minute if they are not". What other answer can there be? The rules are there. It is the Speaker's duty to enforce them and let the chips fall where they may. If this prevents the government from doing what it wants to do, it is just too bad for the government, but it is or should be a matter of complete indifference to the Speaker. If the rules are defective then the house can change them. Till it does the Speaker must enforce them as they are. He has no choice, unless he is to be recreant to his duty and his trust. As Mr. Knowles put it (p. 4260), "If one motion of instruction is in order at this particular time, inconvenient though it may be to my hon. friends opposite, literally any number of such motions may be made provided they meet the conditions that you yourself have laid down".

The Speaker seems to have been genuinely surprised by this. "Am I", he asked, "going to delay the proposal of the motion of the Minister of Trade and Commerce if there are four, five, six or seven motions for instructions?" (p. 4261). The answer is, "Yes; certainly; if they are in order, four, five, six, seven, 50; if they are not in order, none". It is as simple as that.

House of Commons

On both occasions the Speaker's words seem to imply that if the rules get seriously in the way of doing something the government very much wants done, no reasonable person can expect the government to follow them, or the Speaker to enforce them, at any rate after a certain point.

What would anyone think of a hockey referee who asked, "How long am I to allow the visiting team to score goals? How many goals must I allow them to try for before I let the home team have a chance?"

Not in such a spirit did Speaker White interpret his duty in 1896, when the Liberals blocked the remedial bill, nor Mr. Speaker Marcil in 1911, when the Conservatives blocked the reciprocity agreement, nor Mr. Speaker Sproule in 1912-13, when the Liberals blocked the naval bill for four months, till the house itself changed the rules and provided for closure.

Giving notice of closure at the very outset of a debate, before a single member except the mover had uttered a syllable, whether of support or criticism, is a shameless prostitution of the closure rule for purposes for which it was never intended (and has never before been used), an unparalleled violation of parliamentary rights, an unexampled assault upon the very citadel of free institutions. But at least it is within the letter of the rules. At least the rules themselves remain, for the protection of such vestiges of free discussion as still survive. But if the rules themselves are to be interpreted to allow only such procedure, or so many motions, as the government sees fit to put up with, then we shall indeed have said farewell, a long farewell to parliamentary government.

Eugene Forsey.

3 Lakeview Terrace,
Ottawa, May 28, 1956.

Mr. Speaker, I move that these statements in the newspaper are derogatory of the dignity of parliament and deserving of the censure of this house.

Mr. Martin: Oh, Eugene won't like that, M.J.

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member be kind enough to permit the Clerk to read the articles complained of?

Some hon. Members: Dispense.

Mr. Speaker: Order. While the Clerk reads the two articles complained of, would the hon. member for Nanaimo be kind enough to put his motion in writing and send it to the Chair and also indicate who is his seconder?

The Clerk: (Reading:)

About Closure, the Speaker, and Rights of Parliament

A Letter to the Editors of the Journal

Sirs:—Amid the many extraordinary features of the recent proceedings on the pipe-line bill not the least extraordinary is one that seems to have passed almost unnoticed—the strange conception of the purpose of the rules of the house, and the functions of the Speaker, suggested by two rhetorical questions asked by the present Speaker.

The answer is, of course, "Forever, if the motions are in order; not one minute if they are not". What other answer can there be? The rules are there. It is the Speaker's duty to enforce them, let the chips fall where they may. If this prevents the government from doing what it wants to do, it is just too bad for the government, but it is or should be a matter of complete indifference to the Speaker. If the rules are defective then the house can change them. Till it does the Speaker must enforce them as they are. He has no choice, unless he is to be recreant to his duty and his trust. As Mr. Knowles put it (p. 4260), "If one motion of instruction is in order at this particular time, inconvenient though it may be to my hon. friends opposite, literally any number of such motions may be made provided they meet the conditions that you yourself have laid down."

The Speaker seems to have been genuinely surprised by this. "Am I", he asked, "going to delay the proposal of the motion of the Minister of Trade and Commerce if there are four, five, six or seven motions for instructions?" (p. 4261). The answer is, "Yes; certainly; if they are in order, four, five, six, seven, 50; if they are not in order, none." It is as simple as that.

On both occasions the Speaker's words seem to imply that if the rules get seriously in the way of doing something the government very much wants done, no reasonable person can expect the government to follow them, or the Speaker to enforce them at any rate after a certain point.

What would anyone think of a hockey referee who asked, "How long am I to allow the visiting team to score goals? How many goals must I allow them to try for before I let the home team have a chance?"

Not in such a spirit did Mr. Speaker White interpret his duty in 1896, when the Liberals blocked the remedial bill, nor Mr. Speaker Marcil in 1911, when the Conservatives blocked the reciprocity agreement, nor Mr. Speaker Sproule in 1912-13, when the Liberals blocked the naval bill for four months, till the house itself changed the rules and provided for closure.

Giving notice of closure at the very outset of a debate, before a single member except the mover had uttered a syllable, whether of support or criticism, is a shameless prostitution of the closure rule for purposes for which it was never intended

(and has never before been used), an unparalleled violation of parliamentary rights, an unexampled assault upon the very citadel of free institutions. But at least it is within the letter of the rules. At least the rules themselves remain, for the protection of such vestiges of free discussion as still survive. But if the rules themselves are to be interpreted to allow only such procedure, or so many motions, as the government sees fit to put up with, then we shall indeed have said farewell, a long farewell, to parliamentary government.

Eugene Forsey,

Ottawa, May 28, 1956.

They Will Pay

Sirs:—On May 15 Canada was sold "down the river" and democracy went with her, perhaps forever. This colossus of a government, however, does not fear any adverse fate because it knows, as past elections have proved, that Canadians are incapable of moral indignation.

There is no scandal big enough to shock the Canadian people. Shackled by an inertia sedulously cultivated by a wartime government, transfixed by their T.V., captivated by their comics, eager only for their monthly baby bonus (soothing syrup divine), they are completely indifferent to the political scene and the methods employed by their rulers.

It means nothing to them that debate in the house has long been a farce, with the cat-calls and jeers of the Liberals, and the systematic garroting of the opposition by Mr. Speaker, making a mockery of this democracy for which so many of their fathers have died. They cannot see that for this they will pay, and in coinage even more bitter than that just minted on parliament hill.

Marjorie Le Lacheur,
Marlborough Avenue,
Ottawa, May 27, 1956.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo), seconded by Mr. Ellis, has moved that the statements in the Ottawa Journal of May 30 and 31, as just read by the Clerk, are derogatory of the dignity of parliament and deserve the censure of this house.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this is a debatable motion. The letters which have been brought to your attention do raise serious issues, which issues it seems appropriate, by whatever means they are brought forward, should be under the consideration of the house. On the other hand, I think hon. members should examine these letters most carefully because in their examination I think they will find the extent to which the proceedings of this house have in large measure justified criticism of the nature of that put on the record here tonight.

Your Honour, as well as every member, must be concerned about the references to the conduct of proceedings in this house, but I submit that the statements in the last letter read, strong though they are, do not exceed the reality of what has taken place in this house. When the letter speaks of the shameless prostitution of the proceedings of the house I think those are appropriate words. They are particularly appropriate words in relation to what has taken place in this house today.

I think in considering the effect of these letters, that consideration should be given to the extent to which justification has been furnished by what did occur. It is very noticeable that hon. members opposite have not been extremely happy in their acceptance of the application of some of the rules which have been properly applied this evening in this house.

An hon. Member: Speak for yourself.

An hon. Member: Perfectly satisfied.

Mr. Drew: Do I gather that some members opposite do not think the rules were properly applied?

An hon. Member: Nobody said that.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do raise a point of order now that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) has made that inquiry. As I recall the situation, a short while ago Your Honour ruled that you must put the question which was submitted to you from the committee of the whole. From that ruling there was an appeal to the house and the house upheld your decision. That being the case I suggest to Your Honour that no intervening proceeding can occur, because you had in effect said that the interpretation of the rule was that you must then put the motion. If that is so then I suggest that nothing can happen until—

Mr. Rowe: You have thrown the rules away.

Mr. Speaker: The matter raised by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Cameron) is one of privilege and is one that is very serious. I had not seen the letter entitled "They Will Pay" but I had read the letter written by Mr. Eugene Forsey, in which he discusses instances in which I was myself involved. It would seem to me, however, that in a matter of this kind the thing to do, after having placed ourselves in a position where we can deal with the matter, especially since I am concerned, is to postpone the consideration of that motion.

Normally when a member brings to the attention of the house an article which concerns privilege and in which someone in the house is involved, after he has made his motion it is up to the other member involved to be heard. If hon. members care to debate this matter before I myself am heard on the subject, I am not going to object; I am just going to let them go right ahead, but at one stage of the proceedings I want to say that I will have to be heard.

Mr. Dickey: Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of this debate.

Some hon. Members: You cannot do it. You have not the floor.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Halifax cannot make this motion because he is not in possession of the floor at the moment.

Mr. Rowe: He will have difficulty in keeping possession of his seat.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, in considering what has been placed before the house it would be well to examine carefuly exactly what has been said. It has been read to us first of all by the hon. member who brought it forward and then by the Clerk of the house, but I say that amongst the other things that are said here there are statements which I think very properly describe the situation in this house. In examining this and considering what should be done, I think hon. members should regard the actual wording and consider how closely and how accurately they interpret the situation here. This letter says there has been, and I quote the words:

> . . . an unparalleled violation of parliamentary rights, an unexampled assault upon the very citadel of free institutions.

I subscribe to that statement without any hesitation. Certainly in examining this letter I hope no one will suggest that those words do not accurately describe what has taken place earlier and particularly what took place today.

Some hon. Members: Oh; from the opposition!

Mr. Drew: I hear hon. members opposite shouting "Shame."

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Drew: These are the hon. members who have supported the deliberate attempt to destroy the rights of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Oh! Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: Yes, there has been a carefully planned—

Some hon. Members: By you.

Mr. Drew: —and deliberate attempt to destroy—

Some hon. Members: By you.

Mr. Drew: —the citadel of our free institutions. I hear hon. members saying "by you." I would point out to the hon. members that under rule 32 they are all free to debate this motion and make their comments, and I hope that each one of them will get up and try to show some justifiable grounds for the declaration—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I intervene at this moment to indicate to the Leader of the Opposition that in debating this matter one cannot go beyond what is considered privilege. In this article which I have just read it is my view that what may be called privilege in the letter written by Mrs. Marjorie Le Lacheur is the last paragraph:

> It means nothing to them that debate in the house has long been a farce, with the cat-calls and jeers of the Liberals, and the systematic garroting of the opposition by Mr. Speaker, . . .

These are the words:

> . . . and the systematic garroting of the opposition by Mr. Speaker, making a mockery of this democracy for which so many of their fathers have died.

The words that are privilege are "the systematic garroting of the opposition by Mr. Speaker." All the other words are not privilege.

Mr. Coldwell: May I ask a question on a point of order? Is that correct? Is that not more or less an attack on the house, and therefore are not hon. members entitled to discuss not only the matter of privilege regarding yourself, Your Honour, but also the privileges of the members of the house? Surely some of them may be considered by members of the house to be not only an attack on the Speaker but an attack on the privileges of members of the house, and therefore—

Mr. Speaker: I am under the impression—and I am sure the hon. member upon reflection will agree with me—that, freedom of the press being what it is, freedom of expression outside this parliament and the right of criticizing whatever takes place here being what it is, no one on a question of privilege should object to the first two paragraphs and, even in the third paragraph, no one should object to anything if there were not those few words, in which the Speaker is accused of a systematic garroting of the opposition. As far as the other paragraphs are concerned, I see no privilege at all in them.

As regards the article by Mr. Eugene Forsey, in which he writes under the title "About Closure, the Speaker, and Rights of Parliament", there may be more paragraphs there which are incriminatory, but certainly not the whole of the article. This is a matter on which perhaps I might give a ruling on a future occasion, but at this moment I would ask hon. members to consider that there is a very serious matter before this house, perhaps much more serious than one foresees at this moment in the midst of other proceedings. I repeat the suggestion I made earlier, that this matter for the moment be adjourned.

Mr. Drew: No, Mr. Speaker; with deference, I do not believe this should be adjourned. This matter has been brought before the house, the motion that has been presented is debatable, and I think this is the proper time to discuss the material that has been brought forward. There is, after all, nothing in the rules to indicate that such a discussion of a motion of this kind should be adjourned. I was referring to certain words in the letter that has been referred to, and I feel that, with respect to any decision that may be made, it is proper that hon. members should make some comments about this.

The letters have been placed before you, and certainly it must be a matter of concern to the members to form their own judgment as to the accuracy or otherwise of the statements that are made. Otherwise they could not properly pass judgment upon what has been said here. I had quoted a certain part in regard to the assault upon the very citadel of free institutions. The letter went on to say:

> But at least it is within the letter of the rules. At least the rules themselves remain, for the protection of such vestiges of free discussion as still survive.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have seen here tonight certain arguments being put forward.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the Leader of the Opposition be good enough to take into account the remark I made a moment ago, namely that remarks should be addressed only to the paragraphs which in my view are considered privileged. He cannot discuss the proceedings of today. He must address himself to the paragraphs in the documents that have been submitted that have been complained of and are considered privileged. We are not interested in any other matters.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I would point out that it is not only Your Honour who is concerned with what is said in these letters. It is every member of this house; and the conduct of this house is quite as important as the status of any individual or anything that may be said about the performance by any individual of his duties in this house, whatever those duties may be. I am not inclined to think that once matters of this kind have been placed before the house it can be said that only those things that refer to Your Honour are subjects which should be of concern to hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I say only those matters which relate to privilege, and who decides what is privilege and what is not?

Mr. Drew: Then, Mr. Speaker, I am of course dealing with the last letter that was referred to, which is published in tonight's Ottawa Journal, and I would refer to the comments that are made there with regard to a motion presented by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). It speaks of the fact that this motion was presented. Then the letter goes on to say:

> The Speaker admitted his right to do so. But he asked, rather plaintively (p. 4260), "How long am I going to act as if the Minister of Trade and Commerce should not have his motion put forward from the chair and therefore should not be recognized at all, so as to give how many hon. members the chance to move many intervening motions in the meantime?"
> The answer is, of course, "Forever, if the motions are in order; not one minute if they are not." What other answer can there be? The rules are there. It is the Speaker's duty to enforce them, let the chips fall where they may. If this prevents the government from doing what it wants to do, it is just too bad for the government, but it is or should be a matter of complete indifference to the Speaker. If the rules are defective then the house can change them. Till it does the Speaker must enforce them as they are. He has no choice, unless he is to be recreant to his duty and his trust.

These statements, Mr. Speaker, refer as a matter of privilege to the position of Your Honour, and I should think they accurately state the position as it affects Your Honour. There can be no question about the right of any hon. member to use the rights that are available to him under the rules. In this particular case a question had been raised whether motions should be permitted, and there was some difference of opinion whether further motions could be presented. I submit that in this case what has been discussed here is a perfectly proper discussion of procedure in this house.

I think it is highly desirable that the position of Your Honour and the position of the other officials should be respected and should be positions of honour and trust. I submit, however, that it is neither improper nor an offence to this house for any member of this house to discuss the proceedings in the house in the way in which they have been discussed here, and I think what has been said can well be repeated.

> If the rules are defective then the house can change them. Till it does the Speaker must enforce them as they are. He has no choice, unless he is to be recreant to his duty and his trust.

In view of those words, which I believe correctly set forth the situation, I must admit that I do not see how it would be reasonable for the hon. members of this house to condemn a letter such as the one to which I am referring, no matter what may be the purpose of any hon. member who brings forward a motion of this kind. I must say that I think the letter written to the Journal by Mr. Eugene Forsey and published in tonight's edition is an excellent letter summing up this situation as well as it has been summed up.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Habel: A foe becomes a friend.

Mr. Drew: I am sorry, I did not hear what the hon. member said.

Mr. Habel: A foe becomes a friend.

Mr. Drew: There must be some cloud in the sound. I cannot hear well.

Mr. Habel: You have mentioned a name and asked a question.

Mr. Drew: I am anxious to hear what the hon. member said.

Mr. Habel: You have mentioned the name of Mr. Forsey. I say that a former foe becomes a friend of yours.

Mr. Drew: Oh.

Mr. Rowe: We have a lot of your friends coming to us now. You are losing them every day.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I have never hesitated to express my admiration for anything that has been done by those who may be opposed to me politically when I have believed they were worthy of commendation. Mr. Eugene Forsey was an opponent of mine in a by-election in Carleton, but that does not prevent me from expressing my approval of what he has said in the letter published in tonight's Journal and saying that I heartily concur in the general comments in that letter.

As it is now ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Drew the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: We shall continue with the pipe-line debate tomorrow, sir.

Answer by: Mr. Langlois, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Transport:

Questions

1. All civil aircraft operating in Canada are required to have certificates of airworthiness.

2 and 3. Carriers are understood to have used many different types of planes at different times on the D.E.W. line and these planes are not directly identifiable as D.E.W. line aircraft. It is understood, however, that the following types have been used:—Avro Anson V, Avro York, Bristol 170 Mk.31, Cessna 180, Cessna 195, Consolidated PBY, Curtiss C46, Douglas DC3, Douglas DC4, deHavilland DHC2 (Beaver), Noorduyn Norseman UC64A. Ages would vary from new aircraft to aircraft up to 15 years.

4. The empty and all-up weights of the foregoing types are as follows:

	Weight light	All-up
Anson V	7,059	9,460
Avro York	39,883	68,000	(Take-off)
		65,000	(Landing)
Bristol 170 Mk. 31	28,935	44,000
Cessna 180	1,548	2,550	(Landplane)
Cessna 195	2,292	3,350
Consolidated PBY	20,456	30,400	(Take-off)
		28,000	(Landing)
Curtiss C46	30,051	45,300	(Passenger)
		48,000	(Cargo)
Douglas DC3	19,647	26,200	(Take-off)
		26,000	(Landing)
Douglas DC4	48,115	80,200	(Take-off)
		70,000	(Landing)
DHC2 (Beaver)	3,092 (Land)	5,100
	3,380 (Seaplane)	5,090
	3,319 (Skiplane)	5,100
Noorduyn Norseman UC64A	4,765	7,400	(Landplane)

A small variation exists between the weights of individual aircraft and a further variation in the maximum permissible weight according to the engineering specification and the operational factors.

5. The Department of Transport holds the operator of the aircraft, including the pilot in command, responsible for proper loading procedures in accordance with the certificate of airworthiness, and for appropriate supervision.

2. What percentage of the permanent staff of the said branch consists of retired military personnel?

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, June 1, 1956

The house met at eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MR. SPEAKER—RULING ON MOTION OF HON. MEMBER FOR NANAIMO

On the order:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo), that the statements in the Ottawa Journal of May 30 and May 31 are derogatory of the dignity of parliament and deserving of the censure of this house.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: Usually the deputy clerk reads the order, but I rise at this moment in order to deal with this order which appears under "Motions" as follows:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo), that the statements in the Ottawa Journal of May 30 and 31 are derogatory of the dignity of parliament and deserving of the censure of this house.

I have read carefully the articles complained of and I have come to the conclusion that because of the unprecedented circumstances surrounding this pipe-line debate and because of the remarks that were made in this house by members themselves, it was and it is impossible, if we are to consider freedom of the press as we should, to take these two articles as being breaches of our privileges. It is my opinion that if it had not been for some of the insinuations or attacks directed perhaps to one another or the Chair or to the occupants of the chair, these articles may not have been written. I think we should settle our problems among ourselves and that those who outside of this house, either in editorial comment or by letters to the editor, write what I consider to be—and this is the case of these two articles—comments which do not go beyond the bounds of unfairness, I think they should be allowed. Therefore, I rule the motion made by the hon. member for Nanaimo out of order. Do hon. members wish to appeal?

Mr. Drew: Are you prepared to hear any discussion on that, because—

Mr. Speaker: No.

Mr. Drew: —we had proceeded with discussion on this motion.

Mr. Speaker: It is a matter of privilege. Whether it is privilege or not, it is my responsibility to decide. Does the hon. gentleman appeal my ruling?

Mr. Drew: Is it not possible to say something, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Does the hon. gentleman appeal my ruling?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I appeal your ruling but I also suggest that you should accept this motion.

Mr. Speaker: The Leader of the Opposition cannot go beyond appealing my ruling.

An hon. Member: Dictatorship.

Mr. Speaker: Those who are in favour of sustaining the Speaker's ruling will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it; call in the members.

And during the calling in of the members:

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, are you not going to hear a question of privilege?

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, may I draw this to your attention—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, may I respectfully draw this to your attention, that you directed the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Cameron) to make that motion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Coldwell: Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I protest against your ruling.

Mr. Speaker: There cannot be any debate at this moment. The bells are ringing and the members are being called in.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, the rights of parliament are more important than the bells. You drafted this motion, Mr. Speaker. You accepted the motion and the motion is now in the possession of the house and you have no right to hear anything that interferes with the discussion.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, I want to draw your attention—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. McCann: Get back in your seat.

Mr. Ellis: Keep quiet over there.

Mr. Coldwell: —to the statement of Mr. Speaker Lenthall: "I am the servant of the house."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: Dictatorship.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Why don't you throw away the mace?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, may I draw your attention—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, may I draw your attention to your own words last night, reported at page 4532 of Hansard—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why did you change overnight? What is the reason that you changed overnight? Are you afraid today?

Mr. Rowe: What took place in the dark?

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): You are a very good actor; you should be on the stage.

Mr. Rowe: You would probably close the stage.

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows:

On the order under Motions, "Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo), that the statements in the Ottawa Journal of May 30 and 31 are derogatory of the dignity of parliament and deserving of the censure of this house," being called, I ruled that the motion of the hon. member for Nanaimo was out of order since in my opinion the statements in the Ottawa Journal must be construed as fair and reasonable comment on the house and its proceedings.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): "Garrotting parliament." Is that fair?

Mr. Speaker:

Whereupon Mr. Drew appealed to the house from the ruling I gave.

Mr. Bell: No wonder they hang their heads in shame.

The house divided on the question: Shall the Speaker's decision be sustained? And the decision of the Chair was sustained on the following division:

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MOTION THAT THE HOUSE DO NOW ADJOURN

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight):

That the house do now adjourn.

An hon. Member: For obvious reasons.

Mr. Knowles: It should read that the house be dissolved.

An hon. Member: That is making a farce of parliament.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): You made a farce of it.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fleming: Leave the matter to the people.

Mr. Speaker: It is obvious that in this house there are feelings that are perhaps extraordinary. There is perhaps much more than what one would call the ordinary opposition to what may take place. I think there is perhaps on the part of some hon. members what I may term anger.

Mr. Drew: There is.

Business of the House

Mr. Speaker: I want to tell hon. members that I know what my responsibilities are and that I am fully conscious of every step that I am taking.

An hon. Member: I wonder.

Mr. Speaker: I am prepared to take the responsibility before this house and the country for what I do. Hon. members know that it is within my jurisdiction—indeed it is my duty—to make a ruling whenever I consider that I must make one. The right of hon. members is to appeal a ruling. Once the appeal has been made, the house has decided. If hon. members feel that in the performance of my duty my conduct should be criticized they also know, as do I, that before six o'clock tonight they can put on the order paper a notice—48 hours' notice—of a substantive motion which I am sure will be brought up after the 48 hours have expired.

These days are not easy ones. On the one hand hon. members who favour a measure were in committee of the whole yesterday. An appeal has been made with respect to the chairman's ruling. I was called back to the chair merely to put the report of the chairman to the house. What happened? The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) asked me "Will you listen to a point of order?" The point of order was completely outside the matter which was the subject matter of the report and, in addition, that report was itself a matter of order. It was an appeal by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to the house on the chairman's ruling. I was requested not to conclude my ruling at six o'clock but to do it at eight o'clock. As soon as I took the chair at eight o'clock and was about to conclude my ruling there was a motion made to adjourn the house. Then, other proceedings took place and at ten o'clock the house had not yet acted upon the chairman's report of an appeal made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, which is a right provided under our rules. Today we meet; I make a ruling.

Mr. Fleming: Without hearing any argument.

Mr. Speaker: That it should be met with criticism, or even with sincere feelings perhaps of indignation, is the privilege of hon. members. But the ruling on the appeal was submitted to the house. Now, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is moving that the house do now adjourn.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I said earlier that I am prepared to take full responsibility before this house and before the country for what I am doing. I consider—and I have thought very seriously about this—that yesterday around 5.15, when I was called back to the chair for the purpose of receiving the chairman's report, I made a very serious mistake in allowing the point of order and the other dilatory motions; and I feel that the house should not suffer any prejudice or detriment on my account. I want to say this to hon. members—it has been said very often—the rules of this house are devised in order to protect the minorities; yes, they are. But I will add the counterpart to that. I will say—and the authorities support me in this—that the rules of this house are devised to protect minorities against the oppression of the majority and the majority against obstruction by the minority.

Now, the house is master of its own rules and it is my right to submit a matter to the house. I intend at the moment to submit to the house that, in my view, the house should revert to the position where it was yesterday when I was brought back to the chair to receive the chairman's report at 5.15. I submit to the house that the intervening proceedings should not be superseded, and it is up to the house to decide as to the situation which I take at the moment.

Those who are in favour of sustaining the Speaker's ruling will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Drew: I am rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Coldwell: What are you doing, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Fleming: On a point of order—

Mr. Drew: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Drew: —I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe):

That in view of the unprecedented action of Mr. Speaker in improperly reversing his own decision without notice and without giving any opportunity for discussion, this house resolves that it no longer has any confidence in its presiding officer.

Mr. Speaker: The Leader of the Opposition understands, of course, that this is a motion which must go on the order paper and receive 48 hours' notice.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Drew: With consent, this could very properly be discussed now because the motion is now before the house.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Knowles: I rise on a point of order. My point of order is that the question as to whether or not a motion to adjourn the house is in order at any time has been settled by yourself. As you know, I relied on a previous occasion on standing order 2, but—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I know what—

Mr. Knowles: Standing order 25 makes it clear. In addition, you said last Monday that it is always in order—

Mr. Speaker: I know what the hon. member says with respect to this motion is correct. I have indicated to the house I feel that the house should not suffer any prejudice for what I consider to be a serious mistake which I made yesterday. I say that the house is master of its own procedure. No one should contradict that; everybody knows that that is so, and it is my right to submit a matter to the house and that is what I propose to do.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, there is a lot of heat around here and I am absorbing some of it. I will try to speak calmly upon the matter. My point of order is, if you take the position, on your responsibility, that my motion to adjourn the house should not be put, you have to take the responsibility for ruling that motion out of order. Whatever you may feel about any mistakes you made yesterday, the fact is that this is a new day and we are now on the order for motions. We cannot jump from motions to the position in which we found ourselves yesterday at five o'clock, or in the committee of the whole, without first reaching the orders of the day. That could not be done unless some motion were made, and I have no doubt there are those on the other side who would make it at the appropriate time. In the meantime, there is before the house a motion duly made and duly seconded, namely my motion to adjourn the house. Should you in your wisdom and on your own responsibility decide to go back on your own precise statement of last Monday and rule it out of order, that is your privilege, but it is also my privilege to appeal your ruling, if you so rule.

Mr. Speaker: I will say this to the hon. member. I will agree with him that his motion was made before I had indicated my position, and I will allow his appeal and submit it to the house.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Rowe: Can you not let him state his point of order?

Mr. Knowles: Before I make the appeal may I just say this further word? In the statement you made, sir, shortly after I made my motion, you indicated that there might be strong feelings in the house, including some feelings of anger. I am able to hold my temper fairly well, as I think most hon. members will recognize; but I admit that I did get some feeling of anger earlier today when, with citation 216 of Beauchesne, third edition, before me I realized what was happening. Citation 216 of Beauchesne, third edition, reads as—

Mr. Speaker: May I ask the hon. member not to go beyond the matter?

An hon. Member: He is on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Either we have a motion to adjourn before the house or we have not.

Mr. Knowles: We have a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: It has to do with the motion to adjourn.

Some hon. Members: A point of order.

Mr. Speaker: I will accept the motion to adjourn. I have said I will accept the hon. member's motion to adjourn.

Mr. Rowe: You ruled it out of order.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I am finding it difficult to keep up with Your Honour's decisions. First you say, "yes", and then you say "no". Now you are saying, "yes, it is in order".

Mr. Hees: He is saying "maybe".

Mr. Speaker: I indicated that to the hon. member a moment ago; I said it may be that I had not taken the floor to state the position which I intended to put to the house before the hon. member had moved his motion, in which case the hon. member's motion came before I stated my position, and I said that I would accept the motion.

Those who are in favour of the motion to adjourn the house by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those who are opposed to the motion will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Knowles) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I take it from what you said prior to putting the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that you now propose to put to the house the appeal taken from the ruling of the chairman of the committee of the whole yesterday afternoon, because my point of order relates to that proceeding.

Mr. Speaker: I did not intend to do that at the moment; the hon. member is ahead of me.

Mr. Fleming: Perhaps I can stake out a claim.

Mr. Speaker: What I intend to put to the house is that in neglecting—

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: I understand that the hon. member is rising on a question of privilege, but at the moment he did so I was on my feet and in possession of the floor. What I intend to submit to the house is that in neglecting to submit at once to the house yesterday the report of the chairman of the committee on an appeal from his ruling by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) I made a serious mistake and the house should not suffer any prejudice or detriment on my account, and that the house, which is master of its own proceedings, should be placed exactly in the same position as it was when I resumed the chair yesterday to submit the chairman's ruling to the house. It is this action that I submit to the judgment of the house.

Mr. Drew: Why not last Friday?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I submit that at this moment we are not in the proceedings of Thursday, May 31, but in the proceedings of Friday, June 1. We have reached the item on the order paper entitled "Motions" and are still there according to standing order 15. That standing order is quite clear. It reads:

> (2) The ordinary daily routine of business in the house shall be as follows:
> Presenting reports by standing and special committees.
> Motions.
> Introduction of bills.
> First readings of Senate public bills.
> Government notices of motions.

I submit that so long as we are on motions the only thing that can come before the house is something in the form of a motion. Unless there are other ministerial statements which are permissible under motions or unless there are other motions or points of privilege to be raised, Your Honour has to take the house on through introduction of bills—there are none on the order paper—and certainly through first readings of Senate public bills and government notices of motions, which are on the order paper.

I submit that to introduce anything at this point which is not properly under the heading of motions would not be in keeping with the provisions of standing order 15 (2). I submit therefore that if it is Your Honour's desire to deal with the kind of proposition which you read out to us a moment ago, the only possible way it could come before the house would be by virtue of a motion. That is one privilege which is denied to Your Honour; you are not in a position to make a motion.

Mr. Fleming: I submit that under those circumstances notice would be required.

Mr. Speaker: If a motion was made; but I am not submitting a motion because the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has indicated quite rightly that I do not make motions, but whenever a matter of order arises I may decide it subject to appeal or I may submit the matter to the judgment of the house, which is the master of its own procedure and may do whatever it pleases to carry out its wishes. It is at this juncture that I propose not to make a ruling but to submit this position to the judgment of the house. If the house decides in favour of it, then we shall govern ourselves accordingly.

Mr. Knowles: I appeal against your right to do that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, may I put this to you, that the only time at which you could have done that was during the sitting of yesterday. If Your Honour says that you have the right—and I pass no opinion on that point at the moment—to make such a submission to the house, then I submit that the only time you can make that submission is in the sitting during which the situation arises. I submit that you cannot wait for another sitting and then at another stage of the proceedings say, "I now submit to the house that we should go back to where we were at a period in yesterday's sitting", because we are not now at the same stage of proceedings, and because this is another day's sitting. Therefore, if you feel that a submission could be made, first it should have been made at yesterday's sitting; and second, if you wish to make it today I submit that you have to wait until we are at the same stage of the proceedings as we were yesterday and then make your submission. As I say, I express no opinion as to whether you can do so at all, but it is quite clear that you cannot do it at a different stage and during another day's sitting.

Mr. Speaker: Let us not pursue an argument which is not going to take us anywhere. If it is the wish and feeling of hon. members, although it is my contention that this mode of procedure is available to me in the circumstances, I shall proceed with the routine proceedings and come to the orders of the day.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, some time ago I thought you had come to this point. In fact, I have already said that I supported the proposition that you were putting before the house, and I hope that you do put it before the house for the reasons you have given.

An hon. Member: Who is going to move it?

Mr. Speaker: There are certain doubts which necessarily must be entertained because of the routine proceedings that are provided for in standing order 15. I know perfectly well that in normal circumstances we would go through routine proceedings—I am sure there is nothing here to delay and that motions will be allowed to stand—and then we come to the orders of the day. But the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and others have said, "The proposal which you submit to the house is one that you have not the right to do." I contend that I have that right, but if we are to have an eternal discussion of it I shall go through with the routine proceedings.

Mr. Knowles: Why should not the Minister of Finance make the motion that what you want to be done be the decision of the house?

PRIVILEGE

MR. CAMERON (NANAIMO)—REFERENCE TO REMARKS OF MR. SPEAKER ON MAY 31

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a point of privilege. Last night you were good enough to instruct me as to the proper method of bringing a matter before this house.

Mr. Speaker: May I interrupt the hon. member to inform him that last evening I did not instruct him? I outlined what the procedure was if he meant to do anything with the article that he proposed to read at that time.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): You were kind enough to give me your advice as to the proper method of procedure.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the hon. gentleman be good enough to resume his seat?

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Surely, sir, I have the right to make my point of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: I heard the hon. member make his point.

Mr. Rowe: He has not stated it yet.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has said that last night I instructed him to make a certain motion. I told him that I advised him as to what the procedure was if he meant to do anything with the article about which he complained. That is the position.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): That does not alter my point of privilege, sir. You gave me your advice. I followed it meticulously, as a reading of Hansard of May 31 would indicate. At that time you said this to me, sir:

> If the hon. member complains about a newspaper, the procedure is to send the newspaper to the Clerk so he can read it and it will be inserted in the Votes and Proceedings, and he must conclude with a motion that the content of the article is of a malicious intent, in contempt of parliament and a breach of privilege and therefore deserves the censure of this house.

I then asked you this:

> My proper order is to send this to the Clerk of of the house now, is it?
> Mr. Speaker: Provided that the hon. member wishes to go through with the motion I have indicated.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): You then stated—

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member be good enough to come to his point of privilege?

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I am coming to it, sir. I said:

> Yes, I will do that. Do I send this to the Clerk now, Your Honour? Do I read it first?

You replied:

> The hon. member was going to indicate what is the paragraph he is complaining of.

To this I replied:

> It is the whole letter.

I proceeded to read those letters and then make the following motion:

> Mr. Speaker, I move that these statements in the newspaper are derogatory of the dignity of parliament and deserving of the censure of this house.

I placed that motion in your hands in writing, properly seconded by the hon. member for Regina City. You accepted that motion at the time. The Leader of the Opposition then rose to debate that motion. At no time did you indicate that it was out of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member at this moment is not stating a proper question of privilege.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ALGOMA EAST—REQUEST FOR INTERVENTION OF MINISTER IN DISPUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Before the orders of the day are called, I wish to direct a question to the hon. member for Algoma East and Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). Will the Secretary of State for External Affairs extend his wise influence in regard to the hostilities now apparent in Algoma East between the government and the municipal government?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

REVISION OF SALARIES OF TEMPORARY EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, referring to a question which was asked last week, I would ask the Minister of Finance if he is now able to inform the house whether the increases in salary have now been made applicable to the remaining group of employees of the House of Commons?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): I regret I am not but I will try to give an answer later in the day.

[Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo).]

REQUEST FOR DISSOLUTION OF PARLIAMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister of Canada. In view of the obvious fact that the government has lost its moral authority, will the Prime Minister now dissolve parliament and call a general election?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is not a question that can be answered or that should be put on the orders of the day.

Mr. Fleming: Especially if it is an embarrassing one.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

CORNWALL ISLAND—INQUIRY AS TO DREDGING OF CHANNELS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister any statement to make with respect to the arguments and disagreements between the St. Lawrence seaway authority and its United States counterpart over the dredging of the St. Lawrence river around Cornwall island?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): A statement was issued on May 29 reading as follows:

> The Department of External Affairs announced that the question of responsibility for dredging the channels north and south of Cornwall island was thoroughly discussed at a meeting of representatives of the United States and Canadian governments in Ottawa today. The discussion will be continued between the governments and between the navigation and power entities responsible for the St. Lawrence project.

I should like to add to that statement just one word to the effect that there was no disagreement during these discussions.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister inform the house as to the extent of the differences of opinion between Canadian and United States authorities with regard to the dredging of the St. Lawrence seaway channel near Cornwall and also whether the government believes that the United States will agree to dredging on the north side of Cornwall island sufficient to allow for a seaway channel on the Canadian side?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): That is a matter that is under negotiation with the United States authorities at the present time.

POSSIBLE DELAY DUE TO NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES AUTHORITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Transport with respect to the St. Lawrence seaway project. Does the minister expect that the present negotiations which are going on with the corresponding United States authority will be likely to delay to any appreciable extent the opening of the seaway in 1958 or 1959?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answer is that I do not expect that the matters under discussion will delay the opening of the seaway.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT OF ACT RESPECTING CASUAL EMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture or, in his absence, to his parliamentary assistant. Would the minister give consideration to amending the Prairie Farm Assistance Act regulations in such a way as to make it possible for farmers who have suffered from recurring floods in Manitoba to supplement their incomes from casual employment off the farm without losing P.F.A. benefits?

Mr. Robert McCubbin (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Agriculture): The hon. member for Brandon-Souris was good enough to give notice of his intention to ask this question.

Under the existing P.F.A. Act and regulations casual employment off the farm is possible without interfering with P.F.A. benefits. However, full-time employment during the crop season does deprive the individual of the status of a farmer under the act and regulations.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Dinsdale: I should like to direct a supplementary question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture. I was referring to casual employment off the farm and not full-time employment off the farm. Would the parliamentary assistant give some attention to the financial difficulties faced by farmers who are working off the farm on a casual basis, because they have suffered substantial losses from flooding, in order to survive as farmers?

Mr. McCubbin: If the hon. member for Brandon-Souris has any case he would like me to investigate I will be glad to do so for him.

Inquiries of the Ministry

PIPE LINES

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES—PROPRIETY OF LETTING OF CONTRACTS FOR PIPE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can he tell the house or produce any documentary evidence to indicate why Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited is placing contracts for the delivery of pipe before the house has approved the bill or approved any agreement concerning this matter? It seems to me it is a violation of the rights of this chamber that the company should act in this manner without authority. If there is any correspondence authorizing the company to do this before the house has come to a decision, will the minister please produce it since it is of interest in the pipe-line debate?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): There is no authority from the government. Trans-Canada desires to complete the line at the earliest date possible and on their own responsibility they have placed orders for pipe.

Mr. Coldwell: I understood the crown company was to advance the money to do this job, and we have not authorized the crown company to do anything of the kind. This house has not had the opportunity of doing it.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Since the crown company is not in existence the crown company is not in a position to act and has not acted. The government has given no authority to Trans-Canada to place orders.

Mr. Knowles: Does this mean that Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited has taken the place of the government of Canada?

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Johnson (Kindersley): I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce a question supplementary to that of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. If Trans-Canada Pipe Lines has funds so great as to be able to award a $45 million order—

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I suggest to hon. members that although I have allowed questions with respect to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines today, yesterday and on other days during this debate—

Some hon. Members: Not yesterday.

Mr. Speaker: That is right. There were none yesterday because of the superseding motion. However, I allowed questions the day before and any other day when there were questions, although it is well known that according to our rules we should not put questions relating to a matter now before a committee of the house.

Mr. Fulton: But the government will not answer our questions when we get into committee.

Mr. Speaker: Complaints about answers to questions should not be raised as a point of order or a question of privilege.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Claude Ellis (Regina City): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Would the minister explain to the house the significance of June 7 now, in view of the announcement made earlier that Trans-Canada has already placed an order for pipe?

Mr. Speaker: I have already indicated that these matters should be dealt with as soon as the house resumes in committee.

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES—DECISION OF FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to redirect a question to the Prime Minister. The other day I asked him whether or not any estimate had been secured by the government as to when it might be expected that a decision would be made by the federal power commission of the United States on the application of the Midwestern Gas Transmission Company. At that time the Prime Minister said he would look into the matter and would also ascertain whether or not, having regard to the great interest of the government in the decision to be rendered there, Canada had an observer to ascertain the progress of proceedings.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I did ascertain that the officials at the embassy in Washington were keeping in touch with what was going on there and that the position is that there have been motions submitted to dismiss the application of Midwestern for a permit to import, which motions have not been disposed of. If they are rejected I understand there will then be cross-examination and that it is not possible to make any forecast as to when that semi-judicial body will reach a conclusion.

Mr. Diefenbaker: But is it not possible, having regard to the number of briefs that have been submitted, for the federal power commission to give some indication or for the Prime Minister to be able to determine reasonably by way of anticipation when such a judgment will be secured? Is he of the opinion that it will take two or three years as has been estimated?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): No, Mr. Speaker, I am not of opinion that it will take two or three years. The hon. gentleman and I practised law, and I hope the hon. gentleman is still in a position where he can continue to practise law, and he knows from his experience and I know from mine that it is not prudent to forecast when a judicial or semi-judicial body will be delivering a judgment or making a decision.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

ALLEGED DEROGATORY STATEMENTS BY HEAD OF NATIONAL GALLERY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): May I direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Will the minister investigate the derogatory statements Mr. Jarvis of the national gallery has been making to the press recently about the maritimes generally and Saint John in particular? Will he investigate his right to make these statements, the desirability of making them and also the desirability of travelling around the country in this way?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I thought the opposition was claiming the right of free speech.

Mr. Rowe: You are a great champion of free speech.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO SUFFICIENCY OF TRANSPORT AIRCRAFT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John B. Hamilton (York West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the recent statement made by the head of the staff college at Kingston concerning the necessity of transporting troops by air, does the minister still feel that our armed forces are adequately supplied with transport type aircraft?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I should think a question of this nature might be reserved for my estimates. I presume there will be a discussion then.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of National Defence. Does his answer regarding the transport aircraft situation indicate that he does not see any urgency in the problem in the armed forces?

Mr. Campney: No immediate urgency, no.

TRANSPORT

PROVINCIAL ELECTIONS—INQUIRY AS TO USE OF R.C.A.F. PLANES BY CABINET MINISTERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Victoria, Ont.): I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Defence. Is his department making R.C.A.F. planes available to cabinet ministers for the purpose of travel in connection with provincial election campaigns?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Not to my knowledge, sir.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT TO INCREASE AMOUNT OF PERMISSIVE INCOME

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I have not given him notice but he can take it as notice if he so requires. Is the government giving consideration to amending the War Veterans Allowance Act so as to increase the amount of permissive income allowed recipients under the act?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Not at this time, Mr. Speaker.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ISRAEL—SUGGESTED RECONSIDERATION OF SHIPMENT OF SABRE AIRCRAFT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the speech made yesterday, as reported in the press, by a representative of the state of Israel as to the serious situation in which Israel may find itself within the next six weeks or so involving an impending attack, has the government given any reconsideration to the question of the shipment to Israel or the permit to ship Sabre aircraft to Israel?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I have not read the report of the speech in question, but the matter of the shipment of aircraft to Israel is still under consideration by the government.

WEST GERMANY—INQUIRY AS TO INVITATION TO CHANCELLOR ADENAUER TO VISIT CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the impending visit next week of Chancellor Adenauer of the Republic of Germany to the United States, may I ask him whether any invitation was extended to Chancellor Adenauer to come to Canada on this occasion?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): When we heard that the chancellor was coming to this side we had hoped he would be able to return to Canada; but his visit is going to take only two or three days and he will not be able to leave the United States during that time.

VISIT OF THE PRESIDENT OF INDONESIA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the statement published in the press that the President of Indonesia was to address a joint meeting of the House of Commons and the Senate, would the Prime Minister state if that is so, because we have heard no word of it in the house?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there has been no statement in the house because, though a tentative program had been arranged for the visit of His Excellency the President of Indonesia, it was frequently being changed, and, I understand, it was determined just a very short time ago and that the program is now printed and it does contain an announcement that he will be addressing the members of parliament, and others who will wish to take advantage of the opportunity of hearing him, on Tuesday morning at 10.20 in this chamber.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO EXTENSION OF COVERAGE TO FISHERMEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Can the minister tell the house whether any changes in the unemployment insurance regulations to provide unemployment insurance coverage for fishermen will be made prior to the end of the current session so that the house may have an opportunity to consider them?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): I have nothing to add at the moment to the statement I made on the 16th of May.

FREIGHT RATES

CROWSNEST PASS—INQUIRY AS TO RATE INCREASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister give the house the assurance that any increase that may be permitted by the board of transport commissioners with respect to freight rates will not affect the Crowsnest rates which have been long established?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): The hon. gentleman is well aware that the so-called Crowsnest rates are determined by statute and not by the board of transport commissioners.

PUBLIC SERVICE

DEFENCE RESEARCH BOARD—INCREASE IN WORK WEEK OF SECURITY GUARDS

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister now answer the question which I asked him a few days ago with reference to the hours of work of security guards at defence research board?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker; I am sorry that I cannot. However, the matter is being looked into.

DISABLED PERSONS

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE CHANGES IN REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I wonder whether the minister is in a position yet to indicate whether or not the regulations pertaining to disabled persons are about to be changed so as to include a larger number?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I answered that question about a week ago.

HEALTH INSURANCE

INDIANS—INQUIRY AS TO ADVICE OF DEPARTMENTAL OFFICIALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has he been informed of a complaint to the effect that certain officers of his department looking after the health of Indians, I believe in the St. Clair reserve, have been advising Indians to purchase health insurance from line companies?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I will be glad to look into that matter.

Mr. Castleden: The question is whether you have received a complaint.

[Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain).]

Mr. Martin: No. I will be glad to look into it.

Mr. Castleden: I beg the minister's pardon?

Mr. Martin: No; I have not. I will be glad to look into it.

Mr. Castleden: I should like to inform the minister to the effect—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Castleden: I should like to direct a question then to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Did the minister transfer to the Minister of National Health and Welfare the complaint that he received at the Indian conference the other day to the effect that certain officers of the Department of National Health and Welfare were advising Indians to purchase health insurance from line companies?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I do not think that is a correct statement of the proposition, Mr. Speaker. I had the officers of my department inform the officers of my hon. friend's department about this matter and it is under consideration.

TRADE

GATT—INQUIRY AS TO TERMS OF RECENT AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, may I direct two questions to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The first one is this. When will the minister be in a position to announce the terms of the agreement recently entered into with respect to changes in the general agreement on tariffs and trade? Second, will any of the changes require legislative action on the part of parliament to bring them into effect?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I believe that the release date is Thursday of next week. I understand that no special legislation is required by parliament other than the usual changes in the tariff bill that will be brought down by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris).

FINANCE

BANK OF CANADA—PURPOSE OF INCREASE IN DISCOUNT RATE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Was the increase in the interest rate, which was lately ordered by the Bank of Canada, made for the purpose of discouraging the inflationary trend?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Bank of Canada increased its own discount rate and I do not know of any other action taken.

Mr. Rowe: I should like to ask a supplementary question. If it was for the purpose I mentioned, why was the rate on savings not increased in order to encourage savings and likewise to discourage the inflationary trend?

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, I will study my hon. friend's question and give an answer later.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance? Was that step taken by the Bank of Canada in raising the rate, taken with the approval of the government?

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, according to the statute the Bank of Canada takes the responsibility for its actions.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask whether the government was aware of the action before it was taken and did not the government approve it?

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, I gave my answer a moment ago.

Mr. Fleming: That is not an answer.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Finance. If this increase in the rate has as its objective the preventing of inflation, why is it that the government is authorizing the expenditure of $80 million by an American corporation in Canada, something which would presumably increase inflation? The money is not borrowed from the Canadian people. That is my point. If this money were borrowed from the Canadian people by means of a bond issue, the situation would be different; it would be anti-inflationary.

Mr. Harris: As to the former question, I am quite prepared to say that I was informed of the action before it was taken. As to the latter question, I was also informed that the loan of $80 million would not be inflationary.

Mr. Coldwell: I wonder what the reasons were that were given for that advice? Would the minister tell us?

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to discuss this matter on my estimates.

Mr. Rowe: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister another question. He said he would take into consideration the idea of an increased rate of interest on savings as a prevention of inflation. Does the Minister of Finance not advise or give his recommendation to the Bank of Canada?

Mr. Harris: As I say, Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to discuss that matter on the estimates. In the meantime, I think we shall make a bit of progress if my hon. friend reads the statute and sees the division of responsibilities between the bank and the government.

Mr. Rowe: I was asking the minister. I thought maybe he knew what his responsibilities were.

VICTORY BONDS—INQUIRY AS TO REASON FOR WITHDRAWAL OF GOVERNMENT SUPPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Victoria, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance. I should like to know why the government withdrew their support from the victory bond issues of 1942, 1943, 1944 and 1945?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): I am not familiar with the problem; I will find out about it.

Mr. Hodgson: You ought to be familiar with it because the bonds are down to 85 cents this morning.

IMMIGRATION

PROVISION FOR FURTHER ASSISTANCE IN FAMILY SETTLEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): May I direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration arising out of a statement he made to the house some time ago to the effect that children of immigrant families would receive certain payments. My question is this. Are those payments now going forward? If not, when does the minister expect to start sending those payments to the children of immigrant families?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we can expect them whenever this house gets down to business and deals with the estimates which will provide them.

Mr. Fleming: The schoolmaster speaks.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question—

Mr. Speaker: It looks as though the hon. member for Dauphin has a supplementary question.

Mr. Knowles: Fine.

Mr. Zaplitny: Yes, Mr. Speaker. My supplementary question is this. Is it the intention of the minister to introduce any legislation in order to implement that policy or can it be implemented without further amendments to the Immigration Act?

Mr. Pickersgill: The money will require to be voted.

Mr. Zaplitny: May I ask a supplementary question? The minister did not reply to my question. The question was whether that policy may be now implemented without any amendments to the Immigration Act?

Mr. Pickersgill: I have given my answer, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: No.

FLOODS

SASKATCHEWAN—REFERENCE TO AMOUNT OF FEDERAL RELIEF PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister state whether, in view of the hopeful generosity of the government in respect of the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines, the government has come to the conclusion that the paltry $100,000 paid by the federal government in respect of the colossal flood damage in Saskatchewan last year is quite discriminatory?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is no relation whatsoever between the two matters mentioned in the hon. gentleman's question.

GRAIN

BOX CARS—INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBILITY OF FILLING SPACE AT PORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister state what the present situation is with regard to the possibility of carrying forward shipping orders so that boats and other space at ports could be filled? What is the situation with regard to box cars within Canada at the present time and what is the backlog in shipping orders?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): I shall take my hon. friend's question as notice.

DRUGS

SUGGESTED INCREASE IN PENALTIES FOR ILLEGAL DISTRIBUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Justice. In view of the fact that the United States Senate has just passed a law having to do with increased sentences, including the death penalty in some cases, for the illegal distribution of narcotics, may I ask whether this government is giving any consideration to increasing the penalties on those who illegally distribute narcotics for illicit purposes?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I am not the Acting Minister of Justice, but that matter largely concerns our department. The matter is receiving consideration.

BLIND PERSONS

INQUIRY AS TO PROVISION OF GUIDE ALLOWANCE WITHOUT A MEANS TEST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Will the minister tell the house whether he will bring in a proposal at this session to provide a guide allowance without a means test for blind persons in Canada?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): My hon. friend knows these matters are always under consideration. Much will depend upon the progress of debate here and further consideration.

POWER

PASSAMAQUODDY PROJECT—INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF JOINT CANADA-U.S. COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, on May 25 I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs a question with reference to the appointment of a joint committee of the United States and Canada for the studying of the feasibility of harnessing the Passamaquoddy tides for hydroelectric power. I wonder whether the minister has a statement to make?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): A joint reference on the Passamaquoddy tidal power project will be submitted to the international joint commission as soon as agreement on the terms of the reference has been reached between the governments of Canada and the United States. On receipt of the joint reference—I hope that will be shortly—the commission will make arrangements for the appointment of the appropriate boards to assume responsibility for the surveys.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

CANADIAN LEGION BIENNIAL CONVENTION—INQUIRY AS TO ATTENDANCE OF MINISTER AND MEMBERS OF HOUSE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Is the minister attending the biennial convention of the Canadian Legion in Vancouver, which I believe is to be held this month? Are any arrangements being made, as have been made at previous conventions, for members of the House of Commons to attend the convention?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the minister does propose to attend the convention, as in the past. I am not familiar with any arrangements that have been made previously to transport hon. members to the locality where the convention is taking place. Personally, the minister is travelling by Trans-Canada Air Lines.

SHIPPING

INQUIRY AS TO SUBSIDIZATION OF MERCHANT FLEET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the resolution passed yesterday at the annual meeting of the naval officers association of Canada with respect to subsidizing the merchant fleet, a copy of which I understand will be presented to the minister, is the minister prepared to reconsider this matter and make a statement on it?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would prefer to see the terms of the resolution before I make any statement.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MR. SPEAKER—STATEMENT WITH RESPECT TO RULING ON MOTION OF HON. MEMBER FOR NANAIMO

Mr. Speaker: Government orders. Before the deputy clerk reads the order of the day, it is not because I want to anticipate the point of order which the hon. member for Eglinton indicated that he wanted to raise a moment ago that I want to state that it may be said that because the chairman's report was not placed before the house yesterday, the order "House again in committee of the whole" should not appear on the order paper; but, of course, what has happened is absolutely unprecedented. See standing order 7. No such interruption has ever taken place. It is in the same category as the interruption which takes place when the Black Rod comes to tell us that a message is coming to us from the Senate.

Therefore I had to deal with the problem last evening before I left, and the matter which was before the house was, as provided in the rules, an appeal by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre of a ruling made by the chairman in committee, and that report must be submitted to the house and the committee must resume the consideration of its business at once. Therefore I gave instructions to the Clerk to put the order on the order paper and it is in relation to that instruction, for which I take responsibility, that I suggest the action I outlined a moment ago to the house. It is absolutely unprovided for; it is unprecedented; and the matter I outlined a moment ago is one which I thought I had the right to submit to the house at the time I did.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre indicated doubts existed as to that. As a matter of fact, he said: "I challenge your right to do it at the moment", but indicated it could be done later. Therefore at this moment I am—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Knowles: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: I am putting words in the hon. gentleman's mouth?

Mr. Knowles: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: If I am, I withdraw them and I apologize. Now, in the execution of that—

Mr. Knowles: I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. gentleman says he rises on a point of order. The function of a point of order is to bring to the attention of the Speaker a matter which he did not himself perceive. I have perceived the matter. I have explained why it is happening the way it is. What more can hon. members ask than that the matter be left to them to decide? That is exactly what I propose to do.

Mr. Knowles: That is rule by majority, not rule by the rule book. That is taking the will of the majority rather than following the rules in the book.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre says that that is rule by the majority.

Mr. Knowles: And not following the rules laid down.

Mr. Speaker: All questions must be decided by a majority.

Mr. Coldwell: And I suggest to you that the demonstration in this house over the past week has shown that the majority has no respect for the views of the minority.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, we appeal to you to protect the minority against the oppressive majority.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

An hon. Member: Hitlerites.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The matter of order before the house at the moment is one that I brought up myself. Of course, hon. members would wish to debate this matter that I have raised myself. I do not know what more hon. members wish. I do not know what more they can ask for at this moment. I am submitting to them the matter of order which I believe it is my right to submit—

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Coldwell: No.

Mr. Speaker: —and it is their right to decide. Well, the hon. member says no.

Mr. Knowles: It is the right of the government to call the order that it wants called and I submit that you should wait until the government decides what order it wants called. If it wants to call order No. 2 it is the government's right to do so, not yours.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows very well that if he looks at the business of the house for last evening it was indicated that the business would be to go back on the pipe-line debate with the house in committee of the whole. I rose at the moment the deputy clerk was to read order No. 2. He had said, "Order No. 2" and was proceeding to read it.

Mr. Knowles: What does it say? What does order No. 2 say?

Mr. Speaker: That is exactly the point I intend to submit to the house at the moment. I do not know why hon. members should discuss with me a matter of order which I raised myself and which is on all fours exactly with the one they want to raise themselves.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You are our protector, that is why.

Mr. Speaker: What could be more democratic?

Mr. Knowles: Will you hear me on a point of order?

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Knowles: I rise on a point of order.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: There is a matter of order which I put before the house myself. What I intended to submit to the house is that in neglecting to submit at once to the house yesterday the report of the chairman of the committee on an appeal from his ruling by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) I made a serious mistake and the house should not suffer any prejudice or detriment on my account, and that the house, which is master of its own proceedings, should be placed in exactly the same position as it was when I resumed the chair yesterday to submit the chairman's ruling to the house. Those who are in favour of this course of action will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Drew: But, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it; call in the members.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hail, hail, the gang's all here.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, do I understand that you will do nothing—

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Has the Prime Minister no control over his followers?

Mr. Fleming: This is organized disorder on the part of all Liberals in the house.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, are you not going to call order?

Mr. Speaker: There is nothing before the house at the moment.

Mr. Knowles: There is no house.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, this is a demonstration on the part of all Liberals in the house which shows a great disrespect for authority. I protest against this. Parliament has ceased to function.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Where is the Prime Minister? Is he silent in the face of this demonstration?

Mr. Rowe: Is he afraid to dissolve parliament? Why not do it yourself?—you are doing everything else yourself.

Mr. Martin: You have delayed things for three weeks. You led it, too. Don't say a word.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, it should be placed on the record that when an hon. member rose on a question of privilege you sat down and refused to hear him and the Liberals instigated such an outburst of disorder that no one could be heard. That ought to be on the record. This is the lowest moment in Canadian parliamentary history; the lowest moment. There has never been anything like it.

Mr. Pearson: I thought that was last night.

Mr. Bell: This is black Friday, boy.

Mr. Lesage: You brought it on; you did it yourself.

Mr. Fleming: How absurd can you get?

Mr. Martin: The minority is not running this parliament.

Mr. Rowe: The majority isn't running it either; nobody is running it. The majority cannot run it, let alone the minority.

Mr. Hodgson: Hitlerism.

Some hon. Members:

There will always be a pipe line,
The pipe line shall be free;
The gas shall flow from west to east in each locality.
There'll always be a pipe line,
The pipe line shall be free—

Mr. Fleming: Not parliament.

Some hon. Members:

—for Fulton means no more to you than Fulton means to me.
There'll always be a pipe line, the pipe line shall be free—

Mr. Fleming: Free to American investors.

Some hon. Members:

I've been working on the pipe line all the day through,
I've been working on the pipe line just to make the Tories blue.
Can't you hear the Tories moaning, getting up so early in the morn';
Hear the C.C.F.'ers groaning, for the pipe line's getting warm.

Mr. Rowe: He laughs best who laughs last; go to the country and find out.

An hon. Member: You laughed yourself.

Mr. Rowe: No, I am ashamed of you; that is why I cannot laugh.

The house divided on the question: Shall the course of action submitted by Mr. Speaker be followed? And the question was decided in the affirmative on the following division:

NAYS:—0.

During the taking of the vote:

Mr. Speaker: Those who are opposed will please rise.

Mr. Drew: We are not voting because there is no question properly before the house.

Mr. Speaker: Are all other hon. members abstaining also?

Mr. Coldwell: I share that opinion.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question before the house is an appeal from a ruling of the chairman of the committee of the whole—

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I rise to move—

Mr. Speaker: May I interrupt the hon. member? I am now in possession of the floor and will not accept the hon. gentleman's question of privilege.

Mr. Fulton: I move, seconded by—

Mr. Speaker: Order. In committee of the whole Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East) moved that at this sitting of the committee of the whole house on Bill 298—

Mr. Fulton: Before you put the question—

Mr. Speaker: —an act to establish the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation, the further consideration of clauses 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6 and 7, the title of the said bill, and any amendments proposed thereto, shall be—

Mr. Fulton: Before you put the question—

Mr. Speaker: —the first business of this committee and shall not further be postponed.

Mr. Fulton: Before you put the question—

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. member be kind enough to resume his seat?

Mr. Fulton: Will you hear me? If you say you will hear me, I shall resume my seat.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Fulton raised a point of order that the motion was not in order on the ground that certain clauses of the bill had not been before the committee—

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Fulton: Before you put the question—

Mr. Speaker: —and also that other clauses were postponed before being considered by the committee and therefore, in accordance with standing order 33, the said clauses cannot come within the ambit of the proposed motion.

The chairman ruled that in accordance with the rules and practices of the house the motion was in order. Whereupon Mr. Knowles appealed to the house from the ruling of the Chair.

Those who are in favour of sustaining the ruling of the Chair will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

Mr. Drew: You have no right to sit in that chair.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, before you put the question—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Bell: There is the man there.

Mr. Drew: His is the responsibility for this.

Mr. Speaker: The question is the following one—

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, you said you would hear me before you put the question to the house. You gave me an undertaking this morning, Mr. Speaker, when I raised this question at an earlier point, that you would hear me on this matter.

Mr. Speaker: May I repeat what I said earlier and tell the hon. gentleman that I take full responsibility for what I am doing.

Mr. Drew: Certainly you do.

Mr. Rowe: Why shouldn't you?

Mr. Speaker: I know what I am doing. The hon. member has put some remarks on Hansard and he will also have mine on Hansard and he can take whatever course he likes. As a matter of fact, the course has been taken, and I may be dealt with in that fashion. I refuse to hear the hon. gentleman on a question of order at this stage.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Drew: Do you not honour your word?

Mr. Fleming: Will you allow me to state the question?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fleming: It is an important question based upon the authorities.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fleming: You gave me an undertaking that I could do that—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fleming: —and now you are denying me that right, a right of all members of the house—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fleming: —and you are doing it in defiance of what you said this morning.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is the following one:

In committee of the whole, Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East) moved that at this sitting of the committee of the whole house on Bill No. 298, an act to establish the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation, the further consideration of clauses 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, the title of the said bill, and any amendments proposed thereto, shall be the first business of this committee and shall not further be postponed.

Mr. Fulton raised a point of order that the motion was not in order on the ground that certain clauses of the bill have not been before the committee and also that other clauses were postponed before being considered by the committee, and therefore, in accordance with standing order 33, the said clauses could not come within the ambit of the proposed motion.

The chairman ruled that in accordance with the rules and the practice of the house, the motion is in order. Whereupon Mr. Knowles appealed to the house from the ruling of the Chair.

The house divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the chairman be confirmed? And the ruling was confirmed on the following division:

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis). Had I voted, I would have voted to sustain the chairman's ruling.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the chairman's ruling sustained.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I move—

NORTHERN ONTARIO PIPE LINE CORPORATION

CONSTITUTION OF CROWN COMPANY TO CONSTRUCT PIPE LINE, MAKE SHORT-TERM LOANS, ETC.

The house resumed, from Thursday, May 31, consideration in committee of Bill No. 298, to establish the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation—Mr. Howe (Port Arthur) —Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

Mr. Fulton: —seconded by the hon. member for Lanark that this house do now adjourn. On a point of order, may I say that the order of the day for the house to go into committee has not been read.

The Deputy Chairman: The house in committee of the whole on Bill No. 298. The question is on the motion made by—

Mr. Fleming: On a point of order—

Mr. Fulton: The order of the day has not been read.

The Deputy Chairman: The committee knows full well that I have no duty that I can perform at the moment but to put the motion the legality of which has been ruled on. Those in favour of the motion will please rise.

Mr. Knowles: I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Fleming: On a point of order—

During the taking of the vote:

Mr. Fleming: I want to be heard on a point of order. You have no right to shut us up.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Fleming: Have we come to fascism?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I am standing on a question of privilege.

And the result of the vote having been announced: Yeas, 144; nays, 51.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the motion carried.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege I challenge the vote. I was counted on both sides of the motion although I made it clear that I was remaining on my feet on a question of privilege, on which I had risen before you put the question. There are therefore now two questions before the committee. There is the original question of privilege on which I rose and there is the question of privilege with regard to the vote. With respect to the first question of privilege, I submit that you are improperly in the chair because the order for the committee was not read; because the Speaker left the chair—he ran away from the chair—even although a motion was before him which was perfectly in order. Hence on those two grounds, namely that the house had before it unfinished business and second, that the order of the day for you to take the chair had not been read, these whole proceedings and this vote are a nullity. Second, as I have said with respect to the vote itself, the vote is a nullity because I was counted on both sides although I made it clear at the time the Clerk pointed to me that I was standing on a question of privilege and not for the purpose of casting a vote. I place these matters before you and I require a ruling on both points, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: I will deal first with the second question raised by the hon. member for Kamloops. He states that through inadvertence—he being on his feet when the committee was being counted—although he indicated that he did not intend to vote, he was included in the vote when he should not have been. I will direct that the vote be adjusted accordingly. The other question which the hon. member has raised as a question of privilege is, I think, a question of order.

Mr. Fulton: Very well, a point of order.

The Deputy Chairman: It is the first thing, now, on which I am not in a position to rule. He is calling in question proceedings of the house at the time when Mr. Speaker was in the chair.

Mr. Fulton: I am calling in question your assumption of the chair when no order had been read for you to take the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Kamloops is raising a point of order that I am in the chair illegally?

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

The Deputy Chairman: Owing to action which took place at the time when Mr. Speaker was in the chair, I am not in a position to rule on the proceedings of the house prior to—

Mr. Fulton: Will you tell me how you came into the chair in the absence of an order of the house?

The Deputy Chairman: Will the hon. member just wait—

Mr. Fulton: Will you tell me how you got into the chair in the absence of an order from the house, when no such order was passed by the house and no such order was put to the house?

The Deputy Chairman: I will be glad to tell the hon. member that, if he will kindly let me complete my sentence. I said, when I was interrupted, that I was not in a position to rule on any proceedings prior to my assumption of the chair. The hon. member claims that I am in the chair wrongly. While I understand that the house does not know officially what the committee does until it is reported to it, I think the reverse is not so and a committee of the house does know the proceedings of the house. There was a proposition put and voted upon earlier in the day that the house would revert to the position at which it was—

Some hon. Members: No; there was no motion.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I did not say that there was a motion. There was a proposition which was put and voted upon that—

Mr. Coldwell: What was put? What was the motion and what was put?

The Deputy Chairman: If hon. members will kindly permit me to complete my sentence, there was a proposition put before the house and voted upon this morning—

Mr. Fulton: "Proposition" is right.

The Deputy Chairman: —that the house would consider itself at a certain place at which it was yesterday at approximately 5.15, and that was carried. As a result of that—and it could not be otherwise than as a result of that—an appeal has just been voted upon from a ruling which I made yesterday in the chair and which it would not be possible for the house to have voted upon if we had not reached this order of the day. Clause 4.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Fulton: I appeal your ruling.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, before that appeal is dealt with, may I point out that if you, sir, were informed that through some inadvertence you had been called to take the chair and that no effective proceedings had taken place in this house before that time, I submit that you would be bound then to refer the matter to the Chair and ask for a statement from the Chair as to whether you are correctly acting as chairman of this committee.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not know what the message is that you have received, but what I do want to point out is that when it is stated to you on the responsibility of a member—and this is stated to you on the responsibility of many members of this house —that no order was called and that no proceedings under our rules have been taken which justify your now sitting in the chair, it is not, I submit, within your power to decide that question. What I submit is that it is your duty, then, to submit the matter to the Speaker for a statement as to whether in fact the proceedings were properly followed. I now ask you to submit the question to Mr. Speaker as to whether you are properly sitting as chairman of this committee.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether we can get a point settled because I at least am confused. I understood, in my time in the house, that we voted on a motion of this house and that when the motion was voted on and carried it was a decision of the house. But I understand now there is a new procedure and that we vote on propositions. If we do, what is the authority for it? No one moves it. Am I to understand that the Speaker takes it upon himself to put questions before the house on which he asks for a vote of the house? That, too, is something new. Let us be sure where we are.

Mr. Castleden: Let us be sure where we are going.

Mr. MacInnis: I do not know whether we can be sure where we are going or not, but of one thing I am sure: we are going in the wrong direction. Let us find out what is the authority for voting on a proposition, and, if there is no authority, let us give it the desserts it merits, the desserts of no authority; but let us not carry on this sort of thing any longer.

May I say that in my opinion it is no concern of the Speaker of the house what business comes up in this house. That is the concern of the leader of the house and of the Prime Minister. The concern of the Speaker of the house is to see that you and I and every other hon. member of the house are accorded all the rights and privileges that the rules of this house afford us. Beyond that he has no concern at all.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: I see the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I will see the hon. member for Eglinton later.

Mr. Knowles: Before you make a firm ruling, or before an appeal is put, you, sir, might consider this additional point that I wish to lay before you. I listened with care to your contention that you cannot look beyond the fact that you were put in the chair; you cannot look to what happened when Mr. Speaker was in the chair. With respect, I do not think that position can stand up because this place is full of members who know that happened and are in a position to report it to you. But, in addition, Mr. Chairman, to the reasons already given why this committee is not properly or not legally constituted, I wish to draw your attention to a certain citation in Beauchesne, third edition, and also to a certain fact—you, sir, cannot deny it—recorded in the Journals. The Journals or Votes and Proceedings for a day such as Tuesday, May 29, read as follows, on page 656:

> The house resumed consideration in committee of the whole of Bill No. 298, an act to establish the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation, and further progress having been made and reported, the committee obtained leave to consider it again at the next sitting of the house.

The Deputy Chairman: What page is that?

Mr. Knowles: That was Tuesday, May 29, at page 656. In other words, Mr. Chairman, it is perfectly clear that on Tuesday, May 29, we followed the rules. The committee rose and reported progress and obtained permission to consider Bill No. 298 at the next sitting of the house.

On Wednesday, May 30, as recorded on page 657 of Votes and Proceedings, we had the same thing. I read it again:

> The house resumed consideration in committee of the whole of Bill No. 298, an act to establish the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation, and further progress having been made and reported, the committee obtained leave to consider it again at the next sitting of the house.

The committee did that on Wednesday. The committee followed the rules; the committee did what was right and proper. But if you look at the Votes and Proceedings for yesterday, Thursday, May 31, you will find on page 661 this notation:

> The house resumed consideration in committee of the whole of Bill No. 298, an act to establish the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation. And the house continuing in committee;—

You can search the pages of the Votes and Proceedings of yesterday from there to the end and you will not find at any point where the committee obtained the permission of the house to consider the bill again at the next sitting of the house. The proceedings of the committee of yesterday on Bill No. 298 vanished into thin air at ten o'clock last night.

I draw your attention to citation 702 of Beauchesne's third edition which reads:

> When a bill or other matter (except Supply or Ways and Means) has been partly considered in committee, and the chairman has been directed to report progress and ask leave to sit again, and the house shall have ordered that the committee shall sit again on a particular day, the Speaker shall, when the order for the committee has been read, forthwith leave the chair, without putting any question, and the house shall thereupon resolve itself into such committee.

It is exceedingly clear to anyone who might still have an interest in following rules of procedure that the only way a committee can resume consideration of a bill is on the basis of having obtained the permission of the house at a previous sitting to do so. No such permission was asked for yesterday and no such permission was obtained. Mr. Chairman, it is my submission that Bill No. 298 died at ten o'clock last night.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: Hon. members can laugh and I am not surprised at their laughter because they have thrown the rule book into the filth of the Ottawa river; but it is a fact that can be confirmed by the Votes and Proceedings of this house which are clearly defined in our rules as the official records of the house, and I defy any hon. member of this house to show me anywhere in the Votes and Proceedings of yesterday that the committee obtained permission to consider Bill No. 298 again at the next sitting of the house.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if you were to try to tell me that we are acting in pursuance of what is on today's order paper, I wish to tell you that I sought with the loudest voice I could possibly muster to rise on a point of order while the Speaker was in the chair to make the point that order No. 2 on today's order paper is there illegally, but I was denied the right to make that point of order. The Speaker left the chair; but that does not do away with the fact that order No. 2 has no right to be on today's order paper.

We were told earlier in the discussion that the Speaker took the responsibility for putting it there but he did not give anybody a chance to question it at all and it is my submission that it has no right to be there.

Do not let the government say there is nothing the government could do about it, if they accept my contention that Bill No. 298 died at ten o'clock last night, because citation 695 of Beauchesne's third edition indicates certain other ways in which a bill that has been considered in committee can die. These other ways are if a motion is put that the chairman do now leave the chair or if the committee rises for want of a quorum. In both of these cases a bill that a committee has been considering dies. Citation 695 makes it clear that a bill which has died in one of those ways, or in any other way, can be revived by an order of the house.

I am not attempting to say to the government that the death of Bill No. 298 last night is irrevocable and that there is nothing they can do to resuscitate it; they can, but it requires an order of the house to do it and this government which does not seem to care very much for rules has not taken the trouble to present a motion for an order of the house to revive Bill No. 298.

Mr. Chairman, because of your own failure—true, ten o'clock came round—but because of your own failure to get from the committee a motion that you rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again, you know that you cannot sit there now on Bill No. 298. This has nothing to do with looking back to what Mr. Speaker did, whether it was putting order No. 2 on the order paper or concerning his performance or lack of performance in the chair today. I am concerned about your responsibility as chairman of the committee of the whole.

You know, and you have not a chance in the world of trying to tell me that what I am saying is not true, that you did not get permission from the house yesterday to re-open this discussion today. You did not ask the committee. True, you did not know that time would run out and that you would not get the chance to do so, but we cannot help that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: The fact of the matter is that ten o'clock came without that permission having been obtained and therefore if there is any semblance left of concern for the rules of the house the only way Bill No. 298 can be revised in the committee of the whole house is for an order of the house to be made.

For that reason, Mr. Chairman, I contend that everything that has taken place in this committee since Your Honour illegally took the chair is out of order including in particular the vote which you declared carried with respect to the Prime Minister's motion.

I do not want to confuse the point of order. At the moment I am sticking to my point that this committee is illegally sitting but I will add as a sideline that I think Your Honour was unfair when you refused to hear the point of order from me when you took the chair today. It is perfectly right that certain questions of privilege and arguments about the Prime Minister's motion might not have been in order but I contend that my attempt to rise on a point of order the moment you took the chair today was just as proper as was the attempt of several of us to rise on the point of order yesterday to which the Prime Minister spoke. But no, today you arbitrarily said that you had nothing to do at that time but to put the question on this matter while several of us were on our feet trying to raise a point of order. I was one of those and the point of order I was trying to raise at that time is the same point I tried to raise when the Speaker was in the chair, and it is the point I raise now that you, sir, did not get the permission of the house last night to resume on Bill No. 298 today. Therefore, Bill No. 298 died last night and the sitting of this committee now is a nullity, is illegal, and I insist that you consider the point and rule on it.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, my point is rather different; I think you had better rule on this one. I will defer mine which is quite different.

The Deputy Chairman: As I understand it the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has raised two distinct points; one, that the question was improperly put and the other which he raised is that I am improperly here, or to make it less personal, the committee is improperly constituted.

In his argument in support of his contention that the committee is improperly constituted I think it is fair to say—and I would ask the hon. member to interrupt me if I misinterpret him but not if I do not—that what the hon. member is saying in effect is that government order No. 2, I think it is, is improperly on the order paper for the orders of the day, that it should not have appeared there because, according to the hon. gentleman's line of argument, it died for lack of continuance at the end of yesterday's session.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, just so we can be clear that we are talking about the same thing, and in response to your invitation, I recognize that an attempt to ask you to rule on what is on the order paper of the house might lead you to say that is a point to be raised in the house, as I have indicated I sought to do.

I recognize that the only point you can rule on must relate to your actions. It is my contention that by your failure yesterday to get permission to sit again today, you in your capacity are now sitting in the chair improperly.

The Deputy Chairman: In other words, the hon. member is not asking me to rule upon something which if it is valid should have been raised with the Speaker in the chair, and the existence or non-existence on the order paper of this government order No. 2 is a matter which I consider is something to be raised wholly with the Speaker in the chair. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has suggested that I can go further, and on a point of order, not on the clause which happens to be before us, but on the existence of this committee, that I can rule—I know I am taking liberties with his words but I am not meaning it to sound that way—that I inadvertently closed out this committee yesterday by vacating the chair without asking leave to sit again.

There are more occasions than one when the committee rises suddenly and without notice; the best one I know of—I have the citations before me—I think it would be familiar to hon. members—is when a message is received from the Senate that His Excellency desires the attendance of this house in the Senate. We go over. The committee rises and the Speaker, if I remember rightly, just takes the chair without any formal proceedings at all. Standing order 7 reads:

> At the ordinary time of adjournment of the house, unless otherwise provided, the proceedings shall be interrupted and the business under consideration at the termination of the sitting shall stand over until the next sitting day when it will be taken up at the same stage where its progress was interrupted.

Of course hon. members will point out that that has always been the case and that despite the existence of that rule, when we leave the chair at the normal closing hour we ask leave to sit again, but, if I may say so, I think there is a difference in the position. I do not expect the hon. member to agree with me, but I do ask him to listen to my line of thought.

When an ordinary appeal is taken from a chairman's ruling under normal circumstances and is heard, voted on and disposed of, that takes about an hour. It is not usual for the chairman who submits that appeal to rise and ask leave to sit again. As a matter of fact, theoretically he has no right to do so. He rises for the purpose of submitting the appeal to Mr. Speaker. In no instance in my recollection has it ever been raised that the chairman was wrongfully back in the chair. The appeal had been disposed of even though he had left the chair and Mr. Speaker had resumed his seat and the mace had been brought up on the table and to all intents and purposes for the time being the proceedings had come to a halt.

He is asking me to rule that because circumstances were such that it took from somewhere like ten minutes past five o'clock last night to ten o'clock to obtain a vote on my disputed ruling that the position is different. I am not imputing motives, I am asking him to look at this position. Let us suppose that a ruling is appealed and that a number of intervening proceedings, questions of privilege and so on, would have the effect of putting that appeal beyond the ten o'clock hour and therefore making it impossible to be heard. I submit, and I base my ruling on this line of thought, that it would be reading a wrongful intention into the rules to read into them that the Chairman can leave the chair, submit a ruling for appeal and return to the committee under certain circumstances validly, and under other circumstances invalidly.

I suggest to the committee that we might have an appeal taken at five minutes to ten o'clock. Is the taking of that appeal going to result in the disappearance of the order? I do not think it is.

I will say quite frankly that the other question raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre causes me more worry because it affects me personally in its application. He has stated that I improperly put the question, that is Mr. St. Laurent's motion, in that I did not hear points of order which one or more members wished to raise at the time when I resumed the chair. For the purpose of this part of my lengthy discourse, for which I apologize, may we assume that I resumed the chair legally. The facts are as the hon. member stated. I was not unaware that one or more members were on their feet desiring to raise either points of order or questions of privilege, which I do not know. I did not hear them; I did not see them, let there be no doubt about that. I knew they were there but I did not officially recognize them. I consider that I was right in my action.

Mr. Fulton: You deliberately ignored them.

The Deputy Chairman: I did not officially recognize them. I consider—

Mr. Fulton: Put it the straight way and say that you deliberately ignored them.

The Deputy Chairman: If the hon. member prefers that expression I will not argue about it.

Mr. Knowles: If the chairman is accepting that as a statement of his position, that he deliberately ignored members, how can we continue on that basis?

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member might perhaps permit me to complete my remarks. There are times in my opinion when the Speaker or the chairman has not a right to recognize a member. The most outstanding of course—hon. members will say that this is going too far—would be when we are halfway down the line on a recorded vote. I do not think any hon. member in the house would feel that he had the right to raise any question after hon. members had started to rise.

In my opinion this is the situation as I see it. I had put to this committee yesterday an undebatable motion. We had discussed at length whether or not it was in order. I heard every member who rose to speak on the question of whether or not it was in order. I ruled that it was and several members did not agree with me and my ruling was appealed. We get back today exactly where we left off.

Mr. Fleming: That is where the error was made.

The Deputy Chairman: I beg your pardon?

Mr. Knowles: This is a new day.

Mr. Fleming: I said no, that is where the fundamental error has been made, before you precipitately put the motion.

The Deputy Chairman: For the purpose of this very point, may we assume that we got back legally. I was in the process of putting the motion and the only point which could be raised before that motion was put was whether or not it was in order. That was debated to the fullest extent that every member of the house wished to participate in the debate. Therefore I was in a position where it was my duty, whether it was my desire or not to put the motion forthwith, and I did.

Mr. Fulton: As I understand it, there are at least two points of order before you, possibly three. I raised one as to your right to be in the chair and I gave notice of appeal from your ruling. Then the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre raised two other points of order. I suggest that, to be in order—I do not know whether or not being in order matters any longer, because the government has given notice that it does not intend to care about the rules anyway—but so that we can salvage something from the wreck it has created of parliament, it might be appropriate if you would deal with these matters at least in an orderly fashion—one, two, three—instead of promoting the snarl-up the government has created.

The Deputy Chairman: Would the hon. member for Kamloops elaborate a little on his point that I am illegally in the chair? I thought that was the same point as the one raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. If it was not, I am afraid I have not caught the difference between the two.

Mr. Fulton: I said you had no right to be in the chair because there was no order of the day read for the house again to go into committee. In the absence of that decision by the house, the house could not go into committee, because the house can only resolve itself into committee on an order read and agreed to in the house. Therefore this committee has no right to sit, because the house has not reached any decision that it should go into committee. When I use the word "decision" I do not mean that a vote has to be put from the Chair, because once that has been carried I believe we all know that it does not require another vote on another day; but it does require the submission of an order to the house, which the house then accepts and acts on. The house has had no opportunity to accept or act on the proposition. I use the word Mr. Speaker used. The "proposition" was never put to the house to go into committee.

That is a different point from the one raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who says that you cannot go into committee because you yourself, by your failure to report last night allowed the bill to die.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, may I say just a word on the point. In answer to your argument against my point that the bill died at ten o'clock last night, it seems to me, if I may say so with respect, that Your Honour has built your case on inadvertence, on the fact that because of what happened after five o'clock there was no opportunity for you to seek such permission. That, Mr. Chairman, is precisely what happens if a committee rises for want of a quorum. It is not of deliberate design; it is a matter of inadvertence; but the fact that something happens inadvertently does not give the committee power to change the rules in the middle of the game.

It seems to me that what we have to abide by is the fact that yesterday's Votes and Proceedings or yesterday's Journals made no reference to the committee rising, reporting progress and asking leave to sit again. Whether that is a separate point of order from the one raised by the hon. member for Kamloops or whether it is another argument in support of his point of order, I leave to you. But at least we are both contending: (a) because there was no order of the day read by the Speaker in the chair, (b) because of your failure, though inadvertently, to get permission yesterday to sit again today, the bill has died. For these reasons I contend that the committee is improperly sitting at this time. If you rule otherwise, I appeal your ruling.

The Deputy Chairman: I think the hon. member for Kamloops figured that he had a priority of appeal.

Mr. Fulton: I am not asserting any priority. I just want to have the matters considered separately. I understood you had ruled on the point of order or on the argument that I had raised. I indicated that I was not satisfied with your ruling. If you wish more time to consider the point of order raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, which I would be prepared to admit is an even stronger argument than the one I raised, sir, by all means I invite you to do so, because I hope that this time there will be shown respect for the rules which are so clearly stated and the precedents so clearly established, and that we shall not have once more to submit a matter to this house, not for the exercise of impartial judgment, but for the execution of a political verdict.

The Deputy Chairman: I do not know whether that is very much to our assistance in arriving at a point of order. I am not going to rule on a matter which I consider can only be raised in the house, as against the committee. I am not going to rule as to whether or not government order No. 2 stands correctly or incorrectly on the order paper.

I am making this assumption—and I do not expect every hon. member to agree with me but I think it has merit—that the fact that we are here indicates that notice of government order No. 2 was and is on the order paper. Whether it was properly or improperly on the order paper—I am sorry—it is not for me to say.

I wonder whether the hon. member for Kamloops would state his point of order. When I ask him to state it briefly, he will realize it is for the benefit of the Clerk, who has to put it in writing.

Mr. Fulton: My point in simple essence is this. The order for committee not having been read and put before the house, the house cannot resolve itself into committee, and therefore the committee cannot sit. Therefore you cannot take the chair, because there can be no committee before the order for the house to resolve itself into committee is read. I am not arguing that that order requires to be submitted for a vote of the house at this stage, because under our rules, once the first motion for the house to go into committee has been voted on and decided, then on successive days, provided the committee is still alive—and there I protect the point of order of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—then on successive days, when the order is read, the house goes into committee without question put, but it still requires the order to be read, and the house adopts that order without vote. Sir, the house cannot cease to sit as a house and start to sit as a committee of the whole in the absence of some order to do so, and no order to do so was read and presented to the house. So the house had no opportunity to adopt it, and it could not cease to sit as a house and sit as a committee. Therefore you cannot take the chair of the committee, because this committee cannot sit. There is a vacuum in our proceedings.

The Deputy Chairman: Surely that is just the point I am trying to make, that I am being asked to rule now on the validity of a proceeding when Mr. Speaker was in the chair, as a result of which at least one recorded vote was held in the house. I am referring to the vote on the appeal from the chairman's ruling. If I, as chairman of a committee, were to presume to rule in accordance with the submission of the hon. member for Kamloops, I would be ruling that the question of my appeal had been improperly submitted to the house earlier today.

Mr. Fulton: No.

The Deputy Chairman: I would ask the hon. member for Kamloops how that question could have been submitted if we had not reached order No. 2.

Mr. Fulton: We reached it but it was not read. Let me ask you, since you say you cannot look behind to see what happened in the house, then do what any other chairman may be asked to do at any time as I understand it, and that is to read your order of reference for today's sittings in committee. You will find that there is no order of reference because the house did not adopt one and there will not be any on the journals in front of you because the clerk cannot have written it down that the order to resolve into committee was read. Therefore we have no order of reference for today's sitting of this committee, and I say that you may search and search in vain but you will not find any order of reference there under which you are now sitting as Chairman in this committee.

Mr. Rowe: The Minister of National Revenue gave you one. Read it.

Mr. Knowles: On the point of order raised by the hon. member for Kamloops, my hon. friend is quite correct. I realize we have two points of order here and we may reach the point where we will have to have two rulings to decide on what to do with them, but I think the memory of all members, including those on the other side, will confirm that when we finished questions on the orders of the day and it was time for the orders of the day to be read, although the house leader did not indicate what was to be called the clerk assistant got up and started to read order No. 2.

Mr. Harris: May I interrupt just long enough on the point of order to ask this question? Do I ever indicate the order, except perchance where we have run out of business, when I have indicated it the night before?

Mr. Knowles: That is well taken. Shall I say that the Minister of Finance in effect asked for order No. 2 when he said last night that the pipe line would be the business of the house today? All right, let us assume then that the government had asked for order No. 2. The clerk assistant stood up and started to read it. He got out only two or three words when Mr. Speaker rose and said something to the effect that before this is done or on this order I wish to dispose—

Mr. Fleming: Of parliament.

Mr. Knowles: —of the proposition, as we now know it, which he read to the house. I do not wish to bring in the names of any of the people who work for us and I am sure the clerk assistant does not mind my having mentioned the fact that he uttered a couple of words. I endeavoured to ascertain officially where we were at that point and the only answer I could get was that we were at the place that is sometimes indicated in Hansard or in Votes and Proceedings as "on the order" for such and such, in other words, that the discussion of Mr. Speaker's proposition took place on a certain order which had not yet been called. I was expecting that after Mr. Speaker's proposition had been disposed of and after the appeal of Your Honour's ruling had been disposed of the Speaker would then let the clerk assistant stand and read out order No. 2. But no, Mr. Speaker got out of the chair and left the chamber, and order No. 2 has not been read yet.

Therefore it seems to me that the point raised by the hon. member for Kamloops is a valid one, and in order to get this matter sorted out I think we had perhaps better separate it into two points. You had better rule first on the point raised by the hon. member for Kamloops and after that has been disposed of I will ask you to rule on my point that we are not properly in committee because you yourself did not get permission yesterday to sit again on Bill No. 298.

The Deputy Chairman: I should like to accept the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that we try to stick to one point. The report is not completed yet but I ask the hon. member for Kamloops if this is a fair statement of the point of order he raised.

Mr. Fulton raised a point of order to the effect that the chairman was improperly in the chair since the order of the day for the house to go into committee on the said bill had not been read when Mr. Speaker was in the chair.

Mr. Fulton: I think that would be a fair statement of the point. I would perhaps prefer it to include more of the argument—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fulton: —but as a bare statement of the point of order I think it is correct. May I, by way of one more argument, suggest this to you? Speaking from memory, it is my recollection that the words that should be recorded on the journals, by the authority of which alone you and this committee can sit, are these: "And the order of the day being read for the house to resolve itself again into committee, Mr. Speaker left the chair without question put and the house then proceeded in committee with the further consideration ...."

That is how it should appear in the journals kept before you by the clerk. It should be: "And the order of the day being read for the house to resolve itself again into committee of the whole, Mr. Speaker left the chair without question put", etc. It is only when that has taken place and when you have that before you as your authority to sit in committee of the whole that you can sit, and therefore the order of the day not having been read I say that you will search in vain for the order of reference to the committee for this day's proceedings at this stage.

The Deputy Chairman: For the information of the hon. member for Kamloops, I propose to add the following to what I previously read to him:

The chairman ruled that he was not in a position to rule upon the regularity of any proceeding which took place when Mr. Speaker was in the chair.

From which Mr. Fulton appeals?

Mr. Fulton: May I say I have not asked you to rule on the regularity of what took place when the Speaker was in the chair. I have asked you to rule whether you have any authority to sit here as chairman of the committee. Have you any terms of reference? Can you find any terms of reference or authority for today's sitting? I am not asking you to rule on what happened when Mr. Speaker was in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: I must have my reasons for making my ruling as well as the hon. member for making his appeal. I consulted him as to the wording of the report on the point of order which he raised, and that is my reason for not making a ruling. I may be wrong and the hon. member will no doubt appeal, but I regard it as requiring me to rule upon something which took place—

Mr. Coldwell: If you feel that you may be wrong then rule in line with British tradition and give the benefit of the doubt to the minority.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Coldwell: You have got the rights with your majority. You can do everything that you wish.

Mr. Rowe: You fellows would not understand.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Kamloops—well, I thought the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was addressing the Chair.

Mr. Coldwell: Somebody was addressing me from the other side and I was replying.

The Deputy Chairman: We are having a little difficulty reducing the report to writing. We seem to have too many drafts. I will read what I have here.

Mr. Fulton raised a point of order to the effect that the chairman was improperly in the chair since the order of the day for the house to go into committee on the said bill had not been read when Mr. Speaker was in the chair; and further, that only when the order of the day for the house to go into committee of the whole is read can the committee of the whole be resumed. The chairman ruled that he was not in a position to rule upon the regularity of any proceedings which took place when Mr. Speaker was in the chair.

Mr. Fulton: Would you care to add one phrase—

Some hon. Members: No.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Fulton: —as to the point on which I asked you to rule, to the effect that in addition there is no order of reference or authority for this sitting of the committee.

The Deputy Chairman: Have we not got that clear? Is it not covered by the words, "and further, that only when the order of the day for the house to go into committee of the whole is read can the committee of the whole be resumed"?

Mr. Fulton: Oh well, it will not make any difference to the vote anyway.

The Deputy Chairman: From which Mr. Fulton appeals.

Mr. Speaker resumed the chair, and the chairman of the committee made the following report:

In committee of the whole, when it was considering clause 4 of Bill No. 298, an act to establish the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation,

[The Deputy Chairman.]

Mr. Fulton raised a point of order to the effect that the chairman was improperly in the chair since the order of the day for the house to go into committee on the said bill had not been read when Mr. Speaker was in the chair; and further, it is only when an order of the day for the house to go into committee of the whole is read that the committee of the whole can be resumed. I ruled that I was not in a position to rule upon the regularity of any proceeding which took place when Mr. Speaker was in the chair. From that decision Mr. Fulton appealed.

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows:

In committee of the whole, when it was considering clause 4 Mr. Applewhaite reports that Mr. Fulton raised a point of order to the effect that the chairman was improperly in the chair since the order of the day for the house to go into committee on the said bill had not been read when Mr. Speaker was in the chair; and further that only when an order of the day for the house to go into committee of the whole is read can the committee of the whole be resumed. The chairman ruled that he was not in a position to rule upon the regularity of any proceeding which took place when Mr. Speaker was in the chair.

Whereupon Mr. Fulton appealed to the house from the ruling of the Chair.

The house divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the chairman be confirmed? And the ruling was confirmed on the following division:

Mr. Martin: I was paired. Had I voted, I would have voted in favour of the chairman's ruling.

And the house having resumed in committee:

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I think it is not necessary for me to repeat my argument and my submission which I made to you earlier, but it is my view that this committee is improperly sitting because you, sir, did not obtain yesterday permission to sit again on Bill No. 298.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman, may I be allowed to say a word? The chairman is continually sitting and, in the first place, he got that permission.

Mr. Rowe: When did you give it to him, Dan?

Mr. Knowles: May I have your ruling, sir, rather than that of my friend the hon. member for Fort William?

The Deputy Chairman: Once again I would ask the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to listen to me and to interrupt me if I am wrong, but not otherwise. He is making the point that the chairman at the moment has no right to occupy the chair of this committee because when we left this committee yesterday permission to sit again was not asked for and obtained.

Mr. Knowles: That is correct.

The Deputy Chairman: My ruling, of course, is that I am legally here and that the committee is legally constituted because I feel the interpretation which the hon. member places upon the rules and the procedure of this house would of necessity result in absurdity at times and I would not take the responsibility of so ruling. However, I am not putting it at that length in the written report.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, because I believe the Votes and Proceedings or Journals make it clear that no such permission was obtained yesterday and because on that basis I feel Bill No. 298 died at ten o'clock last night I appeal your ruling.

The Deputy Chairman: For the information of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I propose to report that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre raised the point of order that the committee was improperly constituted since the chairman at Thursday's sitting failed to obtain leave to sit again and the chairman ruled that the point of order was not well taken.

Mr. Speaker resumed the chair, and the chairman of the committee made the following report:

When in committee of the whole on clause 4 of Bill No. 298, an act to establish the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation, Mr. Knowles raised a point of order that the committee was improperly sitting since the chairman at Thursday's sitting failed to obtain leave to sit again. I ruled that the point of order was not well taken, whereupon Mr. Knowles appealed to the house from the ruling of the chairman.

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows:

Mr. Applewhaite reports that when in committee of the whole on clause 4 of Bill No. 298, an act to establish the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation, Mr. Knowles raised a point of order that the committee was improperly sitting since the chairman at Thursday's sitting failed to obtain leave to sit again. The chairman ruled that the point of order was not well taken, whereupon Mr. Knowles appealed to the house from the ruling of the chairman.

Those who are in favour of sustaining the chairman's ruling will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those who are opposed to sustaining the chairman's ruling will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The house divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the chairman be confirmed? And the ruling was confirmed on the following division:

And the house having resumed in committee:

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, the two points of order which have been raised already in the committee relate to the whole proceedings of the committee and your right to preside in the committee and the right of the committee to sit as a committee of the whole. The point I should like to raise now is that the business which has thus far come before the committee, which you purported to deal with from the chair, is a nullity.

I base this upon two aspects of the motion which you put so precipitately this afternoon, denying at the time the right of hon. members who were on their feet to address you on important points of order and questions of privilege. My point concerns both the motion itself and the notice which preceded it. The terms of the motion are found at page 4498 of yesterday's Hansard. This is the motion of the Prime Minister:

> That at this sitting of the committee of the whole house on bill 298, an act to establish the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation, the further consideration of clauses 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, the title of the said bill and any amendments proposed thereto, shall be the first business of this committee and shall not further be postponed.

I draw your attention, sir, to the words, "at this sitting." The sitting to which those words had reference was clearly the sitting of May 31 and not the sitting of Friday, June 1. For that reason, sir, as well as for other reasons that I shall now lay before you, now that you are hearing points of order after your refusal to hear points of order at the time when they would have been significant, I am submitting to you that the motion is abortive and the proceedings that you have attempted to preside at this afternoon in this committee of the whole are abortive and a nullity. If the rules mean anything any more—

Mr. Knowles: They don't.

Mr. Fleming:—and it is doubtful if anything remains of them after today but the merest shreds and tatters—standing order 33 provides, or did provide formerly, as follows:

> Immediately before the order of the day for resuming an adjourned debate is called, or if the house be in committee of the whole, or of supply, or of ways and means, any Minister of the Crown who, standing in his place, shall have given notice at a previous sitting of his intention so to do, may move that the debate shall not be further adjourned, or that the further consideration of any resolution or resolutions, clause or clauses, section or sections, preamble or preambles, title or titles, shall be the first business of the committee, and shall not further be postponed; and in either case such question shall be decided without debate or amendment; and if the same shall be resolved in the affirmative, no member shall thereafter speak more than once, or longer than 20 minutes in any such adjourned debate; or, if in committee, on any such resolution, clause, section, preamble or title; and if such adjourned debate or postponed consideration shall not have been resumed or concluded before one o'clock in the morning, no member shall rise to speak after that hour, but all such questions as must be decided in order to conclude such adjourned debate or postponed consideration, shall be decided forthwith.

Let me boil down the language of that lengthy rule so as to confine the statement of it to the points that are strictly relevant to the point now raised in committee of the whole. The words, I think, remaining, would be these:

> Immediately . . . in committee of the whole . . . any Minister of the Crown who, standing in his place, shall have given notice at a previous sitting of his intention so to do, may move . . .

—a motion concerning the postponement of consideration of any clause. I would like to be able to argue the question, but I take it that it is useless here arguing a question which was raised yesterday, in regard to the application of rule 33 to the kind of motion that the Prime Minister put forward. Whilst yielding nothing on the point that was raised yesterday by my colleague, the hon. member for Kamloops, I proceed from that point on the assumption that the action taken by the committee, in my opinion quite improperly, on an invalid ruling of your own prevents me from attacking the motion as such. I therefore argue the point now, sir, on the basis that, although such a motion may be in order in proper circumstances, it is not in order today. That is the point that I tried to put before you, when you turned a deaf ear to all such points. I was trying to say to you that, even though the ruling of yesterday, which was purported to be sustained by the Chair today, was a ruling that the motion was in order yesterday, that is not tantamount to its being in order today, because it was a motion relating to yesterday's sitting. It is not and never was a motion relating to today's sitting.

Note that language of rule 33. Notice that may be given by a minister of the Crown is notice given at a previous sitting of his intention to move. I take it that it is arguable, in view of the word "a" before "previous sitting", that it is not strictly necessary that the minister of the Crown giving his notice of his sectional closure should give it for the next day. He could give it for a later date. For instance, when the Prime Minister gave his notice on Wednesday, he might have chosen to give it for Friday instead of Thursday. That might be an arguable point, in view of the word "a" before the words "previous sitting." Whilst that may be an arguable position, sir, I submit to you that, if the notice is given for the next sitting of the house and if the motion is moved at that next sitting, its effect is immediate as to that particular day. In that respect it is different from other motions. This is a particular type of motion.

Rule 33 is the only code in the standing orders attempting to deal with the procedure on closure motions. We have a situation, undoubtedly, which is unprecedented, and in that unprecedented situation I say to you that to permit this motion to be put today means a wrenching of the provisions of standing order 33 out of all possible recognition.

If that motion had been resolved in the affirmative yesterday, its effects would be immediate as to yesterday. Immediately on its being passed, all speeches would be confined to 20 minutes, and the questions before the house would have to be resolved at one o'clock a.m. following. The effects of such a motion cannot be postponed. Standing order 33 deals in terms only with the case where the motion is resolved affirmatively. There is a hiatus in this rule as to a situation, such as developed here last night, where the motion was not disposed of. In that unprecedented situation, sir, there being nothing in rule 33 to preserve the effect of the notice or to preserve life in that motion so that it should have some life beyond yesterday, I say to you that that motion perished at ten o'clock last night and nothing that has been done since could revive that motion. Indeed, nothing that could have been done yesterday or that might have been done yesterday could have given that motion life beyond ten o'clock last night if it had not been affirmatively decided prior to ten o'clock last night.

Let us look now, sir, at the effect of the notice because rule 33 attaches very great importance to the notice given. Indeed, the rules of this house place the highest importance upon notice of all motions requiring notice, and we have had many examples, some of them in quite recent days, where the chair has ruled on the importance of notice. Rule 33 is extremely important in its provisions with regard to the giving of notice. What was the notice under which the committee was proceeding to deal with this motion yesterday? It was the notice given by the Prime Minister the day before, May 30, and that notice is to be found at page 4465 of Hansard of that date in the first column. You will not find this notice in Votes and Proceedings or in Routine Proceedings and Orders of the Day. Hansard is the only record of the notice given by the Prime Minister of the motion. After making that bogus offer designed to bring the opposition into line, to submit to the steamroller, he proceeded with these words:

> Meanwhile, I have no choice, if the deadline which the government faces is to be met, but to give notice and I hereby do give notice pursuant to standing order 33 that at the next sitting of this committee—

Note, Mr. Chairman, the words "the next sitting".

> —of the whole house on Bill No. 298, an act to establish the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation, I will move that the further consideration of clauses 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, the title of the said bill and any amendments proposed thereto, shall be the first business of the said committee and shall not further be postponed.

Note, sir, that the notice given by the Prime Minister was a notice that at the next sitting of the house he would submit this motion. The next sitting of the house was the sitting on May 31. It was not and is not the sitting of June 1, and there can be no doubt about that in view of the terms of the motion itself when the Prime Minister followed up his notice by motion yesterday "at this sitting", namely, the sitting of May 31.

This was a motion, sir, for a day certain. It is not one of those general motions preceded by a general notice. It was a notice for a day certain of this particularly objectionable type of motion. If the motion was in order then the notice was correct in form for a motion to be submitted yesterday. The motion was moved in compliance with that notice so far as the notice was correct. Therefore, sir, the notice served its purpose and, indeed, its complete purpose. When the Prime Minister rose in his place yesterday and moved that motion the effect of the notice at that moment became completely spent. The notice was at that moment functus.

The requirement of the rule in regard to the notice had been satisfied at that moment if the motion was in order, and the motion having been moved nothing then remained of the notice. The notice had served its purpose. It had become spent. It became spent when the Prime Minister offered his motion. Therefore, sir, it cannot be relied upon as a basis for any other motion, so you see that if the Prime Minister had moved today a motion similar to the one he moved yesterday and had attempted to justify such a motion, so far as notice was concerned, by relying upon the notice he gave the committee of the whole on May 30 it would have been an invalid notice because that notice no longer existed. Its effect was fully spent. And, sir, a motion to apply the effect of standing order 33 now in this committee of the whole would require on the part of the Prime Minister today a new notice of motion for a motion to be put at another and later sitting, and the earliest one for which he could give notice today would be the sitting on Monday next.

Now, sir, had the Speaker been in the chair at this moment, when I hoped to raise part of this argument, I would have called to his mind, in the light of his experience at the bar, that the effect of a notice is twofold. Any notice of motion, whether in a chamber like this or in proceedings before some judicial tribunal, is twofold. It is designed to give notice that at a particular time on a particular day and usually at a particular hour a particular proceeding will be launched. The second purpose is to give knowledge of the content or purpose of that particular proceeding. The time that the notice of motion gives knowledge of is just as important as the content of the proceedings or the purpose of the proceeding that is to be launched at the time set forth in the notice of motion, and the purpose of the time element in any notice of motion is just as important as is the element of content.

This is an unprecedented situation, sir, and I say to you that, lacking any precedent, lacking any express provision in standing order 33 to deal with a situation where the motion is not disposed of on the day on which it is moved, you have no right to rule that the motion retains some life, some effect which standing order 33 does not declare it to possess or retain because if you made such a ruling you would be reading into the terms of standing order 33 provisions that are not contained there.

While there is no precedent on this matter, nevertheless there are some precedents in cognate situations that I think ought to be some guide to us. For instance, sir, in Beauchesne, third edition, page 126, citation 315, you will find two short paragraphs of one sentence each which I should like to read to you. It reads:

> A modification of a notice of motion standing upon the notice paper is permitted, if the amended notice does not exceed the scope of the original notice.
> A new notice must be given in the Votes and Proceedings, under standing order 45, when a material change is to be made to a notice of motion before it is taken up by the house.

A material change in this notice of motion would have been a change in the date because the date on which the motion is to be moved is just as important an element in the notice of motion as is the content of the motion that is to be moved. There you have a cognate citation. It is not under standing order 33 but it is a relevant and cognate citation as applied to any change in a notice of motion. It cannot be done without proper notice and there was no notice given here. The reference there is to the Journals of the house, volume 65, pages 200 and 201. I will just touch on that very briefly, sir. It is a ruling on March 26, 1928. The Speaker is dealing with standing order 45 which prescribes 48 hours' notice and he proceeds to say:

> It is true that according to paragraph 363 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, a modification of a notice of motion may be permitted. That paragraph reads as follows: "A modification of a notice of motion standing upon the notice paper is permitted, if the amended notice does not exceed the scope of the original notice". The above reference is taken from May, 13th Edition, page 234, where the following is found: "A modification of a notice of motion standing upon the notice paper is permitted, if the amended notice does not exceed the scope of the original notice". The next sentence however, reads as follows: "If a motion is proposed, which differs materially from the terms of the notice, it can only be made with the consent of the house, or upon a renewal of the notice".

If the consent of the house is unanimous, such a motion may proceed. But failing unanimous consent and failing renewal of the notice, such a motion cannot proceed. I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that a fortiori that rule applies with infinitely greater strength to a motion under standing order 33 than it does to the generality of motions requiring 48 hours' notice under the rules of the house.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Fleming: I note that is the hon. member for Pontiac who likes to talk that way, who always does his talking sitting down.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member's time has expired but I would be grateful if the committee would give unanimous consent for him to give me these other references.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fleming: I shall be brief. That paragraph at page 374 of May under the heading "Renewal of Notices of Motion" reads as follows:

> A notice of motion standing upon the notice paper for the day's sitting, which is not brought on before the adjournment of the house, disappears from the paper, unless the member in whose name the notice stands, or a member in his behalf, gives a direction at the table for the replacement of the notice upon the notice paper for a future day.

That is not a citation, of course, under rule 33 because there is no British counterpart of rule 33. But it emphasizes the importance of maintaining the integrity of that rule with regard to the requirement of notice. Further, at page 377 there is this paragraph under the heading of "Change of Day for a Motion":

> Should a member desire to change the day for which he first gave notice, he must defer the notice to a more distant day, it being irregular to fix an earlier day than that originally chosen; nor can this rule be evaded by changing the motion into an amendment to another question.

This is not a situation where an attempt is made to advance the day on which the motion is returnable according to the notice but it is an attempt to use a notice, returnable yesterday on a motion which was then proceeded with but not disposed of, as though it had some lingering or surviving effect.

The final paragraph is on page 379 under the heading "Change of Terms of Notice of Motion":

> A modification of a notice of motion standing upon the notice paper is permitted, if the amended notice does not exceed the scope of the original notice. If a motion is proposed, which differs materially from the terms of the notice, it can only be made with the consent of the house, or upon a renewal of the notice.

Mr. Chairman, there was here no renewal of the notice. The motion died last night at ten o'clock. Any proceedings in this committee today purporting to be proceedings on the motion moved yesterday by the Prime Minister or any motion purporting to be based upon the notice that the Prime Minister gave in this house on May 30 are a complete nullity.

Then there is the final point, Mr. Chairman, that where, in the absence of express words or a clear citation or the clearest kind of precedent, there is no provision in our rules or in the jurisprudence based upon those rules requiring the chair to rule that this motion has any surviving effect after ten o'clock last night until this day, it is the duty of the chair to give the strictest type of interpretation to any such rule as this, which is a harsh rule in the first place and which derogates from the proper rights of members of a free parliament. Far from this being a rule with which the chair can be fast and loose in its treatment, this is a standing order that requires the most punctilious respect for and the most meticulous adherence to every provision of it. That has not been given, Mr. Chairman. I say to you, on what I conceive to be as important a question of order as is likely to come before this house at any time in its history, that the entire proceedings in this chamber this afternoon in this committee of the whole are abortive; they are a nullity; and the conduct of the chair in arbitrarily refusing to permit even so much as a statement of this important question of order, let alone argument to the chair upon so important a question, makes the proceedings in this committee a travesty of democracy.

It may be late in the day, Mr. Chairman, in view of the action that you have taken in denying to members of this committee their proper rights to raise important questions on the proper interpretation of the orders that govern this house—or which once, I should say, governed it, because we now must speak of the rules in the past tense—but I raise it. This is so important a question that it ought to be raised now. It ought to be raised to the humiliation of this committee of the whole today and to the humiliation of the government on whose shoulders, in the last analysis, rests responsibility for the travesty that has been committed upon parliamentary freedom and the integrity of the Canadian parliament this day. This is a point of order that affects everything that is going to happen in this committee from this point on. While you have gone so far—as far, I suggest, as any chairman can go, in view of your conduct at the opening of the committee today—to prevent a point of such great importance being raised when normally it would be raised and when I sought to raise it, as I had sought in the house to raise it several times already before the Speaker fled from the chair, I ask to raise it now because I say to you that it now being five o'clock—

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Fleming: May I just finish; I was in the last sentence. I submit that this motion died at ten o'clock last night and that it cannot be revived today; and that the attempt to carry the motion this afternoon was a complete failure. At five o'clock this afternoon we proceed to private bills. At six o'clock the house rises. If there is any attempt in this committee to do anything to the contrary I submit that it will be abortive and it will be a nullity.

Mr. Cannon: Mr. Chairman,—

Some hon. Members: Five o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: It is now five o'clock and I am leaving the chair in order that private and public bills may be proceeded with. The committee will resume its deliberations at this stage at six o'clock p.m. or when private and public bills have been disposed of, whichever is the sooner. Meanwhile it will be my duty to inform Mr. Speaker that the matter being considered in committee is under closure.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, that involves a ruling on my point, I take it, and I wish to appeal your ruling.

Some hon. Members: Five o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: At six o'clock the committee will resume.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. Speaker: Order. There are several bills coming up for second reading. They are all divorce bills. Shall we take them one by one?

Mr. Henderson: I would ask that order No. 46, second reading of Bill No. 366, for the relief of Ruth Carol Friedman Allen, be allowed to stand.

Mr. Nicholson: We cannot hear down in this corner.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is asking that item No. 46 be allowed to stand. Shall it stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

SHIRLEY SUSAN MORRIS DUGGAN

Mr. W. J. Henderson (Kingston) moved the second reading of Bill No. 378, for the relief of Muriel Doreen Southall Fisher.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

Mr. Speaker: I see that all these bills are being carried on division without any debate. May I renew my request that perhaps these bills, if it is agreeable, be taken in one motion?

Mr. Nicholson: May I ask whether Bill No. 380 is standing? There is a great deal of evidence in connection with this case and perhaps the hon. member would like this one to stand as well as Bill No. 366? It is a contested case.

Mr. Henderson: Bill No. 366 has already stood, and I concur in the standing of Bill No. 380 at the request of the hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: Therefore, order No. 53 will stand. Is it agreed that order No. 52 and orders Nos. 54 to 60, inclusive, be taken in one motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that these bills be now read a second time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Harris: I do agree, but I would like it understood that I intend to speak on it.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT RESPECTING PAYMENT OF FINES UNDER SUMMARY CONVICTION PROVISIONS

The house resumed, from Friday, April 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Diefenbaker for the second reading of Bill No. 167, to amend the Criminal Code (payment of fines).

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Prince Albert. If he speaks now, he will close the debate.

Mr. Harris: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, as I think my hon. friend knows, the Minister of Justice cannot be here today. Will he permit the discussion to stand, or, if the discussion continues, all I can say is that we want it adjourned so that the minister might speak.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, this bill was introduced here some weeks ago, and the debate is one that I would like to bring to a conclusion.

Mr. Harris: Go ahead.

Mr. Diefenbaker: For that reason I wish to proceed. A member supporting the government has already spoken on the subject. I would like to conclude this matter at this time.

Mr. Speaker: Well, if no other hon. member wishes to speak, the hon. member for Prince Albert will now close the debate.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, this matter was before the house on April 20, at which time I discussed the situation at some length. I was followed by the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden) and the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. Enfield).

This bill has to do with the removal of one of those anomalous things that through the years have been on the statute books of our country and to a very large degree have made their contribution to our jail population. The amendment, if I might just refer to it in general terms, sir, suggested by myself, provides that where a fine or a pecuniary penalty or a sum of money is adjudged to be paid, before a warrant committing any person for failure to pay the fine is made, the court which passed the sentence must be satisfied that the individual in question is possessed of sufficient means to enable him to pay the fine forthwith; or, unless no request for time is granted; or, finally, unless the court for any other reason expressly desires that no time shall be allowed.

In other words, it does not in any way encourage the commission of crime on the part of those who because of their financial position would be unable to pay a fine should they be convicted of an offence. It is no encouragement to anyone to commit a crime because there is a section under the amendment that I bring before this house whereby a magistrate may in proper cases deny to the individual convicted an opportunity of paying his fine or an extension of the time in which to pay the fine.

Over and over again in my own experience in the courts, and I am sure in the experience of hon. members of this house who are not members of the legal profession, I have seen men and women whose only offence was one that should have been subject to a fine and because of their inability to pay the fine they were placed under the stigma of imprisonment.

The amendment I suggest is nothing new under the British system of the administration of justice. I drafted the amendment I have placed before the house in almost identical terms with that which was introduced in Britain in 1914 in the month of August. It was supported at that time, as many members know, by such outstanding members of the British House of Commons as Sir William Anson, one of the most renowned names in the history of British jurisprudence; Samuel Hoare, afterwards one of the ministers of the cabinet; Joynson-Hicks, who later became a cabinet minister; Robert Harcourt; Hamer Greenwood, that great Canadian whose birthplace was Whitby, Ontario; Sir John Simon, afterwards a Lord High Chancellor; Sir Stanley Buckmaster, afterwards a Lord High Chancellor; Augustine Birrell, later a prime minister; H. H. Asquith, also a prime minister; Stanley Baldwin and Ramsay MacDonald, both of whom in subsequent years became prime ministers of Great Britain. In other words, the amendment I suggest was introduced and passed in the British parliament more than 43 years ago and it had the result of reducing the jail population of Britain by approximately 80,000 a year. I am sure there is no one today who suggests that because a person is unable to pay a fine there can be any justice in imprisoning that person without giving him an opportunity of paying that fine by an extension of time or by instalment payments and thereby discharging his debt to society. There is gross unfairness, when a fine is a suitable and proper punishment, that a person who through no fault of his own finds himself unable to pay the fine should be stigmatized while on the other hand a person with adequate resources and an income sufficient to meet the immediate fine that is imposed is thereby protected from imprisonment.

I was unable to secure statistics from the various provinces in Canada in order to place them definitely before the house; but, as I stated in introducing this measure, with the exception of the provinces of Quebec and Ontario no provinces have kept any records. The best estimate I can make on the basis of the statistics I have is that each year in Canada 35,000 or 40,000 Canadians are in prison not because the offences they committed deserve jail but simply because they have been fined and have been unable to pay the fine.

As the law is at the present time, magistrates have the right if they so choose to grant an extension of time for payment. Because this is not obligatory it means that those magistrates who by reason of their own humanity desire to assure a larger measure of justice than some who have not that same degree of humanity find themselves subject to criticism when they do grant time in the jurisdiction under which they operate. In granting time they increase the degree of administrative work that otherwise is entirely removed by the simple expedient of saying that the fine is so much and the alternative is so many days, weeks or months in jail and unless payment is made forthwith a warrant of commitment is issued and the person is immediately incarcerated in jail.

To send people to jail because of their poverty is not only detrimental to the citizenship of the individual so stigmatized but it also adds immeasurably to the cost of keeping prisoners in jail which by the adoption of an amendment such as I suggest would be almost completely removed. It can be done with justice because the discretion still remains with the magistrate, after making an investigation, to decide that because of the seriousness of the offence a prison sentence is justified or because in his opinion the person, while pretending poverty, would be able to pay the fine if he chose to do so. The magistrate may then simply endorse a warrant of commitment indicating his reason why the individual in question is not permitted to pay the fine by instalments.

The amendment I suggest is supported by Chief Justice McRuer of the Supreme Court of Ontario, who on more than one occasion has pointed out the injustice that is being done today.

I maintain, sir, that the maintenance of this section of the criminal code in its present form is a denial of the advances that have been made in criminology in the last 40 years. It is a denial of simple justice. It makes justice a matter of the possession of dollars and cents. It makes imprisonment the alternative for failure to pay to the individual who is poor. It denies equality because the person who is able to pay escapes imprisonment but the person who is unable to pay is branded for the rest of his life as one unworthy to be considered a good citizen because of the imprisonment he has suffered.

One of the things that above everything else we endeavour to maintain today in our system of democracy is equality as between citizens. Democracy cannot live when a shameless sham is made of rules of conduct or when the law ceases to deal equally as between individuals. Above everything else the essence of democracy depends on the equality of the individual, whatever his station in life and whatever his financial condition may be. It depends as well on the equality of the individual's rights whether that individual belongs to a majority or a minority. It cannot survive when minorities are coerced by perversions or distortions or deliberate evasions of the principle of equality of all under the law.

Generally speaking, this amendment has received the support of the press in all parts of Canada. In almost every case the attitude has been that this is a reform which is long overdue. The general summary of views is expressed in an editorial in the Edmonton Journal of April 24. I shall read only the portions that deal with the situation in question. After a very generous reference to myself in regard to my zeal for legal reform and the protection of civil liberties, it goes on to say:

> He showed this again last week by introducing an amendment to the Criminal Code to eliminate, or at least largely reduce, imprisonment for non-payment of fines.
> This is certainly one of the outstanding abuses of the present administration of justice. In all too many police courts across Canada, the conviction of a defendant on a minor charge is automatically followed by the imposition of a fine with imprisonment as an alternative—the traditional "thirty dollars or thirty days". If the accused has the money to pay the fine immediately, he walks out a free man. If he hasn't the money he goes to jail—which involves not only loss of liberty for a month or more, but social disgrace and often loss of employment. This system is thoroughly bad and indefensible. It not only works great hardship on individuals who have been guilty only of petty offences; it also sets up a different scale of punishments for those who have money and those who have not—a thing wholly contrary to sound ideas of justice.

And again:

> As far as it goes, however, Mr. Diefenbaker's amendment is a marked improvement on current practice. It should remove a serious source of injustice and inequality from our criminal laws, and also greatly reduce the number of men and women imprisoned for trivial breaches of law. It is to be hoped that the government will not obstruct its passage.

This is a reform which has been asked for by bar associations across Canada over the years. It has been asked for by John Howard societies. It represents an advance which Great Britain has found during the past 42 years to work successfully. In submitting this amendment to the house I ask the government to remove the whip and allow this matter to be considered, on the basis of a reform, by each individual personally. It represents a serious endeavour to assure and maintain equality of justice within our country and to remove one of the most serious anomalies in the criminal law as it is now administered.

It will pay dividends in good citizenship for it will assure that in the years ahead those who otherwise would be penalized because of imprisonment and who later on in life might desire to secure positions requiring bonds and the like would not find themselves denied those desires by the fact that some petty offence had been committed at some time in their lives for which a fine under the law was sufficient and for which a fine in the opinion of the magistrate would meet the ends of justice. It would also pay dividends to the Canadian people as a whole by reducing the numbers of those in Canadian jails, which numbers are as high as if not higher than those of any nation among the free nations.

You and I must consider that every year 100,000 Canadians go to jail, a considerable percentage because of their inability to pay a fine. We must realize that something should be done to remove from Canada's name a record which is unenviable and which is certainly not justified on the basis of modern criminology. It is not as though I were bringing to this house something that has not been tried. I bring to this house an amendment which has behind it more than 40 years' experience of trial experiment in Great Britain. It has been found to be successful; it has brought about an amelioration of conditions in Great Britain in a penological way. It has reduced the number of Englishmen, Scotsmen and Irishmen who find themselves at some time or another in jail. It has done something more; it has reduced the numbers in penal institutions of those who later in life under our system, because they have had a previous jail sentence, are often denied that consideration to which they should be entitled on the commission of a latter offence.

I commend this amendment to the attention of the house, not only in the interests of the individual who is unable to pay a fine but also in the wider sense of its contribution to better Canadian citizenship and its contribution toward the raising of our penological standards and the emptying of our jails of many who should not be there.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On a question of privilege, I would be happy to proceed with this bill but the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) has the adjournment and I am prepared to leave it up to him.

Mr. Gregg: Stand.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that this debate be allowed to stand?

On the order:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. Castleden for the second reading of Bill No. 350, an act to amend the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act.

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, I too should like to have the debate on second reading of this bill continued. However, I believe the debate was adjourned by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson). I understand that the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act is administered by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris). If he would care to carry on, I should very much like to see the debate continue and the bill given second reading, if possible.

Mr. Harris: On a point of order, I would be glad to do that but, frankly, the Minister of Justice had the carriage of the matter in the house and, as the hon. member knows, the Minister of Justice is in the hospital at the moment. I will not hold up the hon. member and if by the next time the bill is called the Minister of Justice is not available I will be prepared to speak.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am hesitating only because I wonder whether the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Carter) wishes to continue his speech or whether I may speak now and close the debate.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo continuing his speech?

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): I move that the debate be adjourned, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: That is really not speaking to the motion very long, but nevertheless—

Mr. Knowles: He might have said a sentence or two before he did that.

Mr. Speaker: Yes. Is it the pleasure of the house that this debate be adjourned?

Mr. Knowles: On division.

Motion agreed to on division.

NORTHERN ONTARIO PIPE LINE CORPORATION

CONSTITUTION OF CROWN COMPANY TO CONSTRUCT PIPE LINE, MAKE SHORT-TERM LOANS, ETC.

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 298, to establish the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation —Mr. Howe (Port Arthur)—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 4—Body corporate.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine.

Mr. Cannon: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Churchill: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, are you going to give a ruling with regard to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Eglinton?

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine is speaking on the same point of order as was raised by the hon. member for Eglinton.

Mr. Cannon: That is it, Mr. Chairman. I listened with care to the arguments that were developed by the hon. member for Eglinton on the point of order that he raised. I took note of his learned dissertation on notice and the objects of notice, which I found rather elementary. I also noticed his snide and unpleasant remarks towards you, Mr. Chairman, about which I shall have a few words to say, and I also noted his references to making a farce of parliamentary procedure.

His argument on the point of order itself left aside the most important thing that he should have discussed, and that, Mr. Chairman, was the matter that was placed before the house by Mr. Speaker this afternoon, and it was in these words:

> That in neglecting to submit at once to the house, yesterday, the report of the chairman of committees on an appeal from his ruling by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I made a serious mistake, that the house should not suffer any prejudice or detriment on my account and that the house, which is master of its own procedure, should be placed immediately in the same position as it was when I resumed the chair yesterday to submit the chairman's report to the house. This action I submit to the judgment of the house.

The house voted on that, Mr. Chairman; and you will remember—and I am sure the public will take notice of it—that the vote on that was unanimous. There was a unanimous vote in the house, 142 to 0.

Mr. Nicholson: What is the motion again?

Mr. Cannon: I just read it to you.

Mr. Knowles: There was no motion.

Mr. Cannon: I said the matter that was submitted to the house.

Mr. Nicholson: You cannot vote on a matter.

Mr. Cannon: I have read the matter that was submitted to the house.

Mr. Nicholson: You cannot vote on a matter.

Mr. Cannon: I shall now say a few words on that text. The important words there are:

> . . . that the house, which is master of its own procedure, should be placed immediately in the same position as it was when I resumed the chair yesterday to submit the chairman's report to the house.

At that time we were going to take a vote. We had been sitting in committee of the whole. We were proceeding in the committee and objection had been taken to a motion made by the Prime Minister. You, Mr. Chairman, gave your ruling on the objection. Your ruling was appealed to the house by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, if my memory is correct.

Mr. Knowles: Correct.

Mr. Cannon: And the Speaker was on the point of putting the question to the house but another matter intervened. If the question had been put to the house at that time, what would have happened? The matter would have automatically been referred back to the committee. The incident that consisted in your ruling and the appeal from your ruling came to an end and the matter that was being studied by the committee at that time—that is Bill No. 298—would have reverted automatically to the committee. I submit that the result of this vote of the house—which once again was a unanimous vote—was that after the vote took place this afternoon the same thing happened as would have happened if the vote had taken place yesterday.

Mr. Knowles: The majority is ruling that today is yesterday.

Mr. Cannon: The judgment of the house reads:

> . . . that the house . . . should be placed immediately in the same position as it was when I resumed the chair yesterday to submit the chairman's report to the house.

Mr. Nicholson: What a silly statement.

Mr. Cannon: The house being placed immediately in the same position as it was yesterday, I say that automatically after the vote took place this afternoon that should have taken place yesterday, the matter that was being considered by the house yesterday before this incident intervened was referred to the house again and the house therefore was in possession of the discussion of that Bill No. 298 in committee.

Mr. Knowles: I suppose that makes today Thursday and tomorrow Friday, because of a majority vote.

Mr. Cannon: I have just explained to the hon. member that the result of the unanimous vote of the house was to put us in the same position as we would have been yesterday if the vote had taken place yesterday. That is clear. If the hon. member does not understand English or—I should say "if he does not understand this English,"—he can get a copy of the decision of the house or I can send this one over to him and he can read it. I say that is a most important point, Mr. Chairman, and that it was not covered by the hon. member for Eglinton in his argument. I draw the conclusion, Mr. Chairman, that on that point alone it is your duty to rule that the point of order of the hon. member for Eglinton is out of order and that you are properly in the chair and are presiding over the committee here today in a legal manner.

While I am on my feet I should like to say a few words about other matters that were referred to by the hon. member for Eglinton. First of all, I should like to refer to the way in which he made snide remarks and unpleasant insinuations about the way in which you have been carrying on your duties. I think that I will be expressing the opinion of all the well-meaning and clear-thinking members of this house when I say that the members of this house greatly appreciate the work that is done by Mr. Speaker, Mr. Deputy Speaker and chairman of committees and the deputy chairman.

An hon. Member: You should.

Mr. Cannon: We all know that it is difficult and unpleasant work to do. It is particularly unpleasant when systematic obstruction is engaged in by members of the opposition. As was said by somebody previously in this debate—I think it was by Mr. Speaker—it is not only the duty of the Speaker to protect the minority against the majority but also to protect the majority against organized obstruction by the minority. While I am talking about the way some of the members of this house have acted towards the officers of the house—

Mr. Nicholson: Is this a point of order?

Mr. Cannon: I am answering some arguments raised.

Mr. Nicholson: Is it a point of order, though?

Mr. Cannon: On a point of order I am answering arguments brought forward by the hon. member for Eglinton.

Mr. Churchill: On a point of order, may I ask whether this is on a point of order?

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre has raised a point of order that the hon. member who has the floor, namely the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine, is not speaking to the point of order.

Mr. Cannon: If I may say a word—

The Deputy Chairman: I would say that in these circumstances I do not approve the bringing into this debate of the conduct of the Speaker, the chairman of committees and the deputy chairman, even though the remarks might tend to be pleasing to me. However, I think I might point out that in bringing forward his point of order the hon. member for Eglinton made references to the duties of the presiding officers and I think a fair reference to his references is not out of order.

Mr. Castleden: Six o'clock.

Mr. Cannon: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Nicholson: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine has the floor on a point of order.

Mr. Cannon: To continue my remarks, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Nicholson: Six o'clock.

Mr. Cannon: —may I say that the hon. member made attacks on the chair that he should not have made. While I am talking about attacks on the chair I wish to say that the same hon. member for Eglinton did a dastardly, unpleasant and wrong thing when, after doing his best to be put out of this house the other day—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Cannon:—and provoking the chairman into putting him out of the house, having it organized so that he had newspaper photographers with flashlight cameras at the door to take pictures—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I realize, as perhaps no one else does, the heat of this debate; but particularly as, at the moment, the hon. member for Eglinton is not in the house—

Mr. Bell: That does not matter to them.

Mr. Cannon: He should be here.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I think it is my duty to say that the arguments, statements or accusations which may have been made by the hon. member for Eglinton are open to answer but I think personal remarks about him go beyond that.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I wish to say just a few words about the point of order and I hope I shall not stray from that point of order. The hon. gentleman who raised the point of order submitted the terms of the motion of which I gave notice in the house on the 30th and then submitted the terms of the motion that I submitted to the Chair on the 31st. Though he had reservations about the validity of the motion that I was submitting, and though those objections were made the object of points of order that were discussed very learnedly and at considerable length, they were resolved and your decision was upheld by a vote of the house.

Now, the question that the hon. gentleman submits in his point of order is that because the motion was put before the committee yesterday and was not disposed of until today it had no further validity.

Mr. Nicholson: This sitting.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): The hon. gentleman who is interrupting says "this sitting". Well, "this sitting" means the sitting at which the committee makes the decision, and that is the terms of the motion, that at this sitting—

Mr. Nicholson: This sitting of the committee.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): This sitting of the committee.

Mr. Nicholson: Page 4498.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East):

> That at this sitting of the committee of the whole house on Bill No. 298, an act to establish the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation, the further consideration of clauses 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, the title of the said bill, and any amendments proposed thereto, shall be the first business of this committee and shall not further be postponed.

Now, that is the motion that was adopted this afternoon by this committee and the sitting that we are continuing at the present time is this sitting to which the motion applies, and that is because of the general overriding rule that is in standing order 7 that if:

> At the ordinary time of adjournment of the house, unless otherwise provided, the proceedings shall be interrupted and the business under consideration at the termination of the sitting shall stand over until the next sitting day when it will be taken up at the same stage where its progress was interrupted.

Now, there can be no doubt that there was business before the committee that was interrupted at the end of the sitting, and the ordinary time of adjournment having prevented that business from being completed, it was to be taken up at the same stage where its progress had been interrupted. Its progress had been interrupted by an appeal to the house from the ruling you had made in respect of the validity of the motion. That appeal went before the house and was disposed of by the house and the committee resumed and proceeded to take up the business which had been interrupted at the same stage where its progress was interrupted. You took it up at the same stage at which its progress was interrupted and the question you then put to the committee was whether or not the motion:

> That at this sitting of the committee of the whole house on Bill 298, an act to establish the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation, shall be the first business of the committee and shall not further be postponed.

And that was the decision that was made at this sitting and which applies to this sitting, and being applicable to this sitting, I submit to you, sir, that the point of order taken by the hon. member for Eglinton is not well founded, and that the contention that he put before you that any proceedings had today on this motion are a nullity is a contention that is contrary to the action of the house when it voted on the appeal that had been taken from the ruling you made on the validity of that motion. It was a recognition of the application to the proceedings of this general rule, standing order 7, and a proper application.

After all, you know, these rules are not made merely for the purpose of providing dilatory proceedings to prevent the business of the house from being transacted. They are made for the purpose of providing for an orderly conduct and progress of the business of the house.

Mr. Rowe: Hear, hear.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Yes; I think we are all in full agreement on that.

Mr. Rowe: That is what they are meant for, yes.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): That is what they are meant for.

Mr. Rowe: But not abuse.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): And it is certainly not an abuse of the rules of the house to apply standing order 7 to any business that has been interrupted by the arrival of the hour of the ordinary adjournment of the house. The language which was used in this motion is language which applies from the moment the motion was adopted, and it is language which applies to this session of the committee of the whole. We would have preferred to have it adopted yesterday and to have applied to yesterday's sitting as this sitting, but that was not made possible by the proceedings which were had under the rules of the house.

I was not surprised to hear His Honour, the Speaker, submit to the judgment of the house the course of action he proposed to follow, and that was to treat the matter from the point at which it was interrupted by what His Honour said was his mistake that had been made when he took the chair merely for the purpose of putting to the house an appeal that had been urged by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Rule 33 is not a separate rule; it is a part of the general rules which are applicable. It is one which fortunately it is not necessary to resort to very frequently, but when it is necessary to resort to it, it has to be construed according to its terms but in a manner that will allow it to be productive of the effect for which it was designed and for which it was put in the rule book.

Now, everyone knows that with respect to statutes, or anything that has legal significance, it is the language used that governs, and here the language used in this motion that was adopted this afternoon is that the further proceedings at this sitting of the committee will not be further postponed or adjourned. I submit to you, sir, that there having been a decision, confirmed by a vote of the house, the proceedings were still living proceedings designed to produce their effect; that they are producing that effect and that we are now regularly in committee to give further consideration to Bill 298.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman,—

Mr. Cannon: Mr. Chairman, I have not finished my remarks.

The Deputy Chairman: Just before the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre or the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine rises, I know that there is not supposed to be one point of order raised while we are discussing another. The question will be thrown at me at some stage of the game that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and others have already spoken. I think I am justified in making this statement, that there is some discretion allowed to the chair as to the advice he will take on points of order which I do not think can be regarded in quite the same category as debating points. I am not establishing any precedent. I am taking unto myself that right and will hear the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and then the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, my remarks will be very brief on this—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: I support the contention—

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Would the hon. member permit me to apologize to the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine. I thought the hon. member had completed his speech when the chairman ruled that he did not wish to have comments upon the special points that the hon. gentleman was discussing at that moment.

An hon. Member: He had not even got around to the point of order.

Mr. Cannon: You need not apologize, Mr. Prime Minister. I simply sat down because the chairman was on his feet. We on this side of the house believe that is the proper thing to do.

Mr. Rowe: You are getting pretty good about observing the rules now. You have not used them for a week, so you had better start now.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak about the emphasis the Prime Minister laid on the assertion that this sitting is whatever sitting we are in when the decision is reached. He also relied on standing order 7 which indicates that:

> At the ordinary time of adjournment of the house, unless otherwise provided, the proceedings shall be interrupted and the business under consideration at the termination of the sitting shall stand over until the next sitting day when it will be taken up at the same stage where its progress was interrupted.

I wish to draw your attention to another instance where the words "this day's sitting" were used and different treatment was accorded the motion. On that occasion it so happened that the motion was mine and it also happened that the government would have liked to have seen my motion carried. I might also add that my hon. friends to the right did their best to defeat it and in fact they succeeded even though my motion did not come to a vote.

An hon. Member: What a horrible state of affairs.

Mr. Knowles: The occasion was Thursday, December 20, 1951. We were in the midst of a hectic debate on the amendment to the Combines Investigation Act and on that day I moved the following motion which was seconded as a matter of fact, by the hon. member for Peace River. It read:

> That this day's sitting of the house continue without the usual intermission at one o'clock p.m. and at 6.15 o'clock p.m., and that the house shall not be adjourned at ten o'clock p.m. this day.

This reference appears at page 2253 of Hansard.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that motion which referred to this day's sitting was debated all day. There were several amendments made and there were some recorded divisions. In the divisions the Liberals and the Social Crediters supported us and the Conservatives opposed us and at the end of the day the Speaker adjourned the house because it was ten o'clock. The proceedings on that motion were interrupted. Did the house take it up the next day where it was left off?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Knowles: Did standing order 7 apply to that motion? No. It referred to this day; "this day" being Thursday, December 20, 1951. That day was spent so the motion never came up again.

I am just drawing that to your attention, sir. The Prime Minister in his motion wants this sitting of the committee to carry over from yesterday to today but on the occasion I referred to, "this day's sitting" in my motion was interpreted as applying only to the day on which it was moved and when the motion was not carried by ten o'clock that night it fell by the way, as I think the Prime Minister's motion should have done last night.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Cannon: Well, Mr. Chairman, I simply wish to finish the argument I had started to make previously. My argument was to the effect that in my humble opinion the hon. member for Eglinton, after having manoeuvred in such a way as to get himself put out of the house—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Cannon: —was not doing a very gracious thing in attacking the Deputy Speaker in the way he did for having done the very thing he more or less forced him to do. That was one point.

On the other point as to the making of a farce of parliamentary procedure, I might say it certainly is a farce to hear hon. members on the other side talking about making a farce of parliamentary procedure because that is what they have done, Mr. Chairman. They have, since the beginning of this debate—

Some hon. Members: Order.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Nicholson: This is in order as a speech but not as a point of order.

Mr. Cannon: It is in order because it relates to the remarks made by the hon. member for Eglinton. I am speaking to the point of order but in order not to hold up the decision on the point of order I will be willing to resume my seat now and then speak later on in the evening in this debate.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, one subject only I think should be put before you by me and that is with reference to the Prime Minister's suggestion that standing order 7 governs the situation here.

The Prime Minister suggested that because the motion he made yesterday at the opening of the committee's proceedings had not been disposed of at ten o'clock last night, it came under standing order 7, which provides:

> At the ordinary time of adjournment of the house, unless otherwise provided, the proceedings shall be interrupted and the business under consideration at the termination of the sitting shall stand over until the next sitting day when it will be taken up at the same stage where its progress was interrupted.

I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that standing order clearly applies only to debatable motions. This is a motion which the rules clearly establish must be put forthwith, without amendment and without debate. How can you report progress in the sense that is intended in standing order 7 on a non-debatable motion? If it is in order, that motion should be put forthwith. It is not the sort of motion on which you report progress.

Mr. Pearson: We will remember that.

Mr. Sinclair: Too bad you did not make this point last week.

Mr. Pickersgill: Two-way Fulton.

An hon. Member: Wrong-way Fulton.

Mr. Fulton: The government was not able to get this motion through because of the tactics they had adopted and therefore the motion should fall at ten o'clock at night and it requires renewal. It is not the sort of motion on which you can say that you ask the Speaker to rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again and then have the same motion under consideration at the beginning of the next day's sitting. It is a sudden-death motion; that is clear. It is a sudden-death motion, and unless it is put by the end of the sitting day on which it is moved then it requires to be moved again. You cannot have it under consideration from day to day.

I submit that the Prime Minister's suggestion of the application of standing order 7 is not well founded.

The Deputy Chairman: I hope that the summary we prepared—when I say "we" I mean I had the assistance of the clerks—of the point raised by the hon. member for Eglinton is correct.

Mr. Fleming raised a point of order to the effect that the business before the committee was a nullity on the ground that the Prime Minister's motion consisted of the words "at this sitting of the committee" and since those words have reference to Thursday's sitting the motion was not valid at today's sitting, that the validity of the notice given Wednesday expired at Thursday's sitting. Further, it is essential that due notice be given of a motion to be made under the provisions of standing order 33.

I think that is a fair summary of the point raised by the hon. member for Eglinton. It boils down then to raising the point that the closure motion made by the minister and put—I think the hon. member said "so precipitately" by me—is of no effect for two major reasons. The hon. member who introduced the point of order admitted quite fairly that there is a hiatus in the rules in that there is no specific provision for what shall be done if a motion is not reached on the day for which it has been notified. So we have to endeavour to decide what the position is without the benefit of a rule to that effect.

There are two major attacks. One is that the Prime Minister's motion is a nullity on the ground that it applied only to the session of May 31, the day on which the motion was moved, that it applied only to that day. That point has been argued with considerable success and a great deal of weight. However, in my opinion there are perfectly valid arguments on the other side, although I do not expect the supporters of the point of order to admit their validity.

They are two in number. One is the literal application of standing order 7, which was outlined by the Prime Minister and contested by the hon. member for Kamloops. The other one is that we have by a recorded vote in the house this morning resolved that we would be placed immediately in the same position as yesterday. In any event I am of the opinion that "this sitting" as in the motion means the sitting in which we are at the moment, the sitting at which the motion has been put and carried. I know hon. members will say, "Yes, but it was put illegally." I respect their opinion. We have argued that and a decision has been taken; not acceptable to some I will admit, but still a decision has been taken.

The other point raised by the hon. member for Eglinton was that the Prime Minister's notice, which he gave two days ago, limited its effectiveness to yesterday. What is in the standing order? It says:

> —shall have given notice at a previous sitting of his intention so to do, may move that the debate shall not be further adjourned—

I think we are faced with the necessity of deciding what is meant by "this sitting", what is meant by "previous sitting" and what is meant by "next sitting". Every hon. member has heard time after time the business of the house set for the next sitting of the house. That means the next sitting at which it is reached. I submit to the committee that if this notice had been legally given and if on the following morning the hon. member had risen and moved the adjournment of the house under standing order 26 and we had had a day-long debate on that standing order, the motion would not have been reached. It would not have been reached because the house had passed a superseding motion such as a motion that the house do adjourn with the obvious intention of killing it. It would not have been reached because some other members, not necessarily even opposed to it, would have decided that for that particular day some other matter should be under discussion.

Therefore, if I may say so with great respect for the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Eglinton, I have ruled that the notice given under standing order 33, which is apparently informal as the minister gives notice by standing in his place and announcing it, can be and is legally effective for the motion which we have before us today, and also that the motion moved yesterday by the Prime Minister and put to this committee by the chairman yesterday, but not reached for decision by this committee until today, was and is legally before the committee.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: I assume that the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre in the absence of the hon. member for Eglinton is rising to appeal my ruling.

Mr. Churchill: Yes, I appeal your ruling.

The Deputy Chairman: I read to the committee earlier the summary of the point of order as raised. As the hon. member himself is not here, I propose to submit it in that way.

Mr. Speaker resumed the chair, and the chairman of the committee made the following report:

> In committee of the whole when it was considering clause 4 of Bill No. 298, an act to establish the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation, Mr. Fleming raised a point of order to the effect that the business before the committee was a nullity on the ground that the Prime Minister's motion consisted of the words "at this sitting of the committee", and since those words had reference to Thursday's sitting the motion was not valid at today's sitting; that the validity of the notice given on Wednesday expired in Thursday's sitting, and further it was essential that due notice be given of a motion to be made under the provisions of standing order 33. I ruled that the notice of motion given by the Prime Minister at Wednesday's sitting was effective, and that the motion decided on this day was and is effective in regard to the committee's proceedings. Whereupon Mr. Churchill appealed to the house from the ruling of the chairman.

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows:

Mr. Applewhaite reports that in committee of the whole when it was considering clause 4 of Bill No. 298, Mr. Fleming raised a point of order to the effect that the business before the committee was a nullity on the ground that the Prime Minister's motion consisted of the words "at this sitting of the committee", and since those words had reference to Thursday's sitting the motion was not valid at today's sitting; that the validity of the notice given on Wednesday expired in Thursday's sitting, and further it was essential that due notice be given of a motion to be made under the provisions of standing order 33.

The chairman ruled that the notice of motion given by the Prime Minister at Wednesday's sitting was effective, and that the motion decided on this day was and is effective in regard to the committee's proceedings. Whereupon Mr. Churchill appealed to the house from the ruling of the chairman.

The house divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the chairman be confirmed? And the ruling was confirmed on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the chairman's ruling confirmed.

And the house having resumed in committee:

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Brown, Essex West): Clause 4. Shall it carry?

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Brown, Essex West): Clause 5.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Brown, Essex West): Does the hon. member wish to speak on clause 4?

Mr. Nesbitt: Yes, Mr. Chairman. There are those in Canada who are complacent enough to believe that the expression, "It can't happen here" still applies in this country. I hope that after the activities of the government during the last couple of weeks, which reached their culmination in this morning's and this afternoon's naked display of force, which force was virtually used to destroy the effect of parliament in this country, anyone who had any doubts about the old expression, "It can't happen here", will have had those doubts completely dispelled. The government and the Prime Minister personally are going to have to take the responsibility for this evil behaviour, and that is the only word that can describe it.

A day or two ago I was endeavouring to point out to the government certain historical precedents to show that the dictatorial methods imposed by formerly democratic states for purposes of efficiency and expediency destroyed democratic government in those same democratic states. At that time I cited the instances of ancient Greece and Rome. Today I should like to use a more modern example, although in passing I should like to mention that similar incidents took place in the Italian city states of Venice and Florence in the days of the Renaissance, which states at one time had republican forms of government. I suppose, however, that the most familiar and possibly the most cogent historical precedent is that of Oliver Cromwell. As hon. members will recall, after Charles I had been gotten rid of in England and the Lord Protector, Oliver Cromwell, took over, it was thought at that stage in England that there would be a new form of democratic government. However, during the session of what has been known as the long parliament the Lord Protector, Oliver Cromwell, had a great deal of difficulty in getting along with his parliament. So in 1649 the first thing he did was to expel the Royalists and then expel the Presbyterians. After that the parliament was known as the rump parliament until its final dissolution in 1660. After 1649, Mr. Chairman, the Lord Protector, even when he had only his own followers in there, could not get along even with them, so finally, as hon. members will recall, in 1660, when the speaker was about to put the question, the Lord Protector, accompanied by soldiery marched into the chamber and with the now famous expression "Take away that bauble", pointing to the mace, dissolved the long parliament.

I think hon. members may well take a lesson from this very disagreeable historical example. We have already seen some instances rather similar to those which I have just described take place in this very house. However, this government believes in being up to date. Oh yes; it certainly does! The Liberal government has put the jet-propelled engine of closure on its steam roller majority to speed the crushing of the opposition in this house.

The hon. member for Wellington South is the greatest living argument for mercy killing. The hon. member for Waterloo North—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Brown, Essex West): Order. I do not think the hon. member would like to have that statement stand on the record.

An hon. Member: It is true.

Mr. Fulton: Parliament has just been killed. What is the matter with it?

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Brown, Essex West): I leave it to the hon. member himself as to whether or not he wants to withdraw it.

An hon. Member: He has it in his prepared text.

Mr. Nesbitt: Because of the interruptions by hon. members, including the hon. member for Wellington South (Mr. Hosking), the remark was made. Possibly it was a little bit strong and I will withdraw it at the moment. The hon. member for Waterloo North was apparently horrified a few days ago at the so-called guillotine cartoon that appeared in the Globe and Mail recently. Personally I think this cartoon was most appropriate. I feel that I have at least as much regard for those who died in the two world wars as has the hon. member for Waterloo North. I would ask hon. members to consider just why it was that they died in those two world wars. Just what was the reason that they died? Why did they go to those wars? I know we hear the old trite expression, which is a sad thing, namely that they went the first time to make the world safe for democracy and on the second occasion also. Whether or not we consider this expression to be trite, it is the truth. That is the reason a great many of us went there and that is the reason a great many did not come back. We now have the spectacle in this house of what we have seen during the last couple of weeks and today in particular. We have this spectacle in this chamber itself, in the very heart of parliamentary democracy.

What has happened in the last few days is only a culmination of what this government has been attempting to do ever since the mid-1940's. First we had government by order in council. That was repeated time without number despite the objections of the opposition. Then finally last year the Minister of Trade and Commerce attempted to bring in the notorious amendment to the Defence

Production Act which fortunately was defeated. That has been not only the government's actual activities but their attitude. The famous expression of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, "Who's going to stop us?" has become all too familiar in this house and elsewhere.

It may be all very well for the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the hon. member for Waterloo North and many other hon. members on the other side. These men are capable businessmen—no one would question that statement—and very able men. But running parliament is a different thing from running a grain elevator business or a meat packing business or whatever it might be. These men do not appreciate the difference between running the House of Commons and running a business.

They seem to have forgotten—if they ever knew—what the principles and traditions of parliament really are. If any of them ever knew them or understood them, they seem to have forgotten those principles long ago. The singing of songs in this house by hon. members of the Liberal party, while the government went about its evil business of attempting to destroy parliament, could only be likened to the fiddling by the Roman emperor Nero while the city of Rome burned around him. It has seemed to me that most of the hon. members who were doing all the singing had just about as little appreciation of what was going on or what was happening to our parliamentary democracy. Hon. members opposite must wake up, as I mentioned the other day, to this not so thin edge of the wedge and repudiate quite frankly—I hesitate to use the word but I cannot think of any more suitable one—this vile perversion of democracy. The so-called Liberal party is just about as "liberal" as are the "people's democratic" parties of the iron curtain countries. They are neither "people's" nor "democratic".

The rather shocking proposal presented by the Prime Minister the day before yesterday was certainly something that should not or could not be accepted by any hon. member who believed in parliamentary democracy. If reports that we hear on this side of the house are correct, we understand that the Prime Minister yesterday or possibly the day before was asked by members of his own party to take a greater part in debate. We have now seen some evidence of his doing that since then and we are glad to have the Prime Minister taking his part again in the house. It seems a pity, however, that so far in this debate the only things we have heard from the Prime Minister are threats and announcements of the continued demolition of the structure of democratic government. I cannot help feeling that personally these statements must be extremely distasteful to the Prime Minister himself. Just to show how far this country has gone along the road to becoming a one-party state, the government is now attempting to push this offensive bill through the other place in one day. Ordinarily such a bill—

Mr. Harris: Order. The hon. member cannot talk about what happens in the other place.

Mr. Nesbitt: Ordinarily the passage would take somewhat longer. I should like to make some comment in this regard which I do not believe is out of order.

Mr. Fulton: It has not happened yet. You can talk about the Senate. The only thing you cannot do is to reflect upon what happens there.

Mr. Nesbitt: As a result of some of the comments I have heard to which I pay some attention, since I do not wish to be out of order, may I say this. When this bill comes before the other place, if the other place is not completely supine let the other place show the people of Canada that it is an independent body and that it performs some function. For years, Mr. Chairman, we have heard demands for the abolition of the other place on the ground that it performs no useful function. The other place now has its chance to prove its merits.

Here we have just about the most contentious piece of legislation in Canadian history. If the other place allows this legislation to go through in one day, the arguments for abolition are fully justified. On the other hand if the other place, despite its almost complete composition of government members, illustrates its independence and carries on debate despite the government orders, it will have fully justified its existence before the people of Canada for many years to come. It will have shown that it is not a rubber stamp and that it is performing its practical function, its traditional function of sober consideration of ill-considered, ill-framed and ill-advised legislation that is being hastily pushed through this very house.

Members of this party have been accused from time to time in this debate of not using their time at this stage of the legislation to ask a greater number of questions respecting the pipe line itself. Mr. Chairman, I have a question I would like to have answered, and I would like to have the Minister of Trade and Commerce answer it.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): He probably will not be able to answer it.

Mr. Nesbitt: Will the Prime Minister contradict the statement that Trans-Canada Pipe Lines will not be able to complete the pipe line from Winnipeg to the Ontario boundary and from Kapuskasing to Montreal unless it gets permission from the federal power commission to export gas at Emerson, Manitoba, to the United States?

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, if the Liberal party really thinks the people of Canada are in favour of this unsavory legislation and are also in favour of the gag rule and the destruction of parliament, let them call a general election and get the judgment of the Canadian people. Frankly, Mr. Chairman, I do not think the government will call an election because it is afraid to.

Mr. Cannon: Mr. Chairman, while listening to the hon. member who has just finished his remarks I could not help thinking that he must be a comparatively new member because he referred to the fact that some members on this side of the house sang songs while the bell was ringing for a vote. He referred to that fact as if we were Neros fiddling while Rome was burning. If he knew the traditions of this house he would realize that that has been the custom for a great many years and it has never done any harm to anybody and it has never excited any indignation whatever except in the youthful breast of the hon. member. He also shows that he is rather young and is not conversant with the customs and proprieties of this house when he inserts in the text that he read so diligently several references to the Senate. He did not know in fact that it is not the custom in this house to refer by name to the other place. He learned.

His remarks about a general election also show that he has not had much experience because if he knew the temper of the people of Canada at this time he would realize that if there were an election there would not be more than 10 or 15 Conservatives re-elected to this house.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to take but a few minutes to give my reason for voting for this bill and also for voting for closure. There have been so many remarks on other subjects, on procedural matters and the like, that it seems to me we have forgotten to a certain extent what this whole debate is about. The province of Alberta has great natural resources, great natural riches, I might say, in oil and gas and the eastern part of Canada needs those resources, particularly gas. I am told that in Alberta several of the oil wells are not exploited because the gas has not been disposed of. For several years now gas in the west has been going to waste. It is a terrible waste that should not be allowed to go on any longer. For five years, since Trans-Canada Pipe Lines was incorporated, all this gas has been wasted, and all this potential benefit for the east of Canada has gone to waste. This government has decided, and I think rightly so, that it is time to put an end to this intolerable waste, and the only way to do it is to pass the law that we are studying here today.

No one has been able to get organized to supply the gas to eastern Canada except Trans-Canada Pipe Lines. They have the pipe; they have the know-how; they have the right-of-way; they have the contracts to buy gas and to sell gas; they are the only ones that are organized.

We have heard a lot of noise about selling Canada down the river and giving away to United States buccaneers. Well, if my hon. friends on the other side who use those expressions will only reflect for a few minutes they will realize how silly, how futile and how childish they are. What is the government proposing to do by this bill? It is simply proposing to lend, note that, $80 million to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines at a good rate of interest, at 5 per cent and for 90 days. To lend at 5 per cent and for 90 days: since when is that selling out to United States buccaneers or giving control of the pipe line to Americans? And if they do not pay us back, if Trans-Canada does not pay the money back during the 90 days—

An hon. Member: Ninety days?

Mr. Cannon: Nine months. If it does not pay back the government in the 9-months period the government has ample security. The government has all the assets of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines and will simply take over the project and build the line itself for the great benefit of the people of Canada.

What is this delay costing us? Every year of delay in constructing the pipe line increases the cost by $25 million. It will cost $25 million more a year every year it is delayed, and every day means a loss of $50,000 a day to Alberta. When I say "Alberta" hon. members can read "Canada" because Canada is made up of its several provinces, and anything that is good for any of our provinces is good for this nation of ours as a whole.

There has also been a lot of talk about selling out to Americans and giving the Americans control of this natural resource. If my hon. friends had studied the contracts—I know some have but others have made speeches without studying them—they will realize that when this thing is organized 51 per cent of the stock is going to be offered for subscription to Canadians. If Canadians do not take 51 per cent—it is possible they will not—how can it be argued that they would take 60 per cent, 70 per cent or 80 per cent? How can it be argued that they will take more if more were offered to them if they will not take 51 per cent? My hon. friends' argument is that they will not take 51 per cent. If they will not take 51 per cent they certainly will not take more, so there is no use offering them any more.

We have the evidence of all the experts that this pipe line bill of the government is a good one. All the interested parties support it. The premier of Alberta, Mr. Manning, supports it. The premier of Manitoba gave an interview to the newspapers just recently in which he insisted on the necessity of getting this pipe line built as soon as possible so as to bring the gas to Winnipeg as soon as possible. The premier of Ontario has left the hon. Mr. Drew on the issue. He also says that the policy of the government is a good one. The only ones who still think that the policy of the government is bad are the hon. Mr. Drew and the members who vote for him, and whom I would call trained seals if I was not more polite than he is. Their expert on that side, Mr. Nickle, whom everybody recognizes as an expert in gas and oil, left them on that issue and abandoned his party on that issue. I was told today by someone who was showing me a Calgary newspaper that all of Mr. Nickle's Conservative organization, all of his supporters in his constituency, had backed him on the decision he has taken on the issue.

Mr. Rea: You are not supposed to call hon. members by their names in the house.

Mr. Cannon: I say, Mr. Chairman, that we have won the battle of the pipe line and the Conservatives are simply trying to win the battle of procedure. Should they win it and they need not think they have won the battle of procedure—it would not do them any good with the people of this country. They should consider themselves lucky that they did not succeed in blocking this thing in the way they have tried to do. It is to their ultimate benefit that they have not been able to block Trans-Canada Pipe Lines. If they had blocked it they would get even fewer votes at the next election than they will get under the present circumstances.

An hon. Member: Why don't you try it?

Mr. Cannon: The answer was given the other day by the Prime Minister that there was no reason for going to the people now. They think they know the thinking of the people of Canada. They think the people of Canada approve of what they have done. They think they will get the approval of the people of Canada and therefore they say, "Have an election". Their reason for wanting an election is that they think the people of Canada are backing them, but I think the people of Canada are not backing them and therefore there is no reason to have an election.

Some hon. Members: Quiet.

Mr. Cannon: On the matter of closure, Mr. Chairman, a very sound argument can be made. Most of my hon. friends on the other side of the house are educated people who have college educations and therefore they will realize what a syllogism is in philosophy. The rules of parliament are democratic. Closure is a rule of parliament and therefore closure is a rule of democracy.

An hon. Member: Before debate begins?

Mr. Cannon: And the exhibition my hon. friends have put on in this house since the beginning of this debate is ample proof, if we needed it, that closure is an absolutely necessary rule of this house.

Spokesmen of the C.C.F. and Conservative parties gave notice to the newspapers before the debate started that they were going to put on such a filibuster as had never been seen before in this house. They said, "You think you saw a filibuster last year; well, you haven't seen anything yet".

Mr. Nicholson: Well, have you?

Mr. Cannon: There goes my hon. friend across the way. He says, "Well, have you?" He agrees with me, evidently. He admits that they were going to put on the greatest filibuster that had ever been put on in this house. I say that completely justifies us in imposing the rule of closure. That was the only way we could have achieved constructive debate.

The rules of this house—

Mr. Dinsdale: Rules?

Mr. Cannon: —were revised by an interparliamentary committee in which all the parties of this house were represented and on which the expert of the C.C.F., the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the expert of the Conservative party, the hon. member for Kamloops, and all the experts on procedure in the house served. They went through the rules of parliament with a fine-toothed comb. They made all the changes they thought should be made, but they did not change the closure rule an iota. They left it just as it was before because they realized it was absolutely necessary for the orderly proceedings of debate in this house.

My hon. friends opposite claim they have not had time to debate this bill. Well, this is the twenty-second or twenty-third day of the debate—I am not sure which—

An hon. Member: Watch your mathematics, Charlie.

Mr. Nowlan: Two plus two makes twenty-two?

Mr. Cannon: There is nothing wrong with my remarks as you will see when you look at them. If you consider the proceedings of this house you will see that every year we have about 50 bills which go through parliament. Let us suppose each bill took ten days—which they do not, of course—that would be 500 days, more than a year. This bill has taken 20 days of debate—

An hon. Member: Now it is 20.

Mr. Cannon: —and the 20 days of debate that have been given over to discussion of this bill is more than all the time given to all the other bills in this house since the beginning of this session. Despite this, hon. members opposite say they have not had time to study it. Why have they not had time to study it? Obviously it is because they have been wasting a great deal of time of the house on phony points of order and on motions to adjourn the house, simply wasting the time of this house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cannon: The public does not realize and I think the public should be told that it takes half an hour for a vote in this house. How many votes have the opposition forced since the beginning of the debate on this bill? Up until May 25 last, according to the computation of the Montreal Star, we have had 35 votes.

Mr. Nicholson: How much time would you save if you did away with parliament altogether?

Mr. Cannon: If my hon. friend wishes to talk in this debate he can do so later on. The hon. member has no right to interrupt me while I am on my feet. Will you please keep quiet?

An hon. Member: We are all speakers now, eh?

Mr. Cannon: We had had 35 votes up to May 25 last. By now we have had 45 and out of that 45 possibly 10 were necessary in the ordinary procedure of this house; 35 votes were forced upon us by the opposition on phony points of order and on motions to adjourn the house just for the pleasure of wasting half an hour on a vote in order to defeat the motion. Therefore, you have 35 times half an hour which makes about 17 hours spread over 20 days.

Mr. Nicholson: What would you save if you did away with parliament altogether?

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Brown, Essex West): Order.

Mr. Tucker: We would save having you around.

Mr. Nicholson: That is the logical conclusion.

Mr. Dickey: You would not know a logical conclusion if you saw one.

Mr. Cannon: That is not a logical conclusion because the rules of the house—

Mr. Nowlan: What rules?

Mr. Cannon: —are made to advance debate and not to impede it and using the rules of the house as you have by moving motions to adjourn and so on just for the pleasure of wasting time is—if it is not too strong a word —a prostitution of the use of the rules, putting them to a use it was never intended they should serve.

I have just a few more remarks. I am sorry to see the hon. member for Eglinton is not in his seat but I am sure his friends will relay to him anything I have to say. I started to talk about him this afternoon but I was forced to conclude my remarks.

I remarked on the fact that he put on a good show, tremendous histrionics, and made quite a spectacle in getting himself removed from the chamber—

Mr. Nowlan: Oh, cheap, cheap.

Mr. Cannon: —getting his picture taken and having the flag ready. How did that flag happen to be in this house or in the lobby?

Mr. Dinsdale: It was an organized affair.

Mr. Cannon: I would like someone to tell me that and also explain the organized meeting at the airport—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Brown, Essex West): Order.

Mr. Cannon: I have a few quotations here including the two great financial papers of Canada. In its edition for May 19 last the Financial Post says:

> The recent noise on parliament hill over the gas line should be recognized for what it is: a violent effort by the opposition parties to mislead and befuddle the Canadian public in the hope of making political profit for the next election.

So much for the Financial Post. The Financial Times of June 1 has such a good editorial that I should read practically the whole thing—

Mr. Nicholson: Oh, good.

Mr. Cannon: —but it is too long.

Mr. Nicholson: No, go ahead and read it all.

Mr. Cannon: They are talking about this bill and they say:

> The government felt it must get out of the impasse that has now lasted three years; it made an intelligent proposal that could stand lots of contradiction. It was one that needed to be debated and, by all standards, enough time was made available for such a debate.

Mr. Nowlan: Is that the Toronto Star you are reading from?

Mr. Dinsdale: No, it must be the Winnipeg Free Press.

Mr. Churchill: There are only two newspapers in Canada.

Mr. Cannon: I should read the heading. It reads:

> A Sad Show for Once Great Party.

I do not have to mention the party concerned. I am sure the Leader of the Opposition will have recognized it.

My prize show piece, you might say, Mr. Chairman, is the Globe and Mail.

An hon. Member: Hurray.

Mr. Cannon: I should really congratulate the Prime Minister. I do not know whether he has read that book entitled "How to Win Friends and Influence People" but he has certainly succeeded in doing that by the way in which he has conducted this debate in this house.

Mr. Hees: So you are still hoping to be a a parliamentary assistant?

An hon. Member: Stand up, beautiful.

Mr. Nowlan: You have earned a front seat, Chuck.

Mr. Cannon: I appreciate that you do not like to take this, but be men. When you were little boys you had to take castor oil and now that you are big men you have to take this. Why not take it like men? The editorial in the May 31 edition of the Globe and Mail reads as follows:

> One reason for early completion of the line concerns cost; every year, the price tag on it goes up by another $25 million. But the main reason is need—Alberta's need, to sell natural gas, Ontario's need to buy it. Alberta's situation is critical. In the five years that the cross-Canada line has been under discussion, that province has burned off 120 billion cubic feet of natural gas which it was not able to export to the east and not permitted to export to the United States. This is a criminal waste in a country which needs energy as badly as this one.

[Mr. Cannon.]

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Brown, Essex West): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I must advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Cannon: I shall bow to the inevitable.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Chairman, I think after the storm and fury of today it has been a good thing to have a bit of light comedy touch such as we have had lately. I was highly entertained to hear the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine doing with more magnificent skill what the right hon. Prime Minister did earlier. It will be remembered that the right hon. Prime Minister attempted to telescope two days today and to make yesterday today, but the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine has done an even more magnificent job, he has telescoped ten months into 90 days. I was very curious when he chided the members on this side for not having read the contract, and yet he stated repeatedly that this loan was for 90 days when it is firmly stated in the contract—

Mr. Cannon: If my hon. friend will allow me to give an explanation, it was just a slip of the tongue.

An hon. Member: You cannot take it.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): The contract firmly states that the loan is to be repaid before April 2, 1957, some ten months from now. As I say, it gave us a light comedy touch when the hon. member spoke. However, I am interested in the views he expressed which have also been expressed by more august members of the government about the role of the opposition in parliament. Apparently the concept is that the opposition must in no way impede the passage of legislation of which it does not approve, that it must confine its efforts merely to polite commentaries on the legislation presented by the government. Of course we are then faced with this curious situation, that the members of the Liberal party and the members of the government are so witless that they are unable to use the rules of the house in order to achieve their ends and they become extremely indignant because of their lack of capacity to change the rules in order to obstruct the obstruction of the opposition. I think when it comes to obstruction the honours are very even, although I would suggest that the opposition has confined itself to playing with the rules as they are, not changing them in the middle of the game.

As I listened to the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine I wondered if he could be speaking about some other project. I almost said some other proposition, but I would not like to use that word. I wondered if he was speaking of some project other than the actual bill which is before us. He spoke of the intention of the government by means of this legislation to bring gas from the oil and gas fields of Alberta to the markets of eastern Canada. Curiously enough we have nothing before us, either in the bill now presented by the government and forced through by illegal closure maintained by illegal means, or in the agreement which was tabled although not made an integral part of the bill to provide in any way for bringing gas any further than the city of Winnipeg. There is nothing whatever there. Of course there may be some other secret and confidential agreements about which we have not been informed. It would not be surprising. But certainly on the basis of the information we have, all we know is that there are plans to bring that gas to the city of Winnipeg.

I have been puzzled, and I suspect other hon. members as well as many of those sitting on the government side of the house have also, about the tremendous pressure and haste by which this bill is being pushed through the house. I believe we find the answer on May 28 when the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce made what to me was a very moving statement, and I say that in all sincerity. He asked this rhetorical question of the house: "Why are we pressing this? Well, I don't know, I don't know." If the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce does not know then, who in heaven's name does know and can tell us? The right hon. minister went on further to say, and this is the part I want to deal with:

> I have been working on sizeable projects all my life, and somehow I reach a point in the development when I think a project is important; and if it is a serious enough project I begin to think it is the most important thing in the world and it does seem to me it is important that we do not lose a year in undertaking this pipe line.

I have every sympathy with the right hon. minister's point of view in this regard. I want to say that I would be the first, not only to admit but to proclaim that the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce has made splendid gifts of service to the Canadian people. I shall go further and suggest that he is a man with most unusual and extraordinary capacities and abilities. The tragedy is of course that he is surrounded by pygmies and because he is surrounded by pygmies one can readily understand the God-like proportions he assumes in the eyes of those pygmies to which the hon. member for Dauphin referred the other day.

Mr. Pickersgill: The twentieth century "Gulliver's Travels"?

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Is that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration? We on this side of the house have been puzzled as to just where the asinine advice with regard to procedure given to the government could have come from. Some of us think we know where because there is an hon. minister who has displayed a talent amounting almost to genius for ineptitude in the handling of his own department. One would assume that he would be admirably qualified to offer the insane advice that quite obviously he offered the government with regard to this bill.

As I say, I think it is a tragedy that the minister has been so poorly served. None of those who have served him has had the wit or the courage to suggest to him that there was something tragic in his, shall I say, resorting to some of the measures which have been resorted to in the last few days to push this measure through the House of Commons, when as anyone knows who has even the most modest knowledge of the rules of procedure there were methods by which this could have been put through without so seriously damaging the reputation of the government and of this house.

As I say, he was poorly served. I wonder sometimes just what the right hon. minister would do in relation to that field in which he is so eminent, the field of engineering, if some of his advisers were to present him with inaccurate estimates as to quantities, with inaccurate calculations as to stresses and strains, with hopelessly faulty estimates of the length of time required for a production project. I think I know what he would do; he would fire them very quickly. Unfortunately he has been served by people who have advised him in a field in which, shall I say, by his own admission, he is not very well versed in the methods by which measures can be brought safely through the House of Commons. He has been served by people of the sort that in his own field of engineering he would fire out of hand.

I sympathize with the minister. I can realize that he envisages this pipe line across Canada as a tremendous national project which will be the cap-stone of an extremely eminent career.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): One can sympathize with that. I think I might say, having myself reached rather mature years, that I can readily understand how the minister feels with "Time's winged chariot drawing near." I can realize only too well how, when one moves into the sixth or seventh decade, those years pass quickly by, and periods which people who are fortunate enough not to have drawn so heavily on their bank account of time would consider modest periods into the future, at certain ages seem to be intolerable lengths of time which may frustrate a worthy and certainly understandable ambition.

I am also not among those who consider that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has been deliberately trying to sell us out to the Americans. I do not think he has. I think, on the other hand, that the Minister of Trade and Commerce may perhaps have been intending to use some of those American gentlemen for his own purposes for the building of this tremendous national project and that he had obstacles in the way of bringing that to fruition and reality. Those with whom he dealt, even as those with whom he dealt with regard to parliamentary procedure, have been not worthy of his confidence or his trust. I can only think that we have in this instance of the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines bill cases of what almost appear to be repeated blackmail.

As I recall, at the beginning of this session, when the Minister of Trade and Commerce placed his resolution on the order paper for the introduction of the bill to build 675 miles of pipe line in northern Ontario, it was generally considered at that time—and I presume, since the minister presented it to this house, that he considered—that this was all the concession that those who owned and controlled Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited would require to carry out the undertaking of the pipe line from Alberta to eastern Canada. Then later, within a few weeks, he placed another motion on the order paper, and we found that the ante had been raised and that not only must we build 675 miles in northern Ontario but we must advance them $80 million for the construction of the western section. As I say, that appears to me to be a case of raising the ante. One of the difficulties when one submits to extortion on one level is that one finds oneself confronted with a further demand on another level, and I believe that probably is the case in this instance.

We are told that the western section must be built this year. We are not told how soon the rest of the line is going to be built. We are not told what arrangements have been made with the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines directors, who have so often either gone back on their word or found themselves incapable of fulfilling their promises. We are not told just what firm undertakings this government has from that company that it will proceed without delay to the construction of the line from Winnipeg to the Ontario border from Kapuskasing to Montreal.

True enough there have been reports, which were referred to today in the house—I think it was today—with regard to orders that were alleged to have been placed for pipe by the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines company. Like the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, I was puzzled at the placing of these orders, not merely because of the implied contempt of parliament, but also I was puzzled to know where these people suddenly were finding the $45 million when they could not find the $80 million for the western section. I wondered whether there are other advances they are going to demand from the taxpayers of Canada if and when they are confronted, as they may yet be, with a refusal on the part of the federal power commission of the United States to grant them a permit to export gas into the U.S.A. I think that was one of the obstacles the minister faced to the realization of this dream of his.

Then, I think, he faced another obstacle. In fact, he mentioned it to us in the house. That obstacle is to be found in the province of Alberta. Certainly the comment made by the minister about Mr. Manning's statement to him that he insisted upon this government giving export permits to the United States before giving the go-ahead for export permits from the province of Alberta would indicate that the government of Alberta has also held a gun to the head of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): That is nonsense.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I am only going on the word of the minister himself, which you can find in Hansard, where he told us—

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Where is it?

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): —that Mr. Manning stated that he would require to have exports of gas from Canada before he would go ahead with the deal. The hon. member asks, "Where is it?" I am not going to waste time looking it up. He knows it is on Hansard. Yes, it is here, Mr. Chairman. Since the hon. member for Bow River wants to be formally confronted with what his beloved government has done—

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): They have done a wonderful job.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): They have indeed. Premier Manning, according to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, as recorded on page 2164 of Hansard, put it to him in these terms:

> I would, however, point out that when Premier Manning first brought the project to our Prime Minister he made it a condition that a market in the United States be arranged, in addition to markets in eastern Canada.

He made the conditions. He held the gun at the head of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I would imagine too, from comments that were dropped by the hon. member for Peace River, that there may be other interests in the province of Alberta, perhaps closely linked with the government of Alberta, who not merely view with concern the necessity for exporting gas from Canada but also view with concern the possibility that they might make a deal with a government owned and operated pipe line. There was a suggestion made that the producers of gas and oil in Alberta were not prepared to deal with any organization in which a government body has a deciding vote. In fact, as I recall it, I think it was Mr. Clint Murchison who was reported as having made some such observation.

These are the obstacles which, I think, the Minister of Trade and Commerce faced when he first began to consider this new, vast project which he quite understandably wished to place alongside his other achievements of Trans-Canada, Polymer and Eldorado and alongside his achievements during the war as Minister of Defence Production. I suggest that it is tragic that, in order to realize that dream within a very short period of years—and understandably he wants to do it within a very short period of years—he has been driven to these shifts, to these devices, to these obviously cobbled-together schemes for building a pipe line from Alberta to eastern Canada. I noted when the Minister of Finance spoke on this issue—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Brown, Essex West): Order. I regret having to draw to the attention of the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Nickle: Mr. Chairman—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Brown, Essex West): The hon. member for Calgary South.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I was on my feet before the hon. member for Calgary South and I called "Mr. Chairman."

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Brown, Essex West): I regret very much that I did not see the hon. lady. However, I have seen the hon. member for Calgary South.

Mr. Nickle: Mr. Chairman, it was heartwarming to me tonight to read in the Ottawa Journal a Canadian Press dispatch from Calgary quoting a newspaper opinion poll by the Calgary Albertan made of the eleven executive members of the Calgary South Conservative association. The only paragraph I want to quote from that dispatch is this one:

The newspaper said that the executive members not only expressed complete confidence in Mr. Nickle, but also endorsed his stand on the pipe line.

I think it is fair comment to say, Mr. Chairman, that the members of the executive of the Calgary South Conservative association and the many thousands of Calgarians who elected me to this house on two occasions did so in large measure because of two things. One was their feeling that over a good many years I had acquired quite an extensive knowledge of an industry which is rather vital to western Canada and I think increasingly vital to all of Canada. Second, I think these Calgarians, all Canadians, also had in mind their belief, which I hope has been substantiated, that I was quite prepared to call the shots as I saw them without fear or favour with regard to anyone.

My purpose in rising tonight, Mr. Chairman, is partly to state again why I support this particular government measure by speaking, with reservations, in favour of it. But the main reason I rise tonight is to state why I have voted for the measure on first and second readings and why I intend to vote for it on further occasions. I am doing so because my right to vote on this measure has been questioned on the ground that I am presumed to have a direct pecuniary interest. The mover and seconder of the motion to disallow my vote, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Assiniboia, contended that I was barred by standing order No. 11.

This order is one which, so far as I can ascertain, has hitherto in its very rare application been applied only on private bills, for example, to bar a member from voting on a private bill for incorporation of a privately financed company in which that member may have a direct financial interest. It has never been applied to any public bill, whether for incorporation of a crown corporation such as Northern Ontario Pipe Line, or whether for authorization of use of public funds for payment to wheat farmers, old age pensions, family allowances and so on, for all members of parliament could be construed as having a direct pecuniary interest by reason of their being taxpayers, and many members of parliament could be construed as having a direct pecuniary interest by reason of being recipients of a portion of such public funds.

I will leave it to parliament itself to resolve the question as to how, if at all, standing order No. 11 can or should be applied to public bills in general. So far as this particular public bill is concerned, I intend to prove there is no direct pecuniary interest involved that would bar me from voting on the measure and, indeed, to prove that personal financial gain plays no part whatsoever in the various policies I have urged, the speeches I have made, and the votes I have joined in in this house.

I do not question in any way the right, the duty or the purpose of the hon. members in raising the question at 2.17 a.m. on May 23. I do say, however, that the reply I am now going to give is the one I would have given at that time had I been an expert on rules and procedure or a lawyer, neither of which I am, or had I had advance notice of the question as to my eligibility, which I did not, or had the question not been raised at the end of an extremely long sitting under circumstances requiring some immediate answer from me without opportunity to consider fully or prepare a detailed factual answer. Since then I have flown west to Calgary, and have gathered the necessary documentary evidence, all of which will be made available to the appropriate house committee and to the members who raised the question. Since, sir, it is unlikely that the committee can sit in the near future because of pressure of work in the house I will now present a short summary of the evidence and reiterate that, with a completely clear conscience, I intend to vote again on this bill.

Personally I would regard as "direct pecuniary interest" barring me from voting any shareholdings in Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited, the company to be directly affected by this measure. I have no such interest, and as I said on May 23:

> I state unequivocally that I have no share interest whatsoever in Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited and no shares whatsoever in any company which is a shareholder in Trans-Canada.

I will now quote from a document dated May 25, 1956, from the head office of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited, which document states in part:

> Carl O. Nickle . . . does not own any shares in Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited and has no other rights, title or option, direct or indirect, to acquire any shares in this company. The books and records of the company do fully substantiate the above statement.

The move to bar my vote, however, was not based on any claim that I had a direct interest in Trans-Canada but rather that a company of which I was a director had entered into a contract to sell gas to Trans-Canada. Thus this presumed "indirect pecuniary interest" should be construed to be a "direct interest".

If even the slightest measure of indirect pecuniary interest may be deemed to bar a member from voting on this measure, then perhaps all members in the following categories might be disallowed: (1) All members from Alberta, on grounds that every Albertan will gain from revenues to the provincial treasury from royalties on gas produced from crown lands; (2) All members from communities, including Winnipeg, that will be served with gas through Trans-Canada, unless they are prepared to commit themselves not to use gas, because otherwise they would be direct beneficiaries of lower costs to consumers made possible by the government assistance involved in this measure; (3) All members who are shareholders of any company with gas reserves in Alberta, or shareholders in any gas distribution system in the five province area to be served by Trans-Canada; (4) in fact, we might bar all members because all members of this house are taxpayers.

I will now comment specifically on the grounds advanced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in his contention that my vote should be disallowed. It would appear that he believes the degree of presumed pecuniary interest should determine whether or not a member's vote should be disallowed and that he assumes I have such a greater degree of pecuniary interest than other members because of associations with oil and gas companies that I should, therefore, be singled out.

When he raised the question he stated, as found at page 4241 of Hansard of May 22:

> The information on which I raise this point is found in documents which are matters of record. I refer to the Parliamentary Guide, and I also refer to the Financial Post's directory of boards of directors. One can ascertain from these documents that the hon. member for Calgary South is the president, the vice-president or a director of at least nine oil, gas or pipe line companies.

His statement was misleading. My positions with these companies are a matter of public record, and always have been, partly because I have as a matter of policy tried to ensure that parliament, the public and the readers of my publications should not be under any misapprehensions as to my business relationships and partly also because shareholdings of directors of public companies are required by law to be matters of public record. Had the hon. member cared to examine other documents of public record, he could have given to the house complete details as to my shareholdings, gas reserves, contractual relationships with Trans-Canada, and so on.

To overcome that omission, I have obtained from each company of which I am a director or officer a document setting out, first, my shareholdings and percentage equity, second, their gas reserves, if any, and my equity in them and, third, their relationships with Trans-Canada, if any. These are available to the appropriate house committee and also to the hon. members who raised the question.

These documents establish, first, that the pipe-line company of which I am a director is a small oil pipe-line firm serving one field in central Alberta; second, that only five of the companies have any natural gas reserves and, third, that at present none of these has entered into any gas sales contract with Trans-Canada, and only one of them is even negotiating a contract for gas sales. That one is Bailey-Selburn Oil and Gas Limited. It is also established from these documents that my personal equities in natural gas reserves, through shareholdings in these companies, total only 324,458 MCF. These include, through Bailey-Selburn, 220,758 MCF. I shall not detail these by companies other than that one.

Depending on their quality, location, marketability and other factors, the present worth of gas reserves in western Canada is appraised by the engineers and economists of the industry at from 1 cent to 3 cents per MCF. The only reserves in which I have an equity that might soon be marketable—part of those of Bailey-Selburn—are appraised by that company at a present worth of 2½ cents per MCF. Applying this value to all my share of reserves, including those not marketable, establishes a maximum present worth of all my personal natural gas equity of some $8,125.

Considering that these gas reserves, even after they commence going to market, will require more than a quarter of a century to actually produce; and considering also that there would be no cash return to me except when and if dividends were paid to shareholders from gas income, it is quite obvious that any personal financial gain from gas export would be at a very small and slow rate. If I were to retain such income for personal use it would do little more than keep me in cigarettes.

Actually less than one-third of the gas reserves in which I have an equity are even under negotiation for a sales contract. The document from Bailey-Selburn shows that that portion of the company's reserves located in the Bindloss field will likely be marketed through Trans-Canada under a contract now being negotiated. My equity in those particular reserves, through shares in Bailey-Selburn, amounts to 91,500 MCF, with a present worth of $2,286.75.

At the delivery rate scheduled, these reserves will be marketed over a period exceeding 25 years. My equity in the projected daily sales amounts to less than 10 MCF. Reduced to present worth of 2½ cents per MCF, this planned gas sale could be worth all of 24½ cents per day to me, if the income is actually paid out in dividends. And that figure is before personal income taxes. The sum is somewhat inadequate to affect my policies and votes in the House of Commons, even if I were inclined to let such personal interest affect my views.

To get back to the statement in the house by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, as reported at page 4241 of Hansard, he used these words:

> . . . Bailey-Selburn Oil and Gas Limited has increased its proven gas reserves by about 31·4 trillion cubic feet under the acquisition of all the shares of Selbay Exploration Limited.

While presumably a quote from a magazine of which I am an editor, the statement was a misquote. The hon. member was exactly one thousand times too generous in his measure of these reserves in which he presumed me to have a large interest. The reserve was 31·4 billion, not trillion; and my personal equity in it—less than one-quarter of 1 per cent—is included in the figures I listed a few moments ago.

The key statement in the house by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was this:

> It is my contention, Mr. Speaker, that the contract which this company—
>
> Bailey-Selburn.
> —of which my hon. friend is a director, now has with Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited is, prior to the passing of this bill, just a piece of paper. When this bill is passed and Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited is put in a position to commence operations, that piece of paper becomes a document worth a great deal in terms of dollars; and it is because of that direct pecuniary interest that it seems to me the vote of the hon. member for Calgary South should be challenged.

I challenge the accuracy of his statement, first because it implies that I personally stand to gain a great deal in terms of dollars, whereas in fact the potential gain to me might be some two-bits a day, if Bailey-Selburn should distribute all its gas income to shareholders; and second, I challenge it because in fact no contract had by that date, or has to date, been entered into between Bailey-Selburn and Trans-Canada.

There is an important fact that should be borne in mind. An agency of government—the petroleum and natural gas conservation board of Alberta—determines from what fields and in what volumes natural gas may be marketed. The prerogatives of directors of companies owning gas reserves, of which I am one, are limited to accepting or rejecting sale of their company's gas through the designated agency—in this case Trans-Canada—if their reserves happen to be in fields designated by the conservation board for export.

Under the terms of the permit issued by the Alberta conservation board to Trans-Canada, the Bindloss field is among those committed by the board to Trans-Canada. Bailey-Selburn and other owners of gas in that field must, if they wish to market their reserves at all, enter into a contract with Trans-Canada. This company, of which I am a director, is now therefore in process of negotiating such a sales contract.

Under ordinary circumstances—and those surrounding the questioning of my right to vote in this house are not normal circumstances—there are certain matters I shall now briefly refer to that are rightly and properly the private concern of the individual and not matters for public revelation or discussion. Under these most unusual circumstances, where my integrity and honour have been publicly challenged, an adequate defence dictates that my personal affairs to some extent become public property.

I am prepared to prove to the appropriate committee of this house that my interests as a Canadian taxpayer would somewhat outweigh my interests as a participant in gas reserves, in my judgment and votes on the northern Ontario pipe-line measure. My income tax payments—including those of my wholly-owned company, C. O. Nickle Publications Ltd.—have amounted to $99,010 during the first four years and four months I have been a member of this house, and will possibly not be inconsiderable in the future.

I am prepared to prove that I have, from personal choice, followed a policy since I was first elected to the House of Commons designed to guarantee that I could derive no personal financial gain from attendance in the house, or from parliamentary decisions in which I might take some active part. This has partly involved meeting the costs of having my business enterprise run for me by others in order that I might attend sessions in Ottawa, and the added out of pocket costs of being in attendance here. These costs have been considerable.

This policy, and a normal human interest in the well-being of others less fortunate, has also involved my making donations and grants to charitable and educational causes, with particular emphasis on assistance to youth, in my home province of Alberta and community of Calgary. These have amounted to $123,509. The authority for these figures on taxes and gifts is Harvey, Morrison and Company, chartered accountants of Calgary, who audit my books.

I trust no member of this house will judge that I am trying to assume a role as a paragon of virtue. I am very far from being that. I am a capitalist, Mr. Chairman, and I see no reason to be ashamed of that label.

[Mr. Nickle.]

Like other members of Canada's parliament, I do have a sense of public responsibility and a social conscience, together with a strong faith in the future of our country and its people, and a desire to help realize that future. In this parliament, and in the years ahead when I am a private citizen again, a clean reputation is important to me and to the objectives I still have in life. I trust that the house, after its careful appraisal of all the facts in the rather distressing case involving my honour, will help restore something that I value more than money.

Meantime, Mr. Chairman, for the reasons I advanced in this house on May 15 and May 18—and for those reasons only—I again voice my support for this government measure. On the remaining occasions when votes are registered on this measure, I intend to cast my vote for it. I trust there will be no further challenge of that right to vote.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I must admit to having been extremely interested in the words which have just been spoken by the hon. member for Calgary South. I must also admit to having had a great deal of sympathy for the hon. member because of the position in which he found himself, where interests undoubtedly conflicted with interests.

I have only this to say. The hon. member has made quite a point of the amount of income tax he has paid and his charitable donations. All of us, Mr. Chairman, pay income tax according to our income, and it hurts the least of us as much as it hurts the richest of us. With respect to charitable donations also, if we have a public conscience, as I think most of us have, they are likely made in proportion to the amount of revenue we earn. I must say, Mr. Chairman, in behalf of myself and my colleagues, that the hon. member might have accorded us the courtesy of admitting that the rest of us are in precisely the same position.

This has been a difficult debate, Mr. Chairman, what there has been of it. Those of us who have fought, probably not in the debate itself because there has been too little of that, with the only means at our disposal have been fortified by the interest that has been taken in that fight as shown by the letters and telegrams which have come to us from our constituents and from others across this country. It is largely because of the interest which has been shown in this measure, not only, I might say, in the measure but in the incidents which have taken place in this house, that I feel it would be difficult for any of us to convince even our most well-meaning constituents that what has taken place here today could actually have happened. Hansard will not show it.

Hansard will show words; Hansard will not show emotions. It has been said many times of things that have happened in this world of ours in the last 25 years that it could not happen here. Mr. Chairman, it could happen here.

Mr. White (Hastings-Frontenac): It has happened.

Mr. Rowe: It has.

Mrs. Fairclough: On what is our government founded?

Mr. Purdy: On democracy.

Mrs. Fairclough: "Democracy", my friend says. It got a death blow this afternoon. You might as well just get out; you are no use in this house. Mr. Chairman, I would not have said a word to the hon. member had he not interjected.

An hon. Member: Do you not believe in the majority rule?

Mrs. Fairclough: I agree the majority rules, my friend; I do indeed. But when that majority abuses the use of the rules, of procedure and of precedents that have been built up in this country over hundreds of years, then it is not a case of majority ruling; it is the old steamroller tactics, the very type of thing that robbed Europe of democracy. I admit, Mr. Chairman, to feeling strongly on this subject; I admit to feeling so strongly that it is difficult for me to speak upon it.

An hon. Member: Oh, no.

Mrs. Fairclough: Don't say "oh, no". Possibly the hon. gentleman has not had in his family the history that I have had in mine. In the last 500 years, as I think I have mentioned in this house before, Mr. Chairman, my family has fled from persecution in two countries and it is here today in Canada, and has been here for five generations, thinking that in this country we had freedom. If this freedom is taken from us, Mr. Chairman, where do we go for sanctuary? Where do we go?

An hon. Member: Not to me.

Mrs. Fairclough: Not to you; you're not fooling. The type of thinking which prompted that remark, the type of thinking which prompted the votes which have taken place in this house today, Mr. Chairman, is the type of thing that has robbed free peoples of their freedom over this world many, many times.

I say to you advisedly that threats face us. There are so many kinds of people in this country. The people of the North American continent, and the people of the world, have been warned of threats of physical extinction by reason of atomic bombs or hydrogen bombs. But, Mr. Chairman, there are other types of extinction. To die; we all come to it eventually. If we live the proper kind of life we do not fear death, but a living death is a different thing. I say to this house that there are things to be feared worse than the death which may come to one from an atomic or a hydrogen bomb. I did not hear that last interjection from my friend. If he would like to repeat it I would be very glad to hear it. There have been a good many interjections in this debate.

I had intended to speak tonight specifically upon the gas pipe line. If events of this day have prompted me to depart from my intention it is probable that hon. members will understand that there are some things that need to be said under stress. We have heard a great many excuses given for the procedure which is now proposed on Bill No. 298. We have had quoted to us the words of many persons. As a matter of fact, almost always when anybody speaks in this house he refers to so and so who is an expert in his field. Experts! Many of them have been quoted to us. I do not know under what conditions they become experts, Mr. Chairman. I only know that just the other day, in the course of my reading, I found a modern definition of the word "expert" which said that "ex" is a has-been and "spurt" is a drip under pressure. We have been suspicious of those experts and I think it is only natural that we should be suspicious. All the circumstances have been suspicious.

The hon. member for Nanaimo made some excuses for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Well, I am quite willing to go along with them. Possibly, in the words of the street, he was "had". It seems to me there are a few things we should bear in mind, and I would like to mention three or four around which my own suspicions have centred.

In the first place there is the length of time which has elapsed since the first charter of this company was procured. There has been a great deal of talk about the necessity for haste. It seems to me, however, the necessity for haste is something that has developed in very recent days. There seemed to be no necessity for haste back in 1951; and even granting that some hon. members of this house might think this thing really only started in 1953 after the company was forced into its present alliance, it seems to me there was no particular need for haste in 1953 or 1954 or 1955.

The early assertions of financial competence on the part of this company, which made a very fine plea before the committee when it was endeavouring to procure its charter, have fallen by the wayside and now, rather than standing solidly on their own two feet, they are appealing for help.

The Prime Minister made some reference to what he termed "the amusing speech" of the hon. member for Peel. I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, I have made an error. It was not the hon. member for Peel and I apologize to the Prime Minister. It was the hon. member for Spadina who made the statement that he had seen Mr. Murchison on television some time ago and the interviewer asked Mr. Murchison if what he had heard was true, that Mr. Murchison had not put his own money into the ventures. Mr. Murchison replied laughingly, "not if I could help it." Apparently he does not intend to put his own money into this venture nor the money of the company with which he is associated.

I am impressed by the reluctance of the company to proceed with the northern Ontario section, the section which they took in their stride when they were applying for a charter. After it was made easier for them they found it was still too difficult for them to undertake. I wonder that the minister did not call them to task on that occasion because of their misrepresentations. Again they came along and said that now they had received help for the northern Ontario section they could not proceed with the easiest part of the line, the part from the Alberta border down to the vicinity of Winnipeg.

Then, Mr. Chairman, we had the spectacle of this company which had bragged that it was quite capable of financing its endeavours applying for this loan to finance the western portion, a loan which it has been admitted in this house can only be liquidated if this company can sell gas in the middle states. Meanwhile the bottleneck to such a sale has been created by the opposition presently being argued before the federal power commission.

I say once more, Mr. Chairman, that a most suspicious circumstance has developed out of this very situation, for here we have the spectacle of a large, powerful transmission company with heretofore a good public relations record which now departs from its usual methods of operation in these established markets and antagonizes distributors quite contrary to their established practice, to the extent that they are accused before the federal power commission of raiding an established market presently served also by reputable distributors.

I say if the transmission company had at its disposal contracts for the importation of large quantities of natural gas it would be quite natural for it to try to distribute that gas through recognized channels. Why would it attempt to antagonize the people already established in that field, unless it hoped by antagonizing them to stir up such resentment on their part that they in turn would do just what they have done; namely, appeal to the federal power commission not to give the permission which they sought? Mr. Chairman, it is a most suspicious circumstance.

I cannot see why in the face of all the suspicion anyone could fail to wonder whether this great, powerful and wealthy Trans-Canada corporation wants to get out from under, as appears to be the case.

I cannot help but be suspicious concerning the minister's position when he presses this company to go ahead with its plans despite the repeated actions on their part which dictate the very suspicions I have mentioned. The Minister says these people are the only ones who have contracts. He says they are the only ones who have the pipe, and that we cannot purchase this pipe in Canada. Oh, no? Apparently Welland Tubes got into operation a little sooner than the minister expected.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Chairman, on a point order, Welland Tubes have not broken ground for their plant yet.

Mrs. Fairclough: All right; but they have accepted orders for delivery this year of 20-inch pipe.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No.

Mrs. Fairclough: They have accepted orders for pipe to be delivered to firms in western Ontario this year.

Mr. Rowe: For 30-inch pipe. He knows that.

Mrs. Fairclough: The minister says no, Mr. Chairman, but I am much too suspicious even to accept a "no".

Mr. Hees: Attagirl.

Mrs. Fairclough: I submit that if the Minister of Trade and Commerce had put one-tenth of the energy into supporting the plans of a Canadian plant to produce pipe in Canada that he has put into trying to force a United States corporation to accept a Canadian loan which he will get from the Canadian taxpayers, we probably would have had 34-inch pipe before this time.

Mr. Byrne: Why manufacture pipe if we can't have a pipe line?

Mrs. Fairclough: Too bad I did not hear you.

Mr. Rowe: You did not miss a thing.

Mrs. Fairclough: Considering what has happened in the past, Mr. Chairman, and what has taken place in this house today, yesterday and within the last two weeks during which the opposition has been gagged and stifled, when discussion has been prohibited, when questions have been unanswered and, generally speaking, parliamentary privileges have been prostituted—

An hon. Member: Whew!

Mrs. Fairclough: I have one last remark to make, and that is that it might well happen that before this whole thing is over what has been Howe's pipe dream may well become Canada's nightmare.

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Chairman, I am going to speak as a Toronto member. I think all hon. members will recognize it as a rare occasion when a Liberal from Toronto speaks as a Toronto member. Normally that position has been arrogated by the hon. member for Eglinton and the hon. member for Broadview. Therefore it is to that extent a special occasion. However, I do doubt very much whether the power of the hon. member for Eglinton and the hon. member for Broadview will continue after this terrific display of political legerdemain which they have put on during the last few weeks. I hope also that I shall not be as emotional as the previous speaker, because I think her remarks about the hon. member for Calgary South were tawdry to say the least.

Mrs. Fairclough: Emotion is born of fright, my friend.

Mr. Hunter: The matter of the pipe line has not been considered very much by the opposition, whose members have spent their time in making innumerable motions and raising points of order and questions of privilege. They have done everything they could to keep away from the pipe line. They have not a leg to stand on, and even stupid as they may appear to be they have found that out.

There is a great deal of gas in Alberta. They cannot use it, while we could use it down here. There is an incipient shortage of power in Ontario. I should like to quote from the submission by the government of Ontario to the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects. At page 56 they had this to say:

> Added to this will be capital expenditures for the development of electric power in the order of $125 million to $150 million a year, or from nearly $1·3 billion to $1·5 billion over the ten-year period.

In addition to that I am assuming that the premier of Ontario and his provincial treasurer know something about the province where they head the government. It has been read before, but I should like to read again the letter written by Hon. Dana Porter. The Tories talk about there being no urgency, but I wish they would listen to what the Conservative provincial treasurer of the province of Ontario had to say, and I quote:

> Generally, in view of our rapid industrial expansion, coupled with the fact that our hydro-electric power resources are now approaching their maximum limits of development, the necessity of new sources of fuel for our industries and our domestic consumers is becoming increasingly urgent. We agree with you that further delays in the construction of this project would have very adverse consequences. Time has become of the essence. Every day's delay invites the most serious consequences to the development of Ontario, and to the national economy. In these circumstances, it would appear essential that the western section of the line be completed during the year 1956. To accomplish this, we understand that actual construction must be commenced not later than July 1.

I hear it reiterated time after time by these great experts over here that there is no hurry. I cannot think of a more negative or obstructive or reactionary or destructive outlook. These people apparently do not want the pipe line built. They say they do, but their actions indicate otherwise. They have been objecting to the application of a thing called closure, and have been trying every dodge in the books to prevent it. I think it is high time this small group of political misfits began to realize that there is a government here and that it is going to run the affairs of this country.

I should like to refer to an editorial which appeared in the Financial Post of May 19, reading as follows:

> Here is an important piece of national business to get done. Weather in this country limits the construction season.
> One of the main reasons for the government going to the help of the pipeliners at all is to make certain that at least the Alberta to Winnipeg part of the line is built this season.
> It would be an outrage to let mere gas-bagging in the House of Commons result in the waste of another construction season.
> And this is important: All the political parties say they want a pipe line fast. There is no longer any argument as to what route the line should take. The only argument turns on what company shall do the job.
> One very disreputable effort at confusing the public relates to the financial help which the government is giving the pipeliners.
> One C.C.F.er gave his hearers the impression that the government loan to the pipeliners would be a charge on taxpayers' pockets the same as hospital bills or additional pensions.
> If this man had wanted to give his hearers the truth of the situation he would have pointed to the difference in the investing of money in a sound loan repayable with interest in a year and the spending of money for goods to be consumed—like ice cream cones.
> The fact of the matter is the government's help to the pipeliners is unlikely to cost the taxpayer anything. Either the loan is repaid with interest, or the government will own the line.
> The recent noise on parliament hill over the gas line should be recognized for what it is: a violent effort by the opposition parties to mislead and befuddle the Canadian public in the hope of making political profit for the next election.

That is from a paper which has not always been friendly to this government. May I also refer you to another article which appeared in the Financial Post of June 2, reading as follows:

The Case for Speed is Clear and Urgent

The loud and lengthy row in Ottawa about the gas pipe line is not serving the national interest.

Opposition M.P.'s would like the public to believe that they are a platoon of John Hampdens saving parliament from executive tyranny and defending a Canadian natural resource against foreign exploitation.

What they are really doing is endangering a project that will be greatly to the advantage of the Canadians in the west who want to sell gas and the other Canadians, mainly in the east, who want to buy it.

It is unfortunate that negotiations with Trans-Canada did not mature fast enough to let the government present its plan earlier in the session. To announce closure before the debate began may have been ham-handed.

But the case for speed is clear. Actually the key purpose of the government's proposal was speed—to get the job going this summer.

If action in this construction season were not a matter of concern, the government would not be making its present proposal and Trans-Canada would be left to continue its hunt for loans in the normal places. So a lengthy filibuster which would prevent action this construction season would be just as much a frustration of majority will as defeat of the measure itself.

This is not a Sell-Out

The trouble with the opposition is not that it has been gagged but that it has been unconvincing and unconstructive.

Canadian taxpayers, it is said, are being asked to pay Americans for laying the pipe line. The fact is that the government is merely proposing a loan repayable with interest. And if the pipe line were any such sure-fire profit bonanza as some opposition speakers imply, there would not be five minutes' delay in getting the required loans. Actually, the pipe line itself is at best a very modest profit proposition.

Wildly extravagant and ill-founded statements have been made that this is a vicious sell-out of natural resources to foreigners.

Natural resources are of only hypothetical value until they can be sold. The pipe line will give western Canadians a lot of revenue for something they can't sell now. Their raw material sales will serve the interest of eastern Canadian industries and householders first.

Gas which is surplus to Canadian needs will be sold in the United States.

Do we hear cries of "sell-out to foreigners" when Canada makes gigantic sales of forest products and minerals to Americans, often through United States controlled companies? Of course not.

Let parliament stop this politics-playing, get this matter settled and get ahead on this and other pieces of important national business.

Of course, the C.C.F. want to nationalize the pipe line. I do not blame them for that. They have always been a socialist party, and they would like to nationalize all the means of production. Anybody with any common sense knows that if we can get a natural resource from Alberta to eastern Canada without paying for it with taxpayers' money, we would have a hole in our heads if we paid for it out of the taxpayers' money. This line is not a national asset; it is a construction job. If we can get private industry to pay for that construction job—

An hon. Member: If.

Mr. Hunter: —we would be unworthy of our positions here if we spent the taxpayers' money on it. They keep on saying, "We have sold our birthright." The only thing we have sold to the Americans is some surplus gas. What do they want us to do with it? Should we burn it or cap it? It is absurd to say we are selling out to the Americans when we are selling surplus gas to the Americans. The Americans sold us large quantities of oil during the war. They did not cut it off. They let us have it because they are friends of ours.

An hon. Member: You do not live in southwestern Ontario.

Mrs. Fairclough: They did cut it off during the war.

Mr. Hunter: You are a little emotional; keep quiet. Not only that, but this pipe line and the energy that comes from it will in turn provide employment for many thousands of Canadians who would never get that employment if they depended on this handful of misfits over here to my left. I wonder if they suggest that we should send back to the United States American subidiaries in Canada such as General Motors of Canada, Chrysler Corporation of Canada, Ford of Canada, Canadian General Electric, Westinghouse, Bell Telephone, International Business Machines, National Cash Register, Goodyear, C.I.L., Imperial Oil, International Nickel and Anaconda Brass? Would you send those companies back? They provide thousands and thousands of well-paid jobs to Canadian citizens.

Mr. Rowe: Whose policy brought them here?

Mr. Hunter: This is a very large scheme. In fact it is so large that the people in that part of the house cannot even understand it. The Leader of the Opposition brought up a new slogan the other day. How did it go? "On guard for Canada." I should like to suggest a more apt slogan than that for the Tories: "Obstruction always; construction never."

As far as this marriage of convenience between this so-called Conservative group, the great reactionary group, and the socialists is concerned, it is going to be very interesting to see what the progeny will be. One thing is sure. The C.C.F. had better take note that the Leader of the Opposition is so famous for his boners that they are making a terrible mistake in going near him.

I wonder where the Leader of the Opposition gets his ideas. I have often wondered that. I certainly know where he could have got this one, and that is straight from Moscow. I have a pamphlet which reads:

Stop, Look, Listen, Premier St. Laurent!

That is signed by Tim Buck. Everything in it is what the Leader of the Opposition has been talking about for the past two weeks. It is rather amusing that the Leader of the Opposition could fall for this communist propaganda. It is not only inept; it is ludicrous. It just shows where political expediency can land an unwary politician. Anti-Americanism as a political platform is a tawdry and sordid affair.

Mr. Rowe: You should know; you have used it for 25 years.

Mr. Hunter: It took the Leader of the Opposition a long time to find out that under section 155 of the Companies Act the majority of directors had to be subjects of Her Majesty resident in Canada. First of all, he criticized the government very strongly for not providing it in the bill. But I understand the Leader of the Opposition has been out of the practice of law for many years and had forgotten the contents of part 3 of the federal Companies Act.

In conclusion I wish merely to say that this country and its citizens in the days to come are going to thank God for the Prime Minister of this country and for the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mitchell (London): Mr. Chairman, this Grit gag has been rammed so far down my throat—

An hon. Member: Good.

Mr. Mitchell (London): —that I do not know whether I can speak.

An hon. Member: You never could.

Mr. Mitchell (London): Even if I cannot, I am not sure it is worth while voicing my words in the tattered remnants of what was once a free parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mitchell (London): We have heard in the last few days some most amazing statements in this house.

An hon. Member: That is for sure.

Mr. Mitchell (London): We have seen some amazing incidents. I have been blessed with a strong stomach which has seen me through quite a few revolting occasions, and I have been able to stand a number of revolting statements. I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that this afternoon in this house occurred the most revolting thing I have ever heard. On the one hand, in an effort to drown out the speeches which could properly have been made, I heard a song, "Hail, Hail, the Gang's All Here; What the Hell Do we Care?" From the choir to my right I heard something I thought I would never hear in these halls—a travesty, a sacrilege—when they attempted to sing a song I have always loved. I think there are many members in this house, on all sides of the house, who resent the singing of that hymn in this house.

An hon. Member: You call it a song?

Some hon. Members: Name it.

Mr. Mitchell (London): I do not want to bother them any further than they are bothered now. They are so worried over there that they cannot even sleep. It was "Onward, Christian Soldiers", if you must have the name. The hon. member for Parkdale, who stands up with such righteous zeal, was one of those who participated in it.

We are discussing here not one pipe line but two pipe lines. One of those pipe lines is projected in the mind of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The other pipe line is completed; it is the pipe line that runs from the desk of the leader of the house to the Chair. The only difficulty with that pipe line is that it sprang a leak on one occasion, and the Chair did not know; but the leader of the house was directing the Chair what to do.

An hon. Member: You have a filthy mind.

Mr. Mitchell (London): I have eyes too, and I can see what goes on, and I saw the nod that was missed. I saw the passing of papers from the Minister of Trade and Commerce to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, pure and simple evidence that the pipe line exists.

We heard some quotations—as a matter of fact, we did not hear very much but quotations—from the hon. member for Parkdale. I should like to refer him to a quotation from a speech made in the house by the Minister of Trade and Commerce who is piloting this bill, if you can call it piloting. As found at page 4405 of Hansard of May 28 the minister said:

. . . why are we pressing this? Well, I do not know—

Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation

That is one of the most significant statements, Mr. Chairman, despite what the member for Parkdale may say, that has yet been made in the house. "I do not know". In effect he says, "I do not know why we are ramming this down the throats of members of this house". Then he went on to say:

—perhaps I get overenthusiastic . . .

Well, Mr. Chairman, I have no objection whatsoever to enthusiasm. I get enthusiastic myself, and I think each and every one of us does. But I suggest that overenthusiasm is just as bad a fault and in many cases worse than a negative approach. It leads to trouble. Here we are with a bill on which debate has been closed off at every opportunity. There have been no second looks, and I suggest that second looks are often advisable, even for the omnipotent and all-powerful Minister of Trade and Commerce.

It was possible some weeks ago, Mr. Chairman, to have an honest and open examination before a committee of the provisions of the resolution and the bill. I admit that because of the tactics that have been followed by the government that is no longer possible. But we should at least have such answers as the Minister of Trade and Commerce can give us, and we should have those answers given to us here. I refer to another statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce found at page 4404 of Hansard of May 28, where he is reported as saying:

I have spoken three times in this debate—

You will recall what he did on each and every occasion when he spoke.

—and my purpose in rising now is to attempt to make this a committee where questions that are asked can be answered.

Mr. Fulton: And he is not even here tonight.

Mr. Mitchell (London): Mr. Chairman, I suggest that he has not answered the questions. In fact, one of the amusing things is that the only question he answered he answered incorrectly. At page 4475 of Hansard of May 30 I find these words of the minister:

I have a correction that has to do with the figures I gave on the cost of gas.

That is the only time he has intervened to answer any questions that have been posed to him during the course of the debate. You say: All right, what questions have been asked that he has not answered? I refer you to the remarks which were made by the hon. member for St. Paul's. I refer you to the questions which were asked by the member for Peel. I refer you to the remarks which were made by the member for Spadina. All I can say, Mr. Chairman, is that with the exception of this one time when the minister intervened to correct a misstatement he had made, the minister has not deigned to answer the questions which have been posed to him.

I now propose to refer to some remarks made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce last session. During a somewhat similar debate I made some reference to the unemployment and farm relief act, which has also been referred to during the course of this debate. The minister interposed during the course of my remarks to say, as found at page 5028 of Hansard of June 20, 1955:

Mr. Speaker, I am sure my hon. friend would like to amplify a little. I do not recognize the legislation. Was that the blank cheque legislation?

Subsequently, Mr. Chairman, on the next occasion when I had the honour to be addressing the house the minister again referred to that remark to which I replied, as found at page 5796 of Hansard of July 6, 1955:

Referring to blank cheques, what could be more of a blank cheque than this present legislation?

At that time, Mr. Chairman, I had no idea just how far the present Minister of Trade and Commerce would go. Standing here tonight I am reminded of a musical that I have enjoyed witnessing and listening to on many occasions but which has now ceased to have the same enjoyment for me because it contains a certain song I would love to sing but for lack of voice will not do so. The words are, "He's gone about as far as he can go." The present minister has certainly gone about as far as he can go; but who knows, apparently there are no limits to the arrogance and the imagination of the person who holds that portfolio at the present time. I say further that, politically speaking, the government has not only gone about as far as it can go. It has gone as far as it can go.

What about this blank cheque? I propose to examine what are the normal requirements of a cheque. No. 1 is the date. We have before us a cheque in the form of a bill, a bill which is placed before us for signature. The only definite thing about that bill is its date. Usually the person drawing the cheque, namely this parliament, has something to say about the date. This cheque was dated long before it was ever placed before the drawer for consideration. The payee came to the government with a gun in its hand and said "either or else". I want to know what vicious circumstances lie behind the fact that the government has the unmitigated gall to bring to parliament for signature a cheque which was dated long in advance of the time we had any opportunity to consider it.

The tragedy of the matter is that the drawer is dying in the process, and only the future will tell how bad indeed was this cheque. The drawer will die of the fetters that shackle him, just as surely as free men and free parliaments have done elsewhere; and you and I, Mr. Chairman, have seen them so die.

What is the second requirement of a cheque? I suggest that it is the name of the payee, and I ask who is the payee of this cheque? On looking at section 4 of the bill I find the name of the payee. We have not been permitted to discuss sections 1, 2 or 3. Section 4 is the first opportunity we have had to consider the nature of the person to whom this cheque is going to be made payable. Who is the payee? The minister talks of blank cheques. This cheque is not only blank, it is bunk.

I ask you, Mr. Chairman, to examine clause 4. In clause 4 I find that the payee is named on about five occasions, namely "the corporation." Who is going to negotiate a cheque made payable to "the corporation"? We have had no opportunity to discuss the nature of the corporation, what its assets were, what its liabilities were or what its possibilities of building this project were if we signed this cheque. As far as this minister is concerned I can only say this; how blank can he get?

Let us now look at the next requisite of a cheque. I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that perhaps the amount is something which should be considered. In this case the government contends that it is presenting to us—

Mr. Fulton: More instructions via the pipe line?

Mr. Mitchell (London): Yes; the pipe-line corporation is in action, I see. The government presents to us a cheque which it says is for $130 million. I look at section 6, in which it is said that the amount shall not exceed $130 million. Mr. Chairman, I ask you this question. Is that a proper cheque? I ask that question for two reasons. One is this. May the amount be less? But by far the most important one is this. What is going to happen if this chosen instrument of this all-powerful minister fails to raise the necessary financing? Then this cheque is going to be raised. This cheque is going to have to be raised.

Mr. Chairman, may I now turn to what is perhaps one of the other most serious requirements of a cheque and it is this. On whom is this cheque drawn? Who is the banker who is going to pay this cheque when we are forced to sign it? I suggest that it is the Canadian taxpayer, as each and every one of us knows, and that once again he is being put in the position so well depicted in various cartoons as "UNO Who". What does the average taxpayer know about what is taking place on this particular occasion? We have been throttled here. We have had no opportunity of calling witnesses before us, as was done when this chosen instrument received its charter—

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mitchell (London): Somebody says "oh, oh"; and that very somebody was present, I believe, in the committee that examined and cross-examined the witnesses when they established to the satisfaction of that committee that they were able to finance and to build this line completely in Canada. Now he says "oh, oh". What has happened? Why have we not been given the opportunity, by examination and cross-examination of competent witnesses, to find out why this company that was the chosen instrument is no longer able to finance and build this line completely in Canada? Why have the Canadian people not been told through the medium of that committee and through the medium of answers—however inadequate—given in that committee what the proposition is? Not only are the Canadian people not being told, Mr. Chairman, but we have had closure thrust down our throats at every step.

I suggest to the minister that he could have saved himself and his government a great deal of trouble if he had gone into this matter on a businesslike and reasonable basis, and had applied closure if necessary instead of as of right. If he was interested in having the public, who are going to foot the bill, know what was going on, why did he not permit reasonable debate at all stages? Why did he move closure immediately on the resolution? Why on the second reading? Why on clauses 1, 2 and 3 in committee?

An hon. Member: For concealment.

Mr. Mitchell (London): Why did he do that? I submit, Mr. Chairman, that all he had to do was permit the debate to take its normal course. Then if he found that the debate was not taking a normal course, if he found that the opposition were obstructing and being unreasonable, that was the time to introduce closure and no one could have criticized him for doing so. But here he had a date set long before the people who are going to be called upon to sign this cheque had even heard of it. He had a date set, and he is determined to ram this thing through this house in the quickest possible time. Then he is amazed, hurt and dismayed to find that Canadians who sit on this side of the house are not prepared to be treated in that way.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Henderson): May I advise the hon. member that his time has now expired.

Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Chairman, the official opposition seem to have had two things in mind all through this debate; first to get as far away as possible from discussing the bill—and we have had some very good examples of that tonight—for the obvious reason that they had nothing better to offer; and second, to use every means at their disposal to prevent those who wish to debate the issue from doing so.

Mr. Fulton: Is this another Cockfield Brown speech?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): For five years in the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines and in this House of Commons they built up the hon. member for Calgary South as an expert on oil and gas.

Mr. Fulton: No, we didn't. You did.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): All their problems in connection with oil and gas were taken to the hon. member for Calgary South for his approval or disapproval, and not a single decision could be taken without his endorsation.

Mr. Fulton: Did you have your eye at the keyhole?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): His word was the final answer for the Tories during those five years. During this debate, however, the Tories who are so critical of closure being applied imposed a rigid type of closure. They speak so often of freedom of speech. In so far as the hon. member for Calgary South is concerned, not one single word could he have uttered in this house if in any way they could have stopped him. The only way he was allowed to speak was for some of the other parties to give him the floor in place of one of their own members. It was not the Tory party which gave him the privilege of expressing his views. After this privilege had been provided, however, his friends—those who had been boosting him as an oil expert for five years—after he was given an opportunity to speak in place of a Liberal, tried to stop him from speaking.

Another great worry among the Tories is United States domination. We hear that so often.

Mr. Fulton: Hear, hear. Read the current issue of Maclean's magazine.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): They object to United States capital coming into this great country of ours to develop the industries that provide employment for Canadian people. They have always advocated Canadian raw materials for Canadians first, and no export of any raw material until every Canadian from coast to coast has been satisfied, regardless of how unrealistic this might appear from an economic standpoint. One of their group, however, takes a far different view. The hon. member for Broadview, speaking on this matter on May 18—and these remarks will be found at page 4090 of Hansard—was asked by the hon. member for Halifax if he supported the McMahon proposals. The hon. member for Broadview replied:

> The McMahon proposal looks like an excellent one. Yes, I certainly do.

The McMahon proposal was designed to export 80 per cent of the capacity of the pipe line outside of Canada. That statement came from one of the greatest flag-wavers I have ever seen in the House of Commons. Not 20 per cent was he going to export; he was prepared to export 80 per cent. I for one—

Mr. Michener: What is the capacity of the pipe line?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): —have little worry with regard to United States capital coming into this country. In fact—

Mr. Michener: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I sat quietly here for three weeks while you were yapping.

Mr. Fulton: That is the courtesy you get from the Liberals.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I can think of no better capital that can come from anywhere. I might also suggest I can think of no finer people that I would like to have as neighbours.

Mr. Fulton: We do not mind them as neighbours; we do not want them as owners.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I would not mind having them in my house. I have brothers and relatives in the United States and I consider that they are as good United States citizens as I am a Canadian.

Much of the criticism that we have had to listen to as well has centred around the fact that the government was lending money to a company which originated outside Canada. That has been a great worry to our Tory friends. One would be led to believe that the Tory party had never supported such a proposal, and would fight any such idea just as long as they could stand on their feet.

In looking over the record of that once great Tory party since the turn of the century—and I am thankful we have had very few Tory governments in that period—I find that order in council P.C. 2490 of November 29, 1933, under the Bennett government, guaranteed a loan to the Canadian Pacific Railway of $60 million; and at that period less than 13 per cent of the stock of that company was owned in Canada.

This government has been called the "government by order in council", or the "order in council government". That loan was granted by R. B. Bennett by order in council. He did not bring it before parliament, and it was not tabled until the next session. I suggest that $60 million is an enormous amount of money because in that period, 1933, it constituted 20 per cent of our total federal revenue, and today it would be the equivalent of over $900 million, based on today's revenue. I wish to make it abundantly clear, however, that I am not criticizing the loan to the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. Fulton: Your government permitted inflation.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I would suggest that under the Tory party of that time God knows anyone who could get a loan needed it, individuals as well as large corporations, because I went through that period with my two hands in salt water trying to make a living and I know how hard R. B. Bennett tried to make it for me to live at all. Therefore I can realize why large corporations and individuals would need a little help. But might I say of this period that while a $60 million loan out of a total revenue of $300 million was granted to the Canadian Pacific Railway, R. B. Bennett could find only 20 cents a day for the poor working man who could not find a job. The amount involved in this bill that we have been trying to discuss here is less than 2 per cent of our total revenue; in fact, 1·7 per cent.

We have heard all this talk about United States domination, lending money to a company that is not owned within Canada, but here is an example of the great government of R. B. Bennett that lent 20 per cent of the total revenue of 1933 to a company that was 83 per cent owned outside this country of ours.

Mr. Pearson: By order in council.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I should like to take a few minutes to deal with some criticism that was handed out by the hon. member for Eglinton. I understand that for some cause he was called out of order. Tonight I noticed that the hon. member for Hamilton West used these words when speaking of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, "under suspicious circumstances". Well, now, in my opinion and in the opinion of a great many in this house, the drama that was put on last Friday, a week ago today, was prearranged and premeditated well in advance. It came to a conclusion, however, as a result of what was called the refusal of the chairman to allow the hon. member for Eglinton to speak.

I have gone over Hansard of three days only, May 23, 24 and 25. I find that the name of the hon. member for Eglinton appears as speaking 118 times during that three-day period. If the 264 members had taken the same amount of time we would have had 31,152 speeches, and if the average length of their speeches had been five minutes, not 15 minutes or 20 minutes, it would have taken 155,760 minutes or 2,596 hours.

Now, we all know that the average hours of sitting of this house over the week are five hours a day. If this is broken down I find it would take 519 sitting days to provide all the members the same privilege accorded the hon. member for Eglinton during those three days. With a five-day week, which is what we have been working, it would take—and I want hon. members to remember those figures—104 weeks or exactly two years without any recess at all to give all members of the House of Commons the same length of time that was given to the hon. member for Eglinton. He is the hon. gentleman who spoke over the radio and over television and was quoted in the press and had parades in the city of Toronto. I understand that thousands turned up at the airport.

Some hon. Members: Twenty-six.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I leave it to the house and to the citizens of this country to judge for themselves whether the hon. member for Eglinton was denied the right to speak in the House of Commons.

Mr. Fulton: Get the figures accurately; don't distort them.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Was there some question? I would like to say at this point, for the benefit of the hon. member to my left, that he should remember those figures. Those 104 weeks, or two years, would take us to clause 4 of this bill; that is all. It would take us 104 weeks to reach clause 4 because that is where we were when the flag was put on the hon. gentleman's desk and he bowed out of the House of Commons. I leave it to the house and to the citizens of this country, as I have said, to judge whether the hon. member for Eglinton had been denied the right to speak in this house.

I want to say just a few words about closure.

Mr. Fulton: When are you going to get to the pipe line?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Over four months ago this government and the people of this country were warned by prominent members of the official opposition and of the C.C.F. group over the radio, in the press and wherever they could find a chance to speak, that they were going to filibuster the pipeline bill.

Mr. Fulton: What a panic you fell into.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): We knew that early in January. Over this 4-month period they kept the threat before the public continuously that they were going to filibuster, and it was suggested that the filibuster of last year was but a drop in the bucket.

Mr. Fulton: Panic, panic.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Closure is a rule that originated in the mother of parliaments, and we hear that quotation from the Tories quite often. It has been used 122 times in the past five years at Westminster.

Mr. Fulton: They do not have a closure rule there like this one.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Why should the Tories object to the use of a device of their own creation, because it was their own prime minister who used it first in this country. I want to suggest that I am one who believes that closure should have been used long ago, and I want that to go on the record right here tonight. One case was during the debate on the wheat bill a couple of months ago, when we sat here day after day and heard the same thing over and over again.

I say that for this reason. The very people whom we were trying to help were the ones who were filibustering. We who come from eastern Canada and from the far western part of the country suggest to you that it gets very tiresome when we have done everything we can to try to assist that particular group and we have to sit here and take abuse for doing it. That is why I am suggesting tonight I only wish that we had used closure before, and I hope we use it more often in the future.

I have one other thing to say. I see my time is getting short. I hope the day will never come in a democratic country when the majority are unable to rule. I believe in an opposition.

Mr. Ellis: When are you going to say anything about the pipe line?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I have said more about the pipe line than all of your group put together since the debate started. I believe in an opposition, surely, but I do not believe in minority rule. That section of the British North America Act quoted by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George on Tuesday night is a very appropriate and a very good reminder.

Mr. Fulton: What has that to do with the pipe line?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): The section he referred to was section 49, which reads as follows:

> Questions arising in the House of Commons shall be decided by a majority of voices.

Mr. Rowe: Voices?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): And when we get away from that fact we are getting a long, long way from democracy.

Mr. Rowe: You did say voices?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): There would have been voices heard in every case if your group had not forced recorded votes. If you had not done that about two-thirds of the votes would have been standing votes; but no, you wanted to waste more time and keep your whip in the corridors and up in the rooms.

Mr. Rowe: You said voices but you won't let us talk. You tell us we can vote but not voice.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Constructive criticism is a fine contribution to any debate, but when one criticizes without at the same time suggesting some alternative proposal one is wasting one's own time and the time of the house.

Mr. Rowe: So you say.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): The opposition have stated many times that they have been denied the privilege of discussing the first three clauses of this bill. Surely they will not insist they have discussed clause 4 after this debate is over, because we have listened to a discussion concerning everything in the wide world except the bill itself. They have, without interference from the chair—they have never been called to order—strayed as far away from the subject as they liked. We have had a rehash of elections in Quebec and Saskatchewan and in other places, and no one was called to order.

The last thing in the world that group wanted to do was discuss this bill. Why? It is for one reason and for one reason alone; they do not have a single constructive suggestion. There was not an idea in their heads, any more than there ever was. The only thing they wanted to do was discuss procedure and waste time in an effort to delay this thing.

I will mention one other matter briefly. We have been told on many occasions that this is one of the most important debates in the history of this country. Well, I sat across there last Tuesday afternoon and for one hour there were never more than eight Conservatives in their seats, and for quite a long period there were only three. These are the gentlemen who inform us this is one of the most important debates that has taken place in the history of this country. If it is as important as they suggest, I am still eagerly waiting for some of them to discuss it.

An hon. Member: They have gone home.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): However, they do not want to discuss it because they have nothing to offer. They are just stumbling around in chaos. That is exactly the position they are in at the present time, I would say.

In closing I want to say, regardless of what has been said in the heat that has been generated since this debate began, the minority in this house may believe they should be running the show but that just cannot be so. The majority must rule. It is all right to obstruct to a certain point, but when the obstruction gets to the point where we have demonstrations such as we have seen here in the last ten days it is going too far. I might also say without any thought or fear of contradiction that crass statements that should have been withdrawn have all come from that part of the house.

I have been here for 11 years, and I believe I have made some friends in the city of Ottawa. In conclusion, I do not know how long I will be here but as long as I am here I pray I will never say some of the things that have been said during this debate, and I hope they will never be said again in this house. Let us get down to business and do the work we were sent here to do, and forget about wasting time.

Mr. Fulton: Tell us about the pipe line.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Let us forget about defeating one another—

Mr. Fulton: Come on, tell us about the pipe line.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Davie, I will say this to you in closing. I have listened patiently to you during all the time you have been on your feet and some of the craziest ideas I have ever heard—

Mr. Fulton: Tell me about the pipe line.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): —have come from you.

Mr. Fulton: Tell me about the pipe line. That is what I want to hear. Tell me about the pipe line.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Yes, I will tell you about the pipe line. The pipe line will be built and this government will get credit for supporting it—

Mr. Fulton: Where?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): —and you will be damned for opposing it.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, I am going to start out very quietly but I am not sure that I will be able to control my pitch and my volume to the end.

Mr. Nowlan: Pep it up a bit.

Mr. Nicholson: In the first place I want to say how proud I am of my colleagues.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Henderson): Order. Could we kindly have quiet.

Mr. Nicholson: I want to say how proud I am of my colleagues who have been fighting this legislation from the first opportunity we had to do so but I want to pay a special tribute to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway—

Mr. Fulton: Shouldn't we all rise and pay tribute to the hero who is leaving the house?

Mr. Nicholson: The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway and the Liberal whip are the senior members in this chamber. I telephoned my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway this morning, after reading the article in the Gazette written by Arthur Blakely. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway was especially moved that a brilliant young correspondent would devote his entire column to discussing him under the title "The man from Glen William". This is a little community down in Prince Edward Island which my colleague left over 50 years ago, and it really touched him to have been associated with this interesting part of the island.

However, I think when the history of this period is written the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will be remembered as the hero of this occasion. I think it was a week ago last Saturday night when we were working on our homework until practically midnight. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre came bursting into my room and said, "I have found it at last," and then he proceeded to read as follows:

> Can that be dealt with without the consent of the provincial legislatures? Legally, I say it can. The situation appears to me to be this. There are persons and nations who reach a high estate in the affairs of men, and the high estate they reach imposes upon them high obligations. There was no obligation on the Tribune Festus to say to King Agrippa that he could not deliver Paul to the Jews when they requested that he be put to death. It occurs to one, however, that they also had reached a high estate, which imposes a corresponding obligation. I copied out of the Bible on the table of this house, from the acts, the quite natural statement of Festus:

"It is not the manner of the Romans to deliver any man to die, before that he which is accused have the accusers face to face, and have licence to answer for himself concerning the crime laid against him."

At this point I broke in. "What are you reading?" I asked. "Wait till you hear the rest of it", he said; and he continued:

There was no statute; there was no law which required that this be done; but there was the concept in the Roman conscience that it was the proper thing to do.

If it is fair; if it is just; if it is proper according to the standards of human decency, it will be done; if it is unfair; if it is unjust; if it is improper, all members of this house will say, "It is not our manner to do such things".

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said, "That was our Prime Minister; don't you remember back in 1946"? I must confess I had forgotten about the incident. I do not know of any person in Canada who would have remembered that speech for ten years and would have thought of finding it and using it in this particular debate other than the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I recall the incident. Our late friend Art Smith from Calgary directed a very difficult question to the then Minister of Justice, the present Prime Minister, who without any preparation and without any notes made this remarkable reply.

I must express real sympathy for the Prime Minister of Canada for having had to go through experiences which I am sure have been most distasteful to him during the past two or three weeks. I have a similar feeling for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. They both entered public life after they had done their share of the world's work. They both had achievements of which they could be proud. The only explanation I can give is that they have had very bad advice.

The hon. member for Nanaimo said that the only person he could think of on the government benches or in the cabinet who could conceive and give such poor direction was the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. I cannot think of anyone else either on the government benches who could use such poor judgment and who could convince his elders to pull so many boners. I think the majority of the government members are embarrassed as a result of the leadership they have been forced to follow during these difficult days. I am sure the majority of them were unhappy when some of their colleagues made no contribution whatever to this debate except to stand up and vote and call out "Shame" when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was performing his duty. I am also convinced that when the committee has made its report it will be demonstrated beyond a shadow of a doubt that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was right as usual.

Another thing; when the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar mentioned the fact that three of our colleagues had gone to hospital since this started, hon. members on the other side laughed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nicholson: It is on the record. Two members stood up and said, "I did not laugh." I am sure there is no hon. member opposite who will stand up and identify himself as having said "Shame" on May 22 when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was performing his parliamentary duty, not one. I am sure that hon. members who said "Resign" will not stand up and identify themselves as having made that remark. It is a sorry day for Liberalism when the only contribution some hon. members are prepared to make is to cry "Shame" when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is making the outstanding contribution that he is.

My second point is to pay tribute to the press of Canada. The press of Canada has been able to do what the elected representatives of the people were unable to do. The elected representatives of the people pleaded with the Prime Minister to give extra time, but what were they told? The answer was "No." But as a result of the press reaction across Canada the government has been forced to give us two extra days. Is it not significant that although two members have placed on the record tonight press dispatches which prove from their point of view that the government has the press behind it, only two papers were quoted, one article being quoted by both hon. members, the Financial Post and the Financial Times.

An hon. Member: The Globe and Mail.

Mr. Nicholson: Yes, I shall come to the Globe and Mail. But what about the Winnipeg Free Press?

Mr. Rowe: The Toronto Star.

An hon. Member: The Calgary Herald.

Mr. Nicholson: Referring to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the Winnipeg Free Press had this to say:

All political differences can be set aside to say of Mr. Knowles, in his home city of Winnipeg, that he is the hero of the present debate and that the position he has taken on the parliamentary issues—on the way to do things, as distinct from what is being done—is the position in which any liberal and democrat must rejoice to be with him.

That is what appeared on the editorial page of the famous Winnipeg Free Press, one of the greatest papers in Canada. Here is what Grant Dexter, a very able correspondent who for years on every possible occasion presented the behaviour of this government in the best possible light, had to say writing from Ottawa:

Through all of this hubbub, the most arresting figure on the government side of the house was Prime Minister St. Laurent. He sat, impassive, expressionless, chin in hand, an open book on his desk, silent. His aloofness is almost unbelievable.

Especially at a time of high controversy, prime ministers, regardless of who the house leader may be, always dominate proceedings and lead their own party. Mr. St. Laurent does neither.

Mr. Harris: Would my hon. friend be good enough to refer to the speeches the Prime Minister has made since that date.

Mr. Nicholson: I would, but unfortunately my time is limited to 20 minutes.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nicholson: The Prime Minister was dishonest yesterday—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Nicholson: —in representing to the house that Mackenzie King accepted closure in 1932 without protest. I have not the time to read what the Prime Minister said yesterday and what Mr. Mackenzie King said in 1932, but anyone who wants to read Hansard will come to the conclusion that the bright boy, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, who was a professor of history, did not brief his leader adequately before he spoke yesterday.

I am sorry the Minister of National Health and Welfare has left, but I am sure he will agree with me that the Windsor Star is a most reliable paper. Last Saturday the Windsor Star had this to say:

Sorry Spectacle in Commons

It is well to recognize, however, the government is to blame. By autocratic methods it is forcing through the house legislation which is not in the best interests of Canada.

Mr. Pickersgill: What is the hon. gentleman reading from?

Mr. Nicholson: The Windsor Star of Saturday, May 26. Also from the Windsor Star by Lum Clark, who is a close friend of the minister—Mr. Chairman, I must draw your attention to the fact that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration is trying to cut down my time limit of 20 minutes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Nothing would give me greater pleasure.

Mr. Nicholson: Lum Clark had this to say:

During debate on the emergency powers act, Right Hon. C. D. Howe said: "If we want to do it, who do you think is going to stop us?"

Who is going to stop the government ramming through the pipe line loan?

If the Liberals want to do it, they can vote it through. Party discipline will see to that.

Th Windsor Star also said:

The late Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King had his faults. He had, however, a respect for the Commons and an ability to handle it. He would never have resorted to closure—

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nicholson: One member of the government, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, is the only one who is applauding.

An hon. Member: Mackenzie King is communicating with him.

Mr. Nicholson: That is the message, I suppose. I continue:

—it being alien to his concepts of Liberalism. And Mr. King would never have been trapped into the deal in which the present government has got itself.

I must finish, Mr. Chairman. Mr. King would never have been trapped into the deal into which the present government has got itself.

What has happened in the Commons during the past few days always will be a stain on the Liberal party's banner. It is impossible to reconcile true Liberalism with the methods of autocrats.

Of course I must not pass over the Toronto Star. There are a number of other newspapers that I have here, but the Toronto Star, which has so loyally supported the present administration—

Mr. Pickersgill: What is the date of that?

Mr. Nicholson: This is dated Saturday, May 26:

The government made its mistake in resorting to closure before there was any justification for it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Read some of the editorials this week.

Mr. Nicholson: It continues:

If it admits this error now by permitting several days of unfettered debate, it can help to wipe out the bitterness that has developed and get the pipe-line debate back on a serious and constructive plane.

The London Free Press says:

Respect for the Speaker is vital to the survival of parliament, but this respect must be earned and maintained by impartial use of the powers which parliament vests in the Speaker.

I see the minister is following this very closely. This is in the London Free Press of Monday, May 28.

One of the most unfortunate aspects of the present situation is the position in which it places the Speaker and the difficulty he faces in maintaining anything like an impartial attitude under current conditions.

Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation

The pipe line may be an important issue and speed may be essential in implementing it. But the preservation of parliament and its rights to investigate is much more important.

May I conclude with the words of a great Canadian, Sir Wilfrid Laurier. When he was in a situation such as we have had here in the past short time, he said:

We introduced the reciprocity measure on January 26, and on July 29 we had not yet been able to obtain even a preliminary vote upon it. We had been met at every step by obstruction from the Conservatives, then in opposition; dilatory motions of every kind were made, speech after speech was delivered day in and day out, even in the dog days of summer. I did not complain. I did not whine. Two courses were open to me. I could have done as is done today by the prime minister, I could have introduced the closure and said that we must carry on the business of the government and that consistently with our dignity, we could not allow obstruction. But there was another course open to me and that was an appeal to the people; and I advised my colleagues to give the hon. gentlemen of the opposition the opportunity of appealing to the people. We appealed to the people and we were defeated. Heaven is my witness that I would rather stand here today, defeated and in opposition by that appeal to the people, than stand over there in office by the power of the gag . . .

I challenge the Prime Minister of Canada to prove himself to be worthy of a great Canadian and take this issue to the people of Canada.

Mr. Bell: As is usual in such serious matters, there is a bit of humour or satire in certain things that have taken place. I am reminded of that said humour when I pick up a newspaper I received today and see the headlines, "Howe Says Sabre Best for Interception." There may be some argument as to whether it was a sabre or a guillotine, but I think we all agree that the interception was very good. I also notice that the same newspaper has a headline saying that we are watching Russian tactics. I do not think any comment is necessary on that headline.

An hon. Member: Perhaps they should be watching ours.

Mr. Bell: Seriously, I want to say at the beginning of my remarks in this serious debate that I appreciate, as a younger member of parliament, the opportunity to witness these historic days in our Canadian history. I have been fortunate or unfortunate to come from a political family and for that reason, perhaps more than any other, it has been a great privilege to have been here and to have witnessed what has gone on. I appreciate also that there are two sides to every argument, and I appreciate that probably decisions will be made during these great days; but I say without any fear of contradiction that it has been an honour for me and they are days that I shall never forget.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Coming from the maritimes, I want to begin by considering the maritimes aspect of this so-called all-Canadian issue. Many references have been made to British Columbia and the maritimes, and to the fact that they will not benefit from this pipe line. Probably the most important was the reference the Minister of Finance made in his very good speech the other night. I think he will probably agree that the weakest part of it was the part when he came to the maritimes—

Mr. Harris: Are you speaking of me?

Mr. Bell: Yes; I said it was a good speech.

Mr. Harris: Thank you.

Mr. Bell: I do not know whether it was good in comparison with the other speeches made by members on your side who have spoken, or the fact that you do not speak very much; but it was a good speech. However, the weak part of it—and the minister knows this, because when the hon. member for Royal and I interrupted him he knew we were on a strong point—is that the maritimes are going to get absolutely nothing out of this so-called all-Canadian pipe line.

The question I would like like to ask is. How much have the maritimes been considered in the investigations that have taken place with respect to the said pipe line? Was it the same as the St. Lawrence seaway, this all-Canadian seaway that will never help us one bit, this seaway for central Canada? We were not considered for one minute. There are no figures available. There are no records of investigations or all the various inquiries that might have been made into the economy of the maritimes.

Are we going to get a pipe line down there some day, in 1960 or 1970? Is it going to end at Montreal? How about some statements on that? I have some natural gas in my constituency right now. I think Albert county has about 177,000 MCF. I should like to know whether the government at some time is going to assist with a pipe line. Those are the questions we should like to ask with respect to the maritimes.

Now I come to my second point, and it is a point that means a great deal to us in the east. That is the issue of United States interests. I shall try not to be too emotional, though it is very hard after a day like this; but I shall say this, and the hon. member for Charlotte can take note of it. We have a tradition and a loyalty in the east, and I mean the far east, not the east that stops at Montreal. We have a tradition and a loyalty that is first in Canada, and I am not ashamed of it. We have the Loyalists, we have the Acadians, we have the Scotch and Irish immigrants who came out to Canada because things were tough at home. We are paying a price to be in confederation, and we want to know that things are being run well and run from an all-Canadian point of view.

The last issue, and I feel it is the most important, is one that is bigger than the pipe line. It is bigger than anything we have considered here. It is the issue of closure and the associated rights of parliament. I have my thoughts on the matter. Some people may say that it is a sinister move of the government to bring into Canada an evil form of government that is not known on the North American continent. In a recent report from Ottawa, Norman MacLeod said in an article:

> Canadians can expect the use of closure on an increasing scale. For it is about to become, so far as the St. Laurent government is concerned, an accepted and routine feature of the machinery of parliament. That is something that very few among the M.P.'s themselves realize, most taking it for granted that the current resort to closure in connection with the pipe lines bill is a one shot performance.
> But the other evening a senior cabinet minister commented: "There is one really big thing that the government has done in its handling of the legislation in parliament; it has revived closure as a part of the normal legislative process."

How evil are these thoughts, Mr. Chairman.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bell: As I said, there will be various reasons given and various explanations made why the closure motion was introduced, particularly why it was introduced in the committee stage at the first shot, an unprecedented move in our history. That, Mr. Chairman, was the day the great Liberal newspapers of Canada turned against the present government. The Winnipeg Free Press and the Toronto Daily Star, in editorials that have continued until today, have criticized as strongly as they can the use of closure at the committee stage in the unprecedented way it was used.

What is the reason for this, Mr. Chairman? I will tell you the reason I think it was invoked. The reason is that the members of the present government, particularly those who sit on the front benches, have not the respect for the traditions of parliament they should have, and I will tell you why they have not. Because they have not any political background.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bell: All right, I will back that up. There are eight members of the present cabinet who had no political savvy whatsoever when they were appointed to the cabinet. More than that, they were not even members of parliament. I am going to take a minute to deal with this point, because I think it goes to the root of the whole problem. They have not the respect for British traditions that they would have had if they had been interested in politics before they became members of parliament. Let us look at the record. The Prime Minister was appointed to the cabinet on December 10, 1941. He was elected a member of parliament on February 9, 1942.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bell: How about the Minister of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. Sinclair: Twenty-one years in parliament and you have been in parliament three years.

Mr. Bell: How about the time before that? How about the time he was in business?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bell: All right, this is my point, Mr. Chairman. He was elected in 1935 and appointed to the cabinet on October 23, 1935.

Mr. Sinclair: Twenty-one years.

Mr. Bell: What do these people know about grass roots politics in Canada? What do they know about our traditions?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bell: Hon. members laugh, but I wish today that Edmund Burke could come into this house and see the flagrant use of closure that has been made. I would love to bring Disraeli and Gladstone here and show them a silent Prime Minister on one of the most important days in our history. These members of the cabinet do not have that appreciation of the traditions of politics that mean so much to us, or the early training that would have prevented such action at this time. To sum up this point, I say that is one reason in my opinion why we are having trouble today, because in the cabinet there are eight men who came up the easy way.

Mr. Sinclair: Jimmy Gardiner?

Mr. Bell: They did not win their spurs in politics in any respect before they came to the glorified positions of members of the cabinet. I can name them, too. There is the Minister of Labour sitting there.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bell: I shall not go into his background. In fact perhaps I should say that he did have an interest in politics. How about the Secretary of State for External Affairs?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bell: How about that other civil servant, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the hon. gentleman suggest that I know nothing about politics?

Mr. Bell: Mr. Chairman, after the smart remarks that have been made by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration today and on previous occasions, I wish he would take one of these loose closure motions that are lying around and use it on himself. But that is what is the matter with this government today. They have not the feel of politics in their blood. They have not taken the time to find out what is going on at the grass roots level in this country today. Most of them have been in business or in the civil service, and they were fortunate enough to be around in the wartime days of that great mediocrity of Canadian politics.

I say, Mr. Chairman, that the days are coming when these giants of the war days will pass. But those are the reasons we are in this state. It is not the opposition; it is not the Liberal backbenchers, it is these eight men in the cabinet who came up the easy way.

An hon. Member: How did you come up?

Mr. Hodgson: He came up in the merchant navy, and none of you fellows had guts enough to get in it.

Mr. Bell: I mentioned when I began that in the maritimes we have a very proud tradition and history, and we are paying a price to be in confederation. Make no mistake about it. When the director of the national gallery says that Saint John is the ugliest city in Canada and the maritimes have the least social and cultural development of any area in Canada I do not like it, no matter how untrue it may be.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bell: I say there is a responsibility on the Prime Minister to do something about that and not throw out the smokescreen that he did at the labour convention in Toronto a few days ago. He knows that was a smokescreen. We have been trying for a long while down our way to get some assistance, but what happens? It is the same old smokescreen, and the Minister of Finance knows it. He knows why we are waiting.

As I say, we respect our part in confederation. We have a proud old motto down our way which is—I am not too sure of my Latin —spem reducit. It means "bring back to life". I should like to throw that thought out in this house tonight, because I say the opposition are bringing back to life the real parliament that was known only by those early British parliamentarians whom the cabinet ministers have not even heard about.

The other night I read in the Toronto Star of May 28 a report of a meeting in North Bay, at which the hon. member for Timiskaming is reported as follows:

> Of the closure motion taken by the government she said "I can't repeat here, at a ladies' meeting, the words that I have heard in the house about it. The screams and roars have been terrific. We're back in the days of Sir John A."

In view of those words of the New Brunswick motto, I hope we are moving back to the days of Sir John A., because I think it would be a great contribution to Canada. In closing I want to say one thing more. Hon. members have made light of the fact that we took a Canadian flag and draped it over the desk of the hon. member for Eglinton.

An hon. Member: Where did you get it?

Mr. Bell: I want to say this. The worst part of it as far as the government were concerned was that for an hour and a half they had to look at the flag that a great many of them had not even seen before, much less appreciated.

Mr. Habel: As the member representing a riding most vitally interested in the construction of the pipe line I would feel remiss in my duty if I did not take part in this debate. However, it is my intention to try to talk about the pipe line.

I was much impressed by the speech made by the hon. member who has just taken his seat. In the last part of his remarks he referred to the flag incident. I may tell him that it did not have on me the impression it had on him, and I shall tell him why. It was the second time I had seen the flag act. I had seen the same thing done in the Ontario house by the Tories. When they are cornered they have recourse to the flag. Whenever they find themselves in a bad spot they say, "O, Canada; we stand on guard for thee". But when it comes time to sing the national anthem they do not want to listen to it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Habel: I regret, Mr. Chairman, as much as does any other member in this house the illness of certain members of the Conservative party. But if we wanted to dig a little bit to find out the reason for their illness, it might well be that we would find the reason in the report in the Ottawa Journal dated January 17, which reads as follows:

> Tom Bell, M.P. for Saint John-Albert, newly elected president of the young Conservatives of Canada, said his organization had renewed its pledge of loyalty to Mr. Drew—"We are going out united, strong and eager to do something for this party and the easiest thing to do is just 'get mad at the Grits' ", said Mr. Bell.

No one who saw what has taken place in this house in the last few weeks on this pipeline issue will say that the Conservatives did not heed that call; and mad they are in the true sense of the word. On checking the meaning in the New Century dictionary I find the following definition given of that word: "Disordered in intellect; insane; senselessly imprudent", and many others I would not dare use. That may be the reason for the illness of some of their members, which I regret as much as they do. However, I think it would help a great deal were they not to get that mad in talking about the pipe line.

An hon. Member: Does that include the Minister of Justice?

Mr. Habel: I want to congratulate the cabinet most sincerely for having taken the position they have taken on this issue. The pipe line is a vital issue to the whole of Canada, but it is a main and vital issue to the riding which I have the honour to represent. We heard the hon. member who just took his seat refer to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and say that he had come up as minister the easy way. May I read just part of a clipping that I have from the Timmins paper, the Daily Press. The Timmins Daily Press is a paper which belongs to the Thomson company; and if I am right, Thomson himself was a candidate in 1933 under the Tory banner. Therefore no one will ever say this is a Liberal paper. Here is what it says about the Minister of Trade and Commerce:

> There is no doubt that when the passing of the years shall have permitted a detached, impartial review of Canadian events in the past two decades, historians will ascribe to Mr. Howe major credit for the sweeping changes which are lifting Canada from an agricultural economy to a giant combination of both agriculture and industry, and are rapidly raising the nation to the status of a great world power.

Those words are very different but they are written by a Tory. Then in the Timmins Press as well, dated May 5, 1956, there is another editorial. I shall not read the whole thing but just the heading. I repeat that the Timmins Daily Press is owned by the Thomson Company Limited, and everybody knows how Tory that company is. Here is what they have to say in the headline:

> Government deserves praise for actions on the pipe line.

We in the northern part of Ontario have been looking forward to the day when a government would seek to help us to develop new industry and also to supply the power needed for existing industry. We are absolutely satisfied today with the stand the government is taking on the construction of a pipe line. I hold here in my hand a clipping. The hon. gentleman who immediately preceded me—I refer to the hon. member for Saint John-Albert—quoted from the Toronto Star. I will quote from the Toronto Star of May 18, 1954. The heading is:

> Despite Drew stand, "We need pipe line gas"—Porter.

I happen to know Mr. Porter, and I know he is in the Frost government in Ontario. The Toronto Star goes on to say "Howe's pipe line policy only one making sense".

We hear a great deal about United States capital. Here is a clipping from the Toronto Star of May 1, 1956. The heading is:

> Rapping investment of U.S. funds "biting hand that feeds you".

Here are the words of D. W. Ambridge, president of Abitibi Power and Paper Company:

> D. W. Ambridge, president of Abitibi Power and Paper Company, yesterday said he had no sympathy for critics of expansion of U.S. capital into Canada.

I doubt very much whether Mr. Ambridge happens to be a strong supporter of the Liberal party. Yesterday, on getting my newspaper of May 30, I was surprised indeed to read the report from Ottawa written by Patrick Nicholson, who, I understand, is a reporter for the Daily Press. Here is what he had to say:

> George Drew, leader of the Conservative opposition in parliament, has an unequalled talent for snatching disaster from the jaws of opportunity.
> Independent comments—if anyone in Ottawa can remain truly independent during the current pipe line wrangle—suggests that Drew has unerringly picked a dud again. Just so in the 1949 election he vainly strove to make the North Star aircraft a successful election issue. Just so in 1953 he vainly tried to win the electors by the wild proposal for dramatic tax cuts, which one of his more puerile advisers here dreamed up.

We heard a lot about closure, Mr. Chairman. I should like to remind the Leader of the Opposition that he himself used closure once in the provincial house. During this debate I have seen in the gallery every day throughout this week the very man against whom he used closure at that time. He was glad to see the tactics of the Tory party, because they were exactly what he was trying to do himself in the provincial house at the time he was turned down by the Tories.

That goes to show, Mr. Chairman, that they are not able to speak about the pipe line. They have vainly talked about closure, rules and procedure. If I had a certificate to issue to hon. members of this house, it would be issued to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I would give him a certificate for being a master of the rules and regulations.

Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation

At the present time we need the gas for industry up north. I have been told that we need it also for new industry. No less than the minister of mines of Ontario, who happens to be a Conservative, said on November 25, 1954:

Months of effort ended, pipe line through north—Kelly.

Lately Mr. Spooner, the provincial member for the riding of South Cochrane—and by the way, he is a Conservative member as well—is reported as follows:

Spooner stresses need for gas in the north

Already the Ontario municipal board has given the gas company the red light to start installing the pipe and all the needed accessories in towns like Hearst, Kapuskasing, Smooth Rock Falls, Cochrane, Iroquois Falls, and so on. In my home town of Kapuskasing we have the Spruce Falls Power and Paper Company and Kimberly-Clark. By a mere coincidence all their production is going to the New York Times, and we do not oppose that at all. That company will be using 2½ million cubic feet of that gas a day, and they are in dire need of it because, on account of the dry weather last summer, they were very much afraid they would have to curtail their operations. In fact, if one should know about gas it is the Leader of the Opposition himself. He is aware that to supply that company with the necessary power in 1953 a line was built from Crystal Falls to Kapuskasing, a distance of something like 250 miles; otherwise they would have had to close down.

There is another Abitibi Pulp and Paper Company mill at Smooth Rock Falls. There is one also at Iroquois Falls. The Abitibi production is going to the Chicago Tribune. We do not oppose that at all; we are satisfied with that. They are also in need of power.

As the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys said the other night, northern Ontario is one of the richest storehouses of mineral wealth in the world. I was glad to hear the minister say that. To justify that statement, may I say I hold in my hand an editorial from the Timmins Daily Press, dated July 7, 1955, which reads:

Ore Find Near Kapuskasing of Tremendous Interest

A report, which may have important economic repercussions in the north, came from Kapuskasing last week. It was to the effect that Algoma Steel, Bethlehem Steel and United States Steel are bidding on iron ore deposits found 30 miles north of the pulp and paper town.

The report said that the first drill core from the deposit had assayed 50 per cent magnetite and 2 per cent titanium. The presence of titanium, it is stated, means that the ore is easily refined and is thus more valuable.

While information at this stage is sketchy, "reliable sources" believe that the deposits could be vast. One informant has described the assay from first drilling as "richer than Steep Rock's richest".

[Mr. Habel.]

At Kapuskasing, in fact, a company paid $1 million for a claim in the north about three weeks ago. At Hearst lately, seven big firms have become interested in copper-nickel showings discovered last summer. I find this report in the Northern Tribune:

Seven important mining companies are interested in the property in Scofield, Ebbs and Talbot townships, which is said to contain extensive deposits of copper and nickel.

So the north is growing with all these things, and we need the gas as soon as possible. We do say with a certain assurance that we shall get it with the construction of that leg of the trans-Canada pipe line this year. It would also help in the decentralization of industry, which is one of the things in which the hon. member for Saint John-Albert is interested in.

It may also be of interest to the committee to know that as far as fuel is concerned, in the north, in the riding I represent, we pay as much as 25·8 cents a gallon for oil and as much as $32 a ton for hard briquettes. When you think of that you know what it means to us to have gas for heating, and we are looking forward to getting it as soon as possible.

I had intended to talk tonight about the obstruction of the opposition. In fact what they have done in the house is not to oppose; it is pure obstruction, but I shall refrain from talking about that. One thing I want to say is that the Leader of the Opposition always takes the stand that all government policies are wrong and everything should always be done his own way, either by select committees or by royal commissions. Then he complains of the supremacy of parliament being ignored. Well, in this instance parliament will express its will and I hope the Leader of the Opposition will understand that once the majority has voted for a measure it is parliament which has spoken.

There was also the question of United States capital. I am not going to dwell on that, but one thing I want to dwell on is this. What will be the stand of the opposition a year from now if we have to take over the trans-Canada pipe line. It is a loan that we are authorizing in this bill; it is not a hand-out. This loan is guaranteed by the assets of the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines. Where will you be next year if the assets have to be taken over? If that happens will you then stay with your friends of the C.C.F. party who are for public ownership? Will you follow the motion which the young Conservatives passed, asking that it should be built under public ownership? I just wonder about the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe, who suggested that he did not believe in the Ontario hydro because it cost too much to administer.

I conclude with these remarks, Mr. Chairman. I happen to be on the Liberal side. I was elected as a Liberal in 1953. I am going to say that even if the riding I represent today was represented by a Conservative on the other side of the house, instead of one Tory member bolting his party there would be two, because any Conservative who represented a riding in the north would not dare oppose such a necessary measure.

Mr. Stanton: Mr. Chairman, it has been initimated by many hon. members both in the house and throughout Canada that the Conservative party is opposed to the trans-Canada pipe line. Nothing could be further from the truth. I repeat, nothing could be further from the truth.

I tell my hon. friends on the government side of the house that we have not been stalling them; they have been stalling themselves. They have sought to put through the house in three weeks' time what they should have done in the last three years. They have been trying to cram this bill down our throats, to run it through the house within three weeks' time.

It is now five years since Trans-Canada Pipe Lines got their franchise to build the line across Canada, and what have they done? The government have been playing around with this company in a way worse than one would expect from a knock-kneed old man.

We have been told here in the house that we are to be blamed for obstructing the passage of this bill. That is not the case; we have not been obstructing the passage of this bill. I can tell my hon. friends on the government side of the house that if the Leader of the Opposition had been the prime minister of Canada five years ago with his Conservative following he would not have played around with Trans-Canada Pipe Lines. He would have insisted they get down to work and I am sure the western section of the line would have been completed by this time and he would be ready to go on laying the line across the province of Ontario to its destination at Montreal. He is a man who is willing, ready and insistent about getting jobs done.

My mind goes back to the time he was premier of Ontario, at which time he insisted that United States pulpwood industrialists build their mills in Ontario. At first there were delegations coming down from northern Ontario insisting that the export embargo should not be put on pulpwood because it would mean that many men would be deprived of work. What happened? The embargo was put on and that industry came up from the United States and established mills in Canada. At the present time that industry is supplying work for many thousands who are engaged in the manufacture and processing of printing products.

As I said, we are not opposed to the trans-Canada pipe line but we are opposed to the contents of this bill. Why? First, Trans-Canada came to the government and told them, "You must build the line across northern Ontario from the Manitoba border to Kapuskasing". We know at that time many of the government supporters were opposed to that project. But apparently the Minister of Trade and Commerce overruled them and said, "There it is, you must take it," and like the sweet little boys they are they took it.

Then Trans-Canada came back this winter and informed the government that they would have to finance the line across the prairie provinces. The government swallowed that too, hook, line and sinker. What will happen when the line is built to Winnipeg? There are about 110 miles between there and the Ontario border. The company will come back and tell the government—this company with its millions of dollars—that the government must put up the money. The government will be told they must furnish the money for that 110-mile stretch of the line and the government will do it because they do everything Trans-Canada tells them to do. These rich oil magnates appear to have a way of wrapping our government around their little fingers. The government toes the line, just as private members of the Liberal party toe the line at the crack of the Liberal whip.

We have been told that Canadians cannot finance this line. How do we know? The government has never given Canadians an opportunity to finance it. I am sure if Canadians were given half the chance that is given to the rich oil magnates to the south they would put that line across Canada just as is being done in British Columbia where a line is being built without any government assistance whatever.

What about the question of raising money? Canadians surely have the money. Canadians have raised millions for housing. This government can extract money from Canadians in the form of taxation in the sum of approximately $5 billion. If Canadians were given a chance and were treated decently I am sure the pipe line could be built without government assistance.

Some hon. members have asked what opposition members will say when they go back to their home constituencies. I would like to read from Hansard for May 22 at page 4215, the comments of the hon. member for Kingston:

I have been gratified to note that in this house on the votes on the introduction of this legislation, the Liberal members in the big market potential area along the north shores of lake Ontario and the St. Lawrence river have voted unanimously in favour of the introduction of this bill. In other words they have voted for the immediate transmission of natural gas to their areas as an alternative source of energy.

At the same time the Conservative members for Ontario, Prince Edward-Lennox and Leeds constituencies have voted against it. Why? Can they go home and say to their electorate. "Your need for an alternative source of fuel is different in Oshawa than in Belleville, is different in Napanee than in Kingston, is different in Brockville than in Cornwall," or can they say, "You do not need natural gas until years from now." I am sure we will note with interest their explanation to their electorate of their objections to this legislation.

I may say, Mr. Chairman, we have no objection to the trans-Canada pipe line, but I know the citizens of Leeds county—knowing them to be the true Canadian citizens they are—would not tolerate my supporting this legislation. If I voted for the bill as it stands at the present, and if I voted for the closure motions that have been brought into this house, I would have to hang my head in shame when I went back to my own constituency.

The closure motion has created a rebellion amongst people across Canada. Every place we go we hear of it. Even Liberal newspapers have voiced disapproval of the government's action. I have in my hand a list of Liberal papers which are drastically opposed to this legislation and to closure. This list includes the Winnipeg Free Press, The Saskatchewan Star-Phoenix, the Toronto Daily Star and many others. Closure is something which has been wrongly perpetrated upon hon. members of parliament. It is a disgrace to the government which is ruling us at the present time. When I use the word "ruling" I mean it, because the government is ruling us in these proceedings just as Napoleon ruled his army.

Social Credit members have voted with the government, but I can understand their attitude. I specifically mention the Social Credit members from Alberta, because I believe the Social Credit members from British Columbia are just trailing along. They are anxious to sell their gas and they do not care how they get it out of Alberta. They do not care by what means they get it out or who pays the shot. They are adopting a dog in the manger attitude in order to get it out. They do not care who has to finance it.

If the Social Credit government of Alberta has so much money, as they are always saying; if that government is such a wonderful government, if they are in such good financial circumstances as they say they are, if they are making as much money as they say they are, why do they not furnish the money to build this trans-Canada pipe line across the prairie provinces? They are the ones who are so anxious for it. If it is such a good investment let them invest their money in it and not ask other parts of Canada which will receive no conceivable benefit from it to invest their money.

After listening to and watching the proceedings of the Liberal government and the Liberal cabinet and the Speaker of the house during the past two days, especially today; after listening to their remarks, I should like to quote from a speech made by Edmund Burke on March 22, 1765, during a debate on conciliation with the colonies, when he said:

A great empire and little minds go ill together.

As I said before, many people across Canada and many organizations are protesting against this closure motion and against the pipe-line bill. I wonder if the members of the government and government supporters have telegrams and letters piled up on their desks, as many Conservative members have, congratulating them on the attitude they have taken on this bill and on this closure. I think not. Church organizations which have prided themselves on staying out of politics have attacked this closure motion, and in this connection I quote:

The session of Olde Davenport United Church in midtown Toronto voted last night to petition Governor General Massey to dissolve parliament and call a general election over the natural gas pipe line dispute.

The petition was based on the contention that:

1. Many Canadians are opposed to the loan because it is to be made to an alien firm for a domestic project.
2. Canadians haven't been given a chance to express their attitude.
3. That a cabinet minister, not named in the petition, has opposed putting the measure before the people.
4. The government is due to expire shortly anyway.

"We are sending this petition because we feel our democratic rights as Canadians are being misused."

No words could be truer. Last year we had the big debate on the ridiculous defence production bill, and this year we have the Trans-Canada bill, this vicious bill. No doubt next year, if this same Liberal government is here, the citizens of this country will wake up some morning and read in the press—that is the only way we can get any information from this government; we get it in the press next day—that this cabinet has passed an order in council inviting the Russian government to come over here and man the D.E.W. line for which they will be paid magnificently.

Mr. Henry: Mr. Chairman, it is indeed an honour and a pleasure to support this legislation in this chamber this evening. As I see it, it is both financial and administrative. It works toward a most laudable national result, in that it will provide for Canadians our first natural gas pipe line. This result is all the more laudable because it will be an all-Canadian route. To obtain this program of national development in 1956 we in this house are asked to approve the setting up of a crown corporation and the making of the necessary arrangements that go with it to provide for a lease-basis operation in northern Ontario in the hands of private enterprise. In addition we are asked to approve of a money-lending arrangement, on a short-term basis, to cover the western section.

Our policy is not new on the Canadian scene. It is a blending of both public and private enterprise. It gives first chance to private enterprise and second chance to public enterprise. I summarize it in this way: "It is public enterprise if necessary, but not necessarily public enterprise".

My approach in this debate is to discuss the area of agreement which I think is discernible on both sides of the house. This pipe-line bill in my view is a good thing for Canada, and I think hon. members on both sides share this view. It is a good thing in principle for Canada at home as well as abroad. I look at the problem in principle from Canada's position in NATO, the United Nations and the commonwealth. We are grateful in this chamber for the presence here of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, a former president of the United Nations. We have valued the analysis he has given us of our external affairs, and of late we are particularly pleased with his analysis of our relations with the communist bloc. I would refer to his statement that we are in a period of competitive peaceful coexistence. I think all will agree that we have come through a hot war, a cold war and that now we are in a period of a cold peace. Our freedom from fear has not lessened in any remarkable degree, and indeed we are proceeding to keep in a very firm position our NATO program of war prevention.

Let us turn now to the communist Russian viewpoint on natural gas. It is the policy of the communist bloc to try to crack the west economically without force of arms. In Canada the communist party has resorted to the principle of "divide and rule" in order to discourage Canadians from developing the seaway. Now they are adopting the same tactics in relation to this, our great national program for a natural gas pipe line.

We have two notable broad basic economic problems in Canada. I refer to the fact that in the first place we have to try to maintain a competitive low-cost economy, and in the second place we are now starting an increased program to increase our secondary industries. On the North American continent there is a position which is well known as to the question of natural gas and reserves thereof. The United States, Canada and Mexico have a monopoly of the western world's supply of natural gas. We have then the same problem on this continent, to provide low-cost energy to our many industries. This is a function our neighbours on this continent and ourselves perform in relation to the development, marshalling and distribution of natural gas. It is a low-cost fuel, and it will help to maintain the industrial supremacy of the North American continent in the world struggle for competitive coexistence, as described by the past president of the United Nations.

There are two approaches, that of technology and that of diplomacy, in the development of natural gas. I have no doubt that all members in this chamber on all sides were pleased when they heard of top level conferences in which Hon. L. B. Pearson, past president of the United Nations, and our Prime Minister, the father of the NATO pact, conferred with the President of the United States and the President of Mexico. These three countries monopolize this low-cost energy fuel. It is the duty of the western world to operate in diplomacy and technology as to this matter. The meaning of low-cost natural gas in the United States has been very great indeed because that great natural gas industrial nation consumes 88 per cent of all the gas in the world. I refer to 1953 published statistics in this connection.

How long are the gas pipe lines of the United States of America? They are reliably reported to be longer than their railways and longer than her oil pipe lines. In 1953 the figures showed that there were over one quarter of a million miles of natural gas lines in the United States.

The Russian approach is indeed worthy of serious consideration. In the last pre-war five-year plan of Russia, the orders were that natural gas developments were to be doubled. We have not heard much since then, but we can depend upon it that Russia is not going backward in the development of natural gas but rather forward. When we consider the present position of the communist party of Canada and we see those tactics employed of "divide and rule" in this great nation of ours, are we not reminded that Russia knows the value of this great asset on this great continent? Should we not be warned as to what is the real aim of our enemies in this part of the western world?

Technology speaks to the western nations. I would refer to the Woytinsky report on world population and production, covering as it does, as of 1953, trends and production in this field. This is a well recognized report published by the twentieth century fund and financed by the Rockefeller Foundation. The words to the western nations in this report are that we should develop all available oil and gas now, without delay.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): On a point of order, I wonder whether the hon. member would identify the document from which he has been reading?

Mr. Henry: I would be very glad to do so, and I have already done so. If the hon. member looks at Hansard, it will be adequately identified tomorrow.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Hansard of tomorrow is not yet published. Can the hon. member identify the document from which he is reading?

Mr. Henry: I am not reading from such a document, and I wish to go on, as the time is short enough.

Mr. Knowles: Whose fault is that?

Mr. Henry: I have been impressed, as have other members in the chamber, with the approach taken by the Minister of Trade and Commerce to this subject. I think he has taken the proper approach, and it is the world approach, which appeals to me. He has a true vision of the position, as has his colleague the Prime Minister, father of the North Atlantic Pact. He has a true vision of our position in the United Nations, and indeed in the commonwealth. Are we not discharging our obligations toward our NATO partners in admirable fashion?

To maintain competitive coexistence abroad, we must consider what this means in Canada. It means—

Mr. Nicholson: On a point of order, it is a well known rule that speeches must not be read in committee or in the house. In view of the fact that a great many members are denied the right to read speeches, surely hon. members on the government side should not read their speeches.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Jutras): I think that point of order has been ruled upon on previous occasions, and very wide latitude has previously been given in this debate. At any rate, the hon. member is referring to notes, and that is quite permissible at any stage of the proceedings of the house.

Mr. Henry: I can quite well understand the restiveness of my socialist friends, who are linked so closely to the policy of the communist party in this matter before the house. Mr. Chairman, you were quite correct; I am referring to several notes, referring closely to my notes, as you have said. That is why I now wish to refer to the Toronto Star Weekly which contains an article by Robert Taylor, a very distinguished journalist in the press gallery of this house. There he has stated for all Canadians to read that there is invested in Canada $13 billion of foreign capital, which has produced, according to his investigations in this field, one million jobs for Canadians.

In this natural gas pipe line, we have a very conservative estimate, I would say, of a $1 billion investment, which should produce 75,000 jobs for Canadians. We all know that the seaway represents a similar investment of about $1 billion, and that means another 75,000 jobs. That makes a total of 150,000 jobs for Canadians. I say to my socialist friends opposite that we have heard from them that they wanted a program of works not on the shelf but off the shelf, and here we have 150,000 jobs, a program of capital investment for Canadians off the shelf, and they do not like it. What can we think of them on that account?

A Liberal estimate of the cost of the pipe line would be $1 billion, but we all know that there is a multiplier effect attached to such an investment. If it were two dollars for every one dollar in direct capital investment, I think I would be satisfied because one distinguished Dutch economist, Van der Valk, says that in connection with developments of this kind the multiplier effect of the original investment may well be in places $9 for $1. I take it at least on a basis of two for one because I am a Liberal and because I have faith in Canada. There is $1 billion in the direct investment and, let us say, $2 billion in the indirect position, making a total of $3 billion. I confidently expect that it will produce no less than a quarter of a million jobs for Canadians.

We hear talk in this chamber about unemployment and relief and that sort of thing. They ask from the socialist quarter what are we doing for Canadians to provide job security. I say this is the greatest measure in the history of Canada from the standpoint of job security. I say that to my socialist friends tonight, and I ask them how they like it.

Freedom is a many-sided concept. We have to consider our position and the fact that we are within NATO and within the commonwealth. We have to consider freedom at home and job security for Canadians.

Some reference has been made in this chamber to the fathers of confederation. I trust they are looking at us from some place other than here, because it has not been very pleasant to be here at moments I have experienced in this debate, but I venture to say that they are looking down here on the father of the North Atlantic pact and his distinguished Minister of Trade and Commerce, and that they wish they were back with us on the government side of the House of Commons.

Mr. Jones: We are asked tonight to approve an extraordinary policy of the government to provide 90 per cent of the capital for a private company. What I would like to know from the minister or one of the members of the cabinet is this. What is the policy of the government toward private enterprise in general; or have we a new policy for certain types of private enterprise, in this case a United States controlled company; or have we a policy?

I feel that under the present financial policy of the government we are encouraging everybody but our own people. On the one hand we are encouraging Americans to come to this country and control our natural resources and our industries, while on the other hand our own Canadian companies are being starved for funds and discouraged. Yesterday I received a telegram from a small but very progressive firm in my riding, most of whose dealings recently have been with the United States. They have been shipping heavy equipment which is selling well in the United States, but because of the financial policy of the government I received this telegram yesterday:

> Present bank credit restrictions forcing us and many other firms to brink of bankruptcy . . . Bank of Canada cash reserves requirement forcing us to restrict operations far below last year's. Last year 80 per cent our production exported mainly to United States. Serious complications will result if bank restrictions not eased immediately.

This is what I suggest. If we can be so extraordinarily generous with a United States firm as to advance 90 per cent of the required capital, surely we can ease the restrictions to make it possible for our own factories and concerns to function properly and export at a reasonable rate. I am amazed at the frantic haste displayed to get this bill through, and I have often asked why. This gas has been stored for millions of years under the ground and nobody knew about it. It was only found a few years ago, and now we have found it we are in a terrible haste to get rid of it.

What are we going to do with it? Burn it? I presume that the first thing we think about is burning it, and I often think that to burn a valuable commodity like gas is a repetition of what happened when this country was first opened up, when the farmers and settlers went ruthlessly through the forests, cut down wonderful black walnut and other hardwoods to make stake fences and pile up as wood for use in the stove. We are doing the same thing today with a priceless heritage. We are preparing to get it to the furnace as quickly as possible.

But by burning it do we get the best value? I should like to quote from the seventh report of the natural resources conference, page 266, where I find the following with respect to the petrochemical industry:

> The most fascinating aspect of natural gas is not in its use as fuel but as the base for a petrochemical industry. The list of useful products manufactured from methane gas CH4 which comprises 95 per cent of natural gas is long.
> However, a few examples will excite the imagination and indicate the rich potential. From one million cubic feet of natural gas can be produced 20 tons of ammonia, enough to fertilize 500 acres; 80 tons of nitric acid, this will produce 200,000 pounds of dynamite; thirty thousand gallons of carbon tetrachloride, enough to fill 120,000 standard hand fire extinguishers; 7,500 gallons of ethyl-grani-alcohol, sufficient to make 85,000 26 ounce 70 proof gin.
> One million cubic feet of natural gas would make approximately 16,000 pounds of acrylic fibres, known under the names of orlon, dynel, acrilon, etc.

This suggests to me, Mr. Chairman, that we should pause to think if our present policy is right. We should pause to think if this natural resource belongs merely to our generation and should be dissipated and exhausted in this one generation alone, or whether we have a responsibility to conserve some of it for future generations. I claim we have that responsibility. But in our frantic haste to convert this gas to dollars we overlook the greatest value possible from that commodity. This is an asset that will not replenish itself. You cannot sow seeds to grow gas in the same way that you can sow seeds to grow wheat and other commodities. Once it is gone it is gone forever, and we seem to be determined to use this stored gas at once.

If that is our policy, let us make sure that Canadians get the full benefit of it first. Instead, we are preparing to create a monopoly for merely a 10 per cent investment. What a splendid gift to someone. I believe that if the government had announced its policy a year ago, two years ago or even five years ago, when they were still searching for someone to build the line, and had said they were willing to finance the proposed line up to 90 per cent of its cost, there would have been thousands of Canadians willing and qualified to carry out the project. We would not have had to wait this long. I believe it is not yet too late to remedy the evil we are about to perpetrate on unborn generations.

I understand that the present deal will be called off if it is not completed by June 7. Why not call it off? Trans-Canada Pipe Lines has not proved itself a very reliable company up to date, and may not prove itself reliable when it tries to complete the building of the line.

I should like to deal briefly with some of the objections that have been raised against government ownership of the pipe line, as I personally believe that a combination of the federal government, the provincial governments and municipal governments would be the logical body to operate a utility of this nature. The gas itself is a natural inheritance of all the Canadian people, not the people of one province but of all Canada, and should be used for their greatest benefit and not exploited for profit.

I know that one of the difficulties mentioned earlier in the debate was the inability to get pipe, but according to recent articles in the press that has apparently been overcome. Now you can get all the pipe you want. However, it was suggested that Trans-Canada Pipe Lines had access to sufficient pipe to complete the project. I venture to say that the most anxious company or group of people during this debate are the people involved in the company that owns the 34-inch pipe and has it stored, if they have it. They have far more money invested in stored pipe than Trans-Canada intends to invest in this project at the present time. They have millions of dollars tied up in stored pipe. It is not a paying proposition. It does not earn interest and it costs money to store. Therefore I feel sure that anyone willing to pay the price could get the pipe.

I do not know of another market that could use nearly 2,000 miles of 34-inch pipe. No such project is proposed anywhere else in the world except in Canada and the company that has the pipe would be only too pleased to supply the pipe to the government, any other company or anyone at all who had the money to pay for it.

The government has challenged the opposition to show an alternative way to build the pipe line. We in the C.C.F. group naturally believe in and have proposed public ownership. The proposed pipe line is not a free enterprise proposition at all. Trans-Canada only has a 10 per cent investment in it. It is already a socialized concern. Ninety per cent of it belongs to the people of Canada and only 10 per cent will eventually belong to the pipe-line company. When the taxpayers of Canada are putting up 90 per cent they should have control of this utility, and I am suggesting that the logical thing to do is to put up the other 10 per cent and take over the pipe line completely, and then convey Canadian gas to Canadian consumers.

The history of gas pipe lines is a fine one from a financial point of view. I never heard of a single pipe-line company conveying gas that was in difficulties financially. They have all made handsome profits. There is always an abundance of money to go into that field when necessary. Of course if they can get someone to finance them, as our government is doing, they are going to go out and borrow cheap money.

I believe that these profits that can and will be made on this particular pipe line should accrue to the Canadian government and not help to make more American millionaires, or Canadian millionaires for that matter; they are both the same. These profits could be returned by selling cheaper gas and by giving better service to the people. The profits could be used either to improve that service or they could be turned over for education or for national health insurance.

Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited is naturally interested in the profits to be made. The government would be interested not only in the profits but more in the service that could be rendered to the people of Canada. While we talk glibly of free enterprise being in this field, I notice that they did not enter the field when the St. Lawrence seaway was proposed. That project stood in abeyance for 20 years, but I never once read of a single private enterprise group coming to the government and suggesting that they build it. Why? Because they were doubtful if any profits would be made on that particular seaway. However, they are sure in the case of the gas pipe line. They therefore leave the government to carry on the non-profit venture of the seaway.

I feel that there are certain services that are natural for public ownership such as gas, electricity, water and so on. I would point out that other services that we now enjoy in common were at one time under private ownership. They have been nationalized or, as you call it, socialized for so long that we have forgotten the origin of the institution or the concern; and they have been socialized so successfully that private capital has been withdrawn entirely.

I refer, for instance, to the carrying of mail. At one time mail was carried by private enterprise. We all know the story of the Wells Fargo company that used to carry mail from the Pacific coast to the Atlantic coast. It cost you two or three dollars for a letter. We had stage coaches in England carrying out the same function on a private basis, so that only a few people were able to mail a letter because of the cost; the others could not afford it.

What happened? We socialized that service. That was all we did; we socialized it. The people own it and control it. The cost was brought down so that all people have access to it at very low cost. That is an instance of the socialization of a former private enterprise that we would never allow to go back to those hands again.

Another instance is highways. It is only a little over 100 years ago since most of the highways and bridges were toll highways and bridges. If you had not the money, you could not go very far from home. You had to have threepence or sixpence to pay for going over a stretch of road through some squire's domain or maybe across a bridge. But what happened? The thing was so silly—the people were not getting the best use of the roads because they were privately owned—that the government stepped in and socialized them.

The roads of Canada have always been socialized. We have therefore not had that problem. We have become so accustomed to the socialization of roads that we would never hand the roads and bridges back to private enterprise again; we are happy with the socialized state of the roads and bridges.

There are several other things that I could mention, but I see that my time is coming to a close. One is education. I well remember my grandmother telling me that in the village in which she lived education was all private. There were no public schools. You had to have your threepence or your sixpence a week or you could not get an education. All the schools were privately owned. There are still some that are privately owned, namely the profitable ones. The non-profitable ones went out of business very quickly, because the government of England at the time socialized education and made it available to all the people. We all appreciate it, now that it is socialized, and we would not go back to private enterprise or turn all the schools back to private enterprise. We know it functions to the benefit of all the people, so we keep to socialism. In the same way we have libraries that were private libraries.

We even had private armies in England. Various barons had their private armies and sometimes they grouped together to make a bigger army. Nevertheless they were still private armies paid by the baron or the lord of the manor, whatever the case might be. Eventually the stupidity of the situation struck the people and they socialized the army. Now it belongs to and protects the people as a whole. Those are some of the things that fall into the natural category of socialism. I think the gas pipe line is in exactly the same category and should be socialized and financed by the federal, provincial and municipal governments in order to give the best service to the people of Canada as a whole.

Mr. Carrick: Mr. Chairman, I had the honour of speaking in this debate on second reading. At that time I confined myself entirely to a discussion of the merits of this project. Tonight I should like to speak on the issue of closure, because this debate has been converted into one on the question of closure and the propriety of the government applying closure.

Before I came to this house I thought members generally confined themselves to the issue. In my opinion the issue in this case is the wisdom of building the trans-Canada gas pipe line. One is not here very long before he finds out that issues are created for different purposes entirely, not having to do with the real problem before parliament but designed to attract votes. That is exactly what has happened. In this case there has been a probably unparalleled attempt centred on the question of closure. The opposition parties, the official Conservative opposition and the C.C.F., have described the closure issue as dictatorial conduct, totalitarianism, the gag and other extravagant epithets of that kind.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Carrick: My hon. friend says, "hear, hear".

Mr. Knowles: Where did we find those adjectives? Where did we get them? From Mackenzie King.

Mr. Carrick: I should like to have an opportunity to put my views before the committee. My friend has taken the time of this committee on a number of occasions in order to speak, and I do not ever remember interrupting him. I would expect him to extend the same courtesy to other members of this house.

I should like to put before you, Mr. Chairman, because I think it has not been made clear, what is the government's position with regard to closure. The real facts came out on Wednesday, when the Prime Minister made an offer to the Leader of the Opposition and the leader of the C.C.F. party. He proposed to them that the house should sit on Wednesday night, something which it does not ordinarily do, and that the house should sit on Saturday if they wanted to have additional time to debate this issue. That offer was flatly refused, and in the course of the discussion the leader of the C.C.F. party, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, rose in his place and uttered words to this effect, "Feeling as I do about this legislation and having hostility to it, I am justified in using any means within the rules to block the legislation".

I put that to you again, Mr. Chairman. He said in effect, "We are justified in using any means within the rules to block the legislation". I want to put this question to you because I think it is fundamental to this issue. If it is fair for the opposition to use any means within the rules to block the legislation, is it not equally fair for the government to use any means within the rules to put the legislation through? I put it in another way. If it is proper for the opposition to use every means within the rules to block the legislation, can it be improper for the government to use every means within the rules to put the legislation through? I think it is fundamental that, in point of fairness, if it is open to the opposition to use the rules to block the legislation, it must be open to the government to use them to put the legislation through. If the public of Canada know the attitude that has been taken by the opposition on this matter they will realize the fairness of what I say.

Mr. Dinsdale: When did we debate clause 1?

Mr. Carrick: Did I not explain that to you? If you do not mind, I did not interrupt you. Now you have made closure the issue in this election. You should give me the opportunity to answer you.

Mr. Dinsdale: There is no election yet.

Mr. Carrick: It is a fairly shabby trick. I was saying, Mr. Chairman, that people who understand the situation know that these rules are designed to give the minority, as well as the majority, the opportunity to debate issues; but the rules are also designed so that a minority cannot obstruct legislation and prevent the government from putting legislation through. That is exactly why the closure provision is in the rules.

There has been some misunderstanding on the part of the public as to exactly what closure is. If they knew there were four stages of a bill their views might be different. If they knew that there is a debate on the resolution stage, there is a debate on first reading—

Mr. Knowles: Second reading.

Mr. Carrick: On second reading; thank you. There is a debate when the matter is referred to the committee of the whole house and a debate on third reading. Closure may be applied on any of those four occasions, but ordinarily debate is allowed on all four.

What happened in this case? The question is, have the opposition had a fair opportunity to debate these issues? Let me take you through the dates. We will start with the week of May 14; I shall skip the two or three days that preceded that, when there were blocking resolutions put through designed to prevent this matter from coming before the house. I shall start with the 14th, when the resolution was introduced by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. We had four days during that week when the whole issue could have been debated. In the week beginning May 21 we had five days; in the week beginning May 28 we had five days. Thus we had 14 days, beginning with May 14, when this bill could have been debated. We will probably have two or three more days after this week, which will make a total of close to 20 or 21 days.

I tried to make an estimate as fairly as I could of the amount of time that was spent during those first two weeks, the nine days. I went through Hansard and I eliminated the time taken on questions on the orders of the day and all that sort of thing, and I found to my own satisfaction that approximately 50 hours of time were allotted in this house in the first nine days. Of that 50 hours, 18 hours were taken up with what I call blocking resolutions. The time of the house was taken up on matters in which there was no opportunity for anyone to discuss the merits of the pipe-line bill. There were 32 hours during that time when there was an opportunity to debate the pipe-line bill.

Probably it requires some explanation of why I say there were 32 hours to debate the pipe-line bill. I want to take you back to what has happened in this house. This issue has been converted into an issue of closure, and the pipe line aspect has taken a subsidiary position. That is not accidental. As a result of that, a large part of the 32 hours was devoted to discussing not the pipe line but the closure aspect of this procedure.

An hon. Member: Whose fault was that?

Some hon. Members: Yours.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Brown, Essex West): Order.

Mr. Dinsdale: Who invoked closure?

Mr. Carrick: If the opposition had been in any way desirous of debating this bill, is it reasonable to suppose that they would not have accepted the offer of the Prime Minister? The Prime Minister said that if you would sit Wednesday night and Saturday as long as you wished, if you wanted that much more time to debate the bill, you could have it.

Mr. Nowlan: Was he not generous?

Mr. Carrick: May I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, what is the situation in connection with this debate? We calculate that 20 or 21 days could have been devoted to this issue. Will the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre deny that in the rules last year we adopted a form of closure when we assigned 10 days to the important speech from the throne debate? Ten days are all that are considered necessary for that. Will he deny that last year we adopted a closure vote of eight days on the budget debate? Eight days are considered sufficient for that. Can my friends sitting over there seriously try to tell us that 21 days are not enough to debate an important issue of this kind?

Many things happened in this house that I wish the public could have seen, because I am a great believer in giving the public the facts and I feel that when the public know the facts they will arrive at the right decision. I wish they could have seen what happened when hon. gentlemen opposite imposed a vote upon this house. Remember, on every occasion the whip would walk out and would take not five minutes or three minutes, but 10 minutes, the maximum time, every time.

An hon. Member: Seventeen minutes.

Mr. Carrick: Ten minutes to call in the members and 17 minutes, 18 minutes and 20 minutes every time the vote was taken, and all that time we were here waiting for the members to be brought in. The public should know that in this House of Commons the practice is that when all the members are in the house and a vote is taken, and very frequently another vote has to be taken, the Speaker says: "Shall we consider that the members are in the house?" What do they say? Generally, they say "Yes", but in this debate what did they say?

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Nowlan: There is closure; you cannot ask questions.

Mr. Carrick: What is the question? We have had nothing but dilatory proceedings. I tell you, Mr. Chairman, that if the public of Canada could have been watching what the Conservatives and C.C.F. opposition were doing in this house they would have been ashamed of them.

An hon. Member: You had 21 days.

Mr. Carrick: You asked me what the opposition should have done? I shall tell you what they should have done. They should have recognized that the majority in this house have the right to rule this house, and closure is a—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Carrick: They shake their heads. The other night the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George quoted Magna Carta and section 49 of the British North America Act, which says that our constitution is founded upon the rule of the majority in this house. It is fundamental that the majority have the right to vote, and indeed the majority rule within the meaning of the constitution. We have closure today, and they should have recognized it. What they should have done is this. They should have recognized the right of the government to apply closure, and that they were going to have every opportunity to debate the merits of the pipe-line loan within the closure limits. Surely that is not an unreasonable request to make of hon. gentlemen opposite if they desired to debate the bill. When they were given that opportunity why did they not take it, instead of wasting time?

An hon. Member: Talk about the pipe line.

Mr. Carrick: Yes, I will tell you something about the pipe-line right now. I am going to tell you the reason you do not want to debate the pipe-line issue, and that you know you are in a hopeless position.

Mr. Nowlan: Speak to the Chair.

Mr. Carrick: I will tell you why, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Knowles: Are you in a hopeless position, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Carrick: I will tell you why the Leader of the Opposition gave up on this pipe-line issue. A while ago the treasurer of Ontario came out and said that time was of the essence, the pipe line had to be built. At that time the premier of Ontario, the Conservative leader in Ontario, came out and said the pipe line had to be built.

Where did that leave the Leader of the Opposition in this house? He had hoped to have an election issue. As a result of what happened he knew that he had nothing on the pipe line; he knew that his position was hopeless. He is a very astute gentleman. He has been in politics a long time. If he cannot get where he wants to get in one way he can make a turn and get there another way, and there is no one quite so fast on footwork in the ring as the Leader of the Opposition.

What happened? Extravagant claims were built up. The supremacy of parliament was suppressed. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar spoke of abomination, outrage, and all that kind of political claptrap that they have tried on the people of the country in the last few elections and they have always been rejected. Now they are building up this closure issue.

Mr. Chairman, some people may think that what has happened was not premeditated. I tell you that this has been one of the greatest hoaxes ever perpetrated on the Canadian people, and I shall tell you why. I am not going to dwell upon it because it is a shameful incident. It is the destruction of a man who might have been the leader of the Conservative party, and they have left their mark upon him. They perpetrated this hoax upon the country. I am not going to go further than that. A man who up to this time was respected in the country, refused to obey the rules of the house and take his seat when the Speaker called upon him to do so.

Mr. Bell: The government has gone just about as far as it can go.

Mr. Carrick: The Speaker requested him to sit down and he refused to sit down. I say he is a sacrifice for the ambitions of somebody else and I am sorry it happened to him—

An hon. Member: Look after yourself.

Mr. Carrick: The Leader of the Opposition knows very well what has happened. He is a very experienced lawyer. Let me tell you what happens in court. Counsel sometimes are representing an accused and know they have a hopeless case. What do they do? They know if they can impress the jury that the judge is siding with the crown representative they increase their chances of an acquittal.

An hon. Member: They will never get you.

Mr. Carrick: The Leader of the Opposition knows he has a hopeless case.

An hon. Member: What have you?

Mr. Carrick: He has challenged the authority of the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker, and somebody has indicated tonight they are going to do the same thing with the committee chairman. I tell you, Mr. Chairman, this kind of thing should not be tolerated.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Carrick: One of the leading members of that group has been suspended from the house. One wonders where this will end. We are on the road to anarchy. They are the ones who are destroying democracy in this country. That is where it will end.

An hon. Member: You said it.

Mr. Carrick: I have a moment in which to tell you why this is important to the C.C.F. and the Conservative parties. They know if this pipe line is built they are through in the next election, and I will tell you why. If the western section of the pipe line is built and the loan is repaid to the Canadian government, it will mean they are finished in the next election. They sit there and know it like we do.

Suppose the loan is not repaid. The federal government is in a position to take the line over for 90 per cent of the cost, as the C.C.F. are demanding we take it over now. Where would that leave the C.C.F. in an election? Where would it leave the Conservatives in an election? That is why there is such a desperate effort to block this legislation. They know their fate in the next election is hanging on this very matter, and that is why there is such a desperate effort to block this legislation.

The sordid party purposes which lie behind the efforts of the opposition will be best described in the scathing words of Sir Francis Bacon who said about a similar group of men: "They care not what happens to the ship of state so long as they save the cockboat of their own fortunes."

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): You scuttled the ship.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Chairman, we have just heard quite an oration from the hon. member for Trinity.

An hon. Member: An oration is right.

Mr. Monteith: I was watching the clock and the hon. member spent exactly 14 minutes speaking on closure and on other subjects that are entirely out of order, and eventually he finished up by spending one or two minutes on the pipe line.

He intimated, Mr. Chairman, that the Prime Minister as of last Wednesday offered us an opportunity of speaking all Wednesday evening and all day Saturday, and he asked us why we did not take it. You know very well, sir. The Prime Minister said that in one breath and in the next breath he gave notice of closure in the committee stage. As the Leader of the Opposition mentioned following that, what was that other than a nice, keen sharp axe with a velvet cover over it? That is all it could possibly be. How long are we going to have to put up with that sort of thing?

Mr. Hosking: We have put up with it for 21 days.

Mr. Monteith: When I first came here, Mr. Chairman, I considered it a great honour to be elected by the citizens of Perth county to represent them in the House of Commons.

An hon. Member: Don't you now?

Mr. Monteith: I considered it a great privilege to be here in this twenty-second parliament of Canada. What do we see today? A shambles caused by government rulings. I just hope these rulings that have been given today are not used as precedents as time goes on. What could be worse than a House of Commons like this? Any opposition party would have three strikes against them to begin with, let alone two.

I have made many friends here in all parties and I hope to retain those friends, but I must say I have been greatly disturbed by the subservient bowing of whatever Liberal friends I may have had to the will of this government, as exemplified by what has happened here in the last few days and particularly today. I would like to pass on an admonition to the government, Mr. Chairman, in the words of Angelo—

An hon. Member: Michael?

Mr. Monteith: —in Shakespeare's "Measure for Measure": "O, it is excellent to have a giant's strength, but it is tyrannous to use it like a giant."

In the short time I have been in the house I have found that the committee stage was a sort of round table conference, or at least I have always thought of it in that way. I considered it a period in which one asked questions and one had a right to have them answered. What have we found in these past few days? We have not had that opportunity at all.

Mr. Hosking: You have not taken it.

Mr. Rowe: You did not give it to us.

Mr. Monteith: We have not had an opportunity of asking questions. Let me tell you, Wellington South, that you could stand to have a few questions answered too. The hon. member for Peel the other night asked a great many questions. Has he had any answered?

Mr. Hosking: He also told the minister he could get 34-inch pipe within 14 miles of his riding, which is not true.

Mr. Monteith: Look, Wellington South, you could do a lot better than you have in this debate, too.

Mr. Rowe: Get up and make your speech.

Mr. Monteith: The hon. member for St. Paul's brought up an important item the other night. The Minister of Trade and Commerce was pleased to get to his feet and say he would look into it because if it existed as suggested it would be illegal. Are there not many other things which may be in the same boat? It is very reasonable to suppose so.

When any bill comes before this house we have an opportunity of sitting down and discussing it, much like the situation which I experienced when I sat on the municipal council. You sit around the table. In committee you discuss things, you thresh them out and you get to know what it is all about, despite the fact that you may not be the chairman of the committee or a member of the committee. You have an opportunity to find out what it is all about before you finally vote. We have not had that opportunity at all.

Mr. Hosking: You would not take it.

Mr. Rowe: What are you talking about? The government announced closure.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Chairman, this is probably the most important bill that has come before this parliament in a great many years. I would like to have one question answered. On page 4428 of Hansard for Tuesday, May 29, the Minister of Trade and Commerce tabled some figures concerning the selling price of gas. I am going to use the 100 per cent load factor figures as set out on this page.

This table indicates that gas is to sell in Saskatchewan at 21·3 cents per thousand cubic feet; in Manitoba, at 26 cents. That is a difference of 4·7 cents. I am assuming that the difference arises because this is the delivery cost. That may be all right, and I have nothing to say about that at the moment and I will go on.

From Manitoba to western Ontario, up in the Nipigon district, it is now increased to 34·5 cents, an increase between Manitoba and the Nipigon district of 8·5 cents which is the delivery cost. Then we go on down the line until we come to the Cobalt-Whitby district, which I suppose is the line from Cobalt to Whitby. There it is to sell for 44·5 cents. The net difference between the selling price in Saskatchewan and in the Cobalt-Whitby district is 23·2 cents. I should like to read an item which appeared in Canadian Business of March, 1956, by H. G. Cochrane, who had this to say:

> An interesting sidelight to the Westcoast-Pacific Northwest-El Paso deal is found in the economics of the plan. Pacific Northwest will buy Canadian gas at 22 cents per thousand c.f., at the border, will sell an equal volume down south in the San Juan area for 25 cents. Thus, in effect, gas will be transported some 1,500 miles down the continent at a cost of only 3 cents per thousand.

It is not logical on the face of it, and there may be an answer. If there is an answer I certainly think we should have it. I think we should be given the opportunity to ask for an explanation, and we have not had that opportunity.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Would you like that explanation now?

Mr. Monteith: Yes.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The San Juan basin—

Mr. Monteith: Will I be permitted to get up again?

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Brown, Essex West): If there is consent.

Mr. Monteith: I understand I would not have consent to speak again once I have resumed my seat.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Brown, Essex West): If the hon. member prefers to proceed he may do so.

Mr. Monteith: There are a few things in the bill which I think could stand some explanation. I do not know whether we can discuss clause 3, but I think we have been wandering far afield and it may not do any harm.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Brown, Essex West): We are now dealing with clause 4.

Mr. Monteith: I think we have been dealing with everything tonight. I believe I have been closer to clause 4 than most speakers this evening. Clause 4 reads:

(1) The corporation is a body corporate having capacity to contract and to sue and be sued in the name of the corporation.

(4) Actions, suits or other legal proceedings in respect of any right or obligation acquired or incurred by the corporation, whether in its name or in the name of Her Majesty, may be brought or taken by or against the corporation, in the name of the corporation, in any court that would have jurisdiction if the corporation were not an agent of Her Majesty.

That is perfectly all right, and possibly some legal brain devised it. I am not a legal man, but I would like to have answers to some questions. Ordinarily in committee we are allowed to ask questions. Section 5 (2) reads:

The corporation shall not enter into a lease of the northern Ontario section with Trans-Canada unless it is approved by the governor in council and unless it provides for rentals during the period of the lease and for a purchase price that, in his opinion, are designed to recover not less than the cost of the northern Ontario section and interest thereon at a reasonable rate.

Does the government expect there will be a higher interest rate? It says "not less than". Is it to be that interest rate, or might it be higher? We have the right to know. We should have the opportunity to ask these questions and get answers. Subsection 3 reads:

(3) Subject to this act, the corporation may do such things as are expedient for or conducive or incidental to the attainment of the purposes set forth in subsection (1) and, without limiting the generality of the foregoing, the corporation may, for the purposes of this act, buy, sell, lease, contract, acquire, hold and dispose of real and personal property of every description and expend or administer all moneys received by it from loans to it, rentals, disposition of its property or otherwise.

I suppose that refers to the building of the northern Ontario section. I would just like to ask some reasonable questions in the committee stage. Section 6 (2) reads:

(2) The Minister of Finance, at the request of the corporation and with the approval of the governor in council, may from time to time out of the consolidated revenue fund lend money to the corporation on such terms and conditions as the governor in council approves, but such loans to the corporation shall bear interest at a rate that is not less than three and one-quarter per cent per annum.

Might it be higher? How much higher might it be? What is the procedure? What is the method of setting the interest rate? It says "not less than three and one-quarter per cent". Might it be more than that? Under what conditions might it be more? Then we come to part II, which is an important part of the bill. Section 7 (1) states that the loan is to be 90 per cent of the cost, with a maximum of $80 million. Let me go on down to subsection 2 which reads:

(2) If, with respect to the construction of the western section, the repayment of the loans or otherwise, Trans-Canada is in default under the loan agreement or any security given pursuant thereto, the corporation may, upon giving notice to Trans-Canada, of such default,

(a) take immediate possession and control of any or all assets, rights and undertakings of Trans-Canada and conduct the business and operations of Trans-Canada with respect to such assets, rights and undertakings.

What rights, undertakings, assets and all the rest of it are there expected to be? Maybe they do not know exactly, but what do they expect? We have a right to ask that question and we have a right to receive a reasonable answer. Paragraph (b) reads:

(b) declare that any or all of the assets, rights and undertakings of Trans-Canada be vested in Her Majesty, and thereupon all right, title and interest of Trans-Canada to or in respect of such assets, rights and undertakings, shall be vested in Her Majesty and Trans-Canada shall cease to have any right, title or interest to or in respect of any such assets, rights or undertakings.

Paragraph (e) reads:

(e) pursuant to any agreement in that behalf made, with the approval of the governor in council, before or after the coming into force of this act, between Her Majesty and Trans-Canada and any shareholder of Trans-Canada and any holder of an option to purchase shares of Trans-Canada, acquire shares of the capital stock of Trans-Canada.

Are they going to go out and buy shares? They have $130 million and perhaps will loan only $80 million; are they going to use the remainder temporarily until they get into the construction of the northern Ontario bridge to buy shares? What do they intend to do? This gives them power to do that. Have they any intention of doing it? We have a right to ask for that information and we have a right to get an answer. Subsection 5 reads:

(5) The aggregate, outstanding at any time, of the amounts advanced by the Minister of Finance to the corporation under this section together with the loans made by the Minister of Finance to the corporation under section 6 shall not exceed one hundred and thirty million dollars.

I am not too familiar with this as I have not had a chance to ask sufficient questions and get answers, but it has been my impression that the provincial government was going to put up $35 million. I do not know whether that is part of the $130 million, and I would like to get some further details on that. I have other questions to ask. Why not give us a reasonable time to consider this bill in committee?

We have many more questions. I have another one as to the urgency of this. We have been waiting for five years without one step being taken. On last March 15 the first resolution appeared on the order paper; the first day of debate. It never appeared again. Finally, some months later, we got into the second resolution, which by the way incorporated an entirely different proposition from the first one. Just as a common sense question, why this company and no other? I am not saying there is any other that can do it, but I should like to be told why this company only? Why 90 per cent of the loan to Trans-Canada to build the west coast section? Why not 80 per cent? Why not 100 per cent? We have a right to ask those questions. Why next March 31 as the deadline? Why not February 28 or April 30? We should have some answers to these questions.

Why has not the whole cabinet known what is going on, instead of only the Minister of Trade and Commerce? Can Trans-Canada get another mortgage if the crown corporation permits it? I think it can, as I read the bill. We are entitled to know if it can, and under what conditions it can, why it might need it and that sort of thing. What proportion of membership on the board of directors in this crown corporation will be appointed by the Dominion of Canada and by the province of Ontario? I do not know, and I do not think anybody else does. I think we are entitled to know.

I should like to say one word about that hatchet man from Charlotte. He reminded me very much of the daring young man on the flying trapeze. He skipped all over the lot, but mentioned not a thing about the pipe line. He was talking about wheat, the B.N.A. Act, Canadian early history, and in fact everything, including a dastardly attack on the hon. member for Eglinton.

Very briefly, the evidence of 1951 when Trans-Canada was set up indicated that this was to be an all-Canadian route. It was to be an all-Canadian project. It was to the effect that adequate markets in eastern Canada would consume all the gas that could be produced and moved through the line. That evidence was given. Engineering presented no great difficulty whatsoever. Finance, independent of government assistance, was no trouble at all. That evidence was given by Mr. Shultz on pages 9 and 10 of the proceedings of the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines in that year. In 1954 evidence to the same effect was given in the committee, at pages 45 and 46.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Brown, Essex West): I regret to inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Michener: I wonder if the minister would permit a question?

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Brown, Essex West): Order. The minister has not been making a speech.

Mr. Hanna: In spite of the heat that has been generated in this house during the past few days, the fact still remains that Ontario needs Alberta's natural gas. The province of Manitoba badly needs Alberta's natural gas, and there is every indication that before very long Alberta's natural gas will be needed for the fast-expanding industries of the province of Quebec.

It has been established in the debate so far that there is available for immediate export a very large quantity of the world's cheapest and most usable fuel in the province of Alberta. It has also been established, I believe beyond question, that the absence of an export market for Alberta's surplus gas is very seriously hampering the development of oil and gas in that province. I am convinced that what hampers the development of the great province of Alberta also hampers the development of Canada as a whole.

I would like to congratulate the opposition for finally permitting this house to get down to discussion of the pipe-line bill. This bill has been before this house now for three weeks, and I can say that one of the biggest tasks of the government has been trying to get the opposition into a corner so the terms of the bill could be discussed. In this connection I should like to quote briefly from an editorial that appeared in the Edmonton Journal of May 25, a week ago today. It says:

No doubt this is legitimate parliamentary tactics for an opposition determined to block the passage of a measure. It is equally legitimate, however, for a government to counter by invoking the closure rule so as to bring the issue to a vote. That is what the closure is for.

Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation

The charge of stifling the debate seems singularly inappropriate. Parliament has been discussing the trans-Canada pipe line, with little intermission, since May 9. In that space of more than two weeks—

May I interject that it is now three weeks.

—Mr. Drew, Mr. Diefenbaker, Mr. Coldwell, Mr. Knowles and many other opposition spokesmen have spoken repeatedly against it, and the house has seen some of the liveliest exchanges in its recent history. The arguments against the project have been fully presented. Since this is an undertaking in which "time is of the essence," the point has surely been reached for parliament to decide for or against it.

This great project, in my view, is just as much in the national interest as it is in the interest of the province of Alberta which I have the honour to represent in this house.

I should like to commend the hon. member for Calgary South for the stand he has taken on this issue. We have been told that he is an expert in the gas and oil business, but there is always a chance that an expert might be wrong. Therefore it was most interesting to have the information given in the house this evening that the Progressive Conservative executive of Calgary South supports the member for Calgary South 100 per cent on this issue. I think that is a tribute to him and to his courageous attitude, and a tribute also to this Liberal government from the Progressive Conservative executive in Calgary South. One wonders where the member for Calgary North really stands on this issue. I should like to know what his executive committee is thinking about the stand he has taken.

I come from an area which has experienced the benefits of natural gas for well over 30 years. I was glad when my colleague the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, who also represents an Edmonton constituency, placed on the record a few days ago some of the history of natural gas and oil development in the province of Alberta. This unequalled source of energy has long been recognized as the trump card in Alberta's truly remarkable store of national resources. Following the discovery in the past 10 years of truly amazing amounts of natural gas, the growth of industry in the province of Alberta, and particularly in the city of Edmonton, has amazed even the experts. But at the moment the growth of further new industries in our province, particularly petrochemical industries, is being stunted and hampered by Alberta's inability to export its surplus gas. Industry in Alberta has been doing its best to get along with various conservation measures, but in spite of their best efforts we have been told here that hundreds of millions of cubic feet of natural gas are being wasted daily. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that in the interests of Canada as a whole this waste must be stopped at the earliest possible moment.

In the constituency of Edmonton-Strathcona hundreds of millions of dollars have been invested within the past 10 years as a result of gas and oil discoveries, and most of that industry has been established with the assistance of United States capital which, by the way, the members of the opposition profess to scorn. I should like to read a very brief quotation from an official booklet put out by the city of Edmonton. It says in part:

The $60 million petrochemical colossus of the Canadian Chemical Company, a subsidiary of the Celanese Corporation of America, is in operation on Edmonton's eastern outskirts. It is one of the few plants of its kind in the world, producing many new chemical products never before manufactured in Canada. "Waste" petroleum gases are one of its basic material requirements . . . Wood pulp, the other basic material, comes from the Prince Rupert plant of an associated company.

I should like to comment that this is only one of several petrochemical plants in the city of Edmonton, and I think I should add for the benefit of the opposition that the taxes that are paid by these petrochemical industries, which are largely American owned, have made the municipal district of Strathcona one of the richest municipalities in Canada in the past five years. I wish the members of the opposition could go out to Edmonton and see what outside capital has done and is doing there.

An hon. Member: And in Calgary.

Mr. Hanna: And in Calgary; and what is good for Calgary and Edmonton is good for the other cities of Canada. I wonder whether our Tory friends think the good Canadians of Edmonton or Calgary would vote against a proposal to exclude foreign investment. I certainly believe they would not, and I would feel very sorry for the politician who would go out there in the next election and suggest it.

The growing industrialization of the province of Alberta is one of the highlights of Canadian development today. This industrialization is good for all Canada, particularly for western Canada which has had practically no industry until the recent discoveries of vast quantities of gas and oil in Alberta. It amazes me to hear our C.C.F. friends from the provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba opposing what is good for western Canada. They profess to be the great champions of the west. Then why are they opposing so vigorously a development that can do nothing but good for their own provinces? I am particularly interested in what the members from the city of Winnipeg, who are so vigorously opposing the bill, will tell their people by the time the next election rolls around and they have the benefit of natural gas.

A few days ago the Leader of the Opposition quoted the Calgary Herald as being opposed to Bill No. 298. I should like to quote an extract to him from another great American newspaper—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hanna: Alberta newspaper.

Mr. Rea: You were right the first time.

Mr. Hanna: I refer to the Edmonton Journal of May 17.

Mr. Ellis: Soul-mates, at any rate.

Mr. Hanna: It has this to say:

> This open breach between the Progressive Conservatives and their own gas and oil expert is bound to weaken the opposition's case on the pipe line issue. It will strengthen the widespread suspicion that the Progressive Conservatives, and the C.C.F. too, are more concerned with playing on nationalism and latent anti-Americanism for political purposes than they are with the efficient utilization of Canada's natural gas resources. Indeed, amid all the din in Ottawa these days one can discern echoes of that old war cry of half a century ago: "No truck or trade with the Yankees!"

The gentlemen of the Kremlin are no doubt taking considerable warm comfort from the anti-American campaign that is being waged in this parliament by the members of the co-operative conservative federation sitting in the rows opposite.

An hon. Member: What about the Liberal-socreds?

Mr. Hanna: In my view these gentlemen are doing serious injury to Canada by their emotional anti-American campaign. They have challenged us to an election. I believe it is lucky for them that the Prime Minister announced a few days ago that there will be no election at the present time. If our Tory friends are realistic at all they must surely recognize that Canada is expanding under a Liberal government today at a much faster pace than Canadian capital is either able or willing to keep up with. Canadians are either unable or unwilling to supply the risk capital that our orderly development demands at the present time, and had it not been for the capital we have received from the United States in the past ten years we would not have enjoyed the spectacular development throughout Canada today of which we are all so rightly proud. Is there anyone here, I wonder, who would like to see less development in Canada just because a good deal of United States capital is involved?

Mr. Rea: Page 5.

Mr. Hanna: On the contrary, Mr. Chairman, I am sure that most Canadians realize that Canada has been enriched by the free admission, even the encouragement, of capital and private enterprise not only from the United States but from other countries. Such foreign capital has been very much to our advantage, just as the admission to Canada of skilled immigrants from various foreign countries has been to our advantage. Such people and the capital they have brought with them have contributed and are contributing immensely to our rapid industrialization. They have added strength and stability to our whole economy. Canada needs both more people and more money if our standard of living is to be kept continually on the upgrade, and I believe that the people of Canada have confidence in the government which has given us such a rapidly and steadily increasing standard of living.

A good deal of nonsense has been put on the record about Canadians having to pay more for gas that will come through the pipe line than will Americans on the other side of the border. Here again I am sorry to say that the opposition has resorted to distortion of the facts. They have confused what are generally called wholesale prices with retail or consumer prices.

Mr. Rea: Page 6.

Mr. Hanna: For example, they seek to prove that the gas export price at Emerson, Manitoba, is less than the price that will have to be paid by Winnipeg consumers. Purposely or otherwise they overlook the fact that once the Americans buy the gas at Emerson they have to pipe it hundreds of miles and then distribute it to the various consumers in different cities in the midwestern United States. The opposition simply either do not understand the facts of gas distribution or they are purposely trying to confuse the issue in the public mind.

As for Canadian consumers, Mr. Chairman, from the talk of the opposition you would think the people in eastern Canada were going to be compelled to buy gas that comes through this pipe line. Of course nothing of the kind will happen. This western gas that will come through the trans-Canada pipe line will have to be competitive in price with other fuels that are being used here in eastern Canada. No one will have to take it if he can find and is using a better and cheaper alternative. I go further than that, Mr. Chairman, and suggest that this additional competitive fuel from western Canada being introduced into the markets of Ontario and Quebec will have a very beneficial effect on the prices that consumers are obliged to pay for their present supplies of coal and oil, because Trans-Canada Pipe Lines will certainly offer some competition.

I see that my time has almost expired, Mr. Chairman. A few minutes ago I noticed a headline in one of the Ottawa evening papers "Frost is possible on Sunny Week end". I believe that headline refers to the week end weather; but I should like to comment that I believe Premier Frost of Ontario will also have a sunny and cheerful week end because, in spite of the most strenuous opposition by the federal Ontario Tories and our friends of the C.C.F., Premier Frost and the people of Ontario are almost certain to get Alberta natural gas and get it as quickly as this government can bring it to them.

Mr. Castleden: Mr. Chairman, we are at clause 4 of an iniquitous bill which I can only describe as a disgrace to Canada. We had closure forced on this house when the resolution was brought in. In the very speech in which the minister introduced the resolution he announced that closure would take place the next day. That was something that had never occurred before in Canadian history. We had closure announced in this house on second reading. We had closure announced on clause 1, clause 2 and clause 3 of this bill. This house has had no opportunity to debate or discuss these clauses. We have now reached clause 4. This morning at one o'clock a vote will be taken on this bill without further discussion, one hour from now. Without a full opportunity for discussion, whether the opposition has anything to say or not, this bill is to go through. The Canadian parliament never saw anything like this before in the history of Canada, and pray God it never will again.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Discuss the bill.

Mr. Castleden: We shall be glad to do that. This bill is the most flagrant sell-out of Canadian interests that Canada ever saw. It is a selling out of our interests to United States oil kings. They have Alberta oil; they have Alberta gas. Now we build a pipe line and practically hand it over to them and give the control of distribution to them as far as the line goes.

This company came to the Canadian parliament in 1951 and gave a solemn commitment to this house and to the committee of this house that this was to be an all-Canadian pipe line, built all in Canada, with 100 per cent Canadian consumption. Was that a promise or was it not? Was it a commitment? Was it a commitment by the member who introduced the bill? Was it a commitment when the bill was introduced and a commitment when the bill was passed?

Then a sudden change took place. Shortly after the big Texas oil kings moved in and got control of the company. We were goldbricked. This parliament was laughed at. This parliament was tricked, and we sit idly by and accept it. We were tricked.

The first guarantee is that it shall not be all-Canadian consumption, but that 200 million cubic feet per day shall be sent out through Emerson to the American market. That is No. 1. Now these great Texas oil kings in control of this company say, "We are not even going to build the eastern end of the line; we will get the Canadian government to build it"; and we do it. Under this bill the Canadian government builds the portion of the line from Manitoba to Kapuskasing, rents it to the oil company and says, "You have the option to buy it. If you make money on it, if it is profitable, you hang onto it; if it is a dud, we are stuck with it." They are telling the Canadian people that we are stuck with it.

As if that were not enough, now they say, "You lend us the money to build the western part of it". So we get the bill here to lend them the money to build the western part of it. How far does it go? Have these Texas oil kings no money? Are they not taking the risk, or they going to risk Canadian capital?

An hon. Member: The taxpayers' money.

Mr. Castleden: And then we hand it over by this bill to the Trans-Canada Pipe Line company. As if that were not enough, the Minister of Trade and Commerce makes an agreement with these people on May 15 and comes in here with a bill and says, "Get it through parliament by June 7 or else." You have not only tricked Canadians; you have not only sold your Canadian birthright. You have now destroyed Canadian democracy. The scenes we have witnessed in this house in these last two weeks are a sign of what is happening, namely the destruction of the procedure of this house, the violation of these orders by the government, and the destruction of one of the most promising Speakers who ever came to this house. This government has lost the moral right to rule.

When you destroy these standing orders by arbitrarily bulldozing the people of this house by your majority, you destroy the very basis upon which this parliament can govern. Contempt, disgust, bitterness replace what should be proper reason. Parliament cannot function with that type of thing happening. When this Speaker was told what he should do yesterday; when the action was taken today, and when that Speaker says, "I give this house this proposition", we are being governed by proposition now. There are no more rules; we have Speaker's propositions; and with four members of the opposition standing in their place raising points of privilege and points of order,—

An hon. Member: Read rule 7.

Mr. Castleden: —the Speaker says, "Those in favour of my proposition" and "Those against" and you steamroller the thing, you set aside this rule book and you destroy parliament.

An hon. Member: Have you read rule 7?

Mr. Castleden: You read it. Look at what is happening in this house. Democracy is being destroyed in this house.

An hon. Member: What do you know about democracy?

Mr. Castleden: I have not heard you try to protect it very much.

Mr. Ellis: Why not get up and make a speech instead of interrupting?

Mr. Castleden: The issue in this house tonight is not the pipe line.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Castleden: The issue in this house tonight is democracy and the democratic rights of the people of Canada. Pipe lines will come and go. One hundred years from today the pipe line will probably be forgotten. But the rules and precedents which you have set down today will be the rules whereby this house will be misgoverned. You are taking away the rights of parliament, the rights of members to speak. You are destroying the opposition.

You might as well say to the opposition that they can go home because now, under the precedents set in this house today, the opposition from here on is to be wiped out because they can say, "This was the precedent of June 1, 1956". Built on what? Built on the precedent of 1932, only made much more drastic, completely wiping out the opposition. The government says, "The deadline which we set of June 7 shall be met, irrespective of what happens in parliament."

Where is the seed of it? Where did this come from? I lay the blame on the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I respect his ability as an administrator and as a builder. If I wanted a job done in Canada, a big job in engineering, I believe he would be the man to do it. But I say in the same breath that the man has no right to be within a thousand miles of the House of Commons. Here is his own statement, and I give it to him exactly. I am quoting from page 4405 of Hansard of May 28:

> Now, why are we pressing on; why are we pressing this? Well, I do not know; perhaps I get over-enthusiastic about a project. I have been working on sizeable projects all my life, and somehow I reach a point in the development when I think a project is important; and if it is a serious enough project I begin to think it is the most important thing in the world . . .

Yes, it is the most important thing in the world. To him it is more important than parliament. I tell him in this house there is something more important than the project of the pipe line, and that is democracy and the rights of the people, the rules under which democracy operates. They are being destroyed today, and that is why we had the exhibition that we had today.

I want to say it will be a sad day for Canada when people in this House of Commons will not stand up and protect those rights when they see them being violated. I want to say that the rights and the freedom of this parliament can be pushed back 100 years tomorrow unless someone stands here and says "Stop".

As far as we in the opposition are concerned, we refuse to submit to the violation of those rights. Those rights were bought after hundreds of years of fighting, war, struggle, years of imprisonment of men who refused to knuckle down, men who said "this is wrong" and stood up against it.

When I see the docile Liberal backbenchers to a man standing up and condoning what has happened in this house, endorsing it, supporting it, without one word of protest, I say this can happen. I say it is a sad day for Canada, not only to have the opposition wiped out but all the rules and all the symbols of this house and what this house means. That mace should be placed on the desks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Prime Minister of Canada as a symbol of government. It should rest between the opposition and the government as a sign of what is right, of the rights of the minority, of the rights of individuals to speak in Canada's parliament. Otherwise this House of Commons becomes the home of subservient slaves who bow to the will of a person who becomes overly enthusiastic and thinks his project is the most important thing in the world. Under such conditions there is one important matter, and that is freedom.

The disgraceful conduct of the Chair in doing the apparent bidding of the cabinet was the final act of shame. By riding rough-shod over the rules we have destroyed a part of Canadian democracy. The most important words that I could find were from the letters of Junius. I shall read those words:

> We can never be really in danger until the forms of parliament are made use of to destroy the substance of our civil and political liberties—

And that is part of the right of people to speak in this house. I continue:

—until parliament itself betrays the trust by contributing to establish new principles of government, and employing the very weapons committed to it by the collective body to stab the constitution.

That is what we witnessed today. Let us remember that the acts of today become the precedents of tomorrow. That is the dangerous thing, and that is why we must protest if we have any conception of freedom and any conception of the position of parliament as representing the Canadian people.

I want to pay tribute to a private citizen of Canada, one who exemplifies the thing upon which democracy is built. Democracy is built in the hearts and the minds of the private citizens who are alert and alive to the dangers to democracy; who are constantly on the watch and, when they see something happening that is wrong, do what they can and what they should about it. An unknown lady, whose address is Ottawa, wrote a letter to a local newspaper. She was apparently stirred. This unknown individual, sitting in her little home—I do not know where her home is—did a service to democracy. She did what little she could. She was a Canadian. She wrote to the Ottawa Journal as follows:

On May 15 Canada was sold "down the river" and democracy went with her, perhaps forever.

This colossus of a government however, does not fear any adverse fate because it knows, as past elections have proved, that Canadians are incapable of moral indignation.

An hon. Member: She must be a Tory.

Mr. Castleden: You ought to know. I am sure she could not be related to you. I continue:

There is no scandal big enough to shock the Canadian people. Shackled by an inertia sedulously cultivated by a wartime government, transfixed by their T.V., captivated by their comics, eager only for their monthly baby bonus (soothing syrup divine), they are completely indifferent to the political scene and the methods employed by their rulers.

It means nothing to them that debate in the house has long been a farce, with the cat-calls and jeers of the Liberals, and the systematic garroting of the opposition by Mr. Speaker, making a mockery of this democracy for which so many of their fathers have died. They cannot see that for this they will pay, and in coinage even more bitter than that just minted on parliament hill.

Mr. Cannon: May I ask a question?

Mr. Castleden: I pay tribute to the one who wrote it. You would not understand. After I get through you may ask all the questions you like. This lady was stirred by injustice. I am sorry to say you are not. She was very stirred because she saw the loss of freedom. She picked up her pen and wrote a protest. It is very little. She did what she should; she sounded a warning. So long as Canada produces such citizens we need not be afraid of democracy; we need have no fear for it. So long as we elect and send to parliament members who will fight against the breaking of the rules of parliament we do not fear.

"The nation which values anything higher than its own freedom will lose that freedom". There is the lesson to us all. No Canadian worthy of the name should fail at this time to utter his protest. Knowing Canadians as I do, when they learn what has happened today they will within the year, I predict, relegate this infamous gang of dictators, the government over there, who have violated Canadian democracy, down to the abysmal depths of oblivion from whence they never should have come.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Chairman, it is my purpose to take only a few moments. It has been said many times that there has been no opportunity to ask questions and have those questions answered. I want to make it clear that we have had 19 days of debate in discussing this bill.

Mr. Drew: That is not so.

Mr. Rowe: That is not true; you are wrong again. You have had only 14.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): What did we do on the other days; discuss points of order?

Mr. Drew: You cannot count the days. There were but 14 days.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Fourteen days is quite a time.

Mr. Pickersgill: A lot of days were taken on those undebatable motions.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I have had my officers here before me for several days, and tonight I have kept them up far later than their usual bedtime. I have had two questions to date, which I shall endeavour to answer. A short time ago the hon. member for St. Paul's wanted to ask a question. Through a misunderstanding the chairman did not give him an opportunity. If he would care to put the question now I would be very glad to deal with it if I can.

An hon. Member: He has gone.

An hon. Member: No, he is right there.

Mr. Bell: Ask him, Rolly.

Mr. Knowles: Careful! If you sit down you can only speak once.

Mr. Bell: The first and only question will now be asked.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Dumb "Bell" again.

Mr. Michener: Mr. Chairman, the question I had in mind related to the position which would exist when the 34-inch line, the construction of which is provided by this bill, has been completed. It has to be completed by December 31, and it would leave the 34-inch line from the Alberta border to the vicinity of Winnipeg. The bill does not seem to advance the matter beyond that. I wanted to ask the minister what the program was from there. Presumably that line would be used to provide Winnipeg. Where would the gas be taken from? There are no gathering lines in Alberta to bring it to the Manitoba border.

At the Winnipeg end, there is a market in Winnipeg and nothing more. I believe Winnipeg could be supplied with a very small quantity of gas, perhaps 35 million cubic feet per day as compared with a line capacity of 100 million cubic feet. I would like to know for what purpose the line would be used when it was finished, how much gas would go through it, and what amount of time would elapse before additional use would be made of the line?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Chairman, in a line as long as the contemplated trans-Canada line and of those dimensions it would be quite impossible to think of completing the whole line in one season or, I think, in two seasons. It takes more equipment than I think could be gathered together for the purpose. It may be possible to build to Toronto in two seasons, I am not sure; but the point is that in building to Winnipeg we have built the first 600 miles of the line which will eventually go on to Toronto and Montreal; the most difficult part, because of the larger diameter than the other portions of the line, 34 inches as against 30 inches.

You say there are no gathering lines in Alberta. Well, that province has made arrangements with Tennessee Transmission for the necessary pipe for that purpose. That has been ordered, as well as the line pipe.

Chemical plants are being built in Alberta to clean the gas, and we are quite certain that gas can be delivered into the pipe line as soon as it is completed to Winnipeg. The main urgency is to get the whole situation moving; in other words, to get work going on in Alberta to open up the gathering end of the system; and to advance the pipe line; and to give some security to prospective customers that they will receive the gas for which they contract at a foreseeable time in the future.

The great difficulty about starting a pipe line from an area that has never sold gas and extending into an area that has largely never used gas is that it is extremely difficult to make firm contracts at either end. It is difficult to tell the customer when he will get his gas and it is difficult to tell the supplier when and how much of his gas can be sold into the pipe line.

There has been a great difference in the sales situation since this bill has been before parliament. I received an interesting memo a day or two ago which I might read to hon. members. This is in answer to a question that was asked as to whether the line could be financed without export at Emerson. Assuming that the bridge section—the northern Ontario section—will be built and owned temporarily by the government, it would require a throughput of about 300 million cubic feet per day in order to finance the line. With that throughput the line would carry itself and the problem of financing would not be difficult.

This is the memo:

> Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited informs me that of their total expected Canadian sales, they now have about 50 per cent under firm contract. Since, aside from the proposed export at Emerson of 200 million cubic feet daily, they have available from Alberta about 300 million cubic feet daily, this means that their firm contracts now cover about 150 million cubic feet daily.
> Trans-Canada informs me further that another 35 per cent of expected Canadian sales are covered by contracts which are now within one to four weeks of signature. In these contracts, the principles have been agreed upon, and only matters of detail remain to be negotiated.
> As regards the remaining 15 per cent of Canadian sales, Trans-Canada states that negotiation for contracts awaits such things as issuance of local franchises in a number of communities in which sales can be expected when a duly franchised utility is established.
> It should be noted in connection with the foregoing that the term "expected sales" does not tally with the amounts that the utility companies are contracting to take or pay for.

In other words, the load factor.

> All utility companies insist on a safety margin in their contracts. For instance, if they expect to sell 50 million cubic feet daily, they may contract to take or pay for 40 million cubic feet. The proportions I have stated make what Trans-Canada considers a conservative allowance for this customary understatement of demand, to arrive at a normal estimate, by gas transmission company standards, of expected sales.
> The essential point of these calculations is that Trans-Canada now has under contract or clearly in sight, from Canadian customers only, about 75 per cent of the income required to service the debt involved in building its whole Canadian gas transmission system. By the end of its second full year of operation, Trans-Canada now expects to be able to come very close to meeting all debt service obligations on Canadian sales alone.
> What is needed to secure the additional contracts that will protect all debt service is the assurance that the pipe line is under construction. This is the purpose of the legislation now before the house. Once this legislation is passed, and the pipe line under way, it is quite within the bounds of possibility that the company can demonstrate ability to meet its debt service. Under normal circumstances a gas transmission company would then expect to be able to raise by normal means the funds it requires under those circumstances.

In other words, the question the line can be financed without export is being largely answered by the volume of sales that are being booked by the transmission company. I have very little doubt that by autumn it will be possible to finance the line in Canada independently of export.

I was asked what the government's policy is regarding public investment. I think that policy has been made clear over the years. If there is a job which needs to be done that private enterprise is unwilling to undertake, it has been the policy of the government to do that job as a government enterprise. I can think of several examples; for instance, Trans-Canada Air Lines. No private enterprise was willing to tackle that job at the time. Polymer is another. I can name several other jobs that have been done by the government for the reason that private enterprise was not willing to undertake them.

An hon. Member: And done well.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): We believe that private enterprise can usually do a job better than the government.

An hon. Member: In the case of T.C.A.?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Perhaps if private enterprise had started T.C.A. it might have done better.

An hon. Member: The C.P.A.?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The C.P.A. started with a rich uncle. In any event that is government policy. If the only way of getting this pipe-line project built should be to build it as a public enterprise, the government would regard that as its responsibility. But the government believes that a gas pipe line is peculiarly a project for private enterprise, for the building and operation, and the government is doing its utmost to keep this project in the hands of private enterprise.

It has been represented that this will be a great gold mine for the owners of the shares. I hope so, because, as I have said, we are making sure that slightly more than half the shares will be sold to Canadians. If there is a gold mine in the project, I want to see Canadians benefit, but I would not buy shares myself with any expectation that they represent a gold mine.

This is a very long pipe line, and while I am satisfied that it will be a fair investment I think it is most unfortunate when the hon. member for Winnipeg North starts counting up the millions of dollars that will go to the owners of the common shares. Every common share outstanding represents an investment of at least $8. The original shares were sold at $8 per share, and since then they have been sold at $8 plus interest from the time the first shares were sold. When the line is financed, shares will be issued to the distributors at $9. The cost of distribution will probably be $1 per share, and they will be offered to the public at $10.

This idea that the insiders are making a killing is absolutely wrong. Many times the men who have been working at this problem, working their hearts out trying to get it moving, have said to me, "If we could get $8 back and have a chance to buy the same shares at $9 or $10 when the line is in operation, it would be the greatest transaction we have ever made."

It has been said that this is an improvident transaction, that it is a sinister transaction. I would just like to say that I have been working for the government for 21 years and I have been working as an engineer in private practice for another 20 years, and I think I have a pretty good record. I do not think anyone can point to any particular project and say that through bad judgment on the part of Howe he lost money in the transaction, or at any government project carried out under my direction and say that is a project in which the government of Canada did not get back a proper return.

The point I am making is that I am getting on in years and this may be the last big project I will be called upon to undertake for the government of Canada. I want to assure hon. members that it is not my purpose to close my years of engineering practice and public life by undertaking a project that is an improvident project for the government, a project which will stand to my discredit over the years.

I am confident that this project will work out to the advantage of Canada. Hon. members have referred to the crisscross networks of pipe lines in the United States. It is true that pipe lines take gas to every corner of the United States, to almost every town and village in the United States. Are we in Canada to carry on in competition with that great country without the advantages of natural gas being brought to various communities? For the communities where the gas originates, there will be the possibilities of petrochemical works, and then there will be the advantages that the delivery of gas will bring to industry and the comfort it will provide to home owners.

This is a necessary project. It is said we could put it off for another year, but these projects if long delayed fall to pieces. I became interested in this project directly a little over two years ago, two years and one month exactly. Hon. members talk about five years, but I did not have anything to do with this project five years ago or four years ago or three years ago. I became interested when Premier Manning came to Ottawa and asked the assistance of this government in marketing Alberta natural gas.

Those two years have been well spent. I think the progress that has been made by the company in working out its engineering, in acquiring rights of way, in acquiring production contracts and in signing up markets has been such as could reasonably be expected to take two years. But the project has come to the point where we may say, "True, you have signed up all the gas, and you have arranged sales contracts for more than half the capacity of the pipe line, but just hold another year and probably things will work out all right." When these things reach that point they do not hold through another year. These purchase contracts in Alberta are not going to hold for another year. The sales contracts are not going to hold another year, because people have to make up their minds about the kind of fuel that will be available to them.

It seems to me that the greatest possible compulsion is placed on everyone connected with this project to get the construction started this year. I am hopeful that this bill will pass in due time and the project get under way. I still believe that if this is my last project, it is still a project with which my children will be rather proud that their father had a hand in getting it going.

Mr. Rowe: Mr. Chairman, I listened with interest, as I know every other hon. member did, to the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. His last notes were most touching. I hope his children are never ashamed of him, as I hope my children will never be ashamed of me. I hope this will not turn out to be the flop which the minister seemed to indicate he almost thinks it might. It does amuse me to hear one who has had such long experience in parliament tell us that his judgment has never been in error in building these great things in the past, and that he is building a monument now of which his little children will be very proud in the years ahead.

I have also been in politics a long time. You know, some men are born to greatness, some men achieve greatness, and some men, like the minister of immigration who laughs at everything, have greatness thrust upon them, but still when they get up they hardly know whether they are going or coming. In the house you would wonder what is on. You hear a snigger here and snigger there, and you look around and you find it is the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

As I have said, almost since I was old enough to vote I have had experience in municipal, provincial and dominion politics. One of the first things I learned in the county council was to respect parliamentary procedure. Never in all those years have I witnessed what I have witnessed in the past two weeks. Never did I dream in the wildest stretch of my imagination that I would ever sit in any parliament that would disregard British parliamentary principles as they have been disregarded here.

This government, led by the man who never makes a mistake, by the man whose children and grandchildren are going to be proud of him, is going to create a crown corporation to construct this pipe line across northern Ontario. Yet they tell us how much they love private ownership. That man comes into the house and tells us that this is the most important project that has been brought into this house in the last quarter century. In one hand he holds the resolution and in the other he shoves out closure, almost ahead of the resolution. It would shock the most modest county council and disgust the smallest legislature in Canada, let alone the parliament of them all. This is the most shocking treatment we have ever seen.

The Prime Minister, who is as much concerned with his nephews and grandchildren as the Minister of Trade and Commerce, sits in sanctimonious silence and says it is all right as long as he sees a strong majority but he says, "We dare not go to the country now, for we may not come back like this." The Minister of Trade and Commerce gives us the resolution with one hand, but he puts on closure with the other. The Prime Minister says, with quiet, grandfatherly affection, "You can speak now for the rest of the week; and you know I will not stop you from voting."

Mr. Sinclair: That is what parliament is for.

Mr. Rowe: The Minister of Fisheries thinks that is very generous. We have seen closure after closure, for the sake of closure alone. The greatest project to be considered by this house has been brought here in a cloak of secrecy. At no other time in our history has any project been so deliberately hidden from the consideration of the House of Commons as this particular project. In haste and fear this important question has been rushed into the house and then hidden by this carefully beclouded and clumsily befuddled plan of closure. Never in history have we seen closure applied like this.

You talk about 1932. I was sitting on the government side of this house at that time. True, we had closure, but we were not very proud of it. Right Hon. R. B. Bennett was not proud of it. It was not the greatest project that had been presented to Canada. It was a case where men were starving in this country and farmers could not find sales for their products, and the Liberal party had lost every market in the world. It had lost the British market, it had lost more markets than any government since confederation. Yet they wanted to put the government in a spot and for 21 days they went on and debated. Finally Right Hon. R. B. Bennett did bring in closure. He said to me, "I hate to do this, for it establishes a bad precedent, but farmers are starving." That was because of what the Grit government had done in the years before. It was not an issue like the one in 1912 about the dreadnaughts going to Britain. But here we have a picture we are all in favour of.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rowe: We are all in favour of the development of Canada. I am not confused by your applause. You applauded a member who said we had been speaking for 21 days, when the truth is that we have been speaking for only 14 days. You applauded another hon. member over here, the hon. member for Charlotte, when he told us how many years it would take if everybody talked as much as some of the members talk. He talked about everything except the issue before the house. These men who thump their desks and laugh so much, in this particular issue that threatens the freedom of parliament, have not even seen the insects that infect the carcass. You gentlemen seem to be lost.

An hon. Member: Is that your horses?

Mr. Rowe: I have listened to you in this house for a long time. I have prayed for the day when you might rise. I notice that the backbenchers opposite have demonstrated they have more brains in their seats than in their feet. We have seen the spectacle of these desk thumpers applauding the government, and today applauding the Speaker. Today the Speaker came in and said he was wrong yesterday. They said, "That is all right; we will support you today too." These gentlemen will support anything. If a long-tailed rat came in that door they would not shoot him. Never was a more subservient crowd in power in Canada. I have watched them in power for a long time. I remember the Minister of Trade and Commerce saying, "If we want to do it, who is going to stop us?" and, "I never was much for rules." He has proven that now. They have thrown out the rule book and run over it with a steam-roller. If I were sitting behind this tired, smug, old government, I would hide my head in shame rather than pound the desks. Let them go back to their constituencies. The Minister of Finance laughs.

Mr. Harris: Yes.

An hon. Member: Who wouldn't?

Mr. Rowe: Let him tell the people—

Mr. Harris: Tell us what happened in 1935?

Mr. Rowe: Come on to Dufferin-Simcoe. The weather there is good there too.

Mr. Harris: Then hogs were about 3 or 4 cents, and now they are 26 cents.

Mr. Rowe: The Minister of Finance laughs with reckless glibness, and he speaks just about as glibly and just about as recklessly. The other night he told us that if nobody wasted Mr. Howe's time debating this bill, Alberta gas would be delivered in the city of Winnipeg before winter. More than that, the Minister of Finance said:

> The completion of the line from Kapuskasing to Toronto and Toronto to Montreal may very well be done in the next construction season. Bear in mind what I have said.

At the same time we find that the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Company says that the first delivery on their purchase of 30-inch pipe in England will not get here until 1957, and the completion of delivery will not be until 1959. What are you going to run the gas through? I suppose you will get the pipe from a blacksmith up in Grey-Bruce—

Mr. Harris: They are far better there than in Dufferin-Simcoe.

Mr. Rowe: Certainly I would expect the Minister of Finance to be a little more sure of his facts before he tells us these things so glibly. I never saw a man struggling harder to bail out another colleague. If he had not struggled so hard to bail him out in the last few years he would not be in this mess now. I wonder what they will be like in the future if he has to struggle so hard now. I hear the rustling in the mulberry bushes, and the Prime Minister seems to be getting ready to retire from the leadership. I wonder if there is something in mind for the future.

Mr. Sinclair: Tell us about Premier Frost now.

Mr. Rowe: That is the sort of proposition we have with respect to this great project.

Mr. Pickersgill: Tell us about Premier Frost.

Mr. Rowe: Oh, your little voice does not bother me one bit.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): But you do not answer.

Mr. Rowe: The Minister of Trade and Commerce says this is the greatest project we have had in the last generation. Why is it now brought before us in a mixture of haste, fear, uncertainty and secrecy? Why is this government so afraid of the facts? The minister tells us the facts in a trembling and almost apologetic voice, hoping he has told us enough and not too much so that even his children will not be ashamed of it. Why should these gentlemen be afraid of the facts? Why should they be afraid of parliament? Why should they be so afraid of discussion? Why are they so afraid of opposition? Why are they so afraid of going to the country? You have been bound to your desks for three years. Go out on the green and see what the people think about you. Read the Toronto Star. Read the Winnipeg Free Press.

Mr. Pickersgill: Read the Globe and Mail.

Mr. Rowe: Mr. Chairman, when I heard these gentlemen talking tonight I could not help but think what a great thing it was that we still had freedom of the press, because there is little freedom left in this parliament. Never have I seen the rights and privileges of individual members of parliament so blunted. This Friday will long be a black Friday in the history of parliamentary freedom in Canada. You people were so buoyant in time of critical depression when men and women were suffering. Who is suffering now for want of gas in Ontario? Who is starving for your gas? Who is starving for it now?

An hon. Member: Ask Premier Frost.

Some hon. Members: Tell us about Frost.

Mr. Pickersgill: Tell us about Frost. Tell us about your premier.

Mr. Rowe: You pipsqueaks sound like men on a frosty morning. You have hoarse voices. I cannot tell what you say. Who is suffering but you gentlemen, you great philanthropists, you great advocates of human rights, you great sympathizers with the babies and the aged? In 1932—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rowe: Oh, you boys who pound your desks the most were not even here then. You were not even thought of, but your cohorts in those days said that they would not give a five-cent piece to any Tory province in Canada. You would not give a five-cent piece; and when we tried to do something you opposed it so long that we had to put in a form of closure after the first clause had been dealt with for 21 days, an entirely different situation from tonight. Do not let anyone tell you otherwise. It is just like your misrepresentation of the Leader of the Opposition in this debate. You talk about him not being for the development of Canada. Who developed northern Ontario more than the Leader of the Opposition?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rowe: You say we are not in favour of the development of this country, whether it is the gas line, the C.P.R. or anything else. Why, you young pipsqueaks, your grandfathers voted against the building of the C.P.R. and tried to hamper it by building another line to run parallel with it. It was Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald who formed the national policies that brought about the beginning of industrial development in Canada. It was the Leader of the Opposition who put $200 million into the development of northern Ontario. You men who laugh should laugh less and read more.

Mr. Sinclair: Who gave us the blackouts, the brownouts and the power shortages? George Drew.

Mr. Rowe: You are a long way from being right. It was Hon. Mitchell Hepburn who was responsible for the shortages that brought about the blackouts. You do not know what you are talking about, coming from Vancouver. This picture is a sad picture for this house when we see the steamroller we have at the present time. Tonight the hon. member for Charlotte and the hon. member for Trinity both complimented the government on its steamroller tactics. They said that closure was a good thing, and hoped that it would be used in the future. They criticized the leader of the C.C.F. party, an older parliamentarian. I differ with him in politics, but he is a much finer parliamentarian than anybody I see across there. When he says this is an abomination you backbenchers laugh at him because you do not understand what he is talking about.

Yes, it is passing strange that this great project could be brought in hidden in secrecy, so carefully beclouded, so clumsily befuddled, so cautiously brought in, so hastily brought to the fore and so carefully planned. Somebody has said that we have talked 21 days. You are 50 per cent wrong in the number of days, but you say that we should have been talking about the pipe line. Your Minister of Trade and Commerce told us that we could not talk about the pipe line.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Rowe: He put closure on debate; and when we are trying to fight for the rights of parliament this government, these hon. members, especially the backbenchers, seem to disregard parliamentary principles. Principles in anything are eternal, but pipe lines are only pipe lines. I say in all sincerity, Mr. Chairman, do not think that this great champion of free enterprise who has built more crown companies than anyone else is the only man who can build the pipe line. He says, "I have never made a mistake in my life. I will put on closure. None of these boys knows what he is talking about." He seems to think we may have a dictator some day and, if so, who could be better than himself?

Yes, Mr. Chairman, I have learned long since that power corrupts and absolute power corrupts completely, and I never saw a government so completely corrupt as this government that is trying to corrupt parliament. I say in all sincerity that never since confederation has there been in any British parliament greater destruction of the rights of the individual and the privileges of members in one week's time; never in the whole history of government in the British commonwealth. Yes, Mr. Chairman, that is the attitude of these backbenchers, and I include the little Minister of Citizenship and Immigration who flaps his flippers and pounds the desk. I would be ashamed to be a pupil of Mackenzie King and learn as little as he has learned.

The hon. gentlemen talk about the supremacy of parliament, and not one of them has risen and made an intelligent observation about the rights of parliament in the last week. They know so little that the Speaker is the only man who can argue their case. He makes a decision one day, and then is so afraid of what you may think that he comes in and corrects it the next day and you all vote for that 100 per cent.

Have you ever seen a more subservient group hiding behind the iron curtain of secrecy, behind a smug, complacent, tired old government, eight members of which, as someone has said, were never in parliament before they came into the cabinet? They had greatness thrust upon them. None of them had ever been in the opposition. I do not think any of the eight were ever in a county council. If they ever had been and had behaved like they have here, they certainly would not have been very popular. What has gone on here would never be seen in any provincial legislature, any municipal council, any county council in Canada. I urge the government not to follow their own precedents.

An hon. Member: Time.

Mr. Rowe: Someone calls time. The Minister of Trade and Commerce says that this has to be done because a deadline was set. I do not know whether it was set by the federal power commission of Washington, by Murchison, by Trans-Canada, by Tennessee or by Gulf Oil. I do not know who helped to set the deadline. I do know that the bill was mentioned in the speech from the throne and was mentioned in the house. I do know that the company was incorporated five years ago and that the government spent four months considering the matter before they hastily brought in the measure and imposed closure so we could not debate it.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, the last hon. gentleman has not only been a distinguished member of this house for many years but at one time was the leader of the Conservative party in the province of Ontario. He belongs to the same political party of which the premier of that province is a member.

Mr. Hees: What about the pipe line?

Mr. Martin: He belongs to the great political party of which the Leader of the Opposition was both the leader and premier in the province of Ontario. In a debate of this importance one would have thought that the views of the premier of Ontario would be of great significance and relevance. It would be interesting to know why the hon. gentleman who has just spoken has ignored our questions as to whether or not he agrees with the views expressed by the premier of Ontario. It would be interesting to know whether the grand conspiracy which he has been talking about tonight includes a conspiracy among the premiers of Alberta, Manitoba and Ontario and the federal government.

An hon. Member: And the Speaker.

Mr. Martin: It would be interesting to know why the Leader of the Opposition, throughout this debate, has persistently refused to make any reference whatsoever to one of his friends, one of his political colleagues, with whom he served as head of the government in which the present premier of Ontario served as his provincial treasurer. Mr. Frost, the premier of this province, had this to say about this question:

> We have taken a generous view with the federal government and recognize their position in this matter has not been simple or easy. I have no intention here of making it more difficult for the federal government to carry its arrangements through. If I did that, I would be doing a disservice to this country.

Does the hon. gentleman who has just spoken agree with the premier of the province of Ontario who says that this matter is one of urgency, that he could not take a position in opposition to this measure because he would be doing a disservice to Canada? He goes on to say this:

> Apparently the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines agreement provides for the quickest and most effective way of bringing gas to Ontario.

Does the hon. gentleman who has just spoken agree with that statement? Then Premier Frost goes on to say this:

> Since the very beginning of this country we have recognized there is a price to pay for Canadian independence. If we had not recognized that, certainly there would be no Canada today. In addition to what has been said about the control of this company, whether the Canadian shareholders had the opportunity to take 51 per cent of the stock, or anything of that sort, the fact of the matter is that the construction is in Canada, wholly within the jurisdiction of our country, and is subject to the legislative enactment not only of the government of Canada but of the provinces through which it passes. That in itself is the real essential of control.

Those are words of a man who is not a supporter of this government but who supports the party of which the Leader of the Opposition is leader; and not one word have we had in this debate from anybody sitting behind the Leader of the Opposition for or against the statement of the premier of Ontario. Is it any wonder, then, that the Globe and Mail, which has supported the Leader of the Opposition throughout his period as Leader of the Opposition in this house, writing of the attitude of the provincial Conservative party and then directing its attention to the party that sits behind the Leader of the Opposition in this house, the other day carried the following:

> What of the Conservatives in Ottawa? They, too, dislike Mr. Howe's method of providing the line. But they do not offer any practicable alternative to it, any alternative which recognizes the need to get the line started and finished without further delay.

Then the Globe and Mail goes on to say this:

> Mr. George Drew . . . would submit the house scheme to a Commons committee—a sure way of holding up the pipe line for at least another year.

We may well ask "why this opposition?" I am not going to suggest the motives that have inspired the Leader of the Opposition, before this measure was initially discussed in the house, to indicate what he and his colleagues proposed to do.

Mr. Fulton: And you have been panicking ever since.

Mr. Martin: I am not going to spend much time in reminding the house what the hon. member for Prince Albert said about what he was going to do by holding up the business of the government.

Mr. Fulton: You have been panicking.

Mr. Martin: I hold in my hand, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Diefenbaker: That statement is as false as your promises about health insurance.

Mr. Martin: I hold in my hand—

Mr. Fulton: Look at the minister panicking.

Mr. Martin: I hold in my hand the reason for the attitude of the opposition. Here is a report that appeared in the Toronto Daily Star. These are not my words. These are not the words of a supporter of the Prime Minister. These are the words of a supporter of the Leader of the Opposition, a man who served as a loyal worker contributing his energy and his support to the cause which the Leader of the Opposition has been advocating.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What did the Windsor Star say?

Mr. Martin: Here are the headlines:

> Drew Plays Politics for East, U.S. Money Vital—Western Tory.

Here is the story:

> Calgary, June 1—(CP)—Opposition to the stand of Progressive Conservative leader George Drew on the pipe line issue was voiced yesterday by J. I. Haw, treasurer of the Calgary South Progressive Conservative association, who charged Mr. Drew is "playing politics to maintain his stand in the east".
> "He forgets that we in the west must have money from the United States," he said. "What is good for the U.S. is good for Canada, and vice versa. There should not be one bit of argument in that respect—it doesn't hurt Canada one iota."

He says in effect, "My leader should stop playing politics".

Mr. Fulton: When are you going to stop playing politics?

Mr. Martin: We were told by the hon. member for Assiniboia, who stated on March 7, as reported in the Ottawa Journal: "The government ain't seen nothing yet in the way of filibusters, Argue warned last night. He served notice that his party intends to prolong debate on the Trans-Canada gas pipe line issue until the bill is amended. "We are going to stage the biggest filibuster that we have ever had in this country". Having in mind that background, Mr. Chairman, one would want to go back to the words of a respected and senior member of this house, namely the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, who said this on Thursday last.

Mr. Ellis: Read the whole quotation.

Mr. Martin: He said:

> May I tell hon. members, government members, official opposition members, C.C.F. members and Social Credit members, that I favour closure. The government has a perfect right—not only a right but a duty—to invoke closure at the right time—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: At the right time.

Mr. Martin: To continue:

—that is, when it has been demonstrated that the business of the house cannot be carried on in any other way but by closure.

Mr. Rowe: Oh, yes; but that was not demonstrated. Debate had not started.

Mr. Martin: Hon. gentlemen opposite have quoted Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

Mr. Fulton: Panicking in advance.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend says I am panicky. May I say that I am not so panicky as my hon. friend is right at this minute.

Mr. Fulton: Oh, no?

Mr. Martin: And this debate is not through yet. Sir. Robert Borden, the great constitutionalist and prime minister of this country and leader of the Conservative party, was the first hon. gentleman in this house to propose closure, and we all recall the circumstances. Let us remind ourselves tonight of the words he used on that occasion.

Mr. Fulton: What did Sir Wilfrid say?

Mr. Martin: I am coming to him in a minute, if you will just be patient.

Mr. Fulton: What did your party say about it at that time?

Mr. Martin: I will come to that in a minute. This is what Sir Robert Borden said:

The resolution which I have the honour to move this afternoon touches a very important subject, because it must be apparent to all hon. gentlemen in this house that unless we have such rules as permit the reasonable transaction of public business, and prescribe the ordinary and proper conduct of debate, parliament must fail in its chief function, and the proceedings in this house are liable to be brought in to disrepute and contempt.

No one is more ready than I to acknowledge that liberty of speech and freedom of debate must be preserved, but I venture respectfully to suggest that these privileges must be observed and maintained under such conditions that they shall not be allowed to degenerate into licence and obstruction.

My hon. friends have quoted Mr. Mackenzie King in the debate of 1932, which saw a motion moved by the then prime minister, Mr. Bennett, for closure. Here is what Mackenzie King said. Hon. gentlemen opposite did not quote this when they were talking about him in the same debate:

If you strike at the foundation of parliamentary government, you cannot do anything at all in parliament, because everything done by parliament is based on the assumption that, by the common agreement and consent of all assembled together in a parliament, you have regard and respect for the conventional foundations of parliamentary government.

That was at page 1627 of Hansard, volume II, 1932. Then at page 1631 of volume II of Hansard of 1932 he went on to say:

Obstruction is, in reality, nothing less than a repudiation of the existing constitution of the country.

The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe—

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Mackenzie King never said any such thing on page 1631.

Mr. Martin: I have sat in this house when the—

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Mackenzie King said no such thing on page 1631.

Mr. Hees: You are caught out.

Mr. Pearson: Freedom of speech.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, you have in your hands now—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. In the last few moments of this limited debate I would ask the committee to hear the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Martin: When the hon. gentleman was discussing the debate of 1932—

Some hon. Members: You have not read it right.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend can holler. He has not the slightest appreciation of the value of free speech.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Fulton: This committee is entitled to have the page reference from which the minister is quoting, and I am simply saying that Mr. Mackenzie King made no such reference on page 1631 of Hansard. We do not find a quotation from Mr. Mackenzie King on that page.

The Deputy Chairman: I think I must rule that even if the minister was misquoting, it is not a question of privilege. The Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Martin: When Mr. Bennett was introducing his resolution in 1932 this is what he said.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Martin: He said, as reported at page 1404 of Hansard:

That statement, together with the statement I made a minute ago as to the fundamental principle—

Mr. Fulton: What page?

Mr. Martin: Page 1404. I continue:

—under which parliamentary institutions obtain, is the rule of the majority which constitutes the case we make today for the measure that is standing in my name. Those principles I believe cannot readily be questioned.

Listen to what Mr. Bennett said, then the leader in this house, of the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe. The hon. member sat in this house when this was said:

Is it a crime against the state, as Mr. MacDonald thought it was, wilfully to oppose and maliciously to consume time in personal attacks, maliciously to consume time in making statements which must be known to be untrue, making statements which must be known are wholly beside the question? Is it not, if his statement be correct—

Mr. Hees: It is three to one on Walter. You have not a hope. You may as well sit down.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Hees: Walter has it.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member's time has not expired but it very shortly will expire, and he is entitled to be heard.

Mr. Martin: Here is the final sentence of Mr. Bennett, and I am sure my hon. friends would like to hear what Mr. Bennett said:

Is it not, if his statement be correct, in the true and just sense of the term, a crime against the state that this sort of thing should continue?

Mr. Fulton: The sort of thing you are doing is a crime against the state.

Mr. Martin: I say we have precedent and justification, if ever a parliament had, for closure. Hon. gentlemen have had 14 days in which to debate this matter. They talk about the denial of free speech, and every time some member on this side has risen in this house they have not given him a chance to be heard.

Mr. Rowe: Twenty-one days' difference.

Mr. Martin: They attacked the Prime Minister; they attacked—

Mr. Hees: You are running third; you are through.

Mr. McCann: Come on, you are just a windbag.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. May I suggest to hon. members on both sides of the house that the minister who has the floor is entitled to the same courtesy that has been extended to the other speakers tonight.

Mr. Martin: When the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe was speaking we gave him the attention he deserved.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin: We did not agree with what he said, because we knew perfectly well that he himself did not agree with what he said. If I have said anything out of place, of course, I withdraw it.

Mr. Rowe: You had better withdraw it.

Mr. Martin: Because whatever the hon. gentleman said was really not worth referring to at all.

Mr. Rowe: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. The Minister of National Health and Welfare said I was saying what I knew was not correct; in other words,—

An hon. Member: He withdrew that.

Mr. Rowe: He simply said that if he said anything he should not. I would assume that he would withdraw his whole speech, because he is really 21 days out in the whole thing.

The Deputy Chairman: I understood the minister to withdraw the statement I heard him make, that the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe did not really believe what he said. If the minister has not withdrawn that statement, he must do so.

Mr. Martin: I gladly withdraw it. I am sure the hon. gentleman really did mean what he said.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin: The page I was referring to is 1627.

Mr. Hees: You had better withdraw your whole speech.

An hon. Member: Why not withdraw yourself?

Mr. Martin: I simply want to close what I have to say by quoting from the Toronto Telegram.

Some hon. Members: Time.

Mr. Rowe: Does closure not apply to you?

Mr. Martin: Here is what is said about the Prime Minister of this country by the Toronto Telegram:

Louis St. Laurent; World Statesman

The second French-Canadian Prime Minister in Canada's history, Mr. St. Laurent's integrity, honesty of speech and fairness of mind are qualities in which Canadians take pride.

Some hon. Members: Time.

Mr. Martin:

It is Canada's destiny that her Prime Minister shall henceforth walk among the leaders of the world and it is a happy omen for this country that in Mr. St. Laurent we have a man of incisive vigor of intellect and courage of convictions to speak for Canada on the great problems of peace and progress in the world.

Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation

Mr. Hees: I just received a tip. Walter is first, Bob is second, Pickersgill is third and you are fourth, Paul.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It is now past one o'clock and under standing order 33, the last few lines of which I propose to read:

. . . and if such adjourned debate or postponed consideration shall not have been resumed or concluded before one o'clock—

Order.

—in the morning, no member shall rise to speak after that hour, but all such questions as must be decided in order to conclude such adjourned debate or postponed consideration, shall be decided forthwith.

It therefore becomes my duty to put the questions to the committee. The first question is on clause 4. Shall clause 4 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Michener: Mr. Chairman, I move—

Some hon. Members: No debate.

The Deputy Chairman: With deference, I am unable to hear because of the noise. I am unable to receive a motion from any hon. member. I heard the hon. member for St. Paul's start to say "I move". I have read the standing order which is binding. I submit just this to the committee. I did not write this order but I have been given the duty of carrying it out, and what it says is that:

. . . no member shall rise to speak after that hour, but all such questions as must be decided in order to conclude such adjourned debate—et cetera.

—shall be decided forthwith.

I have no alternative but to put the question which is now before the committee. The question is shall clause 4 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Michener: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

The Deputy Chairman: Those in favour of clause 4 carrying will please rise. May I say to hon. members on both sides of the house that those who are not in front of the line of curtains will not be counted.

Mr. Hodgson: There are a couple coming in over there now.

Mr. Monteith: Keep out, Hollingworth.

Mr. Bell: If you want to vote for closure, come on in, Al.

[Mr. Martin.]

The Deputy Chairman: Those opposed to clause 4 carrying will please rise.

Clause 4 agreed to: Yeas, 130; nays, 41.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare clause 4 carried. Shall clause 5 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Drew: It has never been before the house.

Mr. Knowles: We have never discussed it. It has not even been called yet.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The railroading continues.

The Deputy Chairman: Those in favour will please rise.

An hon. Member: Outside, the hon. member for Pontiac.

The Deputy Chairman: Those opposed to clause 5 carrying will please rise.

Clause 5 agreed to: Yeas, 132; nays, 41.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare clause 5 carried.

Mr. Knowles: Without it having been before the house.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 6 carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Deputy Chairman: Those in favour will please rise.

Mr. Coldwell: What a farce.

Mr. Martin: You have made it one.

Mr. Nowlan: At one time this was a parliament.

Mr. Knowles: It has never been called.

Mr. Rowe: We have had 14 days of closure.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Democracy down the drain.

The Deputy Chairman: Those opposed to clause 6 carrying will please rise.

Clause 6 agreed to: Yeas, 132; nays, 41.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare clause 6 carried.

Shall clause 7 carry?

Mr. Knowles: I rise on a point of order.

The Deputy Chairman: Unless the hon. member is rising to contest the vote on the last clause he may not be received. I would not be able to hear him.

Mr. Knowles: I rise on a point of order with respect to the calling of clause 7.

The Deputy Chairman: I am unable with regret to hear the hon. member's point of order on clause 7 because my instructions under the rule are that I have—

An hon. Member: Closure.

The Deputy Chairman: —to put the question on clause 7.

Mr. Knowles: Are we denied the right to speak to a point of order? This is the second time today you have done this, Mr. Chairman.

Clause 7 agreed to: Yeas, 134; nays, 40.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare clause 7 carried. Shall clause 1 carry?

Clause 1 agreed to: Yeas, 134; nays, 41.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare clause 1 carried. Shall clause 2 carry?

Clause 2 agreed to: Yeas, 134; nays, 41.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare clause 2 carried. Shall clause 3 carry?

Clause 3 agreed to: Yeas, 134; nays, 41.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare clause 3 carried. Shall the title carry?

Title agreed to: Yeas, 134; nays, 40.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the title carried. Shall the bill carry?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. That is not included in the Prime Minister's motion. You are under no instructions to put the question on the carrying of the bill.

Bill agreed to: Yeas, 133; nays, 41.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the bill carried. Shall I report the bill?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am going to repeat my instructions once more to the committee. My instructions are to be found in standing order 33.

Mr. Knowles: And that is all.

The Deputy Chairman: Standing order 33 says:

> . . .and if such adjourned debate or postponed consideration shall not have been resumed or concluded before one o'clock in the morning, no member shall rise to speak after that hour, but all such questions as must be decided in order to conclude such adjourned debate or postponed consideration, shall be decided forthwith.

Mr. Knowles: That was in the Prime Minister's motion? I ask you to read the Prime Minister's motion under which you are operating.

The Deputy Chairman: In my opinion that includes reporting the bill. Hon. members in favour of the chairman reporting the bill will please rise.

Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation

Motion, (Mr. Howe, Port Arthur) agreed to: Yeas, 132; nays, 41.

During the taking of the vote:

Mr. Fulton: Who put the question? Who can get the floor to put the question?

Mr. Knowles: You would not let the hon. member for St. Paul's make a motion, and you would not let me rise on a point of order. Yet in effect you have allowed the government to make a motion. In 1913 Mr. Pugsley and Sir Wilfrid Laurier cursed the government for doing this.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): You do the same.

After the taking of the vote:

The Deputy Chairman: Bill ordered reported.

Mr. Knowles: Goodbye.

Bill reported.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, the people in the galleries have seen a farce tonight.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McCann: Looking at you. You are the farce.

Mr. Coldwell: This is the worst proceeding that has ever been seen in this parliament, Mr. Speaker. The chairman has tried to muzzle the committee.

An hon. Member: The Speaker is on his feet.

Mr. Speaker: This house stands adjourned until Monday at 2.30 in the afternoon.

Mr. Rowe: Why not dissolve it and go to the country?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: On Monday we will take up third reading of the bill.

Mr. Fulton: We cannot hear.

Mr. Sinclair: If you would keep quiet you would.

Mr. Harris: I was announcing that the business on Monday would be the pipe-line bill.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I assume that the first order will be the debate on the motion with regard to the conduct of the Speaker.

Mr. Harris: I was only announcing the government's intention with respect to government orders. I have no comment to make on the other point.

Mr. Bell: You have to have another breakfast party with the Speaker.

Mr. Sinclair: The audience has seen the biggest ham actor in Canada before it right now.

It being 1.47 a.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, June 4, 1956

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. COLDWELL—REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN OTTAWA "CITIZEN" OF JUNE 2

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. On page 1 of the Ottawa Citizen of Saturday, June 2, the following sentences appear:

> Then, white-faced, but determined, the Speaker moved the next vote. The opposition could restrain itself no longer. Coldwell, shaking his fist, advanced on the Speaker. "You bloody fool," he shouted above the bedlam.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that never in my life anywhere, at any time, in any place, have I used those words to anyone. Earlier above the din I had sought to be heard on privilege. I advanced toward the table and I said: "You are a dictator, Mr. Speaker," and I repeated "dictator" several times. Again, let me say that I have never in my life used the foul language attributed to me.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MR. DREW—MOTION OF NON-CONFIDENCE IN PRESIDING OFFICER OF THE HOUSE

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition) moved:

> In view of the unprecedented action of Mr. Speaker in (a) improperly reversing his own decision without notice and without giving any opportunity for discussion; (b) repeatedly refusing to allow members to address the house on occasions when the rules provide that they have the right to be heard; (c) subordinating the rights of the house to the will of the government, this house resolves that it no longer has any confidence in its presiding officer.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this motion is placed before the house with full recognition of the seriousness of the motion itself, and also of the nature of the tragedy that has happened here in this House of Commons.

The Speaker has held the regard, I think I can say without any question the deep affection, of most members of this house. It is with the utmost regret, not only on my own part but I know on the part of others, that a motion of this nature should have become necessary at this time. On the one hand, there is a very real sense of break which has occurred between the Speaker and many members of this house. On the other is the equally deep regret that the high office of Speaker should be called in question.

I need not remind any hon. member here that the office of Speaker is the cornerstone of our parliamentary structure. That name was first formally recorded in the roles of parliament at Westminster in January 1377. For nearly 600 years the name of Speaker has been associated with the authority and dignity of parliament. There have been times when disputes have arisen; there have been other occasions in other jurisdictions when the position of the Speaker has been challenged and when he has been censured for the conduct that has occurred.

At times, in fact, in days gone by the position of the Speaker was an extremely serious post because of the dangers which resulted from the conduct of that office under certain circumstances. It is a lonely office. In one of the many books dealing with the role of the Speaker he has been described as the loneliest man in the house. I do not think there is an hon. member on either side of this house who is not extremely sympathetic with the severe demands which are imposed day by day upon the Speaker, whoever he may be, to rule even without anticipation of what will arise and to rule in a manner which will be acceptable to the members.

I do not think that any hon. member at any time is likely to raise serious issue about a mistake which may be made in the haste of debate and with the infinite variety of possible resolutions, points of order, questions of privilege and other matters which may come before the Speaker for his decision. It would not be upon a question of any mere mistake that the indignation of hon. members of this house would be aroused. Most certainly this motion would not be before the house at this time if it were not for the fact that the continuing confidence in the office of Speaker and the continuing confidence in the present Speaker had been challenged by events of the past few days.

When a statement is made that the rights of parliament are at issue I think it should always be remembered that it is not the rights of the individual members here as individuals which are of importance. What is important is that this is the place where the nation's business is conducted and that what happens here deeply affects the life, the future and the happiness of every Canadian.

House of Commons

We use the words "House of Commons" very often without pausing to reflect upon what those words mean. After all, it is the House of Commons with which we are now concerned. The other branch of parliament is not affected by the discussions here today except to the extent that each one of the members of that other place also has a deep concern about what happens here. The word "Commons" means the people. This is the house of the people.

Sitting on both sides of this house and on both sides of the Speaker are representatives of every constituency of Canada. Collectively, those of us who meet in this chamber represent all Canadians. That is our responsibility; that is our duty. Our rights are important only to the extent that those rights represent the rights of the people themselves. If the traditional rights of the members of this house are debased, limited or arbitrarily curtailed in any way, it is not our rights that are of concern. What is vitally important is that in that curtailment of rights there is a limitation of the rights of the people themselves.

The freedom that we have here to shape and guide legislation, no matter on which side of the house we may sit, is part of the very freedom which we cherish here in his country of ours. It is here in the House of Commons, to which all the people of Canada must look for just laws properly considered and properly made, that Canadians in every part of Canada must look for the greater part of their freedom and for the assurance of that type of government which will be in itself an expression of the freedom which has come down to us through so many generations of sacrifice and of tremendous effort.

It is with that thought that I submit that we should discuss what has taken place and that we should place before this house the problems which now confront us. The ceremony we witness every day at the opening of the house symbolizes the long historic background of the authority, position and tradition of the Speaker. The mace, which is placed upon the table when the Speaker occupies the chair, is an expression of all the great and honourable things wrapped up in this high office which means as much to every one of us as it does to the occupant of the chair himself. I repeat again, that system was not designed for the advantage or convenience of the members of parliament. It was designed for the protection of the freedom of the people of Canada.

What has happened here is something which goes to the very roots of our free institutions. It is something which could affect, and gravely affect, the rights, the freedom and the happiness of Canadians not only for generations but for centuries to come. We all know that we follow the traditions of Westminster and it is, therefore, of importance to us when we examine the position of Speaker that we should recall the history of that office at Westminster, and we should remember that the position of Speaker in the British parliament, before we had any parliament in Canada, had come to represent an institution unique in the annals of parliamentary government. In fact, the independence of the Speaker, as it has been established over long years at Westminster, grew out of the fight between the crown and the members of parliament in the reign of the Stuarts.

Some may wonder at times why we go through the rather cumbersome procedure by which parliament is opened and also why we see the mace removed from the table when the Speaker leaves the chair and placed below the table when the chairman of the committee of the house proceeds to take over. This practice stems from the fight through the Long Parliament in the time of Charles I. The members of parliament suspected that the Speaker was the King's man, and in point of fact they had good reason for entertaining such suspicion. Therefore, when money bills were before the house these assumed special significance. They refused to discuss money matters until the Speaker had left the chair and one of their own members could become chairman of the committee. It was out of that simple and historic fact that this practice and this tradition grew. It has developed as part of their tradition in Britain that the Speaker is not in any sense beholden to the government for his appointment or his continuance in office. We know that there is a different practice there. However, the rules and the traditions are mainly the same. Our own are set out at some length in Beauchesne's, third edition, at pages 52 and 53. I quote paragraphs 105 and 106:

105. The presiding officer, though entitled on all occasions to be treated with the greatest attention and respect by the individual members, because the power, and dignity, and honour of the assembly are officially embodied in his person, is yet but the servant of the house. He is selected and appointed to the trust of presiding officer, in the confidence and upon the supposition of the conformity of his will to that of the assembly.

106. The Speaker's duty as the official mouthpiece of the house is extremely well expressed in a few words by Mr. Speaker Lenthall, who, when that ill-advised monarch, Charles I came into House of Commons, and having taken the Speaker's chair, asked him "whether any of the five members that he came to apprehend were in the House, whether he saw any of them, and where they were?"—made this answer:—"May it please your majesty, I have neither eyes to see, nor tongue to speak, in this place but as the House is pleased to direct me, whose servant I am here, and humbly beg your majesty's pardon that I cannot give any other answer than this, to what your majesty is pleased to demand of me."

There are three branches of government here, in Britain or in the other nations with a similar parliamentary form. If the Speaker of the Canadian House of Commons or of any other house of commons under our traditions is in any way subservient or beholden to the government, the situation is not in principle different from that which the members of the Commons in England faced when the Speaker was beholden to the King. When you, Mr. Speaker, assumed your office on November 12, 1953 you expressed what we all believe to be the true function of impartiality on the part of the Speaker of this house. These were your words as recorded in Hansard of November 12, 1953 at page 3:

The honour which is being bestowed upon me is high indeed, but greater still are the responsibilities. I beseech Divine Providence to grant me all the help necessary for the fulfilment of my duties, in accordance with our noble traditions.

My dear colleagues, it is my duty to maintain decorum and order in debate, to preserve our traditions, privileges, liberties, usages and customs and, in particular, to exercise impartiality and fairness and protect the rights of every individual member. My experience as Deputy Speaker has amply shown me that only with your advice, counsel and co-operation can I succeed in my new task. I shall, I assure you, strive to deserve your effective support, and endeavour at all times to prove myself worthy of your trust.

It is, I believe, true to say that the eyes of other nations, more than ever before, are turned towards Canada. Therefore, I realize that the dignity of this high office and the reputation of our parliament must be most carefully safeguarded, and I shall govern myself accordingly.

I pray to Divine Providence for all assistance necessary so that I shall be able to fulfil my duties in a manner that will do justice to you and this house, whose servant I am.

I said that we have held the Speaker in respect and affection. We echoed, in our own hearts and minds, those words which the Speaker uttered at the time he took this office. It would have been our desire, the earnest desire of every one of us, that the relationship which existed for so long had continued unimpaired. It would not be possible for anyone to pretend that it has been only in these few days that questioning has arisen, and that uncertainty has beclouded that relationship which we desired, just as much as did the Speaker himself.

During this present session it must have been recognized that there has been a steady deterioration in the relationship of the occupant of that high office and many of the members in this house. I should like to emphasize that long before there was any open criticism in this house there was widespread criticism in the press of the conduct of the Speaker in the performance of his duties. That was not good for Canada; that was not good for the people of Canada whose servants we all are. It could have been overcome. Even though the criticism had raised some questioning, it could have been overcome if the Speaker had listened to the advice which was being given to him outside the house as well as inside this house.

Unfortunately for all of us the criticism emerged openly in the house during the debate on what we have come to know as the pipe-line bill. It came to a head last week. Hansard records several expressions of that criticism on earlier occasions, but it was during the last two days of the past week that all the criticism was brought into focus by events which every member in this house must greatly deplore. I know that for all of us the last two days and the past week are days we would like to erase from our memories, erase from our hearts, erase from the records that are kept of the proceedings in this house. But, unhappily, that cannot be.

Therefore, it becomes necessary to review what did take place and to consider what our position is in relation to those events. On Thursday night the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Cameron) raised a question of privilege shortly after nine o'clock. He spoke of two letters which had appeared in the Ottawa Journal. He was given permission to read those letters. It was open to the Speaker at that time to rule that a question of privilege sufficiently important to be discussed in that way had not been raised. That he did not do. On the contrary, the Speaker found that there had been a question of privilege. In fact, he aided in the drafting of a subsequent resolution which came before the house on Thursday night.

So that the words may appear in their context with what I am saying now, I would recall that on page 4529 of Hansard these words of the Speaker and the hon. member for Nanaimo appear:

Mr. Speaker: No. If the hon. member complains about a newspaper, the procedure is to send the newspaper to the Clerk so he can read it and it will be inserted in the Votes and Proceedings, and he must conclude with a motion that the content of the article is of a malicious intent, in contempt of parliament and a breach of privilege and therefore deserves the censure of this house.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): My proper order is to send this to the Clerk of the house now, is it?

Mr. Speaker: Provided that the hon. member wishes to go through with the motion I have indicated.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I have called this to the attention of Your Honour and—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member must understand that if he wishes to make a complaint against a newspaper he must, on a question of privilege, do it in the proper manner, and that is not to stand up only and call it to my attention, but to send the paper to the Clerk who will stand up and read the paragraph complained of, which will be inserted in the Votes and Proceedings; and the hon. member must conclude his question with a motion stating that the article complained of is in breach of privilege and deserves the censure of this house.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Yes, I will do that. Do I send this to the Clerk now, Your Honour? Do I read it first?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member was going to indicate what is the paragraph he is complaining of.

Then there was a further exchange, the letters were read, and on page 4531 the following is recorded in Hansard:

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo), seconded by Mr. Ellis, has moved that the statements in the Ottawa Journal of May 30 and 31, as just read by the Clerk, are derogatory of the dignity of parliament and deserve the censure of this house.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Then at that point a debate proceeded on the motion which had been presented.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that situation was where we left off on Thursday night. I rose to speak and had spoken for a short time when the house adjourned at ten o'clock on Thursday night. Then we met on Friday morning at eleven o'clock, as recorded in Hansard at page 4537. We find that the very opening words of the record are as follows:

On the order:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo), that the statements in the Ottawa Journal of May 30 and May 31 are derogatory of the dignity of parliament and deserving of the censure of this house.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker—

I had then risen to speak continuing the debate which had started the night before. Mr. Speaker then rose and this is what he said as recorded in Hansard:

Mr. Speaker: Usually the deputy clerk reads the order, but I rise at this moment in order to deal with this order which appears under "Motions" as follows:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo), that the statements in the Ottawa Journal of May 30 and 31 are derogatory of the dignity of parliament and deserving of the censure of this house.

I have read carefully the articles complained of and I have come to the conclusion that because of the unprecedented circumstances surrounding this pipe-line debate and because of the remarks that were made in this house by members themselves, it was and it is impossible, if we are to consider freedom of the press as we should, to take these two articles as being breaches of our privileges. It is my opinion that if it had not been for some of the insinuations or attacks directed perhaps to one another or the Chair or to the occupants of the chair, these articles may not have been written. I think we should settle our problems among ourselves and that those who outside of this house, either in editorial comment or by letters to the editor, write what I consider to be—and this is the case of these two articles—comments which do not go beyond the bounds of unfairness, I think they should be allowed. Therefore, I rule the motion made by the hon. member for Nanaimo out of order. Do hon. members wish to appeal?

Mr. Speaker, that was an unprecedented action. No one on the government side of the house had challenged this motion when it was presented on Thursday night. The debate had proceeded without any challenge from anyone. The Speaker made some point on Friday of the fact that as he is the servant of the house it is the house which must decide. The house had decided on Thursday night by its acceptance of the motion without any question being raised that this was a matter that was to be taken under their consideration. It had become seized of the issue raised in that motion. The merits of the motion, until some new motion had been presented, were not in question before the Speaker. It was in the hands of the hon. members of this house. The Speaker had not only accepted but had guided the framing of the resolution which introduced this debate. There is no precedent of any kind in this house or elsewhere for such action as was taken. Not only was there no motion but there had not even been a question raised in the house about the propriety of the course that had been followed on Thursday night, nor as to the propriety of proceeding in the usual way with that debate.

Under those circumstances I submit it was not the Speaker's right to withdraw this matter from the house. The supreme authority to which he referred on Friday had accepted that motion. It could only have been withdrawn properly by a decision of the house itself upon some other motion properly presented. The Speaker could not have done that; the Speaker cannot present a motion. Whether or not the motion would have been in order, the government might have presented a motion and it might have been debated. It certainly should have been debated if decisions made the night before were to be reversed.

One of the most serious aspects of this strange course was that when I attempted, as did many other hon. members, to be heard in regard to this matter on a point of order the Speaker refused to hear a word from any member in regard to this completely strange device which had been employed or which was then under consideration. At the moment the Speaker called the vote without permitting any point of order to be raised or any discussion whatever on the proceedings which were taking place, at that moment confidence in the Speaker disappeared in the minds of many members of this house.

Then, as though this were not enough in itself, as though this were not defilement of our rules sufficient for one day, the Speaker after the vote on that decision had been taken announced that he found he had made a mistake in the ruling he had made about 5.15 p.m. the day before and for that reason all subsequent proceedings should be declared a nullity. Mr. Speaker, there can be no precedent for any such course. This is what the Speaker said, as recorded on page 4539 of Hansard:

> I said earlier that I am prepared to take full responsibility before this house and before the country for what I am doing. I consider—and I have thought very seriously about this—that yesterday around 5.15, when I was called back to the chair for the purpose of receiving the chairman's report, I made a very serious mistake in allowing the point of order and the other dilatory motions; and I feel that the house should not suffer any prejudice or detriment on my account. I want to say this to hon. members—it has been said very often—the rules of this house are devised in order to protect the minorities; yes, they are. But I will add the counterpart to that. I will say—and the authorities support me in this—that the rules of this house are devised to protect minorities against the oppression of the majority and the majority against obstruction by the minority.
> Now, the house is master of its own rules and it is my right to submit a matter to the house. I intend at the moment to submit to the house that, in my view, the house should revert to the position where it was yesterday when I was brought back to the chair to receive the chairman's report at 5.15. I submit to the house that the intervening proceedings should not be superseded, and it is up to the house to decide as to the situation which I take at the moment.

It is difficult to read those words again and realize that they were in fact uttered by a Speaker of this house. There is no precedent for any such reference to a statement of that kind. There is no precedent for the Speaker saying, "I made a mistake some time ago and because I made that mistake everything that has happened in the intervening period is a nullity." On earlier occasions, perhaps unnecessarily, the Speaker has referred to times some distance back when in his opinion on later reflection he felt that he had made a mistake. If this practice were to be permitted, then if the Speaker found that on January 11, the day after this house opened, he had made a mistake it would be appropriate for him to declare that everything which had happened since then would be a nullity and that we should wipe out everythink that had taken place. There is no difference in principle between saying that everything that has happened since 5.15 p.m. yesterday will be wiped out and saying that everything that has happened since January 11 will be wiped out.

What might have been more appropriate still, if in fact such a strange procedure as this were ever accepted as part of our proceedings in this house, would have been for the Speaker to have gone back to a week ago Friday because there might well have been some consideration of the strange decisions which were made on that day.

In order to test the propriety of the course which was undertaken at that time, just let me submit it to one proof. The Speaker said that it is for the house to decide. What he meant by that of course was that it is for the majority to decide. I have been in different legislative bodies and I have been on the government side as well as on the opposition side. I have asserted strongly the rights of the opposition and I hope I am just as fully aware of and just as ready to concede the rights and the duties of the government. When the Speaker declares in his oath that he is the servant of the house he is declaring that he is not merely the servant of the majority but that he is the servant of all members. That is the bedrock upon which respect for our parliamentary system rests.

When the Speaker said that the house should not suffer because of his mistakes, let us consider if he was not actually saying "the government must not suffer in its arbitrary course by what I do." That was what he really meant. That is the only interpretation that can be placed upon the words. That was the effect because the Speaker was not prepared to listen to a single argument as to why this course was not proper. Members on the opposition side who were affected by this course had no opportunity to say why this was so improper. I ask the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), I ask members supporting the government, what they would say if the Speaker picked up something which had been adverse to the opposition say a week before and then had said, "in spite of all the government business that has been done I am not going to let the opposition suffer by my mistake and am going to declare as a nullity all that has taken place."

Mr. Speaker: I do not want to intervene in any way in the presentation of the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), but I know he wants to be fair. It strikes me that when he puts forward the contention that when I said that the intervening proceedings should not be superseded I meant by that that all that had taken place from 5.15 on Thursday until Friday should be declared a nullity. I see that there is a serious misunderstanding of what I said or intended to say. By "intervening proceedings", as mentioned on page 4540, were meant the proceedings which appeared on the order paper as being first readings of Senate public bills, government notices of motions. At the time I was trying to bring the house back to government order No. 2 on Friday and I wanted to do it before first readings of Senate public bills and government notices of motions were taken. I did not want these orders to be superseded by the course of action that I was taking. Then the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said, "No, let us go to first readings of Senate public bills and government notices of motions, and then when we reach orders of the day the matter can be brought up." But I want to say that it was not my intention to say that the proceedings that had taken place on Thursday should be declared a nullity.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I submit that what was said is open to no other interpretation. The words referred to what happened at 5.15. These are the words that are recorded at page 4540 of Hansard:

> I submit to the house that the intervening proceedings should not be superseded . . .

That means that for all practical purposes they become a nullity. We were then carried back by that extraordinary device to the position in which we were at 5.15. I do not believe that any word that I have said in any way stretches the effect of what took place at that time. I submit again that in this case, as in the other, there was no precedent for what occurred.

Whatever the intention may have been, and it is not for us to interpret intentions, the result certainly was not open to question. By that advice, upon which there was allowed no comment and no debate to show what a dangerous precedent this would establish, the way was clear for an immediate presentation of a closure motion which the government wished to have placed before this house. Whatever the intention may have been, whatever the motives were, the Speaker in that act subordinated the rights, the traditions and the practices of parliament to the will of the government. It is almost unthinkable that at such a moment, and with something so strange and new placed before the members here, the Speaker would not hear a word, to protect himself, as to why he should not do this. He declared when he became the Speaker that he sought the advice of parliament. I know that on that occasion he did not mean to suggest, and did not suggest, that he was seeking alone the advice of the government and its supporters. I am sure he meant that he sought the advice of all members. One of the reasons members are permitted to rise on points of order is so that the Speaker may have advice from every part of the house on questions set up before the house. That adds to the seriousness of all that has occurred.

If there were any justification for this course, then I submit again that it would be equally proper to follow that course in relation to some event a week earlier, a month earlier or even longer. The very fact that this would be the natural result, in itself, indicates the seriousness of what has been done. I repeat, need there be any doubt about what the government would have done if the Speaker had followed such a course and had said, as he might well have said with equal validity, that he had made a serious mistake on the previous Friday, when events occurred which are equally distasteful to the memories of every one of us? If any question the indignation expressed by the members of the opposition, just let them ask themselves what the indignation of the government would have been if the Speaker had followed the same course and it affected them as we were affected by these proceedings. It is not difficult to imagine the indignation that would have been aroused. The very suggestion of that in itself deals with the question as to whether there conceivably could be justification for this course. It was indeed black Friday for this house and for the people of Canada. The damage that was done cannot be undone.

The government cannot divorce itself from the tragic downfall of the Speaker on this occasion. He is the victim. He is a casualty of the government's overbearing conduct during this debate. We had done what we could do to prevent the government proceeding on the arrogant course which has produced this sorrowful result. That was our only recourse; that in fact was our only right. It was the duty of the Speaker to protect our rights just as it was his duty to protect the rights of the government.

Whatever may be said of the ugly things that happened here last week, I think it can be said with certainty that every hon. member is equally sorry that they ever happened. No hon. member of this house will want to see a repetition of the turmoil into which this house was thrown last Friday. Let it be admitted immediately that we all share some responsibility for that turmoil. We all took part in it. We can have no happy recollection at any time of that sad event. May I point out, however, that, confronted as we were with a rigid denial by the Speaker of our fundamental rights to be heard in regard to these issues, we had no course open to us but to register our anger in the way we did.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh! Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: Were we quietly to submit in the face of this course that savoured in every way of the dreadful dictatorships that have grown up in Europe in these past few years? It was Junius who said that the subject who is truly loyal will neither advise nor submit to arbitrary measures. The subject who is loyal will neither submit nor advise. We were not prepared to submit to as arbitrary measures as ever denied to the sitting members of a legislative body the rights to which they were entitled by tradition, by the rules and by all the declared purposes of this parliament. Mr. Speaker, this subject now is before the house. It is before the people of Canada. But, above all, it is now for the government to consider the course that it has followed and what it should do to deal with so grave a situation, with a situation which threatens the future of this house and of the rights of the people themselves as represented by the members here.

Under our system of government the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) must assume the first responsibility for all that happens under the government he leads. The fact that the course which led step by step to this inevitable result was initiated by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) in no way limits the responsibilities of the Prime Minister as head of the government. For all that happened here last Friday the Prime Minister must accept the responsibility. Most of us have little but sorrow in our hearts for the plight of the Speaker who was the victim of the government's action.

The Prime Minister could have prevented the dreadful scenes we witnessed here if he had asserted his authority along the lines of our parliamentary traditions. The Prime Minister saw where all this was heading. Starting with the motion of closure presented when the resolution was introduced that it was expedient for the pipe-line bill to come forward and following through step by step when the other arbitrary motions were presented, the Prime Minister saw what was happening in the house and he should have foreseen, as could be foreseen, what the consequences of that erosion must certainly be. I am not seeking for a moment to leave the impression that the opposition did not contribute to the disturbance, as did all the members on the other side. I repeat again, however, that we used the only weapons that we had as free men and women to bring to the attention of this house and to the attention of the people of Canada the disgraceful denial of our rights which had taken place.

We had no choice but to assert our rights as we did. We had no choice, moreover, but to bring this matter to a head by the motion that is now before us. It is not necessary to enlarge upon the facts. Many incidents could be cited where step by step during these recent weeks we have gone along the course which has led to such a serious result. One truth does emerge, however. Deep are the wounds that have been inflicted upon parliament, and nothing that the Speaker can now do, nothing that the government can do, can restore this parliament to the atmosphere, to the state of mind, to the manners and to the decencies which existed here before these dreadful events occurred. I should like to quote words written by the great Gladstone in 1878 and published in the North American Review in the issue for September and October of that year. He said:

> It is a cardinal axiom of the modern British constitution that the House of Commons is the greatest of the powers of the state. It might, by a base subserviency, fling itself at the feet of a monarch or a minister. . . . The commons are armed with ample powers of self-defence. If they use their powers properly, they can only be mastered by a recurrence to the people, and the way in which the appeal takes effect is by the choice of another House of Commons more agreeable to the national temper. Thus the sole appeal from the verdict of the house is a rightful appeal to those from whom it received its commission.

Here we had no power of self-defence. We have none but to declare what we believe to be the rights of the people of Canada and their representatives here in this house. We shall not be subservient to false interpretation of the rules. We shall not be subservient to anything that savours of dictatorship here in this house. We shall not be subservient to the will of the majority expressed by the Speaker, as it has been in this case, in a manner which no longer seeks to define the right of the majority but establishes for the time being mob rule.

I said before that I can only express sorrow for the plight of the Speaker on this occasion. The Prime Minister has the responsibility. He could have prevented this happening. He can prevent anything of a similar nature happening in the future. A partisan vote on the motion now before us will not relieve the unhappy situation in which we now find ourselves. Never before has this house been faced with so serious a situation. Never before were members of this house conscious as they now are that something good, decent, precious and valuable has been destroyed. There is only one way this situation can be relieved. I appeal with all the earnestness I possess to the Prime Minister as head of the government to follow the only course which will restore the dignity, honour and traditions of parliament. That course is to dissolve this house and let the people elect a new parliament more in harmony with our traditions and concepts of government. To let this motion go to a vote that divides the house denies the very basis upon which the Speaker occupies the chair.

It has long been our tradition that the Speaker is the unanimous choice of the house. Let there be no uncertainty about the fact that the Speaker is not the choice of most of the members on this side of the house at this time. The situation can only be cured by the course that has been suggested. It can only be cured in the manner that was so well set out by Gladstone as long ago as 1878. That I believe is now the compelling duty confronting the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. St. Laurent).

I support the motion that is now before the house.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I think all of us today assembled in this chamber realize the serious situation with which this house and the members of this house are confronted. I join with the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) in saying that, in my opinion, the introduction of this motion is something of a tragedy. I remember very well what took place about a year ago when a group of members of parliament in my office were discussing parliament and what had transpired. Among other things, we came to the conclusion that the time had arrived when this house might choose a Speaker who would preside over the house not for one parliament but for a number of years; and each and every one of us—may I say we were not of the language of the present Speaker of the house—were of the opinion that the present occupant of the chair at the end of this parliament should be offered that position on a long-term basis. I therefore say that what has happened at this session—and particularly what happened during the present debate—is indeed a tragic circumstance.

Quite early in the debate, Mr. Speaker—as no doubt you knew from a casual remark I made in the house—I thought that some of your rulings were partisan, and I so expressed myself to some of my friends on both sides of the house. As the days went by I felt that instead of there being protection of the rights of the minority, the majority opinion—that is government opinion—must of necessity prevail. I was saddened by that thought but then, as the time passed and various other rulings occurred and members who rose on this side of the house were denied the right, now and then, which I thought was legitimately theirs to express their opinions on points of orders, that feeling turned more or less to anger.

I join with the Leader of the Opposition in saying that I am sure all of us regret the scene in this house last Friday afternoon. The bells were ringing even after some of us had risen to try to get a word in on a point of privilege which we felt was justifiable at the time. Members were called in to vote, I thought, without being given the opportunity to express themselves on a point of order or a question of privilege that I believe was really valid. I felt that the division had been hurried along in order, once again, to prevent those expressions of opinion that should have been heard by the Chair.

The Leader of the Opposition has, I think, fairly well expressed the view of those of us who felt that way. I think he has dealt with this problem. I have often disagreed with the Leader of the Opposition and probably on occasions shall do so again; but this afternoon I thought that the manner in which he dealt with this situation was a credit to him. He dealt with it in a statesmanlike and dignified manner and I hope that the example he set will be followed by all of us. He dealt with the events of Thursday evening and of Friday. I want to say just a word about that matter because I think that was the crucial point at which the opposition was really aroused. On Friday morning, as reported at page 4540 of Hansard, the Speaker said this:

> . . . yesterday around 5.15, when I was called back to the chair for the purpose of receiving the chairman's report, I made a very serious mistake in allowing the point of order and the other dilatory motions; . . .

He then goes on to speak of the rights of the majority, with which I have no quarrel as long as the rights of the minority are safeguarded. Then he went on to say this:

> I intend at the moment to submit to the house that, in my view, the house should revert to the position where it was yesterday when I was brought back to the chair to receive the chairman's report at 5.15. I submit to the house that the intervening proceedings should not be superseded, and it is up to the house to decide as to the situation which I take at the moment.

As has already been said, Mr. Speaker, this was a most unprecedented request to the house. Indeed it so surprised me that, as reported on the same page, I called out as loudly as I could, "What are you doing, Mr. Speaker?" I did so because I felt that what was being done was something that was going to stifle parliament in the future, change our procedure in the future, and make it possible on some other occasion for a Speaker to rise in his place and say that the business which had been done heretofore should be wiped out. I thought that was a most unheard-of procedure.

Then later on the Speaker spoke of placing a proposition before the house. There was, of course, one way in which the Speaker could have got his views before the house, and that way has already been indicated. He could have got some member of the house to move an appropriate motion or to give notice of an appropriate motion. That was the proper procedure to follow if it was desired to make a change in what had already been done.

I am not going to speak very long because, as I have indicated, I do not think that any of us like the position in which we find ourselves. We do not like the breaches in those personal friendships that have been established over the years in this house. Some of us do not like the feeling that we have perhaps lost respect for one another. In this connection I should like to feel that we could go back to the position in which we found ourselves three weeks ago and wipe the slate clean. But that cannot be done. We must face up to this situation. There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker,—as the Leader of the Opposition has said—that no matter what we may do or say for the balance of this parliament, the Speaker has not the confidence of the entire house, something which is so necessary to conducting the business of this house. I agree with the Leader of the Opposition that, under these circumstances, there is only one way out. Regardless of our individual fortunes in an election period or of our party fortunes, I think that way out should be undertaken. It is the only way. I think that way should be taken in order that a new House of Commons might assemble in a few months' time; in order that that new House of Commons could come here with a new and fresh feeling; and in order that we might once more in this house establish the kind of atmosphere which has prevailed during most of the 21 years that I have been in this House of Commons.

I may say, Mr. Speaker, that this perhaps is unprecedented in our parliament. Of course, Mr. Gladstone refers to some of the turmoil in the British House of Commons, where events similar to those of last Friday have not been unknown even in the past half century and less. But it is today a great misfortune that we have to face the situation with which we are confronted. As the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) has said, and let none of us deny it, some responsibility rests on all of us.

The other afternoon I rose to speak and the shouting and so on from those on the other side was certainly enough to make one feel rather angry. I wish that I had suggested what I think might have been a way out at that time. In view of the tempers of hon. members of the house, the sittings might have been suspended while we cooled off a bit. But that was not done. So, we support the motion of the Leader of the Opposition. I suppose that it will be a vote directly along party lines. That seems to be indicated, and that is unfortunate. I know the feeling of my own friends. The Leader of the Opposition has indicated the feeling of his friends, and there is no doubt that there is no way out other than for the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) to dissolve this house and go to the country so that a new parliament, with all this sort of thing wiped out, may be assembled within the next few months.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): I have listened with attention to the two previous speakers, and I agree with the leader of the C.C.F. party that the present situation is an unfortunate one. Let me say right at the start that I do not like the motion that is before the house. The suggestion that the government should resign as a solution is, of course, a suggestion that the government should surrender to the minority.

I listened to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) and it seemed to me that his main weapon was that of exaggeration. It is true that he was able to keep himself fairly well controlled, mainly no doubt because there were no interruptions. He referred at length to what transpired in this house on May 31 and June 1. I would say that what transpired on Thursday and Friday cannot be judged by those days alone. It was the culmination of days of lawlessness in this house; shouting and defiance of the Speaker. I am not surprised that the Leader of the Opposition would say he would like to forget those days. It is not easy to forget what transpired in this house during that time. There was the phony display put on by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) and action taken to deliberately force this house to expel him. We will not forget that. Hon. members can groan, but they should have been groaning at that time and not now.

Mr. Fleming: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Eglinton rises on a question of privilege.

Mr. Fleming: The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch), Mr. Speaker, has just made two remarks which are a grave offence against privilege and a falsification of fact. He has referred to a "phony display" and has also said that there was, on the part of the hon. member for Eglinton, an attempt to bring about a certain course of action that the house took. Mr. Speaker, there is not a measure of truth in one word, one syllable, one letter of what the hon. member said or what was said in my absence on Friday night by the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Cannon).

You know, and most members of this house know deep down in their hearts, that no member of this house was more surprised than I that the government took the partisan and vindictive course it did. The hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine said, speaking on Friday night, that I had defied the Speaker. There was no defiance of the Speaker. He said also that the action on my suspension was the action of the chairman. It was nothing of the kind. My suspension was due to one thing and one thing alone, a government motion introduced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris), the government leader. The first vote cast to suspend the hon. member for Eglinton was cast by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). There was nothing premeditated. No one was more surprised than I.

The immediate situation that brought this about, as hon. members will remember, was one in which the Deputy Speaker of this house had said, while he was standing on his feet, he would not hear me on either a point of order or a question of privilege. He did hear the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and he did say, at the very same time and under exactly the same circumstances, that he would hear my colleague the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), but he would not hear me. That was the situation, and that was the fact. Any member, whether in this house or outside, who says I sought to provoke this suspension, had any idea that it would be made or made a show here for the purposes of publicity commits the most vile kind of falsehood. Let there be no mistake about that.

I just make one further observation. It has been said outside the house by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mrs. Shipley) that there was something very strange about the appearance of the flag. I want to say this. When I took my departure from the house that day following the passing of this partisan and vindictive motion, I did not know there was any flag going to be put on my desk.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: I will say this to remind hon. members, who seem to have forgotten the fact, that the discussion of that motion and the point of order that preceded it lasted for at least one hour. Let there be no doubt in anyone's mind that there was plenty of opportunity for any hon. member so disposed to find a flag in this building and bring it to the chamber.

Mr. Speaker, the ninth of the Ten Commandments says, "thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbour". I commend that to some hon. members.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I do not like to stop anyone talking on a question of privilege or any other question, but it seems to me that if there was a question of privilege to begin with it disappeared long, long ago.

Mr. Quelch: Mr. Speaker, so far as the point the hon. member has raised is concerned, I will just say this. I will allow those hon. members who sat in this house at that time to decide whether or not the statement I made was correct. We had the display put on from time to time by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton). I could not help thinking at the time that probably the hon. member had taken so much time in reading crime comics he had absorbed the mentality of a juvenile delinquent.

The Speaker of this house is the unfortunate victim of circumstances that were not of his making. I think that this is something we must keep in mind at all times. He was not responsible for the situation that developed in this house during the past few days. I think most of us will agree, and the Leader of the Opposition has already stated it, that he had earned a fine reputation for impartiality and for fairness. I would say that he invariably leaned over backwards in order to meet the requests of the opposition, and it was probably that very action that got him into trouble in this debate. It is a very fine way to act in normal times but you cannot act that way in times of lawlessness because those who are committing those acts will take advantage of that type of leniency.

Let me go back to May 9 when this matter first came up. The opposition has blamed closure for their obstruction but of course that is not true. It started several days before the motion for closure was moved; that is, when the notice of motion first appeared in Votes and Proceedings on May 9 it started and it continued on May 10, a long procedural wrangle with four divisions, and then resumed again on May 14 when two more divisions and more wrangling took place. Finally, when the Minister of Trade and Commerce spoke, he moved closure, no doubt because the government realized that so long as the opposition was going to continue that type of wrangling and obstruction there would have been no hope of ever getting that bill through without closure.

Again I stress the fact obstruction started first and closure followed. The opposition then became angry as a result of closure being moved, but unfortunately instead of fighting the government or the measure they should have fought they vented their spleen and their spite upon the Speaker, the Deputy Speaker and the chairman, and in my opinion that was a cowardly procedure to follow.

Since then they have tried to dictate to parliament. They have tried as a minority to tell the majority how the affairs of this house should be conducted. We have seen in other countries what happened when a minority is allowed to dictate to the majority. We saw that when Hitler was borne to power, then Mussolini was borne to power, and we have seen it in Russia, and we do not want that kind of thing to happen in this country. You cannot appease that type of mentality. Every time you appease that type of mentality they want more concessions.

Instead of debating the legislation before us the opposition staged a number of attacks against the Speaker, the Deputy Speaker and the chairman. It has been said by those on my right that we in the Social Credit group have nothing to talk about in relation to this matter because we filibustered the Bretton Woods agreement and on the rivers bill; but let me point out that there is a great difference between the filibuster we staged and the one we have witnessed in this house during the past two or three weeks. When we opposed the Bretton Woods agreement and the rivers bill we attacked the legislation. We did not at any time enter into a procedural wrangle and we never defied the chairman or the Speaker.

An hon. Member: Nor did we enter into the debate by insult.

Mr. Quelch: In my opinion the Speaker has always been lenient in listening to advice on points of order and unfortunately instead of appreciating that the opposition has abused it.

Now, the resolution before the house reads:

> In view of the unprecedented action of Mr. Speaker in (a) improperly reversing his own decision without notice and without giving any opportunity for discussion;—

We in this group are of the opinion that on Thursday the Speaker did make a mistake in rendering his decision regarding the point brought up by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Cameron). If that situation had been left as it was then it would have created a precedent that would have brought chaos into this house in the future. It would have meant that at any time any hon. member in this house disliked legislation the government sought to introduce and wanted to obstruct it, all he would have to do would be to get a friend of his to write a letter to the press and then bring it up, as did the hon. member for Nanaimo, and we would have obstruction without end because every time a letter is written to the press it could then be raised as a point of privilege in this house, and there would be no end to those points of privilege. The situation being what it was, I think the Speaker was fully justified in taking the action he did on Friday.

The resolution continues:

> (b) repeatedly refusing to allow members to address the house on occasions when the rules provide that they have the right to be heard;—

I would say that just the opposite is the truth. The opposition were not satisfied with impartial treatment but wanted the rules to be twisted and warped in their favour. The third point in the resolution reads:

> (c) subordinating the rights of the house to the will of the government, this house resolves that it no longer has any confidence in its presiding officer.

I am of the opinion that what the opposition really wants is for the rights of the majority to be subordinated to the will of the minority, and therefore, Mr. Speaker, in the light of all the facts, I look upon the action of moving this resolution as extremely despicable and we intend to vote against it.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that we are faced this afternoon with a most unusual situation. I must say that I have no quarrel with what the Leader of the Opposition said in his opening remarks for practically the first half hour during which he spoke when he described the high office of Speaker, the fact that it represented the dignity and authority of the House of Commons, and when he recalled some of the historic events which are associated with the ceremonies we still follow. I am sure that some of his other views every hon. member of this houses shares. There is no doubt, sir, that you have had—and I submit that you still have—the affectionate consideration and regard of most hon. members of this house.

There has been before the house for the last three or four weeks a very contentious measure about which we had been informed —perhaps we should not take into account what was said outside the house—but about which we have seen demonstrated in this house a very firm determination to have the will of the minority prevail over the will of the majority in the house by preventing the majority from having an opportunity to manifest its will in accordance with our constitutional principles.

This has not failed to be obvious to persons outside the house. I have here a clipping from the Montreal Star—not an unimportant newspaper in this country. It is from its edition of May 30 and is headed "The Speaker's Dilemma". It reads in part as follows:

> The Speaker's first duty is to keep the business of the House of Commons moving smoothly. When the opposition embarks upon a planned campaign of obstruction, it is obvious that the Speaker (or, in committee of the whole, the chairman) will become a target of attack—

Not because of the qualities of the Speaker or the chairman but because of the fact that there is a contentious measure that is being opposed by all means that can be devised under the rules of the house to bring about delay and to waste time.

The editorial continues:

> Every restriction on debate, from the sharp weapon of closure down to the hour-by-hour rulings of its presiding officers, is challenged in extreme terms—so extreme indeed that they arouse laughter and contempt among the thinking public which is not so dumb as to believe that free discussion is being slaughtered.

I think the concluding paragraph should also be put on the record. It reads:

> As to Mr. Beaudoin's present unhappy position, a study of recent Hansards reveals an extraordinary patience and courtesy in dealing with a series of heated situations. He has proved himself to be a good Speaker. When the present row is over, and tempers have cooled off, it would not be surprising to hear compliments about his conduct from the opposition benches.

What is it that has brought about the unfortunate situation in which we find ourselves at this moment? On Thursday I made a motion to apply closure based upon a 1932 precedent. A point of order was raised by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton). That was one point of order in this whole long series to which I took no exception whatsoever. I did think that when the government was resorting to a procedure so rarely used as standing order 33 has been, and when there were two precedents which might be applied, it was a quite proper question to raise as to which was the really valid precedent. I am sure that all hon. members on both sides of the house will admit that we on this side listened with great respect to the arguments presented from the other side of the house. I attempted to present an argument in support of the precedent we were invoking. In due course, and not until every hon. member who desired to speak on the point of order had had an opportunity to be heard, did the chairman make his ruling. That ruling was immediately appealed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the appeal was reported to Your Honour.

It was at this point, if, with respect, I may use the words you used, that a mistake was made—you used those words the following morning—but nowhere in the use or application of those words was there any suggestion to declare as a nullity what had taken place from the time you referred to as being the moment when you made the mistake of not enforcing the usual practice that you were back in the chair merely for the purpose of receiving a report from the chairman of the committee, and putting the appeal which had been made on the question contained in the report to the house for its decision. You did commence to put that question. You had previously ruled on numerous occasions that when such an appeal came before you through the report of a chairman there was nothing else before the house and that that report had to be put to a vote.

The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) rose and raised a point upon what appeared to me and what appeared to many to be an academic question. You allowed him to proceed and he did proceed at considerable length. After he had submitted his point and when you were on the point of making your ruling, it was suggested to you that you should not complete your ruling until after six o'clock. We all know what took place after the dinner recess. We know that there were then various proceedings which were obviously undertaken for the purpose of taking up time and preventing the report from the chairman of the committee being submitted to the house and the house getting back into committee.

In the course of the discussion Your Honour indicated to the house that the point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre was merely an academic point and there was nothing on which to rule. Your Honour then proceeded to put the question on the appeal of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the question which was before the house, the only question which could be before the house at that particular time. Your Honour had actually called the yeas and, according to Hansard, you were about to call the nays when the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, although Your Honour was on your feet, rose in an insistent manner and demanded an appeal from a ruling Your Honour had not made. The appeal was granted and Your Honour's opinion was sustained on the appeal.

At this point the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dufresne), although a motion to adjourn the house had previously been disposed of and had taken, as these proceedings do take in our house, about three-quarters of an hour, renewed a motion for the adjournment of the house. That motion was put and decided and according to page 4528 of Hansard Your Honour then rose and said the following words:

The question is now, shall we—

At that point the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Cameron) rose and raised what you have since declared to be an improper question of privilege and which I am informed the hon. gentleman himself was astonished to find was taken seriously. On this the hon. member founded a motion which Your Honour put to the house. At that point the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) rose to speak and after he had proceeded briefly he asked this question:

Do I gather that some members opposite do not think the rules were properly applied?

That was the first opportunity that any member of the government had had to raise a point of order. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) raised again the point of order which he had raised at six o'clock and once more drew Your Honour's attention to the fact that no intervening business could occur, and that the only purpose of Your Honour being in the chair was to put the appeal of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre which had been reported to the house at 5.15. The remarks made at that moment by the Minister of Finance will be found at page 4531. When the hon. Leader of the Opposition said this afternoon that there had been no objection to the course which was being followed he evidently overlooked this paragraph in the second column of page 4531, which reads:

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do raise a point of order now that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) has made that inquiry. As I recall the situation, a short while ago Your Honour ruled that you must put the question which was submitted to you from the committee of the whole. From that ruling there was an appeal to the house and the house upheld your decision. That being the case I suggest to Your Honour that no intervening proceeding can occur, because you had in effect said that the interpretation of the rule was that you must then put the motion. If that is so then I suggest that nothing can happen until—

Mr. Rowe: You have thrown the rules away.

Mr. Speaker: The matter raised by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Cameron) is one of privilege and is one that is very serious. I had not seen the letter entitled "They Will Pay" but I had read the letter written by Mr. Eugene Forsey, in which he discusses instances in which I was myself involved. It would seem to me, however, that in a matter of this kind the thing to do, after having placed ourselves in a position where we can deal with the matter, especially since I am concerned, is to postpone the consideration of that motion.

Normally when a member brings to the attention of the house an article which concerns privilege and in which someone in the house is involved, after he has made his motion it is up to the other member involved to be heard. If hon. members care to debate this matter before I myself am heard on the subject, I am not going to object; I am just going to let them go right ahead, but at one stage of the proceedings I want to say that I will have to be heard.

There was no decision made upon the point of order or the motion. The motion was before you, and on that and on another occasion you had suggested that the matter should not be further considered but should be adjourned. As recorded at the foot of the second column of page 4532, this is what you said, sir:

As regards the article by Mr. Eugene Forsey, in which he writes under the title "About Closure, the Speaker, and Rights of Parliament", there may be more paragraphs there which are incriminatory, but certainly not the whole of the article. This is a matter on which perhaps I might give a ruling on a future occasion, but at this moment I would ask hon. members to consider that there is a very serious matter before this house, perhaps much more serious than one foresees at this moment in the midst of other proceedings. I repeat the suggestion I made earlier, that this matter for the moment be adjourned.

Your suggestion was not accepted, and the Leader of the Opposition said:

Mr. Speaker, with deference, I do not believe this should be adjourned.

He went on to discuss the matter until we reached the hour of ten o'clock. You had already made it quite clear that you felt you might have to make a ruling upon the question at some time. On the following morning, when the matter was called, you did give the ruling that was cited in the Votes and Proceedings of June 1 by the Leader of the Opposition. I shall not read it again. You stated at that time that you were sufficiently informed and did not need to hear any further discussion on the point of order, or the matter as to whether or not this was a proper motion relating to privilege.

Sir, it has always been my understanding that points of order were not matters for debate. Points of order were matters to be decided by the Speaker, about which any remarks that were made by hon. members were not remarks in the form of a debate but remarks designed to inform the Speaker, to call his attention to certain other precedents or to what should, in their view, be the manner in which the point of order should be decided.

These rules in their application, sir, are made to protect the rights of parliament in the psychological atmosphere where the business of parliament is being carried out. They are not rules designed to furnish weapons to delay the passage of the regular business of the house. If it were to be decided that when a point of order is raised it is a subject that is open to debate for every hon.

member in the house, it would be quite impossible to transact the business for which parliament really exists, that is to say, to deal with the matters that are of concern to the Canadian people generally.

You then made your ruling and put the ruling to the house, and it was sustained by the house. I submit that on that occasion there can be no suggestion that anyone who had a right to speak by virtue of the rules was denied the use of that right.

The other matter has to do with the question you declared that you felt called upon to submit to the judgment of the house. It is said that there is no precedent, that there is nothing to justify such a course of action. Sir, I submit that that is a course of action which does not have to be resorted to very frequently, which Hon. R. B. Bennett in 1929 suggested, on a matter of proper procedure with respect to constitutional questions, should be submitted by the then Speaker to the consideration of the house. It is something that occurs rarely but is dealt with by the writers on procedure of the House of Commons, and I have here the second volume of Redlich, which at page 145 says the following, which I think is worth putting on the record of the house:

> It must not, of course, be overlooked that, from a purely technical standpoint, the house is the sole and absolute master of its order of business. Its jurisdiction is most clearly seen in its power at any time to alter the rules of business; as we have already remarked, no special procedure, no particular majority is required for this purpose. In point of fact alteration in rules is nowhere subject to so few difficulties as in the House of Commons. But so long as they remain unchanged, whether they depend on some express order of the house or on customary practice, their maintenance is confided to the Speaker alone; it is his duty to see that they are obeyed, to explain and apply them. In principle the supreme authority of the house is retained; it is clear enough from an express order, made so long ago as 1604, that when precedents are not conclusive the Speaker is to lay the matter before the house for decision: but it is entirely in the Speaker's discretion to judge whether and when to call for such a decision of the house. If he deems it unnecessary to do so, his ruling is final.

This would apply, of course, to the practice at Westminster, where I understand there are no appeals to the house from the rulings of the Speaker. Here we have an express provision to the contrary, and the decision of the Speaker is always subject to an appeal to the house.

> Among so great a multitude of precedents it can but rarely happen that the Speaker will be unable to find a more or less relevant guide for his conduct without an appeal to the house. It has, as a matter of fact, very seldom happened that a Speaker, instead of giving the ruling of the Chair on his own responsibility, has requested the decision of the house on a special case. And when he has once given his decision there can be no refusal to accept his verdict, nor any discussion of his ruling by the house.
> It follows, then, that in the House of Commons there can be no debates on questions of order, such as have attained to a melancholy celebrity in continental parliaments.

Not only, possibly, in continental parliaments.

> Any member is entitled, even bound, to bring to the Speaker's immediate notice any instance of what he considers a breach of order, and to ask for the Speaker's explanation upon any obscurities in procedure. To do so it is proper to call attention to oneself by interrupting and to lay the point in question concisely before the Speaker. Occasionally other members intervene with brief suggestions; but generally the Speaker decides at once: in any event the decision lies with him and his ruling is, as just remarked, subject to no appeal.

Our rule, of course, is different in that respect.

> A set debate on a point of order can only be brought on in one way and under definite conditions. The rules prescribe that due notice of motion must be given that on some future day a vote of censure upon the Speaker will be moved. It need hardly be said that such an event is abnormal and happens but rarely, and that such a motion would only be acceded to by the house if the circumstances fully justified it.
> To an Englishman it would appear seriously to undermine the exalted position and dignity of the Speaker if, in addition to his application of the rules being open to challenge upon special and important occasions, it was competent for every member to call in question the Speaker's authority whenever he chose, and if he was liable at all times to be called to defend the correctness of his decisions.
> It is true that the house is the supreme court of appeal to which the Speaker, like all others, is subordinate, but the authority of the Chair is equally firmly established as against the individual members. Until the judgment of the house is appealed to in the prescribed form the authority of the Speaker must override the doubts of a single member and be final.
> According to English ways of looking at things the parliamentary umpire would be as much lowered by a dispute with a member about his ruling as a judge would be in a court of law, if, after giving his decision, he allowed himself to be drawn into an argument with the parties whose case he had disposed of, or with the public, about the correctness of his judgment or the grounds upon which it was based.

Well, sir, in your discretion you found it desirable to submit to the house the question whether or not, in the application of the general principle incorporated in standing order 7 of the house, the house should be put back in the same position it was when the appeal of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was reported to the house, and you were proceeding to do so. Very unfortunate occurrences did take place. They are to be regretted, as are to be regretted all examples of defiance of constituted authority, and I am sure that for different motives we would all be happy if we could forget the events of these last few days which accompanied the vehemence of the controversy over the pipe-line bill.

But if it became a precedent of this house that one member or a few or even many members of the minority group could hold up the business of the house at any and all times by making a challenge in respect of their confidence in the procedure followed by the presiding officer of the house, what would be the effect of that upon our parliamentary institutions? Oh, I recognize that the Speaker represents the dignity and authority of the house and should be a worthy representative of the dignity and authority of the house. But I submit to you, sir, that in the view of the vast majority of the house you, not only during the past three years but during the whole time you have been in the house, have convinced us of your fitness to represent the dignity and authority of the house.

There have been statements made this afternoon in the course of the debate that this was so up to the end of the last session of parliament and that it is no longer so. That is one of the unfortunate consequences of the firm determination at which the minority in the house had arrived in trying to prevent by every means possible there being time in the house to reach a point where a decision of the house could be made upon the various phases of this legislation. We did resort to closure. It is not something that any government likes to do. It is something for which any government that does it has to take the responsibility before the public, and unless it can satisfy the public that it was a proper use made to enable the business of parliament to be carried on in an efficient way, then it will be rebuked by the public.

But to suggest that in pursuing that course a minority can reach the point where they can succeed in forcing a dissolution of parliament is, I think, something upon which the Canadian public would not be disposed to bestow its approval.

Mr. Fleming: Why not give them a chance?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): This situation will appear to many, in spite of the elevated tone of the addresses made in the house this afternoon by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) and by the leader of the C.C.F. party, as being one more attempt to prevent the majority in parliament from reaching a point where it would be entitled to vote upon the propriety or otherwise of this controversial measure.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I must intervene on a question of privilege. I think it is a most improper suggestion that a matter brought forward in this way should in any way be suggested as a means of delaying debate in the pipe-line proceedings.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Drew: I repudiate any suggestion of that kind and greatly regret that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) would have thought of making such a suggestion.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, not even the Prime Minister could avoid thinking that each and every move that has been made since the pipe-line resolution was first brought before the house was designed to prevent it from reaching a point where it might become a statute of the Canadian parliament. It may be that hon. members will contend that we have improperly used the closure rule, that we have improperly attempted to make the will of the majority prevail in the House of Commons. That also was dealt with by the Montreal Star on June 2, and I think there is much in this editorial that is deserving even of the reflection of hon. members opposite.

The editorial reads:

> The pipe line debate in the House of Commons began formally on May 10, though the subject had been frequently discussed long before that date. Today is June 2, ample time, one would think, for adequate public discussion of the merits and demerits of the legislation. The bill, however, has not yet passed. If the Progressive Conservatives and C.C.F. parties have their way it never will. Their way, it is to be noted, is turbulent. Loss of temper, either feigned or real, is frequent.
> Since May 10, on every conceivable pretext, these two parties have with endless ingenuity blocked or attempted to block the orderly passage of the bill. This is their right. They both disapprove the measure, though on very different grounds. They conceive it to be their solemn duty to kill it if they can.
>
> The government, on the other hand, is equally determined to pass the pipe line bill into law, as it possesses a large majority in the House of Commons, its success is likely.
>
> To read Hansard for the last three weeks is to be given the impression that there is something dirty about the word "majority". It happens, however, to be quite respectable. A democracy works by majority rule. There is no other way it can work, and the government is just as entitled to use the rules and procedures of the House of Commons to make the majority will effective as the opposition is to block it. The air has been filled with hot air and nonsense about the death of liberty because the government has used the weapon of closure. Closure has been applied in the British House of Commons 122 times in the last five years,—

Mr. Diefenbaker: By agreement, mostly.

Mr. Harris: Nonsense.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): The article continues:

> —and liberty seems to be doing all right over there.

Mr. Fleming: A different thing altogether.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Yes; a different thing, in a different climate, and a different conduct by the opposition.

Mr. Fleming: A very different kind of government.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): It is a very different atmosphere. You find no revolt against constituted authority there, and even when there is dissatisfaction, no attempt to resist the processes that have been established by the practice of centuries to bring about orderly government in organized society.

Mr. Fleming: You will find even-handed justice there.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): The second charge, if I may call it so, in this motion is that Mr. Speaker repeatedly refused to allow members to address the house on occasions when the rules provide that they have the right to be heard.

I have carefully examined Hansard for June 1 and I can find no occasion when Your Honour refused to hear any hon. member when he had the right to be heard under the rules. On the contrary, I find several occasions on which Your Honour, as a courtesy, permitted hon. members opposite to speak on Friday when they had no absolute right under the rules to interrupt the proceedings. The first attempt is reported at page 4537 of Hansard, immediately after you made your ruling on the motion of the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Cameron). At that point the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) rose and said:

> Are you prepared to hear any discussion on that, because—

And you indicated that you were not prepared to hear discussion. I would remind hon. members that, at that point, the Speaker had just completed a ruling, that rulings of the Speaker are not debatable under our rules, and that the only legal recourse open to an hon. member who is dissatisfied with a ruling of the Chair is to appeal the ruling. That right was exercised by the Leader of the Opposition. The second case is to be found at page 4540. Your Honour had completed a statement about the business of the House and you had actually put the question:

> Those who are in favour of sustaining the Speaker's ruling will please say yea.

Then some hon. members had said "Yea". Then the Leader of the Opposition—who I submit was clearly out of order to do this when Your Honour was on his feet—interrupted the proceedings and claimed to be rising on a question of privilege. At the same time the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) also sought to take the floor although the Speaker was on his feet. Your Honour permitted the Leader of the Opposition to rise. Instead of stating a question of privilege the Leader of the Opposition attempted to make a motion of want of confidence in the Speaker. Your Honour properly ruled, I think, at that point that such a motion must go on the order paper and that there must be 48 hours' notice.

Instead of proceeding with the vote on which Your Honour had already embarked you extended to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) the courtesy of speaking on a point of order to the effect that the hon. gentleman had already made a motion to adjourn the house before Your Honour had embarked upon that proceeding. Your Honour allowed the hon. member's point of order. I refer to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—that he had been entitled to have his motion put. You put the motion and it was defeated. At that point the hon. member for Eglinton rose on a point of order and was heard. Your Honour pointed out that his observations did not relate to the matter before the house and the hon. member for Eglinton said, "Perhaps I can stake out a claim".

Mr. Fleming: He did not hear me. That is not right.

Mr. Harris: Page 4542 of Hansard.

Mr. Fleming: The Speaker did not hear my point of order then.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): No. The hon. member said, "Perhaps I can stake out a claim", as though there were anything in the rules to give any hon. member the right to preempt a position in the house for some future occasion.

Mr. Fleming: How ridiculous!

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Your Honour rose and had completed part of your speech when you were interrupted by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Cameron) who claimed the right to speak on a question of privilege. He was not allowed to proceed, quite properly, because Your Honour had the floor. Your Honour then indicated again the course of action which you were proposing to take, upon which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the hon. member for Eglinton and the hon. member for Kamloops were all permitted to speak on a point of order. Then Your Honour indicated that you intended to proceed with routine proceedings before placing before the house the course of action which you had already outlined.

At this point the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) again rose and said this:

> Mr. Speaker, some time ago I thought you had come to this point. In fact, I have already said that I supported the proposition that you were putting before the house, and I hope that you do put it before the house for the reasons you have given.

The Minister of Finance was here alluding to the course of action Your Honour had been putting before the house and on which you had called for and obtained the "yeas".

Mr. Diefenbaker: What page was that?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Page 4543. Notwithstanding the submission of the Minister of Finance as leader of the house that you should put the question to the house, Your Honour decided to proceed first with the routine proceedings of the house. In other words, at this point the question of the government, as expressed by the Minister of Finance, was not accepted by Your Honour and we have no criticism whatsoever of Your Honour for not accepting the minister's suggestion. On the routine proceedings the hon. member for Nanaimo was heard on an alleged question of privilege. Then as reported at page 4544 of Hansard Your Honour interrupted him in the following words:

> Order. The hon. member at this moment is not stating a proper question of privilege.

Then we had the incident to which I have already referred and about which I read to the house the only authority I have been able to find in Redlich, volume 2, at the page I have cited. If one examines Hansard one will find that there is not a single instance where any hon. member had a right to speak and was refused that right; but there are examples of the courtesy which you extended to some hon. members although they had no real right to be heard, according to the rules.

The fact is, as Your Honour indicated on Friday, that, because you had made what you yourself described as a serious mistake, the rules of the house had been disregarded to what amounted to the prejudice of the government in this contention over the effort to bring the measure then before the house to the point where it could be voted upon.

Mr. Diefenbaker: To the prejudice of the government, did the Prime Minister say?

Mr. Fleming: Yes, that is what he said; "to the prejudice of the government".

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): To the prejudice of the government's position. With respect to the procedure in the house the Minister of Finance, as leader of the house, had drawn Your Honour's attention to this disregard of the rules and practice, first in the afternoon and then in the evening of Thursday. On neither occasion had Your Honour seen fit to rule on the point of order raised by the Minister of Finance. When on Friday Your Honour put to the house the question that the house, which is the master of its own proceedings, should be placed in exactly the same position it was when you resumed the chair on Thursday to submit the chairman's ruling, you were met by very strong objections and there occurred the incidents which we all deplore.

Now I recognize, sir, that strong feelings and great heat have been demonstrated in this debate. I recognize that hon. gentlemen opposite felt, and probably still feel, that the government has applied standing order 33 with undue severity. We do not feel we have done so. We have acted within the rules to protect the rights of all hon. members on both sides of the house to express their opinion by their vote on this measure in time to be effective. There is a legitimate difference between two sides of the house; it is the normal working of our parliamentary system. On Thursday, I will not deny we were disappointed at the manner in which the rules had been applied, but we created no scene. We made no manifestation. We submitted to that.

On Friday Your Honour, having examined the situation and having come to the conclusion that you should at the first opportunity put the appeal that normally should have been put at five o'clock on the day before, without nullifying any proceeding, you proceeded to submit to the house the question as to whether that should be done. The house having approved that course, you did so.

There was, and still is apparently, the suggestion that in doing so you were subordinating the rules of parliament to the will of the government. Well, we absolutely repudiate any such suggestion. We do say that proceedings of the character of this motion would constitute a very serious precedent that would enable any factious group that was opposed to any bit of legislation to resort to it, and thus prevent the normal operations of the House of Commons in the progress of its business. I should like at this point to refer very briefly to something that was said by an hon. member who was the then hon member for Vancouver East, as recorded at page 41 of Hansard for January 28, 1949:

> Surely this is a question of orderly procedure in parliament, and whether we agree with it or not is a matter to be decided by the vote of parliament.

It has been stated, and we must all recognize it, that if there are hon. members who are prepared to vote for this motion there are very many more on both sides of the house who are prepared to assert by their votes that they still have confidence in the presiding officer of this house. Such a vote would not be a happy situation. It may be an inevitable situation. It is one about which those who have spoken for the other three groups in the house have made their positions clear.

I feel that, on this side of the house, we are entitled to some time for the consideration of what should be the ultimate disposition of this motion. It is not a situation which cannot be cured. It is not a situation which is going to destroy this parliament; and there should be in the minds of reasonable men, after they have had an opportunity of expressing their views, the feeling that, after all, something has to be done to allow parliament to continue to operate in the true traditions of British institutions and to carry on its work effectively. This would not be achieved by the adoption of this kind of motion, and is not apt to be achieved by the repudiation of this kind of motion, no matter what the majority opposed to it.

I therefore move at this time, seconded by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris):

That the debate be now adjourned.

Mr. Fleming: Another closure!

Mr. Knowles: The guillotine again.

Mr. Fulton: That is your answer to everything; chop it off.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the epitome of parliament.

MR. SPEAKER—QUESTION AS TO PROPRIETY OF PRESIDING OVER HOUSE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I should like to ask the Prime Minister if it is fair to ask Your Honour to preside over the sittings of this house when the motion which we were debating this afternoon still stays on the order paper without a decision by the house?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I understand that, however distressing it may be to Your Honour, it is your duty to preside in the house even as you did during the course of the discussion on the motion the debate on which has just now been adjourned. I can see no reason why there should be any kind of admission that this motion is warranted.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): May I ask a supplementary question. I think the Prime Minister missed the point of my hon. friend's question. The question was whether it is fair, not only to the Speaker but to hon. gentlemen who have criticized the Speaker, that the Speaker should remain in the chair until this matter is settled. I think the matter should be settled and then perhaps we can arrive at a good basis again.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): It is my understanding, Mr. Speaker, that, under the statute and the interpretation of the rules by Bourinot, you are required to continue to occupy your office even though there may be a question which concerns you personally involved in the proceedings.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question either to the Prime Minister or to the leader of the house. In view of the Prime Minister's assertion that on important matters the house should be permitted to reach a decision, will he undertake that when this motion is reached again on the order paper in its ordinary place the debate thereon will proceed?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, the business of the house will be announced in due course.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Prime Minister. Does he suggest that, having adjourned the debate on this important motion before it, the house has no right to know when the matter is coming up again? Is this but another example of the kind of thing we have to put up with—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): No, this is not an example of anything that anybody has to put up with. It is a decision of the house that the debate is adjourned, and I cannot at this moment tell the hon. gentleman when it will be possible to continue the debate, but it is not a matter that can be delayed very long.

An hon. Member: Does the Prime Minister have no immediate plans?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question? Does the Prime Minister realize that, according to the way the order paper is set up, this adjourned debate will be on page 2 of the order paper tomorrow under routine proceedings and that the house will be permitted to proceed with it unless the government takes the initiative in preventing that debate?

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I should like to direct another question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the house now has voted against the motion to carry on the debate of the censure motion, and in view of the Prime Minister's statement, can the Prime Minister inform the house now whether this chamber will proceed on the rules of the house rather than on a majority rule?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): This house has always proceeded on the rules of the house.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question, and I do so for the sake of information. Does he not consider that it would be manifestly unfair to Mr. Speaker not to have this matter dealt with at the earliest possible date, and when it comes up tomorrow will he give the assurance that it will be proceeded with immediately instead of being allowed to remain over?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): No, I cannot give the hon. gentleman that assurance. I consider that it is a matter that should be dealt with expeditiously and will be dealt with expeditiously.

Mr. Fleming: Why not today?

USE OF RED ENSIGN IN HOUSE ON MAY 25

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. W. Stuart (Charlotte): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Was the red ensign used on the afternoon of May 25 to drape the chair of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) the property of the Department of Public Works? If so, how did it come to the hands of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough)? Can the minister assure the house that there is a sufficient supply available for other members of parliament who may need them?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): To the best of my knowledge the flag was not the property of the Department of Public Works. I have asked to have the matter investigated, and I expect I shall have a full report later.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. I assume the Minister of Public Works has issued no orders that restrict the use of the flags that are available in this building for appropriate purposes.

Mr. Winters: To the best of my knowledge the flag was not the property of the Department of Public Works.

MEAT

BACON—INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE INCREASE IN PREMIUM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture, as I understand the minister is away at the present time. Can the parliamentary assistant inform the house whether the government is giving consideration to increasing the premium on bacon hogs from $2 to $4?

Mr. Robert McCubbin (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I shall take the hon. member's question as notice and an answer will be given later.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I should like to ask a supplementary question. Can the parliamentary assistant inform the house whether or not the government has given any consideration to making the floor price which is applicable at Montreal equalized throughout the various provinces?

Mr. McCubbin: Of course that is a matter of government policy, and these things will be announced in due course, as any changes are made.

[Mr. Stuart (Charlotte).]

PRIVILEGE

MR. DINSDALE—REFERENCE TO REMARKS IN DEBATE ON JUNE 1

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, to make a correction in Hansard on page 457 of Friday last. The hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Cannon) said:

> How did that flag happen to be in this house or in the lobby?

The next line states:

> Mr. Dinsdale: It was an organized affair.

An hon. Member: Honesty is the best policy.

Mr. Fleming: Why don't you start that practice, and soon?

Mr. Dinsdale: Hon. members will recall that that was a very noisy period during that particular part of the sitting. Certainly that observation did not come from me. It gives me the opportunity to say that I was aware that when the motion for suspension was moved a frantic search took place for the flag. It was not premeditated in any way.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

BRITISH COLUMBIA—INQUIRY AS TO FISHERMEN'S UNION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice or, in his absence through illness, to the Secretary of State. Would the minister make a statement regarding the charges circulated in a letter to the British Columbia member of parliament by the united fishermen and allied workers' union to the effect that there are certain irregularities in the methods employed by departmental officials in carrying out their duties in obtaining information from the union, as compared with the canners with whom they are associated?

Hon. Roch Pinard (Secretary of State): Before answering this question I wish to say that notice of the question was sent to the office of the Minister of Justice, who is away through illness, and it was referred to me for an answer. Before giving a reply, I would refer my hon. friend to the practice in matters of this kind that was outlined on May 21 last by the Minister of Justice in his statement, and I quote his words then:

> The general rule is that no information is given out as to whether or not an inquiry is being pursued in a particular industry unless and until a report is made to the minister by the restrictive trade practices commission and duly published.

Later on in his remarks, the minister qualified that by saying that the parties themselves appeared to have made public the fact that there was an investigation going on. With these qualifications, I am ready to answer the hon. member concerning the charges to the effect that the canning companies were not treated, in the matter of search, in the same manner as the union to which he has referred. I can assure him that all questions as to premises to be visited and the order in which they are visited are being dealt with in the ordinary way and without any discrimination. I should like to add that I feel, as the minister said at the time, that no other information should be given at this time on the matter.

PIPE LINES

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES—INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER CORRESPONDENCE WITH MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I wonder whether he has obtained the answer to my question of May 29, as to whether there has been any correspondence, confidential or otherwise, between himself and Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited at any time since May 8 of this year.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I did obtain the information and I am sorry I have not given it. There has been no correspondence.

NORTHERN ONTARIO PIPE LINE CORPORATION

CONSTITUTION OF CROWN COMPANY TO CONSTRUCT PIPE LINE, MAKE SHORT-TERM LOANS, ETC.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the third reading of Bill No. 298, to establish the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on the motion there is not very much that I feel is required to be said. The bill is in the same form in which it was introduced and in which it received second reading and in the form in which it was for several days before the committee of the whole house. There have been no suggestions that there should be any changes in its language or form, and it now comes up for regular consideration on the motion for third reading in the normal way.

Pursuant to standing order 33, I wish to give notice that immediately before the order of the day is next called for resuming the debate on the motion for the third reading of Bill No. 298, an act to establish the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation and on any amendments thereto, I shall move that the said debate shall not be further adjourned.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Knowles: I rise on a question of privilege. In his remarks just now in giving notice of this motion the Prime Minister said, if I heard him correctly, that there have been no suggestions made as to any changes in the form of the bill. There might have been something else in what he said, but substantially that was the import of what he intimated to the house just now. I remind you, sir, that I indicated when Your Honour was in the chair before second reading was called that the bill should be made to include the agreement referred to in clause 7 of the bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not a question of privilege.

Mr. Drew: Oh, stop admonishing the house.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. gentleman contend that in what he has just said he had a genuine question of privilege?

Mr. Knowles: I do, sir. The Prime Minister made a misstatement and you, sir, have said that when a misstatement is made the time for a member to correct that misstatement is after the person who makes the misstatement sits down. I waited until the Prime Minister sat down and raised my question of privilege at the very time that you have told us we should raise such questions of privilege.

Mr. Fleming: On the same point, it will be remembered that when clause 1 of the bill was called in committee and closure was moved on clause 1, I stated then that I had an amendment I wished to move on that clause and subsequent clauses and had no opportunity to do so owing to the guillotine applied by the government.

Mr. Fulton: You will also recall, Mr. Speaker, that just before the bill went into committee motions were made that instructions be issued to the committee as to specific amendments, which motions Your Honour ruled out of order at that time, but the suggestions were very specific.

Mr. Sinclair: Four members have now spoken in the debate. Carried.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We are to be harassed out of existence.

Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the manner in which the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has introduced this motion for third reading is as accurate an expression of the attitude of the government toward the business of the house and towards the house itself as anything which has come before the house in recent days. It displays the utter contempt of the government for parliament and for the business that is before the house. The Prime Minister as head of the government on this occasion chose to rise on the third reading of a bill which relates to what has been described to us as one of the greatest and most important ventures to come before this country for some considerable time, and simply tell us that there is not very much that requires to be said.

There is a great deal that requires to be said. There is a great deal that requires to be said about the steps by which we have come to this ignominous position in dealing with this bill. We have had exactly the same conduct on the part of the government at each stage, but at least it can be said that on no earlier occasion was there such a summary dismissal of the proceedings before parliament as that with which the Prime Minister has placed before the house for third reading a bill of such importance as is suggested by government spokesmen.

Then again, there was the statement by the Prime Minister, in the very few words he spoke before he again applied the gag, that there had been no suggestion that there should be any change in the language or form of this legislation. What a travesty on what has taken place. There were plenty of changes that were going to be made. There were plenty of changes that would have been suggested if the government had dealt in an orderly and sensible way with the legislation which is now before the house.

Let us just review what has taken place, now that we have reached the very final stage, again under the shadow of the axe. The first stage in the introduction of the bill was a motion standing in the name of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) that it was expedient that the bill be introduced. That was the first step. That motion was brought before the house long months after it had been announced in the speech from the throne that legislation of this nature would be brought before us. The government waited until the very last possible day to introduce this legislation, and then has talked of the need of haste.

In January the government knew what was needed. In January the government, in the speech from the throne, stated that we would receive legislation of this kind; yet it only came before us three weeks ago today. That is the haste that has been precipitated and forced on this house by the government as a result of its dilatory conduct since this legislation was first announced on January 10 of this year.

When the resolution came forward three weeks ago today, before a single word had been said by any member of the opposition the Minister of Trade and Commerce introduced the first closure motion. That was unprecedented in the history of this house. That was the use of the axe in the most cold-blooded manner. Never before has anyone ever thought of introducing closure before there has even been an indication from the opposition as to its views on the particular measure in question. Do not let anyone say there had been views expressed before. This measure only came forward in these very recent weeks after the government had decided to change its original course and halt the proceedings which began on March 15 of this year.

Then in the ordinary course of events we came to second reading. Again there was closure. Then we came to the committee stage, which is the stage where the bill can be discussed in detail. The Prime Minister says today there was no suggestion that there should be any changes in the language or form. What chance did the government give us to deal with this bill properly? None whatever. The moment clause 1 was called the Minister of Trade and Commerce immediately applied a particularly vicious form of closure and moved the adjournment of consideration of that clause. The moment clause 2 was called the same procedure was followed. Again there was closure of this special type. Clause 2 is the defining clause, the clause that tells us what the terms mean, all the terms that give meaning to the language and form—to use the words of the Prime Minister—of the rest of the act.

Then the third clause was the clause which established a corporation. The Prime Minister said, "Oh, we thought we would just pass over these clauses so we could come to the clauses that were the important ones". That clause establishing the corporation was an important clause, as also was clause 2. Then clause 4 was called. Obviously at that time the ears of the government had been opened a little, not too much, and it was decided to permit a limited amount of debate. On that occasion there was actually a discussion on clause 4.

Mr. Speaker, there has been talk of obstruction. The delay there has been, the discussion there has been, has related to the rights of the members of this house as representatives of the people of Canada, and the discussion which has taken place here has been a fight for the right of the people of Canada to have their legislation properly presented in this house.

Now the legislation is before us in its final stage, and it is clear that the government is not prepared to concede the possibility of any change. In what it has done today in moving closure once again the government makes it clear that it is determined to go ahead with this act unrevised and unchanged.

This act is a mongrel if ever there was one. We have first of all an act that was framed with the idea of setting up the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation. Then instead of revising the act to make it an intelligible piece of legislation we find that the government has left there part II which has nothing to do with the northern Ontario part of the line but which provides for the section of 574 miles from the Alberta boundary to the vicinity of Winnipeg.

This act in its dual form does two strange things. First of all it sets up a crown corporation which is going to receive—if the act is passed as the government is determined it shall be—$130 million of public funds. For what purpose is that $130 million advanced? For the purpose of building the northern Ontario section of the pipe line. Is that $130 million to be used for that purpose? Certainly not within the framework of this act for the time being, because part II of the act provides that of that $130 million up to $80 million is to be advanced, by the crown corporation set up for the purpose of building the northern Ontario pipe line, to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines for the purpose of building that western section. That is not one of the declared purposes of the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation, and it is not a proper use of the funds that are to be advanced to the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation.

We objected in the first instance to the advancing of Canadian funds in this way to build a pipe line, to the use of Canadian money for the purpose of handing over a pipe line to a company which is 83 per cent United States owned. Again we have this confused picture; Canadian money is to be used for the purpose of financing a venture that was to have been financed by the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines company itself. But we have this dual arrangement: Advance the money for the construction of the western portion and deny immediately to the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation the opportunity to build, until that money is repaid, the part of the pipe line which it was intended to build. That is using this crown corporation's money for a purpose that was never intended.

Mr. Speaker, over and over again we have heard talk about the desire of this government to welcome investment from the United States. It is not getting the investment from the United States. We have heard from this government that Canadians cannot finance this effort. Canadians are going to finance this effort simply because this government is going to use the Canadian taxpayers' money, whether or not they want it to do so. They are not even going to let the Canadian taxpayer have a chance to say what he wants done about this matter. We have urged for some time that this government take this matter to the people. There was never any suggestion that the Canadian taxpayers' money was to be used for the financing of a venture of this kind. The government has no mandate whatever to use the Canadian taxpayers' money in this way.

Whether or not the money will be repaid by Trans-Canada Pipe Lines, the fact remains that to the extent of over $200 million this government is proceeding to help to finance this United States-controlled organization. Let it not be said that this is just an advance which will be repaid. From time to time we hear of rotating funds. This is a rotating fund if, in fact, it rotates. This is a fund which, first of all, helps in the financing of the western section up to 90 per cent of the cost, and then in one way or another proceeds with the construction of the northern Ontario section if the government goes ahead with that venture.

Whether Trans-Canada Pipe Lines repays or not, the financing of the western section up to $80 million is to be done with public money; and then in turn, if the government proceeds, up to $130 million is to be used by the crown corporation for the construction of the northern Ontario section. That means—and it means nothing else—that over $200 million of public money is to be used in helping to finance a company which said it could finance this whole venture without government assistance.

Here we are at the third reading stage and the Prime Minister, instead of telling us today that there was not very much to be said, could well have been explaining to us at this late date why it is that he is now supporting a plan which he said last year he did not like. He has not yet at any stage explained when the transition occurred and when he moved from plan 1 and plan 2 to plan 3 and gave it his blessing and approval. Not only has he not explained why he is accepting this plan which he did not like, namely the northern Ontario construction under the crown corporation. He certainly has not explained in any satisfactory way how he justifies that still greater expenditure of public money to build this western section in the way it is to be built.

Last night I listened to a panel discussion over television, when a number of men who have interested themselves in the trans-Canada pipe line were discussing this subject. One of the things which interested me greatly was the extent to which even those who have followed this matter very closely do not yet realize that there has been a great departure from the original plan and that, far from having a venture which is being financed by United States investment, we now have the reverse of what was originally proposed here in this House of Commons; that instead of having a venture financed by United States investment, we have a venture financed by Canadian taxpayers' money and the advantages turned over to a company that is controlled in the United States, under an arrangement which will give the profits to the stockholders in the United States.

I have said this before and now on this motion for third reading I say it once again: If a group of Canadian investors, headed by someone who happened to know the minister responsible at Washington, went down there and asked them to put up the funds of the United States taxpayers to finance a Canadian venture which would have substantial control over great gas resources in the United States, does any hon. member opposite suggest for a moment that there would be the slightest chance of any person in congress doing anything but laughing at the proposal?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Would my hon. friend like a case of that kind? I would suggest Steep Rock might be a case, where the United States government put up $10 million.

Mr. Drew: That case has no similarity whatever to the case in question. In that particular case, about which the Minister of Trade and Commerce knows a great deal, his friend Cyrus Eaton succeeded in arranging—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): He is not my friend.

Mr. Drew: —succeeded in arranging a loan from Washington because of the assurance that the United States was going to be able to get iron ore out of a Canadian mine after this company was organized.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I would ask my hon. friend, as a matter of courtesy to me, to withdraw his statement "my friend".

Mr. Drew: He certainly tells everybody he is your friend, and I certainly would be very surprised if he is not because the Minister of Trade and Commerce and Mr. Cyrus Eaton have worked in close co-operation, not only in connection with Steep Rock but also in connection with the iron ore mine in Ungava, with which he has had something to do.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Once again I must intervene. I did not work with Mr. Cyrus Eaton on the iron mines in Ungava. I worked with three gentlemen from my own district who were the discoverers and owners of Steep Rock, and when Mr. Eaton entered the scene I retired.

Mr. Drew: Retired from what?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Any further interest in it.

Mr. Drew: The minister is certainly seeing something sinister in the word "friendship" or the word "friend". I would have thought he would have immediately claimed the friendship of Mr. Cyrus Eaton. Certainly there are many who have done so. Mr. Cyrus Eaton is a Canadian who has made a great success in business in the United States. When the minister talks about there being a parallel, I talked about Canadians going down there. Mr. Cyrus Eaton is carrying on business in the United States. He got the advance from the government at Washington because that mine was going to be made a captive mine to the iron smelting industry in the United States; that was the reason.

Of course I would point out that there is some affinity in another way, because one of the purposes for which the gas is going to be used which will cross the border at Emerson, if this plan goes through is that 152 million of the 200 million cubic feet a day that are supposed to cross that border are to go to three of the steel companies in the United States which will be competing with steel companies in Canada, where we could still be using that gas in competition with them. In fact it is likely that some of the gas will be used for the purpose of processing Canadian iron ore on the other side of the boundary. There is no similarity between the two situations at all.

I repeat, since I was interrupted in that statement by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, that any group of Canadians who went to the congress of the United States with the proposition that they should incorporate a company under Canadian control which was going to have a substantial monopoly on the resources of the gas areas in the United States, and then asked the government of the United States to put up the money to finance the venture, would be laughed out of congress. I am inclined to think someone would suggest that they go before a doctor to see if they should be certified. It is not possible even to imagine that such a proposal would be made. Certainly it would be considered least of all if, in the proposal that was made, they made it quite clear that Canadians were going to get the United States gas cheaper than the people of the United States were. Yet that is the situation with which we are confronted here today.

Some question has been raised about the cost of gas in the United States and in Canada. Some question was raised about the accuracy of figures that were put before the house. I propose to place before hon. members the figures that were submitted to the federal power commission on April 11, 1956, by Mr. B. E. Lowe, in support of his evidence on behalf of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited. Reference has already been made to these figures by the hon. member for Prince Albert.

We have the statement of the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines company itself as to what the average cost of the gas is going to be at various points. These figures were used in support of the application of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines for permission to import this gas into the United States. I wonder if part of their argument was that this was a desirable thing for the United States because in spite of the fact that the gas is produced in Canada, it is going to be sold to United States consumers cheaper than it is to Canadian consumers in Canada. That is the situation.

Mr. Pickersgill: The same old fable.

Mr. Drew: What interjection did I hear from the pipsqueak?

Mr. Pickersgill: I said, the same old fable.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, it is now six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I was dealing with the statement of average prices of gas, according to the statement filed by Trans-Canada Pipe Lines in Washington in April of this year. I want to put those figures on the record for the year November 1, 1958 to November 1, 1959, because at that time the distribution will have been spread out over the various units that will be receiving gas from Trans-Canada Pipe Lines.

I know there is a difference in load factor, and the suggestion was made that this in itself presented some explanation of the difference in prices. If it were possible for me to place on record in Hansard the various tables which show the variation depending on the change in load factor I would do so, but this is a very involved compilation of figures and it would not be a practical possibility at this time.

I know what the Canadian consumer will be interested in is the average cost; after all, that is what will determine the cost to the consumer. Now, I would assume that the government, which has shown such unfailing solicitude for Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited, will not challenge the accuracy of their own statements. While load factors may provide an explanation in some degree, and only in some degree, of some of these differences, the fact remains that these are the average rates per thousand cubic feet of gas at the different points across Canada and at the point where gas will be sold in the United States. These are, of course, wholesale figures to the distributors. As I said before I am taking the year November 1, 1958 to November 1, 1959 as a year when the distribution will have become effective over a fairly wide area.

These are the figures presented to the federal power commission in Washington by Trans-Canada Pipe Lines. They are not mine; they are not the figures of the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), who first discussed these figures a few days ago. These figures are a part of exhibit X33, docket No. G presented in support of the application of Midwestern Gas Transmission Company in the United States for permission to receive gas from Trans-Canada Pipe Lines for distribution in the United States. These are the figures in the order in which they appear as the average rate per thousand cubic feet: Saskatchewan, 26·6 cents; Manitoba, Winnipeg and Central Gas, 32·9 cents; others, 35 cents; Midwestern Gas Transmission at Emerson, 25·3 cents. That is the place where the gas is sold to the United States. Ontario Union Gas Company, 39 cents; western Ontario to other distributors, 42·2 cents; northern Ontario, 52·7 cents; International Nickel, 51·5 cents; North Bay to Toronto, 77·5 cents; Provincial Gas Company, 46·1 cents; Dominion Gas Company, 66·2 cents; Toronto and area, 51·5 cents; east of Toronto to Montreal, 54·7 cents; Ottawa and area, 52·1 cents; undistributed gas delivered at Niagara, 35·67 cents; Quebec-Montreal, 52·1 cents.

Those are the figures submitted by Trans-Canada itself. The significant figures here are the figures at Emerson and at Niagara. Whereas the city of Winnipeg will be paying 32·9 cents Emerson, which is some distance beyond that and an extension for some considerable distance of the pipe line from Winnipeg, will be paying only 25·3 cents. Now, let us not be misled by talks about load factor. That is going through the same pipe line. The wholesale price to the Canadian purchaser at Winnipeg is 32·9 cents. The sale price to Midwestern Gas Transmission Company, a subagency of Tennessee Gas at Emerson is 25·3 cents.

Then we have these interesting figures as far as eastern Canada is concerned. The gas will go through the pipe line across northern Ontario when it is completed and Toronto and area will pay 51·5 cents; yet after the gas has gone beyond Toronto and through the pipe line from Toronto to Niagara the Tennessee Gas company or its agent will pay only 35·67 cents at Niagara for the gas to be sold in the United States.

These are the figures put forward by the applicant company. These are the figures put forward by the company that is being financed by this government with the Canadian taxpayers' money. That gas is going to be piped through at a lower figure than it will be available to any Canadian purchaser in the east, and is then going to be stored in the storage areas of Tennessee Gas to balance up their prices so they can use Canadian gas for their gas war in the United States.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Would my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. Drew: Surely.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Does he appreciate that practically every town on the route of the gas line has now signed a contract with Trans-Canada stating the terms under which that town will buy gas?

Mr. Drew: What has that got to do with it?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I wondered who my hon. friend thought he was fooling by putting his figures on the record?

Mr. Drew: I must say that at this stage it is extremely interesting to hear the Minister of Trade and Commerce talk about anyone fooling this house, when the person who has fooled this house from the very beginning is the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Pickersgill: The one person who has never fooled this house is the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Drew: Are those strange sounds from the same source?

[Mr. Drew.]

Mr. Hees: Louder, squeaky.

Mr. Rowe: No wonder you put closure on that deal.

Mr. Drew: As far as these gas prices are concerned these are the figures that are put before us. Now, if the Canadian taxpayer's money is going to be put up let us assure that we are going to get the advantage of the best prices here in Canada. One of the reasons for these prices in favour of the United States is that this is controlled by a big gas selling organization in the United States which is not concerned about the Canadian market, but is simply concerned about getting gas to sell in the United States at the lowest price possible. That is the reason they are in this venture, and that is what this government is doing with the Canadian taxpayers' money. It is the worst sell-out this country has ever seen. The Canadian taxpayers' money is being used to finance an operation of this kind.

Those are the figures. If the Minister of Trade and Commerce wants to talk so much about load factor, then let him explain to us why it is that the Union Gas Company, which is in Ontario and is buying this gas, is going to pay 39 cents as against the price of 35·67 cents paid at the United states frontier at Niagara when the Union Gas Company has its own storage here in Ontario. Why are we not going to store the gas in the available storage in Ontario instead of pumping it over to the United States to keep an equal level over there to give them the advantage of the easier prices?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has asked for an explanation. The explanation is that Trans-Canada is not obliged to deliver any gas at Niagara. Any gas it does deliver there is gas surplus to the system. The rate at Windsor is a rate that is low in comparison with Toronto for the reason that Windsor can take gas at a uniform load throughout the year by reason of the fact that Windsor has available storage.

Mr. Drew: I am not going to repeat my description of the interjections of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, because I have already applied the appropriate terms to them. The fact is that the figure for distribution in the year between November 1, 1957 and November 1, 1958 at Niagara is 102,000 cubic feet.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Who gave you those figures?

Mr. Drew: What is that?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Who gave you those figures?

Mr. Rowe: Trans-Canada.

Mr. Drew: Oh, the Minister of Trade and Commerce says, "Who gave you those figures?" Those are the figures of your own chosen agent. Those are the figures of the organization you are financing.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): They are absolutely phony figures.

Mr. Rowe: You have these figures yourself.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They were given in evidence before the federal power commission.

Mr. Drew: These are the figures given in evidence before the federal power commission in Washington by the company that this government is supporting with the Canadian taxpayers' money.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): You might be reading them, but I have never seen them.

Mr. Hees: Those are Clint's own figures.

Mr. Rowe: They are certainly a distortion of the facts.

Mr. Drew: If there is any distortion in those figures then that is the best possible evidence that this deal should not proceed. If there is any distortion then it is distortion at Washington by the chosen agency of this government, Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited, who submitted those figures in the evidence they gave this year in Washington. If the minister wants to talk about people being fooled, and he questions these figures, let him agree to the setting up of a committee now, bring Trans-Canada Pipe Lines here and let us find out where those figures came from.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I placed the correct figures on Hansard. Why does my hon. friend want to put on phony figures?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Trade and Commerce has placed figures on the record, and then has had to change them, but the fact is—I repeat if repetition is necessary—that these are the figures put in in solemn evidence before the federal power commission at Washington on April 11 of this year in support of the evidence submitted by Mr. B. E. Lowe of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited when they were seeking approval of their application to deliver gas to Midwestern Gas Transmission Company so that Canadian gas could be distributed in the United States.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Will my hon. friend please table that document; I would like to see it.

Mr. Speaker: May I suggest to the minister that if the Leader of the Opposition does not consent he may not speak.

Mr. Drew: I have fully identified the document. I am convinced the document was in the hands of the Minister of Trade and Commerce before it was submitted at Washington.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): You are absolutely wrong.

Mr. Rowe: They are not private and confidential, are they?

Mr. Drew: That matter stands as something to be explained. It is certainly something for this government to explain, why it is financing the operation which is going to sell our gas more cheaply to United States purchasers than to purchasers here in Canada.

Today we heard some talk about obstruction in this debate. I reviewed today the different stages of this bill. The first motion of closure was moved immediately, before we had said a word. Where was the obstruction there? Second reading, again a motion of closure. Where was the obstruction there?

Mr. Pickersgill: Not for two days.

Mr. Drew: I do wish somebody would find a can of oil to end that squeaking door that is moving on the other side.

Mr. Pickersgill: Very funny.

Mr. Hees: Back to your trawler.

Mr. Pickersgill: Stick to the facts for a change.

Mr. Rowe: Get up and say it; we did not hear you.

Mr. Drew: This is not a humorous subject. If it were I might express the hope that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate might have seen the television last night and watched some of his fellow Newfoundlanders singing "Squid Jigging Ground". It would have been a peculiarly appropriate song for the occasion. However, we do not expect songs here tonight and they are not appropriate to the occasion, but I would hope that without any interruption from the same source it might be possible to proceed with these figures, which are facts, and which the hon. member will have an opportunity to examine at any time if he will only seek from the Minister of Trade and Commerce the information which was made available to him by Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited.

I was referring to the mention of obstruction that had been made by those opposite, by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) today, as though it were an excuse for the procedure that has been followed. I mentioned that on second reading we again had closure moved. I would point out also that when we came to the committee stage, closure of the most arbitrary type was imposed immediately.

The section was called and it was adjourned before there was any debate.

Yes, we wanted information and we have sought information. Neither the Prime Minister nor any hon. member opposite who adheres to the truth can suggest that they were not given ample opportunity at each stage to provide all the information that was required. In the speech from the throne read on January 10 it was stated that legislation to incorporate a crown corporation would be brought forward. In January I asked that this be referred to a committee so that information could be obtained. I have continued right through this session to ask that this be referred to a committee so we could obtain the information which was essential.

We came into the various stages where there has been closure, and now there is closure on third reading to be applicable tomorrow. We have wanted information, we have sought information. We would like information from Trans-Canada Pipe Lines as to why these deals were made to the disadvantage of Canadian purchasers. Those are the kind of things we want.

Then in case once again the Prime Minister should suggest that we have delayed proceedings here let me remind you that we made a perfectly clear submission on March 15, now considerably more than two and a half months ago. When the first motion for the setting up of the crown corporation was presented to this house I had this to say, and I place it on the record again. I pointed out that there were certain suggestions which I wanted to place before the house. Let no one now suggest that we only came forward at the last minute to ask that this be referred to a committee or that other applicants have an opportunity to build this pipe line and to be heard. Over two and a half months ago this is what I said, as reported at page 2182 of Hansard of March 15:

> Before I close I want to put certain suggestions before the house and for the consideration of the government, in the hope that they may be prepared to listen to the words of the Prime Minister when he told the house last year that he did not like this method. First, refer the whole question immediately to a committee of this house to obtain the facts and make appropriate recommendations. Second, insist upon the reorganization of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines as an all-Canadian company which can proceed immediately and under Canadian control. Third, if Trans-Canada cannot carry out its undertaking, then open the whole matter and permit new interests to make their proposals for an all-Canadian line, Canadian controlled. Fourth, if it can be shown, and I doubt that it is so, that part of the pipe line must be built as the government asserts on this occasion, then instead of building a part which could become an orphan under certain circumstances in the future, let them build the whole pipe line and lease it for operation under Canadian control.

That was the proposal which I placed before the government in explicit terms on March 15 of this year. If a committee had been set up at that time it could have heard all the evidence which would have been submitted. We could have heard from Mr. McMahon, and there is a lot more to be heard about that. The Minister of Finance may laugh but I think the minister knows a great deal more about the McMahon transaction than he has yet disclosed. I think there are other ministers whom I could name who know a great deal more about it and who are not as uninformed on this subject as was the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister had heard nothing whatever about Mr. McMahon's proposal until after the new agreement had been made with Trans-Canada following their default. I think perhaps the Minister of Finance had heard. I should like to hear from him what he knew about Mr. McMahon.

At any rate we have the right to know, and I suggested on March 15 that this should go to a committee so we could obtain information. If that committee had been set up we could have had Mr. Gairdner of Gairdner and Company come here so we could find out what their proposal was. In addition to that we could also have had Mr. Champion come here, whose information was placed before the Minister of Finance. There would also have been many other Canadians who would have come before that committee if it had been set up. What is certain is that there were a great many Canadians who could have undertaken this task if they had received as favourable terms as are being offered by this government to the United States-controlled company now before us, but this government refuses to consider the setting up of a committee.

Every relatively unimportant bill that comes to this house dealing with a matter connected with transportation is referred automatically, as a matter of course, to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. Any small rail line, any small transportation operation that comes before this house by way of a measure to build it or to set it up or to give it rights is submitted automatically to that committee.

Why not in this case? The fact is that in those cases they have nothing to conceal. They expect to have to bring the facts out into the open. In this case the government was not ready to let us have that ordinary committee inquiry to which we were entitled as a matter of course. I need not point out, of course, that every one of these pipe-line applications in the first instance was submitted to that committee. Every charter, when the application was made, was submitted to this committee automatically before it was dealt with. Why not in this case? I think the answer is clear, but do not let the Prime Minister suggest to us that we did not offer in plenty of time an opportunity for all the facts to be obtained.

Now we recognize the fact that if the Trans-Canada company were prepared to carry out its undertakings, then under the ordinary contractual obligations it would have the right to do so. I remind this house again that when we spoke about the reorganization of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines, we were suggesting that action in view of the fact that this was the organization which without any reservation had stated in this house through its spokesman that it could construct the whole Canadian line without any export and without government assistance. As a matter of fact as recently as last year Mr. Clint Murchison, the favoured figure for this whole transaction, the man who has the largest single block of shares in this whole transaction, this wealthy man who does not put out his money unless he has to—and he certainly is not being called upon to do so in this case—in his letter to the Minister of Trade and Commerce left no doubt about his assertion that this could be built without government assistance. Then all this has fallen apart.

How they must be laughing at us. How Mr. Clint Murchison and Mr. Gardiner Symonds and the other United States promoters associated with this operation must be laughing at us here. They get the charter on the promise that they can build the line and then, just because they are the only people that know everything about it, this government promises to do the major financing with the Canadian taxpayers' money. What nonsense to suggest that these are the only people who can do it. Look at a map of the gas transmission lines in the United States. They are like the veins in the human body. We could engage the services of experts from any one company or scores of companies that have had experience in this line. There is no question about the possibility of being able to get expert skill of this kind that is needed.

Then I go back to the fact that if Trans-Canada was not able to carry out its undertakings, then it had no right to be the chosen instrument any longer. Under those circumstances I proposed on behalf of our party that if Trans-Canada could not carry out this undertaking, then the whole matter should be placed before the committee and the opportunity presented for offers to be made. After all, it was well over two and a half months ago when I made that suggestion, and all the facts could have been accumulated and examined long before this if the proposal had been accepted.

Now we are on third reading, and in presenting the motion I shall before I sit down—I shall present a motion that will cover the points we had raised at that time—I recognize nevertheless that we have now come to a stage when this government has made it quite clear here on third reading, by the further gag they have now imposed, that this is going through and that after the brief period that will elapse in the other place this is going to go forward under the arrangements they have planned, doubtless also under closure there. The habit is catching, unhappily.

But the point is that if anybody opposite asks us if we know the detailed information of how any of these private enterprises would have undertaken this, the answer of course is no. They denied us an opportunity in committee to obtain the information. We say without any reservation that we believe there is enough initiative in Canada for Canadians to have undertaken this if anything even as remotely favourable as is being extended to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines had been extended to Canadians here in our own country.

That has been denied us, and we are denied the opportunity to learn the facts behind the Trans-Canada operation. We therefore come to the fact that it now seems clear that this government is going to proceed with construction of part of the pipe line under government ownership. Let them not pretend any longer that they are not getting into government ownership. They are. The moment this passes and they set up the corporation to build this northern segment, then they are setting up a corporation which will build 675 miles of this pipe line as a publicly-owned pipe line. That being the case, let us see the result.

We have this strange picture. We have the western section of 574 miles from the Alberta border to the vicinity of Winnipeg, to be financed by the Canadian taxpayers' money to the extent of $80 million, or up to 90 per cent of the cost of construction. Then there is the stretch of 110 miles between Winnipeg and the Ontario boundary. We do not know yet how the government is going to help finance that. We have not been told a word about that, not a word as to how they are going to link up the Winnipeg section with the northern Ontario section. Then comes the northern Ontario section of 674 miles to be built by a crown corporation. Beyond that is the section of 432 miles from Kapuskasing to Toronto, and then the pipe line from Toronto to Montreal to complete the whole line.

How are these others to be built? We do not know that, but we know that this government is committing this parliament and the people of Canada to public construction of a stretch of 675 miles across northern Ontario. Now we are on third reading. We have passed the preliminary committee stage. We have passed the stage when this could be discussed on second reading and the principles considered. We passed through the committee without being given the opportunity to even examine six of the seven sections, and now we are on third reading, the final stage.

That being so, I want to go back to what I said on March 15, and to any who are uncertain in any way about the position we have taken may I emphasize the words I spoke at that time on behalf of our party, as recorded at page 2180 of Hansard:

> Therefore if it comes to the stage where this government forces through an unnecessary venture of this kind, then there is only one thing to do and that is build the whole pipe line and not just part of it, and have control over the whole line.

That, Mr. Speaker, was what I said on March 15. That was the position I put forward on behalf of our party at that time, and I put that position forward today.

An hon. Member: Public ownership.

Mr. Drew: "Public ownership", I hear on the other side. Yes, this government is committing us to public ownership. This government is placing before us now a bill to set up a crown corporation to build 675 miles under public ownership, but then adds this mongrel arrangement under which it puts up the taxpayers' money to hand over to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines to build the other section out in the west, and does not even tell us what it is going to do with the 110 miles between Winnipeg and the Ontario boundary or the stretch between Kapuskasing and Toronto. This pipe line through northern Ontario, if they get to that stage, could be an orphan.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we believe that if a committee had been set up, if the proper inquiry had taken place, this whole line could have been built by Canadians under such a plan of private ownership as has been set forth in this house. However, we recognize now that this stage is past. We recognize now that this government commits itself here on third reading to proceeding with public ownership of a part of the line. It would be an absurd position to have public ownership of the 675 miles and then have private ownership of the parts on both sides, with all the conflicting difficulties which would be raised by that situation.

There would also be the fact that if for any reason Trans-Canada Pipe Lines did not fulfil its undertakings—and it will be the first time it did if it does now—then in that case the government would be left with an orphan. There would be only one thing the government could do and that would be to proceed to expropriate any other parts of the line then in existence to complete the whole line. Let us anticipate that, then. If we had had the opportunity in committee to deal with these matters we could have made recommendations.

The Prime Minister said today that we made no suggestions. We were not given the opportunity. There could have been proposals. Now, on third reading, we say to the government: You want to get ahead with the pipe line. All right, if you are determined to follow the course of going ahead with the pipe line with a crown corporation, go ahead with it but expand the crown corporation and give that crown corporation the power to build the whole line from the Alberta boundary right through to the east. That was what I said on March 15, and I repeat it:

> Therefore if it comes to the stage where this government forces through an unnecessary venture of this kind, then there is only one thing to do and that is build the whole pipe line and not just part of it, and have control over the whole line.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the government surely is not going to tell us that it cannot obtain the pipe to proceed with this construction. That pipe has been ordered for this particular construction. There is no other operation on the North American continent that is at this moment in need of 34-inch pipe. If the crown corporation is expanded and given authority to build the whole line it can, without any question, acquire that 34-inch pipe to proceed with the western section right away, and there need be no delay.

But just at this point let me deal with the suggestion that has been made that there might be two or three years' delay if we do not proceed, no matter what the terms are, with this chosen instrument of the government, Trans-Canada Pipe Lines. Why, Mr. Speaker, this 34-inch pipe was only ordered last October, and it was proceeding to delivery in six months' time. There is no reason in the world why similar pipe cannot be obtained at any time within six months after the order has been placed. But that is only a speculative proposition. Talk of two and three years is sheer and unadulterated nonsense, the kind of bluffing this government has been doing from the very beginning in connection with this whole operation.

Let them go ahead. Let them introduce a bill to expand the operation of the crown corporation to embrace the whole line. They can get the pipe. They can proceed with the construction; we can assure control of the pipe line for Canadians, and we can assure prices that are advantageous to Canadians instead of permitting big gas operators in the United States to set prices that will be unduly favourable to them. In this way if the government, having committed itself to public construction under a crown corporation for the 675 miles, will expand that operation to embrace the whole line, it can start immediately. It can start with the pipe that is available and with the skill that is available as well.

In that way we will have Canadian gas moving in Canada and we will be able then to lead from strength and not from weakness. If we want to get the best prices for Canadian gas in the export market the surest way to get those prices is not to be dependent upon permission to enter the export market. The best way is for us to have our own line and then, having our own line, make the best deal we can and be sure that we are not simply being taken for a ride by the Tennessee Gas company and their subsidiaries in the United States. Now, Mr. Speaker, this is now in its final stage.

Mr. Harris: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: Yes; and in spite of the fact that the Minister of Finance says "hear, hear", I feel sure there are to be some further speeches on this subject before the axe falls tomorrow night. This thing is in its final stages. It is in the position where, after it is passed tomorrow night under closure, there simply ensues a brief intermediate period and then royal assent. Let this government, even at this late date, act as though they really were representing Canadians. Let them speak up for Canada. Let them take a course that will preserve this great natural resource for the benefit of Canadians in the years ahead, and let us make sure that the profits that are going to accrue from these resources will be for the advantage of Canadians and for those who follow after us.

Above all let us make sure that as this line goes through Canada the policies that are adopted will be policies which will encourage Canadian development.

I move, Mr. Speaker, seconded by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe):

That the bill be not now read the third time but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole with instructions that they have power to amend sections 5, 6 and 7 thereof to include the agreements made with Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited as schedules to the bill and add other sections necessary to ensure that the bill shall give effect to one of the following principles:

First, the immediate agreement of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited to reorganize as a company under effective Canadian ownership and control and to undertake construction without a grant of public money, in accordance with the assurances upon which its charter was granted by parliament; or

Second, failing such agreement, the immediate consideration of other proposals submitted by any other persons or companies for the immediate financing and construction of the pipe line under effective Canadian ownership and control and without a grant of public money; or Third, enlarge the powers of the crown corporation so that the entire pipe line may be constructed immediately under public ownership.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is the first round of speakers on third reading. It is customary to recognize the leaders of the three opposition parties before a government member is recognized. The person who moved the third reading could have made a speech. I recognize the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell).

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) said in his concluding remarks, we are now in the final stage of this bill giving certain powers to the crown company and authorizing the building of the pipe line from the Alberta-Saskatchewan border to a point in the vicinity of Winnipeg. At the very outset of my remarks I want to say that I consider this to have been one of the most revealing debates we have ever had in this parliament. It is revealing because of the fact that the opposition has been gagged and muzzled at every stage; and, may I say, it was misled earlier than it was gagged.

Hon. members of this house may recall what happened on the afternoon of May 7. There had been some reports in the newspapers and elsewhere that the government of Canada had entered into an unusual agreement to finance the line from the Alberta-Saskatchewan boundary to a point in the vicinity of Winnipeg. Therefore because we felt that the proposals we had been making ever since this pipe line was first talked about in this country should receive some consideration before any agreement of the type that was rumoured was made and because we felt that the house should have an opportunity of expressing itself before a final resolution and bill were introduced, on that afternoon of May 7 I rose in my place and moved:

The adjournment of the house under standing order 26 for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the advisability of this house expressing its opinion on the method to be employed in the financing of the western portion of an across-Canada gas pipe line.

I deliberately refrained from calling the gas line the trans-Canada line because I knew that adjective had a peculiar connotation; and I wanted to discuss how best we could build the pipe line to convey the quantities of gas which we all want to see utilized in the best manner for our country and most economically in most parts of Canada.

The Speaker suggested that there was a resolution on the order paper but the Minister of Finance intervened and, as reported at page 3612 of Hansard, he said this:

On the point of order, it seems to me that we are doing by indirection what cannot be done by direction. The leader of the C.C.F. party is seeking to have an expression of opinion in favour of an expenditure of money for a particular purpose which can only be recommended by the government to the house.

I quite agree that the expenditure, when it came, had to be recommended by the government and what a recommendation we got!

An hon. Member: More trickery.

Mr. Coldwell: The minister went on to say this:

Then I am not just sure what else could be in the motion except that. If my hon. friend makes the point that he does not propose to seek to have the house declare itself in favour of a public ownership system, then I am not aware of what the point of the motion is.

The point of the motion, of course, was that we should endeavour to discuss an important proposal in order that the house might give the government some direction. But the government, of course, never needs any direction from the house; it never needs any direction from anyone except the ministers who sit on the front bench.

Mr. Knowles: It just follows its own blind course.

Mr. Coldwell: The minister had something more to say. I am quoting from page 3613 of Hansard of May 7. He said this:

Just in order to clear up the final point—

That is the point of what was going to be done:

—Mr. Speaker, may I say this. It seems to me that when the present resolution on the order paper with respect to Trans-Canada is called for discussion, every avenue of discussion with respect to the building, the financing or the like is open to opposition members.

Mr. Dufresne: A one-way avenue.

Mr. Coldwell: "Every avenue", he said. On the introduction of the resolution foreshadowing this particular measure—at that very moment, before one solitary word of criticism had been uttered from this side of the house—the Minister of Trade and Commerce gave notice of the motion for closure. He did that before one word could be said on this side of the house. Mr. Speaker, I say that was an unprecedented thing to do. I have never heard of it being done anywhere else. It was the most deliberate attempt to gag this parliament of which I have any knowledge. Then the Minister of Finance went on to say this:

It may be true—although I do not think in this house we accept these statements at face value—that it is the case that the western section will not be built this summer unless certain action is taken immediately. But in any event that is not a reason for urgency.

That is not a reason for urgency, the minister said, referring to the building of the line this summer.

Mr. Harris: No; urgency of debate.

Mr. Coldwell: He said further:

The urgency is on the matter of debate . . .

Mr. Harris: Quite.

Mr. Coldwell: The minister said this was not a matter of urgency, giving me the impression at the time that there was plenty of time to consider and debate this particular matter—when it came before the house. The next afternoon, on May 8, the Minister of Defence Production—

An hon. Member: The Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Coldwell: —or the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I mean, rose in his place and said he wished to make a statement; and he made a statement, confirming what the newpapers had been saying, about the proposal to build the line from the Alberta-Saskatchewan boundary to a point in the vicinity of Winnipeg. Then a resolution went on the order paper. That was a resolution which was, Mr. Speaker—and I say it once again although the contention has been disallowed by Mr. Speaker and by the house—absolutely out of order when there was another resolution in exactly similar terms, except that there was something added in the second one, already on the order paper. I say that at the very first opportunity closure was indicated. Then closure was moved. Of course the opposition objected to this. The opposition fought this gagging strenuously throughout, and indeed we almost lost sight of the pipe line in this house in the fight for the rights of the members of the House of Commons.

We have to have speed. Speed was the issue. This measure had to be put through by June 7. Well, I am going to say something about that date in a few moments. June 7 is very close and we are under the gag again tonight, under the axe. We had to have speed. I was looking at a very interesting article tonight in the Ottawa Journal written by Mr. I. Norman Smith, and he refers to the matter of speed or the lack of speed. It reads:

> There has never been any dispute about it: by abandoning certain old-fashioned rules of parliamentary procedure Mussolini did make the trains run on time.
> And certainly by burning the Reichstag Hitler removed irritating obstructionist tactics that were in the way of the will of the majority.

Mr. Pickersgill: The same tactics which have been used by Britain for years.

Mr. Coldwell: I used to think of the hon. gentleman as a Liberal. I do not think of him as a Liberal any more. The article continues:

> Russia, too, a zealous devotion to the ends regardless of the means has developed the country to great power and the voice of the meddling dissenter is gone from the land.

Mr. Goode: I think the hon. gentleman can do better than that.

Mr. Coldwell: You can groan all you like.

Mr. Hahn: Tell us about the cement factory in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Coldwell: As a matter of fact I could expose every falsehood that has been put on the record with regard to Saskatchewan. As I said at the beginning, I am not going to fall into the trap—

Mr. Hahn: No, you bet you are not.

Mr. Coldwell: —I am not going to fall into the trap set by our semi-fascist opponents as a diversion and discuss the Saskatchewan election, the New Brunswick election or the Quebec election. I am not going to do any of those things. I continue quoting from the article.

> For sheer headlong efficiency and "getting things done" there can be no doubt the nice-Nellieism of parliamentary procedure, its yeas and nays, its checks and balances, is hopelessly even ludicrously inadequate.

I thought that was a very good summary of the house at the present time.

Let me take a look at the bill again. We have had no opportunity to discuss this bill clause by clause.

Mr. Pickersgill: Through your own fault.

Mr. Coldwell: The hon. gentleman says, "through your own fault." I want to say to my hon. friend that I think it is not a fault but a virtue on the part of parliamentarians to fight for the rights of this parliament.

When clause 1 came before the house, the clause upon which members of parliament can find out the implications of the bill by questions and discussion, what did the minister do? He moved that further consideration be postponed, further consideration when there had been no consideration. He merely read a few lines to indicate what the clause was. Clause 2 received the same treatment; clause 3 the same treatment. We were denied the right to discuss the clauses which named the corporation in the agreement.

We got to clause 4. Clause 4 spoke of a corporation which it did not name, and because of the outcry in the country, because of the attitude of the press, we discussed clause 4. Then we were under closure. Clause 5 was moved; clause 6, clause 7 and the title were moved under closure without one sentence of discussion. I said that evening, and I repeat, that the people who were in the well-filled galleries of the house that night saw a mockery of this parliament and of parliamentary procedure.

Let us look at clause 5. What does clause 5 say? It says:

> The corporation—

Named in an earlier clause.

> —is established for the purpose of
> (a) acquiring real and personal property for the construction, maintenance and operation of and constructing, maintaining and operating the northern Ontario section;
>
> (b) leasing, with an option to purchase, the northern Ontario section to Trans-Canada and carrying out such lease, including disposal by the corporation of the northern Ontario section in accordance with such purchase option; and
> (c) doing such other matters or things as the governor in council may deem necessary to fulfil—

Notice the following words:

> —any agreement or arrangement, made before or after the coming into force of this act—

This gives authority to the government to make any agreement, the one that was tabled in the house and the one which should be attached as a schedule or appendix to this bill and which I venture to guess quite a number of the members have never read and never had in their possession.

Mr. Knowles: Not enough copies were made available.

Mr. Coldwell: Not enough copies were made available; we had to hunt around and get mimeographed copies of the agreement in order that we might study it. The clause continues:

> —between the government of Canada and the government of Ontario or the government of Canada and Trans-Canada with respect to the financing, construction, leasing, operation maintenance, improvement and disposal of the northern Ontario section.

Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation

We have been told that this agreement must become effective by June 7, otherwise the company would not go ahead with it. Yet what has the company been doing? In the past couple of weeks we have read in the newspapers that they have placed contracts for pipe in Britain. I am glad they have placed some there. They have placed contracts in Welland, and again I am glad they have placed some contracts there for pipe to build the northern Ontario section. We have been told that unless we approve this bill it is doubtful whether the Trans-Canada company would undertake the task of building the line. Either they have an understanding with the government that at all costs this measure will be rammed down the throat of parliament, or they have greater faith in the word of the ministers than some of us feel inclined to have.

Now, what about this agreement? I am going to jump over to clause 7. We are told in that clause:

> Pursuant to an agreement in that behalf made, with the approval of the governor in council, before or after the coming into force of this act, between Her Majesty and Trans-Canada . . . the corporation may, on behalf of Her Majesty—

—do certain things. Now, how many hon. members of the house have seen the agreement? How many have read the terms of that agreement? On the second reading of the bill I put on the record the safeguards the company demanded so that if they did not complete the pipe line by next April they could find numerous excuses for the delay. I put those on record on the second reading of the bill. When we look at paragraph 13 of the agreement, for example,—an agreement made in the interests of Canada—what do we find?

> It is a condition of the making of any loans hereunder that the crown company be provided with a favourable opinion or opinions, upon such matters relating to such loans as are required by the crown company,
> (a) by the solicitors for Trans-Canada and
>
> (b) by the solicitors for the crown company who may in giving their opinion or opinions rely on the opinion or opinions of the solicitors for Trans-Canada.

Mr. Harris: Or their own solicitors.

Mr. Coldwell: I beg your pardon?

Mr. Harris: Read the next one.

Mr. Coldwell: Read the next paragraph? Certainly. However, I point that out:

> . . . who may in giving their opinion or opinions rely on the opinion or opinions of the solicitors for Trans-Canada.

Now we will read on:

> Trans-Canada represents, warrants and covenants that
> (a) it shall upon the execution and delivery of this agreement use its best efforts to obtain as soon as possible all necessary permits and licences and orders or amendments or renewals thereof from all authorities and persons including the board of transport commissioners for Canada and the petroleum and natural gas conservation board of Alberta to enable it to proceed with the construction of the western section—

I am not going to read all these; I will let the minister do it. However, Trans-Canada warrants and agrees to do certain things, and paragraph 13 certainly says what I have just read:

> . . . such matters relating to such loans as are required by the crown company,
>
> (a) by the solicitors for Trans-Canada and
> (b) by the solicitors for the crown company who may in giving their opinion or opinions rely on the opinion or opinions of the solicitors for Trans-Canada.

I would like to revert to the purchase of pipe for a moment, if I may. You know, one of the newspapers that has been giving a great deal of attention—and practically all the newspapers of Canada have been giving a great deal of attention—to this particular deal is a paper which has a long Liberal tradition. I suppose there is no paper better known in Canada for its fundamental Liberalism through the years than the Winnipeg Free Press, either under its present name or the name by which we knew it in the early days in western Canada, the Manitoba Free Press. What does it say?

I may say, Mr. Speaker, I am about to quote from an editorial. In doing so I am following the example of the Prime Minister of Canada who this afternoon read into the records two rather long editorials.

Mr. Fleming: From the only newspaper in Canada that supports him.

Mr. Coldwell: I am aware of the fact that the Prime Minister was not checked by the Speaker and that, of course, according to the rules neither he nor I should read editorials regarding the business of the house; but since the Prime Minister did it this afternoon I am going to claim the same right.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): It is just another rule that went out the window.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I believe the actual wording is if it "reflects on the proceedings".

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): This does.

Mr. Coldwell: There was reflection on parliament this afternoon. The editorial reads:

> The government's bill creates a crown corporation which will build and, for a time at least, own the northern Ontario section of the pipe line, leaving it to the Trans-Canada company to operate. On Tuesday Mr. St. Laurent was asked how the building of this section of the line would be carried out. He replied that—

And they quote him:

"It would be built by the crown corporation, of course, under contracts for which tenders would be called in the usual way."

The editorial continues:

Unfortunately, the Trans-Canada company has in fact now ordered the pipe for this "crown" line. Mr. Howe on Wednesday calmly confirmed this; indeed, he had suggested that Trans-Canada place the order with it—

And this appears in inverted commas:

—"clearly understood" that the government could take over the pipe.

The editorial goes on to say:

This is extraordinary. The whole argument for providing the Trans-Canada company with the money to build the prairie section is that it alone can have the necessary pipe. Why on earth should the government depart from the ordinary rules governing the open dealings of crown corporations and put the northern Ontario section into a position of dependence on what Trans-Canada does or does not do? All the rush in parliament is supposed to mean, after all, that the new crown corporation can be in existence in a matter of days. Why would it not have been possible to put off the pipe order that long, and so get it in the proper way without dependence on Trans-Canada?

The editorial concludes:

This episode is even more mysterious than the previous one which showed the inadequacy of Trans-Canada's option on the pipe for the prairie section of the line. If Mr. Howe has any explanation, it is urgently necessary for the government's case that he give it promptly and fully.

Mr. Rowe: What paper is that?

Mr. Coldwell: That paper is the Winnipeg Free Press. One can look at the papers published throughout this country and see papers which normally support the government publishing the same sort of editorials.

I do not know how many of you can see this, but I hold in my hand a cartoon published in another of the leading western newspapers where it is said there is so much support for this particular proposition. This cartoon is from the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix. The cartoon shows, of course, a balance, a scales. On the one side there is depicted a pipe-line start in 1956 away up in the air, and weighted down heavily on the other side we have parliament gagged and muzzled, a big bag containing the $80 million loan for the prairie section and $118 million for government loans for the northern Ontario section.

Mr. Knight: What is the title?

Mr. Coldwell: The title is "Is it Worth the Price?" I wonder, is it worth the price? In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the people of Canada are being betrayed and they are being delivered, as this government has delivered us, gagged and muzzled, into the hands of this powerful group of United States oil magnates.

That is what is happening in this country today, and when we are fighting this proposition we are fighting to preserve the right of this country to control its own destiny. We have watched our natural resources, resource after resource, slip into the hands of powerful foreign companies for processing, so that our iron ore goes from this country and steel comes back at a high price and high profit. Our pulp and paper crosses the line and comes back to us in the form of all sorts of magazines, some of which are good and some of which are objectionable. It also comes back in various other forms. Now we are going to give them one of the greatest sources of power, if this Tennessee Gas company can secure licences from the federal power commission to import the gas into the United States.

I welcomed tonight the statement of the Leader of the Opposition that the first three propositions he made some time ago are now beyond the realm of possibility and that consequently he falls back on the fourth proposition he made on March 15, that this line should be built by the public of Canada, owned by the public of Canada, controlled by the public of Canada and operated by the public of Canada to distribute across Canada first a valuable and great Canadian natural resource. That has been the position we have taken from the outset.

Oh yes; we have been told there are difficulties in the way of the government operating a line like this. Of course there are difficulties. The government would have to negotiate for the gas with the producers in Alberta. How many producers are there in Alberta? In the main not more than a dozen companies are involved, and those companies are United States companies who have gained control, and I am not blaming them. I am not blaming even the province of Alberta, in the financial situation in which the provinces find themselves, for entering into the agreements, although I cannot agree with some of the ideas behind the Alberta agreements with the companies which discovered oil and gas in that province. But I am saying it is not a case of negotiating with thousands of producers; it is a case of purchasing, if you will, gas from wells that are under the control of a few powerful private corporations.

I know that the president of Gulf Oil company stated some months ago that he would not allow his gas to be used by any corporation in which the government was involved. Who does he think he is? This

United States financier comes into Canada and tells the Canadian people that he will not allow them to use one of their own great resources. Where has this country got to; where is this country going?

I want to say, as I have said before in connection with this matter, that if this kind of thing continues for any greater length of time the day will come when we shall have lost our economic independence and will be dependent upon the United States of America. An attempt will be made ultimately to make this country part of that one. I want none of that, because in spite of all the disappointments we have suffered in this parliament in recent days I still believe that the parliamentary system of government is better, provided we can preserve it, than any other form of government of which I know. But in the past two weeks we have seen it steadily undermined by a government which should be doing its best, particularly in these days, to preserve it and the autonomy of our country.

It is said it would be difficult for the federal government to distribute this gas to consumers. I grant that immediately. We have never suggested that the federal government should distribute the gas. What we have said is what Mr. Leslie Frost, the premier of Ontario, said some time ago. Remember that Mr. Frost only accepted this, as the Ontario Hansard bears out, because it was the federal government that had made the decision. When the bill was introduced into the Ontario legislature, Mr. Porter and Mr. Frost made it abundantly clear that their bill was drafted in such a manner that if this parliament felt the present proposition unwise or if for any reason the present plan fell through, they could enter into any other arrangement with the government of Canada. That was his original idea.

I want to say tonight that under a plan whereby the government would own and operate the main gas line the gas could be distributed by any means a province desired to use. If a province wished to distribute the gas by a private enterprise corporation the government could enter into an agreement with that private enterprise corporation to distribute it. But my expectation is that the provinces would do as they have done with electricity, that they would decide to distribute gas through public ownership.

Under this plan the figures produced by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and even tonight by the Leader of the Opposition may make some people think they are going to get pretty cheap gas. But when we look at the figures for the city of Winnipeg, for example, we get some idea of what they are going to pay. The gas company at Winnipeg will pay 28.3 cents per thousand cubic feet, The Central Gas Company are asking permission to charge $1.10 per thousand cubic feet for the gas they are going to get for 28.3 cents per thousand cubic feet. I hear one of my Social Credit friends saying it will be 90 cents in Saskatchewan, but I do not know that it will be 90 cents in Saskatchewan.

An hon. Member: Rosetown-Biggar.

Mr. Coldwell: My friends in Rosetown-Biggar are delighted that the small towns along the way are going to have the benefit of this gas. They are not complaining, because they know that the long pipe line and the cost of distribution and hooking up with little places like Delisle and others along the way have involved the government in more expenditures than a powerful company would put up merely to link city to city.

An hon. Member: How about the small towns in Alberta?

Mr. Coldwell: They get gas at a lower price because they are near to the gas fields, but that is not the real reason. When I was in Alberta over 40 years ago there were places with natural gas. The pipe lines were put in when the cost of construction was quite low and the development could be done for very little.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Coldwell: If my hon. friends want to make a speech let them do so.

Mr. Knowles: They voted for closure.

Mr. Coldwell: They are hooked up with the government so completely that they are speechless, therefore they have to mutter. They had their gas lines laid when the cost of laying was quite low. They are paid for now. If the consumers of Alberta are not getting the benefit of lines which have been paid for, then it is a case for investigation.

I am quite pleased and happy to know that the government of my province is trying to give the people in the smaller places a break in connection with this great natural product. The people of Winnipeg are being told by the local company that they are going to have to pay $1.10 per thousand cubic feet for gas which that company will receive from the pipe line for 28·3 cents per thousand feet wholesale.

When you look at this agreement and this project you begin to see the extent to which parliament should have gone into this matter. I agree with the Leader of the Opposition completely that this proposition should have gone to a committee of this house for investigation. There is no question about it; the more we go into it the more we see the need for that investigation. But that we were denied. Of course it was referred to a committee five years ago. Five years ago when the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Decore) came to this house to get a charter for Trans-Canada Pipe Lines he told us that this would be a Canadian project, that every cubic foot of gas would be available for Canadian consumers, that the gas would be distributed right down into the province of Quebec, and that the company would be financed by Canadians.

Then it went before the committee and the officers of the company confirmed those statements. They went further and said it would not be necessary to export any surplus gas to the United States in order to make this economical, that it would be economical without it. Now we are told that unless this company can export gas to the United States they cannot get the line through. What chance have they of getting permission from the United States? It is now before the federal power commission and is likely to be before that commission, I was going to say for months—I am certain I am right in that—and it may be before that federal power commission for years. Then I suppose we shall have other propositions made to us.

The Leader of the Opposition drew attention to something else that is worth drawing attention to; that is, this $80 million or 90 per cent of the cost of building the line from the Alberta border to the vicinity of Winnipeg, which the people of Canada are going to finance by way of a loan to the company. We are going to finance this just as we are going to finance and build the northern Ontario bridge—so we understand though it looks as though Trans-Canada is going to build it, without tender, by the manner in which they are purchasing pipe in various parts of the world. We have not been told of what is going to happen to the 110 miles from the vicinity of Winnipeg to the Manitoba-Ontario border. Are we going to have an empty pipe line across northern Ontario and a pipe line delivering gas nowhere except to the city of Winnipeg and vicinity?

Who is going to build the 110 miles, and when is it going to be built? We do not know. The company says it cannot proceed with this line unless we lend it up to $80 million or 90 per cent of the cost. They have no money. Yet associated with this proposition are some of the most powerful United States companies. Of course they would rather get the money from Canada at 5 per cent, because they probably can utilize their own resources and finances to greater profit in the United States or elsewhere. So they come to us and ask us to lend this money to a company which is 83·4 per cent United States owned. I am not going to put the breakdown on the record again, because it has been put on on so many occasions.

I see my time is running short. I am told it is up.

An hon. Member: Go ahead.

Mr. Coldwell: No, I am not going ahead, because I do not want to impose on the rules, particularly as there will be closure tomorrow and I may prevent some of my friends from making contributions they wish to make. Though I have something else to say, Mr. Speaker, since my time is up I am going to sit down.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Before the leader of the C.C.F. party preens himself too much on the capture of the Tory party, may I point out to him that in the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition there is no reference to public ownership in any positive sense whatsoever.

There are three propositions in the amendment. The first one—and mark that it is the first one—is that there should be a reorganization of the company. The second one—and mark that it is the second—is that there ought to be some inquiry made about other persons who might do this work. Then in the third—and the third only, the leader of the C.C.F. party should note—if all these others have failed, we should consider public ownership. May I tell my hon. friend that this is consistent with what the Tory party did when it voted down public ownership on his amendment on second reading.

An hon. Member: They did not throw democracy out the window.

Mr. Harris: I have been wondering about this alliance for some time. I have been wondering what has been happening in the last few hours in this house. It seems to me that perhaps something did happen in Toronto the other day. I have not had an opportunity to read the newspapers at any great length, but I did understand that the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) was on a platform in the city of Toronto and delivered an attack on this government. I also understand that on the same platform appeared the leader of the provincial C.C.F. party, and if I understand the report correctly it said that he took some skin off the Tory provincial premier.

What a combination. The hon. member for Eglinton in this house interjected in the speech I made two weeks ago today that it was not true that his party was in any sense attached to the McMahon plan. Since I pointed out to him the quotation from his colleague the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees), I have not heard from either any denial.

Now let us look for a moment at the amendment the leader of the Tory party has moved. The second proposal was that we should consider certain other alternatives, and he mentioned, among others, the Champion plan and the Gairdner plan and the McMahon plan. I am going to refer just briefly to the Champion plan, in case his colleagues in the C.C.F. party have never bothered much about it.

Mr. Coldwell: I have.

Mr. Harris: The Champion plan was one which said at the very beginning that Mr. Champion did not believe in a trans-Canada pipe line. That is one of the alternatives the leader of the Tory party wants us to consider.

What was the other one he suggested? He suggested the Gairdner plan. I wonder whether the members of the C.C.F. party have read the correspondence on that. I point out to them that clause 4 of the memorandum for discussion sent to this government by the Gairdner company said that agreement would need to be reached with the government of Canada to relieve the company of the necessity of paying corporate income taxes for a period of ten years from the commencement of operations.

Mr. Coldwell: We would never have supported that. We supported the one course.

Mr. Harris: In complete fairness to the Gairdner gentleman who proposed this, I want to point out that later on he sent a telegram in which he said in effect, "Since no one has complained about my plan, I think everybody is in agreement with it". Well, it was in such a condition that no one would take it seriously, and that is why he received no protests about it. Yet the Tory party would have us consider this plan. They would have us take the time of a committee of this house to consider a plan put forward for exemption from corporation income tax, something which I think, except within the statutes which provide for certain conditions of exemption for three years and so on, has not been proposed in this house by any party at any time. It makes me think a little of the Tory party of a former generation which at one time issued tax-exempt bonds in this country.

There is another feature to this debate that has been extremely interesting, and that is what has been said by my hon. friend from Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker).

Mr. Diefenbaker: Speak about the McMahon plan.

Mr. Harris: I am going to speak about the McMahon plan again. The hon. member for Prince Albert was the one who spent, I would say, almost two-thirds of his speech advocating the McMahon plan without quite advocating it. You know how the hon. member for Prince Albert can make a speech for 40 minutes and when it is all over he can deny every word in it because he did not really come out and say he was in favour of anything. The McMahon plan was a simple one. I went over it—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Did you see Mr. McMahon?

Mr. Harris: No, I do not know Mr. McMahon and I have not seen him. Mr. McMahon made a proposal, which was perfectly simple. It was a proposal that he be permitted to export out of Emerson 400 million cubic feet of gas per day, twice as much as this government was prepared to grant, and if that were done he could finance the thing himself. Sir, I am not familiar with the technique involved, but it does seem to me that anyone could finance it under those conditions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Harris: But I come back then to the real restraint on this parliament with respect to this particular legislation, and that is that the government have said that at the present time we will not permit the export out of Canada of more than 200 million cubic feet a day, and any company concerned with this matter will have to take that into account in their proposals. So far as I know McMahon has never made a proposal to this government based on 200 million cubic feet a day, and I doubt very much if he would be likely to do that.

At the same time the leader of the Conservative party took a strange line tonight which I want to talk about for a moment. I think perhaps what I said two weeks ago might have been considered a little in the meantime. In any event, he began to complain tonight not that 400 million cubic feet a day were going out of the country but that 150 million to 200 million feet were going to some particular steel company in the United States. Yet his own follower two and a half weeks ago was recommending that twice as much should leave this country, something which would be selling out the country far more than any protestation they may have about this particular deal.

Now, sir, may I speak for a moment about prices. Tonight we have heard a long speech by the leader of the Conservative party about prices and average prices; and this, of course, is a follow-up to what the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) said. You know, sir, somehow they do not seem to have considered what the law of this country is, and I want to repeat something that has already been put on the record but which is blissfully ignored by all those who speak in the opposition.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You had better tell Trans-Canada not to make these false representations.

An hon. Member: Oh, shut up.

Mr. Harris: In the regulations under the Exportation of Power and Fluids and Importation of Gas Act there appears regulation No. 9 headed "Export Price", which regulation is as follows:

> The price charged by a licencee for power or gas exported by him shall not be lower than the price at which power or gas, respectively, is supplied by him or his supplier in similar quantities and under similar conditions of sale for consumption in Canada.

This means, Mr. Speaker, that when a licence is granted for the export of gas out of Canada—and that licence has not yet been granted—it is going to be subject to these regulations, and these regulations will be enforced by the government of Canada to see that the export of gas is not at a price lower than the price for gas supplied in Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is Trans-Canada falsifying its evidence?

Mr. Harris: The hon. member for Prince Albert, by the way, has made me think again of something the leader of the Conservative party said a matter of ten days ago. At that time he was moving an instruction of some kind that we should split the bill so he could discuss separately the loan for the western leg and then the northern Ontario section. I have been wondering about that. I have wondered whether he was trying to get out of the trouble that the member for Prince Albert had got him in with his famous broadcast when he threatened us with a filibuster in this house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is just a childish remark.

Mr. Harris: After all, the northern Ontario crown corporation, for the purpose of constructing in conjunction with the government of Ontario the northern Ontario line, was something on which the hon. member for Prince Albert was threatening us with a filibuster because we had not yet produced the bill that is now before the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is a false statement and you know it.

Mr. Harris: At that time the hon. member threatened that we would indeed have difficulty in putting that particular bill through. It seems to me that if the leader of the Conservative party had been able to divide the bill it might be possible that he would have gone along with the premier of the province of Ontario in his agreement with this government in order to construct the northern Ontario section.

Mr. Drew: What a silly statement.

Mr. Harris: But the member for Prince Albert had already nailed him down to filibustering the bill, and he had to go through with it. As a matter of fact, sir, after I spoke on this subject the hon. member for Prince Albert was kind enough in his reply to say that I had, with a certain specious sanctimoniousness, addressed myself to the subject of his remarks. Well, I had not been conscious that I had had that air in this house, but if I did I respectfully ask all hon. members to forgive me and I will try to practice getting away from it. But I do want to say that if there is one member in this house, as I said before, who makes speeches without really wanting to have them held against him, I cannot recommend anyone better than the member for Prince Albert.

May I speak now for a moment of the leader of the C.C.F. party, what he has read from the newspapers and what he said about what has happened in parliament in the last two weeks. I wonder whether he has forgotten his history when he speaks about the Reichstag. It was not Hitler with his majority who ruined democracy in Germany. It was Hitler with his minority who upset the government of the day. It was only after he had forced on the people of Germany two or three general elections—I have forgotten the exact number, but shall I say three?—within two years and after he had made demonstrations both in and out of the Reichstag and had beaten up his opponents on the street corners and had done many other things of that sort that he brought the democratic process to an end. It was only then that he took over and for the first time the condition arose to which my hon. friend referred.

Mr. Coldwell: You are achieving it just a bit earlier.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, I am going to pursue the subject a little further, and I am going to discuss what has happened with respect to this bill in the past three weeks. It began three weeks ago today. I do not recall a bill being before parliament for three solid weeks, except perhaps for one day, in my time, although there may have been such occasions and if there are I accept the correction. But three weeks today we introduced the resolution preceding the bill and we have been talking about it every day with the exception of perhaps one-half day on a Wednesday.

But what has happened in that time? I have made some hasty calculations which may be wrong, but they will not be wrong by more than two or three. I find, for example, that during that period the leader of the C.C.F. party has spoken 15 times. I find that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton)—I am not sure which is the senior partner but I accept whatever definition they want to make—have spoken more than 30 times in three weeks.

An hon. Member: A good team.

Mr. Harris: I find that the leader of the Conservative party and the hon. member for Fleming—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Harris: I must apologize, sir. I have known the hon. member for so long that I am inclined to think of him personally rather than as a member. The leader of the Conservative party and the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) have spoken more than 20 times in the past three weeks.

Mr. Fleming: Are you counting the times we tried to speak and were not allowed to?

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, if this is a gag I think I ought to have a new definition of what a gag is.

Mr. Rowe: We were speaking about the gag.

Mr. Harris: Yes, I am going to speak about that right now, and I am going to ask the hon. member for Prince Albert and the hon. member for Eglinton what they meant when about two weeks ago and again this afternoon they referred to closure in the United Kingdom being by consent. Mr. Speaker, I have never heard of closure by consent, and if they were suggesting that they would have been agreeable to closure here then it is something new in Canadian parliamentary history.

Mr. Fleming: I did not refer to it being by consent.

Mr. Harris: I can tell you about closure in the United Kingdom, Mr. Speaker. Closure in the United Kingdom is closure. Some time in the middle of an afternoon someone moves, in the United Kingdom, that this question be now put. In this house that is nothing more than a motion which will prevent further amendment to the bill. It will not prevent discussion. Everyone can speak on it. But over in the United Kingdom it means what it says. The question is put at that particular moment.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No. The Speaker determines that. You are wrong.

Mr. Harris: Then at ten o'clock that night, if that motion happens to have been made on an amendment, any member in the United Kingdom parliament can get up and claim that all the preceding motions—that is including the main one—be put; so that between three o'clock in the afternoon and ten o'clock at night you can pass a bill through all its stages. The Prime Minister put on the record the other day a quotation from the labour prime minister of the United Kingdom in which he said that now that he was in government and had been in opposition for some time, he knew perfectly well that it was the duty of the government to govern and to do what they thought was in the interests of the country, and to take the responsibility for doing so.

What is the situation with which we are now faced? We are faced with a Conservative party that now comes forward with an amendment which it hopes will bail it out of the difficulties it has been in ever since this resolution was introduced. This is what they say in effect, and I think I can quote almost literally the words of the Leader of the Opposition. They say in the first place: "When this bill was introduced we were against it; we believed in private ownership; we believed that someone else should build this pipe line except this particular group, and we will try to prove it before a committee of this house".

Mr. Drew: You are so far from the truth that there is no use in challenging you.

Mr. Harris: I am repeating almost literally what the Leader of the Opposition has said. But he left the door open for himself and that door was this. He said, "But if by any chance the government is able to bring this bill forward and put it through, then I am ready to jump over into another position on the last night but one before it happens". What is that position? The position is that perhaps—and just perhaps—it will be public ownership. We have been through that in this house already. When this debate began we made it abundantly clear that we thought this was the only way of getting this pipe line started this year; and no one, not a single person, in the opposition in three weeks has been able to refute that statement in this parliament.

What then is the situation today? We are approaching a deadline. It is a deadline which means what? It means that if it is met, it is just possible that with the winter coming on my friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre may have gas delivered in Winnipeg before then.

Mr. Drew: And your friends in the United States will be happy.

Mr. Harris: It may well be that if we had followed the course suggested by the leader of the Conservative party we would be sitting in the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines or whatever committee it may be, consulting all kinds of people who have had no connection whatever with the province of Alberta with respect to natural gas, and we would have ended up at this time with a group of people who had yet to go to the province of Alberta and get from them an agreement to export gas out of that province. Those are the facts of life. I wonder why hon. members try to avoid them. As I said before, this government is not in a position to dictate to the province of Alberta anything whatever about the natural gas of that province.

Mr. Hees: Just to parliament.

Mr. Harris: The Leader of the Opposition has boasted a little bit about what he has done in northern Ontario with respect to the development of natural resources there; and when he was not doing it, the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) was doing it for him. What did the Leader of the Opposition do?

Mr. Hodgson: He gave you fellows an awful trimming.

Mr. Harris: What he did was to permit the exploitation of natural resources in northern Ontario under certain conditions which he no doubt laid down. Upon those conditions being met, certain royalties, stumpage dues and the like accrued to the benefit of the province of Ontario, and everyone was happy. But the Leader of the Opposition must understand that this is the precise position we are in with respect to the province of Alberta, with government control of natural gas that comes out of the ground. Every word he has used throughout this whole debate has been designed to confuse that issue in the minds of the Canadian people.

Mr. Drew: Nonsense.

Mr. Harris: The Leader of the Opposition says "nonsense". Mr. Speaker, I say again when we build a pipe line, have we any control over the natural gas that comes out of the ground of Alberta? We have no control whatever. The province of Alberta has complete control of it. Only in so far as they sell it to some agency for export do we come into the picture. When my hon. friend speaks as he does, and when the leader of the C.C.F. also speaks as he does, they seem to think that we have control over that natural gas and that we can dictate to the premier of the province of Alberta what he will do about it.

Mr. Coldwell: They want to sell the gas. We want to buy it. A crown company could do it just as well as a private company.

Mr. Harris: Oh, no.

Mr. Coldwell: Read the British North America Act.

Mr. Harris: The alliance will break up if you suggest that this government should buy natural gas which comes out of the ground of Alberta. Two weeks ago I pointed out that the premier of the province of Ontario said he did not want to distribute through the Ontario hydro the natural gas which came there.

Mr: Coldwell: He could set up a company of his own.

Mr. Harris: He does not want to do that. He wants it to be a private company and only to be public ownership by alternative.

The hon. member for Saint John-Albert, possibly the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich and possibly my friend the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam are the only members in this house who have questioned the desirability of building this pipe line. All the other discussion has been because hon. members opposite seem to think they can do the thing better than we can. But, Mr. Speaker, so far they have not been able to demonstrate it to anybody in this country. It seems to me that if we could get back to a consideration of what we are trying to do, this parliament could settle down, as it should have settled down, and we should not have had the scenes which we have had recently.

I am going to say something that is rather difficult for me to say under the circumstances. Both the Leader of the Opposition and the leader of the C.C.F. this afternoon said that all of us ought to regret what has happened, particularly what happened on Friday. I am going to agree with both of them. However, I hope that in expressing agreement in that sense I am not to be taken as having accepted any responsibility for it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Oh, you hypocrite.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Now we have sanctimoniousness.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fleming: What did you say about the word "sanctimonious"?

Mr. Harris: A week ago Thursday night I did what no other member who has spoken in this debate has done. I rose in my place and appealed to the followers on this side of the house to remain in a condition which would not excite any feelings in this house, and from that day to this they have done so.

An hon. Member: They did not pay any attention to you.

Mr. Harris: No other party has done so.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: That is a ghastly untruth.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

An hon. Member: How sanctimonious can you get?

Mr. Harris: I have read Hansard with great attention.

An hon. Member: Read the papers for a change.

Mr. Harris: I am prepared to accept responsibility for what I have said. I am going to say to my hon. friends opposite that except for the singing—and I say "except"—that went on here after the division bells began to ring on Friday, I want my hon. friends to try to show me wherein anyone on this side of the house has been the slightest bit disorderly.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: A travesty of the facts!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think perhaps we might return to third reading of this Bill No. 298.

Mr. Knowles: Is the minister aware of the fact that this afternoon he and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration both turned around and tried to shush their members in the display they were making at that time?

Mr. Harris: I am quite aware of that, but I want to point out that what we did this afternoon was merely to stop the continuation of the normal applause which goes on. We were trying to save time. On that point I am going to say to my hon. friend that throughout this debate there have been a good many people on this side who would like to have taken part. But let us be perfectly frank about it. When this government imposed closure we knew, as we had been warned by members of the Tory party and the C.C.F. party, that we would have every possible obstacle put in our way to prevent closure, and time was always running against us every day.

Mr. Rowe: After five months or five years.

Mr. Harris: It is for that reason speakers on this side have not taken nearly as much part in this debate as they might otherwise have done. If it is the contention of my hon. friend that we were doing the Christian act of turning the other cheek, I can assure him we were. We were making absolutely sure that closure was operative because we believed, and so far no one has been able to shake that confidence, it was in the interests of the Canadian people that this pipe line get started this summer. It does seem, as a matter of fact, to have been the deliberate attempt of the two parties opposite to prevent that very beneficent act.

Mr. Rowe: You read the Winnipeg Free Press and the Toronto Star and you are afraid to speak.

Mr. Harris: I am not afraid to speak on anything in this house. My hon. friend knows that, because one of these days we are going to have a little contest. During an election the hon. member always makes a point of coming over to my constituency. He comes to my riding and makes a speech, and it has always been a difficult one to make because everyone up in my part of the country—

Mr. Hees: Just loves Walter.

Mr. Harris: —remembers—

Mr. Hees: Everybody loves Little Lord Fauntleroy.

Mr. Harris: —and wants to know how the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), who is the only remaining member for the R. B. Bennett government, can ask for support for his party when the last time that party was in office the price of agricultural products in that part of the country was about three or four cents a pound and today it is over 20 cents.

Mr. Rowe: Tell us about the days when you would not give the Tories a five-cent piece.

Mr. Harris: In the course of the discussion the other night the hon. member spoke about this terrible example of closure. He carefully avoided making one reference I thought he might make. I do not want to embarrass him but I am going to ask him now, did he vote in the division on that particular form of closure at that time?

Mr. Rowe: If you will sit down, I will explain it.

Mr. Harris: Yes or no?

Mr. Rowe: Yes; Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has asked me a question.

Mr. Harris: Did you vote?

Mr. Rowe: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member has asked me. The reason I voted for it was that for 21 days your party had refused to give a five-cent piece to a Tory province even if the people were starving, and we voted for closure. It was an entirely different situation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Harris: Here is a man, Mr. Speaker, who as a private member in 1932 voted in a division to support closure which he now says is out of order, and although he was a member of that government at a later time, is now saying they did this wrong at that time.

Mr. Rowe: On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker; I have never said closure was out of order in this house. Closure is in order, but it was placed out of order on this occasion.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Rowe: I have never at any time said that closure as such was out of order. It is something that could be resorted to, but the difference between the closure I voted for and the closure you and your sidekicks imposed was that we debated for 21 days on the first item and you did not take 21 seconds to put it in when you brought in the resolution.

Mr. Harris: I hope, Mr. Speaker, that it will be borne in mind that I only have about two minutes left at this moment, though I think I shall have a carryover until tomorrow. Let me point out to my hon. friend there is no particular difference between 21 days of debate which builds up to a filibuster, and responsible members of opposition parties saying even before a debate began, that they were going to filibuster this bill if they could.

The leader of the C.C.F. party is trying to suggest that they did not do that. Do you know, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Coldwell: No, I did not say that. I said it showed how scared you were.

Mr. Harris: I thought he was going to deny it. In this whole debate as I recall it, and I may be wrong, the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) who made that threat, has never spoken and, he will excuse me if I say it now, he has been out of the house a lot of the time.

Mr. Coldwell: He is like the Minister of Agriculture; he is engaged elsewhere.

Mr. Harris: I do sincerely hope that what has been said by both hon. members who have spoken before me, and the recognition that it is likely this bill will receive third reading some time in the next few days, will remove a great many of the difficulties under which we have laboured.

Now, I heartily agree with all that has been said today. I sincerely hope we can get back to our old standard of conduct, and I will join with both members opposite in saying that I understand, under the circumstances, how strongly they may feel about the conditions attendant on this bill. But do not let them forget that we on this side have feelings in the same way. We feel that the bill is a good one. We do not feel that it is as bad as they make out. We feel strongly that it ought to go forward.

If I have any time tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, I shall explain my final reason.

On motion of Mr. Harris the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: We shall continue with this debate tomorrow. May I just interrupt for one moment to remind hon. members of the pleasure that will be accorded us in receiving the President of the Republic of Indonesia tomorrow morning at 10.20. I am only saying this in order that hon. members, who may perhaps have forgotten it, will be reminded that if they wish to participate they should be here a little before 10.20.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, June 5, 1956

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1956-57

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting supplementary estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1957, was presented by Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance) and read by Mr. Speaker to the house.

HIS EXCELLENCY DR. SUKARNO

INCLUSION OF ADDRESS TO BOTH HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT IN PROCEEDINGS OF TODAY

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I beg to move, seconded by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew):

That the address of His Excellency Dr. Sukarno, President of the Republic of Indonesia, delivered before the members of the Senate and the House of Commons of Canada on June 5, 1956, together with introductory and related speeches, be included in the House of Commons Debates and form part of the permanent records of this parliament.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING ORDERS

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. J. H. Harrison (Meadow Lake) moved:

That the second report of the standing committee on standing orders, presented to the house on May 28, be concurred in.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I wonder whether the hon. member would explain to us the intent and purport of this report, concurrence in which he has just moved. If it relates to matters having to do with exemption from the standing orders of the house because of the late presentation of petitions and so on, I think we should know what it involves, what petitions have been presented and what bills are affected by the motion, and what would be the result to the bills if the motion is allowed to carry, and I think indeed that the hon. gentleman should explain his motion.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): I move that we proceed to the orders of the day.

Mr. Fulton: I am still on my feet. I have not yet given up the floor.

Mr. Harris: I thought you had; I am sorry.

Mr. Fulton: I thought the hon. member for Meadow Lake was about to explain the meaning of his motion so the house might be properly seized of it. If the hon. gentleman does not intend to do that, I move the adjournment of the debate.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Fulton) which was negatived on the following division:

Lennard

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Speaker, I did not vote. My pair was absent from this house. I was paired with democracy.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am told that I have about six minutes left, and I do not suppose I shall take all of it because I intend to avoid the pleasantries in which we engaged last evening. At the conclusion of my remarks at that time I said there was one final reason I wanted to give why this bill ought to be passed. That reason is one which arose earlier in the debate and was referred to by the Leader of the Opposition the other evening.

In the course of arguing that it was possible that pipe could be obtained elsewhere than through the particular means we have in mind in this bill, the Leader of the Opposition said that the demand for steel—I think I am quoting him fairly accurately—had fallen off so noticeably in the United States in the past few months that there would be a supply of steel available for the production of pipe at this time. Without engaging in a dispute with respect to whether that conclusion is right, let me point out that there has been a marked decline, as he said, in the sale of motor cars in the United States, which is a quite considerable part of the steel market. Nevertheless, as my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce pointed out, it still is not possible to get steel, as he said, for these particular purposes.

[Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East).]

But there is some consideration being given by thoughtful people, and I include everyone in that, as to whether or not it may be possible that the decline in the demand for motor cars in the United States may lead to a further decline in the demand for other goods, and that there is a possibility—I shall not say for a moment whether or not I share it—that this could lead to a decline in business activity such as we had in the late months of 1953 and early 1954. If that were true; if that should be the result, and bearing in mind that with one exception this country has for obvious reasons always followed some months after the swing in business activity in the United States, I suggest that it would be wholly desirable to get on with this job to make sure there is employment against the possibility that there might be a decline in other demands.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: How about buying Canadian pipe?

Mr. Harris: On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, should it be the case that we would not be facing difficulties of that kind, then I suggest that instead of a decline we would have an increasing demand for employment, we would have an increasing demand for fuel and energy, and for that reason the sooner we get natural gas to the industrial markets of the east the better in order to supply that demand.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rowe: You could blow either hot or cold through that pipe line.

Mr. Harris: My concluding remark will be that in either event we feel that we are right in urging that the pipe line be begun this summer and not on another occasion.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: May I point out to the hon. member for Eglinton that no one from the Social Credit party has had a single word to say yet.

Mr. Fleming: Last night, Mr. Speaker, you know they gave their place to the Minister of Finance so he would have 40 minutes, and that was done deliberately. The Social Credit group had their opportunity to take their place last night, and they gave up their turn to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member be good enough to resume his seat for one second, because if he will I am sure we can clear the air on this particular point. The hon. member for Eglinton rose and the hon. member for Peace River rose as well. Two members cannot be on their feet while a debate goes on; that is certain. I have pointed out that according to the book here no member of the Social Credit party has spoken yet. However, it strikes me that if I weigh the pros and cons it would seem that at this moment the hon. member for Eglinton should have the floor, following which I will see the hon. member for Peace River.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, we are approaching the final stage in a momentous but sad debate. We in the opposition, make no mistake about it, will fight to the end, to the last minute of debate. As long as we are permitted to raise our voices in this house they will be raised in denunciation of this measure and of the tactics the government have employed in pursuing their success. We arrive at this point thanks to a succession of eight closure motions on the part of the government—eight of them! Altogether in Canada's history before this time there have been but six. We have now witnessed eight closure motions in the last 16 days, and last week we saw a point reached where the government did something that Right Hon. Arthur Meighen years ago said would be done only by an "insane and vicious" government. This government has abundantly deserved that prophetic description.

We have seen the government resort to measures that were denounced by Laurier and King as torpedoing parliament, reducing parliament to a travesty; and yet the decadent successors of Laurier and King have imposed this measure eight times in 16 days. Yes, and yesterday the Prime Minister, in moving third reading of the measure, reached surely the high point in arrogance when he said in effect, and indeed in words, that in his opinion no debate was required at this stage, and said also yesterday that there is in effect no right on the part of members to speak in this house on points of order or questions of privilege.

Well, sir, debate is required on this measure, a great deal of debate that has been denied by the arbitrary decision of the majority led by the government. But while debate may be stifled here in this chamber, believe me, sir, the debate before the people of Canada will not end tonight. I would, sir, that I had as much time as the Minister of Finance had last night and today to talk about the points he sought to make in his speech. He has resorted to the most fantastic aggregation of points that have no bearing, no validity, no weight that I am sure any member of this house in all his ingenuity could devise.

We have seen here an astronomical perversion of the truth. Sir, by the time this debate is over and the government members have spoken there will not be even breath left in the bleeding and mangled body of truth. However, I do appreciate one thing the Minister of Finance said last night when, in deriding the allegations that there had been a gag, he said that I had spoken more than 20 times in total in the various stages of debate. At least I thank him for making that kind of correction of the astronomical perversion of the facts in which the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) engaged, as found at page 4603 of Hansard.

The fact is that some of us have been expected to take part in the discussion on numerous points of order that have been raised from time to time in this debate. Rather than speaking 20 times, I have spoken about five times. Thanks to the government's closure I had only 20 minutes on the resolution stage. Thanks to their closure I had no opportunity to speak on second reading. On clause 1 in committee I raised one question of order and supported another. On clause 3 I spoke to a point of order. On June 1 I spoke to a point of order. That is all. That is the sort of thing the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) seizes upon and tries to make the people of Canada believe, but no one in this house is going to be misled by talk of that kind. He puts it on the record and hopes the people of Canada are going to be misled by that kind of nonsense.

The Prime Minister said yesterday that there was no cause for debate, that the bill came out of committee in the same form in which it went in. Yes; but why? Because the right to discuss, the right to introduce amendments was denied by the arbitrary course of action taken by the government. That is the only reason, Mr. Speaker. I had an envelope full of amendments to introduce on practically every section of the bill, but there was no permission given by this arbitrary majority, who care nothing for the rights of parliament or the rights of members of parliament.

But, Mr. Speaker, one thing is abundantly clear to the people of Canada as a result of this debate, and that is that the country has a one-man rule. It is not the Prime Minister. Everybody knows that. It is the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He is the one-man ruler of Canada.

Mr. Fulton: See him smiling.

Mr. Fleming: Yes, Mr. Speaker; that is the situation. The Prime Minister is not the ruler of Canada. He is just a weak man who has proven himself, in this debate as on other occasions, to be just putty in the hands of the strong man, the one-man ruler of Canada. Where are all these other members of the government? Not one of them has stood up here. Every one of them has bowed the knee to Baal.

Mr. Harris: Nonsense.

Mr. Fleming: Even the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) has bowed. There is not one who has stood up to the strong man, the one-man ruler of this country.

Mr. Harris: Nonsense.

Mr. Fleming: Well and truly did Queen Eleanor, widow of Henry II of England, say, "Of all the passions, lust for power is the most enduring". We have seen abundant evidence of that fact here, Mr. Speaker.

Some day there may be an opportunity—and for the sake of democracy let us hope that it will come very soon—to lay before the people of Canada the information that has been withheld from them, to expose what has been going on behind the scenes in recent months, to give to the people that information which has not only been denied by the government to the House of Commons but has been denied by the ministers to one another. We have seen the Minister of Trade and Commerce denying even to the Prime Minister information that any responsible minister would have felt it necessary to share with the Prime Minister. Mr. Speaker, it may be simply the old Boston influence. You see, apparently only some cabinet ministers are entitled to information.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Oh, quote the facts.

Mr. Fleming: It is an example of the old verse written by John Collins Bossidy:

> And this is good old Boston,
> The home of the bean and the cod,
> Where the Lowells talk to Cabots
> And the Cabots talk only to God.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): If my hon. friend wants to go back 48 years in order to declare me to be a second-class citizen—

Mr. Fleming: Nonsense.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Rowe: Nobody ever called you a second-class citizen.

Mr. Knowles: There is nothing wrong with the people of Boston.

Mr. Fleming: Not a word was said about second-class citizens.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member be good enough to address the Chair? Would other hon. members be kind enough to listen to the member who has the floor and not interrupt him without his consent?

Mr. Fleming: This is the second time the Minister of Trade and Commerce has repeated that false accusation in the course of this debate. I did not say that he or any other person born outside of Canada was a second-class citizen.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Why keep referring to it, then?

Mr. Fleming: Because I think there is something in the minister's mentality that is not to be harmonized with any sense of responsibility to Canada. It was not the minister's birth, but it is something in his upbringing and his mentality.

Mr. Winters: You are alone in thinking that.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I shall remember that remark.

Mr. Fleming: You will remember what?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I shall remember your remark.

Mr. Fleming: I hope you will. I shall make a few more remarks this afternoon that I hope you will remember, even if you are a one-man ruler.

Mr. Knowles: Address the Chair.

Mr. Fleming: On this matter of pipe lines, Mr. Speaker, let me make the position abundantly clear again. We have done so before, but for the record I repeat that we in this party have supported the construction of the pipe line from Alberta to eastern Canada. We were the first party to support the construction of that line by an all-Canadian route. Indeed it took us two years to convert the Minister of Trade and Commerce and persuade him to accept the idea of an all-Canadian route.

The franchise was given to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines on two promises, first, that they could finance the construction without government aid, and, second, that they would build into eastern Canada and deliver gas there before delivering it into the United States. That later was modified to make it simultaneous. However, the basis was that they were not to put gas into the United States before they put it into eastern Canada.

Here we are in 1956. What of their performance? Not one inch of pipe has been laid. The company says it has no finances with which to construct the line. Yes, these companies backing this Trans-Canada Pipe Lines company, which have billions of dollars of assets, say they cannot finance this construction. These people cannot or will not build the easiest portion of the line across the prairies. Theirs is a record of default. That default has been overlooked and forgiven by the government. How forgiving they have been! When I asked the Prime Minister last week what would happen if and when default occurs next April, he could not tell me what the government would do. In the light of their record I think they can be expected to overlook that default also.

Mr. Speaker, here is a government which, in the face of default, has taken no action. Has it thrown open to others the opportunity to come in and bid on a project of this kind, and show what they were prepared to do? No; the Minister of Trade and Commerce, with his big stick, has frightened off all others. The government three months ago decided to relieve this company of the burden of constructing the 675-mile line across northern Ontario from the Manitoba boundary to Kapuskasing. As if that were not enough, they are now going to finance the construction of the easiest leg of the line.

There we have this hybrid scheme, part public ownership. In fact all that is to be done is to be done by public assistance. We will have two portions which will not be connected, and we have no assurance that they will be connected or that a line will be constructed from Kapuskasing to the market in eastern Canada. Now the money to build that line in western Canada is to be taken from the crown corporation that was to build the line in northern Ontario, thereby depriving that corporation, to the extent of $80 million, of the capital needed for construction in northern Ontario, and thus delaying it. Let some of the hon. members from northern Ontario stand up and acknowledge that fact before their constituents. Yes; that is true.

For whom does the government of Canada turn somersaults and produce these favors? A company that is owned and controlled 83 per cent by United States capital, not by small United States investors, but by big interests quite capable of looking after themselves; and all through the piece Canadians have been driven off. We do not know how many others would have come forward if they had not been afraid of the big stick of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Speaker, the government tries to defend this as an example of free enterprise. What free enterprise is left in this Trans-Canada Pipe Line? This rugged mileage in northern Ontario is to be built by a crown corporation at the expense of all the taxpayers of Canada. The easiest part of the line, in western Canada, is to be built to the extent of $80 million, at the expense of the people of Canada. That is not my idea of free enterprise at all. It is public aid; and they are going to scoop the treasury. Now we have it made perfectly plain that the Minister of Finance is going to be there to help them do the scooping.

This has been put forward also as an example of United States investment. We heard that shockingly misleading speech by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras) about 10 days ago when he said, without any facts to justify the statement, that the Conservatives were against United States investment in Canada. There was no greater distortion of the truth in this debate than that statement. What is a distortion is to picture this as an example of United States investment. It is not United States investment in this corporation. It is an example of United States control without United States investment. It is an example of United States profit without United States investment.

How did this come to be recommended to the house? This government have so little confidence in the merits of this measure they did not leave it to free debate. They stuff this measure down the throat of this parliament. Merit, yes; what a mongrel scheme! It is neither flesh nor fowl nor good red herring. Where is the urgency after five years of delay, for which this government shares responsibility with the Texas promoters of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines? There was an attempt by my leader on January 12 to send this to a committee. It was ignored by the Prime Minister then, and on later occasions when the proposal was made. On March 15 there was a proposal made by the Leader of the Opposition but it was ignored by the government. Now, because a deadline has been imposed by the Texas promoters, not only does the government knuckle down to them on the demand of the one-man ruler of Canada, but they expect this sovereign parliament of Canada to throw its responsibilities to the winds and knuckle down to these United States promoters.

Well sir, something prophetic happened in this house a few evenings ago during a vote on a closure motion, which may have escaped the notice of hon. members because they could not see. When the vote was being taken on one of these closure motions the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who sits directly across from me, was reading one of these paper-backed novels, and its title was "Texas Spurs". Believe me, Texas spurs have been driven into Canada to satisfy the ambition of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Where is the rule of law? The rule of law in this house has been destroyed. What is the sense of talking about the rights of minorities in Canada if the rights of the minority of this House of Commons are to be torn to shreds and destroyed by that oligarchy opposite.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the hon. member for Eglinton—

Mr. Fleming: I will tell you what explains this phenomenon. It could not be explained otherwise in a country that cherishes democracy even when this government has betrayed it. There are three instances that will explain what has happened. The first occurred in 1911, a great year in Canadian history. The Conservatives in that year in this House of Commons blocked the reciprocity bill by a prolonged discussion. This government did not want a repetition of 1911. They did not want prolonged discussion even on a measure as important as anything that has come before this House of Commons since 1911.

Then in 1955 there was the debate on the iniquitous demand of the government for a continuance of the absolute powers contained in the Defence Production Act. We defeated that iniquitous demand for absolute powers because we were able to keep this debate going long enough to arouse the country. When the country saw the issue at stake, its response was clear and definite and the Prime Minister had to capitulate. It is a repetition of that which this government is seeking to avoid now by the application of this iniquitous closure.

From that time to this, the defeat inflicted by democracy and the working of parliamentary methods upon the Minister of Trade and Commerce has rankled with him, and he has been looking for the first opportunity to settle accounts with the Canadian House of Commons. He is doing it now because the government has kowtowed to him, as have all hon. members opposite.

Finally there is a third explanation. You can find it associated with the one-man ruler in that speech he made at the opening of this session, when he called upon Liberal members in this house and the other place to toe the party line. This is the man who said, "If we wanted to get away with it, who would stop us?" Well, the majority could have, but they submitted weakly. I apply those words of Shakespeare, "O calm, dishonourable, vile submission!"

There is nothing more favourable to be said for the Social Credit group in this house. They have been the willing accomplices of the government all the way through. There have been to date in this debate 60 divisions, and the Social Credit group has been with the government on 59 of those. Of the eight closure motions to stifle debate and deprive members of this house of their democratic rights, to prevent them from discharging their responsibilities, the Social Credit group has voted with the government on all but the very first. Their batting average is something over 98 per cent with the government on this issue. I say they have forfeited all claim to understand and defend the freedom of parliament.

I have said before that this government has no mandate to do what it is doing. In the face of the pretext the Prime Minister has given the house for not taking this issue to the sovereign electorate of Canada, I say that the real reason and the only reason that prevents the people of Canada today from having the opportunity of passing on this issue that is their right is cowardice on the part of the government, moral cowardice. This parliament has been discredited by all that has happened. All sense of respect on the part of the people of Canada has gone. It has been destroyed by the actions of this government.

Sir, our policy was explained in full detail last night by my leader. In the amendment he has put before the house, we asked for consideration of this matter at various stages. I understand that I have just two minutes left. We are now in the very final stage of the situation in which the government has put us, the third reading. Only a few hours of debate remain. We have been deprived of the opportunity we should have had in the interests of all the people of Canada to put this issue before the searching inquiry of a committee of the house, and to give others an opportunity to put forward their proposals. Well, sir, it seems now we are narrowed down to a choice between two courses, the government's iniquitous proposal to hand over to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited great sums of public money to help them out and public construction of the entire line. We choose the latter.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am extremely sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I am obliged to advise him his time is up.

Mr. Fleming: May I just say this?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Fleming: There is this quotation:

> None have gone about to break parliaments but in the end parliaments have broken them.

Those are the words of Sir John Elliott in 1628, during the impeachment of the Duke of Buckingham. Let the government take due warning.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend who just finished speaking, and who hung on like a puppy to a root to the last word, reminded me very much of the minister's sermon. The caretaker found the notes on the pulpit after the minister had left. He discovered, as he went down the side of the pages, little notes saying, "Gesture here", "Pause here", "Wink here", and then at a certain point he read, "Case weak, yell like hell".

My hon. friend's speech this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, was just as phony as any speech he has made and every speech he has made in the course of this debate. There is a certain ring of truth when a person is presenting the truth. One does not have to raise the roof to get over that sense of truth. My hon. friend tries to wrap himself in an aura of righteousness. Everybody is wrong but him. Everybody has been presenting untruths but him. My hon. friend has been presenting untruths for so long he does not recognize one when he hears it, and he does not recognize the truth when he hears it. Like his leader he keeps repeating certain untruths until by repetition they become truths.

I want to say a word now about the amendment moved by the official opposition. I could best sum it up by reading into the record a very short poem by the poet laureate of one of the opposition parties in this house. It is entitled, "How do you Drew?" It reads:

He wobbled right
He wobbled left
He wobbled in the middle
And in between he huffed and puffed
With lots of wind and piddle
But in the end he made the bend
Without a serious schism
And ended up (who would have thought?)
With Tory socialism!

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is because the amendment is nothing but Tory socialism that we will not vote for it. We shall vote against it.

I would like to take just a minute to say something about the character of the speech of the hon. member for Eglinton. Just one more thing; I do not intend to read a long editorial into the record, Mr. Speaker. I think that is wrong.

Mr. Ellis: You could not find one.

Mr. Low: I could find one; I have one in my hand right now, a good one, one that it would do my hon. friend a good deal of good to read. This is from the Regina Post, and is headed:

A Sad Show for a Once Great Party

I want to quote only one point because it is so typical of the kind of debate to which we have listened here in the last three weeks:

The violence of personal attacks; the run of nasty, snide remarks as to other people's integrity; the spleen of frustration that is father to the theatrical attempts at martyrdom; all those are things designed to nauseate the Canadian, to make him thoroughly ashamed.

That has been typical of the debate, unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, and we ought to be ashamed of it. I am satisfied that as the days go by and those who have carried on the debate in that fashion think about it, they will be ashamed of it.

I would like to say something at this time to indicate why we support third reading of the pipe-line bill. At the same time I would like to reply to a few statements that have been made in the course of the debate that are entirely untrue. May I begin by saying that we have not looked upon this bill as a perfect one by any means. We realize that it has its imperfections. Nor have we felt at any time that the way the government has handled the whole matter has been without error. We have criticized the government for the long time it has taken to come to grips with the urgent need for providing a market for surplus natural gas from our province, the province of Alberta. Only the federal government can do it because a market has to be sought outside of our own boundaries, and the federal government is the only body that can deal with this important source of energy. But when the government finally came to grips with the matter and took action to provide a market for our gas, we welcomed that action and supported it consistently right from the beginning.

My hon. friend says that we voted for the government 59 times out of 60. I have not counted them—perhaps he is right—but I am not ashamed of that for one moment, Mr. Speaker. We supported the government those 59 times because we thought they were doing something in the interests of this whole country. Not only that, Mr. Speaker; we did so because we are fully aware of what happened in some other countries when the minorities, through blocking tactics and other means, destroyed democracy, and we are attempting in our way to be consistent in our support of true democratic government.

Mr. Fleming: You did not think so last year.

Mr. Low: We say that the bill before the house for third reading may not be perfect; it may not represent the best plan for providing a satisfactory market, but it is a good bill and it does provide a pipe line into which we can turn the gas that is now going to waste, and we shall vote for third reading of the bill for these reasons.

In the first place, Mr. Speaker, we decry waste of any kind, and especially waste of a valuable product of our resources. At the present time, and for a long time, there has been great waste of this valuable fuel in Alberta owing to the fact that it is the lifting power for oil. In our efforts to produce oil to try to make Canada as self-sufficient as we can we have had to bring gas to the surface for which we can find no use, at least for some of it. There is, and will be, a greater waste as the days go by if we attempt to increase the production of oil, try to step it up. We do not want to see that. When a pipe line is built the waste can very largely be stopped and oil production can be stepped up without wasting the gas. That is one of the great reasons why there is urgency for the provision of a pipe line.

The second important reason why we support the pipe-line bill is that we are anxious to see our country's economy strengthened by the widest possible development of our resources. We have in Alberta huge gas reserves. Indeed, we are on the verge of very large further exploration programs that will undoubtedly result in the discovery of more reserves, and if we can find a market for the gas soon there is no doubt in my mind that we shall be able to increase the visible reserves by not less than a trillion feet a year for the next 10 or 15 years, and that means money in circulation; it means a stabilizing influence on our economy; it means more employment, and it will strengthen the economy of the whole of Canada.

It also means, Mr. Speaker, the development of a petrochemical industry in our province. It is not generally recognized that we do not just take the natural gas out of the ground, turn it into a pipe line and send it to a market in the east or in the United States. What is done is to put it through a separation plant and take out of it everything but the methane. It is only methane that goes into the pipe line. Butane, propane, sulphur and all these other things are taken out of it. They are left in the province and there they contribute to the development of a petrochemical industry. There is a $100 million industry waiting to get under way that cannot get under way until we find sufficient markets for the methane to make it possible for us to produce the by-products, to separate them from the gas and use them in a petrochemical industry in the province.

Is it not conceivable, therefore, and is it not a point of logic, to say that with a pipe line supplying the gas to a satisfactory market in eastern Canada and in the United States we would be able to strengthen the economy of Canada greatly through the development of a petrochemical industry in the province of Alberta? For years we have been short of sulphur; for years we have been on the verge of having to shut down a good many of our paper plants because of the fact that we did not have enough sulphur. It looks to me as though we ought to be doing everything we possibly can to increase the production of that very valuable chemical and see that it is made available to our Canadian industry. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, those are important things to keep in mind.

Not only that, but the minister and others have already pointed out that there are serious fuel shortages expected in certain provinces of Canada. Manitoba is one of them. They experienced a serious shortage last year, and they expect one this year unless something is done to provide them with a supply of gas. There is a shortage in Ontario. Something has to be done here. If we can get the pipe line built and gas coming into northern Ontario it will give a tremendous impetus to resources development in the northern part of this province, that simply cannot go on unless they get this source of fuel.

Another important point that ought to be kept in mind, Mr. Speaker, is that the sooner we can get the gas through the pipe line and into the markets of eastern Canada and the United States the sooner will it be possible for us to begin a substantial saving of United States dollars that now go to buy United States fuel to be brought in to this country. That in itself is of tremendous value to us, and helps every part of our economy. That argument should appeal especially to the logical mind because of the very serious imbalance of trade we have with the United States today. Every single dollar we can save helps us that much. Every dollar's worth of gas we can export into that country will help to close the imbalance by that much.

We are not afraid, Mr. Speaker, that our natural gas resources will fall under the control of United States buccaneers, as they have so often been called. Let me point out once again what both the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Finance have so well said before. I should not have to say it at all, but it appears we have just to keep repeating these things to drive them home to some people who do not want to see the truth.

The fact is that this gas does not belong to the federal government at all. That gas belongs to the people of the province of Alberta. That gas could be brought out of the ground and used internally in Alberta without the consent of this government and without asking for any help at all.

The people of the province of Alberta have set up a natural gas conservation board which has complete control of the supply of gas and the allocation of that gas anywhere within or without the province. When I say "without the province" I refer to export.

That board can close off the supply of gas it they feel that control is being taken away from us by some other country. I have had sufficient experience with the natural gas conservation board to be able to stand here and on my responsibility assert that they will never allow that important resource to come under the control of any United States buccaneers or anybody else outside Canada. My hon. friends ought to know that.

The Leader of the Opposition, for whom I have high regard, has repeated time and again during this debate—I should not dignify it by calling it a debate; during the discussion of this bill and the agreement with Trans-Canada Pipe Lines—the statement that we are wantonly transferring control of valued resources to a company 83 per cent of which is owned in the United States. That is not so, and no one can bring detailed evidence to prove that it is so.

Let me quickly assert the facts connected with it, and I am sure my hon. friend will recognize the truth of what I say. The partners in this venture, that is the partners in its beginning, in its organization, are Canadian Gulf, which owns vast resources of gas in the province of Alberta and which is owned by British American, a fairly large portion of which is held by Canadian shareholders. Then there is Canadian Delhi, and there are a large group of Canadian shareholders in that company. There is Tennessee Gas and Canadian Hudson Bay, a large portion of which is held in Canada.

Those who have fully investigated this matter assert that not less than 25 per cent of the equity capital already provided is owned by Canadians. I am talking about the equity capital which is the capital put up by the partners for the purpose of getting the company organized and under way and upon which the financing of the future is based. That is the only part of it about which it can truthfully be said the majority is held in the United States.

When financing is completed we hope that fully 60 per cent or more of the company will be Canadian-owned. Let me tell you that the Canadian people will have that opportunity; if they have venture in their souls, if they want to risk some capital they will have a chance to own and control 60 per cent or more of this company. If they do not take advantage of it that will be the fault of the Canadian people themselves. Notwithstanding anything the opposition has said, it is not true to say that the company is owned 83 per cent by Americans.

I see my time is about up, and in closing I want to say just one word about something which has been bandied about, especially by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart). The hon. member spoke at a rally in Toronto on Saturday which was referred to by the Gazette of Monday, June 4 as follows:

> Mr. Stewart said Friday's chaos in the House of Commons was "nothing" to what will happen there tomorrow.

My hon. friend has never been known for the temperate way in which he expresses himself. My hon. friend is very likely to incite to violent debate or violent anything. I submit that his remarks sometimes could well be set down as inciting to violence. According to this report the hon. member went on to say:

> Premier Manning, of Alberta, who refused to sell gas to a government-owned pipe line "is soaked in infamy".

I defy the hon. member for Winnipeg North to bring one shred of evidence to show that Mr. Manning ever said at any time or indicated that he or his government would not sell gas to a government-owned pipe line. Let him bring on his evidence, and if he does not the people of this country are going to brand him for what he is. It is unfortunate that such things as that are bandied about, especially on a public platform where there is no representative from Alberta to deny it or to set the thing right. He will not make that statement in this house.

This is the same man who says we are giving away a very important resource to United States buccaneers. This is the same man who has been the chief proponent in this assembly of a world government. This is the man who has advocated that Canada should part with her sovereignty and give over control of everything to a supranational government. I say to you that it is about time that he tried to be just a little consistent. I do not mind him standing up in Windsor, Ontario, and saying that Social Crediters have yellow streaks down their backs a mile wide. If the hon. gentleman, big as he is, wants to find out whether we have he will have a good chance any time he wants it.

Let me say just one word further. I listened to the leader of the C.C.F. speak last night. He played to the galleries. That has been the policy of the C.C.F. from the beginning. They have displayed histrionics all through this debate. He said that members of the Social Credit party have been speechless. Let me ask him what he means by speechless.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am obliged to inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation

Mr. Claude Ellis (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, from the very outset of this debate considerable attention has been paid to one issue, perhaps more than to the pipe line itself; I refer to the question of parliamentary rights. I feel that sufficient has been said by hon. members on this side of the house with respect to the government's conduct during this debate, but I should like to make brief reference to the role of the government supporter or backbencher during the course of the pipe-line debate in parliament. I noted an article in the Toronto Telegram of Monday, June 4, entitled "They Let the Boom Down" by Judith Robinson. The first paragraph of this reads:

> Epitaph on a free parliament. The Liberal member for Qu'Appelle, Saskatchewan, was on the first plane out of Ottawa, Saturday morning. Going home for the week end, he said. Back on Monday to vote the pipe line through. He laughed. "No more horsin' around with rules," he said. "We fixed that. Kickin' us around. That's what they were doin' and we'd had enough of it."
> "We don't hafta take it, see?" the Liberal member for Qu'Appelle, Mr. Mang, M.P., said, "and we aren't gonta."
>
> "So we decided we'd let the boom down on them yesterday and that's what we did."
> "We let the boom down and we let it down in a big way. See?"

I think that pretty well typifies the attitude of government supporters, including the "socred" supporters of the government, throughout the course of this debate. They have applauded every motion of closure and have tried to howl down every speaker of the opposition who said anything uncomplimentary about this bill or the way the government was railroading it through parliament.

This particular private member is quite proud of himself because the boom was lowered. I suggest that the hon. member had nothing to do with lowering any boom. The government decided when the boom was going to be lowered. I think the average government backbencher is as ill-informed about what the government proposes to do as any member in the opposition.

It is not only the member for Qu'Appelle who has made certain statements in this house which do not bear very close examination. The hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart), speaking the other day, as recorded on page 4604 of Hansard, had this to say. I draw to your attention that he was referring to a debate on agricultural problems in Canada. He said:

> That is why I am suggesting tonight I only wish that we had used closure before, and I hope we use it more often in the future.

I think that statement offers a warning to the farmers of this country that they may expect any time agriculture is going to be discussed—and I feel certain that the hon. member for Charlotte was typical of the Liberals of this house—he is going to demand and expect that closure be used to choke off any discussion on agriculture. During the course of this session we have had several important debates. I think the great wheat debate earlier in the session was of extreme importance to the welfare of this country, as is, of course, the question of the pipe line. Yet when the government is so unsure of itself and so anxious to hide the details of legislation that it will use closure at every step in order to choke off discussion, then I submit that what the hon. member for Charlotte has said may well be taken as warning. That is why I feel that the battle being put up by the opposition in this house against the government procedure is extremely important for the future of parliament.

There have been other comments, but I do not want to take up the time of the house in referring to them. One of the Toronto members, as recorded on page 4597, used smear tactics. We are more or less accustomed to hearing these from the "socreds", but it is a little distasteful to hear smear tactics coming from the mouths of the so-called Liberals, although this debate has indicated quite clearly that there is not a shred of Liberalism on the other side of the house or they would rebel against the authoritarian measures used by this government to ram the bill through the house.

There has been talk about haste. I have had occasion to look through Hansard for the past few years, looking through the debates on the address and the budget debates and various other debates in parliament. I do not recall any member of the "socred" group demanding that the government get on with the pipe line. I do not recall any Liberal shedding crocodile tears about the wastage of gas in Alberta. I challenge any member of the "socred" group to state when he at any time in the past two years has insisted on the building of this pipe line. They sat by and did nothing until the chosen instrument of both the Manning government and this government had received from the government all they had asked for.

Last summer the Minister of Trade and Commerce went out to Calgary. He and his officials met the representatives of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited. At that time he agreed on behalf of the taxpayers of Canada to build the northern Ontario section of the pipe line. One might have thought then that Trans-Canada Pipe Lines would have been prepared to go ahead with the project. No; they wanted a still bigger hand-out from the taxpayers, and so they stalled around.

We know full well what happened. It was only when the government had not only promised to build a pipe line across northern Ontario but in addition had offered to provide $80 million of the taxpayers' money for their purposes that they suddenly decided they were going to go ahead and start this year on the pipe line. We have been waiting for Trans-Canada Pipe Lines to go ahead for over five years. The "socreds" have been sitting by and doing nothing about it. The government supporters have been sitting by and have not criticized Trans-Canada Pipe Lines. However, as soon as Trans-Canada Pipe Lines feels it has got enough out of the taxpayers of this country so it will go ahead, the Minister of Trade and Commerce says, "This is going to go through by June 7 or else". That is the background behind the distasteful scenes we have witnessed in this house in the past few weeks, and all of it can be laid squarely on the doorstep of this government.

In the course of the debate we have offered alternative proposals. I think the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hahn), stated about a week ago that the premier of Saskatchewan had been silent. I wish to refer him and hon. members who support the government on that side of the house to a copy of the sessional paper brought down on February 21, which contains correspondence between this government and various provincial premiers. At that time the premier of Saskatchewan, in writing to the Prime Minister, pointed out this. I am not going to take the time to read the entire letter. Closure is in effect, and I must move along very quickly:

> Like many other Canadians I am profoundly disturbed at the turn of events in connection with the construction of the trans-Canada gas pipe line. It is becoming increasingly apparent that the control of a vital natural resource is destined to fall into the hands of financial interests outside of Canada. I do not think that the people of Canada will view with equanimity the fact that a function so important to our economic development as the transmission of natural gas will to a considerable extent have been alienated from their control. I am concerned lest posterity charge us with having failed for the want of a bold and imaginative program on natural gas transmission.

He goes on further:

> In repeated public statements I have made it clear that the Saskatchewan government is of the opinion that the trans-Canada pipe line should be a public utility with the government of Canada building the main transmission line and the province involved building the lateral transmission lines. From press statements I gather that your government is opposed to such a policy. I would like to suggest that as an alternative you might sound out the provinces involved to see if they would be prepared to enter into an arrangement with your government for the joint construction and operation of the trans-Canada pipe line.
> Your government has already expressed its willingness to enter into an arrangement with the province of Ontario for the construction of the unprofitable portion of the line which runs through northern Ontario. It would seem to me that having accepted this much responsibility there are sound reasons for proceeding one step further and constructing the entire line as a publicly-owned utility. By doing this the people of Canada would retain control of a vital natural resource and would have power to direct its usage in such a manner as to best advance the interests of the Canadian economy.

That was the letter sent by the premier of Saskatchewan to the Prime Minister of Canada, dated November 29, 1955. The Prime Minister made a reply to that letter, in which he said:

> I wish to acknowledge your letter of November 29, expressing your fears about the private ownership of the trans-Canada gas pipe line and suggesting a conference of representatives of this government and yours and the governments of Ontario, Quebec and Manitoba to create instead some sort of agency owned, financed and controlled by these five governments to establish and operate a gas pipe line from Alberta to Quebec.
> As no doubt you are aware, my colleagues and I have no preference in principle for public ownership rather than private ownership in business and we are prepared to consider in any particular case whether, and to what degree, governmental participation in an enterprise is in the public interest. In this particular case we came to the conclusion that some temporary governmental participation was necessary in the national interest in order to get the project started.

I would draw to your attention that the Prime Minister's concluding paragraph reads as follows:

> This matter will undoubtedly be the subject of discussion early in the next session of our parliament. In these circumstances, I feel it would be improper of me to attempt in correspondence with you to anticipate the substance of that discussion. I have no doubt that the points you raise will come up in the debates in the House of Commons and those speaking for this government will be quite prepared to explain the reasons why a course of action of the type you suggest was not followed.

We have waited for that explanation. I have not heard the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance or any cabinet minister or any private member on the government side or any of the spokesmen of the "Socred" party give any reasons why the Prime Minister refused to entertain this reasonable proposal put forth by the premier of Saskatchewan. The Prime Minister never had the decency to write a letter to the premier of Ontario and the premier of Manitoba. He ignored the proposition completely.

Then the government come before parliament and say that the only way this can be done is through this enormous give-away program to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines. If the Prime Minister had the decency to send a letter to Mr. Frost and to Mr. Campbell, he could find out what they thought about this proposal. of course the government has been trying to suggest that the Ontario government is solidly behind them, and of course we know that is not true. The Minister of National Health and Welfare made a 100 per cent political speech the other night in which he said that Mr. Frost had made the statement and Mr. Porter had made the statement that the Ontario government was 100 per cent behind the federal government's proposal, but I note that a statement by Premier Frost to the conference held in the King Edward hotel last Saturday, as reported in the Toronto Telegram of June 2, was as follows:

> Premier Frost says his own feeling today is still what he has previously stated it to be, that the pipe line is the sort of public utility undertaking that lends itself to public enterprise construction, either by the dominion government alone or by the government together with the provincial governments involved. But for reasons of its own the dominion government doesn't feel it wants to build the line itself either to operate forever or to lease or sell later to private interests. We must leave it to the dominion government and parliament to decide which way they'll get it here. We've agreed to make our contribution towards making sure that it comes through Canada all the way.

But at no time did the premier of Ontario ever reject public ownership. He never had a chance to reject it. The federal government did not make a proposal to the Ontario government that they enter into some sort of agreement to build the whole trans-Canada pipe line as a public undertaking. Oh, no; they simply went to the government of Ontario and said, "This is it, this is our chosen instrument, Trans-Canada Pipe Lines. We are not concerned about your wishes at all. If you want gas it is going to be through Trans-Canada Pipe Lines or not at all." The province of Ontario was put in the position where it was forced to accept the second best proposal, the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines proposal.

I should have thought that the Prime Minister of Canada would have had the common decency to seek the opinion of the provincial premiers; but when my colleague the hon. member for Moose Mountain (Mr. McCullough) asked the Prime Minister a few days ago whether anything had been done respecting Mr. Douglas' suggestion that the provincial governments concerned might be consulted with a view to some sort of agreement whereby the line could be built as a public undertaking, the Prime Minister said that nothing had been done. He had not made any proposals to the provincial premiers. The government simply laid it on the line. They said, "This is it, Trans-Canada Pipe Lines. This is our baby, and if you want gas through northern Ontario you are going to have to take our proposal or nothing at all."

I think the statement of Premier Frost is quite clear and indicates that two provinces, without ever having been asked by the government, are already on record as being 100 per cent in support of a proposal to build the trans-Canada pipe line as a public utility. Yet this government is completely blind to the realities of the situation and tries to create the impression that the provinces are not concerned. Neither the Prime Minister nor any member of his cabinet has ever said a word about the proposal made by premier Douglas. They have completely ignored it, and the people of Canada will of course be the losers as the result of this transaction.

Why should the province of Ontario not be favourably disposed toward public ownership? I suggest that the Clarkson, Gordon report makes it abundantly clear that under private enterprise they would have to depend on exports of gas to the United States in order to make it feasible. But the same report indicates that even without the export of gas to the United States the project would be economically feasible under public ownership.

That was a report prepared for the Ontario government. Yet the federal government has chosen to ignore this report, has chosen to ignore the recommendation of the premier of Saskatchewan, and has determined to go its own blind way selling out the interests of the people of Canada for the benefit of a corporation, ownership of which lies to the south of the border.

I suggest that throughout the course of the debate the Minister of Trade and Commerce has made government policy quite clear. He has stated in effect that if the job can be done by private enterprise, then private enterprise should be allowed to go ahead and do it. That means, of course, that if private enterprise figure there is enough profit they will go ahead and do the job. If, on the other hand, private enterprise does not do the job then the government will step in. What the government proposes to do in the present case is to have the taxpayers of Canada put up the risk capital. If the undertaking turns out to be profitable they will then turn over the project to private enterprise on extremely reasonable terms. If it is not profitable, then the public will have a white elephant on their hands. That is government policy.

There has been a great deal of talk about the alienation of natural resources in this country. We know that the great iron ore resources of the province of Quebec are being sold to people outside this country by the Duplessis government at a cent a ton, but at least Duplessis did not put up any money. He did not put up taxpayers' money to allow them to come in and exploit the resource. The pipe line is, after all, the important thing because gas capped in the well is of no value unless there is a pipe line, and in this instance the government is not only alienating this resource of Canada but is adding insult to injury by using the Canadian taxpayers' money to aid a foreign corporation to do the job. You know, it is bad enough when you allow a burglar to enter and rob your house, but when you turn around and give him the tools to do the job that is the essence of pure folly.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that throughout the course of this debate we have emphasized the importance of proceeding with this project. We have argued over the years that we ought to be enjoying this natural resource in this country and that the pipe line should have been built. The government has allowed the company concerned to procrastinate, to delay, to deceive parliament for over five years. Finally when the government get down on their hands and knees before the company and have given the company everything it wants and the company is apparently satisfied now that it is getting enough out of the Canadian taxpayers, this same company turns around and says to the government of Canada, "All right; you will put this through before the 7th of June or we may back out."

Why should Trans-Canada Pipe Lines want to back out? After all they have been given at the hands of the government why should they want to back out? But the solicitude for Trans-Canada Pipe Lines does not extend to other areas. We in Saskatchewan have been urging the government for many years to proceed with the South Saskatchewan dam, a project that is going to involve the expenditure of some federal money. But no; no money is available for the South Saskatchewan dam. As far as the maritime provinces are concerned, the government turns a deaf ear to the many needed projects down there.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am extremely sorry to interrupt, but I am obliged to advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. L. D. Crestohl (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, I seek the indulgence of the house at this final stage of this most vexatious debate in the hope that it may be possible for a few minutes, at least, for all of us to be stripped of political or party allegiance and to speak to each other not as politicians but as Canadians. I take this position because of the axiom that loyalty to our country transcends the loyalties we owe to political parties and no doubt supersedes all personal and political exigencies. I hold with Disraeli, who said:

> First comes my God, then my Queen and country, then my party, then come I.

With this as a background let us analyse briefly the positions that have been taken by the respective parties in the house and some of the things that have been said by their spokesmen. First of all I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, that there are certain definite common denominators on which we all agree. Let us recognize these common denominators. Everyone in the house has agreed that a pipe line for Canada is vital, that a pipe line for Canada is needed, that a pipe line for Canada will help the future of our country. Of that there is no doubt. Not a single member of the house has stood up in his place to argue that the pipe line was not needed or would not be useful for our country. Hitherto, Mr. Speaker, members of the house were deluged with all forms of advice from the country when they opposed a project before parliament. We were accustomed to receiving briefs from chambers of commerce, submissions from boards of trade, petitions from labour unions, delegations, letters and telegrams. Not a word did anyone hear. There was no complaint from anybody. That told us clearly that not only the members of this house but the entire country without exception were in favour of having a pipe line constructed in Canada. Peculiarly enough, with this almost unanimous consent of the entire country, what has developed in this house? No one opposes it and yet this house was almost split in two and the country was almost split asunder on a matter on which we all agree. Peculiarly enough, as I said we seemed to differ on a very simple thing and that is the method of construction, the way it should be constructed.

An hon. Member: The financing.

Mr. Crestohl: I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that the method of construction is not anything that should tear this parliament apart as it almost threatened to do. For example, let us examine what our socialist friends say as to how they would like to see the pipe line built. They say, "We would like a pipe line built, we are in favour of a pipe line, but we want it built our way, the socialistic way, publicly owned". I can understand that, Mr. Speaker. The socialists at least are consistent with their political philosophy. As they always do, they follow their teachers: Karl Marx, Robert Ingersoll and later Norman Thomas, Ramsay MacDonald and more lately Clement Attlee. It is a position to take, and I can understand it. But I put this question to my hon. friends. Are they socialists first or are they Canadians first? What would their answer be to that question if they were asked it? Would they sooner see no pipe line constructed at all if it could not be constructed on socialistic lines? If they say yes, once they say that they favour the pipe line but would oppose it only on the ground that it is not built according to socialistic philosophy, they would be placing their socialism and their socialistic philosophy far above the interests of our country; and that is something they certainly should not do. Of course they cannot answer in that way.

It is true that the minister said at one stage that if there is default—and the hon. member who just took his seat repeated it—the government could take it over. Our socialist friends promptly shouted, "Why wait? Why not do it now?" The answer is also an obvious one. This government is not composed of Liberals in a hurry. We favour private enterprise and we have not yet reached the stage that the socialists have reached.

What do our friends of the Conservative party say? They too take the position that they want a pipe line but they say, "We are not in favour of public ownership; we are a private enterprise party". They have thrived through history because they were a private enterprise party. The government is trying to make of this a private enterprise. Why do they oppose it? They simply say, "We want a pipe line but we want it built our way". That is understandable. I can go along with it. They would like to see it built with Canadian money, under Canadian ownership and Canadian control. But I put this question to them. If a pipe line is so vital and so necessary for the country would they say, "No pipe line unless it can be built with Canadian money and Canadian ownership," assuming that what the government is doing does not give them that? I do not think that the Conservative party, with their loyalty to this country, can consistently say that they would prefer to have no pipe line rather than a pipe line built the way the government intends to do it.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, the Conservative party have been told as clearly and as categorically as possible that there is no other way, that there is no better way, by which a pipe line can be built now. They were told by the premier of the province of Ontario. They were told by this government. They were told by the man whom they themselves labelled as the one man in the house who knows more about gas pipe lines than anyone else here. He has told them. The premier of Ontario has told them. The premiers of the other provinces involved have told them. Yet they sit back almost doggedly, almost capriciously, and say, "We want a pipe line but we will not let you build it". They too are in that predicament, Mr. Speaker. Their joining the socialist party is in my judgment a forceful denial of all their principles up to the present time. They seem to be bouncing from one foot to the other foot, making one manoeuvre or another manoeuvre as long as they can prevent the building of a pipe line. That conduct is not consistent with the welfare of our country. Perhaps there may be other motives which drive them into this course of action. Perhaps they have their eye on the next election in preference to the urgent needs of the country. If that is so, if it is true that they have their eye on the next election and, with that object in view, have created or helped to create the commotion in the house, let me say this to them. They fall directly into the category so magnificently enunciated by that great political thinker and cleric, the Abbe Raymal, who said this:

> Politics in practice too often means all for party, nothing for people; all for office, nothing for honour; all for power, nothing for progress.

I can think of no more suitable description of the Conservative party if it is true—and I do not accuse them of this—that they have their eye on the next election in preference to having their eye on the well-being of the future of this country.

I also have another brief quotation. J. F. Clark, a recognized philosopher, said:

> A politician looks for the success of his party; a statesman for that of his country.

I believe that the two hon. gentlemen, namely the leader of the C.C.F. party and the leader of the Conservative party, in really doing a little bit of soul-searching, will recognize that, once there is that universal agreement across the entire country that a pipe line should be built, they should, even at this late stage, give their views and their approach to this national problem a second look. Basically, Mr. Speaker, I believe that they are concerned with the well-being of this country above all else, but I believe that they have this entire picture in bad focus and are following a distorted line of action.

It is true, Mr. Speaker—and unfortunately so—that the debate on the bill has produced a by-product, namely the question of closure as it affects democratic rights. This too, Mr. Speaker, has been placed in very bad focus. I submit that the country should be told, not in a rhetorical fashion but in the simplest language, that closure does not prevent debate. If debate was prevented, then it was prevented not by the government. Closure, in its real sense, was designed to fix a limit on the time of debate and nothing more.

Mr. Churchill: But after consideration.

Mr. Crestohl: Yes. To use the terms "guillotine", "choke off discussion", and similar inflammatory terms is to intentionally mislead.

Let me tell you that if closure is an undesirable rule in parliamentary procedure its removal could have come about in 1955 when we revised the standing orders. I should like to tell the house that the very men who spearheaded the attack on closure were members of that committee to revise the standing order. I should like to name the four whom I consider the ones who spearheaded the attack. They are the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming); the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton); the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill). Now, Mr. Speaker, those men not only agreed to retain closure in our standing orders but they did something even more drastic. They introduced new closures into our standing orders that never existed before 1955. We never had closure on the throne speech debate; we never had closure on the budget debate. We were able to debate those two items as long as we wanted. These men who now complain about closure agreed in their own nimble minds to introduce these new terms of closure into a parliament in which they had never existed before. Today it is the very same miscreants who introduced closure into our house who are complaining about it.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that much criticism was levelled at the minister for having announced closure at the outset. Do you realize we know today when the budget debate next year will be terminated? We know now when the throne speech debate next year will be terminated. We know it now, we know it well in advance. What could be more reasonable, when a debate is to be limited, than that the minister gets up and says, now I limit this debate and I am telling you now when it will be terminated. I think the minister has done the house a service in telling us when this debate will end. I want to say that if it is a sin to impose closure, with the record of the Tory party being the first ones to introduce closure in this house and the fact that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) was responsible for introducing it in the legislature, then let him amongst you who is without sin stand up and cast the first stone.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, it is a distasteful procedure, as the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has explained. There are other distasteful standing orders in our rules for administering the affairs of parliament. There is standing order No. 11 which says that a member is not entitled to vote on a question in which he has a personal interest. It is a distasteful move to make but the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre introduced such a resolution. I am sure he did not find it pleasant but it had to be done and he did it. There are other standing orders such as the one to ask a member to withdraw because his conduct is in question. There is standing order 34 to name and dismiss a member. These are all unpleasant standing orders. I must confess that I was not happy to stand up and vote for the dismissal of the hon. member for Eglinton, but it had to be done. He defied authority and for the proper administration of parliament it had to be done. If there are these standing orders they have to be considered.

I see no reason, Mr. Speaker, for our having gone so far afield in creating an issue by questioning our democratic rights. I say that it is improper indeed to deny the rights of a minority; I would defend those rights with my very life if that were needed. But I realize that it is equally improper to frustrate or nullify the rights of a majority by tactics and manoeuvres that are made in bad faith. I say in closing, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Churchill: I rise on a point of order. I think the hon. gentleman should not use the term, "made in bad faith", with regard to the proposals put forward from this side of the house. That is imputing motives.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): I am sorry, but I was not following the hon. member's remarks too closely. If the hon. member did accuse another hon. member of bad faith, I am sure he will withdraw it.

Mr. Crestohl: I have not accused any individual member. I say that what has happened, the delaying tactics, in my opinion amounted to conducting the business of parliament in bad faith. That is not an accusation against anyone directly. I say it is a misuse or an abuse of our standing order. Of course, hon. members had the right to do the things they did. They had the right to use the standing orders in this book, but the government also has the same right to use the standing orders in the very same book.

Mr. Nesbitt: And to change them if necessary.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. member, but I must inform him his time has expired.

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): One of the many myths which the Minister of Trade and Commerce has tried to foist on the Canadian parliament and the Canadian people recently is that the opposition has been able to obtain the information which it sought about this important matter. Of course, anybody who has been in this house or in the galleries knows that nothing could be farther from the truth. We have had information denied to us on every occasion.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there are two key questions upon which this whole matter revolves. The first is, why is this government building the northern Ontario section of the line for this company? This company received its franchise on the express understanding that it would complete the whole line unassisted by the government. Representatives of the company appeared before the board of transport commissioners on numerous occasions year after year and reaffirmed that assertion. Then, suddenly, the minister announced that the government is going to build this section of the line for the company. He made no explanation why the company is unwilling to live up to the undertaking on which it was awarded the franchise, and the company of course has said nothing on its own behalf. This is one of the great mysteries of the last few years.

It is obvious, I think, that the reason this government is building this section of the line for the company is that the wealthy United States interests which control Trans-Canada Pipe Lines have got the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) wrapped around their little finger. They have duped him into doing what they want him to do. Can you not see this whole thing taking place in the board room of one of the wealthy United States companies which own this Trans-Canada pipe line? You see the boys sitting around cutting up a melon in advance, and the talk, of course, gets around to the desirability of getting this government to build the northern Ontario section. But these businessmen, being men of common sense, realize that there is very little chance of being able to persuade the government to do this because they know that the government knows that among them they have several times the finances available to build this section. They know perfectly well that the government knows that they received the franchise on the express understanding that they would build the whole line unassisted, and also they know that their representatives have asserted time and again before the board of transport commissioners that this line would be built without financial assistance from the government. But it seems like an attractive idea, and it keeps coming back in the conversation and finally they decide, well, why not have a go at it; why not see if we can get in touch with C. D. He is a good guy. And so they talk among themselves and decide who should be the one who should call the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Whom should they decide upon but the minister's long-time friend, Mr. Clint Murchison, who, of course, is the biggest shareholder in this whole undertaking and who stands to make the most when the line has been completed.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, the record shows that Mr. Clint Murchison owns one share of Trans-Canada.

Mr. Hees: The record shows, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Clint Murchison's company, New Delhi, owns 25 per cent.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): You are wrong again. Canadian Delhi.

Mr. Hees: Well, Canadian Delhi, which is Mr. Clint Murchison's company, and the minister knows it. This is simply another example of the minister's mincing of words to try to weasel out of something which he knows is perfectly true. We have heard a great deal of this kind of talk from the minister. That is why we on this side of the house take his statements very much with a grain of salt.

Mr. Pickersgill: Tell us about Ray Milner and M. A. MacPherson.

Mr. Richardson: May I ask a question?

Mr. Hees: No. After I finish the hon. member may ask all the questions he wishes in his own time. Mr. Speaker, you can just hear the telephone conversation that would probably ensue: "Hello, C. D., this is Clint. The boys are sitting around talking about this pipe line, C. D., and they think it would be a grand idea for you to build this northern Ontario section for us. No; we know perfectly well that we have the money to do it. Certainly, C. D., but we could put that money to better advantage in other places; and, as you have said yourself so often, C.D., you have to look after the boys in this pipe line! They have to be able to make plenty out of it, and we want to make plenty; you know that. No, it is not a question of our not doing it. I know we agreed to do it. Of course, we are going to do it. We know it is a plum you have handed us, but we would just appreciate it very much if you would build this section for us, C. D. You are going to look after the boys? You will? Oh. Well, that's swell, C. D. The boys are going to be very happy about this real nice gesture you are making, C. D. Don't forget to come down for another turkey shoot. Did we ever have a time the last time, yes, sir. As you have said, that is the way for fellows to get together. It sure is. Yes, you bet it is, C. D., yes, sir. That is the way for fellows to get together. We never would have started on this project if it had not been for that turkey shoot. We will be seeing you, C. D."

The receiver is hung up. Just picture that board room, Mr. Speaker, the scene in that board room after the information comes through.

An hon. Member: A picture of the ex-president of the Conservative party.

Mr. Hees: The boys are rolling around, slapping their thighs and laughing themselves nearly sick. They say, "He went for it! He went for it! You could not believe it." "Yes, he did," says Clint, "he went for this deal". That is just about the way the whole thing went, Mr. Speaker, mark my words. If that is not the story, I ask the Prime Minister and the Minister of Trade and Commerce why this government decided, after this company was given the franchise on the understanding that the line would be built without government assistance, to build it for the minister's pet instrument in this deal?

Then, Mr. Speaker, another question that remains unanswered is why, if this company took the franchise on the explicit understanding that they would build the whole line unassisted, is the company having the prairie section built for it, even though it is by far the easiest section of the line? The answer is again, the company was so successful the first time, that the boys could hardly believe their ears. Since the minister went for their deal the first time, they decided, why not try again? As they did not dare ask for complete financing, they asked for 90 per cent of the deal, and, of course, the minister went for it again lock, stock and barrel. Was he ever led down the garden path by the wealthy United States interests that are controlling this company!

There is no doubt at all that when this line gets to Winnipeg, this company will once again cry on the minister's shoulder, as it did on those two previous occasions. They will turn to the minister and say: "We cannot finance construction. Will you please finance construction for us?" Of course, he is going to finance construction as far as the Ontario border from Winnipeg, and later, when the line gets to Kapuskasing, you can just see them coming to him again and crying on his shoulder, and he is going to agree once again to build the remainder of the line for the company.

I see it is five o'clock, Mr. Speaker, and since I have something more to say I will sit down.

Bill No. 393, for the relief of Robert Alfred Price.—Mr. Henderson.

ALFRED SEVIGNY

Mr. W. J. Henderson (Kingston) moved the second reading of Bill No. 394, for the relief of Alfred Sevigny.

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, this is the bill which was before the Senate committee last year and reached us as Bill No. 490. It was duly referred to the miscellaneous private bills committee and, after witnesses had been heard, after the petitioner had presented his case and the witnesses appeared and the respondent was given a chance to tell her story, the committee decided that this was a case which should not take the time of hon. members. The Journals of the House of Commons for Friday, July 1, 1955, reported as follows:

> Your committee has also considered Bill No. 490, letter Q-16 of the Senate intituled: "An act for the relief of Alfred Sevigny", and has agreed to report the preamble thereof not proven on the grounds that the committee is not satisfied that the petitioner is worthy of having his petition granted.

I do not propose to review all the evidence, but the respondent was examined as follows:

> Q. You mentioned before that he had beat you. Could you tell us a very specific occasion that is outstanding in your mind?
> A. He beat me the first time after our marriage after we have moved to Thetford.
> Q. But how often did he beat you?
> A. Two or three times a week.
> Q. Can you mention any particular occasion that is distinguished from other occasions for any special reason?
> A. Once he beat me and I remained in bed for 15 days.
> Q. Why did you have to stay in bed for 15 days? What was the result of the beating?
> A. Because my face was all smashed up.
> O. How did he hit you?
> A. He hit me with his fist on the side of the mouth and broke my jaw.
> Q. What happened to you then and there right after he hit you?
> A. I don't remember. I fainted.
> Q. Are there still any results of that beating, any consequences to date?
> A. Yes. Two months ago I had to go and see a specialist for my eyesight. The specialist told me I had two scars in my eye, and this was a result of being hit.
> Q. Ten years ago?
> A. Yes.
> Q. Are there any other scars left as a result of that?
> A. A small scar at the back of the head when he hit me and I fell in the street.
> Q. What have you to say with reference to your husband giving you money to live on?

She then gives evidence to indicate how much those amounts were. This woman did not represent herself as a saint. She admitted that there were grounds on which divorces have been granted which could be charged against her. She appeared before the Senate committee and our committee and she appeared to be telling the truth. I want to pay a tribute to members of the committee, particularly the government members, who reviewed this case last year because after taking all the evidence into consideration it was decided that on balance the committee was not satisfied that the petitioner was worthy of having his petition granted. Having reached that decision a year ago and with some of the same witnesses appearing this year, I do not think that this House of Commons should be asked to grant a divorce for this particular petitioner.

I notice that right up until May 14 the respondent was protesting but apparently her lawyer wrote a letter to counsel for the petitioner saying:

> This is to advise you that my client, the respondent in the divorce application of the above-named has decided not to contest the petition for divorce.

I notice that a year ago this respondent was forced to go to the Household Finance Company to get $75, on which I presume she had to pay interest at the rate of 24 to 26 per cent, in order to obtain counsel to fight her case. Seventy-five dollars would not go very far in paying counsel and bringing winesses from Montreal to Ottawa. I understand another $75 was ordered by the other place.

One significant thing that happened last year was that the sister of the petitioner came before the Senate committee and the miscellaneous private bills committee and gave her sister-in-law a very good name and represented her own brother as being a person unworthy to be granted a divorce by the parliament of Canada. I hope that hon. members who reviewed the evidence last year and considered that this was a case that should not be approved will vote accordingly when the vote is called.

Mr. W. J. Henderson (Kingston): Mr. Speaker, this is the motion for second reading of this bill, and I submit that it should be permitted to go to the committee which has been set up to deal with bills of this type. I was impressed this afternoon by the statement of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) that there should be a searching inquiry made by a committee of this house, and I presume that that should apply to this instance.

There are probably several new members this year on this committee which is responsible for approving or disapproving of bills of this nature and I think it is only fair that they should be given an opportunity to consider this bill. They should not be confused by evidence which was presented in a previous year, possibly before an almost different membership. I would point out that the respondent did not appear at the Senate committee hearing and I feel that under the circumstances this bill should go to the committee which is set up to handle it.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Knowles: On division.

Motion agreed to on division, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR PRINTING OF NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS IN BOTH ENGLISH AND FRENCH

The house resumed, from Tuesday, March 6, consideration of the motion of Mr. Poulin for the second reading of Bill No. 149, to amend the Financial Administration Act.

(Translation):

Mr. Paul E. Gagnon (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, the bill now before the house unequivocally shows the importance which the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Poulin) gives to the matter of bilingualism.

I heartily congratulate my colleague on this happy initiative and consider it an honour to have the privilege of supporting his efforts.

Outside of election time, when it is permissible to question the sincerity of those in office, our federal statesmen seldom have the opportunity to extend to minorities the benefits of their broad-mindedness, their understanding, and their generous impulses.

Now this pleasing opportunity is being offered to them by this bill. In fact it affords the government a wonderful chance to show French Canadians how much consideration it is prepared to give to their requests and how far they are willing to go in giving them a square deal.

The adoption or defeat of the bill will, to a large extent, reflect the pro-French or anti-French sentiments of the leaders and supporters of the Liberal party.

There are things that should not have to be requested, and which, by their logic or nature, are self-evident necessities. Respect for and recognition of the two official languages of Canada are among them.

It might be assumed in certain quarters that in requesting bilingual cheques we are seeking a favour. The fact of the matter is that we are merely seeking confirmation, under a new form, of a sacred and inalienable right of the first settlers of this country.

> The Acts of the Parliament of Canada and of the Legislature of Quebec shall be printed and published in both those languages.

So reads the final paragraph of section 133 of the British North America Act. It is the only constitutional document relating to bilingualism. Brief and concise, those few words, by their very ambiguity, have led to a restrictive interpretation of the principle stated, and this has been the basis of the unfortunate doctrine of the "Quebec Reserve". Faced with the French achievement, carried out by a third of Canada's population, the Anglo-Saxon majority limited its concessions to the strict minimum in the federal field, leaving it to the province of Quebec to observe the letter and the spirit of the pact of 1867. However, the statement that no legal document protects the French language outside of Quebec is untrue. I am now quoting from chapter 3 of the Statutes of Canada 1870, 33 Victoria, section 23, admitting the province of Manitoba into confederation:

> Either the English or the French language may be used by any person in the debates of the houses of the legislature, and both those languages shall be used in the respective records and journals of those houses; and either of those languages may be used by any person, or in any pleading or process, in or issuing from any court of Canada established under the British North America Act, 1867, or in or from all or any of the courts of the province. The acts of the legislature shall be printed and published in both those languages.

That section of the Manitoba Act implies that not only in the province of Quebec is the French language official. Therefore, the imperial act of 1848, which restored the official character of the French language in Upper and Lower Canada, also applied to the province of Ontario. The French-speaking delegates at the Quebec conference surrendered none of our rights.

Moreover, none were revoked by the imperial parliament.

In 1871, that parliament sanctioned legislation of vital importance. It was entitled "The British North America Act, 1871". It is chapter 28 of the Statutes of Victoria 34-35, assented to on June 29, 1871.

According to section 2 of that act, the federal parliament is empowered to form from time to time new provinces out of Rupert's Land and the Northwest Territories just acquired under confederation. I quote:

> . . . and may at the time of such establishment make provision for the constitution and administration of any such province . . .

Now section 4:

> The Parliament of Canada may from time to time make provision for the administration, peace, order, and good government of any territory not for the time being included in any province.

Section 5 confirms the two acts already voted by the federal parliament: the North-West Territories Act of 1869 and the Manitoba Act of 1870.

Section 6 provides that once the parliament of Canada has formed new provinces, it shall no longer have the right to alter the provisions of any law pertaining to them, save by prior agreement of the legislature concerned.

Financial Administration Act

During the session of 1877, the North-West Territories Act was amended. By section 11, chapter 7, 40 Victoria, the federal government provided that the use of the French language would be optional at the legislative assembly and in any court within the territories:

Section 11—Either the English or the French language may be used by any person in the debates of the Council or Legislative Assembly of the Territories and in the proceedings before the courts; and both those languages shall be used in the records and journals of the said Council or Assembly; and all ordinances of the said Council shall be printed in both those languages.

In the Revised Statutes of Canada of 1886, the school section of 1875 became section 14 and the clause voted in 1877 to preserve the rights of the French language, became section 10 of chapter 50.

Without the slightest doubt, the source of most of the difficulties encountered by French Canadians in connection with the two official languages derives from the lack of clear and accurate definitions not only in the constitution itself but in the legislation enacted subsequently.

On the other hand, English-speaking Canadians did not concern themselves too much with our interests and claims and cared still less about anticipating and giving satisfaction to our legitimate wishes. One must recognize that, with a few exceptions, they have rather hindered than helped us in the struggles we have had to wager, since the conquest, against assimilation by the English and the use of one language only.

The privileges we enjoy today in the exercise of some of our prerogatives have been more often conquered by us than generously granted by them.

If we have remained French Canadians, it is certainly not their fault. The scorn, the insults, the persecutions, the contempt, the unfair school laws that my fellow-citizens had and still have to put up with in some provinces are proof enough of the narrow-mindedness of some of our rulers.

In this connection here is a news item published in the Gazette of May 5, 1954:

(Text):

English-speaking Canadians have not followed the British example of "being scrupulous to respect the rights and even the sensitivities of the French Canadians", Murray G. Ballantyne said here yesterday.

Mr. Ballantyne, a journalist and former professor of history at Loyola College, was addressing the Montreal Lions Club on "French Canada and Confederation".

Mr. Ballantyne said "We must accept the fact that Canada is called by history to be basically bilingual and bicultural. Our national destiny is difficult, but enriching.

"Canada is the French Canadians' home, and they ought to be able to feel at home in it from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Together, we French and English-speaking Canadians can build a great nation . . .

"Apart, neither can succeed."

Mr. Ballantyne looked back into the historical record to support his claim:

"The only reason we have a confederation instead of a unitary state is because of the French. We wanted to bring them into partnership with the English-speaking Canadians, yet at the same time we wanted to preserve their rights to their own way of life.

"We divided authority between Ottawa and the provinces primarily so that the French would not be swamped by the majority."

"The English in Quebec are perfectly free to teach in their own tongue. The French in Ontario are not," Mr. Ballantyne said.

Mr. Ballantyne went on to point out that in Manitoba the French tongue has been deprived of all recognition and Catholics who want their own schools have to pay taxes to the public schools as well.

"Thus the French Canadians are once again made familiar with the penalty of double taxation," he said.

In Quebec, where nine out of ten people are Roman Catholic and eight out of ten speak French, there is full autonomy and full equality. Dr. James Paton, secretary of the provincial association of Protestant teachers, says:

We're well treated here. We get our full share of tax money. The Catholics go out of their way to be fair and even generous to us. We're only embarrassed because the Roman Catholic schools in other provinces don't get the same break.

Among English speaking provinces only Alberta and Saskatchewan come anywhere near giving Roman Catholic schools the treatment that Protestant schools get in Quebec.

(Translation):

Speaking in particular about the way French Canadians are treated outside of Quebec, Mr. B. K. Sandwell, former editor of Saturday Night, in a book published in Montreal under the patronage of UNESCO and entitled The Canadian Nation, notes that:

The English Canadian can go out of his province; everywhere he will have the benefit of English schools and all the cultural advantages that this entails. Once out of Quebec, the French Canadian meets but difficulties if he wants to give his family a French education. In such conditions, we need not be surprised if the patriotism of the French Canadians of Quebec is local rather than national. It is only in that officially bilingual province that they feel at home; they cannot have such a feeling in other provinces where their language and culture do not enjoy any special right.

And Mr. Sandwell adds the following reproach to which our English-speaking fellow citizens should give their thought:

This conflict opposing the advocates of one language in all the provinces except Quebec to those who want both languages to be recognized is the most serious obstacle to an amendment of the constitution; what is still more serious, it prevents the creation of a truly national spirit.

Mr. Speaker, this charge made by an English-speaking Canadian against a restrictive interpretation of the official rights of the French minority in Canada deserves our attention. The refusal of true bilingualism by the provinces and even by the federal government is the main obstacle to a communion of ideals between Canadians of both cultures.

> It does not seem therefore that the French Canadians are at the root of those difficulties; they are rather the victims of a cultural ostracism which hinders the development of a national ideal. As soon as the French Canadians will be treated everywhere as equals, national unity will come as by magic. You cannot build a nation by being unfair and by violating the natural and constitutional rights of one section of the population.

This was written by Mr. Clement Brown in Le Droit of April 14, 1954.

According to what is said and done at the House of Commons however, this situation is improving gradually.

There is no doubt that, as far as goodwill is concerned, considerable progress has been made during the last few years.

I am personally very glad to have among my friends the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre (Mr. Thatcher) who, following the example of some of his co-religionists, has learned French, speaks it quite well and never misses an opportunity to study our problems and to try, to the extent that his socialist background will allow him to do so and as long as the interests of Saskatchewan are preserved, to understand them in the light of reason and common sense in a truly Canadian spirit.

I take this opportunity to congratulate him and to tell him that his contribution to the cause of national unity as well as his support are greatly appreciated.

The sympathy and friendship of our other English-speaking colleagues is to us a source of joy and hope.

When this bill has been adopted, a new step will have been made towards harmony and goodwill between the two great races of this country and towards the achievement of our common destiny.

Mr. Andre Gauthier (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I believe that as a Canadian of French descent, it is my duty to make a few comments concerning the bill that is now before this house. I think there is not much I can add to the remarks of the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Poulin). His speech was a model of moderation, and indicates on the part of its author a thorough command of his subject.

I merely wish to add a few general thoughts and take this opportunity of making my position known on this important matter.

Quite a number of my supporters have asked me to state my position in this respect. I have no hesitation whatsoever in stating that I support this bill with all my heart and that I will proudly vote in favour of its adoption.

The origin of bilingualism in Canada dates much farther back than 1867; the French achievement is the very basis of the discovery and colonization of our beautiful and great country. The hazards of European politics, in which we did not participate, ordained that we were to share with the Anglo-Saxon people the privilege of creating a young and vigorous nation.

This dual civilization, which enriches Canadian life and of which we are proud, must be exteriorized by all means of expression at our disposal.

Every people has its own character, its own genius, its own heredity. It might be thought by some people that we should not attach so much importance to the printing in both languages of government cheques and other negotiable notes. However, in my view, Mr. Speaker, it is a practical way of expressing the characteristics of the Canadian people.

The confederation act officially sanctioned the mutual wish of both racial groups of this country to work side by side for the greatness of Canada, in the respect of one another's rights.

The principle of bilingualism, Mr. Speaker, has been established and recognized by section 133 of the British North America Act. We should remember that section for it had a great influence all along the advance of the Canadian nation towards its maturity. It reads as follows:

> Either the English or the French language may be used by any person in the debates of the houses of the parliament of Canada and of the houses of the legislature of Quebec; and both those languages shall be used in the respective records and journals of those houses; and either of those languages may be used by any person or in any pleading or process in or issuing from any court of Canada established under this act, and in or from all or any of the courts of Quebec.
> The acts of the parliament of Canada and of the legislature of Quebec shall be printed and published in both those languages.

From the text I just quoted, it was obviously the legislator's intention to make the use of both languages mandatory in the drafting of official parliamentary documents. I admit that neither cheques nor other negotiable effects are specifically mentioned in clause 133, but if this section of the Constitution is to be construed practically and logically, the use of both official languages should obviously find place in every manifestation of Canadian life. In 1927, postal orders, money orders, postal and excise stamps were made bilingual. While this act of courtesy, of justice and generosity on the part of our English-speaking fellow citizens hurt no one, it was a great cause of satisfaction to all Canadians of French origin.

A second important step towards bilingualism was the issue of bilingual money in 1936. This took place under a Liberal government and the argument of those who held that this gesture might foster disagreement or create difficulties for the government is easily disproved by the fact that, since 1936, national unity has made giant strides, and the government that was responsible for it has been continually re-elected since.

The bill before us would complete the official recognition of bilingualism by printing in both languages cheques and other negotiable effects issued by the government or by a crown corporation. Once more our English-speaking compatriots are given a chance to show that they understand and appreciate the French element's share in the birth, conservation, safeguard and development of our country.

All through our political history, the Liberal party has been recognized as the party of Canadian unity. Its leaders have always given perfect examples of their broad-mindedness and of their spirit of conciliation. They have long since understood that Canada's future rests on the vitality of two great races having different traditions, marching side by side, but without merging or losing their characteristics and without there being any question of assimilation.

They also understood that each should strive to know the other better, and that while scrupulously respecting the constitutional rights of minorities, a study of both official languages should be encouraged as much as possible.

But to reach that goal, we must first recognize those languages in a practical and effective way everywhere in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, bilingual postage stamps, bilingual bank notes, bilingual cheques are all messages of good will that circulate between provinces. To foreigners they proclaim our bi-ethnical character, and to Canadians they testify to the maturity of our nation and effectively prove our mutual understanding and the reciprocal recognition of our mutual rights.

I do not want to speak too long, so as not to delay the passing of this bill.

In the past, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) has shown his spirit of fairness and understanding. I am confident he will grant the request made in this bill and that he will give the necessary instructions so that, from now on, all cheques and negotiable instruments issued by the government or by crown corporations will be printed, as the bill says, both in English and in French.

Before I resume my seat, Mr. Speaker, let me say once again that I will be glad to vote in favour of the bill introduced by the hon. member for Beauce.

Mr. J. Wilfrid Dufresne (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, it is with a true sense of pride that I rise now to give unconditional support to the bill under review, sponsored by my distinguished colleague, the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Poulin).

When this bill was introduced, I hastened to congratulate the hon. member, and I take the new opportunity that is now offered me of congratulating him again most warmly, wishing with him that, in the interest of the great cause of the national unity of our country, this bill will become law as soon as possible.

Since I have been sitting in this house, I have noticed with very great satisfaction that our English-speaking compatriots, on both sides of the house and regardless of party, occasionally paid us the honour of using that other official language of Canada, which is my mother tongue.

We are grateful to them for their magnificent effort, and we hope that several others will follow their example. Thus the relations between the two great races which make up the majority in this country will be facilitated, and this can only lead to better understanding. The more Canadians who can fluently speak the country's two official languages, the more cordial our relations are bound to be and the more can we help cement for all time national unity, without which happiness and prosperity are impossible.

We should no longer have to be taught a lesson by great statesmen of the democratic world who honour us by their visits and who, unlike far too many Canadian members of parliament, address us in both official languages. I need quote no other examples than those of our gracious sovereign and of the Queen Mother, and last year that given by the President of the United States, Mr. Eisenhower, and more recently by the Prime Minister of Great Britain, Sir Anthony Eden, and this morning by the President of the Indonesian Republic, Mr. Sukarno.

If those great figures of the free world are pleased to address us in French and in English in the House of Commons, the debating hall of the representatives of the Canadian people, it is because they know and realize that there are in Canada two official languages, and that neither has precedence over the other, that they both have the same value and that they are both on an equal footing. As stated by previous speakers, my argument is based on the spirit of the Canadian constitution which recognizes bilingualism in our country.

Is it not true that in this very chamber, Mr. Speaker, you must use both languages, and are not our debates printed in both French and English?

There can therefore be no doubt that the two languages of Canada are officially recognized and no fair-minded Canadian would dare state the contrary.

This formula was vividly recognized—I may be allowed here, Mr. Speaker, to differ from the hon. member for Lake St. John (Mr. Gauthier) who has just resumed his seat—by a Conservative administration under the late Right Hon. R. B. Bennett who, in deference to the wishes of the majority of Canadians and more particularly of the French-speaking Canadians, gave us bilingual money which, by the way, lost nothing of its value by reflecting the bilingual character of this country.

It never occurred to our Anglo-Saxon fellow citizens to refuse our country's money because it was printed in both languages.

It seems to me that, after such a forward step in the direction of common sense, even if more than 20 years have passed since that memorable day, we must continue on the road to progress, as far as bilingualism is concerned, by giving our unanimous approval to the bill introduced by the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Poulin).

In fact, the bill gives rise to no complication and, contrary to what the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) said, it entails no extra expenditure. In my view, the argument of the hon. minister is preposterous, and his more or less shaky explanation is but a pretext to reject the bill. I dare hope that, since he made that assertion, the hon. minister has revised his views, that he has undergone a complete change of mind and that he will gladly support the bill submitted to the approval of the house by the hon. member for Beauce.

Those who print cheques, drafts, bills of exchange, postal notes, postal money orders and other negotiable instruments will not need more paper and will not charge more to the government for printing these documents in both languages, the more so since these documents are printed in millions of copies and that profits on such printing are very reasonable.

In adopting this bill, the government would show its patriotism and its understanding, and would greatly help to dissipate from the minds of my French-speaking compatriots their feeling of isolation in the province of Quebec.

The time has come to dispel from the minds of those who still cling to this antiquated view, the thought that the province of Quebec is a reservation where only French Canadians have access.

We want all Canadians, whatever their racial origin, to feel at home in the province of Quebec as long as they remain mindful of the law.

On the other hand, we want French Canadians, equally mindful of the laws in the other provinces of the confederation, to feel at home everywhere in Canada.

Why this distinction, why admit French in the province of Quebec and refuse it elsewhere? Yet there are more than a million French Canadians living in the rest of Canada. To my mind, this is a serious injustice which should be corrected in the shortest possible delay.

At this moment, all hon. members in this house are given a chance to show themselves as Canadians in the fullest sense of the word by voting without hesitation in favour of the bill presented by our distinguished colleague from Beauce.

In so doing, they will also rectify the injustice committed every day in the province of Quebec when English-speaking fellow-citizens receive cheques made out in French.

Let us act with justice and tolerance towards all, let us return to the spirit of the Canadian constitution and let us dedicate all our efforts to the making of a bilingual country of Canada.

All the speeches delivered on national unity will be but empty words if we cannot practise, at least in some measure, what we preach.

Mr. Speaker, with a few exceptions, all my electors are French-speaking and many of them have asked me to speak on their behalf on this occasion.

I thank and congratulate from the bottom of my heart the hundreds of citizens of my riding who wrote to me about this matter. It shows that they consider this bill as important. However, I can assure them that, even without a word from them, I would have taken the same stand to demand without the least hesitation what I believe to be logical, fair and patriotic.

I want to congratulate particularly the management of the Paquet Company Limited of Quebec, the largest retail concern in our district, who took an interest in this bill and who acknowledge, even in the midst of a nearly 100 per cent French-speaking population, the necessity of bilingualism back home and everywhere in Canada. This example of true Canadianism should be followed throughout the country.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that every Canadian will appreciate the gesture of all those who, by word and vote, will support the bill which is now before the house and which I support myself with the utmost feeling, on behalf of all the people I represent here.

We are grateful to the hon. member for Beauce whose personal merit and well known patriotism make him a citizen of whom we are proud. He has acquired a new stature, if that were possible, in presenting this bill, and he has won the affection and the admiration of all who are worthy to be called Canadians.

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have this opportunity to make a few brief remarks in favour of the bill now before the house.

On March 6 last, the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Poulin) introduced for second reading Bill No. 149, entitled: An act to amend the Financial Administration Act. In language moderate and to the point, he explained to this house that the spirit of our constitution recognizes bilingualism in both the written and the spoken word. As a matter of fact, the existence of the French language in Canada has unquestionably affected the nature and the development of culture in this country.

In the last 25 years, and especially in the last decade, the constant growth of bilingualism in various parts of Canada is something which we could not help noticing. This development and progress have even had their effects in this house.

During the debate of the last few sessions, we have seen that a goodly number of members from predominantly or almost exclusively English-speaking communities have made it a point to say a few words in the other official language of Canada, and that they have expressed themselves in almost flawless French. This noble gesture on their part proves that they are ready to recognize the survival of the French language in Canada and the advantages of its constant growth as an instrument of culture in the various classes of society.

Indeed, Canada has its Canadian press which, although not always fully in agreement in the matter of ideas, has become an important factor of bilingualism and unity while reporting the national activities of the two main groups of our population. In our own press gallery, correspondents and reporters of both languages work side by side in a true brotherly spirit, in giving the people of this country their own interpretation of the proceedings in this house.

The desire for mutual understanding seems more and more evident among a large and growing number of our people, again as a means of maintaining, and of spreading if possible, the knowledge and the practical point of view of both languages in this country.

In 1936, the government of Canada unequivocally recognized the importance of, and the justification for, bilingualism in this country by giving our currency its present character. However, our money is not our sole means nor our sole aim in transactions. Cheques, in a general way, especially those issued by the federal government in the provision of social services, such as family allowances, old age pensions and others, as well as those which are regularly distributed to civil servants, should also carry that bilingual character which contributes to the solidarity and unity of our nation.

There is no doubt that bilingualism is growing, and is spreading to various areas of the country, without giving rise to undesirable controversy. The year 1955 has been memorable in the history of Canada, more particularly for the small Acadian people, who last year celebrated the second centennial of its deportation. Throughout Acadia, in numerous centres of the other Canadian provinces, in New England and in Louisiana celebrations marked the rebirth and survival of that small group who, exactly two centuries ago, were condemned to dispersal and near extinction. In New Brunswick alone that small group now represents nearly 250,000 people, i.e. more than 40 per cent of the total population of the province. With its fellow citizens of British and other origins, it largely contributes to the fulfilment of their destiny on this American continent.

The granting of bilingual cheques by the federal government would be welcome, more particularly by New Brunswick, as a token of consideration and appreciation by those good people who offer a striking example of that understanding and co-operation which so largely contribute to the maintenance of our national unity.

Mr. Gerard Legare (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, we are indeed celebrating this year the 20th anniversary of the adoption of the act that gave our country a bilingual currency.

I remember reading at that time the favourable comments in both the English and the French press, rejoicing over that decision of parliament. Since then, similar statements have been issued on many occasions. Newspapers and magazines have often printed statements of eminent people who earnestly asserted that cultural and racial duality in this country was of great advantage to the Canadian nation as a whole. Furthermore, as an hon. member who spoke before me was saying, we do not have to go back 20 years, 10 years, or even 5 years to find statements in favour of bilingualism in this country. We merely have to remember events that took place in this house since 1953, and particularly what was said by Queen Mother Elizabeth on the occasion of her visit, when in her splendid address delivered in both languages, she stated how privileged we were in Canada to have two official languages.

The President of the United States, Mr. Eisenhower, also made a similar statement in this house. We also heard the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, Sir Anthony Eden, express views to the same effect, in French and in English, and praise the extent of French culture in Canada.

The bill moved by the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Poulin) seeks no privilege nor favour. To my mind, his bill claims the recognition of a right. French-speaking Canadians living in all provinces of Canada are entitled, it seems to me, to have negotiable bills, issued by the federal government, printed in the two official languages of this country. Besides, as has already been pointed out, French-speaking Canadians make up nearly one third of the population of Canada, and in the province of Quebec itself that racial group is equal to 80 per cent of the population. Therefore, English-speaking Canadians enjoy preferential treatment in the province of Quebec, where the right to speak English is acknowledged by all, as it should be. On the other hand, French-speaking Canadians are at home everywhere in this country. That was brought home to me during a visit I made in western Canada, where I was happy to feel at home. That is why I am happy to note that from year to year French-speaking Canadians are more and more appreciated and liked. And this is pretty general. Some may say that they have heard statements to the contrary. I know that in the past we heard statements to the effect that the French language was perhaps badly treated in certain quarters; today such statements do not hold any longer in this country. There is almost unanimity, as I said a moment ago, in favour of bilingualism in Canada.

In the course of my research, going through files on bilingualism both in this house and elsewhere, I came across correspondence between a former member of this house, a Mr. Cohen, who was sitting here in 1936, and a young student in western Canada by the name of Boulanger. This young student was only 14, and has corresponded with Mr. Cohen. As a matter of fact, the first letter written by Mr. Cohen to young Boulanger was to tell him that he didn't want to receive anything in French; nevertheless, he agreed to read his letters and finally Mr. Cohen agreed, in that correspondence, that he had been converted to the necessity of imparting that official character to both languages in this country. Because of the efforts of this young lad of 14, Mr. Cohen graciously recognized the prejudices which he had nourished in the past and which he regretted. He was now ready to admit that the French language had equal rights in this country.

Although he was only 14 at the time, young Boulanger pointed out that the founders of Canada had played a great part in Canadian history and he so convinced Mr. Cohen that he made him recognize his mistake in refusing to accept the French language.

I have given this example, Mr. Speaker, to show that today English-speaking Canadians readily—and I underline the word "readily", because of the marked change in this regard—accept the duality of culture; they recognize that the French language has equal rights in Canada and that we are entitled to express ourselves in our own language, wherever we may be in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, may I move the adjournment of the debate?

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: At eight o'clock the house will resume consideration of the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

NORTHERN ONTARIO PIPE LINE CORPORATION

CONSTITUTION OF CROWN COMPANY TO CONSTRUCT PIPE LINE, MAKE SHORT-TERM LOANS, ETC.

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Howe (Port Arthur) for the third reading of Bill No. 298, to establish the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, when I was speaking at five o'clock I described what this government is doing for the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines company. I described that it is building the first one-third of the line for the company; it is financing 90 per cent of another third, and in all likelihood, judging by the willingness of this government to do unlimited favours for this company, it seems quite possible that when the time comes, the government will finance the last third of the line for the company. At the same time the government is leaving the company completely free to make all the profits which it can make. Those profits undoubtedly will be many millions of dollars each year. This, Mr. Speaker, is no less than an investor's paradise. The government is making such a paradise out of a company which is owned 83 per cent by wealthy United States financial interests.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we all know that big American companies are in the habit of repaying very generously indeed those who do favours for them. That is why Washington is a haven for the 5 percenters. This particularly applies to United States gas companies. That was the reason why General Eisenhower, the president of the United States, vetoed the natural gas distribution bill on February 17. He described the tactics used by the United States gas companies as being arrogant and not in the best interests of the American people, and he vetoed that bill.

This company, Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited, is owned 83 per cent by large United States gas companies, and that is a particular reason why the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) should bring this whole matter before the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, in exactly the same way as has been done with every other transportation measure that has come before this house in my knowledge. They invariably are put before the committee and thoroughly examined. The officials of Trans-Canada could be brought forward, and this whole undertaking could be investigated from top to bottom, and parliament could know the details which we have been denied to date.

I believe that Trans-Canada Pipe Lines will handsomely reward the party in power which has handed out to it so many favours and obviously will hand out more favours to it in the future. After all, as I have said, this government is financing the construction of the line and leaving the company free to make profits which are going to amount to several million dollars a year. I think this company, which is an 83 per cent United States company, in thinking this whole thing over will consider that it should deal generously with those who are making this whole operation possible through financing the line for it and rejecting the applications of any other companies that come forward to put forward propositions. All other propositions have been consistently turned aside and not even listened to. I think Trans-Canada will consider, for instance, that a contribution of say a million dollars to the Liberal campaign fund for the next election would be very small repayment for the tremendous and unprecedented and almost unbelievable favours this company is receiving from this government.

An hon. Member: How irresponsible can you get?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, there has been a great deal of speculation concerning when the next election will be held. In trying to decide when it will come about, I think we have to bear in mind that April 2, 1957 is the key date. That is the date by which the government must make good on their assurance that they will not take over the company. I feel sure, and I think all of us feel sure that when Trans-Canada Pipe Lines comes forward on that date next year it will be forced to say it cannot complete its financing because there will be no decision from the federal power commission of the United States by that time; too much evidence is piling up against the application every day. I am told there are 200 pounds of petitions which have accumulated so far, and more come in every day. Therefore I think it is certain that there will be no F.P.C. decision by April 2 of next year. I feel sure, and I think all of us feel sure, that the Prime Minister assured this company when that date came due, the government would not take over Trans-Canada Pipe Lines, otherwise they would not have gone ahead and placed orders for pipe, as they have done recently. Therefore that is the key date for the next election. After that date is passed, I think you will see an election and then, Mr. Speaker, If I am not wrong and I do not think I am going to be—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hees: —you are going to see the most lavish Liberal campaign this government has ever sponsored. You are going to see a gigantic television program, a gigantic advertising program, the cash inducements to "Vote Liberal" are going to be bigger than any you have ever seen before. This is going to be a Liberal campaign to end all Liberal campaigns.

We have seen, Mr. Speaker, what this government is willing to do for a company owned 83 per cent by wealthy United States interests. What is it willing to do for Canadian provincial governments that come forward to it for meagre assistance just to help them with their limited financial resources to develop power and other natural resources to bring industries to their provinces, and thereby increase the standard of living of their people?

I give you as an example the province of New Brunswick. The premier of New Brunswick came here and asked for federal backing for his power development bonds, so that he could have a lower rate of interest on the money he had to borrow to complete that project, and to lower the charges against his people, to develop power and increase their standard of living. This would not have cost this government one penny, nor would it have cost the taxpayers of this country one penny. It would simply have meant that this government would have backed the power development bonds of that province, and it would have shown that this government was interested in the power development in our Canadian provinces. But was this done? Certainly not. The reason was because they have a Liberal government in New Brunswick and it was felt by them that—

Mr. Hosking: Wrong again, George.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hees: I will make a correction this time. They had a Liberal government, and now a diminishing Liberal party in New Brunswick, which convinced this government that if they gave assistance in the form of backing those bonds, it would be more difficult for them to ever get back into power, and this government listened to the advice of the provincial Liberal party in New Brunswick, and that is the reason the federal government is not backing the power development bonds of New Brunswick.

Another example is the province of Saskatchewan. That province came forward and merely asked for assistance in completing a power dam which will provide 500,000 acres of irrigated land which could be turned into market gardening areas producing crops which would materially assist the people in that province, and increase the standard of living there. It would also have provided enough cheap electrical power to allow them to completely electrify that province; bring industries there, and diversify their economy and materially increase the standard of living of the people of the province of Saskatchewan. What did this government do? It turned them down flat.

It seems to me that you have to be a company which is predominantly American-owned, and has defaulted on the undertaking for which you received your franchise, and then you will be granted whatever favour you ask. As long as you can have the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) wrapped around your little finger and jumping through a hoop, as is the case with Mr. Clint Murchison and the rest of the people who control Trans-Canada Pipe Lines, then you can be sure that this government and the Minister of Trade and Commerce will grant whatever favours you ask. If you are merely trying to improve the standard of living for the people of Canada, you will be turned down flat.

Mr. Speaker, I call on this government to stop using the taxes of this country to bail out the shareholders of a primarily United States company which has defaulted on its undertaking, and to start using the money of the taxpayers of Canada to develop Canada by Canadians for the benefit of Canadians.

Mr. Paul Hellyer (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, this Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation bill—

Mr. Hodgson: All aboard; let us get on the the gravy train.

Mr. Hellyer: —started out as an economic issue—

Mr. McGregor: How do you know?

Mr. Hellyer: —and I would like for the first half of my time at least, if I am not interrupted too often, to speak about the economic aspects of it.

An hon. Member: What are you going to waste the second half on?

Mr. Hellyer: If you will contain your soul in patience for a minute or two perhaps you will see. First of all there is the need for power, which is fundamental. There have been various statements on this subject. From my own experience I can say this: Last winter almost every night during the peak load period the electricity was cut off from my hot water heater and that would not have been the case if there had been ample power.

An hon. Member: You should pay your hot water bill.

Mr. Hellyer: This point of view is also held by a friend of hon. members opposite, the premier of the province of Ontario.

An hon. Member: Ex-friend.

Mr. Hellyer: I think his opinion is one which is very accurate and well taken.

An hon. Member: You did not always think so.

Mr. Hellyer: From the point of view of revenue this line should urgently be built and it should be built now; as far as Winnipeg is concerned at least, this year.

The leader of the Social Credit party has stated in this house that every day of delay costs the gas producers of Alberta $50,000. No one in this house has challenged that figure nor that statement.

Mr. Hodgson: Nobody knows; they are only guessing.

An hon. Member: Speak for yourself.

Mr. Hellyer: If the line were delayed for two years it would cost the people of Alberta $36,500,000; but what is $36½ million to hon. members opposite?

An hon. Member: What's a million?

Mr. Dufresne: That's peanuts to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Hellyer: The Globe and Mail in an editorial dated May 31 stated that one reason for early completion of the line concerns costs.

Mr. Lennard: Why?

Mr. Hellyer: Every year the price tag on it goes up by another $25 million.

Mr. Lennard: Why?

[Mr. McGregor.]

Mr. Hellyer: But what is $25 million to hon. members opposite? What about the balance of payments with the United States? Members opposite have been alarmed at the deficit that we have had on current account with the United States. The gas to be exported at Emerson will bring in 50 million American dollars per year.

Mr. Fleming: You have to reckon with the federal power commission first.

Mr. Hellyer: But what is $50 million to the hon. gentlemen opposite? The gas consumed in eastern Canada would supplant the importation of United States gas and coal to the equivalent of two million tons of coal per year. This means a saving to the Canadian people of 35 million more American dollars each year.

Mr. Lennard: Where did you get your figures?

Mr. Hellyer: Any way you look at this project, the Canadian people will be in pocket to the tune of $100 million if the line is built to Winnipeg this year. To me, any government which, by making a loan of $80 million at 5 per cent, can come up with a $100 million dividend on behalf of the Canadian people is investing in a course of action which is both prudent and profitable. No one will benefit one-tenth as much from this project as the Canadian people will.

Mr. Lennard: Where did you get your figures?

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): He didn't get them in Wentworth.

Mr. Hellyer: What does this project mean in terms of jobs? Getting the line built will mean thousands of new jobs for Canadians. Someone may ask, what about the inflationary effect, and how do you reconcile the $80 million loan with the policy of the central bank at the present time? As the Minister of Finance has already explained, it is granted because a great many physical assets that will be used for the stage of the line which will be built this year are to come from the United States, so it will not put a further strain on our Canadian physical resources.

An hon. Member: But your pet company had the franchise five years ago.

Mr. Hellyer: On the other hand, when the later stages of the line are built, and as the line load builds up, new jobs will be created, new industries will be built up at a time when we may be very grateful for them. As the Minister of Finance said this afternoon, that if the present trend in the United States is continued, and paralleled here in a year or two, it would be very gratuitous that this line had been put into operation without further delay. I am sure that if two years from now there were serious unemployment and the government had not acted in getting this line built, labour would condemn the government for having failed to look into the future.

Many new industries will spring up. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) mentioned this afternoon that new industries will be built in Alberta. I heard of one the other day that has not been announced. A very large plastics industry will be built up in a central Ontario town if this line is to proceed immediately. It will provide a new Canadian industry and jobs for hundreds of people.

An important by-product of this change-over from United States coal to Canadian gas will be a substantial improvement in the air pollution problem in our great cities such as Toronto. The late Rodney Adamson, the former M.P. for York West, would have been very much interested in this. I do not think he would have obstructed the bill. I think he would have supported it wholeheartedly.

There is also the aspect of defence, which has not yet been mentioned. As an alternative source of power, this gas pipe line is of vital importance. It is another protection that we would have that the industrial potential of the United States and Canada would be kept strong in case of attack. It is much easier and much faster to repair a gas pipe line, after a direct hit, than it is to refit or repair a power generating station. We had an example a few weeks ago of generators going out when the Sir Adam Beck No. 2 plant at Niagara failed during a storm, causing a failure of power supply over a large section of Ontario. Gas will be one further source of power to help keep our industries intact for our collective security.

What are the alternatives which have been mentioned? The Tories have mentioned some. First of all, there is the McMahon plan, which is supported by the member for Broadview (Mr. Hees). Under that would be exported to the United States 400 million cublic feet of gas per day, leaving insufficient for the future requirements of eastern Canada. Does the hon. member for Broadview really think he should support a policy such as that? Then there is the Gairdner plan. Is it not a coincidence that these plans should have just come forward after this matter was brought before parliament? I am told that they were working on the statistics for this gas development more than a year before this plan came before parliament, and nary a word was said by them. They only came up vaguely with the plan when they knew it was too late to come into effect. Then the third was the so-called Champion plan. I think that is the most ineffective and ludicrous of them all. At least the C.C.F. party is consistent in its policy of public ownership. That at least is a clear alternative.

Mr. Lennard: Another red herring.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): You are pretty red yourself.

Mr. Hellyer: I am not convinced that public ownership would save the taxpayers of Canada a penny. On the contrary, I feel that the whole operation will be more economical under private ownership and that the increase in efficiency will provide ample return to the owners of the equity from time to time. Incidentally, I hope that when the time comes for a majority of the common shares to be offered in Canada they will be fully subscribed and held by Canadians. We as a people are notoriously reluctant to invest in this type of security. This is another opportunity for us, and I hope that we will take full advantage of it.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, by no conceivable stretch of the imagination could the project, under public ownership, proceed as far as Winnipeg this year. This proposal now before us is the only one which gives any assurance that the line will get under way now. However, even if the saving to the Canadian people were $1 billion, I would not support the bill if I thought that parliament was in fact in jeopardy.

Mr. Lennard: Tell that to Toronto.

Mr. Hellyer: We have had some evidences here this afternoon of freedom to say things which I do not think most of us would accept. The hon. member for Eglinton—

Mr. Lennard: You were bombarded on Sunday.

Mr. Hellyer: The hon. member for Eglinton said this afternoon that he wished he had more time.

Mr. McIlraith: He has spoken 30-some times already.

Mr. Hellyer: Since the debate began, much time has been spent on points of procedure.

Mr. Hodgson: Stick to the truth.

Mr. Hellyer: The Progressive Conservatives have taken 1,200 column inches in Hansard on procedure.

Mr. Lennard: What are you doing now?

Mr. Hellyer: The C.C.F. party has taken 650 column inches.

Mr. Fleming: Points well taken.

Mr. Lennard: What are you doing now? You had better save a little hot air right now.

Mr. Hellyer: The Liberal party has taken only 201 column inches.

Mr. Lennard: Because you were ashamed of the whole proposition. That is why.

Mr. Hellyer: This notorious waste of time could have been well employed by the hon. member for Eglinton and others, and he would then have had ample time to discuss the merits of the bill.

Mr. Fleming: With closure applied the first day?

Mr. Hellyer: He also told us this afternoon that he had a whole envelope full of amendments. If he had spent just part of the time wasted on procedure in putting his amendments before the house he would have made some little contribution to the debate.

Mr. Lennard: You would not listen. That is why.

Mr. Fleming: You applied closure at every stage.

Mr. Hellyer: The same hon. member who is interjecting now referred to the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. St. Laurent) as putty.

Mr. Fleming: Putty in the hands of the strong man.

Mr. Hellyer: When he says this type of thing he is defaming a man whose shoe laces he is not worthy to unloosen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lennard: Who wrote that for you?

Mr. Bell: You are pretty good on the shoe polish.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Lennard: Order nothing. There is no order here any more.

Mr. Hellyer: Following that he made a quotation to this effect, of all passions, lust for power is the most enduring. Very true.

Mr. Lennard: Careful, now.

Mr. Hellyer: This is the first time in a long while that parliament has had as much space in some of the newspapers as crimes of lust but perhaps, Mr. Speaker, what we have witnessed here is in fact a crime of lust, a lust for power—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Lennard.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hellyer: —by people—

Mr. Fleming: Government lust for power. You said it.

Mr. Hellyer: —who would frame the government and slander the officials of this house in order to achieve their own political ends.

Mr. Lennard: You have not been here long enough to know your way around.

Mr. Hodgson: Toe the party line now.

Mr. Lennard: You have not been here long enough to know your way around. You do not know what you are talking about.

Mr. Hellyer: He went on in his characteristic fashion and said something along these lines: —

Mr. Lennard: California here we come.

Mr. Hellyer: —something in the minister's mentality, referring to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), does not harmonize with the interests of Canada.

Mr. Dufresne: He was right.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, the people of Canada will never be able to repay the Minister of Trade and Commerce—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fleming: If the government will call an election they will repay him all right.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fleming: Bring on the election.

Mr. Hellyer: They will never be able to repay him for his contribution to the development and safety of this country in war and in peace.

An hon. Member: What's a million?

Mr. Bell: If you paid Cockfield, Brown for that speech you are a damn fool.

Mr. Lennard: California, here we come.

Mr. Hellyer: The hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Bell) may think he is the liberty bell but it is interesting to note that he, like it, is a little bit cracked.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bell: But I always ring true, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Dumb-bell.

Mr. Hellyer: The hon. member for Eglinton went on to say that the $80 million—

An hon. Member: Where did you get that note?

Mr. Hellyer: —for this corporation will denude the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation and hold up construction of the northern Ontario section. I do not know whether or not my saying that this is a complete falsehood is parliamentary but, in my opinion, that is exactly what it is. On the contrary, the building of the northern Ontario section will be enhanced and speeded up by the action now proposed by the government.

Mr. Fleming: By parting with their capital?

Mr. Hellyer: Perhaps the hon. member would build the northern Ontario section first and hope some day he had some gas to put through it, but other more practical people would do the thing in the right sequence.

Mr. Lennard: We are getting the gas right now.

An hon. Member: Right over there.

Mr. Hellyer: Then, Mr. Speaker, the same hon. member carried on and said, "Where is the rule of law?" Mr. Speaker, how well he might ask this question of himself.

Mr. Fleming: And the Liberal party.

Mr. Hellyer: This is what the Post-Express has to say about the hon. member, and the Post-Express describes itself as an independent newspaper. It is a central Ontario newspaper published in the constituency of the chief whip of the Progressive Conservative party.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): Napanee.

Mr. Lennard: What is the name of the paper?

Mr. Hellyer: In an editorial in the issue of May 31 it has this to say:

> Serious undermining of the rules of parliamentary procedure, such as the disgraceful conduct of Donald Fleming last week—

Mr. Fleming: Is this in order?

Mr. Hellyer: I continue:

> —coupled with the above-mentioned lack of support from Ontario, spells doom for the Progressive Conservative party federally.

Mr. Nesbitt: If you believe it, why do you not call an election?

Mr. Lennard: What is the name of that paper?

Mr. Hellyer: The Post-Express.

Mr. Lennard: From where?

Mr. Hellyer: The editorial continues:

> Closure is a very common form of procedure in Westminster. It is not even unique in Canada. It is simply an expedient to get work done. But expulsion of a member of parliament for refusing to recognize the chair is a very different matter. Historically, expulsion was the means used to handle recalcitrant schoolboys who refused to abide by the common rules of conduct. And expulsion was always a disgrace. Mr. Fleming's conduct after expulsion was much like that of the juvenile delinquent of today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Lennard: On a point of order, I should like to ask the hon. member where the Post-Express is published.

Mr. Hellyer: Napanee, Ontario. It is one of the strongholds of Toryism in Ontario.

Mr. Lennard: Why did you not say that before?

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member for Winnipeg—

Mr. Hansell: On a question of privilege, if I may, the other day when I was speaking I referred to the incident whereby we expelled the hon. member for Eglinton, and I was informed by the chairman that it was a closed incident. I pointed out the hon. member who has just spoken and to you, sir, that evidently the incident is not closed. I wish it were, and I wish that the rule might be adhered to.

Mr. Speaker: I agree with the hon. member for Macleod that matters of that type are not any more to be referred to. May I ask hon. members to do all they can in order to proceed in an orderly fashion to have a debate in which there perhaps may not be as many interruptions as there have been and also to observe the rule of relevancy. I understand that the hon. member for York West (Mr. Hamilton) wishes to raise a point of privilege.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Yes, Mr. Speaker; I wish to raise a question of privilege. I should not like to have left on Hansard a reflection on the former member for York West. The late Rodney Adamson was too patriotic a Canadian ever to have supported legislation of this kind.

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Hellyer) was supposed to have accompanied another two or three members of this house to a meeting in Toronto last Saturday but unfortunately he was unable to get a reservation. Having listened to the speech he has just made, I congratulate him; for had he obtained a reservation, had he gone to Toronto and had he made the speech he has just given he would have been eviscerated. I am not sure that is the right word. Many words were bandied about at that meeting, and I claim no credit or guilt for this. The hon. member for Davenport was called something that was very unparliamentary. He was called a gutless wonder. I have no proof of that whatsoever. I have no knowledge of his intestinal circumstances. All I know is that he was fortunate in not having been there. However, Mr. Speaker, I wish to cross swords with foemen more worthy of my steel, namely the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and the leader of the government.

An hon. Member: Don't fall and break your neck.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I have forgotten the hon. gentleman's constituency, oh yes, Iles-de-la-Madeleine—but I have heard him interrupt on many occasions in this house. The impression he gave me is that he is merely tilting at windmills; not that I suggest there is any comparison between him and Don Quixote. That is not so. I have regard for Don Quixote. But this hon. gentleman, as usual, mounts his charger and dashes madly to the fray, quite indistinguishable from the rump on which he is perched.

Mr. Cannon: That is a hot one.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Now I am going to deal with the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The other night he said this as reported at page 4632 of Hansard:

> It has been represented that this will be a great gold mine for the owners of the shares.

I said so and I proved that on the basis of the figures which were submitted to the minister by Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited. I said then—and the minister has not denied it—that by 1962, on the basis of the company's own projection, certain shareholders will be getting about 15 per cent per annum in dividends, some would be getting 20 per cent and others would be getting 45 per cent. I do not know what the right hon. gentleman's definition of a gold mine is, but I think there are very few gold mines in this country which are going to pay dividends such as those which Trans-Canada Pipe Lines will pay. Then he went on to make this admission. He said that an investment in this company will be a fair investment. If he thinks this is going to be a fair investment, why should not private enterprise undertake it? If the right hon. gentleman thinks this will be a fair investment, why does he have to come to the parliament of Canada and ask the taxpayers of Canada to put up the money to finance this company; and not only to lend them the money with which to finance it but in effect to subsidize them through rates of interest? If it is a fair investment, surely free enterprise can handle it. This is what the minister says is a fair investment. Yet he comes and asks money from parliament for the benefit of this company. As reported at page 4632 of Hansard he said this:

> I think it is most unfortunate when the hon. member for Winnipeg North starts counting up the millions of dollars that will go to the owners of the common shares.

What is unfortunate about it? Is it unfortunate that these figures are being placed on the record? Is it unfortunate that in the opinion of many people this company will be a gold mine and will be able to pay these dividends of which I have spoken? Surely there is nothing unfortunate in that statement. What the minister should have said was, "I think it is most revealing when the hon. member for Winnipeg North is able to do this". Many of these facts and figures have not come from the government. We have had to put them on the record.

I think time will show that this pipe line will be successful, and to that I have no objection. I think it will be extraordinarily successful. But I object to the taxpayers of Canada having to put up this money when private enterprise itself ought to be in a position to do it.

Then the minister goes on to tell us about the capitalization again, of the shares which will be issued at $8 each; some shares which will be issued at $8 plus interest back to the time of the inception of the company; some shares which will be issued to the distributors at $9; and still other shares which will be issued to the public at $10, of which only $9 will go into the treasury of the company, $1 being taken off for underwriter's fees or some other expense of which I know nothing. But there was still another share I mentioned. I refer to that share which was attached to the subordinated debentures, whereby those who bought debentures for $50 will be able to buy a share for $3.32. I said in the past that if this method of capitalization goes through, not many of the people of Canada are going to get a chance to buy these subordinated debentures. Then the minister went on to say this:

> This idea that the insiders are making a killing is absolutely wrong.

What is the 20 per cent per annum but a killing? And it would be more than 20 per cent because as time goes on and the bonds are redeemed there will be less interest to be paid. Therefore there will be more money available for distribution as dividends. If this is as good a financial proposition as I believe it to be, as the minister believes it to be and as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) believes it to be, why can the sponsors not finance this thing? Why have you to come to Canada and ask the people of Canada to finance it? Why do you go almost to the extent of total financing and yet say, "This must be given back to free enterprise"? Why not go the other 5 per cent and say, "This will be owned by the people of Canada"?

It is profitable in more senses than we are told. It is going to be profitable on the basis of the company's own projection. Let us take also the projection of the firm of chartered accountants, namely Clarkson, Gordon and Company who made a report to the treasurer of Ontario. They said, as regards public ownership alone, that the income projection shows the estimated results from the government-owned line in one set of circumstances that on the basis of public ownership there would be $10 million available after all interest had been paid and after depreciation had been paid to go into the treasury of Canada. When one takes into consideration the other 200 million cubic feet per year which ultimately will be exported at Emerson, there is going to accrue to the company a profit of $8 million a year through carrying that gas. In other words, there will be a minimum of $18 million a year available to go into the treasury of Canada.

Then the minister says that this legislation is not improvident. I think it is truly and completely improvident when a monopoly is allowed to make this sort of profit in Canada, a monopoly which is to be financed by the people of Canada but which could be owned by the people were there any desire that they should do so. The minister went on to say this:

> Many times the men who have been working at this problem,—

And this is heartbreaking; this rends the heart strings.

> —working their hearts out trying to get it moving,—

Let us see who are these people who are working their hearts out. Who are these people who have come to see the minister with their hearts working overtime? Canadian Gulf; Hudson Bay Oil; Tennessee Gas Transmission Company; Canadian Delhi Oil; International Utilities Corporation—this group which owns 83 per cent of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines. Have they been working their hearts out? What they have been doing is working their heads to the bone. The following quotation from the minister is interesting because the minister goes on to say this—referring to these men, these great financiers, these tycoons:

> —have said to me, "If we could get $8 back and have a chance to buy the same shares at $9 or $10 when the line is in operation, it would be the greatest transaction we have ever made".

In other words, what these men did was to go to the minister and say, "If you will give us $8 for our shares today, next year we will give you $10 for them". I suppose that could be called financial wizardry but I think that is pure, sheer fatheadedness. If the men who are running this corporation are such utter fatheads as to make such a proposition as this, then I do not think we can trust them with the running of this corporation. The minister, in his rebuttal, did not make a very effective answer to the arguments we have advanced. We have said, and I think rightly, that this whole proposition should be under public ownership. We have shown from the figures of the company itself and we have given from the figures of Clarkson, Gordon that this company would be very profitable, so profitable it should be financed by public enterprise, for since it is a monopoly those profits should go to the treasury of the country.

There is one more particular matter I want to talk about. We have been told that we were going to stop this legislation in the house. It is true. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has said, as have others, that it was our intention within the rules of the house to use every device, every stratagem, whereby we could stop this legislation. We had the right to do it, just as the government had the right to stop us or thwart us if they could. We used every manoeuvre we knew and we outmanoeuvred and outfought the government. The government was stopped cold until that unhappy day last week when the Speaker of this House of Commons came before us and asked a brute majority to support a proposition which he submitted to us. That was a prostitution of the rules of this parliament, but the majority carried it. In defence of what happened afterwards, we have the spectacle of this knight in shining armour, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris), who said last night when dealing with this same question as recorded at page 4683 of Hansard for June 4, 1956:

> Both the Leader of the Opposition and the Leader of the C.C.F. this afternoon said that all of us ought to regret what has happened particularly what happened on Friday.

Then the Minister of Finance goes on:

> I am going to agree with both of them. However, I hope that in expressing agreement in that sense I am not to be taken as having accepted any responsibility for it.

Pontius Pilate come to judgment. The Minister of Finance takes water and washes his hands. In the meanwhile, what is the Prime Minister of Canada doing? While this whole unhappy scene was being enacted he sat there quiescent and impotent, the leader of parliament, who could not restore order in this house. On the other hand, to protect the petty prestige of this government, he sacrificed the Speaker of this house.

Mr. Richardson: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): You certainly can.

Mr. Richardson: Where was the hon. gentleman at that time? Was he in his seat?

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I was protesting on the floor of the House of Commons at this iniquity; that is where I was. I am prepared to account for that to my constituents, and I know what is going to happen when I meet my constituents.

Mr. Pickersgill: More gas.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): What the Prime Minister did was to co-operate in the destruction of the Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I ask hon. members to debate the measure that is now before us.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I would be very happy to do so but I call you to witness that the Minister of Finance introduced this subject into this debate last night.

Mr. Speaker: I will go along with the hon. member that too much extraneous matter has been injected into this debate, but there are only a few hours left before the debate is concluded—

An hon. Member: Why?

An hon. Member: Whose fault is that?

Mr. Speaker: I am not blaming anyone at the moment; I am merely asking hon. members to co-operate with the Chair if they feel that, for the purpose of making their arguments pro or con on this bill, they can avoid personalities and avoid introducing into this debate matters which are completely extraneous to it.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, with all deference, you are about three weeks too late in making that appeal to this house.

Mr. Speaker: I merely asked the hon. member if he felt that he could accede to my request. If he feels he cannot, of course, because of the precedents that have been created in this debate I would allow him to go along the way he wishes.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Let me make my position clear, and I hope to have a chance to say this in the adjourned debate. I think you have no moral authority to be in that chair but I respect the Chair and so I am going to do as you ask.

[Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North).]

Mr. J. A. Smith (Battle River-Camrose): In rising to take part in the last stage of the discussion on this bill to establish a pipe line from Alberta to eastern Canada, I do so with some humility. I am one of the younger members in this house, Mr. Speaker, and a long time before I became a member of parliament, long before I left school, I was taught to appreciate and give consideration and respect to authority, particularly to the established parliamentary rights that have been handed down to us in Canada throughout the years. During the course of this particular speech I will not attempt to point my finger at any one particular member or to bring up matters which I think would be well forgotten. I will, however, attempt to put on the record a few facts on behalf of the party which I am privileged to represent.

It has already been pointed out that we in Alberta have had the privilege of enjoying the use of gas as a fuel for a great number of years. This is true, particularly of the southern part of the province. However, in the part of the province which I am fortunate enough to represent, the development of gas and oil reserves has been a more recent thing. Just a few years ago it was our privilege in the small town in which I live to have gas introduced. I could speak at length on such gas fields as the Turner valley field, the Medicine Hat field, to which I believe the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) referred last night when he spoke of the gas fields as being over 40 years old, Kinsella, Viking, the Lloydminster, Vermilion and other fields. So far as I am concerned personally I do know that the development of gas and petroleum resources in Alberta has meant a great deal to the industrial development of that province.

On the other hand, I want to point out that the use of this fuel has meant a great deal to the mothers of families throughout our province. I am looking forward to the day when the mothers of families from the Alberta boundary to the heart of Quebec will be able to use gas to cook their meals and heat their houses. In the early days of gas exploration in Alberta, particularly after Mr. Manning took over, there was established what was called the gas export policy of that province. He insisted that so far as the use of gas was concerned, the first consideration in Alberta should be domestic use; the second concern should be the use for the development of Alberta industries; and third, the export of gas out of the province.

It has been established time and time again in this house during the course of the debate that we do have sufficient gas to export and that is why we in this group are supporting this measure. The question of gas export from

Alberta was one which was bitterly fought in our provincial legislature, and it was a major issue in one of our provincial elections. However, that is past history and I am very happy that all Alberta members, with the exception of one, have seen fit to set aside politics and support this measure which means so much, not only to the province of Alberta but to Saskatchewan, Ontario and Quebec. As far as that is concerned, it means much to Canada as a whole, as the use of this fuel will further the industrial development of our great country.

We are supporting this particular bill, Mr. Speaker, because we see in it the only possible way by which our surplus gas can be disposed of and the only way in which the development of the great petroleum resources of Alberta will continue. For some years we have recognized the need for the construction of this line. Our premier made this statement in 1953, and I am reading now from an editorial in the Globe and Mail of May 31, 1956:

> Alberta's failure to get markets for this huge surplus is stifling exploration and investment in its whole gas and oil industry. As long ago as December, 1953, Premier Manning declared:
>
> "It is important to the continued development of the gas and oil resources of western Canada that an adequate market for gas surplus to local requirements be established at the earliest possible date."

This particular editorial goes on to point out:

> Ontario's need to buy gas was stated by Premier Frost just last week. By 1960, Mr. Frost predicted, all of this province's hydro electric resources would be in use, and some other form of energy besides coal and oil would be required to supplement them.

We happen to have the fuel that is needed, or will be needed, in Ontario, and we shall be very pleased to bring it down. It has been pointed out, Mr. Speaker, that we in this group have been speechless during the course of this debate. That is not a true statement. We have made comments; we have taken part in every phase of the development of this bill from the resolution stage to the present time, but we have not taken the position, as some have, that we want to hold up the final passage of the bill. We made our point clear and concise.

In that connection I should like to quote from an editorial in the Ottawa Citizen of May 9, as follows:

> The shortest speech from the three opposition groups in the commons after Mr. Howe's announcement of a new plan to hasten construction of the Alberta-to-Quebec gas pipe line was that of the Social Credit spokesman, Mr. Quelch. In a single sentence, Mr. Quelch said his group was happy that a start would be made in 1956 and that further comment would be reserved until the legislation came down.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not see anything wrong, even now, with the speech of the hon. member for Acadia. It was short; it was the truth and it was not time-wasting, nor was it embellished with time-wasting fluff. The editorial goes on to point out that we of Alberta will enjoy the monetary returns from the sale of this gas. That is something that is true. We will enjoy it. The Alberta government and the people of Alberta will receive 12½ cents out of every dollar's worth of fuel that enters the pipe line at the eastern boundary of Alberta. But are we the only ones who are to gain from it? Surely, the people of Saskatchewan, surely the people of Manitoba, of northern Ontario, of central Ontario and of Quebec will gain the right to use the fuel that is there.

By-products have been mentioned time and time again in the course of this debate. We shall have some benefit from those by-products that are taken out of this gas as it leaves Alberta. During the past season we have passed a bill authorizing the construction of a hydrocarbon pipe line which will permit the flow of the materials taken out of the gas to be sent to the provinces of Canada, and chemical industries will likely spring up in the other provinces as well. I maintain that this gas is needed. Its need has already been pointed out in the town of Sudbury for the great nickel mines, and so on. This is a Canadian project as far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, and one that is worthy of support.

Our position has been put on the record, Mr. Speaker, time and time again during the course of this debate.

An hon. Member: You are in bed with the Grits.

Mr. Smith (Battle River-Camrose): I have never interrupted anybody since I came to this house. I always felt that I would be highly discourteous if I were to do so, and I should like to have the same courtesy extended to me that I have extended to others during the short time that I have been here.

Much has been said about United States control of the so-called trans-Canada gas pipe line. We have been told that 83 per cent of the shares of this company will be in the hands of United States buccaneers, and so on. I am not prepared to accept these statements as being exactly the truth. However, as a group we have asked that 51 per cent of the shares of Trans-Canada be offered to the people of Canada. We have been told that better than 51 per cent, that over 60 per cent, will be offered to the people of Canada. We also asked that the control of the management of this company remain as it is now, for all time to come, in the hands of Canadians. It is a Canadian company, as I see it, Mr. Speaker, and it is guaranteed that it will remain so. We have heard a great cry about United States investment and United States money coming into Canada from my friends to the immediate right, and I am not singling out any particular one of them. However, Mr. Speaker, I do not feel that the members of the C.C.F. group are in harmony with their provincial government in Saskatchewan, because no later than June 1, 1956, the following report appeared in the Ottawa Citizen:

$60 Million Pulp Mill in Saskatchewan

That is a wonderful project and I agree with my friends from Saskatchewan that it is going to make Saskatchewan a better place in which to live; but who owns that company? Sixty per cent of the money that is to be put up for this company will come from where? Not from the people of Saskatchewan—

Mr. Knight: Not from the Canadian taxpayer.

Mr. Smith (Battle River-Camrose): Not from the people of Canada, but 60 per cent of it will be United States money. Where is the produce from this pulp mill to go to? It is all committed for sale to the United States of America. Certainly, that is not the case in so far as the trans-Canada gas pipe line is concerned because safeguards have been taken to see that Alberta, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Ontario and the rest of Canada are safeguarded.

As was pointed out this afternoon, we do have in the province of Alberta what is known as the natural resources and development conservation board, which was established several years ago to make sure that the development of Alberta's natural resources was carefully handled. I believe that at one time the minister of natural resources of the province of Saskatchewan spent some time in our capital city of Edmonton finding out what type of plan we used to protect the development of our resources in Alberta and whether he could institute a similar plan which will eventually work in the province of Saskatchewan.

I want you to remember, in summarizing this point, before comments get too heavy over here, that 40 per cent of the interest in this pulp mill will be left in the hands of Canadians if they are ready to take it up. Sixty per cent of it will be United States-controlled investment.

Last evening I noticed that queer things happened in this house. I thought I had been as startled as it was possible for one individual to be during the course of this debate.

[Mr. Smith (Battle River-Camrose).]

However, when I heard the Leader of the Progressive Conservatives move an amendment to the present bill last night, part of which reads—anyway, he made an amendment which suggested that if in the final analysis everything else fails nationalization of this line be the case. On May 22 we had a vote on an amendment to the amendment which had been sponsored by my good friends to the right, the C.C.F.'ers. At this time the Progressive Conservatives had occasion to vote for practically the same thing they brought in last May. What happened? What did the hon. member for Eglinton do? He voted against it. What did the Leader of the Opposition do? He voted against it?

Mr. Fleming: A different thing altogether.

Mr. Smith (Battle River-Camrose): I am sorry, the hon. member for Eglington was away at that time and I must apologize for that statement. However, he did not vote in favour of the amendment to the amendment. All the Conservative members who were in the house at that time either abstained from voting or voted against the amendment to the amendment.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it has been said this afternoon that we have something new in this house today. What is it? We have Tory socialism. That is quite a term. Before yesterday we had what were known as Progressive Conservatives and now we have Tory socialism. Let us not forget it.

My time has just about expired, Mr. Speaker. In closing I would like to express my deep regret that such an unfortunate page in the history of the parliament of Canada has had to be printed as the result of the introduction of a bill which, in my opinion, means so much continued development for our great country.

Mr. G. S. White (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak very briefly in this debate and simply for the purpose of making as strong a protest as I can on behalf of the riding which I represent, the riding of Hastings-Frontenac. My protest is against the dictatorial manner in the matter of the procedure adopted by this government in ramming the pipe line bill down the throats of the Canadian people I also protest against the actions of this government in their total disregard for the rules of this house and their flagrant abuse of them.

It is difficult to understand the reasoning and the thinking of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), a man who has had a very distinguished career as a counsel at the bar. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) is also a member of the bar, as are many other members of the cabinet. All of these are men who have had years of legal training and experience and they should at least be able to understand and appreciate what we refer to as the rule of law. They should appreciate the value of the rules of this house and they should understand what properly constituted authority means. Above all, they should realize and appreciate the responsibilities of the private members of this house and the rights and privileges of minorities.

I would like to ask what the Prime Minister or any member of his cabinet who is a member of the bar would say if any court in the Dominion of Canada were to proceed to try a case during the course of which the presiding judge said he would hear only one side of the case or if he were to refuse to hear one of the counsel or disallow the full production and examination of all the facts relating to the case. Why, every single member of the bar would protest in a most vigorous and violent manner. They would say it is contrary to law, contrary to what we describe as British justice, contrary to the rights of individuals, and they would be quite within their rights in disapproving and condemning any such procedure.

In this parliament, which we regard as the supreme court of all the courts in the Dominion of Canada, we have seen the Prime Minister, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), the Minister of Finance and all those who support this government gag, stifle and prevent the free elected members of this house from presenting the views and opinions of the people they represent. They have used the gag to prevent full disclosure of all the facts and the production of all the evidence in relation to this most iniquitous bill, which is simply a sell-out of one of our great national heritages to United States interests. All I can say, Mr. Speaker, is that it is a farce, a tragedy and a mockery of parliament. It is a travesty of justice and the rights and privileges of individual members of parliament. But the day will come, Mr. Speaker, when the full truth and the facts now behind the scenes will be revealed to the Canadian people.

The hon. member who recently spoke on behalf of the C.C.F. party referred to certain statements made in this house yesterday by the Minister of Finance, where at the top of page 4684 of Hansard the minister expressed the opinion that he was not accepting any responsibility for what had happened in this house on Thursday and Friday of last week. I say the Prime Minister and his government must accept full responsibility for what has happened, because it was the Prime Minister, his cabinet and the members who support him who brought in the closure measure which gagged and stifled parliament. The Prime Minister and his cabinet were the ones who agreed upon and decided what procedure would be used in forcing this bill through the house. Any member of the cabinet with a little foresight could easily have seen what would likely happen.

People have said that it could never happen here but these same people have seen it happen here. They have seen the parliament of Canada reduced to the status of a parliament in a country under a dictator. We in Canada are inclined to scoff at what goes on in the so-called parliament that meets in the Kremlin where once or twice a year the representatives of the 16 Soviet republics meet for a two-day session and simply vote for and pass everything that is placed before them.

There are many members of this house who have served in the two world wars. Many other hon. members in this house have sons and daughters who served in one of these wars. Concerning the first war there was a slogan to the effect that the first war was to make the world safe for democracy. To me, if democracy means anything, it certainly means a free parliament. The second war was to defeat Hitler and Mussolini and all the things for which they stood and the methods used by those dictators to achieve power. It is difficult to believe that it has actually happened here, for is parliament not the very cornerstone of democracy? Is our parliament not the custodian of all the cherished hopes and ambitions of free Canadian people? Yet these things which mean so much to the Canadian people have been ruthlessly brushed aside in this house. The rights and privileges of individual members of parliament, along with the rules of this house, have been thrown into discard. This whole tragic farce on the part of this government is simply for the purpose of handing over to United States interests one of the great natural resources of this country, which belong not only to this generation but to many Canadian generations yet to come.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Change the record.

Mr. White (Hastings-Frontenac): He says, "Change the record." I have observed many times during this debate many hon. members on the other side of the house have exhibited mocking, sneering laughter when anybody on this side has stood up and spoken on the rights and privileges of members of parliament. I would like simply to tell whoever made the interruption that in the province of Ontario I have the honour to represent in this house the very large riding of Hastings-Peterborough—no, Hastings-Frontenac.

Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation

An hon. Member: You do not know your own riding.

Mr. Knowles: That is a reminder of redistribution.

Mr. White (Hastings-Frontenac): A redistribution that this government shoved down my throat to cut out a Conservative member. My very large riding of Hastings-Frontenac was settled many years ago by United Empire Loyalists, and their descendants are still there today, the very finest type of citizens in the Dominion of Canada. The descendants of these United Empire Loyalists today have the same respect for the Crown, the flag, British institutions and properly constituted authority as their forefathers had. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that the descendants of these United Empire Loyalists in my riding will never condone or sanction—

Mr. Pickersgill: Attacks on the Speaker.

Mr. White (Hastings-Frontenac): —the actions of this government and what they have done to our free parliament. Has Mr. Jumping Jack something to say? Then stop speaking.

An hon. Member: Take care of your second-class babies.

Mr. White (Hastings-Frontenac): Other hon. members in this debate have already traced the growth of the free parliament in the commonwealth, what a free parliament stands for and what the rights and privileges of individual members of parliament are. I shall not repeat them. But apparently parliament means very little to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In my opinion, no one in this house tonight will ever live to see the day when the prestige of the parliament of Canada will be restored to the position it held before black Friday, June 1, 1956.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh! Hear, hear.

Mr. White (Hastings-Frontenac): Something has gone, and it has gone forever. Call it an intangible, if you wish, but that intangible is something that hundreds of thousands of young Canadians fought to preserve, and this government has thrown it away. No magic wand can bring back what has been taken away. Centuries of tradition have vanished overnight, and what has been accomplished? We now see that the will of the Minister of Trade and Commerce will prevail.

An hon. Member: How about the majority?

Mr. White (Hastings-Frontenac): As other hon. members have suggested, only a new parliament can face the future in this country. The people of Canada must decide the issue, but the Prime Minister made it fairly plain yesterday that he would not have an early election. I would like to draw the Prime Minister's attention to an editorial that appeared yesterday in the Ottawa Journal and a second editorial which appears in today's Ottawa Journal, and I am going to read part of it. The heading of the editorial is "Parliament Should Dissolve". It reads as follows:

> Parliament should be dissolved, and the sooner the better.
>
> For if any one fact emerged from last week's pitiful scenes in the House of Commons it is that this parliament has come to an inglorious end.
>
> It can no longer serve Canada usefully. For it no longer represents the Canadian spirit, but has become an alien thing, inviting not respect but distrust and contempt. To continue such a parliament in being, to drag out its life in miserable futility, would be a sin against Canada . . .
> Aware of these things, as he must be, Mr. St. Laurent will be incurring grave responsibility, taking heavy risk against public good if he insists that this parliament stripped now of moral authority and national respect be dragged on for another year.

If the Prime Minister is not going to have an election, if he is not going to place this issue before the people of Canada, then it is just another example of political expediency on behalf of the Liberal party.

This morning in this chamber many hon. members had the opportunity of hearing the very fine address by the distinguished President of Indonesia. Everyone who heard him speak must have been impressed with his words as he described the struggle in his country for independence and the pride that he expressed when he told us of the first free election of a free parliament in Indonesia, but I say it is fortunate that this statesman was not here in this chamber on black Friday to witness the execution of the Canadian parliament by the guillotine.

An hon. Member: By the Tory party.

Mr. A. J. P. Cameron (High Park): As all hon. members know, I do not often participate in debates. I am very proud, both as a Canadian and as an elected representative, to take part in this debate this evening. I hope the remarks I will make will be worthy of the momentous decision that has to be made in the interests of Canada. Before dealing with the subject of my remarks, in which I wish to prove that this is a beneficial project for the people of Canada, I wish to express my feeling of the atmosphere in which this debate has been conducted and to express my regrets in that connection.

I have the greatest possible respect for the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming). I respect him as a man; I respect him as a lawyer; I respect him as a leader in Y.M.C.A. activities; I respect him as a parliamentarian; but, when he seems to arrogate to himself a superior moral tone, I find that leaves in my mouth a great feeling of distaste. I have listened with considerable regret to the remarks he has made in this house, particularly in reference to my honoured leader and to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). The cruel and caustic remarks of the hon. member for Eglinton are something that I am sure he will live to regret. The mean and unworthy insinuations he has made with respect to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) are entirely unworthy of the hon. member for Eglinton. They are something that I am sure will recoil upon his head. Weak indeed must be the argument, sir, when he has to resort to such tactics. The hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) outside of the house was kind enough to tell me that he got a kick out of me. When I asked him why, he said: "It is because you are never nasty." I should like to return the compliment to the hon. member for Prince Albert. I respect his abilities as a lawyer, as a parliamentarian, but I think he is very much miscast in the role he is called upon to play. He should be treading the boards in New York and not trying to lead the Canadian public down this blind alley which his party is supporting.

There are also some actors on the other side, the juvenile actor for Broadview whose comments I have heard tonight and which are not worthy of reply. Then we have the celebrated team constituted by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I am sure that upon the dissolution of that firm, which I can see is coming very shortly, they should offer their talents to some of the Canadian rugby coaches because I am sure they would make a place as two of the greatest blockers in Canadian football.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nesbitt: You had better fire Cockfield, Brown.

Mr. Cameron (High Park): I am also glad to note that the Senate has not seen fit to remove divorce from the parliament of Canada because when the divorce takes place between the C.C.F. party and the Progressive Conservative party we are going to have a spectacle that will be well worth seeing. I wonder whether the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre remembers the time that his party defeated the leader of the Conservative party. I wonder whether hon. members of the Conservative party remember when the members of the C.C.F. party defeated their present leader in this house in the riding of High Park, which I have the honour to represent. When the divorce proceedings are instituted in this high court of parliament it will be a show in which all the people of Canada will take a great deal of interest.

An hon. Member: Who wrote that?

Mr. Nowlan: Cockfield, Brown.

Mr. Bell: You had better fire Cockfield, Brown.

Mr. Cameron (High Park): I should also like to say something about the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) who made some remarks about the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Hellyer) not being present at a meeting which took place in Toronto on Saturday. There is a very good reason for that. The hon. member for Davenport was here until the last vote was cast early Saturday morning.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): So was I.

Mr. Cameron (High Park): That may be perfectly true, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North says, but undoubtedly, knowing the nature of the meeting in Toronto, organized as it was by the C.C.F. party—

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): No, it was not.

Mr. Cameron (High Park): —I am sure that the C.C.F. party made certain that they would have their representative there, come low tide or high water.

Mr. Fleming: It was not organized by the C.C.F. party.

Mr. Cameron (High Park): I resent the remark that the Liberals from the Toronto area were afraid to be there. We are prepared to face our opposition at any time and look them squarely in the eye.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Then dissolve the house.

Mr. Cameron (High Park): We have nothing to be ashamed of, and we are proud of the record of our party in this particular debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dufresne: We are on the pipe line debate. Did you know that?

Mr. Cameron (High Park): Provision of financial assistance by the federal government to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines to assure the building of the western section of the line this year is a good business proposition. This country stands to gain whether Trans-Canada can repay the loan by April 2 of next year or whether the pipe line company defaults.

Mr. Dufresne: Pick it up.

Mr. Cameron (High Park): I will be very glad to accept the hon. member's suggestion. The agreement executed between the Canadian government and Trans-Canada on May 8 last requires the repayment of the loans in full plus interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum, a rate which, in itself, provides a profit for the people of Canada.

Should the pipe line company be in default, the government can foreclose and assume full ownership of this essential utility at a rate equal to only 90 cents on the dollar of its actual cost. This factor, coupled with the recognized fact that construction costs of the pipe line are increasing at the rate of several million dollars each year, and the Globe and Mail says $24 million each year, makes extraordinary financing of the line this year by the government not only prudent but sound economically.

Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited stands to lose several millions of dollars in cold hard cash and years of intensive unrewarded effort to get the project started. This government and the people of Canada stand to lose nothing; rather, the profit is all on their side.

As at present constituted, the majority interest in Trans-Canada is held by United States interests. In this respect, it fits the ownership pattern of the over-all Canadian oil and gas industry, an industry which we must all sincerely appreciate could not have made its tremendous contribution to our booming economy without the venture capital which has poured into our country from the United States and Europe.

There have been numerous opportunities and invitations for additional Canadian participation in Trans-Canada. This has been a costly venture to support in the past six years. Important is the appreciation that this has been a purely speculative venture. There have been many periods in Trans-Canada's history when the sponsors have had to meet bills running between $200,000 and $400,000 per month. This has represented real venture capital even for the substantial interests behind Trans-Canada. There have been times when the continual demand for financial support has been trying on the sponsors. On such occasions efforts have been made to broaden the base of support through inviting the participation of other Canadian interests. In these efforts Trans-Canada was not successful.

Too, it must be recognized that the ownership pattern of Trans-Canada will change materially when the company is publicly financed. Canadians will be afforded the opportunity to purchase at least 51 per cent of the common stock outstanding at the time of public financing. The present sponsors, consequently, must make more than half of their present controlling position available to Canadians. Whether Canadians avail themselves of this offering is, of course, something over which neither the government nor Trans-Canada has any control but the opportunity will certainly be presented.

Beyond financial control, whatever its final result, is the vital factor that the pipe line will remain forever under the complete jurisdiction of Canadian law. Not a cubic foot of gas can be exported to the United States without a permit from the Canadian government. By the terms of the export licence itself, prices to United States customers cannot be more advantageous to the buyer than those offered Canadian customers. The national interest of Canada is and will be completely protected.

Mr. Mitchell (London): Page 6.

Mr. Cameron (High Park): It is just page 3. It is utterly ridiculous for opposition members to contend there has been inexcusable delay in making a start on the Trans-Canada project. Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited, as presently constituted, is little more than two years old. It was in January, 1954, that the original Trans-Canada company amalgamated with Western Pipe Lines Limited to present an entirely new natural gas transmission project.

It is true that the original Trans-Canada company was incorporated by this parliament in 1951. But it is equally true, and of public record, that the original Trans-Canada company failed in its objective, its proposal to build a pipe line across Canada from Alberta to Quebec which would be entirely dependent on Canadian sales. The original Trans-Canada company spent millions of dollars on gas exploration, extensive market studies and detailed engineering in a sincere effort to reach its goal but found that markets were not immediately available in Canada in sufficient volume to meet the stringent requirements of pipe line financing. Too, the government of Alberta refused to grant the original Trans-Canada company an export licence on the conviction that marketing restricted to Canada could not provide a fair return to Alberta producers.

The Alberta government was firm in its insistence that export to a substantial and readily accessible United States market be at least an integral part of any plan to take surplus gas out of that province. A new Trans-Canada company emerged from this deadlock in January, 1954, a company whose objective represented a compromise between the declared policies of the government of Canada and the government of Alberta.

From the outset, export of Canadian gas to the United States was part and parcel of the new undertaking.

Now we hear much idle talk of delays and failures on the part of Trans-Canada. What are the facts? The facts are that the new Trans-Canada company has made tremendous progress. It must not be forgotten this is to be the biggest pipe line in the world; its capital requirements far exceed those of the St. Lawrence seaway development. Its building will result in a billion dollars being spent in Canada on natural gas facilities within the next three years.

Within four months of the formation of the new company, on May 10, 1954, Trans-Canada was granted an export permit by the petroleum and natural gas conservation board of Alberta to take four trillion three hundred and fifty billion cubic feet out of Alberta in the next 25 years. This export quota represented the total estimated market requirements of Canada in that 2½ decade period and enough to export 200 million cubic feet of gas daily to the United States for 25 years.

Two months later, in July 1954, Trans-Canada appeared before the board of transport commissioners in Ottawa and was granted a provisional permit to build the line across Canada and a spur south from Winnipeg to carry export gas to the Canada-United States border at Emerson, Manitoba. The permit was provisional to the degree the company still had to prove financibility.

In the same month, July 1954, Trans-Canada applied to the board of transport commissioners for a permit to build a pipe line from Niagara Falls to Toronto to bring in a temporary supply of American gas for the metropolitan Toronto area. This interim supply was important because it would temporarily satisfy a pressing need of the Consumers' Gas Company and would assist in the development of a much larger market for Alberta gas when it arrived in Toronto. This Niagara-Toronto line was started within three weeks after the transport board permit was granted, was completed three months later, and the conversion from manufactured to natural gas was in effect in Toronto by November 7, 1954. This 76-mile line cost $5,300,000 and its cost was borne by the sponsors of Trans-Canada.

Simultaneously, Trans-Canada, equipped for the first time with proper authority, embarked on vigorous purchase and sales programs, buying hundreds of billions of cubic feet of natural gas from the Alberta producers and arranging to sell it to utility companies and industries along its 2350-mile route to Montreal. Some considerable progress was made in both directions but, in both cases, Trans-Canada was faced with problems beyond its control. With the exception of a section of southwestern Ontario, none of the communities along the pipe line route had used natural gas nor knew much about it. Utility companies, either public or privately-controlled, had yet to be established in most communities. Thus, in many instances, there was no second party with whom Trans-Canada could negotiate. This is still the case in many centres but most of the large market areas now have gas utility companies and have firm contracts with the pipe line company.

At the other end of the line, in Alberta, purchase contracts were lagging too; it was evident many large producers were going to hold out until they achieved strong representation of their industry within the framework of the pipe line company. This led to a broadening of the base of the Trans-Canada company to include Canadian Gulf Oil Limited, which owns one of the largest gas reservoirs in Alberta, and Hudson Bay Oil and Gas Company Limited, another major and respected gas and oil producer.

Appreciation of the extension of sponsorship was soon evident among producers. Purchase contract negotiations were speeded up; long-term agreements, favourable to both the pipe line and the producers, were much easier to negotiate. At this moment, June 5, 1956, Trans-Canada has signed purchase contracts with Alberta producers for the limit of its export permit.

In the early summer of 1955 Trans-Canada signed a contract with Tennessee Gas Transmission Company to export to this company, at the Manitoba-Minnesota border, 200 million cubic feet of gas daily for a 25-year period. The requirement of the Alberta government to export to an accessible and substantial U.S. market was met to the best of the ability of Trans-Canada. This export requires the approval of the federal power commission of the United States and it is now being considered.

By midsummer 1955, the prospect for making a start on the line in 1956 appeared quite bright. Plans were completed for the importation from the United States of additional interim supplies of gas to serve the area from Toronto to and including Montreal as a market development measure pending the arrival of Alberta gas. The necessary pipe for this line was placed on firm order and an application was made to the federal power commission of the United States for a permit to import the temporary supply. This application is also under consideration by the United States commission at this time.

As late summer, 1955, approached it was necessary to arrange for the scarce 34-inch diameter steel pipe for the 575-mile line to Winnipeg. This created a real problem. The pipe would cost close to $40 million; it was in heavy demand. A firm order was required and this large amount of money—still a highly speculative risk—posed a large problem.

An hon. Member: Read more slowly.

Mrs. Fairclough: Not so fast.

Mr. Cameron (High Park): In late October, with a November 1 deadline for the order looming, Trans-Canada decided to ask Tennessee Gas Transmission if it would consider placing the order on that company's line of credit with the steel company and, in return, assume, if it desired, a sponsoring position in Trans-Canada. Tennessee Gas agreed to the proposal, came into Trans-Canada on an equal basis with Canadian Gulf and Hudson Bay Oil and Gas, and assumed its share of the sponsoring cost of the pipe line company.

Sales contracts continued to grow in overall quantity but still fell short of the amount required to pay the fixed charges on the line, the prime requirement in pipe line financing. It soon became evident that without some form of extraordinary financial assistance, the line could not be started in 1956 and the Canadian government was advised of the problem. It was decided parliament would be asked at this session to provide assistance of assuming the responsibility of building the costly section of the line between the Manitoba-Ontario border and Kapuskasing. At the same time, the strongest possible case was placed before the federal power commission of the United States for the important export to Minnesota, a sale which, had it been approved in time, would have made the entire project immediately economical and financible. This, however, was not to be the case; the import licence was contested by other interests in the United States and the hearing is still in progress.

Meanwhile, time was running out for the 1956 construction period. At best, Trans-Canada needed 120 construction days to build the line from Alberta to Winnipeg.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I am obliged to remind him that his time has expired.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we are opposing third reading of this bill, as we have opposed this legislation right from the start, because we regard it as a bad deal for the people of Canada. There are on the other side of this house those who seem to have fallen for the notion that the purpose of this bill is to build a line that will distribute gas in this country. Surely any who have studied the matter realize that the whole purpose of the promoters of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited and Tennessee Gas Transmission Company which is behind Trans-Canada is to make use of Canadian gas for the purpose of breaking into the profitable industrial market in the central and mid-western part of the United States. True, contracts have been signed as a sideline to distribute gas to some areas in western Canada, including my own city of Winnipeg; but with regard to that I simply say that it has already been made clear that the Winnipeg and Central Gas Company which expects to get gas from Trans-Canada for something of the order of 28 cents a thousand cubic feet has applied for permission to sell that gas to the consumers in Winnipeg at a price of $1.10 a thousand cubic feet. That, of course, is run-of-the-mill practice so far as a private corporation of this kind is concerned.

There are those who think that they are voting on a proposition that will eventually get gas into Ontario and perhaps into Quebec. That could happen. It might happen. But the chances are it will not. To those who have studied the matter—to those who have listened to thoughtful discussions of this matter such as that which we saw and heard on "This Week" on Sunday night over the C.B.C. —it is clear that there is a great deal of uncertainty as to whether this line will ever result in gas being brought into the eastern Canadian market. The purpose of the Tennessee company, the purpose of Trans-Canada, is to get hold of this Canadian gas so that they can use it to break into the United States industrial market and make huge profits out of this resource that belongs to the people of Canada.

There are those who dare to hope that the day will come, despite the efforts being made by the promoters of this company, that there will be a system of considerable proportions distributing gas through the various parts of Canada. If there is any hope that that realization might come about I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that that makes it all the more important that this whole project should be under public ownership and control. If the picture that has been painted for us regarding the distribution of gas in Canada is to be realized, it means that in due course some 30 per cent of the people of this nation could be concerned in this project.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that a project of that significance, a project that might concern some 30 per cent of the people of this country, should not be under foreign private ownership, should not be under private ownership at all, but should be under the ownership and control of the Canadian people. Because this bill sets out to alienate control over this resource and over its distribution to foreign private interests, we maintain that this bill is a bad deal for the people of Canada. We in the opposition are trying our best not just to delay this bill. Let me disabuse others on the opposite side of that opinion. We do not want just to delay this bill. We are still trying to defeat it. In doing so, we are carrying out our responsibilities to the people who sent us to this free parliament.

We have heard a great deal from the other side, including many interjections from the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill), though I do not believe he has made a speech in the debate. I imagine if someone did the arithmetic involved in counting the number of times his name is on Hansard, as has been done for some of the rest of us—quite a compliment, I might say—it would be found that his name is on Hansard quite often, but he has not yet given us a speech. May I say to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and to the rest of the government, particularly to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), and there is something very pointed I want to say to him tonight, that they do not yet seem to have appreciated the fundamentals of this situation. They have made up their minds they want to put this bill through. They come before us and they talk about the will of the majority. They talk about majorities having the right to vote and decide on the issues. I want to deal with that in terms of what I call the fundamentals in just a moment. Before I do so may I indicate just how this decision of the so-called majority was reached. It is set out very clearly for us on page 202 of "The Canadian Liberal", for the first quarter of 1956. This is certainly an official publication because the editorial advisory board is headed by D. K. MacTavish, Q.C., who seems to head a great many things. On page 202 I find a part of the speech which was made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) at that Liberal banquet which was held earlier this year. He said:

> I heard a song a while ago entitled "What Lola wants Lola gets". But the point about all this is that when the decision is made, when the Prime Minister says, "This is the course we will take", Mr. Gardiner follows the party line without the slightest deviation. There is never a word expressed outside the council chamber that he had ever had a different point of view about the matter at issue.

In other words, this decision of the majority that the Prime Minister and the rest of the cabinet tell us must be accepted by parliament is a decision that was first of all made in the cabinet on the basis of that slogan, "What Lola wants, Lola gets".

Now, Mr. Speaker, apart from Lola let me get down to fundamentals. We have heard references in this debate to the British North America Act and Magna Carta. May I remind those who may be quoting the British North America Act that section 50 provides for parliament to remain in office for not more than five years. Section 50 does not say that every elected parliament must remain here five years. No, it allows a parliament to last not more than five years, subject to being sooner dissolved by the governor general. What is the fundamental proposition involved in section 50 of the British North America Act? It is that we have what is known as responsible government. It is different from government in some other countries where a congress or an elected legislature is elected for a set period of time. We have responsible government which is based on the proposition that the government has the constitutional right to go ahead and put legislation through parliament only so long as it has the confidence and support of the majority of the electorate of this country.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, the majority of the members of this house.

Mr. Knowles: When the time is reached when there is any doubt about that matter, when there are serious apprehensions amongst large groups of citizens in the country as to the course the government is following, there is only one thing for that government to do and that is to take a proposition of this magnitude, especially three years after an election, to the people of this country.

Lest my professorial friend, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, is of the opinion that I am just uttering my own dictum let me refer him to an authority on parliamentary procedure. Dr. Arthur Beauchesne. I refer in particular to page lviii, of his third edition.

An hon. Member: That is page 58.

Mr. Knowles: I recognize that is page 58, but it is really page lviii of the early part of the book which is just before page 1. Not only is it just before page 1, but it is basic to everything else that follows. If this debate only went on long enough I would have a chance to read the whole of Beauchesne.

Mr. Pickersgill: Have you not already done that?

Mr. Knowles: I ask the Prime Minister to listen to this paragraph.

> To hasten drastic and contentious legislation through parliament, except on the basis of the clear and unmistakable approval of the majority of the electorate, might, strictly speaking, be legal.

Mr. Prime Minister, what you are asking parliament to do tonight is legal. You have the authority and power to do it.

Mr. Pickersgill: And constitutional.

Mr. Knowles: My hon. friend would do well not to put his name on Hansard quite so often.

Mr. Pickersgill: I cannot hope to compete with you.

Mr. Knowles: I go on to the next sentence and while I am talking to the Prime Minister I do not mind the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration listening in.

But it would be unconstitutional in the sense that it would offend against one of the foundations of parliamentary government, the principle that no party in office shall act so drastically along party lines as to cause grave apprehension among large numbers of citizens or as to be regarded as action designed solely to protect one class of the community, and not the community as a whole.

An hon. Member: Tut, tut.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, some wiseacre over there says, "Tut, tut". That is their regard for the fundamentals of our parliamentary institutions.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Knowles: When my 20 minutes are up I shall be delighted if the minister asks all the questions he likes.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have only one question.

Mr. Knowles: I say that the government is doing precisely what that quotation from Beauchesne says is unconstitutional. It is hastily putting through something on party lines, something that has already caused grave apprehension among large numbers of citizens throughout this country. The Prime Minister knows that the majority of the people in this country do not support him on this pipe-line proposal.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: If you are so sure why do you not tell the Prime Minister to dissolve this house? As a matter of fact, it is my suspicion that the Prime Minister realizes that he should dissolve this house, but it is those members behind him who do not want an election who are trying to keep him from doing it. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, what is being done here tonight by the Prime Minister and this government meets exactly the prohibition in the last part of that quotation:

. . . designed solely to protect one class of the community, and not the community as a whole.

[Mr. Knowles.]

No, it does not quite meet it, Mr. Speaker. It is not designed to protect one class of the Canadian community; it is designed to provide huge profits for a few people outside of this country altogether. I say to the Prime Minister, in the words of that quotation, he has the power to do what he is doing tonight; it is perfectly legal; it will stand up in court but in the strict parliamentary sense of the term, by the rule of everything that is moral and proper, it is unconstitutional what he is asking parliament to do tonight, and that is the reason we are taking the stand that we are, not just a delaying action, but a stand—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: Our aim, Mr. Speaker, is to defeat this bill and we hope that even yet the arguments that we are permitted to make in the next three hours and five minutes will persuade the government that it is trying to foist upon the people of Canada a bad bill.

Last evening the Minister of Finance paid me the compliment of suggesting that I had spoken more than 30 times in this debate. I do not mind that reference, but just to keep the record straight—and I suppose this will produce a bit of humour, but let us have the record straight—this is only the second time that I have actually spoken in this debate itself. All of the other times that I have risen to my feet—and it may be 28 other times or even 50 times—have been on points of order, and I make no apology for doing my best to persuade this parliament that it is not only important to get things done; it is important to do them in the right way.

I wish to point out, Mr. Speaker, that during the course of this legislation there have been a number of instances of what we regard as the breaking of the rules of this House of Commons. It is not my purpose in reciting them at this moment, or reciting just a few of them, at any rate, to argue each case over again. The house has made its decision, but I think we should have a catalogue of what has been done by this government. First of all, a second resolution was put on the order paper when an earlier resolution was already there. We fought that three different times because we felt it was wrong. Then, skipping over some of the minor infractions of the rules, we reached the occasion when, in my view, the government sought to go beyond what was included in standing order 33, the first night we were met with closure, when it brought in the bill the same night the resolution was passed. The government also broke a fundamental rule and presented parliament with a gross insult when it gave us a bill without the agreement attached to it which is referred to in the bill. In due course, we got into committee and we had the Minister of Trade and Commerce, imposing, even before official closure under standing order 33, a form of closure that he devised—unless the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration suggested it to him—that of postponing discussion on the first three clauses, with the result that the only clause we discussed in committee was clause 4. In that connection, since the Prime Minister is fond of reading Redlich, an ancient authority, may I ask him to read a page other than the one he read yesterday. I refer him to page 92, paragraph 3, which reads:

> We may, then, say that the centre of gravity of the whole legislative action of the House of Commons lies in the region of the work of committee of the whole house. It is in committee that the fate of a bill is really decided; its ultimate form is there settled in the clash of parties and opinions or by the compromises made between them. In this stage debate is quite free: members may speak to each question as often as necessary.

Over on page 93 Redlich says this:

> The rules provide, of course, for the application of the closure to debate in committee as well as in the house. It may be moved and carried upon every question before the committee. But its use in committee, except sparingly, is regarded as unwarrantable conduct on the part of the majority. All opinions ought here to have an opportunity of free expression.

That is Redlich, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister's authority, used by him in another debate. I suggest that he read these pages and realize how grave is the sin that he has committed in asking this parliament to give third reading tonight to a bill which, when it was in committee of the whole, was discussed, so far as this house was concerned, only with regard to one clause because we had this vicious form of closure, not only the application of standing order 33 in a way which I feel was in violation of the rules, following the bad precedent of 1932, but we had this other form of closure that the Minister of Trade and Commerce introduced right from the start. That, I say, Mr. Speaker, is in violation of the basic principles laid down in Redlich as well as in other authorities.

I see that my time is running out. I will not be able to complete the catalogue of the rules that have been broken; but, Mr. Speaker, let me say this to you. What has happened throughout this debate? It is not just so much that an individual standing order, an individual rule, an individual citation here and there has been broken; the terrible result is that there has been built up an over-all precedent, an over-all fact that this parliament can never forget; not just that the rules can be broken, but the precedent that has been established in this debate is that parliament can be made to bow to the will of one man. If it has been done once, as it has, it can be done again. No pipe line is worth it.

I conclude with these words. I direct them to the Prime Minister in the hope that even yet, between now and one o'clock tonight, he will reconsider this matter and tell these men behind him who do not want an election that this whole matter is too serious, and take it to the country.

Mr. Viau: We want gas in Winnipeg.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for St. Boniface says, "But we want gas in Winnipeg." Yes, we want gas in Winnipeg, but we do not want it at inflated prices such as we will get under private enterprise.

If I may get back to what I was saying before the interjection of the hon. member for St. Boniface, there is something far more important than gas for Winnipeg, far more important than a pipe line for Canada. That something far more important is parliament, which has been wounded seriously, wounded by what has happened in the course of this debate. I say again that I did not have time to catalogue all the instances of the rules that have been broken in this debate. They are important in themselves; but the over-all result is that a serious precedent has been established, the precedent that the parliament of Canada can be made to bow to the will of one man. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and through you to the Prime Minister, what shall it profit Canada if we gain a pipe line and lose this nation's soul? What shall it profit the people of Canada if we gain a thousand pipe lines and lose parliament?

Mr. Martin: Will my hon. friend permit me to ask a question?

Mr. Knowles: Certainly.

Mr. Martin: There is in the conclusion that he has drawn the suggestion that there has not been enough time for the discussion of this bill. The leader of the C.C.F. acknowledges that to be the case. Will the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre not agree that the longest time ever permitted by the Labour government in the United Kingdom—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin: Let me put my question. The longest time ever permitted by the Labour government during the years 1945 to 1951 on a money bill was four hours and 44 minutes.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, in reply to the minister may I send him a copy of May's fifteenth edition and ask him to read the rules under which the parliament at Westminster operates including rule 29 having to do with closure, where he will see there is quite a different setup so far as closure in that country is concerned.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: It really works there.

Mr. Knowles: Hon. members are laughing, but the Speaker nods his head. He recognizes the truth of what I am saying. I say to the Minister of National Health and Welfare that if he is concerned about the fact that there has not been sufficient time to discuss the pipe line bill in this house I agree with him. I would also agree there has not been sufficient time to discuss what has been happening to parliament. But so far as the time to discuss the pipe line measure is concerned, may I remind him that we were first given notice of the pipe line bill in the speech from the throne on January 10. The Minister of Trade and Commerce gave notice of his first resolution on February 6. On March 15 that first resolution was debated for one day, but it was not until May 14 that we were given the chance to start discussing what was at long last the government's proposition in this field. If anyone is responsible for cutting down the time for discussion of this measure it is the government on the other side of this house.

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, this is the first time I have risen to take part in this debate on the pipe line but I thought I could devote a few moments to dealing with the beneficial effect that the construction of this pipe line would have on Canada. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) said that this would mean the expenditure in Canada of about $1 billion which would include the capital cost of the construction of the pipe line, the capital cost of the distribution of the gas plus the capital cost of assembling and purifying the gas.

In my county of Welland a new company, the Welland Tubes Limited, has been formed as a subsidiary of the Steel Company of Canada and of the Page-Hersey Tubes, Limited. This company is presently building a plant five acres in extent to make 30-inch pipe to build a part of the line from Winnipeg to Montreal. In fact, it has already been announced by Trans-Canada Limited that this company will be awarded a $45 million contract for 30-inch pipe. They should be in operation early in the new year. Besides this, Page-Hersey Tubes, Limited, will be making much of the pipe required in the smaller subsidiary lines necessary for the distribution of gas.

The total length of the pipe line from Alberta to Montreal is about 2200 miles. The pipe for the 34-inch line from Alberta to Winnipeg will be supplied by United States companies at a cost of about $40 million. The 30-inch pipe for the distance from Winnipeg to Montreal will be supplied by British and Canadian firms. The British share is $32 million and the share of the Canadian firm is $45 million or 60 per cent of the 30-inch line. This is a very sizeable order indeed for a company which has the know-how but as yet has no buildings and no machinery, or at least not much machinery for building pipe of this size.

I am impressed with the capable management of Page-Hersey Tubes, Limited, and no doubt they will direct this project. I know many of their men and I feel confident that they are admirably qualified in a technical way to build this pipe.

Ever since the pipe line was proposed I have been in constant touch with the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). I want to thank the minister for saying he would do his best to see that all the pipe that could be made in Canada for this project would be obtained here. I think the minister has been most fair. He has always been out to help Canadian industry and when he has kept Canadian industry at work he has maintained employment at a high level.

Before departing on his trip to Australia I called to the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce the fact that the Atlas Steels company of Welland was somewhat slack. They were making stainless steel. I asked him if he knew about any new market for stainless steel and he told me he would see what he could do. The minister went to Australia and it was not long before the Atlas Steel Company in Welland was working on the stainless steel requirements of the Australian railways. This has opened up a new market for this company in that part of the world and I would express the hope that they can continue to get sufficient nickel to fill their expanding export markets.

I have a letter in my hand dated June 1 from Mr. De Young, president of Atlas Steels company. In this letter he asks me to express appreciation to the minister and his department for the help his company is receiving in their export business. This is a typical attitude I find in industry in my area concerning a man who many opposition members say is a dictator.

The manufacturing of pipe will be a year-round operation. Many workmen experienced in various technical skills will be employed and this will help alleviate the condition of seasonal unemployment in the wintertime. The manufacture of this pipe in Welland will help to boom the economy of Welland county, the Niagara district and Canada as a whole. A good many men will be employed.

I am very much in favour of the immediate construction of this pipe line and will not at this time go into my reasons. I am ready to accept the word of the premier of Ontario as to the need for power and energy in my province.

Mr. Small: Pretty weak.

Mr. McMillan: I recently read an editorial which said in effect there was no shortage of coal and therefore the gas was not required. I think this editorial missed the point completely because if we do not need to import coal because of the availability of gas we will save many Canadian dollars. Then, too, the Consumers' Gas Company of Toronto will be using Canadian gas instead of United States gas as they do now. The opposition parties say we are favouring the money barons of the United States. That is just as sensible as it would be for me to say that by their actions they are favouring the coal and oil barons of the United States. We must not forget that if Trans-Canada makes money, and no doubt it will according to the opposition, the three levels of government, federal, provincial and municipal must have about a 50 per cent share in these profits.

Much has been said about the rules of the house. I have been here since 1951 and it seems to me it is becoming progressively more difficult to expedite legislation particularly if it is of a contentious nature. Democracy here could be more efficient. We have been here for six months and the order paper seems full and not many estimates have been passed. We seem to debate the smaller items at great length and just before parliament adjourns we pass estimates affecting the expenditure of millions of dollars in just a few hours.

Mr. Small: Why didn't the government bring it down before?

Mr. McMillan: The government brought it down in time. The point is, our system lends itself to a certain inefficiency becoming, in my mind, more apparent with the growth and expansion of our country.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Let closed debate fix that.

Mr. McMillan: Considering the pipe line debate from a surgeon's point of view, I have often wondered what would happen to a patient if a surgeon working in the chest or abdomen of a patient had to stop his surgery to listen to long conflicting arguments from his assistants.

Mr. Small: Sometimes they do.

Mr. McMillan: I am afraid it certainly would not be advantageous to the life of the patient. In the same way, this long debate has not been advantageous to the Canadian people. I never realized and I never imagined that so much pain would be experienced in giving birth to this project.

An hon. Member: Gas pains.

Mr. McMillan: I agree that we must have rules of procedure and that these must be based on decisions of the past, but too many rules, many of which seem to conflict, to my mind tend to make our democratic processes inefficient. We should strive to make them effective and dynamic. I think we should be able to contrive rules that would leave protection with the minority but at the same time afford rights to the majority, who in the final analysis must take the responsibility of government. After all, it is the differentiation of these rights that comes into play in the procedure of closure.

Our mother of parliaments at Westminster conducts its business much more expeditiously than we do here. I understand that closure is used there as often as 22 times a session. True, it is more often by agreement, but forced closure does occur as occasion requires. But agreement on closure is more readily arrived at when there is a suggestion of forced closure behind it.

I think that if our parliament is to have the confidence of the people we should be spending more time on the business for which we were sent here rather than on long procedural debates. Repetition of argument on succeeding stages of a bill, particularly by the same speaker, is inexcusable, since it is time consuming and costs the taxpayers money. Some hon. members in this house seem to think that there is something wrong with the application of closure. Even the Prime Minister said it was distasteful to him, but he is to be admired for going through with it when it is for the good of the Canadian people as a whole. The Conservative party has used it two or three times this generation. Now we have used it, supported by the Social Credit party. I think the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis) speaking for the C.C.F., said the other night that it should be used on occasion.

Why then the outcry when approximately three-quarters of the members in attendance in this house have been consistently voting for this pipe-line bill? Under these conditions, would any reasonable, disinterested person say that the bill should not pass? Majorities rule in all western democracies; minorities rule behind the iron curtain and in those parts of the world where tyranny still exists. Why should a minority rule here?

It is time that some sanity returned to this house. The Prime Minister is both gracious and generous. He is too much of a gentleman to reply in kind. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) is also a fine gentleman and has done more in a practical way than any other man in this generation to make Canada great. During the pipe-line debate they have both been smeared by insinuating questions and statements, the like of which I would not like to be on record as using against any person in this world.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Some three weeks have passed now since the government started its plan of muzzling parliament and since it adopted a new type of closure, which is a type of foreclosure to prevent disclosure. One question which has been asked and which has not been answered by the Prime Minister or any of the other ministers is this, and I again throw the challenge out to the government to answer it When in all parliamentary history has this course ever been followed before of adopting closure before discussion begins? I have perused the records of parliament, the history of Britain; I have taken the records of closure during the years; and in large measure it has been imposed as a result of agreement. I can find no trace where in the mother of parliaments such a course was adopted whereby parliament was frustrated from discussion by reason of the actions of the Prime Minister and those associated with him.

As I listened to my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris), last evening, I enjoyed hearing a parliamentary speech made in parliamentary style and I compliment him for that speech. I say to him that he did not answer that question; he evaded that question. History shows that Gerry, the governor of one of the states, finally achieved the unusual distinction of having his name used in connection with gerrymander. Another politician, Roorback, achieved the doubtful distinction of having his name associated, by reason of his conduct, with false and frivolous stories a few days in advance of an election when it was too late to deny them. My hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, too has achieved immortality in having created what I think in future years will be known as the Harris closure, whereby the mouths of parliament are silenced in advance because of the fear of the government that disclosures would defeat the purposes of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

I am one of those—and there are many of us—who love parliament. The House of Commons—with its traditions, its dedication to preserve and maintain freedom, its necessary dependence on the fact that an opposition must be able to express itself fearlessly and powerfully upon the issues of the day—requires rules that are interpreted fairly. As you know, Mr. Speaker, being about to publish a book on the subject of the rules of parliament, the rules of parliament should not be altered, dare not be changed in order to meet the demands of an overwhelming majority. Only yesterday the Prime Minister, in the course of his speech giving one of the reasons for the action the other day which denied the rights of parliament, when the decision of the previous day was reversed in the morning, said that after all that prejudiced the government. I have his exact words, and I asked him to repeat them. "To the prejudice of the government." Is that the basis upon which parliament is operating? Is that the basis by which we in fact, as members of this house, are to be attendants at the will of the Prime Minister and those associated with him? Sir, the events of the last week will be forgotten, but not forgotten in this generation will be the short-cuts through freedom that have been made by a government that has set the zero hour and then curtailed the rights of parliament in order to achieve an arbitrary date. Yes, I did not get the opportunity to ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) last evening what it was that changed his attitude in the last year. Was it not a fact that a year ago he was opposed to advancing money to this corporation? Was it not a fact that a year ago he did not wish to guarantee the bonds of this corporation? He nods assent.

What changed his attitude? What brought about this change? Why this alteration of attitude? Has the Minister of Finance finally concluded that to his left sits the king maker, the Warwick, the man who will determine the next leader of the party to which he belongs?

Mr. Harris: Oh, act your age, John.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He has dominated parliament. Having dominated parliament, are we to say that in the lesser sphere of party politics it would not be beneficial to those who have ambition to have him within their corner? Yes, I ask that, for I find it passing difficult to understand why the Minister of Finance should have deemed it necessary to alter his direction, to change his viewpoint in a matter of a few months. The company that for five years broke every promise, that denied the achievement of everything it advanced, suddenly became even in the mind of the Minister of Finance a puppet equal in favour to the favour it enjoyed in the mind of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Why the change? In order to achieve a temporary victory, the victory of the opportunity of a majority to say "yes", every right of parliament has been mercilessly and brutally mutilated. Yes, Mr. Speaker, your book is out of date even before it is published.

And we have had all of that in but a few weeks, all of that in order to achieve the glory of a victory that depends upon evasion of the rules. Why, Mr. Speaker, can you imagine how the rules have been perverted when today becomes yesterday because, as the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said, otherwise it would have prejudiced the government? Oh, it is a dreadful picture. It is one that the members of this government will hear about, it is one about which the Canadian people are beginning to realize what my hon. friend who just took his seat so emphasized, the need of efficiency. Has that not been the cry of every dictator and every potential dictator in every generation? Parliament works too slowly. They want action now. The rules have been with us for generations. Dump out the rules. Evade them. Place Mr. Speaker in an unenviable position, having established the apex of authority and prestige.

Surely, sir, never in the history of this parliament has there been such sordid action to place Mr. Speaker in a position whereby all of the things for which he stood are to be subverted to the temporary desires of an immediate victory, of a fixed date. Oh, it is quite a picture. It is one that governments in the years ahead will look back upon and their members will say: Was that Liberalism in 1956?

I am going to refer for a moment now to one or two matters that have arisen during the course of the debate, and one of them has to do with prices. On May 29 I spoke in the house and I referred at some length to the representations being made by this favourite corporation, this corporation of which 24 per cent is owned and controlled by Clint Murchison. He is a remarkable man, Mr. Speaker. It has been said of him that he can take one dollar and one dollar and make $11 million. He himself has said that when he has been asked, "How do you do your financing?", he has said, "I do my financing by finagling". Oh, there is a man, a man who, according to his own biography, in his early life thought of the day when he ultimately would be able to take the rest of the United States and add it on to Texas. He has looked a little farther north under this bill. This is the man for whom the rights of parliament have been subverted and the traditions of generations swept aside.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) answered me the other day when I produced the record, and I have it here, the evidence given by Mr. Lowe to whom reference was made yesterday by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew). This is the only price list that has been placed by Trans-Canada Pipe Lines before the federal power commission. When I brought up this matter what did the Minister of Trade and Commerce say? He was aided and abetted by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), although it is a little out of his ambit. As found at page 4426 of Hansard of May 29 the Secretary of State for External Affairs said of myself:

> He does not know what you are talking about.

Charity begins at home, I say to my hon. friend. None of the ministers of the government knew anything about this, or at least the Minister of Trade and Commerce did not, and he went on to say this, as found at page 4426 of Hansard:

> This is the current revised rate schedule for about 140 million cubic feet of gas, contracts for which have been based on this rate schedule.

Then he went on to say that the prices were as follows and he set them out. That was his statement. That was his manner of deluding parliament. He answered me and he said that I distorted. He did not know, Mr. Speaker, that the sales manager of his beloved corporation, Trans-Canada, had given evidence on the 11th day of April in Washington. I can give him the page if he would like to have the page. This man was showing how advantageous this deal was. But the right hon. gentleman said to me that I did not know what I was talking about, that I distorted. Well, Mr. Speaker, the next day he rose in his place in the house and, with that circumspection that does not always characterize his actions, this is what he said as reported at page 4475 of Hansard: I have a correction to make. That is the omnipotent man, the man who dared to say to me that I had placed before the house something distorted. He said, "My figures were not revised".

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): You would not correct anything.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He said my figures were not the truth. I have them here, and if my hon. friend will allow me to place them on Hansard, I will do so.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Do it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They were given in evidence placed before the federal power commission of the United States. This is what the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) said as reported at page 4475 of Hansard:

> I have a correction that has to do with the figures I gave on the cost of gas. The figures appearing on page 4426 of Hansard for May 29 at the end of column 1 and the beginning of column 2, relating to interruptible gas are in error.

Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation

That is the man who told me that I distorted, the man who produces evidence that he had to evacuate the day following. His statement continues:

They were quoted as being the current revised rates, but were read from an unrevised tabulation.

Mr. Speaker, he was not answering me. He was answering his pet corporation.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I would not bother to answer you. You never made an accurate statement in this house in your life.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would ask my right hon. friend to maintain silence and listen to the truth. As I say, Mr. Speaker, that is what he did, and he did not have the courtesy to say, "When I said my hon. friend distorted, charity begins at home". No. He did not do that. Here is the record and I challenge my right hon. friend to let me have the same right as that which we gave him the other day, that of placing this record on Hansard.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Certainly. I have been asking you to table it for the last week.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am asking the same consideration as that which we extended when my right hon. friend produced the revised revised edition.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask the permission of the house to have this document added to Hansard for it tells the story. It reveals the facts. It indicates that Canadians, under the representations being made to the federal power commission of the United States by this favourite corporation; this corporation that has been cajoled, nourished and helped; this corporation whose promises, however often broken, have always been forgiven—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Put your table on Hansard and let us see how phony it is.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is what I wanted to do. I submit the table.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): You read from both tables.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I submit the table.

An hon. Member: The boss gave you permission.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I submit the table which was submitted by Mr. Lowe on April 1, setting out in detail the prices that are expected will be charged between November 1, 1956 and November 1, 1957 and thence year by year until November, 1962.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Would you mind telling me who Mr. Lowe is?

Mr. Fulton: We told you who he is and you would know if you had been listening.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Does the hon. gentleman wish to have this table put on Hansard interspersed between his remarks?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes. That is the purpose.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. gentleman unanimous consent to have that done?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: The boss says yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The table is as follows:

BEL/jp.
November 23, 1955

A simple perusal of this document indicates as follows. My leader yesterday placed on record the figures for the period from November 1, 1957 to November 1, 1958 and so on year by year. In every year until 1962 Canadians are going to pay on the wholesale price approximately 7 cents to 10 cents more per thousand cubic feet than will the Americans. The Midwestern company, of course, is in a dual position.

An hon. Member: Time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Gardiner Symonds is in the position of being a director and one of the bosses of Trans-Canada. He is also the head of Midwestern because it is a subsidiary of Tennessee. He buys cheaply from the Canadian organization and he sells at extremely high prices in the United States. My right hon. friend says that these were phony figures. The only thing phony about them was that they were given by Trans-Canada Pipe Lines corporation before the federal power commission of the United States. I make this suggestion. If they are right—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I am glad you put in that qualification, "if they are right".

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, I say "if they are right". If they are right my right hon. friend, regardless of what the law may be in Canada, is actually helping a corporation to soak Canadians for the benefit of these very desirable promoters, these adventurers from Texas trading into Canada, and away with Canada's resources. On the other hand, if they are false,—and I want to be fair to my right hon. friend because it is his suggestion that they are—may I say that they are the only figures that this company has presented before the federal power commission of the United States. If they are false, the Trans-Canada officers and officials are trying to obtain, by false pretences, an order of a United States commission. I do not care which alternative you take. On the one hand, they are defrauding Canada, if you believe that the figures are correct; and they are certainly in the evidence of Mr. Low, the sales manager. If they are false, the purpose is to delude a United States commission into believing—in order to secure an order from the United States of America—that the price will be advantageous to the United States.

That is the kind of thing that we wanted to have before a committee, Mr. Speaker. The government say they gave us the right to speak, the right to question. In committee, when we asked one question after closure, we were out. We lost our position. We could not follow up. We wanted to see that benign and benevolent man, Mr. Gardiner Symonds. We desired to have an opportunity of finding out how he, on the one hand, as a director of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines, would be able to secure the best price for Canadians and how, as the motivating genius of the Tennessee company and the Midwestern company, he would at the same time be desiring to secure the lowest possible price. Mr. Speaker, the record is there. The Minister of Trade and Commerce the other day was obliged to rise and say to my friend the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Michener), "If my figures are right"; because he pointed out that on the figures given by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, Canadians were being mulcted for the benefit of the people of the United States. He said, "If it is right, I will stop it; I will use the law". What have you been doing?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Nothing.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Confession is good for the soul, even in the dying days of a debate.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): There has been no gas export permit issued.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is exactly what the minister has been doing, nothing, but endeavouring to railroad through the House of Commons legislation for a company the desirability of whose claim is subject to the most serious suspicion. Certainly, there should have been a most serious examination.

Sir, I should like to have dealt with the McMahon plan. I should like to have some of the ministers conduct a little Gallup poll of their own. How many of them saw the McMahon plan?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): We have seen lots of Gallup polls.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What about the Minister of Mines? I never saw it. There were only three copies and the minister had three and they were all private and confidential. I put it to the Minister of Trade and Commerce that he told McMahon to write "private and confidential" on there. McMahon produced the record and the minister said write "private and confidential"—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That is an absolute falsehood, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Diefenbaker: My right hon. friend has often said that. He said it to me the other day and I have proven now that it was he who was deceiving parliament.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), in a speech part of which at least I hope he will regret, suggested that we on this side, and especially we in the government, were putty in the hands of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe).

Mr. Lennard: Aren't you?

Mr. Pearson: He went on to say, with that fine disregard for accuracy which he so often displays—

Mr. Nowlan: He studied under you.

Mr. Pearson: The hon. member was a disgrace to my teaching. "Where are all those members of the government? There is not one of them who has stood up here"—I am proud to be the eighth member of the government to speak on this bill.

We are now, Mr. Speaker, ending a debate which began, and we often forget this, on May 14th.

Mr. Fulton: It began on May 17th, and you know it. Why persist in falsifying the record.

Mr. Pearson: In the immortal words of the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), I asked the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) to maintain silence and listen to the truth. We occasionally forget also that this is a debate on a pipe line. The opposition to this bill has been long and vigorous.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: At times it has been frenzied. It was forecast many years ago, the tactics that should be followed by a Conservative opposition in such a discussion.

Mr. Nowlan: That was when you were a Tory.

Mr. Pearson: I can stand heckling, but I do not like to be insulted in that way. A great Canadian, Mr. Speaker, the late John W. Dafoe, in his book "Clifford Sifton in Relation to his Times", had this to say in describing the tactics of the opposition of 1897 to a railway bill introduced by Mr. Sifton. From his book I quote the following paragraphs which have a peculiar relationship to the debate we have been having in this house. He said:

> If any Canadian satirist wishes to write an oration for the use of an opposition resisting a government proposition to build or assist in building a railway—

Or, if you like, a pipe line.

> —he can readily find his material in that vast repository of talk, the Canadian Hansard. The lines of the attack are defined by usage and sanctified by tradition.

This was written many years ago.

> First it must be urged that the building of the road is too early or too late . . . then the route is all wrong; it either starts at the wrong place or follows the wrong course. The parties to whom the building of the road—

Or the pipe line.

> —is given are not the right parties.

Then, Mr. Dafoe put in quotes some of his own reflections on this.

> "Is not the government aware, Mr. Speaker, that the bankers of London, New York, Paris and Kalamazoo, in alliance with the engineers of Great Britain, the United States, Germany and Kamschatka are eager to build this railway, and given the opportunity are prepared to make a proposition which will save this country millions and rescue the people from the hands of the exploiters whom the government delight to honour?"

Then, Mr. Dafoe went on:

> Since the government cannot tear up the contract any alternative offer can be put in the most attractive light; while conversely, the arrangement, to which the government is committed, is to be painted in the darkest colours. Flagitious, corrupt, improvident, perfidious, knavish, faithless are words very suitable to be used. Any member of the opposition can be trusted to say that the treasury of the country is being robbed in order that means may be obtained for the debauching of the electors;—

Mr. Nowlan: That is obvious.

Mr. Pearson: I continue the quotation:

> —but only those most skilful in the art of innuendo should be permitted to hint that there is a private and sinister explanation of the favouritism displayed by the minister. By the use of some such formula an opposition running to interminable length can be offered.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the opposition has undoubtedly run to an interminable length, but there has not been as much discussion on the bill during this interminable length as on things external to the bill. This is probably a good reason why the Minister of External Affairs should take part.

The opposition, of course, claim, and they claim very often, to be gagged. If that is true, Mr. Speaker, they are the noisiest group of gagged men in history. They have talked, gag or no gag, endlessly on the bill, around the bill, above the bill and below the bill. They have ranged far and wide from Alcibiades, through Shakespeare down to poor old Guy Fawkes and then on to Hitler. They have raised endless points of order, questions of privilege, especially from one or two members.

A charge, and it is a serious one, has been levelled that what we are witnessing in this debate is the end of our parliamentary freedom.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: Well, that is the charge, Mr. Speaker.

Mrs. Fairclough: Absolutely right.

Mr. Pearson: What in reality are exaggerated and excitable statements cannot destroy the facts any more than carefully contrived scenes in the House of Commons can obscure them. Parliamentary government is in danger when the government elected in a democratic way is prevented from carrying on the business of government by a minority using and exploiting the rules of the house. To prevent that, Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: What about closure?

Mr. Pearson: I wonder if some of the apostles of free speech would allow me to continue my speech. To prevent this, there are rules of closure recognized in every deliberative assembly, and in most of them the rules are far stricter than they are in this assembly. That rule has been applied here, not to stop debate but to limit it. In that connection, reference has been made very often to the use of closure in the mother of parliaments, about which we have heard so much in the discussion. Let us see what happens in the parliament at Westminster. From 1945 to 1951, which was the period when the Socialist government was in power in the United Kingdom, the maximum time actually devoted to the consideration of any government money bill by the House of Commons during that period of six years was 21 hours and 25 minutes.

Mr. Dufresne: It was defeated since.

Mr. Pearson: And of that total time, including 44 minutes on the resolution preceding the bill, 7 hours and 18 minutes were given to second reading, 10 hours in committee, 22 minutes on the report and 2 hours and 35 minutes on third reading.

In the six Socialist sessions covered by this period, 55 money bills became law in the United Kingdom. Altogether, they took up 260 hours, 9 minutes, of parliamentary time, which would suggest—

Mr. Knowles: Good legislation.

Mr. Pearson: —that the average time spent in debate on a bill over there during that parliament was 4 hours and 44 minutes. That country, Mr. Speaker, the home of parliamentary freedom, also understands the necessities of parliamentary government, the responsibilities and rights of the government as well as of the opposition.

There is going on tonight in Paris, Mr. Speaker, a debate on which the government of that country has staked its existence. Before that debate began a period of three days was allowed for it. Is that the end of democracy in France?

Some hon. Members: Pretty much.

Mr. Pearson: Or is the real danger to democracy in France from the extremists in that country, right or left, who delay, obstruct, provoke scenes, shout down the presiding officer, or walk out? Extremists in those countries know, Mr. Speaker, that the best way to destroy democratic government —and in some of them they have succeeded —is to prevent it from governing; that the way to destroy freedom is to promote licence and confusion, and the best way to destroy democratic authority is to bring it into ridicule.

Mr. Hees: Is this your pitch for the leadership?

Mr. Lennard: No; it is his swan song before leaving.

Mr. Pearson: The hon. member for Broadview, whose interruptions in this debate are as vociferous as they are vacuous, must remember that all members are not consumed with the political ambition that seems to consume him.

Mr. Sinclair: Back to the bush leagues.

Mr. Pearson: The people of this country are not going to believe that a Liberal government headed by the present Prime Minister is going to destroy the liberties of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: There is no one in this country who is also going to believe that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), who has done so much for Canada in peace and war, is—to use, Mr. Speaker, the shameful phrase that came from the other side—the tool of United States interests.

Mr. Hees: Do you think you can catch Walter?

Mr. Pearson: The hon. member for Broadview is a physical heavyweight but a mental featherweight.

Mr. Hees: You were ahead last year but not this year.

Mr. Pearson: If we could have a little free speech for once I would appreciate it. I now come to a very important aspect of this discussion which has been referred to by a good many speakers, and that is the international side of the question. It has been suggested in the debate that our relations over this bill with the United States have been humiliating; that this bill represents a sell-out to United States interests.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, there is no reason for not speaking very frankly on our relations with the United States of America on any subject. I have done it in the past and I hope to do it in the future. But it is no service to our country or to the United States to indulge in unfair references to Americans, to make destructive and insulting comments on United States investment; to use coarse epithets and charge that our resources are falling into the hands of United States buccaneers.

Mr. Nowlan: What does the New York Times say today?

Mr. Pearson: It is humiliating and degrading to suggest that we are becoming hewers of wood, drawers of water and diggers of holes for our United States neighbours.

Mr. Hees: That is your Montreal speech.

Mr. Pearson: That is a defeatist attitude. It is as defeatist as some of the references on the other side to 54-40 or fight, or to suggest that we are becoming a banana republic. I know the members of the opposition get quite violent in denying that they are unfriendly to United States investments in Canada. Well, if they are so friendly to United States investments in Canada why scare them away with this kind of talk?

Mr. Lennard: Oh, rot.

Mr. Fleming: Hand it to them on a platter.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Hees: Where else would they invest it?

Mr. Pearson: Their attitude, Mr. Speaker, reminds me of the old English music hall ballad: "I forgive you, my dear, for dissembling your love, but why did you kick me downstairs?" There is no danger of our losing control in Canada of any investment in Canada in connection with any project under Canadian control, federal and provincial, as this one is.

A good deal of talk has occurred in this debate about the analogy of the Canadian Pacific Railway. There was a case of a Canadian enterprise being controlled, not in theory, but in fact, out of Canada, in London, and at a time when Canada was not a self-governing free country as she is now, but at a time when Canada was a colony ruled from Downing street. Did it stop our growth, politically and economically? It did not. Who says, then, that this trans-Canada pipe line project will stop our growth politically or economically, or sell us to any outside country?

Mrs. Fairclough: Now I have heard everything.

Mr. Pearson: It is just as well that we should stop talking, even the hon. lady from Hamilton, if it is not too much to ask, in a way which is going to disturb the inflow of needed capital into this country.

Mr. Hees: You were ahead last year.

Mr. Pearson: I take the hon. gentleman's interruption as a tribute to the fact that I am getting under their skin. Next year, $7,500 million will be invested, capital investment, in Canada, 23½ per cent of our gross national product. We shall not be able to find all that money in Canada. We must get some of it from outside, especially from the United States, if we are to maintain the development which we have begun—

Mrs. Fairclough: Let us get the $80 million, too.

Mr. Pearson: —unless we want to slow down the development; but let there be no suggestion, because we have had this $600 million worth of capital come into this country last year and maybe more next year, that that makes us a satellite.

This country, Mr. Speaker, Canada, in the councils of the world has won a reputation for frankness, for independence, above all, for courage in facing the problems of development and for energy to conquer them. Therefore, let us get ahead and pass this bill and take one more step in national development.

Mr. G. C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, some years ago when it was my good fortune to first speak to this house I happened to follow the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) and although I was a very junior member of this house I regretted the fact at that time, having just come in the same day as I did, and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) and five others, that he had seen fit to make a narrow-minded partisan speech thereby projecting the Department of External Affairs into the realm of party politics. He is my personal friend but at the same time he is the gentleman who happens to occupy the position of Secretary of State for External Affairs and all I can say is that if the world is now dependent on three wise men of whom he is one then I hope they are following a star which is brighter than that which is leading the Secretary of State for External Affairs tonight.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mrs. Fairclough: Aw.

An hon. Member: Can't take it, eh?

Mr. Nowlan: He is going to lose his bearings in this debate and also in international situations and I think we all regret the fact he had to intervene—

Mr. Hosking: Sour grapes.

Mr. Nowlan: My hon. friend says "Sour grapes".

An hon. Member: You are jealous.

Mr. Nowlan: I would like to see the Secretary of State for External Affairs go from the government of Canada to democratic assemblies throughout this world and say, "I represent a democracy". He cannot do it.

Mr. McCann: Says you.

Mr. Nowlan: That is why he spoke so forcibly and that is actually why he feels so bad about the situation. We are trying to maintain a situation in this parliament and we all have a personal respect for individuals in this house. Many of us have a personal liking as well as a respect for many on the other side of the house but this is a situation which transcends those things and tonight—it is now five minutes after eleven; no, six minutes after eleven, because every minute counts, every second counts—in one hour and 54 or 55 minutes we are going to have—

Mrs. Fairclough: The axe.

Mr. Nowlan: —the axe fall. Like the condemned man who has had his breakfast at midnight, we are going to hear the footsteps of the hangman coming down the corridor.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nowlan: All right, I know that you can make these noises and perhaps one tends to be a little melodramatic but nevertheless that is the situation as many of us see it tonight, Mr. Speaker.

Two weeks ago tonight I happened to be speaking on the second reading of this bill. We had had interminable discussions about procedure but two weeks ago tonight when I raised a certain matter the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill) said, "Defer that until you get to the committee stage and we will deal with it there." Where was the committee stage, Mr. Speaker? Clause 1; moved consideration be deferred. Clause 2; moved consideration be deferred. Clause 3; moved consideration be deferred; and tonight I heard the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration say it is the right of parliament—not of the people but the right of the majority of parliament—to decide what shall be and what shall not be done.

An hon. Member: That is right.

Mr. Nowlan: I grant that, under certain circumstances; but the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration is a student of history. I think he will remember what happened to the Long Parliament. He will remember how the members of that parliament said exactly the same thing, that it was up to the majority to control, until in the end someone came along and said, "In the name of God be gone; you have tarried here altogether too long."

That is the situation which perhaps confronts us tonight, Mr. Speaker, when we are dealing with this matter at this time, because we have gone through debate. As my hon. friend the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) pointed out tonight, this is not a debate on a pipe line bill as such. That was authorized five years ago. Those things were sanctioned by parliament and the franchise was granted by the Department of Transport five years ago. What we are considering tonight is not the operation of a pipe line as such but the financing of it by this parliament, which is an entirely different thing. What we are considering tonight is the—

Mrs. Fairclough: Loaning the money.

Mr. Nowlan: —loaning the money, as my friend the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) says.

Mr. Diefenbaker: United States investment in reverse.

Mr. Nowlan: We are considering the fact that having authorized the franchise of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited five years ago, and that company having made application to the board of transport commissioners and all the rest of it, we are now asked to provide the money for the project. Someone has said that we the opposition, the C.C.F. and this group, are delaying this matter—after five years!

Where are we tonight, Mr. Speaker? We are asked to provide the money. We started out presumably to build the so-called bridge across northern Ontario. We moved from that and now we have to loan millions of dollars for the construction of that portion of the line which these entrepreneurs, when they came before us five years ago, said was the easiest part. They said it presented no difficulties whatsoever and as a matter of fact neither did the northern Ontario line because even if the northern Ontario section cost more, think how cheap it was to build the line across the prairies and they could average the two. On the basis of those assurances the committee of this parliament and the board of transport commissioners gave authority to them to go ahead and now we are facing this situation tonight. It is really a ludicrous situation in many ways, because, as the member for Winnipeg North Centre pointed out, the pipe line has already been authorized, and as appeared in the press tonight from the pen of a distinguished Canadian columnist there is going to be lots of gas to be transported in this country; we are simply laying the foundation of how it is to be transported and it is a most unfortunate thing that in this we should have bogged down in the way we have.

Why have we done it? Because before this measure came before parliament the executive saw fit to enter into an agreement whereby they said this shall be done by June 7. There was no reference to consulting parliament in the agreement or the passing of legislation by parliament. The executive said, this shall be done by June 7, and that was the thing with which this parliament was confronted when this bill first came into the house. I can say, without any fear of contradiction, there has never been a more indecent form of closure imposed upon any parliament in the world than that in the form of the agreement entered into by the executive with the United States tycoons before the executive brought legislation into the house.

I think I can say this. I notice the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) is not here at the moment, but I think I can say this as one Baptist to another. This Machiavellian Baptist on the other side of the house now says, "Well, my friend from Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) said in a radio broadcast—

An hon. Member: Another Baptist.

Mr. Nowlan: —that there was going to be a filibuster and the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) made a statement to the effect that a filibuster was going to be made." Those are not the reasons why closure was imposed; they have nothing to do with it. Closure was inevitable once this government, behind the backs of parliament and with no consultation with it, went ahead and entered into this agreement whereby June 7 became the date of execution by parliament. Make no mistake about that. They tied the hands of this parliament. When they hide behind certain indirect statements or direct statements which may have been made, then it simply shows the weakness of the case.

That is the only reason why we have closure at this time. My hon. friend, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) once said he had a crystal ball into which he gazes from time to time. Probably he gazed into the crystal ball and saw there was going to be some resistance to this in parliament. And why should there not be? If the opposition realizes its responsibilities, why should there not be? In addition to whatever may be said about the bridge across northern Ontario, we are called upon to lend $80 million to United states entrepreneurs so that they may build a pipe line across Canada whereby they can carry Canadian gas into the United States. That is the situation.

There have been many United States visitors sitting in the galleries in the past few days, and I hope there are some sitting here now. The other day a friend of mine was sitting in the gallery, and one of them was sitting alongside him. He was asking what this fight was all about. My friend said, "It is a question of a bill whereby the government of Canada is asking to borrow money whereby it can finance a company that is 83 per cent United States controlled to build a pipe line whereby Canadian gas ultimately can go into the United States." The American replied, "If they had the sense that God gave geese, they would be opposed to that." I think that is common sense. That is why some of this debate has gone on in the way in which it has.

Much has been said about the fact that there have been 14 days of debate. The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) dealt with that today. The time that has been given to the debate on this pipe line per se has been very much restricted. No one knows it better than my friends over here, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, who have a knowledge of history and some understanding of what I mean. If they had been sitting in this opposition—

An hon. Member: Where they should be.

Mr. Nowlan: I wonder what the Secretary of State for External Affairs would have said about this if he had been sitting here. I can imagine the fulminations, the speeches he could have made about this horrible, atrocious thing that a government was doing at this time and under these circumstances. That is why, when they talk for 14 days or 16 days or whatever it may have been, the opposition has been trying to develop, during the latter part of this debate at any rate, the rights of parliament itself. Those are much more important than the pipe line itself, important as it may be.

Why are we facing this step tonight? We were told from the beginning that there was a great need for haste. We were told that the steel necessary for pipe might be sold to the Arabians or somewhere else, that it was in such short supply that unless the parliament of Canada passed this bill by June 7 Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited might lose that steel. That was the only argument that has ever been advanced, as far as I can remember, for the passage of this bill.

Yet what did we hear this afternoon? What did we hear from the Minister of Finance? He said that for 14 or 16 days, or whatever the number of days may have been, the government had been urging that the bill had to be passed because there might be a shortage of steel, but perhaps they were wrong and perhaps, looking at the economic situation, there would not be any shortage of steel. Perhaps there is going to be a depression; perhaps there is going to be unemployment. He suggested that there might be a surplus rather than a shortage of steel, that there might be unemployment rather than full employment and therefore we should pass this bill to provide employment for Canadians who might be otherwise unemployed if by chance there is a surplus instead of a shortage of steel. I suppose the minister has been so close to the United States entrepreneurs who have said, "Heads I win; tails you lose", that he said that if he could not be right in one way he would be right in the other. If they said there was going to be a shortage of steel and then there was a surplus; if they said there was going to be a tight employment situation and then there was a need for employment; the legislation should still be passed.

I wonder just what the government intended. I wonder what the Prime Minister thinks. A few moments ago the Secretary of State for External Affairs referred to this government as headed by the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister is one for whom all of us have a great deal of liking and had a great deal of respect, but I hold in my hand a statement from the Winnipeg Free Press with respect to that gentleman heading this government. I can quite understand why he has sat nebulously quiet, why like a chameleon he shifted from one colour to another and said nothing and did nothing. Apparently the government itself did not know what it was doing or what it was going to do. This is by Mr. Grant Dexter who certainly is no Conservative. Referring to this debate in the last few days, he said this in the Winnipeg Free Press.

> Through all of this hubbub, the most arresting figure on the government side of the house was Prime Minister St. Laurent. He sat, impassive, expressionless, chin in hand, an open book on his desk, silent.

An hon. Member: And dignified.

Mr. Nowlan: It goes on:

> His aloofness is almost unbelievable.
> Especially at a time of high controversy, Prime Ministers, regardless of who the house leader may be, always dominate proceedings and lead their own party. Mr. St. Laurent does neither.

That is a statement from one of the leading Liberal newspapers in Canada, if not the leading one. When my hon. friend, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, asks, "Can we not have unqualified and undoubted trust in this government led by the Prime Minister", against this I cite this statement of Mr. Grant Dexter and I ask him how the two may be reconciled.

I come from a province which is not directly affected by this pipe line. We are going to help pay the bill. We are going to get no benefit directly or indirectly from it. In fact, we are going to suffer detriment because of it, because when the gas flows, if it does—and we do not know how we are going to bridge the gaps or tie them together—but assuming by some legerdemain they can do that, then the coal miners in Nova Scotia, my province, are going to suffer because of this bill. I say that notwithstanding the fact that they say this pipe line has to be built, it had better all be built by the government rather than built of this conglomeration of misfits and misjointed pipes such as we have at the moment.

In addition to that, Mr. Speaker, I come from a province that produced another Howe, Joseph Howe, the leader of the Liberal party of Canada, the one who objected to agreements made behind the back of parliament, the one who opposed the family compact, that which the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris), and the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) personify today, the one who established responsible government in Nova Scotia because he fought those very same things that our friend, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, today personifies. So the wheel has come full circle, Mr. Speaker. We have the Joseph Howe of 100 years ago who established the Liberal party in this country now being confronted by the machinations of the C. D. Howe who controls the Liberal party in this country today. Dust to dust, ashes to ashes and Howe to Howe, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Elmore Philpott (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, when the famous Canadian novelist, Lionel Shapiro, returned to Canada a month or two ago he wrote a special editorial for Maclean's magazine. He said that Canadians were too dull, that we never got excited, that in particular the parliament of Canada, the House of Commons of Canada, was dull as dishwater, that nobody ever lost his temper and that it would be a very good thing for the parliament of Canada and for the whole of Canada if somebody got excited once in a while in the House of Commons of Canada. On June 1, which was last Friday—

An hon. Member: Black Friday.

Mr. Philpott: Black Friday for my friends opposite. On June 1 last, black Tory Friday,

Northern Ontario Pipe Line Corporation

the London news service carried the following cable reporting the comments on Canada of the famous novelist, J. B. Priestley, as found in the Ottawa Journal and other papers:

> The average Canadian was beginning to feel frustrated and was experiencing a desire to express his Canadianism. These "wary, dubious, rather shy and withdrawn" people, struggling to assert their individuality, needed to have "their temperature raised".

That was written at about the same time last Friday when my hon. friends opposite were in the centre of this house. I am going to try tonight not to raise anybody's temperature but although I may have something very nice to say a little later about my old personal friend, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), I have to set him straight on his history because I am afraid that the same history professor that we both sat under, the late Professor George Wrong, would not have thought too much of the ideas he was giving about Gladstone last night when he was holding up Gladstone as a man who was against closure. The way I read the history books and as I was taught by Professor George Wrong—

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege—

An hon. Member: Wait till after.

Mr. Drew: —I am not going to have history rewritten in this way because the quotation I gave from Gladstone written in 1878 had nothing to do with closure but had to do with the legitimate demand for the dissolution of parliament when a condition arose in which there was no justification for parliament continuing.

Mr. Philpott: I am glad to see that the Leader of the Opposition, like the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), can make a correction too.

Mr. Knowles: Newspaper columnists might do the same.

Mr. Philpott: It is very clear if we study the history of closure and how we got closure, and it should be clear to my hon. friends opposite, including the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who certainly knows better although he has pretended not to in this debate, that the great old mother of parliaments, the country that gave the parliamentary system to all of the democracies in the world, applied the first closure in the whole British commonwealth in the year 1888, and applied closure then after about five or six years of deliberate sabotage of the parliamentary system by the Irish nationalist party led by the great Parnell. But with all the great tricks of obstruction which Parnell used and which forced the institution of closure in the British parliament, I think that even Parnell never brought up anything such as the obstruction twins, the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) have brought up.

Mr. Knowles: What a Liberal.

Mr. Philpott: So, Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to put on the record, in the same way that the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) did, a much shorter table than he put on the record a few minutes ago. I ask permission to put on the record a brief statement giving a complete analysis of the number of closures in the last seven sessions of the British parliament from 1948 to 1955 inclusive.

Mr. Fulton: What is your source?

Mr. Knowles: What is the source?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Has the hon. member unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. As there is not unanimous consent the table may not be placed on Hansard.

Mr. Philpott: I take that as an example of exactly the kind of courtesy we have in this house.

Mr. Knowles: I rise on a question of privilege.

An hon. Member: Oh, sit down.

Mr. Knowles: There is never any denial of consent to put tables on the record if their source is given. The hon. member has made up this table himself.

An hon. Member: Oh, listen for a change.

Mr. Philpott: I will now give the figures which the obstruction twins will not permit to be put on the record.

Mr. Fulton: Your party put on closure.

Mr. Philpott: In the 1948-49 session, from October 26, 1948, to December 16, 1949, there were 15 closures by agreement and four closures not agreed to, that is, opposed by the opposition, or a total of 19. In the 1950 session, from March 1, 1950 to October 26, 1950 there were eleven closures by agreement and two closures not agreed to, a total of 13. In the 1950-51 session, from October 31, 1950 to October 4, 1951 there were 23 closures by agreement and 11 closures not agreed to, a total of 34. In the 1951-52 session, from October 31, 1951 to October 30, 1952 there were 50 closures agreed to. I point out, Mr. Speaker, that it seems there was a sudden rise after the Churchill government took office. There were also ten closures not agreed to, or a total of 60. In the 1952-53 session, from November 4, 1952 to October 29, 1953 there were 20 closures by agreement and seven closures not agreed to, a total of 27. In the 1953-54 session, from November 3, 1953, to November 25, 1954 there were 23 closures by agreement and 7 not agreed to, a total of 30. Finally, in the 1954-55 session, from November 30, 1954 to May 6, 1955 there were six by agreement and four not agreed to or a total of ten.

For the seven years there is a total of 148 by agreement and 45 not agreed to, or a grand total of 193. Therefore when my hon. friends opposite have the unmitigated gall or colossal ignorance to say in one and the same breath, why do we not have British fair play in this house, why do we not follow the British system, how ignorant can they get or how deceptive can they be?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: Tell us what the Canadian practice has been.

Mr. Philpott: Let us look at the British rules. At page 23, rule 29, we find the rule on closure of debate and it shows very clearly that any member, not just a cabinet minister giving 24 hours' notice as here, may move closure at any time and provided that motion passes by a majority, which includes 100 members of parliament, closure is effective immediately.

Mr. Knowles: Read the qualifying clause.

Mr. Philpott: I am making my own speech.

Mr. Knowles: Read the qualifying clause.

Mr. Philpott: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has been obstructing this house for six months and his time is up.

Mr. Knowles: You omitted the part about what happens when the closure motion appears to the Speaker as an abuse of the rules.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Philpott: Just a minute, your time is coming. About 10 days ago in this house you could have been saved from your folly if you had heeded the wisdom of the wise old man in your party who dragged himself from his sick bed and tried to tell this house that they were on the wrong track; who said he believed in closure and that we had to get back on the track somehow. When the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) almost immediately accepted that suggestion in the spirit in which it was given, without one moment's hesitation it was rejected by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) and my hon. friends opposite.

Mr. Knowles: What a distortion.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Hans Andersen.

Mr. Philpott: I understand that the real objection of the C.C.F. is, of course, that closure is all right if it is done 148 times in Britain by agreement—

Mr. Nicholson: How many times in Canada?

Mr. Philpott: —and 45 times by non-agreement, a total of 193 times. I understand that my hon. friends opposite claim that closure in this case was too soon, or that the debate was choked off too soon. I have here in my hand Hansard of March 15, 1956 on the very first day that the very first pipe line resolution was introduced into the house. As reported at page 2162 we find this:

> Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That was the resolution on the first pipe line bill. There is the first motion. Right off the bat every C.C.F. member who is sitting across there tonight voted against that resolution to introduce the first pipe line bill into the house. Let us remember who were the men who voted against it, and they were the only ones in this whole house in any of the three parties. They were:

Argue	Johnson (Kindersley)
Barnett	Jones
Bryce	Knight
Bryson	Knowles
Cameron (Nanaimo)	McCullough (Moose Mountain)
Campbell	Nicholson
Castleden	Noseworthy
Coldwell	Regier
Ellis	Zaplitny
Gillis
Herridge

Mr. Knowles: Knowles is still against the bill.

An hon. Member: We are still opposed to it.

Mr. Philpott: A few pages over we see what happened on that day and we have seen what has happened since and how my hon. friends the Tories since that time have been led down the garden path by their new allies. Here is what my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) said about that gesture at that time as reported at page 2171 of Hansard:

> Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, we supported the motion that the Speaker leave the chair, not because we approve of the motion now before the committee but because we wanted an opportunity before this committee to indicate why we think this resolution should be opposed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: In view of the comments from hon. members to my left I would point out that nothing is gained by the silly gesture they made this afternoon.

I would suggest therefore that although the C.C.F. opposition have said that we had closure too soon, if they had had their way we would have had closure before one single word was allowed to be said by any member of any party in this whole house.

Mr. Speaker, we have seen in this house in this past few weeks scenes which would better be forgotten as quickly as possible. We have had protests raised about the death of parliament and all that sort of tommyrot. I do not believe there is an hon. member in any part of the house who thinks so, including hon. members in the two parties or the parts of the two parties that oppose this bill, because I think we should never forget that it is only part of the two parties which have opposed this bill, and that the whole Frost Conservative government has supported the government in this matter and is still supporting the government in it and of course the Conservatives' own oil and gas expert, the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Nickle).

Mr. Pallett: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Philpott: Let us remember, Mr. Speaker, why there was disorder.

Mr. Pallett: On a question of privilege—

Mr. Nicholson: This is a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Do I understand that the hon. gentleman is rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Pallett: Yes.

An hon. Member: A fraudulent one.

Mr. Pallett: Having regard to the statement about the whole provincial Conservative party, I would direct the hon. member's attention to today's press.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Philpott: Mr. Speaker, I hope that you are not docking my time as a result of the obstruction tactics of the hon. gentleman opposite.

An hon. Member: Talk all night.

Mr. Philpott: We saw tonight quite a demonstration of the great histrionic abilities of the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). But the hon. member for Prince Albert has one great weakness as a politician. He has a great faculty of letting the cat out of the bag too soon. On March 10, in a radio broadcast, five days before the first bill was ever introduced into the house, this is what he said:

> The defence production filibuster, highlight of the 1955 session of parliament, will look like a "skirmish" alongside planned Progressive Conservative opposition to the trans-Canada gas pipe line bill this session, John Diefenbaker said Friday night.

I would mention the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) but he is not here. He is elsewhere and has been all through this debate. I will therefore let that matter skip.

Mr. Knowles: He is out with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner).

Mr. Philpott: I say that all of the obstruction that has occurred in this house was deliberate and planned obstruction and that all of this great wail that is going up now about the loss of rights was the inevitable result of what was planned by hon. gentlemen opposite. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that democracy cannot function—

Mr. Lennard: It has not been functioning for the last couple of weeks.

Mr. Philpott: —unless there is a full opportunity for fair discussion and free debate;—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Philpott: —and unless the majority is willing to respect the rights of the minority,—

An hon. Member: They have not done so.

Mr. Philpott: —and to allow the minority to advance all of the arguments they have to advance. I will submit to hon. gentlemen opposite that they would be much farther ahead in this debate and certainly much farther ahead in the respect of the people of the country if, instead of carrying on the obstruction tactics which they have been using in the past several weeks, they had debated the merits of public ownership versus private ownership or who was going to build the pipe line.

Mr. Lennard: Oh, sit down and write your column.

Mr. Philpott: Mr. Speaker, every hon. member in every part of the house who had any point of order to raise was given every possible chance to raise that point of order.

Mr. Knowles: That is not true.

Mr. Philpott: So long as hon. members opposite were willing to act as Her Majesty's loyal opposition they had every right that is granted to them in this and every other British parliament. But when they chose to pervert their points of order to points of deliberate disorder, we had the chaos that we had last Friday afternoon.

I would say just this in closing, Mr. Speaker. I am not going to make any personal references, but I would like to say a word concerning the unfortunate incidents that occurred to one member from Tory Toronto. Of course, there have been Toronto members here who were, shall we say, given a leave of absence from this house before now. I am not even going to say anything about the terrible use or abuse of the most sacred symbol of a country, the flag of this country, which was draped on the desk of a man who had broken the most fundamental rule of this house. But I would say this.

Mr. Lennard: Time.

Mr. Philpott: If for any reason—

Some hon. Members: Time. Order.

Mr. Philpott: —my hon. friends opposite bring out a flag again for that kind of thing, let them bring out the right flag for the occasion. Let them bring out the skull and crossbones, the black and white flag of piracy.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am recognizing the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Cameron), but do I understand the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) is rising on a point of privilege?

Mrs. Fairclough: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I take great exception to the remarks which have just been made. There are times when the only answer to actions which have been taken in this house is to display the great symbol of democracy and for that action I make no apology.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): I cannot hope, of course, to compete with the oratory of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott) but I can start with a complete reading of a clause in the British rules of procedure which he omitted. He read part of that clause, but he very carefully omitted this:

> After a question has been proposed a member rising in his place may claim to move that the question be now put, and unless it shall appear to the chair that such a motion is an abuse of the rules of the house or an infringement of the rights of the minority the question shall forthwith be put.

I can understand perhaps the hon. member deciding, in the light of certain things that have happened recently, that such a clause is totally irrelevant to this house.

Since we have heard many great authorities on parliamentary procedure, Mr. Speaker, I want to place on the record a very humble authority, no one of any great distinction particularly. He is Dr. Arthur Beauchesne who today in the Toronto Star has expressed his views about this government and the manner in which they have treated parliament. I put it on the record now:

> The government had invoked closure too soon, before the debate even started, Mr. Beauchesne said. "They should wait until questions have been debated two or three weeks, then give notice of closure." He also described as incorrect Right Hon. C. D. Howe's device of postponing "further discussion" of clauses in committee stage—when there has in fact been no discussion.
> Correct procedure would have taken time, he admitted, "but if we are going to sacrifice parliament to build a gas pipe line from west to east, then I say to hell with the gas."
>
> As if aroused by his own words, he exclaimed: "Our freedom was won in England, on the battlefields; they beheaded Charles I because he interfered with parliament. Are we to go back now to Runnymede?"

Let my hon. friends on the other side who claim that they have been behaving within the rules of parliamentary procedure eat that, swallow it and digest it.

Mr. McIlraith: He was the Tory candidate in the last election.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I do not care what kind of a candidate he was. He is an accepted authority on parliamentary procedure, except perhaps by these witlings on the other side of the house who are understandably infuriated because they did not have a single member capable of debating points of order. The other evening a man said to me that this was most extraordinary. He had never before seen a hockey game in which one side relied on the referee to shoot all the goals for them.

I am very sorry that the minister of external affairs, after having favoured us with a rather irrelevant speech tonight, has left his seat because I should like to ask him to take the statements of Dr. Arthur Beauchesne and read them in conjunction with a particular paragraph of the North Atlantic treaty, a paragraph of which we are told this particular minister is singularly fond. I refer to article 2 which reads:

> The parties will contribute toward the further development of peaceful and friendly international relations by strengthening their free institutions, by bringing about a better understanding of the principles upon which these institutions are founded, and by promoting conditions of stability and well-being. They will seek to eliminate conflict in their international economic policies and will encourage economic collaboration between any or all of them.

I commend to the minister of external affairs this very favourable article of his and suggest that he read it in conjunction with Dr. Arthur Beauchesne's very vivid comments on the manner in which this government has prostituted parliament.

I want now to deal with the silly and ridiculous—I was going to say something unparliamentary—the silly, ridiculous, unfounded statement that is repeated again and again from the other side of the house to the effect that there has been plenty of time given for this debate and it is only the obstruction of the opposition that has prevented it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perfectly true.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Their justification for bringing in closure, as Dr. Beauchesne has said in defiance of parliamentary procedure, has been based on two things. The first is the arbitrary date of June 7, agreed to by the government without consultation with this parliament, and the other is the statements by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) that there was going to be a strong vigorous opposition to this measure when it came to the house. Now, sir, I suggest to you that any government, having been told months before that there was going to be vigorous opposition to one of their measures, if that government had the slightest consideration of the decencies, the rights and properties of parliament, they would have seen fit to bring this measure in as soon as possible.

What happened? On January 10 it was foreshadowed in the speech from the throne. Then, we heard no more about it for almost a month. On February 6 a resolution was placed on the order paper. Then again it was put on ice for more than a month, about five weeks. Finally this resolution was brought before the house on March 15 and debated briefly at that time. Then on May 9—nearly two months had again elapsed before they brought this measure that they are so anxious to pass and for which there is so little time to debate—they brought it back to us. Then, they complain because in the 18 sitting days much of the time has been taken up by procedural disputes. I suggest to them that Dr. Arthur Beauchesne probably realizes the real nature of that fight. It was a fight to preserve the rights, the dignities and proprieties of parliament. This has been a fraudulent argument presented to the Canadian people deliberately to deceive them into believing that the opposition was given plenty of time but through sheer obstructionism were blocking discussion of this bill, when the record shows that this government had this measure in mind as far back as January 10. They delayed for a month before putting it on the order paper; they delayed another five weeks before finally bringing it up for discussion, and then they delayed for two months before bringing it before parliament. What a nonsensical delay! Do they think the Canadian people are going to believe them? They are going to believe that there was something that this government wanted to hide, that they did not dare have discussed.

Mr. Dufresne: They are still hiding it.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): They are still going to believe, and they are going to be right, that this government was determined that no questions would be asked on it. Therefore, the Minister of Trade and Commerce took the course that has been so roundly condemned by Dr. Beauchesne. They did not want to answer any questions. Quite rightly, we have been asking certain questions here and there has been no answer from any government member, not even from the eloquent Minister of National Health and Welfare when he rose to speak, nor from the equally eloquent Secretary of State for External Affairs when he delighted us this evening. One would perhaps not expect that either of these gentlemen could be expected to know much about it, but I would think that the Minister of Finance might have known enough to answer, and certainly the Minister of Trade and Commerce would.

The questions that have been asked them and to which we have had no answers are these: Has the government any firm undertaking or guarantee and, if so, why has it not been presented to parliament, that the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines company will build the stretch from Winnipeg to the Ontario border and from Kapuskasing east? Nothing that has been presented to this house indicates that there is any firm undertaking on the part of that company to build that part of the line. If the government have a firm undertaking, then why have we not been told of it, why has it not become part of the schedule to this bill and why has it not been presented to parliament?

Last night when the Minister of Finance was playing so engagingly the Merry Andrew he did not bother to answer these questions. They were beneath his dignity; they were not important at all. All he was interested in was scoring sophomoric points on various members of the opposition.

Mr. Harris: I enjoyed myself, if you did.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): He engaged, I noticed, Mr. Speaker, in a discussion on the rise of nazism, arising out of some statements from the press that were placed on the record by my friend, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). I have not had time to go back and read all the history of the advent of the nazis to power. It may be that the minister is right. I do not know, for instance, sir, whether the nazis found it necessary to take the speaker of the Reichstag, to break him on the wheel of government necessity, to strip him of all dignity and decency and to toss the corpse back to the chair and pretend that everything was as it had been before. I do not know that they did that, but I do know of something they did. I do know that they also took an old man full of honours, a national figure, a hero to his people, and they befuddled that old man and they stripped him of honour and dignity and used him as a stalking horse for their assaults on the freedoms of the German people.

We are going to build a pipe line? Why? We were told quite pointedly the other night that we were going to build a pipe line as a monument to a stubborn, determined old man who wants to snatch some measure of immortality before he shuffles off the scene.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): On a question of privilege, you praised me highly last night. What has happened in between?

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): The qualities I have attributed to you tonight are in no way inconsistent with your former abilities, in no way inconsistent at all. No, we are going to build a memorial to this stubborn, ruthless, determined old man, this modern Ozymandias, king of kings. Look on my works, ye mighty, and despair. We may well despair, Mr. Speaker, about some of the evil works upon which this particular monument is going to be raised. I would suggest to the minister that it would have been better for him to have bought a tombstone.

Mr. H. P. Cavers (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on the 17th day of this debate, I realize that I cannot reach the heights of forensic eloquence of the two great orators from British Columbia who have preceded me tonight. However, I hope that in my speech tonight I shall not indulge in any personalities and that I will not arouse the heat that might have been aroused earlier in the debate.

In the earlier part of the debate, Mr. Speaker, I have been impressed with the remarks of the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Nickle). From the time that he came to this house the hon. member for Calgary South gave evidence that he was probably the best informed member in the House of Commons on oil and gas issues, and he was recognized as such in all parts of the house. His opinions were valued by the colleagues who sit in his group, but recently a change has taken place in the attitudes of his colleagues. During the course of his remarks, the hon. member for Calgary South pointed out to hon. members the many new discoveries of gas and oil which have taken place in the province of Alberta. He has explained to the house that year after year a great surplus of gas and oil has been piling up in the province of Alberta, on account of lack of markets, at the average rate of 4,000,000,000 cubic feet a year. It is his estimate that $150 million has been invested by Canadians and foreign investors to explore, to investigate and to develop wells producing high-value oil and the resultant amount of gas. The $150 million which has been invested by those Canadian and foreign investors is now carrying interest which is not only a great burden to the larger companies but is also pressing some of the smaller companies.

Last year I had the personal privilege of going to the northern part of Alberta and while I was there I was flown into the Pembina oil fields. I had the opportunity of standing there and seeing one of the derricks erected. I saw some of the wells that were in operation, and on one corner of this particular field we saw a head of gas probably 15 feet to 20 feet high. I said to the engineer in charge: "What are you doing there?" He said: "We are burning off the surplus gas because we have no way of exporting it to eastern Canada. We are burning each day in this particular spot enough gas to heat the city of Toronto for one day." It is my submission, Mr. Speaker, that this country cannot afford to expend energy; to waste a valuable commodity for any great period of time. I say we should proceed with this scheme because each year that passes $25 million more is required to build the line.

This bill proposes a short-term federal loan of $80 million at 5 per cent for 90 per cent of the cost of the construction of the trans-Canada pipe line to Winnipeg. It is admitted that Alberta has a great surplus of gas. They have realized within the last year or two that there is no fear of shortage. Premier Manning has now issued a permit to export 584 million cubic feet of gas a day.

I think we must see that this surplus is used, that it is not sealed up in the earth or, worse, burned off as is being done in the situation I alluded to a moment ago. We are told the city of Winnipeg needs gas badly and must have it this year. Ontario needs gas. Because of the great industrial expansion we have had in Ontario in the last 15 years we have a need for greater energy in the banner province of Canada. I think I am permitted a licence to make that statement because I come from that province. We have shown great industrial expansion in Ontario and have used up to a great extent our electrical energy and we now must turn to other sources of energy.

I would like now to refer to Ontario Hansard of February 21. At page 389 of the proceedings the Hon. Leslie M. Frost, premier of Ontario, had this to say on February 21, 1956:

> We think there has never been, since the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the great opportunity to do an outstanding job for our country as there is at present.
>
> The federal government has, in its wisdom, negotiated the agreement with Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited, and no doubt the consummation of this deal was premised upon our participation in the building of the northern Ontario section.

I submit it is good for us to commence the section of the line which will extend from Alberta to Winnipeg.

Again at page 390, Mr. Frost, speaking in the Ontario legislature, had this to say:

> Undoubtedly, northern Ontario was benefiting, as undoubtedly was our province generally, since we represent half the industry of Canada and have one-third the population. Obviously Ontario should not back away from a proposition of that sort. I do not think we could afford to do business that way.
> We have taken a generous view with the federal government, recognizing their position in this matter has not been simple or easy. I have no intention here of making it more difficult for the federal government to carry its arrangements through. If I did that, I would be doing a disservice to this country.

If Mr. Frost would be doing a disservice to this country in putting bars in the way of this scheme, then I submit that as a member of this house representing the constituency which I have the honour to represent I would be doing a disservice to this country if I did not support third reading of this bill.

I should like to refer to a meeting held at Niagara Falls, Ontario, on May 25 last. This meeting was addressed by the Hon. Dana Porter, treasurer of the province of Ontario. The meeting was reported in the May 26 edition of the Toronto Daily Star the day following the meeting and the Toronto Star reports the meeting in this manner:

> Mr. Porter stood flatly behind the Liberal government in Ottawa and took a position opposite to that of the national Progressive Conservative leader, George Drew on the subsidization of U.S. interests to construct the trans-Canada pipe line.

Mr. Porter was further quoted as saying, and I cite his words:

> As a provincial government we are satisfied that a supply of natural gas is essential to the exploitation of the future and we feel that a delay of that supply would be a detriment to our own success.

Mr. Speaker, if these are the opinions of the premier of Ontario and his provincial treasurer—men who have good knowledge of this matter and I am sure they must have—then I believe it is right that this government co-operating with them should see that opportunity is given to extend the western leg of this line.

Later in his address at Niagara Falls, Mr. Porter pointed out that the 30-inch pipe line will carry energy equivalent to 8 million tons of coal and the very nature and quality of the fuel makes it of great value, particularly to the province of Ontario. Well, Mr. Speaker, that is why the premier of Ontario and his government are ready to put up $35 million for the northern leg of the pipe line which extends across the northern part of our province. They are willing to extend the time under which the arrangement could be made in order that we could provide that line. We must be ready next spring to join in a partnership with the province of Ontario in order that we can assist them to do this job. It should be borne in mind that Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited has already provided $14 million and they will provide another $7½ million which will boost their total investment in this enterprise to $21 million.

I have mentioned the words of Premier Frost with regard to northern Ontario. This line will pass through such centres as Kenora, Port Arthur and Fort William, Timmins, Kapuskasing, Kirkland Lake and North Bay. Here a great industrial development awaits the people of northern Ontario and the domestic users as well will have the opportunity of using this gas. They will have a fuel which will substitute for a fuel which they now import from the state of Pennsylvania in the United States of America and they will get it at a lower cost.

So far as southern Ontario is concerned the line has already been built. From the Niagara river at Queenston crossing the counties of Lincoln, Wentworth, Halton, Peel, York and extending into the city of Toronto, Tennessee gas is flowing through a pipe line that was laid last summer. This gas is being purchased by the Consumers Gas Company of the city of Toronto for use by consumers in the city of Toronto and other consumers along the way in Niagara Falls, Welland, Grimsby and Hamilton. It is the intention of this company to block up the pipe line at the international boundary in the Niagara river and bring in Alberta gas from the opposite direction when the remainder of the line is completed. I am sure the citizens of Canada will agree that due haste should be taken to see that at the earliest possible moment in this great industrial sector of Ontario we are using Alberta gas rather than Tennessee gas.

On May 21 the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) spoke in this house and I was impressed with the fact that he felt great expenditures would take place in the development of the project. The building of the line itself, installations in consumers' homes, installations of equipment in industry and installations in various municipalities will run to over $1 billion in the next five years. If this gas is to be capped and used —and I am sure that it will—and if the companies sell their product at a profit—and I am sure that they will—then the federal treasury will profit to the extent of about 45 per cent of the profits received.

Those of us who live in the Niagara peninsula have already realized the business developments in that area. The hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan), speaking in this house earlier this evening, has pointed out to you that Page-Hersey Tubes have already a $10 million mill under construction. They propose to manufacture pipe for 150 miles of line from Sarnia to Port Credit. In addition to that, Welland Tubes Limited will manufacture the 30-inch pipe for the nothern Ontario section of this line. This cannot help giving employment not only to these particular industries but to other subsidiary industries in that area, and it will mean that industries coming into that area will provide a great impetus to business in the whole Niagara frontier.

During the course of this debate and in the newspapers of the country, we have heard a great deal about closure in the past few days. I think that a number of our people are of the opinion that we have closed the mouths of the opposition members. Members have said in this house that they have been gagged, that freedom of expression is at an end, that parliament has died. Those are some of the expressions that have been used. Last evening I thought I would look at the record of the proceedings in the house since May 10 last.

Yesterday the Minister of Finance made certain statements regarding the time expended by certain particular members. I have not counted those figures but I know that this house has been in session on this debate for 17 days. During those 17 days, up to last evening—and I think that during the course of the debate today honours have been fairly well divided—the members of the official opposition party have spoken 82 times, and members of the C.C.F. group have spoken 58 times, for a total of those in opposition to this measure of 140 speeches. In perusing the debates I noted that Liberal members had spoken 52 times during the debate, Social Credit members 11 times, and one independent member has spoken in the debate, making a total of 64 speeches in the 17 days of debate.

So I feel that the rules have not closed the mouths of opposition members. Whilst it may be said that a great deal of this time was taken up in procedural matters and discussion of matters with the Chair, nevertheless an opportunity was given during those 17 days to discuss the merits or demerits of this bill. I think that the opinion should not go abroad that we have endeavoured to stop, obstruct or deprive any member of this house of having an opportunity to speak on this measure. Rumour has it that during the latter part of this evening a flag incident will appear in this house. All I can say is that we have had one flag incident; let us have no more.

I stand at this time speaking on the bill providing for the development of a trans-Canada pipe line. I hope that before too many years have passed we shall have many other bills dealing with gas pipe lines in this country because I can foresee that the development of this line will promote such expansion of industry and business throughout the country that we shall need other branch lines to complete the job.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I have been in this house now for 11 years, since the year 1945, during which time I have had fully confirmed, and indeed heightened, the love and admiration which I have always felt for this institution of parliament; but never did I expect to see, and never before have I seen, such an iniquitous piece of legislation as is now before us. Nor did I ever expect to see, and I hope never to see again, such strong-arm tactics as have been used in the attempt to ram it through.

What we have seen, during the whole course of time in which this bill has been before the house, is a spectacle of a government motivated by fear, confused by doubt and dictating by force. What we are presented with in this bill and in the course which has been followed is an example, in its most crystal-clear form, of an attempt to subvert parliament to the will and purpose of a government in order to meet a self-imposed deadline accepted by that Canadian government in order to meet the wishes of a company dominated by United States interests.

I say to you, sir, and I say to the Prime Minister and the government, that the Canadian people resent very deeply that their parliament should have been used in that manner and for those purposes. I have said that we have seen a spectacle—and we still see that spectacle—of a government motivated by fear, dictated to by fear, in the tactics that they have followed in this debate, and still lacking the moral courage to take the issue to the people.

We were told at the outset, we have been told again tonight and we have been told on numerous occasions during the course of this debate, that closure was being applied, the rights of parliament to discuss and debate were being cut off, because of two speeches which forecast a fight, made outside the house by members of the opposition. What a spectacle we have. There is the government—they are not all here tonight because apparently they are ashamed even to witness the final passage of their own measure by the methods they have adopted—but there they are, a government with the support of 170 members, with a majority of approximately 100 over all other parties in the house. What a picture—there they are, panic-stricken, motivated by fear, because of two speeches made outside the house. We and the C.C.F. party have only 75 members against this monolithic structure of 170. Yet we are told that because two members made speeches outside the house they were so afraid of what we might do inside the house that they had to apply closure at the outset.

Fear is an ugly motive, and ugly motives produce ugly results. That is what has happened in the course of this debate: closure at the outset and at every stage of the debate, closure of a vicious type never before used in the history of this parliament or any other parliament, because they were afraid.

We have been told, the Canadian people have been told so often by spokesmen for this government, that this is the only party that can govern—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fulton: —that these people sitting over there are the only party that can govern. Look at them. There they sit. They cannot even govern by unparliamentary methods, let alone parliamentary methods. They could not even get the closure motion, their iniquitous motion backed solidly by every one of their members and the Social Credit members, through the house in one day. It took them a day and a half to complete the murder of parliament.

And today they have raised or attempted to raise, by the words of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris), another spectre, another fear to hang before the Canadian people, the fear of a possible depression.

Mr. Casselman: Do not shake your head.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Fulton: This is the Minister of Finance whose budget was predicated on the assumption that we were in for an inflationary boom, this is the Minister of Finance whose fiscal instrument, the Bank of Canada, has been and is pursuing policies which can only be appropriate if they are designed to head off or to minimize an inflationary boom, this is the man who stands up today and tries to justify this absurd measure by another resort to fear, the fear of a depression.

Well, sir, this wonderful, monolithic government, having been panic-stricken by two speeches made outside the house, having adopted the ugly course that they did as a result of that fear, and having done their best to frighten the Canadian people by holding over them another bogey, this government of bogus men, bogeymen, now see only one other obstacle to the accomplishment of their desires. That obstacle we all know, and we all have respect for it. It is the Senate, composed in the main of elderly men, distinguished men, many of them, but those who can be counted upon there to oppose the government's desire number, in the opposition, at the most six elderly gentlemen.

This government, once again motivated by panic, has tried to eliminate even that last obstacle by thrusting down the throat of the other place, even in anticipation of the debate, a change of the rules so that these men will not have a chance to thwart the wrongful ambitions of this government. What a shameful process—

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is reform of the Senate.

Mr. Fulton: —dictated by unreasoning fear and an unreasoning desire to dominate every part of this country, including every part of the legislative processes of this country. There they sit, 170 men who cannot govern by parliamentary methods or unparliamentary methods and have now even guillotined the Senate.

Sir, resorting to closure in advance of debate and at every stage of debate here, and now in advance of debate in the other place preparing for the guillotine there, why, sir, what a shameful comparison that makes with the past history of this country and with some of the other great men who have sat here and some of the other great governments who have contributed to the welfare of Canada. Sir John A. Macdonald, with far smaller majorities, passed bills having even greater import for the people of Canada. In the over-all picture it took him some five years to accomplish his designs for the building of the railway. Did he ever resort to closure, although he had a much smaller majority? Or take the Criminal Code, a bill of some 700 sections, which has stood, by and large, the test of time for some 70 years,—that was enacted in those days, but they did not have to resort to closure. They did not have the majority of this government which we have been told is made up of the only party that can govern.

But this bill, sir, under this party which says it is the only party that can govern Canada, has been guillotined more often and more viciously than any other piece of legislation in the history of Canada. That is the way the Liberal party governs Canada today, and the only way it can govern.

And so we have the spectacle, and the Canadian people see the spectacle of the government—if we are to believe their own word that they introduced closure because they were afraid of what the opposition might do, and that is what they said—quaking in their shoes because of two opposition speeches made outside parliament, a spineless government, sir, an eviscerated government which has not got the courage to rely upon parliamentary methods.

But while we resent what is being done, still when we look at who is responsible for it—and there are three men primarily responsible, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Minister of Finance—I think we can say and say fairly that we should not make the Minister of Trade and Commerce the target of our main criticism over what has happened to parliament. With respect to parliament, that minister does not know what he is doing. He is completely in character. Here is the man who said: "If we want to get away with it, who is going to stop us?" Here is the man who said: "What's a million anyhow?" This whole proceeding is in character so far as he is concerned.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Here is the bright boy from Kamloops.

Mr. Fulton: But the Prime Minister does know what he is doing.

Mr. Lennard: I wonder.

Mr. Fulton: He is the ex-president of the Canadian Bar Association. The Minister of Finance also knows what he is doing.

Mr. Lennard: Don't be too sure about that.

Mr. Fulton: They know what is the precedent that they are fastening on parliament. They know they are establishing a precedent whereby a government that follows them can introduce legislation even more vicious, even more inappropriate than this, call one clause, put the measure under closure and then pass the whole bill no matter how many sections it may have, even 600 sections, on the precedent that has been established here. The Prime Minister has admitted that it is not a desirable precedent. This ex-president of the Canadian Bar Association said: We knew that there was a more desirable way to do it but it would not have been very convenient. And so he resorted to the incorrect method of doing it and rammed it through with the force of his majority.

We have seen the Prime Minister in a new role. The Prime Minister has established a record for silence in the earlier part of this session unequalled, I think, by any prime minister in any parliamentary institution. Then, as the result, we are told, of a Liberal caucus, it was decided that the great prestige of the right hon. gentleman should be thrown into this debate on the side of the Liberal party. And so the Prime Minister has emerged from his silence and we see him in a new role in this debate. But unfortunately his role and his speeches now are confined almost exclusively to announcements of further guillotines. St. Laurent the silent has become St. Laurent the spectre, a spectre presiding over the destruction of parliament, a graven image presiding over the debacle of Liberalism and over the wreckage of this institution which is the guardian of freedom of Canadian citizens.

I suggest to him that there is only one way he can now retrieve the reputation which all of us are prepared to admit that the hon. gentleman did enjoy and as a leading Canadian statesman formerly was entitled to enjoy. That way is to dissolve this house, submit his conduct and this issue to the judgment of the Canadian people and try to salvage something from the wreckage that he has created.

Now, sir, what of this matter of obstruction that our hon. friends try to pretend we on this side have used as our only weapon against their bill and against their course? We have been referred to the practice in the British house. The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott) tried to tell us, and told us incorrectly, about British closure. It is amazing to me, sir, how it is that the government when it suits them will refer us to the practices of the British parliament but when it does not suit them they will spurn them as being inapplicable.

Let me remind my hon. friends, including the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), this new convert not only to Liberalism but also to the present pipe line policy, that in the United Kingdom a bill of this sort most certainly would have been referred to a committee. Most bills are referred to committees which have the power to make inquiry so that when they come back to the house they have been thoroughly examined. Here, ever since the measure first came forward, we have pressed for a committee. Certainly this debate could have been shortened had we been allowed to make that inquiry. Not only is the British closure practice different from ours but, such as it is, it is infinitely more justified because there bills of this sort would have received full inquiry before ever they came before the house for detailed approval. Never in the history of the United Kingdom, so far as my researches go, have they ever applied closure—or would they apply it—in advance of debate, because the government over there are responsible and do not panic.

As for the debate itself, let us look at what has happened in its course. This bill has been debated for some 10½ days. That is, apart from the time which has been occupied by discussion of points of order—and, may I say proper points of order—the bill itself has been debated for some 10½ days in this house. Let me point out that discussion of points of order has not taken time from the time that would otherwise have been available for debate, because the government had a schedule. They told us that. They told the press that it was their intention to get this measure through this house by May 31. It is now June 6th. Hence we have not actually taken away time available for debate, although we have delayed the application of the government's timetable and we did fight against the guillotine, and would do so again.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) does not like points of order because he does not like to be bound by the rules. The government is now behind its schedule. What then was the reason for the enormous haste? Why did they have to put on closure on the first day? Of course they did not have to do it. But, Mr. Speaker, the bill has been debated for the 10½ days which the government's timetable would have allowed us.

Last night the Minister of Finance said he had done some arithmetic. I regret that his arithmetic was not too accurate. I think that fact bodes ill for the future financial welfare of the country. He said of me that I have spoken 30 times in the course of this debate. The Minister of Finance is a master of the gentle art of distortion, so perhaps I should leave that matter there. However, I will point out to him that, including the speech I am now making, I have spoken twice in actual debate. In addition I have moved three motions in the course of debate. I have made three motions of one line each: twice when I moved that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) be heard, and once when I moved that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill) be heard.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I thank the hon. member for the compliment.

Mr. Fulton: That was resented by the leader of the house and the Minister of Trade and Commerce because it did not suit their plan.

Let us be accurate and not indulge in distortion when we look at this matter. Of the 10½ days of debate of the measure up until 11 o'clock tonight there have been 50 speeches made in debate by Liberal members and there have been 44 speeches made in debate by Progressive Conservative members, including three by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Nickle). Since one can hardly say that the hon. member for Calgary North supported us, I think perhaps it would be fair to say that there have been 43 speeches made from our point of view as against 50 made by the government. We have then the situation that the Liberal party has made more speeches in debate than has any other party in the house. There we have the new method—

Mr. Sinclair: It is the largest in number.

Mr. Fulton: My hon. friends opposite support that course. There we have the new method—putting on closure and then take up the majority of the time by pushing in their own members. And yet they say they have not attempted to stifle debate.

An hon. Member: Tell the truth.

Mr. Fulton: When I tell the truth it hurts hon. members opposite and they resent it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I must inform him that his time has expired.

Mr. Dickey: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fulton: After all, the government put on closure and I am not allowed to speak again. If hon. gentlemen opposite would revoke their closure, I should be glad to answer any questions that are asked. As matters stand, I would be strictly out of order if I did so. We believe in maintaining the rules even though hon. members opposite do not.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Order. I would suggest that the hon. member for Kamloops has established that it would not be in order for him to accept a question.

An hon. Member: Not a word about the pipe line.

Mr. Maurice Boisvert (Nicolet-Yamaska): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to take part in this debate because it gives me a chance to stand behind the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) who stand so high in the esteem of the Canadian people.

An hon. Member: Not any more.

Mr. Boisvert: Nothing that has been said by hon. members opposite will diminish that esteem. For 20 days in this parliament we have been experiencing something which will destroy our democracy if it is repeated time and time again. It started last year, with an import from another country called a filibuster. This year, long before we brought before this parliament an extremely important piece of legislation, we were told that the government would be subjected to a worse filibuster. Is there anything worse in a parliament than a filibuster for the purpose of playing politics with respect to legislation which is for the good of all Canada and which will bring about a development—and this was said in this parliament—as big as that brought about by the railways at the end of the last century?

Mr. Van Horne: You are talking about a sell-out of Canadian resources. That is what you are talking about.

Mr. Boisvert: I will come to that.

Mr. Van Horne: When?

Mr. Boisvert: If my hon. friend is patient enough, I will come to it. Let us ask ourselves what this bill which is before this parliament means.

Mr. Van Horne: It means dictatorship.

Mr. Boisvert: It means the construction of a pipe line from Winnipeg to Montreal.

Mr. Van Horne: It means a sell-out.

Mr. Boisvert: The purpose of this bill is to form a corporation. There is nothing complicated about the bill. It is very simple legislation. It involves the development of Canada as a whole, it invokes the development of a means of transportation for gas which will benefit the provinces of Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta.

Mr. Bell: Do not say New Brunswick.

Mr. Boisvert: This purpose was well put by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) when he introduced that measure. He said, as recorded at page 3864 of Hansard for May 14, 1956:

> Its purpose is to hasten the day when Alberta will have an adequate outlet for its surplus gas, and the day when the cities, towns and industries of Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec within economic range will have access to this fuel. It is an undertaking of truly national scope, which we must either launch now or see languish for years to come.

No hon. member from the C.C.F. party, no hon. member from the Tory party has proclaimed before this parliament that what the minister said that day was untrue, was not factual. No one dared to attack a measure to bring about this development, but they have introduced what we call a filibuster to prevent this parliament from legislating.

We were told about freedom of speech. We were told thousands of times that we were violating the freedom of speech. There is a freedom in any democratic country in the world more important than any other, and that freedom is the right to legislate, the right to pass laws for the development of the country and for the good of the people in the country. That is what this government was trying to do and the opposition was trying to prevent this parliament from legislating. The right to legislate is incorporated in our constitution. Section 17 of the British North America Act says, and I quote:

> There shall be one parliament for Canada, consisting of the Queen, an upper house styled the Senate, and the House of Commons.

Section 91 of the British North America Act says:

> It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada—

That is why we are sitting in this parliament, to legislate, to pass laws and not to listen to speeches for 20 days without being able to arrive at a decision. It is the duty of this parliament to arrive at a decision on any question which is placed before this parliament. I am in good company, and I will give you a citation now which must be well known by members of the Tory party but which they have not brought before this parliament in the course of the long discussion we have had about closure. Closure is embodied in our rules for one purpose only and that is to put into effect the legislation which is requested by the people of the country and which is necessary for the progress of Canada. To this the opposition have been objecting for 20 days and abusing—that is the strongest word found in the dictionary—the rules and destroying and diminishing the dignity of the parliament of Canada which is so much respected by every province in Canada.

Let me now quote Mr. Meighen.

Mr. Van Horne: How much did you have to pay for that speech?

Mr. Boisvert: My hon. friend should have done what I have done. He should have remained in his place during the course of this long debate. I did not miss one sitting but often when I have looked in his direction I have not seen him.

Mr. Van Horne: I was at the demise of the Liberal party, which was brought about by—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): The hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska must not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. Boisvert: Mr. Meighen, that great leader of the Tory party, said this on March 2, 1926, as reported at page 1440 of Hansard for that date:

> The closure rule is all right; it is perfectly defensible, justifiable and necessary. But never in the history of any parliament was closure adopted for the purpose of giving its members a holiday. Those who stoutly resisted this rule when applied only for the purpose of learning the will of parliament on absolutely essential legislation, only for the purpose of getting the decision of this house on important legislation submitted by the government; those who fought day and night to prevent the application of closure for such purpose, come into parliament this afternoon and call upon all their own followers and their allies to the left to stand up and support closure in order that parliament may adjourn.

The opinion of Mr. Meighen was that closure is justifiable and necessary when it is to bring about a decision on important legislation. Let us see what Mr. Bennett said. He was a great leader of the Tory party. On March 2, 1926, Mr. Bennett, as reported at page 1477 of Hansard for that date, said:

> Mr. Speaker, I congratulate my hon. friends opposite on the courage they have displayed in moving closure. It is a courage, of course, born of necessity, but nevertheless I congratulate them because it indicates a recognition on their part that closure is an efficient instrument in the hands of a government to permit public business to be transacted. I have nothing to say as to the reasons why they have changed the views they held in the days long since passed. I feel that it is not to be held against those who govern that they see fit to change their minds and adopt more modern methods when they have seen the error of their ways and realize the virtue of that to which they were opposed.

Those two quotations represent the views of two great leaders of the Tory party. Why have we been sitting in this parliament for 20 days with measures of obstruction directed against the Chair, to destroy the dignity of the Chair and to destroy the confidence this parliament had in the chairmanship?

Mr. Dufresne: Out of order; it was decided this afternoon that one cannot talk about that. Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Boisvert: I will say no more.

[Mr. Van Horne.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): I have already told the hon. member.

Mr. Boisvert: I will say no more about it. I have said enough to show the people that there was something wrong—I will use the proper word—there was something shameful. The hon. member for Kamloops used some other strong words. He designated the member of the government who imposed closure as an ugly man. We have heard strong—and I am repeating it—we have heard the strongest words in the discussion of this measure to bring about a sentiment in Canada which would cause the people to ignore the true facts, because facts were distorted with respect to our parliamentary duties. The duty of the House of Commons and of parliament is to develop Canada; it is to make Canada prosperous for everyone; to make Canada one of the greatest countries of the world. No one in this parliament is able to say that he has done his duty toward the country when he has abused the rules of parliament to prevent this parliament from legislating.

My time is running short. It was said at the outset of this debate that we were submitting ourselves to United States buccaneers. Let me say to the opposition who have fought this measure that it was not dignified for a member of parliament to use such words. Since the name of Tim Buck has been introduced into this debate, I know the kind of buccaneer that the C.C.F. members would be glad to have on their side. I prefer to be with the Americans who are trying to help this country to develop itself into a great country than to follow those buccaneers who are aiming at the destruction of our economy, the destruction of the rights of this parliament and the destruction of the duty of this parliament to legislate. I am glad tonight to be on the government side and to be with the majority of the people because this House of Commons represents the will of the people of Canada, not the will of the opposition members who have fought this measure.

Mr. John B. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Speaker, there is an expression in baseball that you can be at bat, on deck or in the hole. Mr. Speaker, I have been in the hole in this debate now for two weeks, but little did I think that I was going to come to bat right after murderers' row.

The galleries will clear tonight, the press will go to bed and the tumult will die. Would that I could be a Churchill to sum up all the points that have been raised in this debate. One thing I am sure of. Although I have read tonight in the press that the fight is all over, I am sure that the people of this country are going to carry on this fight until this government reaps the justice it deserves.

You know, Mr. Speaker, we have been told that this is a bill to permit the construction of a pipe line.

Some hon. Members: That is right.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): How ridiculous can you hon. members get? Permission to build this pipe line was passed by this house in 1951. I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce, what has he been doing since that time? If we are going to be surrounded by the great believers of "get things done", then, what is the explanation of the inertia that has faced this house and this government since 1951? This bill deals with only one thing. It deals with the financing of a pipe line, my hon. friend, and with one thing alone. If I have asked a question, what has been done since 1951 about the financing of a pipe line, perhaps I can ask what has been done since 1954 when the Minister of Trade and Commerce arranged the deal to put the companies together to carry out this undertaking? What has been done since 1954?

If I might ask another question, what has been done by the minister since last fall when we first read the news that this bill was going to go through? What has been done by the minister since the month of January when we heard in the speech from the throne of the plans for this pipe line? Why, Mr. Speaker, is June 7 so important? The only reason I can think of that June 7 is such an important date line is that this government is afraid to let us look behind the propaganda screen and see the facts. The reason it is afraid to let us look behind the screen is that this government is sick, this government is tired, this government is shop-worn, this government is lazy and this government lacks the courage to bring the facts before this house.

Who has sold this June 7 deadline? Well, I wonder who it is? I understand that the public relations director of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines is ensconced in suite 514 of the Chateau Laurier, and he is the same man who was the public relations director of the Prime Minister in his last election campaign, and he was able to sell the people of Canada at that time a man that we have not seen in the House of Commons during this session. He is the same man, and I understand that he is turning out some speeches and I have wondered, Mr. Speaker, whether they may have been some of the speeches that we have heard read in this house.

I ask the Prime Minister, did he ever go into court with a case prepared like this one? Did he every try to prove a case without one bit of primary evidence, not a single bit? Did he ever refuse to the court or to the jury the facts as they have been refused now. And he asks us to accept these pieces of paper? Why, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister would not have his law student turn out material such as this.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, does not provide the financing wherewithal of the trans-Canada pipe line. This bill, I am afraid, may be the subject of numerous cases of litigation. Why is it this way? It is because there was no opportunity in the committee stage in this debate for the opposition to propose the amendments which would have read some sense into this bill.

I have heard criticism voiced in the past concerning our speaking on the pipe line. I spoke on the pipe line two weeks ago but no one took the trouble to answer me. The only reply we have had to any questions we have asked is that our questions are frivolous and vexatious. I would say to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) tonight that I have looked at his bill. It provides for the leasing and purchasing of the northern Ontario section of the trans-Canada pipe line but it makes no provision if default takes place for an agreement with any other group or company. Oh, Mr. Speaker, this is not going to solve our problems tonight. We are going to be back here debating this all over again.

I think I am in order on third reading of this bill, Mr. Speaker, to refer to the clauses. In addition, clause 5 (1) subclause (c) says it is drawn to fulfil any agreement or arrangement made before or after the coming into force of this act. What other agreements has the government in mind in connection with this legislation? What other type of deal are they going to tell us about at some future date?

An hon. Member: Another sell-out.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Under financing in clause 6 subclause (3) it says the total amount that can be loaned by this company is $130 million. I wonder why they put the default clause in because if the government is going to take this line over, if the company does not fill the bill, then they will not have enough money in the kitty to do the job.

Mr. Hunter: You are breaking our hearts.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): If I am breaking your hearts, I say to the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Hunter) I have done a much better job than the others who have attempted to make you show some heart in connection with the rules of this house.

In clause 7 (1) we again find the words "this agreement or any other agreement that is to come into force as a result of this act". I ask again, what other type of deal had you in mind, Mr. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and Mr. Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), in connection with this phase of the bill? Then they have a provision here covering the acquisition of the shares, and this is an important feature too, Mr. Speaker. They have made sure they have the same wording in this clause also; it is this agreement or any other agreement. I wonder what type of arrangement this government has made with the shareholders of this company which is so interested in developing the natural resources of Canada? I wonder about all the good names they have. I think this has been referred to before. There is the Hudson Bay Oil and Gas Company Limited, 75 per cent controlled by the Continental Oil Company of Tulsa; and the Canadian Gulf Oil Company, which is another very good name. This company is controlled 60 per cent by the Gulf Oil Company of the United States. Of course there is also the Tennessee Gas Transmission Company; that is Gardiner Symonds' outfit. There is also the Canadian Delhi Oil Company Limited; that is Mr. Murchison's job. There is the International Utility Company of New York, too. Of course, they let a few shareholders out in Calgary and Edmonton get into this. I wonder what special arrangement has been made to bail these shareholders out if default takes place. As a matter of fact there probably is some arrangement because I see they still have Mr. R. A. C. Henry in there and he has been in with the government ever since the Beauharnois scandal.

Reference has been made to default, Mr. Speaker, and they drafted a default clause in the agreement. Oh yes, here it is, on page 3 of the agreement. It reads:

> Such notice of default shall be given to Trans-Canada as may be specified in the indenture but the indenture shall not specify a period for giving such notice that is in excess of 90 days from the date upon which the crown company becomes aware of such default.

They made sure about this in the agreement covering the shares, too.

An hon. Member: Careful, John.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): They made sure of it because they provided for relief in connection with the forfeiture. The 90 days' notice was there but there was also a provision that there could be relief against forfeiture.

Well, Mr. Speaker, there does not seem to be any doubt about what direction this company is taking. I am sure these documents do not provide for the financing which this company requires to do the job. These documents do not provide for a firm contract which will not be subject to being re-opened at the whim and fancy of the gas promoters in the United States.

I have heard my hon. friends opposite talk about the similarity between the promotion of the Canadian Pacific Railway by our party and what they are doing now, but there is a great deal of difference. At that time this country was an integral part in thought and in every way of the country which provided the financing, and when Sir John A. Macdonald spoke about it he was talking about ensuring that that great company was financed by British subjects. That was the important thing to him. What a difference it made to him to have it done that way instead of having it come from the United States. As I speak here tonight I am reminded that it is past twelve o'clock—

Mr. Hosking: It is past one o'clock.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): It is past twelve o'clock for my purposes. I am reminded that this is the anniversary of D-day. This is the anniversary of the day upon which hundreds and thousands of Canadian boys lost their lives to ensure that Canadian sovereignty would always remain in Canadian hands.

Mr. Hees: Today is the day of the sell-out.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): In closing I want to use some of the words of Sir John A. Macdonald, spoken in circumstances such as these. I am going to read from Hansard of 1880-81, volume I, page 494. I am going to take poetic licence and I am going to substitute the gas companies in this instance. This is what Sir John A. Macdonald said: Mr. Speaker, I can trust to the intelligence of this house, and the patriotism of this country, I can trust not only to the patriotism but to the common sense of this country to carry out an arrangement which will give us all we want, which will satisfy all the loyal, legitimate aspirations, which will give us a great, an united, a rich, an improving, a developing Canada, instead of making us tributary to American laws, to American gas companies, to all the little tricks and big tricks that American gas companies are addicted to for the purpose of destroying our control over our own natural resources.

Mr. Drew: Here comes the axe.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment to the main motion lost. The question now is on the main motion. Mr. Howe (Port Arthur), seconded by Mr. Harris, moves that Bill No. 298, an act to establish the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation be now read a third time. Those who are in favour of this motion will please say yea.

Mr. Martin: I was paired with the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis).

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Mr. Knowles: I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Did the hon. member for Pontiac-Timiskaming (Mr. Proudfoot) wish to declare a pair?

Mr. Proudfoot: Yes, sir. I was paired with the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe). Had I voted, I would have voted for the motion.

Mr. Knowles: I rise on a point of order. My point of order, Mr. Speaker, is to the effect that this house should do no further business tonight. I base this contention on standing order 33, upon the terms of the closure motion which was moved this afternoon by the Prime Minister, and on the basis of your own interpretation of standing order 33 as given on May 15 and May 22 of this year.

The motion moved this afternoon by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) was as follows:

That the debate on the motion for the third reading of Bill No. 298, an act to establish the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation, and on any amendments thereto, shall not be further adjourned.

It is my contention, of course, that everything that was provided for in the Prime Minister's motion has now been done. This motion called for the debate on third reading, and on any amendment thereto, to be concluded and the necessary votes taken thereon. It does say in standing order 33 on this point:

But all such questions as must be decided in order to conclude such adjourned debate or postponed consideration, shall be decided forthwith.

The question that now faces us is as to whether there are any other proceedings that are necessary to be dealt with in order to conclude such adjourned debate and the debate on the amendment. I submit that everything that is necessary to conclude the adjourned debate has been done. The debate is over. I make no comment on that. I recognize the fact the debate on third reading, indeed, all possible debate in the House of Commons on this bill is over unless the Senate amends it and sends it back to us.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I said that I would also base my contention on rulings that Your Honour gave on the night of May 15, or perhaps it was early in the morning of May 16, and also on the night of May 22, or in the morning of May 23. On those occasions it was your contention that we had to continue so long as there was an unbroken chain. It was your contention that certain proceedings followed upon, or were part of, other proceedings, and therefore they had to be dealt with before the house adjourned, even though we were past adjournment time. But it was also your admission that in certain instances there was a point at which one came to the end of the chain. I disagreed with the position you took on the night of May 15. I felt that the chain was actually broken before you felt it was, but, at any rate, you have laid down the proposition that one had to go only as far as the chain of events would take one. Relying on that same interpretation of standing order 33 Your Honour on the night of May 22 or in the morning of May 23 did say that after second reading had been given to the bill the motion for the house to go into committee of the whole on the bill was a different proceeding which could be left over until the next day. As a matter of fact, we did not have any argument about it because Your Honour laid that down as your view as soon as that point was reached. In other words, on that night we reached a certain point and went no farther. Of course, in all of this my view and the argument that I am now presenting, and your view, and the position you took on the night of May 22, is that once the proceedings covered by closure have run out we are past ten o'clock and cannot take up any other item of business.

So far, I think Your Honour will agree with me that I have set out the situation correctly. If there is any argument, it will be over the question as to whether or not the one other proceeding which has to be taken before this bill is sent to the Senate is separate from or a part of the motion for third reading. That other proceeding is, of course, the motion that the bill be now passed and the title be as on the order paper. It is my strong submission—in my view there is no question about it—that the motion that a bill be now passed and the title be as on the order paper is a distinctly separate proceeding from the motion for third reading which has now been passed by a vote of this house. I refer Your Honour to standing order No. 75 which reads as follows:

Every bill shall receive three several readings, on different days, previously to being passed.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it is clear from that sentence that being passed is a separate proposition, a separate proceeding from the third reading; indeed, the three readings which are referred to in that sentence. There is another sentence in standing order 75 but it does not have any application to anything at this point. I also ask Your Honour to read standing order 76, which reads as follows:

When a bill is read in the house, the Clerk shall certify upon it the reading and the time thereof. After it has passed, he shall certify the same, with the date, at the foot of the bill.

Again I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the wording of that standing order is abundantly clear, namely, that the passing of the bill is something quite different from a reading of the bill, be it first, second or third. The fact that it is clear is underlined by the instructions to the Clerk that he is to certify on the bill each of the three readings, and also that he is to certify the date on which the bill itself is finally passed.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in addition to what I have said, based on standing order 33 and your interpretation thereof on the nights of May 15 and May 22, and in addition to these clear-cut standing orders—remember, it is the standing orders which are supposed to guide our proceedings here—I also ask Your Honour to take note of page 166 of Beauchesne, third edition. I am sure Your Honour is familiar with this page. It is the third of a group of pages in which Beauchesne sets out in some detail the proceedings on money bills. In fact, Dr. Beauchesne itemizes these various proceedings by number all the way from 1 to 30, and on previous occasions from the chair as well as from the floor persons have indicated that the numbering does specify a distinction between one proceeding and another. You will note, sir, that item No. 29 on page 166 reads as follows:

> Speaker: "When shall this bill be read a third time?" (If bill to be read third time now):
> "Moved by Mr. . . . . seconded by Mr. . . . . that said bill be now read a third time." "Carried."

Then, as a distinct item of procedure appears item No. 30, which reads:

> Speaker: "Moved by Mr. . . . ., seconded by Mr. . . . . that said bill do now pass and that the title be as on the order paper." "Carried."

There is a little bit more in No. 30 but I need not read it. I will only say that there is another sentence indicating what will be done if the title of the bill were to be changed from what appears on the order paper.

Now, I submit, Mr. Speaker, that that is a clear-cut indication of how we are to proceed, which was given by Dr. Beauchesne in his third edition, to support my contention that the motion that the bill do now pass and the title be as on the order paper is a separate proceeding from the motion for third reading, just as separate as was the motion to refer the bill to the committee of the whole from the motion for second reading which, on the night of May 22, you agreed was so distinctly separate that it had to be left over until the next day.

I now move on to another authority in support of my contention. This time I refer to Bourinot, and just to keep the record straight, may I point out that Bourinot, like Beauchesne, is a Canadian authority. I ask Your Honour to note what Bourinot says on page 532 under a paragraph bearing the Roman numeral XVI. The paragraphs immediately preceding this one deal with third reading. I am on page 532 of Bourinot, fourth edition. Once Bourinot has described third reading, he then says:

> XVI. Motion, that the bill do pass. The next question put by the Speaker is:
> "That this bill do pass, and that the title be, etc."
> This motion generally passes nem. con. immediately after the third reading, . . .

Mr. Cannon: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: I hear my friend the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Cannon) say "Hear, hear". That is perfectly correct; it generally passes right after third reading.

Mr. Nesbitt: That is the hon. member who represents practically nobody.

Mr. Knowles: My friend the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) has the book in front of him which is more than I can say for the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine, and so has the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton).

An hon. Member: And so have many other hon. members.

Mr. Knowles: All right, I am very glad to note that a couple of hon. members over there are following me. I continue:

> . . . though it is quite regular to defer the final passage until a future day.

Now, there is more in that paragraph but I will not confuse the issue by reading the other lines or trying to claim anything on the basis of what is in the rest of that paragraph. As a matter of fact, I looked up all the footnotes referred to in that paragraph and some of them are from English records which obviously have no bearing on our Canadian practice but the references indicated by the letters (x) and (y), as Your Honour will note by looking at the bottom of the page, are to the Canadian Journals. There, in addition to all the other authorities I have given, is a clear-cut statement that the motion that the bill do now pass and that the title be as on the order paper is a distinctly separate proceeding from the motion for third reading.

I recognize that when one starts to cite authorities around here it is common practice for someone to try to find an authority on the other side and I would not be surprised if someone picked up May and tried to throw a sentence at me from May in contradiction to the position I have been making. Before someone throws that sentence at me I will read the sentence that someone might find.

I have in my hand May's fifteenth edition. The same sentence will be found on other pages in other editions but it appears on page 554 of May's fifteenth edition near the bottom of the page under the heading "Bill passed" and it reads:

> The question "That this bill do pass" is no longer put in the House of Commons and, according to established usage, a bill, when read the third time, has passed.

Mr. Cannon: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: Well, there is my friend the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine with his "Hear, hear" once again; apparently he has not studied this very much. But the fact is clear to anyone who has studied it that May is describing the practice in the parliament at Westminster where for their purposes when the third reading has been given it is taken that the bill has passed.

Now, as the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) knows, because I had occasion to refer to them earlier this afternoon—

Mr. Martin: Thank you for the compliment.

Mr. Knowles: —I have made some study of the standing orders of the parliament at Westminster. As a matter of fact they appear in May's fifteenth edition as an appendix thereto. When one goes through the standing orders at Westminster one discovers that there is nothing in those standing orders corresponding to what is our standing order 75 and our standing order 76 where a definite reference is made to the passing of the bill. There is no requirement under the standing orders at Westminster for a motion that the bill do now pass but in our Canadian standing orders there is a requirement that there be a motion that the bill do now pass. This is provided in standing orders 75 and 76; it is spelled out on page 166 of Beauchesne's third edition and it is spelled out with abundant clarity on page 582 of Bourinot's fourth edition where he says:

> The next question put by the Speaker is: "That this bill do pass and that the title be, etc." This motion generally passes nem. con. immediately after the third reading, though it is quite regular to defer the final passage until a future day.

May I assure you sir that—

Mr. Cannon: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Knowles: Surely.

Mr. Cannon: For the benefit of those who are following this debate and do not have a copy of the standing orders before them, in order that they could understand it better would the hon. member mind reading the second sentence of standing order 75?

Mr. Knowles: I am sure Your Honour agreed with me a moment ago that I was quite justified in not reading the second sentence of standing order 75 because it has no applicability to the present situation.

Mr. Cannon: Would you mind reading it?

Mr. Knowles: I do not mind reading it. As a matter of fact, I would be glad to read all the standing orders in the book. I think it might be a good idea to put them on the record. Standing order 75 reads:

> Every bill shall receive three separate readings, on different days, previously to being passed. On urgent or extraordinary occasions, a bill may be read twice or thrice, or advanced two or more stages in one day.

Mr. Cannon: Very interesting.

Mr. Knowles: Does the hon. member contend that this is that kind of urgent or extraordinary occasion?

An hon. Member: Certainly he does.

Mr. Fleming: No, he is just obstructing. He wants to delay the proceedings of the house.

Mr. Knowles: My hon. friend thinks that this is one of those occasions where the majority should rule and where proceedings that normally cannot be changed except by unanimous consent should be changed because the majority wants them changed.

Mr. Coldwell: It has been that way all through.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, this interruption in our discussion was made necessary because the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine wanted the whole of standing order 75 put on the record.

I should like to draw to Your Honour's attention the fact that there have been in the past a number of occasions when our Journals have recorded the motion for the passing of the bill separate from the motion for third reading. As a matter of fact, the footnotes on that page of Bourinot we were looking at a moment ago, page 532, direct one to the Journals of 1874, 1876, 1877 and 1879 where you will find such instances. I am sure the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) will not object to my going back that far because after all he referred us yesterday to something that happened back in 1604. But in addition to these instances in the Commons Journals there was a very interesting instance recorded in the Journals of the Senate where on May 2, 1879, a bill—it was the marine electric telegraphs bill—which had been passed through all its other stages—indeed it had been given third reading—was actually defeated on the separate and final vote that the bill do now pass and the title be as on the order paper.

In other words, although it is perfectly correct that generally this last motion goes through without any difficulty, there has been at least this one occasion I have found in the other place where it was the point at which the bill was defeated. It is a separate proceeding and the very fact that Your Honour would have to put the motion and that it would be subject to a vote—in fact, I feel it should be voted on so that we can express our attitude on this bill right down to the end—but the fact that it is that kind of a completely separate proceeding makes it clear to me, and I think I have so persuaded a good many hon. members of the house, that it is the kind of proceeding that ought to be left over until tomorrow.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: Now, Mr. Speaker, I know some hon. members of the house are not convinced—

An hon. Member: Most of them are not.

Mr. Knowles: —and no doubt they will say that this is another of those technicalities. Mr. Speaker, this will probably be the last point of order I will raise in connection with this legislation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: You must be getting sleepy.

Mr. Knowles: Not at all. The appreciation expressed by the Liberal members for points of order and technicalities is noted. I feel it is my duty to give this house this one last chance to pay some attention to a technicality. All kinds of things have been said by Liberal members about technicalities but I stress their importance in our concept of the rule of law and our belief that parliament should function according to rules that are laid down and are not changed in the middle of the game.

Mr. Fleming: You are perfectly right.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, although it is perhaps only a technicality, if the rule is clear respect should be had for that technicality. I give the house this one more chance to pay respect to a technicality but I suggest there is even something more that I am giving to at least one person who is listening to me right now, and I refer to the Prime Minister. If we will follow the rules it will be recognized that it is after ten o'clock, a long time aften ten o'clock, which means that we have gone beyond the application of the closure rule. The government has no right to put this motion. If the government will follow the rule and leave the motion that the bill be now passed and the title be as on the order paper over till tomorrow—

Mr. Harrison: It is tomorrow.

Mr. Knowles: —until 2.30 this afternoon, then, if it is more satisfactory for my hon. friend from Meadow Lake—that would at least give the Prime Minister one more night to think over this important piece of legislation.

There can be no doubt that it is a separate proceeding. If I had not risen, you would have put the question and there would have been a vote on it. I do not see how anyone can contend that it is part of the proceedings necessary to conclude the adjourned debate on third reading. That is over; that has gone. All that is left is this one motion. It is not debatable when it is called. Whether Your Honour puts it tonight, completely against my view on the matter, or whether it is put tomorrow afternoon, it is not debatable. It is simply to be voted on. But I think it is far better to leave it over till tomorrow afternoon so that this house at this stage of the game will have paid attention to an important technicality, and also so that the Prime Minister might have one more night to think over this matter and think over the speeches that were made tonight and the appeals that were made to him and the chance he has to come back to this house tomorrow when the vote is called on that final motion and admit to the house that this is something that parliament should not be asked to pass but rather is something that should be dealt with in another way.

Hon. members know what I think that other way should be—an appeal to the country—but I am not enlarging on that now because I am on my feet only on my point of order. I present this point of order to you, Mr. Speaker, realizing that it is not as serious a technicality as some of the others I have raised in the past three weeks but it is a serious one, and the house has this one more chance to respect a technicality that is very clear. The rules indeed are clear, and I hope that you will give this point the consideration that it deserves.

Mr. L. D. Crestohl (Cartier): The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has expressed meticulous concern for technicalities. Whilst you heard the hon. gentleman I respectfully submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that you should not have heard him. I quote from that same standing order 33:

> . . . if such adjourned debate or postponed consideration shall not have been resumed or concluded before one o'clock in the morning, no member shall rise to speak after that hour . . .

I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that you must give strict interpretation to these words:

> . . . no member shall rise to speak after that hour.

It cannot be contended that the wording here is intended to apply to the debate. It would say so if it were intended to apply to the debate, but the language is simple and clear. I should like to say to the hon. gentleman that it is to me crystal clear that no member may rise. It does not qualify the circumstances under which a member might rise.

Mr. Fleming: Why are you speaking?

Mr. Crestohl: I too am out of order, but I am drawing to your attention, Mr. Speaker, that you should not have heard the hon. gentleman. It is after one o'clock, and no member should speak after that hour.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Crestohl: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: If he contends that it is not possible for him or for me to rise at this time to speak, would he tell me how the minister could rise to move that the bill be now passed and that the title be as on the order paper?

Mr. Crestohl: I should be very pleased to answer that. That forms part of standing order 33, which states:

. . . but all such questions as must be decided in order to conclude such adjourned debate or postponed consideration, shall be decided forthwith.

That is part of the proceedings which must be concluded tonight.

Mr. Fleming: You are begging the question.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): It is not necessary to add very much to the extremely cogent argument put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, but there are one or two things, based on what has happened on June 1, which I think should be brought to your attention, Mr. Speaker, in support of his argument.

The point made by the hon. member is that this is a separate proceeding which requires a separate question and that, it now being after one o'clock and this not being included in the closure motion, no one can move that motion, and therefore the question cannot be put. In this connection I should like to suggest that there is an absolute parallel between the situation which arises after third reading and the motion that the bill pass and the situation which arises after report from committee and the motion that the bill be read a third time at the next sitting of the house. You will observe, if you look at Bourinot at page 532, to which your attention has already been directed, that Bourinot, in dealing with the motion that the bill do pass after third reading, says:

The next question put by the Speaker is: "That this bill do pass, and that the title be, etc."

May I refer you then back to page 528, where Bourinot is dealing with the stages necessary on report from committee of the whole and where he says:

Accordingly, when a bill is reported without amendment, the Speaker puts the question, "When shall the bill be read a third time?"

So there is an absolute parallel between those two situations. I submit to you that you, sir, recognized on Friday, June 1, that the question, "When shall the bill be read a third time?" was a separate question and therefore a separate proceeding from the receipt of the report and the adoption of the report of the committee. If you will look at Hansard of Friday, June 1, you will observe that you did not put that question, "When shall the bill be read a third time?" on that night. I submit—and it is the only conclusion that can be drawn—that the reason why you did not was that you recognized that the question was a separate question, not necessarily involved in the preceding stage, and therefore could not be moved or put after one o'clock. Let me read from Hansard of June 1 at page 4641, second column. We had certain points raised. It states:

After the taking of the vote:

The Deputy Chairman: Bill ordered reported.

Mr. Knowles: Goodbye.

Bill reported.

The bill was reported to you, sir. Hansard continues:

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, the people in the galleries have seen a farce tonight.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McCann: Looking at you. You are the farce.

Mr. Coldwell: This is the worst proceeding that has ever been seen in this parliament, Mr. Speaker. The chairman has tried to muzzle the committee.

An hon. Member: The Speaker is on his feet.

Mr. Speaker: This house stands adjourned until Monday at 2.30 in the afternoon.

Mr. Rowe: Why not dissolve it and go to the country?

So, sir, you left the chair without putting the question, when shall this bill be read the third time, and I submit that the only basis upon which you could have left the chair without putting that question was because you realized and recognized that that question is a separate question, a separate stage of the proceedings from the report of the committee, and therefore could not be put after one o'clock. That is on all fours with the submission now made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that the question, shall the bill pass and the title be as on the order paper, is a separate question from the third reading of the bill.

Since, therefore, it is made clear by the authorities that the two questions in both cases are separate, and since you have recognized that by what you did on the night of June 1, then I submit that following upon example you cannot put the question as to whether the bill shall pass tonight.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, to be very brief on the subject and with particular reference to what the hon. member for Kamloops has just said, it is quite correct that Hansard of June 1 does not record you as having said anything after the deputy chairman reported to you. I only say that others were speaking during that time and the dialogue is as has been read by the hon. member for Kamloops. But I should point out to you that in Votes and Proceedings of Friday, June 1, I read the concluding sentence on this particular subject which is as follows:

> The house resumed consideration in committee of the whole of Bill No. 298, an act to establish the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation, which was reported without amendment, and ordered for a third reading at the next sitting of the house.

It was on that basis that the third reading appeared in Routine Proceedings and Orders of the Day for Monday, yesterday. May I also point out to Your Honour that in my submission the hon. member for Cartier is quite correct in that if there is a parallel here the parallel is not only that which I have recited with respect to the report from the committee of the whole and third reading but also the parallel that the ruling that you made with respect to the resolution on May 15, as I recall it, was that you held that it was an essential and continuing part of the resolution that upon the resolution being reported you should proceed and did proceed to give first reading to the bill. That is, I submit, the situation at the moment.

I have listened to these references to Bourinot, fourth edition, and may I point out that while I have not had the advantage of reading all the citations, because I ignored the ones in the United Kingdom, the ones of Canadian origin which were cited are dated much earlier than our modern rules. I would point out that there has been no recent precedent since the rules were revised in 1892, as I recall, although I cannot give the date precisely, and that the present practice of Your Honour and those occupying the chair of making a separate motion or a separate inquiry, shall the bill pass and the title be as on the order paper, is now in fact obsolete having in mind the fact—

Mr. Knowles: Standing order 75.

Mr. Harris: My hon. friend refers to standing order 75, but I say that it is an essential part of the third reading of the bill and is only essential to that extent.

Mr. W. A. Tucker (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, may I draw your attention to citation 810 in Beauchesne, second edition, which reads as follows:

> If the bill is reported without amendment, the Speaker puts the question: "When shall the bill be read a third time?" The house, at this stage, may decide by a majority vote either that the third reading will take place immediately or at some future day. If, to the Speaker's question, the answer comes "now", he will at once put the third reading and the motion "that the bill do now pass and title be as on the order paper."

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that that bears out what the leader of the house has just said, that this is now in effect one proceeding and that when we get to the stage where third reading is ordered to be given by the house it is then your duty to put the motion at the same time that the bill pass and the title be as on the order paper, and I cite to you that citation found on page 229 of Beauchesne, second edition.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the Minister of Finance if he overlooked the position that Your Honour took on the night of May 22 when you did recognize that the chain of events did not go on to the motion that the bill be referred to committee of the whole after second reading? The Minister of Finance refers to what happened on the night of June 1. Even if what Votes and Proceedings records is correct, I point out that no attempt was made that night to move third reading. All that was done that night, even according to Votes and Proceedings, was that the third reading was ordered for the next sitting of the house.

By the same token, Mr. Speaker, I am suggesting that what Bourinot calls the further consideration of Bill No. 298 should now be ordered for the next sitting of the house. Ordering something for the next sitting of the house is quite different from putting the motion itself. So far as citation 810 in Beauchesne, second edition, which the hon. member for Rosthern has read, is concerned, all it does is support that long set-up on page 166 of Beauchesne, third edition, making it clear that if the house wishes to do so it can take third reading and the other motion on the same day. They do not have to be on separate days like the first, second and third readings.

But in this instance we have passed the time for doing business this day. We are now four and a half hours past ten o'clock, and I submit that this other proceeding is just as separate from third reading as was third reading from the committee stage last Friday night and that the only thing Your Honour can now do is order the further consideration of this bill, in other words, that the motion for passing it at the next sitting of the house be placed on tomorrow's order paper.

Mr. Speaker: I wish to thank hon. members for the consideration they have given to this matter of order. I want to say that I expected that a point like this might be raised at this time, and in all the time available to me since the beginning of the day when I was not in the chair I have examined the point. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre says that standing order 33 at this moment is satisfied because he says that all the motions that must be decided have been decided, and he bases his remarks on the last part of the standing order, which reads:

> . . . but all such questions as must be decided in order to conclude such adjourned debate . . . shall be decided forthwith.

I have taken that view and I still hold the same view. As the hon. member knows, an order of the house has to be made when we ask the question, when shall this bill be read a second time, either now or at the next sitting of the house. An order of the house must take place. The same thing applies with respect to third reading. One must ask the house the question: When shall this bill be read a third time? If the second reading has been on the same day the answer to the question will inevitably be "Next sitting of the house" unless by leave the house agrees to have it read a third time immediately. But an order must be made for the house to proceed from one reading to the other. So it is for the first reading and so it is for the second, and it is also so with respect to the third reading. See Beauchesne's third edition, citations 652 and 703. That is why after second reading and after third reading, once the house has given the order, the Clerk needs to have this order in order to insert it in his Votes and Proceedings.

If the hon. member looks at the Votes and Proceedings he will see what constitutes the various entries in the Votes and Proceedings. He will find that "Bill read the first time and ordered for a second reading" constitutes one entry. These procedures are so purely linked together and so purely formal that they constitute only one entry. They do not even deserve a second entry. On the second reading we find: Bill read a second time, ordered to be committed: one entry, bill reported and ordered to be read a third time. This is also a matter of one entry alone. The third reading of the bill and the motion that the bill do now pass and the title be as on the order paper, even when the title has been changed in committee, and that the title be as amended in committee is declared at the last motion, this also constitutes only one entry. It is just one move.

The hon. member places a great deal of emphasis on standing order 75 because the word "passed" is found there. Standing order 75 reads in part as follows:

> 75. Every bill shall receive three several readings, on different days, previously to being passed.

Once a bill has gone through its three readings, effectively it is passed. If the title has not been amended in committee, the motion that the bill do now pass and the title be as on the order paper, although we maintain that it is still votable, is merely a purely formal motion linked and connected with the motion for third reading. It is there only in case we may need to use it for the purpose of declaring that the bill has been amended in committee. I have here instances where amendments have been made. I have here an instance of an amendment to a bill moved by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) a few years ago, having to do with the Criminal Code which was amended in committee. See Hansard, volume III, 1949, page 2699. He himself said consequential to the amendments which have been accepted the title will have to be changed and he himself moved, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker)—who was then the hon. member for Lake Centre—that the title be changed. If the hon. member reads the Votes and Proceedings of that day—and I have them here—he will see: Bill read a third time, ordered that the bill do now pass and the title be as amended in committee—and the new title was inserted in brackets—motion agreed to. It is just one step. See Journals, 1949, volume XCI, pages 331-2.

Hon. members at this moment, for various considerations which it is their privilege and right to hold, may wish to have this last motion perhaps postponed. But I want to tell hon. members that when I took the Speakership of the house in 1953 I found several documents in the files in my chamber. Among them I found a memorandum which had been prepared long before, about 10 years ago, I would say. It deals with various questions and answers on closure. It is in that memorandum that I found all the references as to when closure had been imposed in the past since 1913. At the last page of that memorandum that I have here in a notebook where hon. members may see it, on standing order 39, which was the previous number of order on closure, I find the following:

> Question—Does a notice of closure on third reading of the bill also cover the motion that "The bill do pass and the title be as on the order paper?"
> Answer—Yes. This is a purely formal motion which is not debatable under standing order 38—
> Which is now standing order 32.
> —and must be put forthwith in accordance with the provisions of standing order 39—
> Which is now standing order 33.
> —which requires that all questions connected with the main motion shall be decided forthwith.
>
> See Beauchesne's third edition, citation 227.

Let us look at citation 227.

Mr. Fulton: For the information of the house, could Your Honour tell us who drafted the memorandum?

Mr. Speaker: There is no name attached to it. However, I suppose that it was prepared either by the Speaker of the day or by one of the clerks of the house. There is no name attached to it. I took all the documents that were there and examined them, and this is what I found. But because I found that memorandum, that does not mean that I must say that is the Bible and I will not decide otherwise. Nevertheless, someone at one time gave full consideration to what should be the proper interpretation of standing order 33 and has divided the matter into questions and answers. On the question with which we are now confronted, whoever prepared it—and I do not suppose it was anybody interested in anything else but procedure who would have worked on that standing order—has said that in his view the question that the bill do now pass is a purely formal motion connected with the motion for third reading.

Mr. Fulton: It might be permitted to suggest that it has lain anonymous for all these years because the Speaker of the day did not agree, and therefore it never saw the light of day.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, but I did not hear what the hon. member said.

Mr. Fulton: I said that it might be permitted to suggest that it has lain anonymous for all these years because the person for whom it was prepared did not agree, and therefore it never saw the light of day. One suggestion is as valid as the other.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member must also consider that closure has been applied in the last few weeks but prior to that several years had elapsed during which closure was not applied. I presume that memorandum might have been prepared at one time when there were perhaps intentions of using closure but finally the intentions were modified. Nevertheless, this memorandum refers to citation 227 of Beauchesne's third edition. Citation 227 reads as follows:

> 227. If debate is on an amendment under closure, and a division takes place on that amendment before two o'clock in the morning, a new amendment may then be proposed, but the speeches thereon will be limited to one for each member who has not already spoken and shall not be longer than 20 minutes. A division may again take place on this new amendment, and another one be again proposed, and so on until two o'clock. The government members, in order to prevent the opposition from proposing such amendments, may keep up debate until two o'clock in the morning,—

And these are the words that are applicable.

—when all questions connected with the main motion have to be decided forthwith.

Standing order 33 says this:

> . . . all such questions as must be decided . . .

Citation 227 says:

> . . . when all questions connected with the main motion have to be decided forthwith.

Citation 717 of Beauchesne's third edition reads as follows:

> 717. Bills should be certified upon each of the three readings. The certification is usually made by the Clerk Assistant. Unless it is duly made, the bill cannot be dealt with by the clerks of Votes and Proceedings or of the Orders of the Day, nor can it be sent to the Senate. The original bills, thus certified, form part of the records of the house.

Reference has been made to the wording of standing order 76. There is no indication in citation 717 of Beauchesne's third edition, which is a clear comment about what is being said in standing order 76, which would support the interpretation that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has placed upon it.

Mr. Knowles: Which takes priority, a citation or a standing order?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is contending that unless there is a motion that the bill do now pass and title be as on the order paper, the bill is not effectively passed. I say that the motion that the bill do now pass and title be as on the order paper is a relic of the past. It is kept merely for the purpose of amending the title which, because of certain consequential amendments in committee, has to be amended. Once the three readings have gone, the bill has been passed.

I am sorry to take so much time, but I shall be very brief from now on. At page 194 Campion says:

> No question is put on the title, unless it is required to amend it in consequence of amendments made in the bill, and, when so amended, no question is put on the title as amended.

Mr. Fulton: What edition of Campion is that?

Mr. Speaker: Campion in his first edition refers to May's thirteenth edition, page 411, where May says:

> When all the clauses and schedules have been agreed to, and any new clauses or schedules added, the preamble is considered and, if necessary, is amended; and the chairman puts the question, "That this be the preamble of the bill." Lastly, in the Lords, the title of the bill is considered and agreed to; and in the Commons, any amendment that may be necessary is then made to the title.

Then in May's fifteenth edition, at page 554, there is this:

> The question "That this bill do pass" is no longer put in the House of Commons, and according to established usage, a bill, when read the third time, has passed. The form, however, is preserved in the Votes and Proceedings and Journals, where the bill is recorded as having been read the third time and passed, . . .

I would say that here we have kept the form. The form has not fallen into desuetude as it has in the United Kingdom. In the United Kingdom when they amend the title in committee they do not even refer to it after third reading. The entry is made, "Bill read third time and the title be—" and they repeat the new title as amended in committee, whereas here when a bill has been amended in committee we put the motion that the bill do now pass and title be not as on the order paper but as amended in committee. See Beauchesne's third edition, citation 692. So, although the form has fallen into desuetude in the United Kingdom, we still use it, but I say it is used merely as a formality. It is a link connected with the main motion which is the third reading of the bill.

Now, I have taken enough time and this is the ruling which I feel I should make.

Mr. Knowles: With respect, but because I believe this final motion is separate from the third reading, according to our Canadian practice and our Canadian standing orders, I appeal your ruling.

Mr. Speaker: Those who are in favour of sustaining the Speaker's ruling will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those who are opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre rose to submit his point of order before the Deputy Clerk had a chance to stand up and say "Third reading of this bill", may I be permitted now to ask the Deputy Clerk to perform that duty?

The Clerk Assistant: Third reading of this bill.

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows:

Mr. Knowles raised a point of order to the effect that, when the motion for third reading of the bill had been disposed of, the terms of the motion adopted in this sitting had been met; and since the motion "That the said bill do now pass and the title be as on the order paper" was a distinctly separate question, it could not be taken after the ordinary hour of adjournment.

I ruled that the motion "That the bill do now pass and the title be as on the order paper" was votable, but since it was a formal procedural motion connected with the question for third reading, it must be decided forthwith, in accordance with the terms of standing order 33; whereupon Mr. Knowles appealed to the house from my ruling.

The house divided on the question: Shall the Speaker's decision be sustained? And the decision of the Chair was sustained on the following division:

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Drew: What is the order of business for tomorrow?

Mr. Harris: It would be the government's intention on government orders to take interim supply.

Mr. Drew: There has been no notice given that would make it possible for this to be taken up tomorrow.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Are you going to abolish the rules on that too?

Mr. Drew: There is nothing appearing on the order paper.

It being 3.20 a.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

BUTTER SALES, INSTITUTIONS

3. Since its inception, what has been the total cost of the policy to the taxpayer?

Answer by: Mr. McCubbin, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Agriculture:

APPENDIX

ADDRESS

of

HIS EXCELLENCY DR. SUKARNO

President of the Republic of Indonesia to

MEMBERS OF THE SENATE AND THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

in the House of Commons Chamber, Ottawa on Tuesday, June 5, 1956, at 10.20 a.m.

The President was welcomed by the Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent, Prime Minister of Canada, and thanked by the Hon. Wishart McL. Robertson, Speaker of the Senate, and the Hon. L. René Beaudoin, Speaker of the House of Commons.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister of Canada): Mr. President, we are honoured by your presence here today, for your visit to Canada is tangible evidence of the growing friendship between our two countries. Let me assure you, therefore, of the pleasure which your visit to Canada, to our capital and to this parliament gives us.

If I may take the liberty of making a personal reference, Mr. President, I should like to say that I still recall with the best of memories my own too brief visit to Indonesia in 1954, when you made me welcome and we first became acquainted. I join with my colleagues in the hope that your sojourn in Canada will be as pleasant and rewarding as was my own among the friendly people of Indonesia, whose gracious hospitality I shall always recall with pleasure.

Although it is true that vast distances separate our two countries geographically, there exists no such distance or distinction between the hopes and aspirations of our two peoples. We share in the hopes for the building of strong and vital nations, states well adjusted in their relations with their neighbours and anxious to be on good terms with all peoples of good will.

Canada is a young nation made up of diverse races which have brought to this continent cultures and traditions of other lands out of which we are building a united society. Indonesia too may be proud of her own ancient peoples and traditions, of her rich cultures which today she seeks to preserve and adapt to the demands of the twentieth century. Both our peoples have inherited countries rich in natural resources which we desire to develop to improve the living standards of our peoples. We both know that national development cannot be achieved by international isolation. So we in Canada take much satisfaction in our co-operation with you in the United Nations and in the modest assistance toward your economic progress that we can make through the Colombo plan.

As parliamentarians, Mr. President, we have followed with a lively interest the events associated with the convening of Indonesia's first elected parliament. We know something of the difficulties which were involved in conducting your first national elections last autumn and of the magnificent way in which your people overcame those difficulties. I hope that on your return to Indonesia you and the other distinguished parliamentarians who accompany you will convey our greetings to the members of your new parliament.

I am sure that my colleagues and friends are aware, Mr. President, of the high esteem in which you are held by your people. In Indonesia the name of Sukarno is synonymous with the achievement of national independence, and to a degree which would be the envy of any statesman you enjoy and richly deserve the title of father of your country.

Therefore it gives me great pleasure, Mr. President, to welcome you to the Canadian parliament. I now invite the President of the Republic of Indonesia to address us.

President Sukarno of the Republic of Indonesia: Mr. Speaker, I am deeply grateful for this opportunity of addressing the distinguished parliament of this great country. I am also deeply grateful for the invitation which has brought myself and your other Indonesian guests to these hospitable shores.

Address by President of Indonesia

In one very important sense Canada and Indonesia are neighbours. Your country is both an Atlantic power and a Pacific power, and travelling west from your shores the Republic of Indonesia is a neighbour of yours. Nothing is more important than knowing one's neighbours; that is one more reason why I was so glad to receive this invitation to visit you.

I feel that there is a close link between Canada and Indonesia. Both of these countries are on the verge of a great new period of development, and I am firmly convinced that the future of both countries will bring increased prosperity and increased happiness for all mankind.

Perhaps there is another link between us. In terms of history it is not so very long since Canada released herself from colonial bonds. If I am not mistaken, the uprisings in both Upper Canada and Lower Canada in 1837 did not immediately bring national independence, but they did bring a new political constellation, which led directly to the granting of responsible government to those colonies we now know as Canada. That new political constellation was a direct ancestor of the British North America Act which even today serves, with its amendments, as your constitution.

With us it was different. My nation still had almost one hundred years of colonialism to undergo after the Canadian people had assumed the mantle of nationhood. Our independence did not come smoothly, but it came eventually as a result of war, of enemy occupation, of revolution, and, most important, of a national struggle lasting decades. But now that great struggle is partly over. The Republic of Indonesia has joined the family of nations and seeks to play a full part in the joint tasks and joint responsibilities of that family.

Standing before the members of this parliament and before you, my thoughts inevitably fly to the far-flung homes of the Canadian people who have chosen you as their representatives and who have handed to you the responsibilities of government. I would like to convey to those people, spread over this vast country, the most sincere greetings from myself, from members of my party, and from the Indonesian people. Further, I wish to convey to you the most grateful and heartfelt thanks of the Indonesian people for your assistance in the past, and our hope that this visit will lead to even closer relations in the future. It would not be surprising if even closer relations should develop between neighbours, even though they are separated by the thousands of miles' expanse of the Pacific ocean.

Mr. Speaker, allow me to say a few words to the French-Canadian members.

(Translation):

May I be permitted to say a few words to the French-Canadian members. As first citizen of my country, I feel greatly privileged to extend to you the most cordial and sincere wishes of the Indonesian people whom I have the honour of representing here. They are the wishes of a friendly nation whose ideals and interests are almost identical with yours. Such similarity is quite logical since, in all democratic countries, the roots of civilization are basically the same.

Moreover, I avail myself of this opportunity, which is unique in our history, to thank you for the warm welcome you have given me.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, it is obviously true that the land, the climate and the people are the basic elements for the making of any nation. The future of that nation depends greatly upon what is done with the land and its resources. The political future of the nation depends, it is clear, upon the organized strength of the nation, and the social and cultural development of the nation can be measured only by the people's victory over their environment.

Like Canada, Indonesia is a vast country. We have more than 3,000 inhabited islands and our archipelago runs from Malaya to the north of Australia. It is a vast country of 82 million people and—I do not say this in any boastful spirit—it is today the third largest democracy in the world. Our nation is young in this modern world of ours, but it does not enter the family of nations empty-handed. I know that Canada is just beginning to exploit the great wealth bestowed by God upon this country: we of Indonesia are in the same position. The difference between us is that Canada's great natural wealth could not be exploited until science and technology had reached their present level. Indonesia's natural wealth could have been exploited—to the benefit of humanity—long ago. But we laboured under colonialism.

Now we can see no limit to the possibilities of development. It is no exaggeration to say that even we of Indonesia do not know the wealth of our country. It is no exaggeration to say that many of the islands composing our archipelago have hardly been explored, let alone exploited. When modern technology and modern science are devoted to the task of extracting the maximum from those islands, then I say with no fear of contradiction that Indonesia will contribute very, very greatly to the material well-being of this interdependent world of ours.

Furthermore, it is my belief that Indonesia and the other newly reborn countries of Asia and Africa have other gifts to bring to the world. I would like to quote to you a passage—a very short passage, but a very important passage—from a booklet distributed by the Canadian government. This booklet was distributed three years ago throughout the countries of southeast Asia and, speaking of Asia, it stated that:

> Although we may have something to give and to teach, we have also much to receive and to learn. In this vast country of ours, we have found out how we may live and prosper, but from the east, with its ancient cultures, we have much to learn of the abiding things that bring comfort and delight to the mind and heart.

Mr. Speaker, that may well be true. What is equally true is that from the east also can come great material benefit, material benefit for all countries, material benefit both for the west and the east, material benefit for the whole world.

I know that it is a truism to talk of the interdependence of nations; I know that almost every speaker today refers to this, but it is sometimes difficult to appreciate just what it means in cold reality. The government of Canada has obviously a real understanding of the position: this is shown clearly by the fact that each year Canada contributes more than $25 million to the Colombo plan. As the representative of a country, and as the representative of a nation benefiting from this aid, I know what the Colombo plan means and, please believe me, I express the gratitude of my people for this example of the brotherhood of nations and the interdependence of mankind.

We are indeed grateful for all assistance which comes to us, from whatever quarter of the globe it may come. We struggled long for our national identity. We love that national identity, we hold that national identity dear as life itself. We aim, therefore, above all things, to maintain and preserve that national identity. I assure you in all seriousness: nothing will ever take that from us. No hope or promise of quick reward will persuade us to barter one scrap of our independence, for to us that independence, that national independence, is more precious than any other thing in this world.

When I first set foot in the United States I expressed my hope of observing America, amongst other things, as a state of mind. It is important that Asia and Africa be seen as a state of mind. And what is that Asian and African state of mind? Essentially it is the determination that the nations of Asia and Africa develop their own national reality. I use the word "reality" advisedly, because a nation is a reality.

Who could doubt that after observing the post-war world? In particular, perhaps, who could doubt that after observing the Asian and African conference which was held in Bandung a year ago? That great and historic meeting of twenty-nine states showed clearly the path of history in this post-war and troubled world. Representatives of more than half of mankind, pre-representatives of 1,600 million people, met together in one of Indonesia's mountain cities, and discussed problems common to them all.

Those national representatives of Asia and Africa discussed the basic problem of where their nations stood in this modern world. I know that it is not necessary for me to tell you of the result of that conference. You know that a long and all-embracing resolution was unanimously adopted. That result answered the basic question of where those nations stood. It answered the question of what the peoples of Asia and Africa sought and desired. Those assembled representatives of the majority of mankind clearly expressed their opposition to colonialism in all its forms. That is a basic fact in the mid-twentieth century.

Above all things, this is the period of Asian and African nationalism. This is the era when the old conditions, the old and hated pattern of world society is undone. Who can be surprised by the fact that colonialism, whatever form it assumes, whatever mask it may hide behind, however it may disguise itself, is indeed a hateful and a disgusting thing? I will tell you this: colonialism left Indonesia with a heritage of illiteracy, a heritage of human sickness, of human ignorance, of human degradation, which was a disgrace and a menace to the twentieth century. We had the highest illiteracy rate in the world. We had the highest mortality rate in the world. We had the lowest living standard in the whole world: one "goband" a day, two and a half guilder-cents a day—not even one dollar-cent a day. Our country was rich, but its wealth did not serve to alleviate the misery and ignorance of our people. Having achieved independence, we still feel the consequences of 350 years of colonialism. And those consequences are not light ones.

Illiteracy, sickness which science has long known how to control, technical backwardness, great social inequality, great economic backwardness, were our inheritance, but under a national government, under a government dedicated to the uplifting and progress of our people, these things are not insupportable or unchangeable.

Just eleven years ago almost all of our people were illiterate; today less than half of our people are illiterate. Perhaps it may seem that I am boasting. I do not intend to boast, but I am immensely proud of the achievement in this field, and I am immensely proud of our national progress in other fields. We a nation previously numbered amongst the voiceless and the unconsidered in the world, a nation previously numbered amongst the unregarded—we have, for example, but recently completed, to our great satisfaction, the very first general election in our country. This is a considerable achievement, and I am proud of it. I am proud of it because it shows a degree of political progress which could hardly have been expected of a nation which only eleven years ago was not even considered by the world.

We elected, under conditions of universal suffrage and secret ballot, a parliament and a constituent assembly. Although I know well that those things alone are not a guarantee of democracy, I know equally well that without those things democracy cannot exist. We have chosen, and chosen after proper consideration, the democratic path to national fulfilment and national emancipation. We have chosen the path of Pantja Sila, the five principles of our state. They are: Belief in God; nationalism; humanitarianism; democracy, and, last of all, social justice. It is our belief that this path will lead us most rapidly to the full and useful life which every nation ought to contribute and enjoy in our present-day world.

We all know that there is more than one road to participation in the world's affairs. We have chosen this Pantja Sila road. It is our sincere hope, our most sincere hope, that it will lead to success.

I am told that people are sometimes surprised at our attitude toward certain international problems in the world. We do not automatically accept the views of any group of people. We do not join in any military organization. We intend to be ourselves. It is true, it is very true, that we are enthusiastic members of the United Nations, and we see in the United Nations the faint outlines of a future world organization. We call our foreign policy not a "neutral" foreign policy; we call our foreign policy "independent" and "active". We call it so because we take an independent line in accordance with what we see as the best interests of the world and our own nation, and we act upon that.

One of the draftsmen of Canada's greatness, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, said in the year 1900:

> I claim for Canada this: that in future Canada shall be at liberty to act or not to act.

In those words that great prime minister, that architect of the future, summed up the foreign policy which we of Indonesia choose to follow today.

We seek to follow a policy which will give the greatest benefit to all mankind, and if that foreign policy should sometimes run counter to what you believe and act upon, believe me when I say that what we do and how we vote is dictated by our ideals, and not by any spirit of opposition.

Yes, we are separated, as I said, by the Pacific ocean. But we are also joined by the Pacific ocean. We are neighbours, and nothing is more important than that neighbours should understand each other. I have not come to your vast country to negotiate any treaty. I have come with the hope that this short visit of mine will lead to a better understanding between our nations. If this should be so, I will be well content. You have a great future with your neighbour and friend to the south, the United States of America, that vast country which I so recently visited. There is a saying that "an unseen frontier of friendship" exists between Canada and the United States. It is my prayer that between us of Indonesia and this country of Canada a similar frontier of friendship may develop and grow strong.

Again I say, if our foreign policy should sometimes run counter to what you believe in or act upon, it is dictated by our ideals and not by a spirit of opposition. So let our friendship be strong.

Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen, I beg you, do not underestimate the force of the nationalist torrent which is today pouring over Asia and Africa. It is a mighty torrent, and one thing is certain; we are in the midst of an historical change which is vital for the whole future of mankind. It is a nationalist torrent, and that torrent is not directed against anyone or any nation. It is a torrent whose object is the greater freedom, the greater liberation, of mankind. I say this in all seriousness: any attempt to stand against that torrent will be vain, just as every attempt ever undertaken to stand against an historical process has been vain. This torrent is directed only against the outworn principle of colonialism. You may call it a destructive torrent, but it is one which is destructive only of colonialism and one which will lead to a greater and wider horizon of freedom for all men everywhere and in every country. In the framework of history it is constructive and progressive.

Today most of my own country is free, most of my own nation is enjoying the fruit of independence, but to our sorrow and continued dissatisfaction a part of our nation and country still suffers under colonialism, that plague on mankind's fulfilment. West Irian—perhaps you know it better as West New Guinea—is still unfree. Until West Irian is rejoined to the rest of my country Indonesia will feel herself incomplete and insecure. There can be no question that West Irian is part of Indonesia, and indeed until 1950 no one in the world would have dreamed of denying that fact. Until we are united with our still unfree brethren we of Indonesia will never be content, because we know just what colonialism means in terms of human unhappiness, in terms of human misery and human degradation.

In this world of ours, troubled and uneasy though it is, there is still much success and many gains for the peace and security of men. Whatever we have gained has been won because man's understanding of other men as brothers has increased.

This is essential. Mankind the world over is basically the same, whatever cultural or ideological details may appear to divide it. Understanding and sympathy are necessary. Active understanding and active sympathy will help relieve the strains and tensions in the world. This is really my message to you. Give us your understanding and your sympathy. Give us, if you can, your active understanding and your active sympathy. If you do that, and if we of Asia and Africa retain that active sympathy and understanding, then the future of the world can indeed be bright. Yes, mankind is basically the same, whatever racial or ideological details may appear to divide it. Why should mankind divide itself? Look, Indonesia is a country with many religions and many faiths. We have in Indonesia Moslems, we have Christians, we have Civa-Buddhists, we have peoples of other creeds. We have many ethnic units, such as Javanese, Achinese, Balinese, Madurese, Sundanese, etc. But, thank God, we have our will to unity.

We try to practise our state motto "Bhinneka Tunggal Ika", which means "Unity in Diversity". We are tolerant to each other, we are one nation. One of the most remarkable phenomena in modern history is that we of Indonesia, although living on 3,000 islands, are united in one nation, without pressure, without compulsion, without civil war.

What, then, is our unifying force? It is the will to unity, it is "le désir d'être ensemble", instead of suspecting each other, dominating each other, threatening each other and colonizing each other—living at each other's expense.

We of Indonesia try to practise "Bhinneka Tunggal Ika" amongst ourselves. Let us try to practise "Bhinneka Tunggal Ika" amongst nations.

Then, only then, can we look up again to the stars and say, "Thank God, for You have given us this world, and we have lived according to Your word."

Hon. Wishart McL. Robertson (Speaker of the Senate): May I, Mr. President, thank you on behalf of the Senate of Canada for coming to us and for the eloquent and inspiring address you have just delivered.

We realize that you are the first head of an Asian state who has ever visited this parliament. We were disposed to extend to you a hearty welcome, for your reputation had preceded you. We were disposed as well to extend that hearty welcome because of the great respect we have for the Indonesian minister in Canada, and extend that welcome on the part of all those who have come under the charm and influence of his personality.

We are more honoured and pleased on this occasion, Mr. President, because Indonesia, although a young nation as the age of states is reckoned, has become a leader of that community of nations in Asia and Africa which are newly independent or just emerging to take their rightful place in the family of free nations. It was just over a year ago that the achievements of the Asian-African conference held in Bandung, Indonesia, brought dramatically to the attention of the whole world the fact that a new and powerful force was present in world affairs. We welcome this new force which is based on the independence and equality of the people of Asia and Africa. There has long existed among the people of Canada sympathy and understanding for the aspirations of countries like Indonesia which are engaged in the great task of creating new nations out of ancient civilizations.

You, sir, have been a most powerful spokesman not only for Indonesia but for that larger community of which Indonesia forms a part. We leave this chamber with a clearer understanding of the important matters with which you have dealt and we sense that, great as may be the geographical distances which separate our two countries, we are close in mind and heart. We would ask you particularly, Mr. President, to convey to your parliamentarians and the people of your country generally our warmest expressions of esteem and friendship.

Indonesia is the world's sixth most populous nation, and her natural beauties and resources are justly famous. She may be proud, Mr. President, of her accomplishments at home and her reputation abroad. We wish her well in all her future undertakings.

(Translation):

Hon. L. René Beaudoin (Speaker of the House of Commons): Mr. President, right hon. Prime Minister, hon. Speaker of the Senate, hon. members of the Senate, hon.

members of the House of Commons, ladies and gentleman:

While listening this morning to the President of the Republic of Indonesia, who enjoys such prominence and popularity in his own country, because of his struggle for her independence, and especially because of the well-deserved success he has achieved as a result of perseverance and courage, I recalled a statement once made by a Canadian writer to the effect that the spirit of independence is deeply rooted in the heart of peoples. And if, under certain circumstances, and by virtue of certain historic rights, that spirit is sometimes subjected to equitable laws, it is nonetheless true to the laws of nature and to common aspirations that societies develop in the sense of their autonomy.

This same struggle to which you referred a while ago, Mr. President, we have experienced at home, albeit without clash, or blow, and, especially, without bitterness, so that here, that is to say in the commonwealth, the symbol of the crown and the good will of all parties are the only bonds which make it a united whole.

While listening to you, Mr. President, we noted that your problems were quite different from ours, though quite as complex. Canada, which is a sovereign country, has always avoided interference in the domestic problems of other countries, and so we are in a position to wish for you, and to hope with you, that they may all be solved in accordance with your wishes, for the greatest good and prosperity of your country whose noble aspirations you symbolize so admirably.

In this task you are ably supported by your Minister of Foreign Affairs, Mr. Ruslan Abduglgani, whose presence at your side I note with pleasure.

(Text):

To you, Mr. President, to your able Minister of Foreign Affairs and to the people of Indonesia, may I express the best wishes of the Canadian people and of the members of this house, and also the sincere hope that you will be successful in all your worthy enterprises till you have fulfilled your cherished ideals.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, June 6, 1956

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Sixth report of standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Hunter.

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

Seventh report of standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.—Mr. McCulloch (Pictou).

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1956-57

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance) moved:

That the message of His Excellency, together with the supplementary estimates presented on June 5, be referred to the committee of supply.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MR. DREW—MOTION OF NON-CONFIDENCE IN PRESIDING OFFICER OF THE HOUSE

The house resumed, from Monday, June 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. Drew:

In view of the unprecedented action of Mr. Speaker in (a) improperly reversing his own decision without notice and without giving any opportunity for discussion; (b) repeatedly refusing to allow members to address the house on occasions when the rules provide that they have the right to be heard; (c) subordinating the rights of the house to the will of the government, this house resolves that it no longer has any confidence in its presiding officer.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, almost the first words spoken by the Leader of the Opposition when he submitted this motion for the consideration of the house on Monday were the following:

The Speaker has held the regard, I think I can say without any question the deep affection, of most members of this house. It is with the utmost regret, not only on my own part but I know on the part of others, that a motion of this nature should have become necessary at this time.

We on this side of the house certainly do not feel—and I am sure there are many on the other side of the house who do not feel—that this motion was either necessary or warranted. We feel that the views expressed by the leader of the C.C.F. party, when he recalled the discussion which took place in this chamber about a year ago that it might be desirable for this house to have the speakership a permanent office that would go on from one parliament to another, are views that would still be valid at the present time.

We feel that your conduct in the exercise of that office from the day you first took your place in the chair has been such that it deserves the commendation and affectionate regard of all hon. members of this house. I am sure that, distressing though it must have been to you, sir, to have to occupy the chair while this motion was being discussed on Monday, your conduct and the manner in which you presided over the deliberations of the house at that time have earned for you another degree of admiration and respect of the hon. members of this house on both sides.

When I moved that the debate be adjourned I thought that on reflection it might be possible that the house would not have to make any pronouncement upon the motion, and that the hon. gentleman who had moved it would feel that the best interests of parliament would be served by withdrawing the motion. Apparently that is not to take place and the matter probably will have to come to a decision.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis) suggested that it should be disposed of and that there should be a decision of the house upon it at the earliest possible moment. I think that is desirable if the matter has to be proceeded with, and I shall add nothing further to what I said on the previous occasion because I think your conduct is the best refutation of the statements made in the motion and that most hon. members would feel that they should at the earliest possible moment be able to signify their formal view that that is the fact.

Therefore I suggest that it be disposed of on the same high plane which was maintained on Monday; and now that the very contentious measure which was the occasion for the events which preceded the motion has passed out of our hands I would hope that calmer views will prevail and that we can get back to a position where we will be able to discharge our duties to the country with respect to the matters which have to be dealt with at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Are we to take it that the hon. Leader of the Opposition is to speak with unanimous consent and will not close the debate?

Mr. Drew: I shall not speak because I do not want to raise any question of being in the position of closing the debate. I shall defer my remarks until later.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, this indeed is a time when the solemnity of the occasion denies anything in the nature of vengeful feeling or indeed the expression of strong views. I do not know of any occasion in the years I have been here when I have risen with less relish than I do now; for indeed this house and parliament walk with history when events such as these occur and when a motion such as that which was proposed by the Leader of the Opposition comes up for consideration in this house.

With the viewpoint of the Prime Minister that it is a momentous occasion, no one can disagree. I would remind the Prime Minister of this, however, with regard to the remarks he made today. When the motion was made the Prime Minister in effect stated that what was being done was an attempt to delay the pipe-line debate and disarrange the timetable of the government. That was not the purpose. In continuing the debate may I say that I am of those who believe that Mr. Speaker is in the position in which he now finds himself because of the improper acts of the government. That was revealed when the Prime Minister stated yesterday that what took place on Friday would have prejudiced the government.

I speak as one who has had toward Mr. Speaker those feelings that have been referred to over and over again, but this motion is more than a personal one. It is based on the demand for a perfect dedication to the preservation of the ancestral rights of the members of the House of Commons, requiring that Mr. Speaker maintain the privileges of parliament. In so far as Mr. Deputy Speaker is concerned, the Leader of the Opposition endeavoured to have a motion brought before the house but that opportunity was denied. Having regard to the contents of that motion, in order once more to restore this house to a sense of its responsibility I believe that the Deputy Speaker should indeed present his resignation.

It is in keeping with the seriousness of this occasion that we maintain dignity and restraint—the Prime Minister did so during the course of his remarks—for all of us know that if freedom is to be maintained this place must remain its national temple for our country. It is not an unusual motion, although until 1925 in the mother of parliaments it had not been made within the memory of any living member of parliament. Parliament has been described by Quintin Hogg in these words:

> . . . a priceless possession, not to be exchanged for anything more meretricious . . . an ancient family mansion which has been lived in continuously for a period of centuries.

Freedom is maintained by successive Speakers, who have it in their hands and their power to sustain the rights of members in all parts of the house and to assure that the ark of the covenant for Speakers is that all members have equal rights and that at no time shall there be a deviation, however beneficial that might be to the government of the day or however detrimental or prejudicial to the wishes of the government of the day any order made by Mr. Speaker may be.

Mention has been made of the regrets that all of us have for the events that have taken place. I indulge in no recriminations. I am of those who join the Prime Minister in their love of parliament and in the maintenance of those amenities which are above the temporary advantages of controversy in this house. Indeed, one of the elements that distinguishes parliament from other representative institutions was set out many years ago by Sir William Harcourt on June 24, 1895, when offering his resignation as leader of the house. He said this:

> I would ask leave to say that for every man who has taken part in the noble conflicts of parliamentary life, the chiefest ambition of all ambitions, whether in the majority or in the minority, must be to stand well with the House of Commons.

That is a principle that we maintain as an ideal, however often in the thrust of debate we lose sight of the goal which is ours. In order to maintain parliament as an instrument of freedom, a fearless and determined opposition whose rights are respected is of the essence. To that end rules have to be interpreted fairly, for when the interpretation of the laws of parliament is altered or changed in order to meet the demand of the majority or has the appearance of being so altered, then the rights of parliament are violated and tyranny is substituted for justice. I fear that in the years ahead what has taken place will be looked upon as the temporary passing of parliament, when rules were swept away, when the demands of justice were disenthroned and when the doctrine which was the negation of democratic rights was enthroned, that might is indeed right.

Sir, all of us have read works on parliament and on the rights of the Speaker. One of the finest works on the subject was written by Herbert Morrison. He sets forth in his book "Government and Parliament" the sanctity of the position of Speaker. I am not going to read from it; I am simply going to make my own summary and it is this. The responsibility of the Speaker is—and I paraphrase the words of another that were written over 2,500 years ago—to combine that degree of freedom of speech without which parliamentary rules are tyranny and that degree of parliamentary rules without which freedom of speech would become licence.

Throughout the ages Mr. Speaker has been in imminent danger of displeasure at the hands of the sovereign. I do not quote British precedents because the appointment of our Speaker is so different, but under the British system the speakership is a permanent appointment. His impartiality denies that he be the subject of directives or otherwise from the government. His concern is not whether his action may prejudice the government or the majority. To dare place him in that position is to make Mr. Speaker a sacrificial instrument at the will of the government. That he will err no one denies; that he will sometimes make mistakes is admitted; that he will sometimes be wrong is accepted; but that he will ever be on the side of wrong is to deny the traditions of his high office.

Sir Robert Borden described parliament in 1929, sir, when he accepted from the mother of parliaments at Westminster the gift of the chair in which you now sit. He said this:

> The parliamentary institutions which we hold as of right and not of grace were won by a common ancestry and through gradual evolution and development during the past five or six centuries.

It is because we believe this that we alternate as between English-speaking and French-speaking Speakers.

> The man who summoned the first gathering that might be regarded as the forerunner of the commons house of parliament of Great Britain as that of Canada was a Frenchman, born in France. Thus we can look back with satisfaction upon the fact that Saxon and Norman five or six hundred years ago stood side by side in the assertion of liberties that are ours today.

It is because of that great tradition that we in this parliament must assure that our prerogative rights must be maintained, must be assured, shall in no way be diminished, and may not be curtailed at the hands of the majority, however desirable that curtailment may be.

I mentioned that there was a recent instance in the mother of parliaments. I am not going to speak at length in this regard. However, to those who are interested the motion appears in the British Hansard of May 25, 1925, moved by Captain Wedgwood Benn, to the following effect:

> That, in view of the express provisions of standing order No. 26 for the protection of the rights of minorities, this house regrets the action of Mr. Speaker on the 25th May, 1925, when, contrary to recent precedents, he granted the closure at 11.45 p.m. on the first day's debate on the motion for the second reading of the finance bill.

Outstanding leaders of Liberalism spoke on that occasion. Sir John Simon, afterwards lord high chancellor, dealt with the rights of parliament and the need of Mr. Speaker preserving at all costs the rights of the minority and also of assuring that those rights shall in no way be diminished. Right Hon. David Lloyd George spoke on the same occasion. In detail he set forth the facts at pages 1605 and 1606, and I paraphrase his early remarks, that the majorities of today become the minorities of tomorrow and what is done to minorities today will create precedents that in future years will be used against those who become minorities. At page 1607 he said this:

> I have, in this house, been one of the leaders of great majorities for 17 years, but I am prouder of the fact that once upon a time I was one of seven, trooping into the lobby amidst the jeers of a triumphant majority. I am prouder today of that fact, and it did not take many years before that triumphant majority melted away amidst the derision and scorn of the people of this country. I know majorities must prevail if you are to govern, but minorities must also be heard if liberty is to be preserved, and it is because I think that the liberties of this house have been curtailed and that a fair opportunity has been denied, not to us, but to the House of Commons—we only wanted our share whatever it was—

I say, sir, those words represent the situation here. This motion is not a partisan one; this motion is one that is moved not for the benefit of the minorities of the present but for the benefit of minorities that are yet to come. And I say to the Prime Minister through you, sir, that Mr. Lloyd George on that occasion pointed out how soon those transitions do take place.

I have gone back over the years, and the earliest occasion I can find is in 1628. At that time the then Speaker, Mr. Speaker Finch, refused to listen to the requests of the members of the house of that day. He was asked to speak on their behalf, to be the custodian of their rights, and he refused to do that although according to the ancient privileges of parliament as they then existed it was his responsibility so to do. He was urged to act; he refused, and a member of parliament, Mr. Peard, said this:

> If the Speaker will be silent, we are dumb. That is blowing up the house without gun powder.

That is the regard that members had as far back as 1628 for the tremendous responsibilities that rest upon the Speaker.

I am not going to go over the details of the last few days but, sir, what took place on Friday, June 1, as recorded at page 4537—and I say it with a deep sense of responsibility; I say it with sadness—was a denial of the rights of the House of Commons to a degree that members, whatever side they are on, ought not to accept with equanimity.

Your Honour had made a ruling the night before, on Thursday, May 31. You had ruled that the hon. member for Nanaimo could speak. In effect you endorsed the question of privilege he raised. You indicated that certain portions of the letters might raise privilege, and you wished an opportunity at some time to point out those sections that did not. You made a ruling which was prejudicial to the government's intentions and demands. You made it in keeping with the finest traditions of those who have occupied that honoured chair. Sir, why did you change the next day? The record gives no reason other than that you believed you had made a mistake.

Sir, there were scenes of indignation in this house. I am of those who, loving this institution, denied themselves the luxury of participating in some of the things that took place; but, sir, you will never understand the feelings of hon. members that were aroused when those ancient rights were negatived and the decision of the previous day was altered overnight, when parliament through you, sir, had taken its firm decision on the Thursday night and you altered that decision the next day.

You placed a proposition before parliament. I have searched the records and I can find no example that in any way can be considered a precedent. Can you not understand why hon. members were aroused? Can the government not understand? What would the Prime Minister have said if he had been on this side? However one looks at the decision on Thursday night, that decision was made; that decision could not be changed. To say that the House of Commons is its own master is simply to adopt a verbal subterfuge. That is why we were aroused, sir.

Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the debate. The Prime Minister knows why.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I second the hon. gentleman's motion. If it will be accepted by the house, I have a very sad announcement to make.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On motion of Mr. Diefenbaker the debate was adjourned.

THE LATE J. L. MacDOUGALL

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, many of us already have been informed of the very tragic event that occurred a few moments ago in this house in the sudden death of our very esteemed colleague, beloved by all of us, Mr. MacDougall, the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard.

I think that it would be fitting, in view of the fact that this tragic event has occurred in this very building, at the moment he was to proceed to answer the call of the bell to take part in our deliberations this afternoon, that we might adjourn the house as a tribute to his memory and as an indication to all his friends of how terribly shocked we are at this tragic event. I would like to move, seconded by the Leader of the Opposition, that this house do now adjourn.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, if I might be allowed one word; forty years ago, on the 1st day of May, we were in the 196th battalion together. I have known the late hon. member through all those years.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed with great regret that I heard a moment ago from the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott) that my good friend, Jack MacDougall, had passed away. I have known Jack MacDougall since 1935, when he was my opponent in the general election. We were political opponents but the very best of friends since that time and up to now. It is indeed with regret that I have heard of his passing, and I agree that in respect for the memory of one who took so much interest in the affairs of this house it would be proper to adjourn.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to say that we were shocked at the news of the untimely passing of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, the Liberal whip for the British Columbia group. We join the Prime Minister in desiring, out of respect for him and to show our sympathy and understanding to his friends and relatives, that this house should be adjourned. We also wish at this time to join in indicating the high regard in which we held the hon. member, and to say that his strained attention here in the past weeks had certainly taken a terrific toll on him.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 3.11 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, June 7, 1956

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

THE LATE J. L. MacDOUGALL

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yesterday afternoon, shortly after we had commenced our proceedings, hon. members were deeply shocked to learn of the sudden death in this building of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, Mr. John Lorne MacDougall. To indicate the respect in which we held our friend, it was unanimously agreed that the house should immediately adjourn for the remainder of the day.

Mr. MacDougall was born at Tiverton, Ontario, 57 years ago. He began his first service to Canada when he enlisted as a soldier in the first world war at the early age of 16. In taking this course, he followed the example of his four elder brothers and, like them, he returned to our shores at the end of hostilities bearing the scars of wounds inflicted during active combat.

Going to Saskatchewan after his war service, he plunged into an academic career, finished his matriculation and completed his arts degree, and then came to Toronto to study and graduate in dentistry. Unfortunately his health was so undermined by his war experiences that he was forced after three years to abandon the practice of his chosen profession.

Having moved to Vancouver, it was there in 1935 that he first stood for election to the House of Commons. Although unsuccessful in that attempt, he was elected for the constituency of Vancouver-Burrard in 1949 and was re-elected with a substantial majority in the last general election.

Mr. MacDougall was certainly among the best liked members of the House of Commons. His was one of those warm personalities that generate a friendly atmosphere wherever they may be. And yet, along with that cheerfulness, he had a very serious approach to the problems upon which we are called to express our views from day to day. He gave very careful study to the legislation before the house and stoutly defended the principles in which he believed. It was a mark of his fine character that he bore no ill feelings whatsoever against those who disagreed with him nor, I am sure, did any of his fellow members ever harbour any such feelings against him.

Despite his poor health, Jack MacDougall was a frequent contributor both to the debates of this house and to the work of the committees of which he was a member. He last spoke in debate on May 15, less than three weeks ago. He had been in constant attendance since then. The Hansard for June 5 records that he participated in the various votes which took place in the early hours of yesterday morning, including the last one at about three o'clock in the morning. He died just as he was on his way to take his seat in this chamber for yesterday's sitting. His faith in Canada and his devotion to the Canadian people and Canadian interests were demonstrated up to his last breath. He will long be remembered by all of us with affection and with high regard.

Mr. Speaker, I am confident that I speak for every member of this house when I express our very deep sympathy to Mrs. MacDougall in her tragic loss.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in joining with the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in expressing our sympathy in the very sudden and sad loss of one who was a friend of every member of this house, I wish to concur in what has been said and also to express the feeling that those of us who did not belong to his party always had for him.

Jack MacDougall loved people. He gave friendship generously and he received it. Yesterday, on going through the building after the news had come of his very sudden death, it was noticeable that the members of the staff were all quiet and sad. Without exception they spoke of his friendliness and his interest in what they were doing.

All of us will recall the manner in which he mingled with the members of every party and, in doing so, expressed his genuine affection for those who shared with him responsibilities in this house. The House of Commons was a great part of his life. It was evident that for him what took place here was a very personal thing.

I think perhaps it was only symbolic that the end should have come as he was about to give another day's service here in this house. He had given great service to his country. He served well in the first world war as a very young man. The three occasions on which he was severely wounded undoubtedly contributed to the ill health from which he suffered but about which he never at any time complained. His courage was equally great in the years of peace that followed. There was never a suggestion from Jack MacDougall himself of the uncertainty that he knew existed about the length of this life or about the disabilities from which he constantly suffered. We all remember his genial conduct on all occasions. As the Prime Minister has said, he carried no rancour. He held strong convictions. He expressed them. He held independent views as well as views that conformed with the party to which he adhered with great loyalty and sincerity.

I can safely say that there is as great a feeling of sadness on this side of the house as on the government side. Nevertheless, we do recognize the very special sense of loss to those who have been associated with him for many years. To the Prime Minister, to the members of the government and to all of his colleagues we extend our deepest sympathy. Above all our sympathy goes to his wife. I do not think any of us will forget the tragic circumstances under which she learned of his unexpected passing. She was in the gallery, as she had been so constantly during this session. She was taking her share in what had been a great partnership over the years that he had served the public so well. I think we can only express the hope at this time that for Mrs. MacDougall there may be some very real comfort in the knowledge that all of us here are thinking of her in her sorrow at this time.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, we were all profoundly shocked and distressed yesterday when we learned of the news of the sudden passing of our friend and colleague in this house, Jack MacDougall. We shall miss that hearty greeting he would give when you met him in the corridors in the morning or in the cafeteria or elsewhere. We shall miss that friendly way he had with him always. We can ill afford to lose, particularly at times like these, one who is universally friendly and for whom we have such a universal feeling of friendship. It brings home to us once again, Mr. Speaker, the fact that in the midst of life we are in death. Edmund Burke once said at the funeral of, I believe, a political opponent who was taken in the middle of a contest: "The worthy gentleman . . . has feelingly told us what shadows we are, and what shadows we pursue." Those matters which we felt so keenly about during the past week, whether on one side or the other, are after all fleeting things, shadows that flit away.

Mr. MacDougall has not only left many friends but he left in this house records of his work here. I am sure that whether we agree or disagree with the projects which he took over in this house, he urged them because he thought they were in the best interests of those who worked in offices, stores or labour throughout this country. I refer, of course, to the fact that he promoted the bill which caused the celebration of Victoria day to fall on Mondays instead of other days during the week. He did so because he believed, rightly or wrongly, that this was of benefit to the people whom he served.

So, Mr. Speaker, we join, too, in the tribute that has been paid. He was a fellow citizen of mine in the city of Regina for a while when he practised his profession which, we have heard, he had to relinquish on account of his physical condition. I think few of us realized the extent of the ill health which he suffered. We join with everyone not only in this house, but I am quite sure his countless friends across the country, in mourning his loss and expressing to his widow, who has been his constant companion throughout the years, our heartfelt sympathy in her sorrow and her grief.

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Social Credit group of this house and as a representative from the province of British Columbia, it is my privilege this afternoon to pay tribute to the memory of a friend whose service to his constituents, to his province and to his country has been so very suddenly brought to a close. We in this group would like to join in the expressions of sorrow and sympathy that have been voiced in this chamber this afternoon.

Several qualities were evidenced by the late member for Vancouver-Burrard for which he will be especially remembered, and some of those have been mentioned by the previous speakers. One thing that has impressed me since I came to the House of Commons and had the privilege of getting to know Mr. MacDougall was his unfailing cheerfulness and his friendliness. Perhaps because I came here rather recently and Mr. MacDougall had been here for some time I appreciated that spirit all the more. Whenever we had the opportunity of meeting, regardless of the surroundings, there was always that happy and cheerful salutation, and I am sure that I as well as all other hon. members will miss that greeting in the days that lie ahead.

I also noted the devotion which characterized the life of our departed friend. His loyalty to the responsibilities that his constituents had placed upon him has left a deep impression upon my own life. I believe as well there was a real sense of the value of the moral and spiritual resources as far as our friend was concerned. On more than one occasion I listened to him as he addressed this house and made reference to his faith in God and the things which are spiritual.

There is another thing by which I shall remember him, and that is his sense of fairness. There are always sharp differences of opinion, as is expected in political life, but his loyalty to his own party and policies did not keep him from respecting the views of those who differed with him, nor did it keep him from giving credit when he felt such credit was warranted. Therefore, for those qualities of life and character I am sure we are all going to remember Mr. MacDougall.

We in this group would join in our expressions of sympathy to Mrs. MacDougall and assure her of our prayers at this time. Certainly, I am sure the prayer of us all is that God, who is the God of all comfort and grace, will be her sufficiency in this time of sorrow. We express our sympathy to his constituents in the loss of a faithful servant; we express as well our sympathy to the Prime Minister, to his colleagues and to the party of which Mr. MacDougall was a member. I am sure that today and in the future we shall all miss Jack MacDougall.

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, may I, on behalf of my British Columbia colleagues and myself, add a word of tribute to the memory of the late member for Vancouver-Burrard who was taken from us so suddenly yesterday. May I also extend our very deep sympathy to his devoted wife who has given him such abiding help and encouragement and loyalty throughout the years.

As has been said here in such eloquent terms this afternoon, Dr. Jack MacDougall was greatly beloved by every member of this house. He was indeed "the happy warrior".

In spite of grievous wounds sustained in world war I, in spite of recurring illnesses which afflicted him throughout many years, and even latterly as he well knew under the very shadow of death itself, he was always active, cheerful and inspiring. I am sure that the sheer courage with which he triumphed over all the vicissitudes of life will long continue to be an inspiration to every member of this house.

He was a great Liberal and a strong party man, yet he could upon occasion be thoroughly independent, as all of us here well know. Stern characteristics of the old Scottish covenanter were always peeping through in his attitude toward men and affairs.

He served his constituency, his province and his country devotedly and well. To thousands of people in Vancouver and throughout British Columbia where he lived and worked for so many years he proved himself a true and valued friend. I do not know of anything finer that I could say of him than that.

For his good example, for his fine character, for his wit and humour, for all his lovable qualities, we shall miss him greatly here in this chamber.

As we take our leave of him may I paraphrase the immortal words of John Bunyan: "My marks and scars I carry with me, to be a witness for me, that I have fought His battles Who now will be my rewarder. . . and all the trumpets sounded . . . on the other side".

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, the constituencies of Vancouver-Burrard and Vancouver-Quadra lie side by side throughout most of their length and for that reason and also because of the great friendship which had grown up between the late Dr. MacDougall and myself I should like to add just a few words today.

In his home city of Vancouver, Dr. MacDougall's passing will be mourned by thousands of his fellow citizens who knew him and loved him for many reasons, perhaps most of all for the many kind deeds he had done for so many of them and also for his spirit of service and for the wonderfully cheery spirit with which he faced life in spite of severe handicaps. Those qualities, of course, have been manifested here and have endeared him to every member of the House of Commons.

I am sure I speak for every one of us when I say that a great-hearted Canadian has gone from our midst. I should like to join in extending sympathy to his wife, who has been such a wonderful life partner.

Mr. D. F. Brown (Essex West): May I be permitted to say a word on behalf of those government supporters who constitute the rump in this House of Commons. We have known and revered Jack MacDougall as an associate since 1949 and we will long remember him. We in this part of the house in particular have appreciated the wit which he expressed on various occasions. We realize that he had a friendship with all members of this house. We realize too that every

hon. member knew Jack MacDougall. We remember his sincere friendship, rugged but faithful friendship, which he established in this house. We remember him for the fidelity which he showed in this house to his party and in connection with all matters in which he participated.

To Mrs. MacDougall, who was his constant companion, we express our sincere love and sympathy. Jack MacDougall has not died, for the qualities which he expressed so well will remain an inspiration to the hearts and minds of the members of the rump for the years to come.

MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS

Ninth and tenth reports of standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. Henderson.

TRADE

GATT—ANNOUNCEMENT OF RESULTS OF GENEVA CONFERENCE

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a brief statement on the tariff negotiations which have recently been successfully completed in Geneva. A detailed statement of these results was tabled in the house at eleven o'clock this morning, the time which was agreed to in advance with the other countries. For the convenience of hon. members I would suggest that that statement be printed as an appendix to Hansard.

I am happy to say that Canada has concluded new agreements at this conference with the United States and with 12 of our other trading partners in both Europe and Latin America. These agreements were signed on May 23 in Geneva on behalf of Canada by Mr. L. D. Wilgress, Canadian ambassador to NATO, who was also the chairman of the Canadian delegation. The new tariff rates agreed to at this conference will not come into effect until the end of June at the earliest.

The new GATT agreements represent a further addition to the significant and substantial progress already achieved in previous GATT conferences in the reduction of tariff barriers throughout the world. The benefits obtained by Canada in these latest negotiations will lead to useful, practical gains for Canadian exporters of a wide range of products and in many markets. In addition to the concessions obtained directly by Canada, we will also benefit from all the concessions resulting from negotiations between the other participants, and this is one of the great advantages of a multilateral negotiation under GATT.

These new agreements will further strengthen the basis of confidence and co-operation so essential in world trade. It is appropriate at this time to reaffirm Canada's view of the usefulness of GATT as a framework for the conduct of trade and for the development of common trading policies. In this connection, the establishment of the organization for trade co-operation to administer GATT on a continuing basis would render the agreement more effective and would have a most encouraging influence on international relations.

The Canadian government has consistently supported this proposed organization and is prepared to take steps to provide for Canadian participation at the appropriate time. The United Kingdom has already indicated its acceptance, and it is our hope that all the members of GATT, and particularly the other leading trading countries whose support is essential, will similarly find it possible to join in its establishment.

The agreement concluded between Canada and the United States is one of the major agreements resulting from this conference. The concessions that could be made by the United States were limited by United States legislation to maximum tariff reductions of 15 per cent, spread over the next two years. Also, there were a number of items, particularly in the agricultural and fisheries field, on which the United States was not prepared to negotiate at this time. Within these limitations, however, we have concluded an agreement which should be most satisfactory to both countries. The fact that United States concessions would be implemented in three stages was, of course, taken fully into account by our negotiators in determining the nature of the concessions Canada could justifiably grant. Canada has obtained maximum concessions on a large number of products, including various chemicals, certain metals, some agricultural items and a number of manufactured products and machinery. I am sure the house will welcome this agreement as a further step in our joint efforts to reduce trade barriers between Canada and the United States.

Canada has traditional and important trade relations with Europe and Latin America. It is our earnest desire and intention to continue to strengthen these close relations and to work with the countries of these areas in expanding our trade in both directions. As part of this general policy, Canada has concluded new agreements with Austria, the Benelux countries, Denmark, Western Germany, Italy, Norway and Sweden. Canadian exporters will obtain useful benefits from the concessions granted by these countries, many of which have made significant progress in the removal of import restrictions. Canada has also made agreements with Cuba, the Dominican Republic and Haiti, which are open dollar markets for Canadian goods. I am confident that these various agreements will serve to emphasize the importance of our trade with the countries of these areas and will stimulate even closer connections between us.

In multilateral negotiations which involve reductions in most-favoured-nation tariffs, it is customary for both Canada and the United Kingdom to alter certain of the tariff preferences accorded to the other. Most of the reductions in margins of preference of interest to Canadian exporters in the United Kingdom are relatively minor. There were, of course, opportunities for informal exchanges of views on matters of common interest between Canada and the United Kingdom as the negotiations progressed.

To conclude, I would stress that Canada as a major trading nation has a vital interest in the expansion of world trade in an atmosphere of confidence and co-operation between countries. By entering into these latest negotiations under the auspices of GATT, the major trading countries have given renewed evidence of their intention to pursue the constructive policies that have been developed and strengthened through common effort.

As to the concessions granted by Canada, my colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) will wish to make some comments.

Mr. Speaker: The minister referred to a statement which he said should be published as an appendix to Hansard.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for that purpose?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(For text of detailed statement see appendix, pages 4834-41.)

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the tariff concessions made by Canada at this last tariff conference at Geneva, to which my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has referred, cover 180 items or sub-items in our customs tariff. Of these, 115 are reductions in the present most-favoured-nation rates of duty and 55 are undertakings not to raise existing rates of duty. For five items Canada undertook not to raise duties above certain specified rates higher than those actually in effect, but which in all five cases are lower than the rates previously agreed to under GATT. The remaining five items are reductions in the British preferential tariff, made unilaterally by Canada concurrent with reductions in the most-favoured-nation tariff.

Canada's concessions are set out in schedule V to the sixth protocol of supplementary concessions, and I should like to table copies of that schedule in English and French. This schedule consists of two parts, part I covering the most-favoured-nation tariff, and part II covering the British preferential tariff. The Canadian concessions will not come into effect immediately, but will be implemented at appropriate times having regard to the time at which other countries put their concessions into effect. I should make clear too that the Canadian concessions to each country will be brought into effect in one step.

Canada's total imports during the calendar year 1955 from all countries under the 115 items or sub-items on which the most-favoured-nation tariff was reduced at Geneva amounted to $91 million. Canada's total imports during 1955 from all countries under the 60 items which were bound but not reduced amounted to $88 million.

The reductions in the most-favoured-nation tariff cover a wide range of products such as: textile machinery, orange juice, lettuce, newsprint, shelled oysters, shrimps, spectacle frames, cigars, sawmill machinery, adding machines, cash registers, road building machines, electrical precision apparatus, such as is used in oil refineries and chemical works, cameras and tobacco pipes.

Since GATT negotiations relate to the most-favoured-nation tariff there was no occasion to negotiate reductions of rates of duty under the British preferential tariff. Of course, some margins of preference in the Canadian tariff as well as in the tariffs of other commonwealth countries were reduced in the course of negotiations with non-commonwealth countries. Of the items in which Canada reduced margins of preference those which covered the largest volume of trade were orange juice, electrical precision apparatus and textile machinery. The great bulk of Canadian imports of these products in 1955 were from non-commonwealth sources.

Part II of schedule V, which I am also tabling, contains five items. As I have mentioned, these provide for unilateral reductions by Canada in preferential rates of duty on certain goods on which the most-favoured-nation rate is also being reduced.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MR. DREW—MOTION OF NON-CONFIDENCE IN PRESIDING OFFICER OF THE HOUSE

The house resumed, from Wednesday, June 6, consideration of the motion of Mr. Drew:

In view of the unprecedented action of Mr. Speaker in (a) improperly reversing his own decision without notice and without giving any opportunity for discussion; (b) repeatedly refusing to allow members to address the house on occasions when the rules provide that they have the right to be heard; (c) subordinating the rights of the house to the will of the government, this house resolves that it no longer has any confidence in its presiding officer.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, it is naturally difficult to resume the debate. I said nothing today when the heart of parliament went out to the beloved wife of the member for Vancouver-Burrard. I shall say no more than this, that his life was an example of one who carried on whatever the consequences and he would have expected this house to follow the course of his own life.

Sir, yesterday afternoon the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) suggested that this motion, having been launched during the debate on the pipe line, should now be withdrawn. I am authorized to say that, in so far as Her Majesty's loyal opposition is concerned, that view cannot be accepted. As the days go by and we look over the things that took place, the unexplained change of ruling on June 1 becomes even more unexplainable. The need for this motion has not been erased by the termination of the pipe-line debate. That debate has gone the way of history. The prerogatives of parliament are abiding and must remain unimpaired. It is interesting that on an occasion such as this we should reread the pages of history. In 1628—on March 22 of that year—the Speaker had failed to listen to the demands of the members of the House of Commons to be heard on questions of privilege. Then suddenly the atmosphere changed. The king needed supplies.

[Mr. Harris.]

Immediately every opportunity was given for the members of the house to speak. One Sir Robert Phelips—and I have his speech here—said this:

This day's debate makes me call to mind the custom of the Romans, who had a solemn feast once a year for their slaves, at which time they had liberty without exception to speak what they would, whereby to ease their afflicted minds; which being finished, they severally returned to their former servitude.

Those were spectacular words but what he meant was this. The rights of parliament cannot be impaired for the temporary advantage of anyone, including the crown. As I see it, Mr. Speaker, the members of this house cannot stand idly by when their privileges and their rights are jettisoned, if only temporarily, at the will of a determined majority. You, Mr. Speaker, have read the duties and the responsibilities of a Speaker. No one summarized them better or epitomized them to a finer extent than did Mr. Speaker Lowther who, following his termination of office, wrote a book entitled "A Speaker's Commentaries" in which he set forth in a very few lines the duties and responsibilities of the Speaker:

The Speaker must decline to submit motions which infringe the rules; he must decide whether a motion is one of privilege or not; . . .

Then a little later:

The granting or withholding of the closure is another source of considerable anxiety to the occupant of the chair. Have the opposition had a full opportunity of stating their case? Have they made the best of their opportunity? Is there anything more which could be said usefully? Has the subject received its full quota of time in view of the total amount of time available for discussion? These and similar problems present themselves to the Speaker and must be solved in his own mind before he can accept a motion that "the question be now put". It is obvious that no hard and fast rule can be laid down on these matters, and that in each case the Speaker must use his best judgment and discretion.

And finally:

. . . he—

The Speaker.

—is the guardian of the privileges of the house as well as those of its members.

Mr. Carrick: May I ask my hon. friend a question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am trying to conduct this debate on a plane that is not controversial. If my hon. friend has observations to make, let him make them later.

Mr. Carrick: May I—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You, Mr. Speaker, then did lay claim to our ancient and our undoubted rights and privileges, especially that of freedom of speech in debate. In the United Kingdom Mr. Speaker, when he achieves his high office—and I quote—

. . . rigorously cuts off his party affiliations. He declares his honourable intention of being the impartial servant of the house as a whole, and in particular that he will do his best to safeguard the rights of minorities.

A moment ago in connection with closure I mentioned that the responsibility for the putting of the closure remains with the Speaker.

Mr. Harris: In the United Kingdom.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In 1925—the responsibility is set forth fully here—the responsibility remained with the Speaker and any changes that have been made since then do not remove that essential circumstance connected with the closure. In the United Kingdom no Speaker—and I again refer to Lord Ullswater—receives notes of communication from the members of the cabinet. He does not meet or communicate with them. As an inflexible policy—and it is of the essence of free debate in order to prevent anything in the nature of chaos within the House of Commons—he rules on the basis of rules, not with a consideration of the results that might flow from the rulings which he gives.

I say to you, sir—and I do so with deep feeling—that unless we maintain respect for parliament, democracy will wither and die. Parliament's supremacy demands the maintenance not only of the forms of parliamentary government but also of its soul. Without profound respect for the Chair the house would degenerate, in the heat of debate, into chaos and worse. What happened here on Friday, June 1, has but to be read in order to indicate how far removed from what parliament has a right to expect were the occurrences on that unforgettable morning.

On May 31, in accordance with the principles that are laid down by Viscount Ullswater, Your Honour decided that a serious question of privilege had been raised. You indicated the course to be followed by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Cameron). In a more or less incomplete manner you indicated that there were portions of the alleged statements that infringed the privileges of parliament and, indeed, your rights. One had only to look at the faces of Her Majesty's executive on the night of May 31 to realize how disturbed they were. The next morning, without giving the opposition a chance to speak, you, Mr. Speaker, peremptorily reversed, without argument, the decision you had made the night before, a course that was foreign to your usual course since assuming this high and honourable office as our first commoner. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) occupies a high position under our system of government. He rose in his place. There was nothing presumptuous in his words. As reported at page 4537 of Hansard he said this:

Mr. Drew: Are you prepared to hear any discussion on that, because—

Then we have Mr. Speaker's answer.

Mr. Speaker: No.

Mr. Drew: —we had proceeded with discussion on this motion.

Mr. Speaker: It is a matter of privilege. Whether it is privilege or not, it is my responsibility to decide.

That was a decision, sir, you had made the night before, leaving only the question of finding an opportunity when you could speak regarding these statements which made references derogatory to yourself. So it goes down the page and there is no opportunity given. The bells ring, the decision is final, irrevocable, unarguable. There cannot be any debate. Mr. Speaker says:

The bells are ringing and the members are being called in.

The Leader of the Opposition says, "Mr. Speaker", and he is met by suggestions that he be quiet, and other interruptions. Finally the appeal that you suggested is submitted to the house. Sir, time and the calm retrospect of several days cannot erase from the hearts of those the feeling that this indeed was something beyond expectation. It never occurred before. It has no precedent in British history since 1640. It is one of those things that must be retraced, otherwise the pathways of expediency on June 1 will in the future become the highways along which those who desire to circumvent parliament will be able to do so. That is the great danger of dangerous precedent. Your Honour knows that is one of the great dangers of bad decisions in courts of law. This, however, is more than a decision affecting the rights of individuals. The decision you made on June 1, sir, is one that in the years ahead will constitute an opportunity for evil men to prevent parliament from protecting its right of free speech. It will make members in this house, on whichever side they sit, tenants at the will of the government of the day.

I am going to conclude, sir. There is always an anticlimax when events such as those of yesterday take place. I say again, if what took place on June 1 is to stand, the rights of free men in parliament will be at the whim of the Speaker and our Canadian system will become, and indeed the occupant of the Chair will become, the pliant creature of a dominant majority. Majorities are no better than minorities. But, sir, minorities have it not in their power to alter the rules to meet the demands of expediency for them. Majorities dare not be permitted to have written into the Journals of the House of Commons a precedent that, for all time to come, will stand as an accusing finger to the practice of the democratic and parliamentary way of life.

Members have a right to know that the rules of the house will be observed and not be dependent upon the caprice of the majority. They have the right to know that the rules will not be reversed by the demands of expediency. They have a right to ask that the decisions of today shall not be reversed tomorrow by the presiding officer, whatever the consequences may be to the majority in this house. We have the right to demand that in the future frustrated ministers will think of the consequences to Mr. Speaker if at any time by overt demand or subtle compulsion they place him in a position where he must depart from what, on the basis of his wide experience, he had determined was the right course to follow. Sir, if the rules under which parliament operates, if the decisions of today in a deliberative, orderly assembly, are to be reversed tomorrow by the presiding officer who made an earlier decision, then we shall have chaos. If the accumulated usages and precedents of the past can be set aside when they are detrimental to the government of the day, then parliament will be placed where respect and dignity will be supplanted by disrespect and disorder.

It may be that we will have to consider a reform in the manner of the choice of Mr. Speaker in order to give him that detachment which British precedent and British ancient usages have assured for the Speaker. It will be difficult under our system to bring about anything of a similar nature to a permanent appointment such as is made in Great Britain because of the fact that there must be recognition in our country of the dual contribution of those of French and British origin. But certainly we dare not let the situation go unchallenged whereby a Speaker at any time can be permitted to be placed in a position where power and authority, whether directly or indirectly applied, can bring about such an event as happened here the other day. There is no other way in which this matter can be brought before the house except through the motion that was moved by the Leader of the Opposition. Is the Prime Minister not in a position now to give that leadership which will remove those pages, as it were, from the records of parliament? Charles I tore out two pages of the Journals. Let us not in 1956 have written into these Journals the denial of the usages of the past and the return to supreme authoritarianism of a majority uncontrolled. This motion is designed to assure that in the future parliament will never again find itself trammelled by the desires of a powerful cabinet, thereby placing Mr. Speaker in a position undeniably difficult and destructive of that authority and prestige which, however much it had been built up, has been seriously diminished as the result of what took place.

I speak from the heart when I say this. What happened on June 1, Mr. Speaker, caused a resentment, a feeling of frustration in the hearts of hon. members, to see the usages of 300 years thrown out of the way for a pipe line. To me, parliament and the maintenance of its supremacy, its authority, its dignity, are above the fortunes of a pipe line.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, it is about 50 years since I first began taking part in debates. I have always entered a debate gladly, only wanting the opportunity to get at my opponent. I wish that were so today, because I rise today to take part in this debate solely from a sense of duty. When I spoke here a little over a week ago I tried to point out to this house where we were drifting. I thought there was an opportunity to stop and take a look before we took the next step. The house did not stop. We proceeded with the measure that was before us, the pipe lines bill. The pipe lines bill has now passed. It passed through this house and I understand it has been passed by the other place, and in a few moments I suppose it will get royal assent.

We passed it, but what price have we paid for it. This, sir, is a part of the price, a motion made in this House of Commons to censure the Speaker, something that never happened and I suppose was never thought of before in a Canadian parliament. That is too great a price to pay for any bill that might come before this house. What are a few paltry million dollars, in comparison with the legacy that has been left us in forcing the measure through the House of Commons?

Until the regrettable events of the past few weeks I held Your Honour in the highest esteem. I think you, sir, must have known how high my esteem was. Since you took over your office in 1953 I felt increasingly that you had most, if not all, of the attributes that go to the making of a great Speaker. I felt that you, sir, could very well be the greatest Speaker that this parliament has had since the late Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux filled the high office that you now hold. It was not my pleasure to know the late Mr. Lemieux but I did know a man who knew him very well, the first leader of this party, the late

J. S. Woodsworth, and he never tired of singing his praises as a great man, a great Speaker, whom it was an honour to know and an honour to serve under, or perhaps I should say to serve with.

Will you excuse me, sir, if I mention some of the attributes which I think you have for the position you hold, or which at least I thought you had. You have a fine presence and, if you allow me to say so, a great charm of manner. You are equally fluent in both of the official languages of this house. You have industry, perhaps at times a little too much. In any case, you had sufficient industry to familiarize yourself with the rules of this house and I am satisfied sir, that you know the rules of this house better than any Speaker that has been here in my time. That, sir, was my position until the recent debate on the pipe line legislation began, and then my hopes began to fade until the proceedings of the house last Friday morning sent them crashing at my feet.

It is because of the proceedings of the house of last Friday morning that I believe the motion moved by the Leader of the Opposition last Monday has become a necessity and, because it has become a necessity, it has become my duty to support it.

Some statements that I made in the house at various times have been referred to in this debate and in the one before it, but I am afraid my statements were used to give an altogether different impression from what I intended to convey when I made them. When he spoke to the motion before us the Prime Minister referred to a statement I made in this house in discussing a matter on January 28, 1949. My remarks, quoted by the Prime Minister, may be found at page 41 of Hansard of 1949. At that time I used these words in supporting the motion that was then before the house:

> Surely this is a question of orderly procedure in parliament, and whether we agree with it or not is a matter to be decided by the vote of parliament.

I certainly made that statement, and it was a proper one to make at that time; but if the Prime Minister meant when he quoted that statement that I should have supported the proceedings, if one can call them proceedings, that took place in the house last Friday, well, I am afraid he has not compared what was before the house on those two occasions.

Let me quickly point out what we were dealing with in 1949. The session opened just after the previous election and the Prime Minister moved, after giving due notice, mind you, due notice that is required by the rules of this house, that after a certain date government business would take precedence over all other business.

I think the reason for the motion was that the government wanted to get on with the terms under which Newfoundland would enter confederation and everything was in order. It was so much in order, in fact, that after getting the views of the members of the house the Prime Minister himself suggested there be some changes made in the dates. Those changes were made and it was for that reason I said:

> Surely this is a question of orderly procedure in parliament, and whether we agree with it or not is a matter to be decided by the vote of parliament.

These words appear at page 41 of Hansard for January 28, 1949. And then I went on to say:

> I think every hon. member, I suppose at least every hon. member on this side of the house, regrets that the government has felt it necessary to postpone the debate on the speech from the throne, or rather to postpone it if it is not finished by the end of next week. That is a longer time than the government suggested at first, and that in itself is one of the hallmarks of democratic procedure. There has been a compromise between the two extremes. If the government did not get all they expected to get or wished to get in the first instance, the opposition got at least some of what it wanted.

Surely there is no comparison between that occasion and this one. I wish now to read from Hansard of June 1, 1956, from a statement made by Mr. Speaker:

> Now, the house is master of its own rules and it is my right to submit a matter to the house. I intend at the moment to submit to the house that, in my view, the house should revert to the position where it was yesterday when I was brought back to the chair to receive the chairman's report at 5.15.

I deny, sir, that it is your right or the right of any Speaker to put matters before this house excepting the matters that are given to you by the house to put before the house. We cannot carry on business here if the Speaker of the house can come into the house at any time and say "I think we had better revert to some other order of business," or "I made a mistake and I think we should try to rectify that. Now let us go back to where we were yesterday or the day before yesterday or last week or the week before that." How in the world can the business of the house be carried on in that way?

And then the Speaker went on to say, as reported at page 4540 of Hansard for June 1, 1956:

> I know what the hon. member says with respect to this motion is correct. I have indicated to the house I feel that the house should not suffer any prejudice for what I consider to be a serious mistake which I made yesterday. I say that the house is master of its own procedure. No one should contradict that, everybody knows that that is so, and it is my right to submit a matter to the house and that is what I propose to do.

Sir, I could not disagree with you more definitely than when you make that statement. I have already said it is not your right to place matters before this house excepting such matters as are given you by the members of this house to place before it. I am afraid that is where some of our trouble stems from. For some reason or other you made the passage of business through this house your concern. I submit it is none of your concern; it is the concern of the government. Your concern is to hold the balance as between the rights of the opposition and the rights of the government as matters proceed.

May I refer for a moment to the question of closure. You know, there were some terribly amusing things said with regard to this closure—in regard to why it was brought about—at least they would have been funny if the matter were not so tragic. I think I heard the Minister of Finance, if my memory serves me right and if he contradicts me I will take it all back, say that closure was invoked when it was because I think it was the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) had said the opposition was going to oppose this bill with everything it had, or some words to that effect, and the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) had made a somewhat similar statement.

Well, boasting of that kind is a juvenile sort of thing and I do not hold with it; but, sir, it is not a reason for introducing closure. Closure invoked at that stage anticipated that something might happen in this house. We do not carry on the business of this house in anticipation of what may happen. We carry on the business of the house on the basis of what happens in the house. As I said the other day, that is where the initial mistake was made.

Hon. members opposite accused the opposition of criticizing the government's pipe-line bill. What in the world do you think the opposition was sent here for, to help the government? No, they were sent here to oppose and, if the opposition did not oppose, the government would also criticize them.

Let us suppose that instead of opposing the pipe-line bill the opposition had let it go through parliament without any opposition at all. What would government supporters be saying as they went around the country? Let us suppose this bill was passed unanimously—the opposition did not like it very well but then they had no alternative so they said they would let it go through. The government damns the opposition for opposing it but it would also ridicule the opposition if they agreed with the government.

Now, the purpose of an opposition is to oppose. I think it was Sir Winston Churchill's father who said at one time that if the opposition ever found itself in a position where it had to approve of something that the government was doing it ought to do it with a kick rather than a pat.

There is a citation in Beauchesne's second edition—I imagine all hon. members have a copy of this book—and I wish hon. members opposite would read and study it. I read this citation in this house some years ago and I propose to read it again now. I am referring to citation 900 which appears at page 282. I believe it is from Hatsell's book on parliamentary procedure or something of that nature. The citation reads as follows:

> So far the maxim is certainly true and founded on good sense that as it is always in the power of the majority by their numbers to stop any improper measures proposed on the part of their opponents, the only weapon by which the minority can defend themselves from similar attempts from those in power are the forms and rules and proceedings which have been found necessary from time to time and are become the standing orders of the house, by a strict adherence to which the weaker party can alone be protected from those irregularities and abuses which these forms were intended to check, and which the wantonness of power is but too often apt to suggest to large and successful majorities.

Could anything be truer than those last words I read, "large and successful majorities"? So large and so successful have the government majority been that they consider that nothing is to be allowed to stand in the way of what they want to do even if they have to tear to shreds the rules and procedures of this house in the doing.

I agree that in a certain sense parliament must always decide, but it must decide according to the rules. If the rules can be changed from day to day, from hour to hour and from week to week the minority has no protection whatsoever. If the position taken by the Speaker of this house is to prevail, it can lead to nothing else than that the majority in this house can at any time impose its will upon the house and the minority, and the opposition which was sent here by the electors of this country in the same way as the members of the government were sent may as well go home. We will have no business here, we will have no function to perform, there will be nothing for us to do. The government has taken it upon itself to rule by sheer force without regard to the rules and procedures which have come down to us through the years.

I am under no illusion as to what will happen to this motion when it comes before the house for a vote. Undoubtedly it will be defeated, but that will not be the end of the issues which have been raised on it. I should like to say to the government that they may not always be here; the Liberal party may not always be where they are now. No matter how permanent things may look, change is the law of life.

We cannot have ministers coming into this house and introducing bills and giving notice of closure at the time of doing so. But that is the precedent which any minister can follow from now on. We have adopted that as the method to be followed in this house. From now on a minister can bring in a bill or a resolution preceding a bill and at the same time give notice of closure. Why? Because he has heard that the hon. member for—we could say any place you like—is going to oppose it, or that the opposition are going to oppose it. Because the opposition are going to do the thing they were sent here to do, the minister by closure will say that they will try to prevent them doing it. That is one of the things which will inevitably happen because of what has taken place here during the past few weeks.

As I said before, if something is not done, any Speaker at any future time can say, "I believe I made a mistake and you have to go back to where we were yesterday, or the day before, or the week before." Where will we be if we carry on business in that fashion? But that is the precedent we have made ourselves, and parliament is the creature of precedent. The decision taken today becomes a precedent for other decisions tomorrow.

I would say to the government, or whoever may be the government after the next election, or if there is not an election before the next session of parliament it should be done at the next session, that they should set up a committee on procedure to propose changes—they may not be very material ones and I do not think material ones are needed—in regard to these matters which have brought the Canadian parliament to the position it is in today, with the hope that it will never happen again. I say that that should be done at the next session of this house, if there is one before there is an election.

If there is an election before another session is called I will not be here and I may not be here at the next session even if there is no election. I would hate to see this parliament, where I have spent so many of my days, degenerate into a rabble where decisions were made where the Speaker, knowing what the decision would be, would say, "Parliament will decide." That means only one thing, that the government will decide.

As I said when I rose to speak on this motion, I have never spoken with less relish when putting my views before an audience, call it that or whatever other word is suitable, but I felt that I had to make my position clear. When the motion is put I shall vote for it, not in any hope that it is going to carry or that it will do very much good. But we have to make our protest. I should like to suggest to those who will be here at the next session or to those who will be here when the next parliament assembles that they set right the wrongs which we have done to parliament during the last three weeks.

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to commence my remarks in this serious debate with a quotation from what was said by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada at the convocation ceremonies held at the University of Toronto a short while ago. The chief justice is reported to have said:

> Unless we are ever vigilant of threats to our individual rights, the priceless heritage that is Canada's will be maimed and disfigured, if not destroyed.

I think remarks of that tenor have been said to graduating classes of universities down through the years until part and parcel of our heritage has been such references to the maintenance of our freedom. What is the priceless heritage about which Canadians are so concerned? It is the right of free speech, a free press, free elections, freedom of assembly, freedom to organize. These are the things that we mean and think of when we talk about our priceless heritage of freedom. Here in parliament we find that freedom is the central part of this system. As Ivor Jennings has pointed out, "so much of the history of freedom is part of the history of parliament that freedom and parliamentary government are often considered to be the same thing."

That is why we have reached the stage in our proceedings in parliament of putting forward and discussing a motion of censure, because we have felt that parliamentary government has been endangered and that in the endangering of our parliamentary government our very freedom has been endangered. The citadel of freedom has been assaulted from within right here in the House of Commons, and in the painful and tragic events of this week and on black Friday, the 1st of June, the attack from within on parliament resulted in the humiliation of the Speaker and the humiliation of parliament itself.

It is one of the grave moments in Canadian history and, as with others who have spoken, it is with regret that I engage in a debate of this nature. I never expected that we would reach this stage in Canada when we would have to look closely at our parliamentary system to see whether or not it was sound. I always thought that it was so soundly based that nothing could shatter it. It has been pointed out that the origin of our troubles arose at 5.15 last Thursday. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) drew our attention to that the other day and indicated that at that moment I was the one who rose to my feet on a point of order and because of that the normal routine was upset.

May I point out very briefly that my point of order, dismissed after the interval of the supper hour by the Speaker as being academic and subsequently called an academic point by the Prime Minister, was nevertheless in my opinion then and now a matter of profound importance to the position of Speaker in this House of Commons. I seized the first opportunity I had in the course of the debate to bring to the attention of the Speaker the point of order, following the lines that he has told us are the essentials of a point of order. The Speaker's own words are that the function of a point of order is to bring to the attention of the Speaker a matter which he did not himself perceive.

I brought to the Speaker's attention a matter which he did not himself perceive at the time or had forgotten, and I thought I was performing a duty in endeavouring to replace in the Speaker's hand something that he had let slip to the chairman of the committee because I believe that here in the House of Commons it is the Speaker's interpretation of the rules that should be decisive and not the interpretation of the rules as determined by one or other of our chairmen of committees. However, it was dismissed as academic. The Prime Minister pointed out that I was persistent in asking for a vote on the Speaker's ruling. I admit I was persistent and under similar circumstances I would be persistent again because I thought I was being brushed aside. So much for that.

The date of the commencement of the disaster that befell parliament was not at 5.15 on last Thursday but on the 24th of May. It was on the 24th of May that we entered upon the slippery slope that led down to destruction because that was the day when, as some member of the press gallery so aptly put it, closure by thumbscrew was applied. We had had earlier on the resolution stage the imposition of closure, which we resisted and disliked. On the second reading stage we had the imposition of closure, which we resisted. But in the committee stage when the first clause of the bill was brought before us closure by thumbscrew was applied, the right of speech was forbidden to members of parliament, and anger and dismay swept through the house.

It was on that occasion that the chairman of the committee made his ruling with regard to the interpretation of the word "consideration", a word never before interpreted by a Speaker in the House of Commons. There was no precedent for guidance. It was in consideration of these two matters that I subsequently brought to the Speaker's attention the point of order that I raised on the Thursday. But it was the imposition of closure that brought about all the sorry circumstances that succeeded.

I want to digress for a minute or two to discuss closure as it is applied in England because so many references have been made to the procedure there and the implication has been made that it is a normal course of procedure in England. That, sir, is not so. People who talk about closure being applied in England must first discuss and define such matters as the previous question, allocation of time and the guillotine before they can relate that to what happens here under our system of closure. But may I point out that on the 5th of June the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) said, as found at page 4743 of Hansard:

> From 1945 to 1951, which was the period when the Socialist government was in power in the United Kingdom, the maximum time actually devoted to the consideration of any government money bill by the House of Commons during that period of six years was 21 hours and 25 minutes.

I presume he means that any bill which authorizes the use of public funds is a money bill. I would hope that you would keep in your mind that period from 1945 to 1951 and the maximum time the minister gave of 21 hours and 25 minutes for a money bill. If you will bear with me, I will direct your attention to the fact that in the British House of Commons in June of 1948—I will give references, which were not given by the minister—as found in volume 451, column 2175 to column 2658 of British Hansard, a bill was discussed there called, appropriately enough, the gas bill. It had been introduced, discussed on second reading and was in the committee stage and the report stage on the 9th of June through to the early hours of the 10th of June in a continuous sitting of parliament. They have no recess for the supper hour. For 16 hours, just in that one stage, the committee stage and the report stage, the bill was discussed. That discussion in the House of Commons had been preceded by not days or weeks but months of sittings in a standing committee, including in that standing committee several all-night sittings. I ask if you relate that fact to the minister's statement that the longest time ever spent on a money bill in the House of Commons was 21 hours and 25 minutes—if you can relate those two statements—and can place any credence in the suggestion that the minister's statement is accurate. I will leave it to you to make your own choice.

Let me point out this further fact. The minister might have gone a step further and looked at the transport bill in 1952, volume 508, column 47, of the British Hansard—discussed on November 24, 1952. On that occasion the British system of closure that allocates time was imposed at the commencement of the committee sittings and the guillotine as they call it was introduced. It was introduced because of their experience with that gas bill in 1948. Under that system of closure they allowed seven days on the committee stage. That was, of course, preceded by the usual introduction and second reading events. Under that system they allowed seven days in the committee for a total of 45½ to 49 hours. In our committee sittings we had five days under closure by thumbscrew for a total of 25 hours and the extra three that we got on the night of the voting. I am not excluding there any time that we may have spent on other matters. That guillotine motion introduced in England at the commencement of their committee sittings on the transport bill in 1952 was debated for almost seven hours, preceded by one division and concluded by four divisions. The Times wrote an article about it which you may find in the course of the debate. Anyone who wants to discover whether or not closure is accepted as the normal practice in England might very well read that debate of 1952. He will discover that it is abhorred by the British House of Commons. He will also discover that it is not anything like the type of closure that we had here.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) in his remarks said this:

> That country,—

He was referring to England.

> —Mr. Speaker, the home of parliamentary freedom, also understands the necessities of parliamentary government, the responsibilities and rights of the government as well as of the opposition.

Any study of the British Hansard indicates that fact. In an earlier debate I ran across the remarks of Lloyd George who, as you know, spent 50 years in the House of Commons in England. He said that there stood out in his memory one event when he, along with six others, went into the opposition lobby and were outvoted by the tremendous majority of over 600 who went into the government lobby under the system that they have of voting. He said that vast majorities wither away and die. He said that he had lived to see the day when that vast majority had disappeared and he himself had come in on the government side.

Mr. Speaker, the root of the matter that we are discussing here is the independence of the Speaker. We have looked to the Speaker to be the guardian of our liberties. That volume of May that we have been discussing so frequently during the last two or three weeks is dedicated to the Speakers of the commonwealth who uphold in common the high tradition of parliament. It is that independence with which we are so much concerned. In the independence of the Speaker we believe we see the protection of the minority groups in parliament. Of course the man who set the greatest example in England was Mr. Speaker Onslow, in 1727. This shows the long tradition of the independence of the Speaker. Mr. Onslow was Speaker for 33 years. In Kenneth Mackenzie's book on "The English Parliament" you will find these words:

> Onslow's show of independence at the outset of his career as Speaker did not belie his subsequent conduct. Throughout his 33 years' tenure of the Speakership he exhibited an unflinching attitude of independence towards the government, and he enforced the rules of procedure without respect of persons. 'The forms of proceedings', he held, 'as instituted by our ancestors, operated as a check and control on the action of ministers, and they were in many instances a shelter and a protection to the minority against the attempts of power'. Only by strict adherence to the rules of procedure could the minority be protected from those 'irregularities and abuses which these forms are intended to check, and which the wantonness of power is but too often apt to suggest to large and successful majorities'. Indeed, so great was Onslow's attachment to forms that Horace Walpole said that 'it often made him troublesome in matters of higher moment'. There could hardly be better testimony to Onslow's indifference to ministerial convenience.

That, I submit, represents the state of independence that we expect of the Speaker of the Canadian House of Commons. Why are we so much interested in that matter? Because, as I said earlier, this is the citadel of our freedom. We have a long tradition handed down from our ancestors. Sir Ivor Jennings in his book "The Queen's Government" speaks about the behaviour of the ordinary Englishman. The same thing may well be said about the ordinary Canadian. Sir Ivor Jennings said this:

> He is not only a free man; he is truculently free. He is, perhaps, the most law-abiding citizen in the world, particularly when the law seems to him to be sensible; but no man is more ready to take offence when the law is broken. He does not obey orders because they are given by some person in authority: He obeys orders when they are lawful orders issued by a person who has legal authority to issue them. John Hampden, gentleman of Buckinghamshire, is one of our national heroes; and Hampden has written his name into history because he refused to pay a tax of 20 shillings, imposed upon him by the sheriff in accordance with orders from the king. He was charged before the Exchequer Chamber in the Great Case of Shipmoney. Seven judges found against him and five in his favour; but later parliament reversed the verdict. The important point, though, was that Hampden refused to obey an order that he thought to be unlawful and thereby helped to establish a tradition.

I think that Canadians, equally with Englishmen, are truculently free. I think that some of the exasperation shown in this house last Friday was due to that fact. No man is more ready to take offence when the law is broken. Last Thursday and Friday, and on other occasions, we thought that the law—the rules of procedure of the House of Commons—was being broken. All of this occurrence here leads, in my opinion, to the necessity for a study of the parliamentary system. I think we have been taking things too much for granted. I think that our professors of history, our writers on political science and our teachers in the schools as well as members of parliament themselves and others must examine our parliamentary system much more closely. I think we are inclined to misunderstand the various operations of it. We fail to understand sometimes the party system. I would hope that members of the government, as well as those on the opposition side, would study and reflect upon Professor Jennings' two volumes, one called "Parliament" and the other "Cabinet Government", in which he sets out the basis of our system of parliamentary government.

He says with regard to the parties that come into the house:

> The House of Commons is the oratorical battle-ground of those parties. The one supports and the other opposes the government. The one defends a policy and the other puts forward another. Any defect of administration, any weakness of principle or defect of practice, any blunder of politics, is soon brought to light and exhibited to the world.
>
> The functions which Bagehot described are thus exercised through the competition of government and opposition. The "mind of the people" is expressed in different ways and through different forms because it is not and cannot be a single mind. Political education is real education because at least two points of view are always being put, and the elector has to choose between them. The other side has power to speak and therefore can and must be heard. The opposition demands that policies be formulated openly and consequences of policies revealed.
> Parliament compels the government to defend itself by open and rational argument; but it also compels the opposition to state what is the alternative and, if that alternative be plausible, to attempt to carry it out. The majority does not override the minority roughshod, because the habits of centuries have created a free people, disliking oppression even of minorities. Members of parliament, to quote Milton again, know the people of England to be a free people, and themselves the representatives of that freedom.

I think the function of the opposition in parliament is misunderstood. Looking back I find that four years ago I spoke in the House of Commons, although I had not been here very long. At that time some matter came up striking at the rights of members in this house and I entered into the debate. Here is what Ivor Jennings says, in his book "Cabinet Government", on the importance of the opposition:

> It is not untrue to say that the most important part of parliament is the opposition in the House of Commons. The function of parliament is not to govern but to criticize. Its criticism, too, is directed not so much towards a fundamental modification of the government's policy as towards the education of public opinion. The government's majority exists to support the government. The function of the opposition is to secure a majority against the government at the next general election and thus to replace the government. This does not imply that a government may not be defeated in the House of Commons. Nor does it imply that parliamentary criticism may not persuade the government to modify, or even to withdraw, its proposals. These qualifications are important; but they do not destroy the truth of the principle that the government governs and the opposition criticises. Failure to understand this simple principle is one of the causes of the failure of so many of the progeny of the mother of parliaments and of the suppression of parliamentary government by dictatorships.

Then, as a final quotation from Ivor Jennings, I have this one:

> The tradition of parliament that "His Majesty's Opposition" shall not be oppressed is not a tradition merely; it rests on policy. Given free elections, an opposition that is not allowed to oppose in parliament is by that fact supplied with arguments for opposition in the country. If it can be asserted that the government fears criticism, it can be suggested with considerable force that there is ground for criticism. The opposition is given a forum in parliament because if it were not it would be given a convincing argument in the forum of the country.

Mr. Speaker, an understanding of parliament is essential. I hope that out of this trouble that has arisen here the people of Canada will give much closer attention than they have given during the last few years to an understanding of parliament. We are suffering from the war years. This is an aftermath of the war. During the war years we granted full power to the government, and that government has been reluctant to relinquish that full power. We have fallen into a state of complacency with regard to our system of government.

I am going to conclude, Mr. Speaker, with a quotation from Kenneth Mackenzie's book "The English Parliament". On the first page there is a quotation from a broadcast delivered in February 1946 by Edward R. Murrow. This was just at the conclusion of the war. It says:

> I doubt that the most important thing was Dunkirk or the Battle of Britain, El Alamein or Stalingrad. Not even the landings in Normandy or the great blows struck by British and American bombers. Historians may decide that any one of these events was decisive, but I am persuaded that the most important thing that happened in Britain was that this nation chose to win or lose this war under the established rules of parliamentary procedure. It feared Nazism, but did not choose to imitate it. The government was given dictatorial power, but it was used with restraint, and the House of Commons was ever vigilant.

I think that, sir, sums up the attitude that I have towards this great institution. During the last two or three weeks here I have wondered why so many men whom I have known in this house, men who are so moderate in their day to day life, have become so aroused over the events that have occurred during that time. It struck me that when moderate men are aroused to such an intensity of feeling there must be something fundamentally wrong. I have seen other men less able to control their feelings quickly aroused over matters which were trifling. But when moderate men are moved to the very core of their being, then I say that forces are being unleashed in the country that are not subject to easy control. This is a serious situation in the history of our country when moderate men are moved as they were moved during the last two weeks.

We have passed through a period of Canadian history that will not be forgotten. I do not think the recent occurrences can be cured by this parliament. I think the wounds will not be healed except over a long passage of time. I think that it will take a great deal of effort to re-establish the authority of parliament as we used to understand it, and to re-establish the prestige and authority of the House of Commons. We will have great difficulty over the ensuing years in maintaining that thing that we prize so highly, our way of life.

We have been talking and fighting wars over this question of maintaining our way of life. We have said communism is wrong; nazism is wrong and Kaiser Wilhelm with his military dictatorship was wrong. We said, though we were not very eloquent about it perhaps as ordinary citizens, that we preferred the British way, the Canadian way. We were thinking surely, as young men in days gone by, of things like these which we accepted for granted, and we thought then we enjoyed in our own country freedom from any type of oppression. Nothing has shaken me more in the course of my life than the events of the last two weeks and the threat, as I see it, to that freedom which has been the one thing that we have been working to preserve throughout the last two generations.

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, there have been many members who, in the course of this debate, have said this is a tragedy. That is so, and in a personal way. Some French writer, whose name escapes me, said that tragedy lies not in the conflict of right with wrong but in the conflict of right with right. You, sir, believed that you were right; we believed that we were right, and that difference which divides us is not something superficial. It is a difference which digs deep into the vitals of this House of Commons.

We here are parliamentarians. That means we have concern, respect, and even veneration for this house. We have these things not only in our bones but in the marrow of our bones. I doubt whether there is any member in this house who cannot number amongst his ancestors some who died that free institutions such as this should prevail. Therefore anything which hurts them hurts these things we cherish most.

This is the focal point of our freedom. This house is the focal point of our democracy, that form of government about which it has been so often said, it is the most difficult that the wit of man has yet devised. We have been told that democracy is slow, cumbersome, lethargic, even venal and corrupt; yet what we ought never to forget is that these charges fade into nothingness beside this one fact.

Any member of this House of Commons has the right to bring to the floor of the house the plea of the humblest person in Canada for justice. There is the greatness of parliament. Anything which tarnishes that greatness hurts not only us but every individual in this country.

I say, this house is the focal point of our democracy. The Speaker, then, is the focal point of the House of Commons, and we have given him the authority, we have placed in his hands the dignity and the integrity of the House of Commons. In the past, sir, in this parliament we have been served well. I am not going to refer to the remarks which the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis) made about Your Honour because largely I concur in them. You had raised the prestige of the Speakership; you were our Speaker. Some of us had known you for many years and through that time we had a great liking for you, in the chair and out of it. I had hoped that perhaps even on the very periphery I might have been numbered amongst your friends. I had for you, as had others, a genuine respect even when I thought you were at times wrong. And now, what has happened to make us rise in our places and disown you?

Some little time ago the Prime Minister said that what had happened had been frustrating. He used that word on several occasions in the course of his remarks, and I well believe him; but, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway pointed out this afternoon, it is our bounden duty, when we think the government is wrong, to frustrate it in every way possible within the rules of parliament, and we did so. But the remark of the Prime Minister was revealing in another way. He said he was frustrated. He showed by that remark, I suggest, that there was a gap in his political education; for I think one of the best pieces of apprenticeship any man can serve before he takes his place in government is to be in the ranks of the opposition.

I have been here for some 12 or 13 years. I have had my own ideas of the sort of legislation which ought to be on our statute books to improve the conditions of the people of this country, and for month after month and year after year I have been frustrated but always, sir, within the rules of parliament, always so that I could not say I was unjustly done by. Frustration is no excuse for what happened last week. The tragedy of it is, sir, that you are perhaps the unconscious victim of that frustration.

Some days ago, also during the course of this debate, I rose in my place because I was disturbed at what was happening. I believed there was a corrosion taking place in the foundations of the Speakership. Members of parliament on this side of the house were rising on points of order which may or may not have been legitimate. We thought they were, and I maintained then and I maintain now it was the duty of the Prime Minister or the leader of the house to combat those points of order if they thought they were wrong. Instead, we were met with silence; and you, sir, were placed in the almost intolerable position where, in our eyes, you were acting not only as counsel for the defence, but you were acting as the judge. Time and time again this happened while the government sat silent, and you were becoming more and more embroiled in what appeared almost like partisan politics. You were being used by the silence of the government, and now you are being sacrificed through the silence of the Prime Minister.

I believe, sir, that last week you made a serious mistake. You made a mistake which is almost unforgivable because you impaired the rights of the opposition as we saw them. At best you were guilty of a lapse of judgment, and perhaps we can make the excuse for you, sir, who cannot speak, that you were under strain, under tension which at times must have been great; but a mistake was made. There was a motion in the possession of the house, and then it was removed by what I have already referred to as brute majority. The rules were changed in the middle, sir.

I believe you to have been wrong in doing that, but I believe the government were even more wrong, if they had any respect for parliament, in allowing your error to prevail. Certain members of the government must have discussed the situation on Thursday night or Friday morning. There was a way open to them—a legitimate, proper and honest way open to them—but silence was maintained and that silence was nothing but cold cruelty on the part of the Prime Minister, who in my judgment, lost in his own sense of frustration, sacrificed our Speaker in this House of Commons. Perhaps that may now be his manner of doing things, but I hope that is not so ever again in the future.

There were other things which happened, however, which make me believe this might be so. We had the situation of which you, Mr. Speaker, can know nothing because this happened in committee, where a minister of the crown moved that clause 1 be postponed—

Mr. Coldwell: Further consideration.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): —that further consideration of it be postponed, as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar points out. That was wrong by the rules of this house. The Prime Minister must have known of this wrongdoing on the part of his colleague, yet apparently it was not only condoned but it was connived at. There is only one belief I have and it is this, that the Prime Minister had to violate the rules of this parliament because he could not govern with them; and, sir, you are in the tragic position where we believe that you did not carry out the rules fairly, equitably and justly. But the primary blame I still place upon the Prime Minister.

I am angry even yet, and I hope our anger will not diminish as days go by. I am angry at what has happened to this House of Commons. I am angry with the way the government has treated the position which you hold. I am dismayed, sir, at what you did, no matter what the reasons may be and no matter what the excuses may be. I am dismayed that these wretched precedents which have been established will go on the official records of this house to guide some government in the future to commit the same sort of iniquity that was perpetrated upon us in the last week.

I regret, sir, that you for whom I have had this respect find yourself in the position in which you are today. I have tried to understand your position; I hope, sir, that you will try to understand our position and realize how intolerable it is.

There is going to be a vote in this house and that vote will be decided by cold numbers. But no matter how it is decided it is not going to help in any way the malaise which afflicts this House of Commons now. I know no cure for it unless there be this. I think there is only one solution in honour, and that is for the Prime Minister of Canada to go to the people of Canada and justify his debauchery of the House of Commons of Canada.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, every hon. member who has risen in this debate has explained how distasteful the task he has been given is to him, yet I rise because I feel it is my duty to explain my own feelings in this regard.

I regret that a motion expressing the view that the recent actions of Mr. Speaker in improperly reversing his own decision without notice, in repeatedly refusing to allow members to address the house on occasions when it was their right to do so, and in subordinating the rights of the house to the will of the government has become necessary.

Yesterday the Prime Minister endeavoured to give the impression that there were many on this side of the house who did not feel that the motion was either necessary or warranted. I wonder where the Prime Minister has been during the past two or three weeks. I wonder where he has been mentally and in spirit, because physically he has been sitting in his seat listening to the debate and he has risen in his place to lead the vote of the government perhaps 15 or 16 times in appeals from the rulings of the Chair or in votes to sustain the ruling of the chairman of committee. Surely that in itself is an indication that there are many hon. members in this chamber who have doubted the correctness of the decisions which have been given by the Chair, and that in itself is an indication that there is a widespread feeling of non-confidence in the present occupants of the chair.

This afternoon we have listened to thoughtful and eloquent speeches given by hon. members on this side of the house who have been trained in the profession of law. In precise legal language they have pointed out to this chamber where errors and mistakes have been made, where the traditions of long ago have been violated. I rise merely as a lay member, as one not trained in the law. I have never taken a very keen interest in the rules of procedure of this house, but I have been hurt and wounded to the quick during the past few weeks. I feel it is incumbent upon me to express my feelings in that respect.

I appreciate deeply the ordeal to which Mr. Speaker is now being subjected. It must be extremely difficult for the Speaker or his deputy to remain in the chair and hear charges levelled against him as member after member rises in his place and states that he has lost confidence in the Speaker. It is not entirely of the Speaker's making, although I do feel he has exposed himself by his actions to grave criticism. The traditions of the office of Speaker, as has been pointed out this afternoon, are very high, and the position the Speaker holds is a great one; for he not only presides over the proceedings of this house but he must protect the liberties and rights of parliament in debate.

You, sir, sit alone in your great chair, dressed in your robes, which contribute to your authority and your dignity. But those robes are something more than decorative aids to authority. They emphasize the loneliness, which has been referred to, and the impartiality of your office. We are not draped in gowns, but you are there distinct and alone and impartial. You have no direct communication with individual members of this house.

On great national occasions we gather in public places and in churches and we sing the national anthem and other hymns and songs suitable to those particular occasions. There is one anthem which I recall, the first line of which is, "What do I owe?" It refers in a rhetorical way to the many conditions of man. The first verse commences:

What do I owe to this dear land of ours?

Then follows the answer:

All of my best, my time, my thought, my powers.

Then the next verse asks a question and gives the answer:

What do I owe to those who follow on?
To build more sure the freedoms we have won.

Surely that is the role of every member of the House of Commons, and particularly it is the role of the Speaker of this house, to build more sure the freedoms we have won so that those of future generations who may follow us will benefit, not only from our endeavours but from the endeavours of our forefathers. But those freedoms cannot be built up and made more sure without constant watch. Vigilance must be there all the time. In referring to the freedoms Kipling uses these words:

> All we have of freedom, all we use or know
> This our fathers bought for us long and long ago.
> Ancient right, unnoticed as the breath we draw.

We are so apt to take these rights and treat them as though they do not really concern us. We take them for granted, and it is only on the rare occasions when those rights are challenged that we begin to notice. Rights were won for us centuries ago at Runnymede and in Westminster Hall. Cast your mind back to the 13th century when we had Magna Carta; then the petition of rights followed, the great remonstrance and the bill of rights. Those were all great endeavours by our forefathers to try to preserve the freedoms for the generations which would come. For centuries statesmen have been building on those rights in order that we may reap the benefit.

They were hard-won rights, sometimes in long debate, sometimes under great persecution and sometimes on the battlefield. It may be said that we cannot turn back the clock, that we cannot bring King John back to life, that Charles I was beheaded and cannot come back again. But I suggest that those were not merely men, they represented a state of mind which I regret to say still exists in this world, the state of mind of absolute power, the state of mind of the dictator. Unless we watch very carefully occasions will arise when we will have to protest against the encroachment of this state of mind which was represented by the actions of those dictators of long ago.

General Eisenhower made a very remarkable speech in the Guildhall of London at the close of the last war. These were his words in part:

> To preserve his freedom of worship, his equality before the law, his liberty to speak and act as he sees fit, subject only to the provision that he trespass not upon the similar rights of others.

He said that the men of London would fight for those rights. He went on to say that the men of his home town in the United States would also fight for those rights and for that freedom. We know that the men of Canada have fought for those selfsame rights.

But the events of the last few days have shown that His Honour the Speaker and his deputies have not permitted equality before this chair. They have denied the liberty of members to speak when members had a perfect right to express their points of view. There has not been equality before the law by this chair. The liberty of speech has been curtailed. Long years ago advice was given to a young man in these words:

> My son, if sinners entice thee, consent thou not.

Late Thursday evening and early Friday morning His Honour was enticed and His Honour gave consent. We will never know what sordid means were used to lure Mr. Speaker from his path of duty. The government honours its secrets and when it does to the extent that we have seen recently it becomes tyranny. On Friday last you suddenly reversed your decision and ruled a motion out of order. I shall not go into great detail about that unhappy event. I do not think it could be summed up better than in the words of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) as found at page 4646 of Hansard of June 4:

> One of the most serious aspects of this strange course was that when I—
> The Leader of the Opposition.
> —attempted, as did many other hon. members, to be heard in regard to this matter on a point of order the Speaker refused to hear a word from any member in regard to this completely strange device which had been employed or which was then under consideration. At the moment the Speaker called the vote without permitting any point of order to be raised or any discussion whatever on the proceedings which were taking place, at that moment confidence in the Speaker disappeared in the minds of many members of this house. Then, as though this were not enough in itself, as though this were not defilement of our rules sufficient for one day, the Speaker after the vote on that decision had been taken announced that he found he had made a mistake in the ruling he had made about 5.15 p.m. the day before and for that reason all subsequent proceedings should be declared a nullity. Mr. Speaker, there can be no precedent for any such course.

Your fault, Mr. Speaker, on that tragic day was one of weakness and lack of resolution. Far greater responsibility rests on those men who, by threats or promises, played upon your vanity and your ambitions. But the Prime Minister saw nothing wrong with this barefaced flouting of parliamentary rules and procedures. He could find no occasion when Your Honour had refused to hear any opposition member when, in the Prime Minister's opinion, he had a right to be heard. The Prime Minister could only recall that the rules of the house had been disregarded to the extent of what amounted to the prejudice of the government. Prejudice of the government! That seemed to be the all-important thing.

He refused to admit that the rules of parliament had been subordinated to the will of the government. The government supporters, according to the Prime Minister, had created no scene, made no manifestation. Only the opposition was to blame. All his geese were swans.

The Minister of Finance followed along the same line. As leader of the house he refused to accept any responsibility for what had taken place the week before. These were some of the words he used, and I quote from page 4683 of Hansard of June 4:

> I am going to say something that is rather difficult for me to say under the circumstances. Both the Leader of the Opposition and the leader of the C.C.F. this afternoon said that all of us ought to regret what has happened, particularly what happened on Friday. I am going to agree with both of them.

Mark these words—

> However, I hope that in expressing agreement in that sense I am not to be taken as having accepted any responsibility for it.

That from the leader of the house! No wonder Hansard records some members as saying, "Oh, oh", and an hon. member as saying, "Oh, you hypocrite". Others referred to his sanctimonious attitude. Then he went on to say:

> A week ago Thursday night I did what no other member who has spoken in this debate has done. I rose in my place and appealed to the followers on this side of the house to remain in a condition which would not excite any feelings in this house, and from that day to this they have done so.

That was the man who only ten minutes before had done his best to provoke members on this side of the house and to agitate them by insulting them and using terms which no cabinet minister should stoop to use. Seven times, as recorded in the first two columns of his speech in Hansard, the Minister of Finance referred to this party in derogatory terms. "Tory party", he said, in a sneering tone; "Tory party", and he has the nerve to say that he had done nothing and none of his followers had done anything to excite the members of this party. Over 200 years ago the name "Tory" was given to the Conservatives in the United Kingdom. It was an insulting name drawn from a small band of Irish bandits. There were other names used for other parties in those days.

I have been here for some ten years. I realize that all parties have had a great history. The Conservative party has made a great contribution to the history of this country and to the history of democracy in other lands. The Liberal party has made a great contribution to the development of this country and the development of democracy in other lands. Those parties which have represented the socialist creed have made great contributions. But it ill behooves a minister of the crown to stand up and try to cast slurs upon other parties in this house. I may be wrong, but I cannot remember ever hearing any member on this side of the house refer to the Liberal party by derogatory names, certainly not seven times in the first ten minutes of a speech.

That is only an indication, Mr. Speaker, of some of the things which have been going on. I said when I started that I felt I had been wounded. I have tried to analyse my thoughts during this unhappy period. My thoughts and feelings after the events of last week were very akin to my thoughts when I heard of the abdiction of Edward VIII. I remember so well that I was driving through western Ontario going to Windsor when the word came over the car radio. My friend who was driving had to stop the car because he felt so ill when the sad news was heard. A position which he had revered had been insulted. A man of whom he had thought much had been shown to be unworthy of the high office that he held.

Those were the feelings I have had during the past few weeks. The dignity of the office of Speaker of this house, an office which I was prepared to revere, had been shattered. Men I had regarded with some esteem I have now lost faith in. I do not know how you are going to restore the confidence as between government and opposition and as between members and the Chair in this parliament. This is an unhappy house. This will remain an unhappy house as long as this parliament is in existence. We can never live on the same terms of even casual friendship as we have lived in the past.

I think the Minister of Finance is bound at all times to smart under that brand which has been given him. I refer to the brand of hypocrite. He cannot remove that from the record. If he is human he will find it difficult to associate with those he may think have used that term to him, whether or not it was justified. I know I feel that it is almost impossible for me to associate on any level of friendship with some of those who have taken a leading part in this debate.

It is an unhappy situation. I am deeply sorry for Mr. Speaker and for his deputy, the chairman of committees. I believe that they have made mistakes. I think they have been put in this terrible situation by the actions of the government; and I hold as being mainly responsible for those actions, the Prime Minister and the leader of the house.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to engage in quite as violent language as did the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich.

Mr. Pearkes: Perhaps you do not feel as keenly.

Mr. Harris: I am sorry if I do not appear to feel as keenly as my hon. friend. I really do.

I shall do my best at once to apologize to him if I offended him in any manner by referring to his party as the Tory party. It may well be that with his particular knowledge of the origin of the word and his desire not to be associated with the occasion on which the words were first used, he would feel that that was not the type of name that he would like to have attributed to his party. I assure him that I was aware, as was he, of the origin of the word. I also wish to assure him that in my part of the country—as will be borne out, I am sure, by looking at Hansard the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe refers to us as Grits and we refer to them as Tories.

These old names, Mr. Speaker, have a certain affection and a certain meaning, and I thought that long ago the Conservative party had not objected to the use of the word "Tory". If they do, I immediately apologize for having perhaps lapsed into the vernacular on which I have been brought up in Ontario politics and which I am sure will long outlive both the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich and myself. I think these words will be used for all time to come. But in retracting them, I do so sincerely and I shall do my best to avoid the use of the word, at least in the House of Commons, if it is the desire of his party that I should not use it.

He spoke very feelingly at one stage about some matters to which I think I ought to refer later, and I hope I shall be reminded of them.

As everyone has said, Mr. Speaker, this has been a very unusual and unprecedented motion and debate. The Prime Minister spoke at some length the day before yesterday and gave detailed reasons why Mr. Speaker was, in our opinion, entitled to and enjoyed the warmhearted support of a great many of us in this house. I doubt that I should try to add anything to what he said. But after all, in view of what the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich has said, I think I might possibly say a few words both with respect to the immediate problem that faced Mr. Speaker and as to some of the reasons advanced in a general sense by those who have already spoken on the other side.

May I point out that the hon. member for Nanaimo introduced a resolution with respect to privilege. May I also point out that he had raised a question of privilege on a prior occasion and that it would not be surprising that Mr. Speaker had had occasion to consider what was then before the house. May I also point out that when the Leader of the Opposition spoke to the motion proposed by the hon. member for Nanaimo, at the first opportunity when he inquired if there was any point of order on this side, I raised a point of order as will be seen at page 4531 of Hansard. I raised the point of order in these words:

> As I recall the situation, a short while ago Your Honour ruled that you must put the question which was submitted to you from the committee of the whole. From that ruling there was an appeal to the house and the house upheld your decision. That being the case I suggest to Your Honour that no intervening proceeding can occur, because you had in effect said that the interpretation of the rule was that you—

And I remember emphasizing those words.

> —must then put the motion. If that is so, then I suggest that nothing can happen until—

At that point the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe interjected. Then Mr. Speaker rose to his feet and went on to say some words which I shall give in a moment, and I resumed my seat without having obtained from Mr. Speaker a ruling at that particular moment. But may I point out what Mr. Speaker said when he then rose to his feet. I think I can skip everything down to the final sentence at the bottom of page 4531, which begins as follows:

> If hon. members care to debate this matter before I myself am heard on the subject, I am not going to object; I am just going to let them go right ahead, but at one stage of the proceedings I want to say that I will have to be heard.

Let me continue further. There were some intervening interjections, and ultimately the Leader of the Opposition continued the debate. Mr. Speaker once again interjected, as will be seen on page 4532 at the top of the second column. Then the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar interjected; then Mr. Speaker again, and I come finally to the bottom of the second column of page 4532 where I find these words by Mr. Speaker:

> This is a matter on which perhaps I might give a ruling on a future occasion, but at this moment I would ask hon. members to consider that there is a very serious matter before this house, perhaps much more serious than one foresees at this moment in the midst of other proceedings.

Mr. Knowles: In all fairness, read the whole paragraph; start at the beginning. The Prime Minister did this the other day too. It is shameful.

Mr. Harris: I have not the slightest intention of doing anything shameful, or of misleading anyone.

Mr. Knowles: The Prime Minister did it the other day, too.

Mr. Harris: I shall go back to the first of the paragraph.

> As regards the article by Mr. Eugene Forsey, in which he writes under the title "About Closure, the Speaker, and Rights of Parliament", there may be more paragraphs there which are incriminatory, but certainly not the whole of the article.

Mr. Knowles: That makes it tremendously different.

Mr. Harris: I continue:

> This is a matter on which perhaps I might give a ruling on a future occasion, but at this moment I would ask hon. members to consider that there is a very serious matter before this house, perhaps much more serious than one foresees at this moment in the midst of other proceedings. I repeat the suggestion I made earlier, that this matter for the moment be adjourned.

The Leader of the Opposition, however, did not adjourn the debate but continued. It will surely be obvious from this, but perhaps my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre would not even agree to this, that Mr. Speaker had something in his mind about this; that this was not the last word to be said on the subject.

Mr. Knowles: He said only that he might have to rule on how much of the article was incriminatory.

Mr. Harris: That may well be or it might not be. However, my hon. friends opposite are in a position to place upon these words any interpretation they desire. I point out to him, as I do to every hon. member who has spoken in this debate, that we on this side have opinions—those opinions are not well founded in the view of hon. members opposite; I recognize that—but I hope the time has not come when we are expected to accept their opinions without question.

The following day Mr. Speaker said in effect that, upon consideration, he had concluded these matters were not matters of privilege and therefore ruled the motion made by the hon. member for Nanaimo out of order. He asked if hon. members wished to appeal, and that is on page 4537 of Hansard for June 1, 1956. As almost every member who has spoken has said, the Leader of the Opposition at that point attempted to argue the merits of the decision. Mr. Speaker did not permit that but did ask him if he wished to appeal the ruling. He did, in fact, say on page 4537:

> I appeal your ruling but I also suggest that you should accept this motion.

That motion, I take it, was the motion of the hon. member for Nanaimo. At this point the Speaker had made a ruling and the Leader of the Opposition wished to discuss the ruling. The Speaker had not chosen to accept discussion of it but had given the opportunity, which he was bound to do, to allow an appeal from his decision. This appeal was dealt with.

While I am on the subject of appeals, Mr. Speaker, I do want to point out that I interjected only a few words into the address of the hon. member for Prince Albert because I know he would not want to have the record read as if he were referring to this parliament when in fact he was referring to the United Kingdom parliament.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thank my hon. friend. I appreciate the interruption and I know that was the purpose.

Mr. Harris: It might perhaps be useful if every member who speaks after me in this debate, though I do not wish to suggest any course of action to anybody, would bear in mind the distinction between this parliament and the United Kingdom parliament. There is a real distinction. It may be that we have a better system or it may be that they have a better system. I do not think we need to debate that at this time. But let me point out that in the United Kingdom, and this is well known by all hon. members, there are no appeals from the Speaker's rulings; nor, if I remember correctly, are there any appeals from the chairman's rulings in committee.

It may be that the very fact we in this country do allow appeals, in fact we provide for them by the rules, is something which ought to be considered in this parliament. It may be that the fact there are appeals permitted by the rules inclines toward creating appeals for reasons which would not have too much weight in the long run if the appeals were not allowed.

Every member of this house has said, and we all recognize it, that when Your Honour entered into your present duties you were looked upon with the highest regard. As has been said, I think by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, if in Canada we should reach a time when the Speaker might be continued in office for longer than the period of one parliament, it might be possibly while Your Honour was in that chair because of the high regard in which Your Honour was held.

I think that was a recognition not only of the personal regard in which you were held as a result of being acquainted with Your Honour since 1945 and in some cases earlier than that, but it was a state of mind brought about by the work you had done as a delegate to the United Nations on behalf of the people of Canada and because you had served as deputy speaker throughout the period 1949 to 1953 and had given universal satisfaction. All this builds up to the fact that when you entered into your duties you were held in the highest regard.

I speak subject to correction, but I do not recall any appeal from your rulings during at least the first two sessions of this parliament.

Mr. Fleming: One.

Mr. Harris: The hon. member for Eglinton tells me that there was one appeal prior to this session. I had forgotten it but I accept the correction. The Leader of the Opposition the other day in his quite good, historically correct and even in places moving remarks about the institution of the Speaker, did say something that I had either overlooked or had forgotten. As I recall it, he said that there had been newspaper criticism of Your Honour prior to the time we engaged in this debate. As I say, I do not recall it and he did not elaborate; however, I accept it as a fact. I would not know what newspaper criticism there had been of Your Honour prior to this debate, but if it had begun at that time it must have been as a result of appeals from your rulings in this house or of criticism of Your Honour in this house, because I doubt very much whether any newspaper editorial would undertake to criticize Your Honour if you were not being criticized in the house or by members of it. Therefore, looking back on it I have come to the conclusion, sir, that some time since this session began there have been criticisms of you or of your rulings by the opposition, because I am quite satisfied there was none on this side, and that brought about the newspaper comment.

May I point out again the very substantial difference between our parliament and that of the United Kingdom. I have heard you, sir, ask for and listen to points of order at very considerable length. I am not criticizing your conduct when I say that. I have known you, sir, to be half-way through putting a motion and then, out of courtesy, permit an interjection or allow a point of order or another comment to be made at that time by members of the opposition. I would hope that hon. members opposite, if they follow in this debate as I am sure they will, would tell me whether they would expect any such conduct from the Speaker in the United Kingdom parliament?

Mr. Fulton: No. There the government would defend the point of order instead of leaving it to their Speaker.

Mr. Harris: I shall come to that in a moment. So I say, Mr. Speaker, that some time prior to this debate there seemed to be growing up in this house a dissatisfaction with your rulings or with your conduct, I take it to be with your rulings. Let me ask hon. members opposite, is there any solution to dissatisfaction with a ruling of the Speaker except to put it to a vote of the house and to have a vote in which in all likelihood there would be a party division? So long as we have appeals that is bound to be the outcome in most cases.

It may well be that hon. members of the Progressive Conservative party will always support their leader if he appeals a ruling Your Honour has made. I think it is only to be expected that under these circumstances members of the Liberal party would support your ruling. It may be that members of the other parties present, not feeling particularly engaged in the matter, perhaps at times may support your ruling and at other times may not; but, as a matter of fact and without looking at the record in detail, I doubt very much whether that had occurred until recently.

I am of the opinion that the appeals which have been taken since the beginning of this session have been supported by the opposition groups, and we have upheld your rulings. Again subject to correction—I am sure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will follow and tell me if I am wrong—I do not recall an occasion during this session when his party has not voted against the Speaker's ruling, and that before this particular debate began. I may be wrong, and if I am wrong I apologize. But, sir, so long as these appeals are allowed we shall have the appearance of a political dispute in this house about the Speaker's ruling.

If, as was the case in parliament previously, this was common practice, nobody paid a great deal of attention to it. I well recall—the hon. member for Prince Albert will recall as well—that on a great many successive Wednesdays when in those days we used to vote on motions for papers, it was almost an invariable rule that we would have divisions on motions for papers and the like. Then at a later time we would have appeals on the rulings of the Speaker as well. In those days we often used to have appeals on a decision as to whether or not a motion to adjourn the house to discuss a matter of urgent public importance was in order. Eventually that passed away.

When hon. members opposite in this particular matter express regret that we shall not be able to come to a conclusion except on what they think is a partisan vote, let me point out that since I came to parliament, and long before that, appeals with respect to the Speaker's rulings were decided in that particular way. Now, it surely is a matter for consideration that if that is the case, one wonders whether any useful purpose is served except to continue to remind the Speaker that there are members in the house who disagree with him, and nothing much beyond that.

This afternoon the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway suggested that we might consider—in fact he said we should consider —changing the rules of the house. I am free to confess, Mr. Speaker, that the suggestion certainly appeals to me because, as the hon. member for Prince Albert has said, in the United Kingdom they have a different method of invoking closure from what we have. He was quite right the other night when he interjected in the course of my remarks that Mr. Speaker has a discretion in the matter in the United Kingdom.

I am sorry I did not catch what he said at the time, although I read it in Hansard afterwards. Had I caught it, I would have elaborated the point. In the United Kingdom, as I said the other night, they can have quick closure; they can have closure in a matter of hours. It is true that the putting of the motion for closure depends on the discretion of the Speaker, for the reasons which have been read to us this afternoon by the hon. member for Prince Albert. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, closure does in fact occur. It must have been evident in the course of the last three weeks that our closure rule has not been effective in any sense whatever as compared with what it had been prior to this or with respect to that which obtains in the United Kingdom parliament.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What does the minister mean by saying, it has not been effective?

Mr. Harris: Well, I will touch on that in a moment. My answer so far has been to a great deal that has been said because every speaker who has engaged in this debate, except perhaps the Leader of the Opposition, has been arguing about closure as if closure had anything to do with the motion before the house, except in so far as their feelings may have been engaged because closure was going on at the time, or the government was attempting to impose closure at the time this particular motion arose. But do not let us decide on the question of the Speaker because as opposition members we happen to disagree with closure invoked by the government and for which they are prepared to accept full responsibility.

The government knows perfectly well that closure is an unusual and rarely accepted method of passing legislation in this house. This afternoon the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway may have had a valid point when he criticized us for paying any attention to threats of filibuster made by members of the two parties opposite. I hope we will not argue that again. I only say this. The government invoked the closure rule after full consideration; and because we did that I hope no hon. member opposite will feel there is any reason for voting in favour of this particular motion with respect to the Speaker.

Now, there may be other reasons and I shall come to them in a moment. The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich spoke of those who had fought and died for this country and the freedom we enjoy. I paid particular attention, having regard to his distinguished service on behalf of this country in two world wars. I was a little disappointed, just a little, that he did not make it clear that there are a good many people on the government side who have fought for this country from time to time. I am sure it was just an accident in drafting the notes he had because he realizes as I do that we are—

Mr. Fulton: There was no reference to either side.

Mr. Pearkes: Just to keep the record straight, I made no reference to any hon. member of parliament having served in the war. My remarks were general. I was not thinking of members of this house.

Mr. Rowe: I think the hon. member simply said that many had fought.

Mr. Harris: I accept the hon. gentleman's statement that he was speaking generally. I was inclined to accept the criticism he was directing to me at that particular moment in the light of what he had said otherwise, and implying that perhaps those of us who had fought for this country were forgetting the freedom we fought for.

I accept the correction, sir, and say this. One of the things that must be decided in this debate, if it can be decided, is how this parliament can function if your decisions are to be subject to appeal. Now, if we have a situation arise in which every decision of the Speaker is to be subject to appeal quite obviously we shall not be able to legislate for those things with or without opposition which we consider should be done.

On the other hand in this country we have followed the practice, and I think it is a very excellent practice, sir, of having Speakers drawn from the two—I was going to say minority groups—which are the largest minority groups in this country; and I would not like to think we would enter upon a practice which over a number of years would not give an opportunity for service in the chair to persons like yourself who represent one of those great races. Nor would I like to think that we would enter upon a practice that would mean some other person, representing another part of this country, might not also have the honour of sitting in the chair.

We have imposed this disability, if you will, upon ourselves—and I do not call it a disability; I think it is the contrary—but one cannot compare the Speakership in Canada with that of the United Kingdom unless we first make the Speaker's appointment permanent and second make his authority absolute in the sense that you do not permit appeals from his decisions.

Therefore, while I agree entirely with all the lofty sentiments my friend the hon. member for Prince Albert has expressed both in his own words and in the quotations he has read, I say that we can use those words in this country and we can mean them too, but our actions may not possibly live up to the words if we deny to the Speaker that authority and position which he enjoys in Westminster.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Just one word. Does the minister not agree, however, having regard to the fact that our system and the division of our population denies a permanent Speaker on the basis of one race or the other, that the one point I made was that the Speaker should be in no way subject to suggestion on the part of the government?

Mr. Harris: I entirely agree, Mr. Speaker, that the Speakership in this country, because of the situation which is created by a new Speaker every four or five years or whatever term parliament may run to, being in the difficult position of having to pick up the traditions and having to pick up his knowledge of the office and the manner in which to conduct it—

Mr. Fulton: His difficulty arises toward the end of his term, not toward the beginning.

Mr. Harris: The hon. member for Kamloops I think will agree with me that if this difficulty arose prior to this particular debate it will be necessary for hon. members of his party to explain why at this particular moment we have this particular motion. Now, I accept his leader's statement to the effect that it did arise prior to this, and I submit to him—

Mr. Drew: What is that? What did you say?

Mr. Winters: What did who say?

Mr. Harris: I said what I had said a few minutes ago, that in his introductory remarks my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition had said that criticism had arisen with respect to Mr. Speaker in the press of Canada before this debate arose.

Mr. Drew: Yes; that is so.

Mr. Harris: And I went on to say—I do not know whether there was or not—I would expect that criticism could only have arisen if there was criticism here in the house.

[Mr. Harris.]

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MR. DREW—MOTION OF NON-CONFIDENCE IN PRESIDING OFFICER OF THE HOUSE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Drew:

In view of the unprecedented action of Mr. Speaker in (a) improperly reversing his own decision without notice and without giving any opportunity for discussion; (b) repeatedly refusing to allow members to address the house on occasions when the rules provide that they have the right to be heard; (c) subordinating the rights of the house to the will of the government, this house resolves that it no longer has any confidence in its presiding officer.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, may I ask how much time I have?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Nine minutes.

Mr. McIvor: Where is the opposition?

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich were here I would point out—and though he is not here I do it anyway—that the Ottawa Journal uses the phrase "western Tory in final criticism".

Mr. Nowlan: Are there any connotations to that?

Mr. Harris: No, none whatever.

Mr. Nowlan: The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich is here now. Say it to him.

Mr. Harris: Yes. Just before my hon. friend came in I was referring to an Ottawa Journal headline which reads "Western Tory in final criticism". However, I accept my hon. friend's objection to that word on a permanent basis.

Mr. Speaker, when I broke off at a quarter to six I think I had come to the point where I said it would appear that any decision we have made in the past with respect to a decision by Mr. Speaker has been made largely on party lines, and that probably any decision we may make in the future will be made largely on party lines. I repeated that I thought this situation was the result of the system we had in this country, and I did not criticize that system. I did submit to hon. members that they should consider whether or not we would ever avoid the possibility of that situation so long as we allowed an appeal to the house from a decision of Mr. Speaker.

In the course of this debate it has been implied—I do not think it has been suggested directly—that it is unfortunate that Mr. Speaker's conduct should be brought into question and that the matter could only be decided in this manner, namely by a resolution with respect to his conduct. Let me point out that this form of resolution could be used—I am not suggesting it is being so used at the moment—to advance the party disputes which occur in this house.

By one of the hon. members who spoke earlier in the debate I think it was suggested that the only way to resolve this problem was to dissolve the house so that we would have a new parliament and presumably a new Speaker. But let me point out that if an opposition felt that was the way to conduct the business of the house, and if they felt that a government would be obliged to dissolve parliament because they attacked the Speaker, then I suggest to you that these attacks might possibly be more frequent than they have been.

It is true that the government at least proposes to parliament the choice of a Speaker. That is the duty of the government. In this particular case I recall that the Leader of the Opposition joined in the recommendation to parliament. It would always be the duty of a government to recommend another Speaker on another occasion, whatever the government may be.

I know that hon. members opposite feel extremely strongly on this particular point. I know that every one of them is aware of the great responsibility that all of us bear in the consideration of the discharge of the duties of Mr. Speaker. I am ready to agree that they must have given long, careful and serious thought to the proposal before us. Even if it were moved, as I think it was, at a time when feelings were stronger than they have been at any other time while I have been in the house, the fact of the matter is that the resolution was allowed to remain on the order paper and to be moved some 48 hours or so after that.

I give my hon. friends opposite full credit for taking a serious and solemn view of the problem before they engaged upon the debate of this resolution. But for the reasons I have given, Mr. Speaker, it would seem that it would lead to only one conclusion; and I wonder whether, under our system, any other conclusion could be reached and whether or not it is desirable that we should come to that conclusion.

May I just add one word more. Both the leader of the C.C.F. party and the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich, in their remarks, have spoken of the friendships they have enjoyed in the house, which they do not feel could continue under present conditions. I sincerely regret that expression of opinion. I have always had a high regard for both hon. members and for every other member of the opposition. I would hope we would recognize that if this motion is disposed of by a vote, it would be, generally speaking, on party lines; that is the only way, according to our rules, in which it could be disposed of.

For that reason I would hope that after this is over, all of us could take a view which would not be the view expressed by the two hon. gentlemen but rather that now we have discussed it and hon. members have expressed themselves—and I must say with dignity on every occasion—all of us could vote and accept the result; that we could take up where we left off without these friendships having been more than temporarily involved; and that we could once again work together in the sense that a government and an opposition work together in the larger sense of being part of a parliament which is here for the purpose of disposing of the business of the people of Canada, with opposition, as my hon. friend has said, and with proposal and support on this side but on the basis—which is the true basis—that all of us are sent here to discharge our duties seriously and honestly, and that all of us are trying our very best to do that.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate with mixed feelings. So far as His Honour the Speaker is concerned I approach what I have to say with a heavy heart. So far as the government's part in this whole affair is concerned, it is difficult for me to express my feelings.

With regard to Mr. Speaker—though some may wonder at this in view of what has happened in the last few days and in view of what I may say before I take my seat—I am going to say that there is no friendship with any other person in this House of Commons that I value and enjoy more than I do my personal friendship with Mr. Speaker. So far as I am concerned that friendship arises because of my respect for his qualities as outlined this afternoon by my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. I suppose it is also true to say that it arises because of a common interest in parliamentary procedure. Not only have I personal respect for my friend Rene Beaudoin, but I have the highest of regard for the industry with which he has applied himself to his task as Speaker and for the tremendous knowledge he has gained of parliamentary procedure across the centuries. Despite what has happened in the last few days and despite what duty compels me to do in this debate, I hope that friendship between us will continue.

When I think of Mr. Speaker and what he has done for parliament in these last three years—up until a few days ago—I am conscious of the job he has done here on the floor of parliament. I say this to the Minister of Finance, despite the specious attempt he made to picture the opposition as having been critical of Mr. Speaker for a long time. I say that Mr. Speaker's job in this parliament has been appreciated by all of us in the opposition just as much as by those who sit to his right.

Mr. Harris: I did not say anything about a long time.

Mr. Knowles: The Minister of Finance went to great pains to indicate that the criticism of Mr. Speaker by the opposition did not start with this pipe-line debate. He went to great pains to indicate that there had been criticism of his rulings prior to this pipe-line debate, and that that was the basis of the newspaper attacks on Mr. Speaker which occurred prior to the time the pipe-line debate began.

Mr. Harris: I referred to the fact the Leader of the Opposition had said that. I said that I myself did not know about it.

Mr. Knowles: I am prepared to let the record speak for itself. I paid very close attention to what the Minister of Finance said.

Mr. Lesage: That is what he said.

Mr. Knowles: I paid very close attention to what the minister said this afternoon. I want to tell him that, subject to my not having been able to find everything on the point between the time I had supper and eight o'clock, so far as I can ascertain there were only two appeals against rulings by Mr. Speaker prior to the pipe-line debate.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is correct.

Mr. Knowles: I thank the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration for confirming that fact. First may I say that there were no appeals in the session of 1954. In the session of 1955, there was only one appeal. It occurred on July 5 of that year and is recorded on pages 5683, 5684 and 5685 of Hansard. The appeal was made by the Progressive Conservatives. When the vote was called naturally the Progressive Conservatives voted against Mr. Speaker's ruling but we of the C.C.F., along with the members of the Social Credit party and the members of the government, voted to sustain Mr. Speaker's ruling. Let the record speak for itself, Mr. Speaker. Prior to the pipe-line debate there were only two appeals of Speaker's rulings in this parliament. In one case we voted against the ruling and on one occasion we voted to sustain the ruling.

The other of the two to which I have referred occurred on March 23 of this year, and is recorded on page 2457 of Hansard. The occasion was a motion for the production of papers moved by my colleague the hon. member for Yorkton to which the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration applied a treatment that was dug out of antiquity. We did not like it. We protested against it and we argued about it. At this moment I cannot recall whether we were thinking of appealing the ruling, but in the course of the argument Mr. Speaker was offended by something the hon. member for Prince Albert said and the result was that Mr. Speaker virtually challenged the hon. member for Prince Albert to appeal the ruling. The hon. member for Prince Albert did so, and that was the occasion when we voted against Mr. Speaker's ruling.

[Mr. Knowles.]

In addition to the fact that for two and a half sessions there were only two appeals, there have been quite a number of occasions when Mr. Speaker has ruled against motions or amendments moved from this side of the house. I confess that the number of rulings against motions or amendments made by members of the C.C.F. group seems to be fewer than is the case for members to my right or left, but there have been some cases affecting all three parties on this side of the house. In none of those other cases except the two to which I have referred were appeals launched. I call my colleagues around me as witnesses to this statement. There have been several occasions when one colleague or another has been dissatisfied with the ruling Mr. Speaker has made and has suggested to me that I should appeal it. I have turned around and said, "No; Mr. Speaker is being fair." There have been occasions when Mr. Speaker has ruled against the government. He ruled against the Minister of Finance in respect of the Post Office Act. So I have said to my colleagues, Mr. Speaker is being fair and if we like his rulings when he rules against the government we cannot stand up and appeal his rulings when he rules against us.

Mr. Harris: I think it was the Deputy Speaker who ruled against me.

Mr. Knowles: So far as we are concerned, it does not matter. The occupants of the chair are one; and whichever occupant has made a ruling we have been happy, until the start of the pipe-line debate, over the kind of impartial treatment given to this House of Commons by the occupants of the chair during this twenty-second parliament.

I confess that in the parliament from 1945 to 1949 we got into the habit of making appeals. There was no other way we could get a vote. Those who were here remember the experience. Perhaps it was because we made so many appeals from 1945 to 1949 that the habit carried over into the next parliament for a time, but we soon discovered that in Mr. Speaker Macdonald we had a presiding officer in whom we could place our confidence. In fact, I remember that once in the very early months of his Speakership he ruled against the Prime Minister, and the habit of making appeals began to disappear. The habit had virtually died out with Mr. Speaker Macdonald, and when Mr. Speaker Beaudoin came into the chair he inherited a happy relationship between the house and the Chair and he was able to develop that relationship into one of the best relationships that could ever have obtained between the Speaker and the House of Commons.

I know that I enjoyed it. I know that the friendships built up during that period are such that, so far as I am concerned, they will outlast even the experience through which we are going now. I repeat that the conduct of the Speaker up until a short while ago was something that deserves from all of us the highest commendation.

I am conscious, Mr. Speaker, not only of the tremendous job you have done here in the house. I am conscious not only of your impartiality across the years to us here in this chamber, but I also have very vivid memories of a committee over which Mr. Speaker presided for two full sessions. I refer to the committee which was set up for the purpose of revising the rules of the house, which brought in a report that was adopted last July, a report which in due course became our standing orders as they are now constituted. I say to the Minister of Finance, and he knows this, that if it had not been for the approach of Mr. Speaker, if it had not been for his impartiality; if it had not been for his determination that the rules of this parliament were to be the rules of parliament and not the rules of the majority, there would not have been a unanimous report last summer.

My friend the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre is confirming that statement. The Minister of Finance knows that after two years of battling things out in that committee, that was subsequent to earlier committees in the days of Mr. Speaker Macdonald, and Mr .Speaker Fauteux, finally the point was reached in that committee where we were at loggerheads. We could not agree. The Minister of Finance had his rule changes that he felt the committee should adopt. We had gone through them; we had argued them; we had voted and we had had amendments. We had spent all kinds of hours without reaching a report that could be unanimous at all.

The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, the hon. member for Kamloops, the hon. member for Acadia, the Minister of Finance and others who were members of that committee will recall that things were getting difficult. It looked as though the battle was lost. It looked as though the Minister of Finance was going to get his way simply by moving that the changes the government wanted be put through, that the report be made back to the house and put through by a majority vote of the House of Commons.

What did Mr. Speaker do? The minister knows what he did. He said he would not present to the House of Commons in his name as chairman a report that was the report of the majority only. There had to be compromise; there had to be a report that would represent as nearly as possible unanimity of opinion on the part of that committee, and I remember the night across the way in room 16 when Mr. Speaker almost literally took four heads and banged them together, the head of the Minister of Finance, the head of the hon. member for Kamloops, the head of the hon. member for Acadia and my head. He said, "It is time for you four fellows to get out and get together in a subcommittee and come back with a report".

The proposal of Mr. Speaker became a motion and a decision of the committee was reached late that night, at eleven o'clock or perhaps twelve o'clock, in room 16 across the way. As instructed we were up in the office of the Minister of Finance on the fourth floor at nine o'clock the next morning. We started in, and my colleagues will confirm it, and found it was tough going, particularly under those circumstances, to try to give and take, but we did it.

I was looking today at Hansard of July 1, 1955, when the report of that committee was moved in this house by the Minister of Finance and seconded by the hon. member for Kamloops. But for the fact that the hon. member for Kamloops was seen first, either one of the other two of us would have had the honour to second it. Why? Because we had reached unanimity, because we had a presiding officer in this house who sensed what parliament should be like, who insisted that the rules of parliament were the rules of parliament, not the rules of the government; and this book we have, or this book we had until a week ago, the standing orders of the House of Commons, representing the unanimous report of the committee that worked for years, is our possession in the House of Commons because of the impartiality, because of the fairness, because of the appreciation of parliamentary tradition in the heart and mind of Mr. Speaker Louis René Beaudoin.

I shall never forget that experience. No matter what comes out of this situation in which we are, my friendship for him, my regard for him will continue. But, Mr. Speaker, in the meantime something has happened. First may I say, indicating our continuing regard for Mr. Speaker, indicating also the attitude of this house toward Mr. Speaker's rulings, that as late as May 3 of this year when the fever of the pipe line was beginning to rise though the legislation had not yet reached us, there was a motion under standing order 26 moved by the Leader of the Opposition that had to do with a pretty contentious issue, the McMahon correspondence, and some question as to whether the Minister of Trade and Commerce had been completely fair with the house.

Mr. Speaker ruled the motion of the Leader of the Opposition out of order. The Leader of the Opposition appealed the ruling. It was one of those cases where no appeal is allowed. Mr. Speaker, in his desire to be fair, was leaning over backward. If you read Hansard of that day, May 3, 1956,—most members do not have to read it; it is still fresh enough in our memories—you will see that the point was reached where it looked as though Mr. Speaker was going to allow an appeal. Who was it that came to his support; who was it that rallied Mr. Speaker to stand firm; who was it that reminded him of his previous decisions? It was my leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. Supported by the statement my leader gave on that occasion, Mr. Speaker rallied and refused the appeal that the Leader of the Opposition sought to make. There the matter rested. That is the kind of regard this house had for Mr. Speaker until recent days.

I come down to May 7 of this year, the day before that dramatic day when the Liberals held a caucus in the morning and the Minister of Trade and Commerce made his statement in the afternoon and filed notice before six o'clock of the resolution preceding Bill No. 298. My leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, presented a motion to adjourn the house under standing order 26 to discuss the matter of an across-Canada pipe line, with the suggestion of public ownership in the motion. This was something pretty basic and pretty fundamental so far as we were concerned.

It was ruled out of order by Mr. Speaker. In his comments he said something which we thought indicated that he was prepared to have an appeal. My leader asked whether that was what he meant. Mr. Speaker said, "No, there is no appeal". My leader accepted it. It ended there. This was on the day before the Minister of Trade and Commerce stood in this house and told parliament what it was he was going to demand, no matter what it might do to parliament, as we have learned to our sorrow. That is the kind of Speaker we had until recent days; that is the kind of relationship we had between the Chair and the members of this house. Then came the determination of that minister who operates on the slogan, "What Lola wants, Lola gets", and there followed the days which are now part of bitter memory.

I am not going through the things that happened during the first few days of that debate when we began to feel that something had happened, something had snapped. But that was our experience. Where was our Speaker, where was the man in whom we had learned to place such confidence? Point after point that we would raise was turned down. We fell back on our only recourse, that of making appeals. The more we felt we were being denied our rights, particularly under the threat of closure, the more it seemed as though there was nothing else for us to do but to keep on raising points of procedure, trying to establish and to protect our rights.

Finally came the day that caused all the trouble. I shall not discuss anything that happened previous to May 31 and June 1, because up to that point I think we might have survived; although, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway pointed out, he warned the house and the government a few days before that we were drifting toward a crisis.

Well, other members have recited what happened on the night of May 31 when Mr. Speaker, after having heard the point of order of my friend the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, heard the point of privilege made by my colleague the hon. member for Nanaimo, and suggested to him that he should not proceed with the point of privilege unless he was prepared to put it in the form of a motion. He did so; he followed the instructions of Mr. Speaker as to how to draft the motion. He sent the documents in question to the Clerk, as suggested by Mr. Speaker. Everything was being done just as Mr. Speaker was suggesting that it be done. The next morning, June 1, something seemed to have happened. The Winnipeg Free Press in an editorial on Monday, June 4, 1956, said this:

> The circumstances may, for once, be fairly put in an analogy with a football game. Late in the third quarter, the referee makes a decision that leads on to a vital score for the visiting side. The officials of the home team are obviously much upset. The fourth quarter begins with the referee announcing that he has changed his mind, that he made a wrong decision in the third quarter, and therefore play shall now proceed from where it was before he made that decision.

How apt is that description.

Mr. Hodgson: I'll say.

Mr. Knowles: That morning, June 1, our trusted and revered Mr. Speaker, the one in whom we had such confidence, began to break standing orders and citations right and left. I ask you first of all to note citation 216 in Beauchesne's third edition:

> On resuming an adjourned debate, the member who moved its adjournment is by courtesy entitled to speak first if he rises in his place when the order is called.

I ask you to couple that with standing order 7, which the Prime Minister quoted to us the other day in another debate, which reads:

> At the ordinary time of adjournment of the house, unless otherwise provided, the proceedings shall be interrupted and the business under consideration at the termination of the sitting shall stand over until the next sitting day when it will be taken up at the same stage where its progress was interrupted.

It is clearly established that on the morning of June 1 the Leader of the Opposition had the floor; he was in the middle of his speech. Interrupting him at that point was a violation of standing order 7 and a discourtesy to the Leader of the Opposition under citation 216 of Beauchesne's third edition. "But oh", says someone, "it is proper for the Speaker at that point if he feels he must do so to raise a point of order". No. In doing that Mr. Speaker violated the provisions of standing order 50, which reads:

> Whenever Mr. Speaker is of opinion that a motion offered to the house is contrary to the rules and privileges of parliament, he shall apprise the house thereof immediately, before putting the question thereon, and quote the standing order or authority applicable to the case.

If the motion of my friend the hon. member for Nanaimo was out of order, the time for Mr. Speaker to tell the house was before he put the question. But no; the night before he put the question as in order. Rising on a point of order discourteously in the midst of the speech of the Leader of the Opposition I say was out of order. Then Mr. Speaker refused to hear anyone on his point of order. His contention was that this motion which was in order the night before was out of order the next morning.

I shall not go into the argument as to whether any of the rest of us might also have had the right to speak to the point of order; if that were at stake I would argue that too, but I am not going to confuse it by going that far. But I do say this, that in addition to the standing orders and citations I have already given which our revered and trusted Mr. Speaker broke, he on that occasion broke standing order 34, which reads as follows:

> Any member addressing the house, if called to order either by Mr. Speaker or on a point raised by another member, shall sit down while the point is being stated, after which he may explain.

The Leader of the Opposition sat down and Mr. Speaker stated his point of order but he denied the Leader of the Opposition the right to explain after he had sat down. What a way to start a day, a day we shall never forget.

Now, of course, we have had the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance indulge in what I can only call distortion, because they have tried to contend that Mr. Speaker forecast the night before the ruling against the motion which he made the morning of June 1. I apologize to the house for the anger with which I interrupted the Minister of Finance this afternoon, but I confess that is how I felt. Perhaps I should not have made the apology.

The Minister of Finance this afternoon endeavoured to create the impression that the ruling Mr. Speaker gave on the morning of June 1 was not something new but something forecast by what was said the night before. The minister tried to create that impression in two ways. On the one hand he drew attention to his own intervention in the speech of the Leader of the Opposition, recorded at page 4531 of Hansard, when he suggested that no motion of any kind should have been entertained by the Speaker at that time.

Mr. Speaker did not rule the motion out of order the next morning on that ground; not at all. I say it is unfair, it is misleading the house and it is a case of distortion for the Minister of Finance to try to say that his intervention here in the house the night before was the basis upon which Mr. Speaker made his ruling the next morning. Then in an attempt to create the impression that some doubt had been cast the night before on the validity of my hon. friend's motion, the Minister of Finance read this, quoting from Mr. Speaker's words as recorded at page 4532 of Hansard:

> This is a matter on which perhaps I might give a ruling on a future occasion—

It was at that point I burst in saying that it was shameful for the Minister of Finance to mislead the house in that way, trying to suggest that Mr. Speaker the night before had said to the house that he might have to rule the next day on the whole motion.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member did not read the other quotation. I am referring to what Mr. Speaker said at the bottom of page 4531. Perhaps the hon. member would not mind reading that.

Mr. Knowles: I do not want to be unfair. Where is it I am skipping?

Mr. Pickersgill: If you will look at the bottom of page 4531, the second last line, and read from there on for three or four lines on the next page.

Mr. Knowles: My hon. friend is drawing my attention to the fact that Mr. Speaker said the night before that—

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. gentleman read it?

Mr. Knowles: Surely. It reads:

> If hon. members care to debate this matter before I myself am heard on the subject, I am not going to object; I am just going to let them go right ahead, but at one stage of the proceedings I want to say that I will have to be heard.

Mr. Pickersgill: Exactly. That is surely the whole point.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, that is on my side of the argument. That proves Mr. Speaker had no notion prior to ten o'clock Thursday night of ruling this motion out of order.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, if you will also read the other quotation—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Cardiff: You are getting in deeper; you had better keep quiet.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sure the hon. member wants to be fair.

Mr. Knowles: That is exactly the case, and my point is that the Minister of Finance was grossly unfair, because as I pointed out he had not read the—

Mr. Carrick: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Knowles: If it is short; I am watching my time.

Mr. Carrick: It is very short and it is this. Would you mind reading to the house the point in the second last paragraph on page 4531 where the Speaker said it seemed to him the thing to do was to postpone consideration of this motion. Does that not indicate he did not find a question of privilege existed and he wanted to postpone it?

Mr. Knowles: That is a fair enough question. All these points, Mr. Speaker, indicate that the Speaker was not sure when was the best time to debate it, that he was not sure how much of the two articles should be regarded as incriminatory. But there was no question about the validity of the motion, no question but that the motion itself was proper. I thank my hon. friend, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, and the hon. member for Trinity for helping me out on this.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. gentleman just let me put one other question? He says that there was no question raised about the validity of the motion. There was a question raised, which I think he will admit, by the leader of the house, the Minister of Finance, which is reported on page 4531 of Hansard of May 31. The point raised, as the hon. gentleman knows, was a completely valid point.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Knowles: Whether or not the point raised by the Minister of Finance was valid, and I concede that it might well be a valid one, that is not the point on which the Speaker ruled the motion out of order the next morning. The minister knows that just as well as I do. Just before I get too far away from this point, may I indicate what Mr. Speaker said, as reported at the bottom of the second column on page 4532:

> As regards the article by Mr. Eugene Forsey, in which he writes under the title "About Closure, the Speaker, and Rights of Parliament", there may be more paragraphs there which are incriminatory, but certainly not the whole of the article. This is a matter on which I might perhaps give a ruling on a future occasion.

That followed the paragraph in which Mr. Speaker had singled out sentences in the other letter which in his view were incriminatory.

An hon. Member: Three words.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is not that what he based his ruling on?

Mr. Knowles: No. The next morning Mr. Speaker ruled that the whole motion was out of order. He did not at that time, as the Minister of Finance implied, contend that the point of order raised by the member for Winnipeg South Centre should not have been raised. On the other point, there was no suggestion by Mr. Speaker or no suggestion by anybody that the motion itself was out of order.

This is what represents the real problem, because next morning we had a complete turnabout. There was an attempt by the Prime Minister like that of the Minister of Finance. I mention the Prime Minister because he did the same thing as the Minister of Finance when he spoke on Monday, June 4, where he is reported at page 4655 of Hansard as follows:

> You had already made it quite clear that you felt you might have to make a ruling upon the question at some time. On the following morning, when the matter was called, you did give the ruling that was cited in the Votes and Proceedings of June 1 by the Leader of the Opposition.

I say that is misleading. Mr. Speaker gave no indication the night before that he was going to make a ruling on the motion as a whole; the only indications he gave the night before were that he might have to rule on how much of the letters was incriminatory, plus the indication that he himself might wish to speak.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman is putting an interpretation on words.

Mr. Fulton: That is the only interpretation possible.

Mr. Pickersgill: We simply do not agree.

Mr. Knowles: My friends opposite are doing their best to create the impression that Mr. Speaker came independently to the decision that he announced to the house on the morning of June 1, and we do not agree.

Mr. McIlraith: Do you suggest anything different?

An hon. Member: Withdraw.

Mr. Knowles: It is a known fact that the Minister of Finance went to Mr. Speaker's office after ten o'clock Thursday night.

Mr. McIlraith: It is a known fact that the hon. member for Kamloops went from his place up to the chair.

Mr. Fulton: I certainly did not go that night. On a question of privilege, in case that appears in Hansard, I most certainly deny that, because I did not go to the Speaker's chair that night.

Mr. McIlraith: I am not suggesting there was any impropriety in it.

Mr. Fulton: You are stating what you know to be incorrect, just as you have on other occasions. I submit the hon. member should withdraw those words because he knows them to be incorrect.

Mr. McIlraith: I believe them to be the fact.

Mr. Knowles: On this point I think I might read another sentence from the editorial in the Winnipeg Free Press, as follows:

> Whether the Speaker was right or wrong in his first decision is open to prolonged discussion, of little public interest. But it is perfectly plain that, by changing his mind overnight, so greatly to the government's advantage, the Speaker becomes exposed to opposition suspicion of having yielded to government pressure.

Mr. Pearson: Innuendo.

Mr. Rowe: That is not innuendo, that is a fact.

Mr. Knowles: There are certain facts which are known to the minister of external affairs and he cannot set those facts aside even if he were to act in the manner the Minister of Finance did here this afternoon. I move on. That action was not the action of the Mr. Speaker whom I have known for the past seven years.

In addition we have this business of submitting a proposition to the house by Mr. Speaker for a majority decision. That has been discussed at great length, so I need not argue about it in theoretical or abstract terms. I am going to read some standing orders to show just how wrong this was. Standing order 41 reads:

> Forty-eight hours' notice shall be given of a motion for leave to present a bill, resolution or address, for the appointment of any committee, or for placing a question on the order paper; but this rule shall not apply to bills after their introduction, or to private bills, or to the times of meeting or adjournment of the house. Such notice shall be laid on the table before six o'clock p.m., and be printed in the Votes and Proceedings of that day.

That is a standing order which requires notices for certain kinds of motions and it permits certain exceptions, but what the Speaker put to the house was not one of those exceptions. What the Speaker put to the house might be regarded as coming under standing order 42, which reads:

> A motion may, in case of urgent and pressing necessity previously explained by the mover, be made by unanimous consent of the house without notice having been given under standing order 41.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I am obliged to tell him that his time has expired.

Mr. Knowles: I am sorry, too.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I waited until the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre had finished his speech because in accordance with certain recent directions I felt that was the proper way to do it. I ask you to direct that certain words of the hon. member for Ottawa West be stricken from the record, because they are not in accordance with the facts. If they are allowed to remain there they may create a wrong impression.

When the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was referring to the fact that it was within the knowledge of members that the Minister of Finance had been to see the Speaker on Thursday night, the hon. member for Ottawa West put on the record words to the effect that I had been to see the Speaker.

Mr. McIlraith: That you had gone up to the chair.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that is not correct. During that period when feelings were so tense I made it a point not to go to the chairman or the Speaker for the very reason that I did not feel it was correct for hon. members, and particularly for ministers, to be doing that at such a time. If I am going to criticize ministers for doing it I am not going to do it myself. I did not go to the chair or the Speaker during that period; therefore I wish to have those words removed from the record because they were put on there by the hon. member for Ottawa West to create an impression which the hon. member knows to be false.

Mr. McIlraith: If the hon. member states that what I said is not in accordance with the facts and that he did not go to the Speaker, then of course I completely accept his explanation and am prepared to withdraw my remarks. As to the latter part of the hon. member's remarks, of course hon. members well realize their propriety. That is another matter, but I shall withdraw my remarks.

Mr. Fulton: I am grateful for the hon. member saying that he will withdraw; therefore if there was any impropriety in my other remarks I withdraw them outright. But I would ask that the remarks of the hon. member at that point be stricken from the record because if they were left there they would leave a false impression.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I recall another occasion when there was difficulty about striking matters from the record. I do not feel that it is within my power to order this whole matter stricken from the record. The hon. member has raised his question of privilege and the hon. member for Ottawa West has withdrawn. In turn, the hon. member for Kamloops withdraws on his part, and I think the incident should be considered at an end. The hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings.

Mr. G. C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, as every other speaker who has taken part in this debate has said, it is an unpleasant experience which we are undergoing. It certainly is one in which no one participates with any degree of pleasure or satisfaction because I can say, as was said by the last speaker and by every other hon. gentleman, I think, who has taken part in this debate, that I have had the highest regard for Mr. Speaker and the other occupants of the chair coming under that title, and also a personal regard and a warm friendship as well. Therefore it is particularly unfortunate that we are faced, as we believe, with the necessity and the responsibility for proceeding with this matter at this time.

It perhaps would be a relatively easy thing to sit in one's seat and not take part in the debate, but because I feel strongly on this matter, because I feel that hon. members have a duty which has to be performed in this connection, I do not think any one of us should remain seated and hide behind someone else who is undertaking this responsibility and performing this task at this time. So, much as I regret it personally, I feel that I have a responsibility here as a member of parliament, as a member of the opposition, and I am exercising it tonight, though I certainly agree with many of the things which have been said by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre about His Honour the Speaker, and the personal relationships which have existed heretofore between us.

There is another reason why I rise to take part in this debate. I must say that I was somewhat shocked by the statement of the Prime Minister when he spoke in connection with this motion on Monday, June 4. The right hon. gentleman, after referring to the motion and quoting from an editorial, went on to say this about our action, as found at page 4654 of Hansard:

> Not because of the qualities of the Speaker or the chairman but because of the fact that there is a contentious measure that is being opposed by all means that can be devised under the rules of the house to bring about delay and to waste time.

Again on page 4657 the Prime Minister said in a tone, I say with respect, of deepest sarcasm:

> This situation will appear to many, in spite of the elevated tone of the addresses made in the house this afternoon by the Leader of the Opposition and by the leader of the C.C.F. party, as being one more attempt to prevent the majority in parliament from reaching a point where it would be entitled to vote upon the propriety or otherwise of this controversial measure.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that I for one resent the imputations which are contained in these two statements of the Prime Minister, and I regret that the Prime Minister has shown so little appreciation of the sense of this house and the sincerity of the feelings which have been aroused by the matters which have gone on during the past week that he would suggest that we would move this motion simply for the purpose of bringing about delay. All the irritations, all the frustrations which have occurred during the preceding weeks undoubtedly contributed to an unhealthy atmosphere, undoubtedly caused irritations on our side of the house as well, but those irritations in themselves would never have prompted this motion had it not been for the matters to which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre referred a few minutes ago.

It was when we finally came to what I am afraid will go down in parliamentary history as black Friday that we were confronted with a situation where we felt that there was nothing else that could be done. When you see, Mr. Speaker, as you and others undoubtedly did, and as hon. members have indicated, reasonable men, experienced parliamentarians, some of whom have been here for almost a quarter of a century, so angered, so aroused that they had to use means which had never been used before in the Canadian parliament, you can judge to some extent of the intensity of the feelings of the members and the sincerity of the feelings of the members of the opposition and of the Leader of the Opposition when he gave notice of this motion.

To suggest that we would impute, charge and indict an officer for whom so many have had the warmest personal feelings, one who personified within himself all the respect which is due the Chair; to suggest we would do that for partisan purposes is an implication which I resent, and that is one reason I am speaking on this motion tonight. Certainly, sir, if notice of this motion had been given for any of these purposes or there had been any suggestion of them I certainly would not be speaking at this time.

Then there is another reason why we are perhaps all the more interested in this now than we would have been heretofore. That is because of some of the academic discussions which have also arisen, and the suggestions as to the rights of the majority and of the minorities. No one questions the fact that a majority represented by the government has the responsibility for initiating legislation and seeing that it is properly debated in parliament, because parliament is the forum wherein that debate takes place, where public opinion is formulated, crystallized and so on and so forth.

But although one can appreciate the general philosophy, the general principle, that a majority cannot be continually obstructed or blocked by a minority, that proposition made in general certainly has no application whatsoever in the situation which developed here. If one wants authority for that one could refer, for instance, to an editorial in the Winnipeg Free Press which deals with this question of discussion of the rights of a majority and the rights of a minority. This is what the Winnipeg Free Press says:

> The government has struggled for years with the pipe line problem. Mr. Howe has made decisions, found that they did not work, and made new decisions . . . Eventually out of all this confusion, there comes a bill. And Mr. Howe says, in effect: "Right, we've decided what's best for the country; time is short; whisk it through."
> There is here something dangerously near the idea that the government's thinking is enough, and that parliament's argument in public, as the focus for popular thought and discussion, does not matter.

If one wants a further illustration of the working of democracy and the function of debate, I would recommend that the Secretary of State for External Affairs see that his book is properly distributed to the members on his own side of the house. One could take his book, "Democracy in World Politics" and occupy a lot of time tonight putting most interesting quotations on the record as to the functions of debate in parliament, the rights of an opposition to debate; how it eliminates the dark corners, helps to crystallize public opinion and even reaches over the shoulders of a majority. I see the minister has the book in his hand. I am sure he would be glad to have many copies of it sold, and I hope that tonight he will perhaps reread it and then read the speech he made the other night and try to reconcile what he said in the book with what he said in the House of Commons as to the functions of an opposition and a majority in this parliament.

Dealing with this matter, I should like to call the attention of that distinguished former president of the Canadian Bar Association, the Prime Minister, to a statement of principle laid down by the Canadian Bar Association a few years ago, when they said:

> Under democratic institutions, the people accept to be governed by majority decisions, but on condition that the laws should be discussed in the open, traversed by the criticisms of the opposition and be the result of a free and enlightened decision of parliament.

I wonder how much discussion there is when the motion is that further consideration be postponed? How much discussion is there when the Leader of the Opposition, rising time after time to speak on a matter, is refused recognition by the occupant of the chair at that time, in violation of all the ancient usages and principles of this house and of other parliamentary houses?

Never before was such a spectacle seen. On four different occasions the Leader of the Opposition stood in his place, as he had a right to do, and with respect, and the Chair should have recognized him. But each time the Chair refused to recognize him. Despite all this—I say despite these irritations, despite these frustrations, despite the intensity of feeling which was engendered—this motion would not have been made had it not been for what happened on that Friday morning.

I am not going to deal with that matter in detail. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has outlined it substantially in so far as precedents and citations are concerned. May I just go back before that for a moment. If we accept this matter to which I referred a moment ago, namely the fact of the relative importance of the position of the majority in comparison with that of the minority, I suggest we are going back to the principles which prevailed 500 years ago when parliament consisted of the king's men, with the pocket boroughs and all the rest, and when the executive were in the king's pocket. It was against that arbitrary rule that we finally developed through the centuries these principles which were incorporated in this book to which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre referred a while ago. I refer to our standing orders, our rules and all the citations which preceded them. That was what evolved through the centuries.

Where are we now? As has been pointed out, because of what happened on Friday morning, in a very few minutes all of this which had happened before was scrapped and apparently thrown out the window. The Leader of the Opposition, on rising to continue a speech he had started the night before in a debate which had been adjourned in the regular way, was knocked down almost as quickly as if he had been pole-axed. He was stopped dead and ordered to sit down. He was given no opportunity to speak; he was given no opportunity to continue the debate. He was refused that right. He was even refused the right to raise a point of order and he was told by Mr. Speaker, "You have your remedy; you can appeal".

We listened to the Minister of Finance this afternoon in a long, technical, legalistic argument which I am afraid did not go too far toward defence of the Chair, Mr. Speaker, but which perhaps at least put the Minister of Finance on record as having intervened in some way in this matter by a speech. What did the Minister of Finance say this afternoon? What was the whole motive and theme of his statement? It was that these appeals from the Speaker's rulings are always political, and everyone knows they are political. He said it was unfortunate that was the case but that you had to have these political decisions; and he was almost suggesting and hoping that perhaps some day we would be able to obviate the necessity for appeals from Speakers' rulings; that is, purely political appeals.

Then I would refer you to the statement of Mr. Speaker on Friday morning, as recorded at page 4542 of Hansard, when refusing the Leader of the Opposition the right to speak. He went on to say this:

> . . . I propose not to make a ruling but to submit this position to the judgment of the house. If the house decides in favour of it, then we shall govern ourselves accordingly.

Then later on he said to the Leader of the Opposition, "You have your right; you can appeal to the house". What right was there? What justification was there, Mr. Speaker, for stopping that debate when it was stopped and for refusing to give the Leader of the Opposition even a chance to be heard?

Then later on we had that other unprecedented move that was made, this formulation of a proposition or submission to the house by the Speaker in which he attempted to reverse himself and take us back 24 hours into the previous day instead of having the debate carried on in the way in which it should have been carried on. At page 4552 of Hansard I notice that it is put in the form of a motion: "Those who are in favour of this motion, will please say yea". Who made the motion, Mr. Speaker? Certainly not Mr. Speaker. Certainly no one on the government side of the house.

The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration was very vociferous tonight in his defence of Mr. Speaker by interjection; but I did not notice any of them rising at any time when these discussions were on to help Mr. Speaker. I did not notice any of them answering points of order. As someone has said, Mr. Speaker had to carry the whole load himself. They sat back and allowed him to do it, or at least they did not help Mr. Speaker in any way.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Nowlan: Surely.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member will admit that on the previous Thursday evening the Minister of Finance raised a point of order about the alleged point of order of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre as soon as the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre sat down before six o'clock, and the minister raised the same point of order in an interruption of the Leader of the Opposition shortly before ten o'clock and in neither case—although the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre virtually admitted his point of order was valid—did he get a ruling.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to my hon. friend asking a question, but as I said a moment ago he has been very reluctant to get into this debate so far. I certainly do not want him to be deprived of that privilege, but I do not want him to make a speech in the middle of mine. Later on he will have an opportunity to speak if he desires to take advantage of it.

I was referring a moment ago to the fact that at page 4552 you have the usual phrasing or phraseology but it is most unusual having regard to the background: "Those who are in favour of this motion will please say yea". No motion had been made whatsoever. So we had that situation, namely that in one short morning Mr. Speaker had reversed himself with regard to what he had done the night before; he had refused debate; he made a submission from the Chair which, with deference, I suggest was unwarranted and submitted it; and then he set the clock back 24 hours.

I think it can be summed up in one way, Mr. Speaker. For some reason Mr. Speaker acted as a wrecking crew to get back on the rails the government locomotive which had been so effectively derailed the night before, and without his intervention it never could have been put back on the rails. That is what happened. It was then, and only then, that we saw in the house the scenes which took place and to which reference has been made in the press time and time again. It was after that had occurred that the Leader of the Opposition gave notice of this motion, which the Prime Minister said was made for the purpose of delaying debate. I say that it was not made for that reason in any way shape or form.

Much has been said about intervention. I listened very carefully to the Minister of Finance who spoke this afternoon. As I said, he gave a refined, legalistic argument about the rules of the House of Commons. I noticed that there were some things with which he did not deal. I know that my hon. friend the Secretary of State for External Affairs must have read with a great deal of interest the comments which have appeared in the press lately, and particularly the editorial comments of a gentleman named Mr. Norman Smith who is a liberal certainly with a small "l" if not with a capital "L". He is one who sat here and observed these proceedings. He is well known to some hon. gentlemen opposite and is a personal friend of many. Certainly he could never be accused of making any political capital for the Conservative party. But as a disinterested observer, as a man who has travelled the world over and seen some of the scenes of disorder, some of the dissolutions of parliaments to which the Secretary of State for External Affairs referred the other evening, and who has travelled with him, what does he say about the events of Friday morning. He says the Liberal party tore up the rule book, and not only tore up the rule book but part of his national pride in citizenship. Moreover, they went about their tasks with a gladsome thumping of desks. Certainly, Mr. Speaker is not responsible for the thumping of desks, but that epitomizes the situation just about as succinctly, just as about as fairly as anything that could be said.

There are many things that could be read from these articles which would be very unkind. I do not want to put them on the record. Mr. Smith goes out of his way to say, and it is certainly true, that these gentlemen are not fascists; they are not communists. He said they are just ignorant, and ignorance was the kindest thing that could be said about them. I think probably that is about as fair an observation as could be made. In his column Mr. Smith also goes on to say—it is unfortunate the Minister of Finance did not deal with this point this afternoon—that there were notes passing back and forth between the government leader and Mr. Speaker. Sometimes other cabinet ministers were used as office boys. Finally, when the notes were intercepted, the house leader became more astute and went out into the lobby to pick up the notes carried back and forth.

Those are the facts as set forth by Mr. Norman Smith. I was hoping that this afternoon the Minister of Finance would give some explanation or stand up, as the hon. member for Kamloops did a while ago, and deny them very pointedly. No; we heard long appeals about fairness in a political situation such as this, but certainly nothing which went to any of these matters that have been referred to in the local newspapers printed here in Ottawa and which have certainly come to the attention of all who were involved in the situation. Certainly, I thought they would have been dealt with this afternoon.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could I ask the hon. gentleman another question?

Mr. Nowlan: No; make your speech afterwards. You will have plenty of time. At least, Mr. Speaker, in fairness to the chair these things should be dealt with; they should be explained. At least this could be said for King James when he came into the House of Commons; he took control of the chair and threw the Speaker out of it. He did not skulk behind the chair, and that is more than a suggestion of what has gone on around this place.

An hon. Member: What king did you say?

Mr. Nowlan: King James; but you have a better knowledge of history than I and perhaps it was Charles, at any rate one of the Stuarts. It was three hundred years ago. I can understand why the minister would be a better authority than I am because the government is repeating the same procedure that was carried on in those days. He probably made a study of the technique that was used, but I say at least the Stuarts took over the chair. I have even heard the remark that once in this house when the chairman was refusing to "see" an hon. member, some hon. member was so exasperated he may have gone up and twisted the chairman's head around and said, "Now can you see him?" But at any rate neither he nor the Stuart king skulked behind the chair.

At any rate, there were those events of black Friday for which there has been no explanation. We all know that Mr. Speaker was under tremendous difficulty. We know he was tired. We know he had been sitting in that chair under a terriffic strain. We recognize all those things, and the same would apply of course to his assistants, the deputy and the deputy chairman. However, that does not explain what happened; that cannot explain this reversal which took place on Friday morning.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the Minister of Finance talk about his great qualities, his experience, his personality, none of which is denied. This makes it all the more difficult to understand why he acted the way he did on Friday morning. A less experienced man, one who had made many mistakes before, one who was not conversant with the rules, one who was not a thorough gentleman, could have been expected to crack up under the pressure of some of the things which were done. It is because of that complete reversal, because of this background that suggestions, call them innuendoes if you like, have been made deliberately in the press as to what has gone on; and yet no explanation has been given.

It is a good thing, Mr. Speaker, to have this motion before us. We regret the necessity for it, but it was time it was dealt with. It had to be dealt with. Parliament could not continue, and how it is going to continue I do not know. A while ago the Minister of Finance said he hoped that after this was disposed of personal friendships could be restored. I hope so too. Personal friendships are something which we all value. One of the great traditions of our parliamentary system is that we do not allow the acrimony of debate on public matters to interfere with personal relationships and personal friendships. But personal friendships be as they may, the fact remains that parliament cannot carry on unless there is implicit confidence in the Chair, its impartiality and its independence of the executive. This confidence has gone. I say with all the seriousness which I can command, Mr. Speaker, that confidence cannot be restored in this parliament. There is only one way.

Someone suggested a while ago, and I thought it was another innuendo, that perhaps we were bringing this on to force an election. We are certainly not bringing this on to force an election. There are other ways if we wanted to do that which could perhaps be explored. I do say that although this certainly was not brought on with any such intention, the root problem will not be solved until after an election, until after a new government and a new house have come back and new officials have been elected. Then perhaps we can start to rebuild and repair the damage which was done during the last few days.

As has been said by so many others more effectively than I can say it, it is not a matter of the ruling on Friday; it is not the special damage which may have been done to one party or the assistance which may have been given to another, serious as those things may be, but the fact that these are part of the precedents of the House of Commons. They have become part of the fabric and will become interwoven into our parliamentary procedure.

They cannot be allowed to exist in that way, Mr. Speaker. Something will have to be done under a new parliament to eradicate these things and restore the prestige of the Chair. It is for that reason we feel as strongly as we do, and why I am speaking on this motion tonight. It is parliament, the institution which we have revered, which we respect and which the thousands of people who were lining up trying to get into the galleries revered and respected as well. It is indeed woven into the warp and woof of our being, and damage has been done to it—I was going to say almost irreparable damage. It is irreparable under the existing circumstances. I think it can be rectified in time, but it is a matter which must be dealt with by this house.

A partisan vote may be necessary. I quite appreciate, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway said this afternoon, that may be the result. I have no illusions, either, as to the result of this vote, but it will be recorded in Hansard that the opposition has stood up and protected what it sincerely believed to be the rights of parliament. The opposition has gone further than any one individual would have gone to preserve those rights, and that will probably be the most healthy precedent of all which will come out of this turmoil and trouble of the past few weeks.

Mr. Harris: I rise on a question of personal privilege. I was engaged with my officials on some matters which may come before the house later, and I was absent when the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings was speaking. I understand he made some reference to a newspaper article that had to do with the passing of notes, and inquired as to why I had not already mentioned the matter.

Mr. Nowlan: I said I expected you would have dealt with the matter this afternoon.

Mr. Harris: I did not because up to that time no one had mentioned it or taken the responsibility of speaking on the point or making any assertion that there was any truth whatever in the statement. That is why I did not mention it this afternoon.

I wish to point out that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar did rise on a point of personal privilege with respect to this other article the other day. That was because he was quoted in the article. Nothing in this article quotes me, but I shall read it for the benefit of hon. members and make an explanation.

Mr. Nowlan: Just so there will not be any misunderstanding, the Minister of Finance is quoting from a different article. I quoted from Norman Smith.

Mr. Harris: I have not read Norman Smith's article.

Mr. Nowlan: That is the article I quoted from.

Mr. Harris: I have no doubt it applies to the same thing—

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, while no one will question the right of the minister to rise on a question that relates to real privilege, he certainly cannot rise in regard to a quotation from one editorial and then start to read another. If he has any comment to make about the one that was read, that certainly could be a question of privilege; but most certainly there can be no question of privilege relating to that which would make it permissible to read some other editorial.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that the editorial complained of makes reference to my exchange of—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Order. Just before the Minister of Finance continues, in order to know where we are at this particular point of privilege, I think we have had to state several times in the last few weeks that where a member wished to contest a reference to himself made during a speech, he had the right to do that as a matter of personal explanation following the speech. I think that is admitted. Should this turn out to be a different question of privilege from the one arising out of the speech of the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings, then of course it would be brought up on the orders of the day. I would gather from what has been said that it does refer to the same incident; therefore I think, under our recently established practice of personal explanation at the end of a speech, that this is the time for the Minister of Finance to do it.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, my understanding is—I regret that I cannot express it perhaps correctly because I did not hear what the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings actually said—that there is a statement that I exchanged notes with the chairman, and there is a reference to an occasion when I spoke to my colleague the Minister of National Revenue.

Let me speak about that for one moment. I noticed that Mr. Speaker appeared to be, shall I say, distraught or ill at ease. I spoke to my medical colleague and suggested to him it might be desirable to find out whether Mr. Speaker needed any medical attention. That was all I did that day with respect to my colleague, and whether or not he sent anything to Mr. Speaker under those circumstances I do not know.

With respect to the chairman of the committee, let me point out that I spoke to the chairman of the committee after I had been informed by those who inquired how or under what circumstances this report could have arisen, and I was informed by him that it is his courtesy to notify whips of parties that they have a speaker coming up in a few moments, or something of that nature; that it had been done all during that day and that the reporter must have seen this happen, and that the thing being sent by the chairman of the committee was one of those notes. I received no note whatever from the chairman, nor did I send any to him. Nothing that is in the newspaper I read has any basis of fact in so far as my making communication of that kind is concerned.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, on a further question of privilege, I want to corroborate what the Minister of Finance has said. I ordered the cheapest prescription in the world, a glass of water. I think it was Christ who said, "a glass of water in my name shall not go unrewarded."

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, let me trace the history of the motion that has been under discussion tonight in order to put the record straight in some aspects of the distortions that have been made of the proceedings. You will recall, sir, that when I rose on a question of privilege I was instructed by Mr. Speaker that it would be necessary for me to follow a certain procedure if I wished to pursue the matter. He outlined that procedure to me and I followed it. It included the drafting of a motion, the finding of an hon. member to second it, and sending the motion to the Speaker in the chair.

There has been the suggestion here this evening that Mr. Speaker was in doubt at that time as to whether the motion was in order; that he had in fact almost decided on the Thursday night that on Friday he would have to rule it out of order. I can well understand why my hon. friends in the cabinet should wish to convey that impression; but I suggest to you, sir, that it is a continuation of the cruel and callous treatment which that cabinet has meted out to the Speaker of this house. It is a determination that he shall be made the goat all the way down.

I am going to quote from page 4532 of Hansard to show that Mr. Speaker not only had no doubt that it was in order but so indicated to the house at that time, because he interrupted the Leader of the Opposition when he was speaking with these words:

> Order. I intervene at this moment to indicate to the Leader of the Opposition that in debating this matter one cannot go beyond what is considered privilege. In this article which I have just read it is my view that what may be called privilege in the letter written by Miss Marjorie Le Lacheur is the last paragraph:
> "It means nothing to them that debate in the house has long been a farce, with the cat-calls and jeers of the Liberals, and the systematic garroting of the opposition by Mr. Speaker . . ."
>
> These are the words:
>
> ". . . and the systematic garroting of the opposition by Mr. Speaker, making a mockery of this democracy for which so many of their fathers have died."
> The words that are privilege are "the systematic garroting of the opposition by Mr. Speaker". All the other words are not privilege.

Then the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar raised the question at that point as to whether the narrowing of the points of privilege suggested by the Speaker was in fact correct and suggested that it was more or less an attack on the whole house. Following that, Mr. Speaker reiterated his position and in the paragraph the Minister of Finance did not read this afternoon Mr. Speaker said this:

> I am under the impression—and I am sure the hon. member upon reflection will agree with me—that, freedom of the press being what it is, freedom of expression outside this parliament and the right of criticising whatever takes place here being what it is, no one on a question of privilege should object to the first two paragraphs and, even in the third paragraph, no one should object to anything if there were not those few words, in which the Speaker is accused of a systematic garroting of the opposition. As far as the other paragraphs are concerned, I see no privilege at all in them.

Now, there is the clear statement of the Speaker of this house that he recognized that my motion was in order the night before, and any contention now on the part of members of the cabinet that he had already half made up his mind to rule it out of order is a gross distortion of Mr. Speaker's expressed views on the evening of Thursday, May 31. When he ruled it out of order on Friday, June 1, he did not actually rule on the question as to whether or not my motion was in order. I had brought a motion before the house. Mr. Speaker ruled not whether my motion was in order but whether the charges contained in the motion were sustainable. When he reversed his decision of the night before I was faced with the question as to what had induced him to do so, and I could think of only three alternatives.

The first was that my motion was actually out of order, that Mr. Speaker had been mistaken, that his knowledge and understanding of the rules of procedure had not been adequate to make a decision as to whether or not my motion was in order. After all that has been said on all sides of the house both this afternoon and on previous occasions when this matter has been discussed, no hon. member will seriously contend that the Speaker of this house is not competent to decide whether or not a motion is in order. We have had very lengthy eulogies concerning his vast fund of knowledge of parliamentary procedure. It has been stated that with the possible exception of one Speaker our present Speaker stands head and shoulders above the usual speakers of the Canadian House of Commons in possessing an exhaustive knowledge of the rules of procedure.

I think we have to throw that suggestion out. Mr. Speaker at that time knew this motion was in order; he was not just guessing, he knew it and he expressed to the house, as I have shown quite clearly, his reasons for thinking it was in order.

That brings me to my next possible alternative for his extraordinary action on the morning of Friday, June 1; and that is that Mr. Speaker maliciously and deliberately gave me wrong advice with the intention of ruling it out of order at a later date. That also is a proposition to which I cannot subscribe; it goes against all the past record of Mr. Speaker. Not only that, it cannot be sustained when one places it alongside Mr. Speaker's reactions not only on this occasion but on a previous occasion when I raised a similar question of privilege with regard to an editorial appearing in a Montreal newspaper. On both those occasions Mr. Speaker expressed himself as gravely concerned over the seriousness of these situations. In fact when the much publicized attempt of the Minister of Finance to raise a point of order on this particular motion was brought to the attention of the house Mr. Speaker had this to say:

> The matter raised by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Cameron) is one of privilege and is one that is very serious. I had not seen the letter entitled "They Will Pay" but I had read the letter written by Mr. Eugene Forsey, in which he discusses instances in which I was myself involved. It would seem to me, however, that in a matter of this kind the thing to do, after having placed ourselves in a position where we can deal with the matter, especially since I am concerned, is to postpone the consideration of that motion.

Now it is true he suggested postponement of it, but he also referred to our having placed ourselves in a position where we could do something about it. The reference very clearly is to a motion which he considered to be in order. No, sir; I cannot believe that the Speaker deliberately and maliciously gave me faulty advice in order later to be able to rule the motion out of order. It was a matter he took too seriously to play ducks and drakes with on any cynical basis of that sort.

Now, we have to seek for some other reason. The only reason that comes to my mind, Mr. Speaker, is that in those fateful hours between 10 o'clock on the night of May 31 and 11 o'clock on the morning of June 1 the Speaker of this house must have been subjected to persuasion, to pressure, to evil counsel of some sort to persuade him to declare out of order a motion which he himself had accepted, had helped to draft, and which he had indicated was definitely in order.

It is not possible, of course, Mr. Speaker, for us to know who can have given that advice; but that such advice must have been given is I think incontrovertible. And while we cannot know who gave that advice we do know of people in a position to give that advice, and we do know of people to whom the implementation of such advice would have been of great advantage.

Mr. Pearson: That is the way Senator McCarthy talks.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I am not coming to McCarthy at all; I am coming to a few other things. The Speaker of the Canadian House of Commons occupies a precarious position of eminence from which at the end of the life of parliament he has to step down. There are a number of positions of dignity and honour, positions in which he can hope to find further opportunities for public service. All those positions are within the power of the government of the day to grant or to withhold.

It has been suggested that Mr. Speaker proceeded to reverse a mistake he had made. I submit, sir, that if that is true with regard to other actions he took on that occasion, the action of listening to the point of order of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, it is distinctly not the case with regard to this motion, because if you will recall he handled the two situations in an entirely different manner. His decision with regard to my motion was not included as a part of the mistake he sought to rectify by placing a proposition before this house. It is an entirely different action. He took the action of ruling it out of order. Somewhere, at some time, he was persuaded that his action of the night before in accepting and helping to draft my motion had been out of order. Somehow he was persuaded that the motion itself was out of order.

I find it difficult to believe, sir, that among his colleagues on the other side of the house the Speaker of the House of Commons found someone more versed in the procedure of this chamber than himself, in the light of the fact that with the rather doubtful exception of the Minister of Finance no member of the cabinet has risen through all this time to oppose the points of order raised from the opposition. This would lead me and I think anyone else to the conclusion that there is not anyone on the other side of the house now capable of disputing the points of order raised from this side.

I see that the Minister of Finance laughs. If by his laughter he means that he or others are so capable, then I say it was a contemptible thing for the government of the day to allow the Speaker of this house to deal by himself with the points of order that were raised continually from this side of the house, to place him in the impossible position not of being the judge as between two opposing sides but having to take up the arguments presented by one side. I am still of the opinion, sir, that there is not anyone on that side of the house sufficiently versed in procedure to be able to give valid and honest advice to the Speaker of this house to cause him to reverse a considered decision that he had made.

I have been puzzled, as have many other hon. members of this house, by the strange procedural activities of this government during the whole presentation of the pipe-lines bill to the house. I have wondered why they apparently took great thought to select the most difficult ways in which to get this measure through. The first sample, of course, was when quite out of order they placed a second resolution on the order paper while one dealing with the same subject was already there. That was a totally unnecessary proceeding. I recall that at that time the government received advice from my hon. friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre as to how they could emerge from the difficulty they had themselves created.

I suggest to you that we have to look further for a solution to this strange problem, and it is a strange problem, a strange problem of a government so inept that it is unable to get its measures through the House of Commons within the accepted rules of this house. I would suggest to you that perhaps an explanation can be found in the constitution of the present administration. I think it is no accident that the government that has involved itself in a most fantastic tangle of procedure, that has been driven in the course of that tangle to utterly destroy the most notable Speaker this house has seen for decades. It is not an accident that many of the members of that administration have stepped right into cabinet positions without any experience in parliamentary life.

I would suggest to you that this has been the root cause of the trouble through which we have been going the last few years, and the last few days in particular. When one looks at the front treasury benches he finds that with two exceptions no minister has sat on the floor of this house as a private member, and no minister at all has sat on the floor of this house as a member in opposition. This creates a very grave situation for parliament. I am not attempting to deny that eminent university presidents, distinguished corporation lawyers and higher civil servants are men of great ability. They are possibly of greater ability than other men who could be found within the membership of the Liberal party; but their abilities were not the abilities of parliamentarians because there is only one place in which a man can qualify for this difficult business of parliamentary life, and that is in the ranks of parliament itself.

I would suggest that this growing habit on the part of this administration of bringing in from outside the ranks of parliament cabinet ministers without parliamentary experience is destroying the very roots of parliament. This institution has several functions to perform. It is not merely an institution for the passing of legislation by the existing government, it is the developing ground for competent parliamentary leadership.

When we have a party—and I address this to the rank and file of the Liberal party—which has acquiesced in this practice, it has been acquiescing in the degradation of parliament because these men, eminent as they are, lack one thing. They are men who have not, like the Minister of Finance and like the Minister of National Health and Welfare, been prepared in their earlier years to take the grave risks involved in embarking upon a political career. On the other hand, they have sought their eminence in other fields and later come to crown it with political eminence. That is a most dangerous precedent and practice for parliament to follow, when parliament should be composed of ordinary men and women representing ordinary men and women throughout the nation.

[Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo).]

From the ranks of the membership must come those men who have developed their capacities and their abilities to use the procedures and rules of parliament in order to effect their policies. I can understand that the minister of external affairs may perhaps feel badly about my comments, but I want to say to him that the very qualities which made him a valuable servant of the people in the civil service are not qualities that make him valuable in the House of Commons when it comes to dealing with difficult parliamentary situations. He never had to face them during his earlier career.

It will not be until we get back to the original purposes of parliament, to the original proceedings and traditions of parliament, that we shall avoid the sort of tragic mess into which we got last week. I think it is a damning indictment of a government with an overwhelming majority that it should have been unable to devise means of using the regular procedures of this house to effect the passage of their legislation. It is an admission of total ineptitude and failure as leaders of the Canadian parliament that they had to take recourse to breaches of the rules which have led to this unhappy debate during these last two days. It is particularly tragic that a man who had earned not only the respect of this parliament but the respect of the nation should have been made the victim of the ineptitude of this government, and ineptitude it was, as I think every member of it now recognizes in his secret heart.

I would suggest that there is no solution to be found in the mere passing or rejection of the motion before us. As the Minister of Finance has said, when it comes to a vote the matter will be decided on party lines and the vote will mean nothing. A vote will not in any way obliterate the sad fact that a large minority in this house has had its confidence in the impartiality of the Chair destroyed by the ineptitude and folly of the present administration.

I notice that some members of the cabinet are so little seized of the seriousness of the crime they have committed as to smile smugly about this situation. It is nothing to smile about, it is something that has to be cleared up. I am not making any empty suggestion when I suggest to the Prime Minister that he has something to retrieve. I am not alone in my view that he has failed sadly this parliament and this country in these last strenuous and trying days.

I imagine he has read the newspapers. I imagine he realizes that the people of Canada are disappointed that they had hoped he could master the art of using parliamentary procedures, that they hoped he could retain control of the democratic processes of this country. I suggest to him that, having failed to do so, there is only one course open to him, the course of appealing to the people and allowing them to judge. I say this in no boastful way at all. I am not at all sure that I would come back here after another election; far from it. I think it is quite possible that I might be left at home, but I would rather be left at home than continue in the unhappy situation in which we are today.

Despite the words that have been said on this side of the house in, I think, all sincerity that this situation is not going to be allowed to interfere with the personal friendships that have been developed here, I am afraid that is a too optimistic point of view and that it is going to take a long time for the resentments, the rancours and the disillusionments that have been created over the last week or so to finally disappear. The first and essential step for clearing the air is that the twenty-second parliament of Canada should come to an end at the earliest possible moment.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that whatever may have happened in the house during the past few days we will all agree that the discussion of this particular motion has been approached by every hon. member almost throughout in a spirit at least of seemingly objective manner. I paid particular attention to the speech delivered tonight by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I followed with interest the speech just delivered by the hon. member for Nanaimo and the speech of the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings, but I paid special attention to the speech of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

He began his remarks by saying that this discussion of the motion before the house caused him to have a heavy heart. I am sure he used a phrase that most hon. gentlemen could, with justification repeat. He reminded us that there was no friendship in this house that he cherished as much as his friendship with Mr. Speaker. He told us that there was never a Speaker in this house whose industry was as great, that there never was a Speaker with knowledge of our procedures and the procedures of free parliaments over the course of the centuries as great, as precise and as mature.

Then he said that he hoped that his friendship with the Speaker would be maintained and would continue. Only a man who was lacking in the elements of civility would deny that that was a legitimate hope. I too hope that the friendship which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre had with Mr. Speaker will be maintained, for I suppose that no one in the whole time I have been a member of the House of Commons, now almost 21 years, has enjoyed in his relations in this house as great a measure of cordial relationship with the presiding officer as the member for Winnipeg North Centre. On many occasions his enthusiasm with respect to his interest in the rules of the house would cause him, not improperly, after the Speaker's ruling had been made, to go to the Speaker's chair and presumably in a spirit of academic interest, which is understandable, discuss with Mr. Speaker the wisdom or lack of wisdom in a particular decision. The hon. gentleman himself and only he has the control over whether or not the friendship of which he has spoken tonight shall be maintained.

The hon. member went on then and said, and I use his words, that no one will deny that Mr. Speaker has done a good job. Then he raised his voice and said with emotion: "No one ever in my time in this house has done a better job." Then he went on and pointed out that he had corrected the Minister of Finance, that there had only been two appeals from Mr. Speaker's rulings and that on one occasion the party which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre supports had, if I understood him correctly, refused to join in voting against the Speaker's ruling. Then my hon. friend concluded, "No wonder I say that Mr. Speaker has had in this house a remarkable performance."

I calculated by the clock the time that my hon. friend spent on Mr. Speaker's admirable qualities. In over two-thirds of the time he spoke the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said more things by way of confirmation of the validity of the performance of the Speaker than any other member, and we can only conclude from what he has said that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, up until a very few days ago, was firmly of the view that within his experience this house has had no better Speaker.

On motion of Mr. Martin the debate was adjourned.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

DIABETES STATISTICS

Question No. 495—Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace):

1. By provinces, how many sufferers from diabetes are there in Canada?
2. How many of these are hospitalized?
3. Is the government currently engaged in any activities designed directly to assist Canadian diabetics?
4. If so, of what nature?
5. Are any further measures to assist Canadian diabetics currently under consideration?
6. If so, of what nature?

Answer by: Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare):

1. There is no accurate gauge of the number of diabetics in Canada. According to preliminary estimates based on Canada's sickness survey, population basis 13,000,000, there are about 40,000 known diabetics; however, medical experience has shown that for every reported case, there are about three unreported cases.

2. There are approximately 8,500 hospital admissions per year in Canada of patients requiring treatment for diabetes.

3. Yes.

4. Federal assistance totalling more than $65,000 has been provided under the national health program to support research and surveys on the detection of diabetes. Research in diabetic problems is being supported at present at the University of Western Ontario and at Queen's University.

The Food and Drugs Act provides that all insulin preparations must meet the standards set forth in the food and drug regulations. In addition, the conditions under which these preparations are manufactured are constantly reviewed by the food and drug inspectors. The regulations also provide for specific labelling requirements to prevent confusion regarding the potency and the use of each preparation.

The advertisement to the general public of any preparation for the prevention or treatment of diabetes is prohibited by the act, thus preventing the exposure of diabetics to useless or harmful preparations.

The food and drug regulations also require informative labelling of special food products sold for persons on sugar-restricted diets.

5 and 6. The Department of National Health and Welfare will continue to give the most careful consideration to any projects designed to assist Canadian diabetics when submitted by the provinces under the national health program.

URBAN AIR POLLUTION

Question No. 520—Mr. Richardson:

Is the Department of National Health and Welfare taking any part in the solution of the urban air pollution problem?

Answer by: Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare):

1. Yes. The Department of National Health and Welfare has assisted the international joint commission for several years in the investigation of the problem of air pollution in the Windsor-Detroit area in accordance with the terms of the reference of January, 1949, between Canada and the United States. A two-year epidemiological study of sickness experience of selected groups of the population in high and low pollution areas of Windsor, and in small country towns of southern Ontario, was carried out from 1953 to 1955. Other aspects of this investigation of the urban air pollution problem have dealt with the nature and concentration of contaminants in the environment, the influence of meteorological factors, the problem of smoke emission from great lakes vessel traffic on the Detroit river and its control, and the effects on vegetation. A final report on the above reference is being prepared this year.

Since January 1, 1956, this department has also undertaken certain responsibilities in this field with the appointment of a consultant, atmospheric pollution services, who is also the chairman of the Canadian section of a technical advisory board to the international joint commission. Requests for advisory services from the provinces and other governmental agencies have been coming forward on an increasing scale. The following is an outline of these activities:

(a) The pollution of the air from oil refinery operations involving the emission of toxic substances such as hydrogen sulphide, mercaptans, phenols, and other odoriferous compounds.

(b) The control of emissions of fluorides, oxides of nitrogen and sulphur dioxide from contemplated operations of a new phosphate fertilizer and nitrochemical plant.

(c) The analysis and control of diesel exhaust gas fumes from engine-operated equipment in underground and mining operations.

(d) At the request of the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada a complete revision has been undertaken of regulations and orders dealing with control of atmospheric pollution from railroad operations of companies subject to the legislative authority of the parliament of Canada.

The epidemiological and occupational health divisions of the Department of National Health and Welfare are collaborating in a study of atmospheric pollution levels and their possible effects on the health of aged hospital patients in the Ottawa area.

The laboratory services of the occupational health division are conducting laboratory research directed towards the study of the biological effects of various toxic gases and aerosols, including the effects of substances found in contaminated urban atmospheres. The laboratory services have also studied for several years the problem of atmospheric pollution from gold refining operations in the Yellowknife area.

Consideration is being given to the possibility of the establishment of a national network of sampling stations for the measurement of atmospheric contamination levels in urban areas of Canada in co-operation with provincial departments of health, municipal air pollution control officials and certain federal departments.

APPENDIX

GATT—ANNOUNCEMENT OF RESULTS OF GENEVA CONFERENCE

The Department of External Affairs announced today details of the tariff agreements which were negotiated under the general agreement on tariffs and trade at the recently concluded conference in Geneva. The head of the Canadian delegation, Mr. L. D. Wilgress, signed on behalf of Canada on May 23 the protocol of supplementary concessions to the GATT in which are incorporated the complete schedules of all the tariff concessions negotiated at the conference. Details of the agreements were tabled in the House of Commons this morning.

The tariff conference, which opened in January, 1956, and was recently concluded at Geneva, constitutes the fourth general round of multilateral tariff negotiations under the general agreement on tariffs and trade, following similar GATT conferences held at Geneva in 1947, at Annecy in 1949 and at Torquay in 1951. Twenty-two countries participated in these latest negotiations, and the new agreements concluded among them are an extension of the agreements drawn up among GATT countries in the previous years. As in the past, the negotiations were carried on between pairs or groups of countries, on a selective product by product basis.

Canada negotiated new agreements with the United States and with 12 other countries in Europe and Latin America. Under the most favoured nation principle, which is basic to the GATT, all tariff concessions agreed to at Geneva will become available to Canada whether or not these concessions were negotiated directly with Canada. Similarly, Canada will automatically extend its own tariff concessions to each of the other participating countries, and to non-GATT countries with which Canada has most favoured nation agreements.

The complete schedules of all tariff concessions negotiated at this conference are being made public today. They are incorporated in a protocol of supplementary concessions to the GATT signed by representatives of participating countries at Geneva. Mr. L. D. Wilgress, Canadian ambassador to NATO, signed this protocol on behalf of Canada on May 23.

The new tariff concessions will come into effect in the various countries on dates to be announced by each government. It is not expected that any country will bring its concessions into effect until June 30 at the earliest. United States concessions will be implemented in three stages over the next two years, as required by United States legislation. Under the terms of the GATT, all the concessions agreed upon are bound against increase, subject to certain procedures permitting countries to renegotiate particular concessions from time to time.

The following review indicates the main concessions secured by Canada and the main concessions granted by Canada as a result of these negotiations. For further details, inquiries should be addressed to the international trade relations branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce with respect to the tariffs of other countries, and to the international economic relations division of the Department of Finance with respect to the Canadian tariff.

Concessions Obtained by Canada

The United States

The United States concluded agreements at this conference with Canada and all the other participating countries, and granted concessions over a wide range of goods. The agreement concluded between Canada and the United States was one of the major single agreements resulting from this conference.

The United States conducted these negotiations under the authority of its trade agreements legislation, which permits maximum reductions in the United States tariff of about 15 per cent of the rates of duty in force on January 1, 1955. Under United States legislation, these reductions must be implemented in three approximately equal steps of about 5 per cent of present rates, with an intervening period of 12 months between each stage. The first 5 per cent stage of United States duty reductions will be made effective on June 30, 1956. Within these limitations, Canada secured the maximum possible reductions in United States duties over a large number of products. Concessions were obtained on almost all the items of interest to Canada on which the United States was prepared to negotiate. The delay in the complete implementation of United States concessions was taken fully into account by both countries in arriving at a satisfactory balance of concessions.

The United States schedule of concessions resulting from this conference contains some 650 tariff items, of which approximately 150 are of interest to Canadian exporters, and represent imports into the United States from Canada totalling over $200 million in 1954. These concessions include items of interest to Canadian producers and manufacturers in various regions of Canada.

The United States list of concessions includes a variety of chemical products, such as synthetic rubber, vinyl acetate, vanillin, barytes and a number of chemical compounds; a number of metals, including crude aluminum and its alloys, aluminum bars and sheets, steel ingots and billets, ferro-silicon; a few agricultural products, such as lettuce, turnips, hay, blueberries; some paper products, such as book and printing paper, wrapping paper and hanging paper; a number of more highly processed products, such as manufactures of aluminum, of iron and steel, of wood, and of glass, various types of machinery and electrical goods.

Details of the main items of interest to Canada, showing the present United States rates of duty and the final United States negotiated rates of duty which will be in force at the end of two years, are given below. A table showing the three stages of reduction for all items of interest to Canada is being published by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

In this group are concessions on: Paint brush handles, and broom and mop handles, from 10 per cent to 8½ per cent; canoes and paddles, from 10 per cent to 8½ per cent, furniture, from 12½ per cent to 10½ per cent; parts of furniture, from 20 per cent to 17 per cent; doors, from 16⅔ per cent to 15 per cent.

per cent; boots and shoes, made by welt process, from 40 cents pr. to 34 cents pr.; laminated sheets of synthetic resin, from 12½ per cent and 7½ cents lb. to 10½ per cent and 6¼ cents lb.; piano parts, from 20 per cent to 17 per cent; and mud dispersant derived from coniferous bark, from 10 per cent to 8½ per cent.

Europe

Canada concluded new agreements with the following European countries: Austria, Belgium, the Netherlands, Luxembourg, Denmark, Germany, Italy, Norway and Sweden. Extensive tariff concessions had already been obtained from these countries in previous negotiations under the GATT. However, as a result of the latest negotiations, many further concessions of interest to Canadian exporters have been granted by these countries.

While direct negotiations between Canada and European countries were not extensive, Canada will also benefit from concessions which these countries granted to the other European countries participating at this conference including the United Kingdom, and to the United States. Moreover, Canada did not negotiate with Finland, France and Turkey, but some of the concessions which these countries negotiated with others are also of interest to Canada.

In a few cases, the concessions made in European tariffs are reductions in statutory rates of duty which have been temporarily reduced by administrative action. Such concessions ensure that the lower rates resulting from the negotiations will be the maximum applicable rates. It should also be noted that many of the concessions of interest to Canada are on products or in countries where discriminatory restrictions have been removed.

A summary of the more significant European concessions is given below.

Austria

Austria was authorized by the contracting parties to the GATT to conduct its negotiations on the basis of a new draft tariff which is awaiting approval by the Austrian government. While rates of duty previously bound under the GATT continue in force under this new tariff, increased duties are scheduled on many items which are not bound. The negotiations thus offered an opportunity for obtaining reductions from this higher level.

Canada obtained a reduction on whisky, from the draft tariff rate of 3,500 schillings per 100 kilos to a rate of 2,450 schillings per 100 kilos. This reduction brings the bound rate on Canadian whisky to the level of the rate on bourbon whisky which the United States had negotiated with Austria in the course of GATT tariff renegotiations in 1955.

Other Austrian concessions of interest to Canada include a reduction in the duty on sheer nylon dress and lingerie fabrics from 35 per cent with a minimum of 14,000 schillings per 100 kilos to 32 per cent with a minimum of 11,000 schillings per 100 kilos; and a reduction on bookkeeping and calculating machines from 1,400 to 1,000 schillings per 100 kilos. The duty-free entry of tallow for technical purposes was bound.

Benelux

The common customs tariff of Belgium, the Netherlands and Luxembourg is not high and many leading Canadian exports to these countries are bound under the GATT either duty free or at low levels of duty. Nevertheless the negotiations provided a useful opportunity for obtaining concessions which are of interest to Canada. The three Benelux countries offer a substantially open market for Canadian goods, free from exchange and import restrictions.

The following are among the more important concessions, from the Canadian point of view. While lumber is admitted into the Benelux countries duty free on a temporary basis, the existing legal duty on larger sizes of coniferous lumber was reduced from 10 per cent to 3 per cent, which is also the rate of duty for standard sizes. The duty on a narrow range of odd sizes of coniferous lumber was reduced from 10 per cent to 5 per cent. The legal rate of duty on canned salmon was reduced from 20 per cent to 15 per cent; the existing duty on wood alcohol for the production of formaldehyde was reduced from 18 per cent to 12 per cent, on spark plugs from 12 per cent to 10 per cent and on parts of calculating and bookkeeping machines from 8 per cent to 6 per cent. Reductions were also granted in the duty on frozen tongues of bovine animals and pork, kraft paper, pressure cooking stoves of copper, loud speakers and microphones for telegraphy and telephony, and on organs. The existing duties were bound against an increase on crude rapeseed oil, on salted and pickled horse meat, and on some grades of paper and paperboard.

Denmark

Concessions on most of Canadian principal exports to Denmark had been obtained at earlier GATT conferences. Duty-free entry is bound on many of these items, while the duties on some others are bound at low levels. At the present conference, the duty-free entry of flax seed was bound and the duty on spark plugs was reduced from 0·10 krone to 0·05 krone per kilo. Canadian exports of these products to Denmark increased considerably following removal of import restrictions last year.

Among other concessions of interest to Canada, the duty on canned peaches was reduced from 0·65 krone to 0·55 krone per kilo, and the existing duties were bound on planks and boards of Douglas fir and on radio navigation apparatus.

Finland

Canada did not negotiate directly with Finland. However, in its agreements with other countries, Finland granted some concessions which are of interest to Canada, including the elimination of the existing duty of 9 marks per kilo on mineral and vegetable blacks, a reduction in the duty on thin aluminum foil from 150 marks to 75 marks per kilo, and the binding of duty-free entry on rubber substitutes and on certain machines for the pulp and paper industry.

France

At the previous GATT conferences concessions had been negotiated by France on about two-thirds of the items in the French customs tariff. Among the products on which new concessions have been granted are the following: aluminum hydroxide bound against increase at 15 per cent ad valorem; lecithin, reduced from 20 per cent to 18 per cent; patent leather, reduced from 17 per cent to 15 per cent; and certain types of sewing machines, reduced from 12 per cent to 11 per cent ad valorem.

Germany

Germany granted concessions on a wide range of products. The concessions of primary interest to Canada include reductions in the duty on whisky, from 375 marks to 325 marks and from 575 marks to 525 marks per 100 kilos respectively depending on the size of the containers; a binding on canned salmon at 20 per cent and a reduction on canned lobster from 30 per cent to 20 per cent; an elimination of the 8 per cent duty on unbleached sulphate pulp and a reduction on bleached sulphate pulp from 10 per cent to 5 per cent; a reduction on ferro-silicon of high silicon content from 12 per cent to 11 per cent; a reduction on radio control and radio navigational aid equipment from 15 per cent to 12 per cent; and a reduction on polyvinyl chloride resins from 25 per cent to 21 per cent in three annual stages.

Duty reductions were also granted in the duties on fresh and frozen eels, kraft paper and paperboard and domestic electric washing machines. Statutory duties were reduced to the level of temporary reduced rates on small outboard motors, tires and tubes for motor vehicles, unwrought magnesium, calculating machines, typewriters and cash registers, and on metal-working machine tools. The existing duty on polystyrene was bound.

Italy

The negotiations resulted in concessions by Italy covering approximately 20 per cent of Canadian exports to that country in 1955. A number of the products on which concessions were obtained have been freed from restrictions.

Italy eliminated the statutory duty of 8 per cent on salted cod, which has been admitted duty free on a temporary basis. Similarly, the duty free entry of chemical wood pulp was bound, from a previous statutory rate of 6 per cent. The 10 per cent duty on flax seed and the 3 per cent duty on crude cobalt were eliminated. Reductions were granted on planks and boards of Douglas fir from 10 per cent to 6 per cent, on outboard motors from 35 per cent to 27 per cent and 25 per cent respectively depending on their cylinder volume, and on forklift trucks from 35 per cent to 32 per cent.

Reductions to the level of the temporary duties were obtained on prepared moulding and drawing powders of polystyrene and of similar plastics; on spades, shovels, hoes and similar tools; on calculating machines, automatic electric toasters and on burners operated by gas. The statutory duty on canned salmon was reduced from 25 per cent to 14 per cent. In addition, reductions were granted on certain iron and steel items imported from countries not belonging to the European coal and steel community, including Canada, within an annual quota.

Norway

The duty-free entry granted by Norway on many important Canadian products was bound at earlier GATT negotiations. At this conference, Canada obtained new concessions on a number of products. Reductions in duty were obtained on nylon fishing nets, from 25 per cent ad valorem with a minimum of 10 kroner per kilo, to one-fifth of this level, 5 per cent with a minimum of 2 kroner per kilo; and on synthetic rubber, from 30 per cent to a maximum statutory rate of 10 per cent.

Reductions were also obtained in the duty on canned salmon, from 0·30 krone to 0·25 krone per kilogram, on cotton duck, unworked cellophane, canned peaches, and on certain machines for the paper-making industry. The duty-free entry of pneumatic spade hammers and rammers was bound, and the existing duties were bound against increase on red clover seed, patent leather, certain grades of upper leather and on fork-lift trucks.

Sweden

Sweden granted concessions on various items of interest to Canada, many of which have been freed from import restrictions. Duty-free entry was bound on natural aluminum oxide, which alone accounted for 15 per cent of all Canadian exports to Sweden in 1955. The duty on raw beaver skins was reduced from 15 per cent ad valorem plus 350 kronor per 100 kilos to 5 per cent ad valorem. The duty of 150 kronor per 100 kilos on raw muskrat, racoon and skunk skins was eliminated. Reductions were also made in the duties on phtalic acid and anhydride; developed motion picture film; dressed fur skins of beaver, chinchilla, mink and fox; motor vehicle tires; machine felt containing up to 20 per cent of continuous synthetic fibres; screw taps and dies; darning, sewing, and knitting machine needles; certain gasoline engines; radio receiving sets and factory trucks. Duty-free entry was bound also on planks and boards of Douglas fir and on nickel anodes. The existing 10 per cent duty was bound on certain machines for the paper-making industry and for mining. On whisky, the former bound rate of 200 kronor per 100 litres was reduced to the existing level of duty at 135 kronor per 100 litres.

Turkey

Commodities of interest to Canada on which the rates of duty will be reduced by Turkey include calculating machines and cash registers, from 15 per cent to 5 per cent; typewriters, from 10 per cent to 5 per cent; refrigerators and refrigerating equipment; and office furniture of metal.

Latin America

Canada concluded new agreements at this conference with Cuba, the Dominican Republic and Haiti. Successful negotiations had taken place with these countries at previous GATT conferences, and the new agreements are necessarily somewhat limited. It should be noted that these three Caribbean countries provide open dollar markets, without import or exchange restrictions affecting Canadian goods. Canada will also benefit from concessions granted by Chile and Peru in their negotiations with other countries.

Cuba

A number of useful concessions were obtained by Canada as a result of these negotiations. Duties on five commodities of interest to Canada will be reduced to the same level as the duties applicable to the United States under the preferential tariff treatment which Cuba grants to the United States of America exclusively. These reductions are on copper tubing or pipe, from 5·11 to 3·90 pesos per 100 kilogs; aluminum sheets, not corrugated, undulated or grooved, from 4·00 to 3·25 pesos per 100 kilogs; phosphorus, from 5 to 3·5 centavos per kilog; linseed oil, from 50 to 40 centavos per 100 kilogs; and sewing machines, from 5 to 4 per cent ad valorem. Some of these reduced rates were previously in effect but were not bound under GATT. In addition to the above concessions, the most-favoured-nation rates on refrigerators and electric ventilators will be lowered correspondingly with reductions made in the preferential rates to the United States on these products.

Dominican Republic

A wide variety of commodities have been included among the consessions granted by the Dominican Republic. Among these the following are of interest to Canadian exporters: Aluminum ingots reduced from 10 to 8 pesos per 100 kilogs; typewriters, calculating machines and cash registers, from 20 to 18 per cent ad valorem; mimeographs, dictating machines, and addressographs, from 20 to 18 per cent ad valorem; electricity and water meters, bound duty-free; passenger car and bicycle tires, reduced from 25 to 22 per cent ad valorem; synthetic resin and other plastics in original solid state, from 15 to 13·5 centavos per kilog; plastic toys, bound against increase at 1·20 pesos per kilog.

Haiti

Canada will benefit from several new concessions supplementing those previously negotiated with Haiti at Annecy and Torquay. The duty on dried fish and shellfish other than codfish has been bound against increase at 0·33 gourde per kilog or, if higher, 20 per cent ad valorem. Other concessions of interest to Canada include: electric refrigerators and air conditioners reduced from 10 to 5 per cent ad valorem; typewriters, dictaphones and mimeographs, from 20 to 15 per cent ad valorem; cash registers and calculating machines from 20 to 15 per cent ad valorem; oat cereals reduced from 0·25 to 0·15 gourde per kilog or, if higher, from 20 to 15 per cent ad valorem; canned soups from 0·35 to 0·25 gourde per kilog or, if higher, from 20 to 15 per cent ad valorem.

Peru

A few concessions granted by Peru are of interest to Canada among which are the following: rubber water hose over 8 cms. in diameter bound against increase at 0·10 sol per kilog; water wheels and turbines, bound at 0·03 sol per kilog. There is also a customs surtax in the Peruvian tariff applicable to all items which, in the case of the above products, is also bound against increase at 12½ per cent ad valorem.

Chile

Negotiations concluded by Chile with other countries resulted in a number of concessions of which the following are of interest to Canada: leaf tobacco reduced from 6 to 4 gold pesos per kilog; cash registers and automatic vending apparatus reduced from 2·80 to 2·40 gold pesos per kilog; sodium phosphate bound against increase at 0·35 gold pesos per kilog; ferro-nickel and ferro-chrome alloys in bars, bound against increase at 0·15 gold pesos per kilog.

Japan

Canada did not negotiate with Japan at this conference, since negotiations between the two countries had taken place in 1955 at the time of Japanese accession to the GATT. However, Japan concluded new agreements with other countries and granted concessions on a number of items of interest to Canadian exporters.

Reductions in Japanese rates of duty of interest to Canada will apply to the following commodities: vegetable soups and juices, from 20 per cent to 17 per cent; synthetic resins of vinyl chloride and vinyl acetate series, from 30 per cent and 22½ per cent to 20 per cent; antibiotics and preparations thereof, from 17½ per cent to 17 per cent; containers of paper and cardboard excluding bags, from 15 per cent to 13 per cent; peaches and pears canned or bottled, from 30 per cent to 27 per cent; varnishes, from 22½ per cent to 20 per cent; insulated cable and wire for electricity, from 20 per cent to 18 per cent.

Items on which the rate of duty will be bound against increase include: whisky; polyethylene; polystyrene; pressure gauges; internal combustion engines; paper and pulp mill machinery; cream separators; electric refrigerators.

United Kingdom: Modifications in Preferences

Canada did not negotiate with the United Kingdom. However, a number of tariff preferences accorded by each country to the other will be modified to some extent as a result of agreements which Canada and the United Kingdom concluded with other countries. The changes are not significant in total and, in general, the cuts are not very deep. Some margins of preference will be narrowed and there are also instances of reductions in the preferential rates of duty. Changes in preferences in the Canadian tariff are indicated in a separate section.

GATT—Tariff Revisions

Modifications in the United Kingdom tariff of interest to Canada include the following: Printing paper, a reduction in the MFN rate of duty from 20 per cent to 16⅔ per cent, with imports from the commonwealth remaining duty free. Kraft paper and most machine-glazed papers, a reduction in the MFN rate from 16⅔ per cent to 14 per cent, with imports from the commonwealth remaining duty free. On a range of miscellaneous machinery and parts, a reduction in the MFN rate from 20 per cent to 17½ per cent, with imports from the commonwealth remaining duty free. Motor vehicles and various classes of accessories and component parts, a reduction in the MFN rate from 33⅓ per cent to 30 per cent, and a reduction in the preferential rate accorded commonwealth products from 22⅔ per cent to 20 per cent. Artificial silk yarn, a reduction in the MFN rate from 9d. plus 22½ per cent ad valorem to 9d. plus 20 per cent, with imports from the commonwealth accorded, as formerly, a preferential rate of five-sixths of the MFN rate. Papermakers' felts containing artificial silk, a reduction in the MFN rate from 25 per cent to 15 per cent, and a reduction in the preferential rate accorded commonwealth products from 20⅚ per cent to 12½ per cent. Artificial silk dresses, a reduction in the duty applicable to all countries from 30 per cent to 27½ per cent, the alternative specific rate of 6s.9d.1b. (chargeable when higher than the ad valorem rate) to be replaced by a rate of 9s.1b.

Tariff Concessions Granted by Canada

The tariff concessions made by Canada at the 1956 Geneva tariff conference cover 180 items or sub-items in the Canadian customs tariff. Of these, 115 are reductions in the present MFN tariff and 55 are bindings of the existing rates of duty, of which many had been lowered unilaterally by Canada since the last tariff conference. For five items Canada undertook not to raise duties above certain specified rates higher than those actually in effect, but which in all five cases are lower than the rates previously agreed to under the GATT. The remaining five items are reductions in the British preferential tariff, concurrent with reductions in the MFN tariff. Canada's concessions are shown in schedule V to the protocol of supplementary concessions. This schedule consists of part I covering the MFN tariff, and part II covering the preferential tariff. These concessions will not come into effect immediately, but will be implemented at appropriate times having regard to the implementation by other countries of their concessions to Canada. The Canadian concessions to each country will be brought into effect in one step.

Canada's total imports during the calendar year 1955 from all countries under the 115 items or sub-items on which the MFN tariff was reduced at Geneva amounted to $91,000,000. Canada's total imports during 1955 from all countries under the 60 items which were bound but not reduced amounted to $88,000,000.

Part II of schedule V contains five items, which provide for reductions in preferential rates of duty on certain goods on which the most favoured nation rate is also being reduced. During 1955 Canadian imports from British commonwealth countries of goods covered by these preferential reductions in part II were valued at $450,000.

The reductions in the most favoured nation tariff cover a wide range of products such as:—textile machinery, orange juice, lettuce, newsprint, shelled oysters, shrimps, beer, spectacle frames, cigars, sawmill machinery, adding machines, cash registers, road building machines, electrical precision apparatus (such as is used in oil refineries and chemical works), cameras, and tobacco pipes. Details regarding these and other important most favoured nation tariff reductions are given below.

The most favoured nation rates on certain types of machinery were reduced, but all were of a class or kind not made in Canada, namely, textile machinery, Item 413, from 5 per cent to free; leather working machinery, item 420, from 7½ per cent to 5 per cent; certain road building machinery and earth moving machinery, item 422a, from 10 per cent to 7½ per cent; specialized types of electrical precision apparatus, meters, gauges, etc., items ex. 445k and 445n, from 22½ per cent and 15 per cent respectively, to 7½ per cent.

The most favoured nation rate on newsprint, item ex. 197, was reduced from 22½ per cent to free; ponderosa pine lumber and California sugarpine lumber, item ex. 505, from 10 per cent to 5 per cent; white oak lumber, item ex. 505, and Douglas fir lumber, item ex. 505, from 10 per cent to 7½ per cent.

The most favoured nation rate on orange juice, item 152(b) was reduced from 10 per cent to 7½ per cent; edible offal of beef and veal, item 7(b), from 1½ cents per pound but not less than 7½ per cent to 1¼ cents per pound but not less than 6 per cent; hay, item 69b, from $1.25 per ton to $1.06 per ton; white clover seed (both ladino and white Dutch), item ex. 71b, from 2 cents per pound to 1 cent per pound; bent grass seed, item 72e, from 15 per cent to 7½ per cent; the seasonal duty on lettuce was reduced from 1 cent per pound to 85 cents per pound; tomato paste, item 89 ex. (c), from 2 cents per pound to 1½ cents per pound; eviscerated turkeys item ex. 9, from 12½ per cent to 12½ per cent but not less than 5 cents per pound and not more than 10 cents per pound; cigar tobacco unstemmed, item 142(b) ex. (i), from 15 cents per pound to 12½ cents per pound, and cigar tobacco stemmed, item 142(b) ex. (ii), from 22½ cents per pound to 20 cents per pound.

The most favoured nation rate on cobalt metal, item ex. 208t and ex. 711, was reduced from 20 per cent to 10 per cent; on copper beryllium alloys, dutiable under various items, were reduced to 7½ per cent; manufacturers of lead, item 339, from 27½ per cent to 25 per cent; coin locks of bronze, item 352c, from 35 per cent to 30 per cent; retarder for plaster, classified under item ex. 220a and item ex. 711, from 20 per cent to 10 per cent; rough building stone, item 305, from 12½ per cent to 10 per cent.

The most favoured nation rate of fire engines, item 424, was reduced from 22½ per cent to 20 per cent; fish hooks for non-commercial fishing, item ex. 440j, from 15 per cent to 10 per cent; open pleasure boats, item ex. 440a, from 25 per cent to 20 per cent; guns and rifles of a class or kind not made in Canada, item 441e, from 10 per cent to 7½ per cent; cameras of a class or kind not made in Canada, item 462(ii)(a), from 17½ per cent to 15 per cent; slide projectors, item 463, from 20 per cent to 15 per cent; spectacle frames, item 328, from 17½ per cent to 15 per cent; cigars valued at more than $6 per pound, item ex. 143, from $1.75 per pound plus 15 per cent to $1.50 per pound plus 10 per cent; beer in casks, item 146, from 35 cents per gallon to 15 cents per gallon and beer in bottles, item 147, from 50 cents per gallon to 15 cents per gallon.

The most favoured nation rate on oysters, prepared or preserved, item 123 ex. (c) was reduced from 22½ per cent to 15 per cent; oysters shelled and frozen, item ex. 133, from 17½ per cent to free; shelled oysters in bulk and in cans, items 124, 125, 126 and 127, from various rates to free. Shrimps, presently dutiable at various rates, reduced to 10 per cent.

The most favoured nation rate on cash registers, item ex. 519(a)(2) was reduced from 25 per cent to 22½ per cent; cash register parts, item 519b, from 15 per cent to 12½ per cent; adding machines, item 414d, from 17½ per cent to 15 per cent; adding machine parts, item 414e, from 15 per cent to 12½ per cent.

Since GATT negotiations relate only to the most favoured nation tariff, there was no occasion to negotiate rates of duty under the British preferential tariff. Of course some margins of preference in the Canadian tariff as well as in the tariffs of other commonwealth countries were reduced in the course of negotiations with non-commonwealth countries. Of the items in which Canada reduced margins of preference those which covered the largest volume of trade were orange juice, electrical precision apparatus and textile machinery. The great bulk of Canadian imports of these products in 1955 were from non-commonwealth sources.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, June 8, 1956

The house met at eleven o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INTERIM SUPPLY—SUGGESTED COURSE OF ACTION

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish at this time to make a brief statement and a suggestion about the business of the house and the business of the country. I want to suggest to all hon. members, and particularly to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) and the leaders of the other parties opposite, that we should consider carefully whether it might not be possible to reach agreement on a course of action to meet a serious aspect of the situation now facing this house. I would ask the leaders opposite not to give me an immediate answer but to consider what I am about to say and to let me know before the house meets on Monday whether they would be agreeable to following the course I am going to suggest.

All hon. members are, of course, aware that the interim supply voted to defray the cost of administering the affairs of this country since April 1 is virtually exhausted and that, unless additional money to carry on the administration is voted at an early date, many thousands of people in this country will be faced with inconvenience and even serious embarrassment. It seems to me that all our fellow citizens do expect this parliament to conduct the nation's business in such a fashion that party warfare, which is inseparable from our form of government, does not result in unnecessary inconvenience and hardship to the people of Canada whom we are all here to serve.

In other sessions it has been usual at this stage for the government to ask for and for the opposition to agree to the voting of one month's interim supply in order to permit the administration of the affairs of the country to be carried on while the work of the session continues. To do so now would not deprive members of the opposition of the means of continuing their opposition to the government. There are many contentious items on the order paper about which it would be possible for hon. gentlemen opposite who wish to do so to oppose the government as strongly as they feel they would be justified in doing. I would, therefore, hope sincerely that it might be possible for the parties opposite to accept this suggestion I am making that we should proceed on Monday by agreement to the granting of interim supply for one month in the usual way.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): This statement sounds very plausible but is in keeping with the manner in which I regret to say the Prime Minister has put forward certain other suggestions within the past few days. What should be remembered is that this house does not yet know what the plans of the government are in regard to the continuance of this session. What would ordinarily be regarded as sources extremely close to the government have been stating it is the intention of the government to adjourn within a short time. If an adjournment is to take place, it presents an entirely different situation than that with which we would ordinarily be confronted.

Before we speak of other matters, I should think that the government would be only accepting its responsibilities to the house, all of which form a part of the general responsibilities of parliament, in telling us what it is the intention of the government to do. The Prime Minister has said that it seems all our people expect us to conduct our affairs in a way that will not cause disadvantage to the people of Canada. I would point out that it has been the custom to bring down interim supply before the earlier supply had come to an end. This is now June 8, and supply came to an end on May 31. I regret to say that this is only in keeping with the manner in which much of the business of the house is done, that we should be asked to vote interim supply at a time when the supply has already expired.

Naturally we will be ready at any time to consider any proposals, but since the Prime Minister has seen fit, and that of course is his right, to make this statement in the house before it has been communicated to me as Leader of the Opposition or to the leaders of the other parties, I believe it is appropriate to reply also in the house and to say that before suggestions are made as to the way in which business should be done in regard to the details now before us, it would be most appropriate if the government would inform us as to whether it intends to continue this session without interruption until our business is completed or whether it is intended to adjourn the house. This would have a very definite bearing upon the voting of interim supply without any examination of the details now before us.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish merely to say on behalf of this group that even as we have been giving all these matters serious consideration for many days, we shall continue to give serious consideration to the situation that now confronts not only this country and the house but the government. Like the Leader of the Opposition we feel that before we are asked for an answer more information should be given to us than has been indicated by the Prime Minister this morning.

So far as this issue is concerned, I would remind the Prime Minister and the government that several days before the end of May I began to ask the Minister of Finance questions regarding interim supply. I made it clear that we were conscious of the fact that interim supply was running out and that in our view the normal course was for the government to bring down interim supply before the date that the money already on hand had run out.

However, Mr. Speaker, at this point I merely wish to indicate that, as we have been doing, we will continue to give consideration to the situation.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, we will be prepared to give careful consideration to what the Prime Minister has suggested. At the moment I see no relationship whatsoever between the need to have interim supply for the period of one month and the future plans of the government with regard to adjournment or to any possible adjournment. They need the money; the bills have to be paid. We have never yet taken more than a couple of hours at any time, so far as I can remember, to vote as much as two months' supply. However, so far as we are concerned we shall be prepared to join with others in giving careful consideration to the Prime Minister's suggestion and on Monday we shall let him know exactly what we decide.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that it is not possible at the present time to announce, or even to make, any plans for the future course of this session. This matter of interim supply is one of immediate urgency and I would hope that it would be considered in that aspect and as a routine matter that could be dealt with in the usual way.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish in any way to engage in a debate on this subject but I would point out that it is now June 8, and if there is any foundation whatsoever for the statements that are appearing in the press that it is the intention of the government to adjourn before the end of June, that is now known to the government. To say that the government is not in a position to inform the house as to what its intentions are is straining the credulity of the members of this house rather severely.

The point I wish to make is this. We certainly have no desire to see anyone suffer as the result of the failure of the government to conduct its business in the ordinary way. Nevertheless, the government has seen fit not to follow the ordinary course by delaying the introduction of supply until some time after it would ordinarily come before the house. The extent to which it would be appropriate for us to facilitate the discussion of this subject depends on many things—and certainly we are as anxious as the government is that there should be no inconvenience to any Canadian because of proceedings here—but the fact is that we should know before we give an answer of that kind whether it is the intention of the government to adjourn the house and in that way postpone all consideration of the estimates where it will be possible for us actually to examine the business of the people of Canada. Obviously, that creates an entirely different situation. If we are to proceed without interruption to deal with the estimates such as those of national defence and other departments which are large spending departments and of extreme importance, or if on the other hand there is to be a deferment until a date when the major part of the expenditure will already have taken place, or have been committed for the remainder of the year, I do think the Prime Minister should be in a position to tell us the intention of the government with regard to adjournment. I cannot believe there are any uncertainties at the present time which would make it impossible for the Prime Minister to give that information to the house which at this stage of the session he should be able to give.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, it had been the intention of the government to suggest that there be an adjournment over the summer months. Now, what has taken place is of such a character that we shall have to reconsider whether or not it would be possible to make that suggestion to the house with any hope that it would meet with the approval of the house.

Mr. Drew: Then, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister to give consideration to that matter before we meet to discuss the manner in which the business to which he has referred will be proceeded with.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MR. DREW—MOTION OF NON-CONFIDENCE IN PRESIDING OFFICER OF THE HOUSE

The house resumed, from Thursday, June 7, consideration of the motion of Mr. Drew:

In view of the unprecedented action of Mr. Speaker in (a) improperly reversing his own decision without notice and without giving any opportunity for discussion; (b) repeatedly refusing to allow members to address the house on occasions when the rules provide that they have the right to be heard; (c) subordinating the rights of the house to the will of the government, this house resolves that it no longer has any confidence in its presiding officer.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I believe that the house would generally agree that my paraphrasing of the observations of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) clearly establishes his high regard for the Speaker as a man and particularly, because it is more relevant in this context, his great confidence in the particular role which he has in this house, and that that confidence prevailed, as far as the hon. member is concerned, up until a point somewhere between ten o'clock on Thursday, May 31, and the 1st of June. That was not, however, the view of the hon. gentleman who leads the party which my hon. friend supports, for the leader of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation said at page 4650 of the current Hansard that what he had heard in the pipe line debate was evidence of what he called partisan rulings and the Leader of the Opposition in his carefully and moderately uttered statement observed that there had been rumblings about the quality of the Speaker long before the pipe line debate began; sometime, presumably, during the course of the recent winter. It is clear, however, that as far as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was concerned his alleged confidence was shaken only at the time I have indicated. He has said that the Speaker did not act independently.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have always understood that argument by assertion is not in fact argument at all. For one hon. member to say that the Speaker did not act independently is not in any way to establish with any justification that he did not in fact act independently. I can understand my hon. friend saying that perhaps of others with whom he did not enjoy the same measure of acknowledged and avowed intimacy and the cordial relationship which he had with the Speaker, the man who was his friend up until that period of May 31.

Mr. Knowles: June 1.

Mr. Martin: June 1. This is what Mr. Speaker said at page 4539 of the current Hansard about whether or not he had acted independently:

I want to tell hon. members that I know what my responsibilities are and that I am fully conscious of every step that I am taking.

Then he went on:

I am prepared to take responsibility before this house and the country for what I do.

The Speaker says he has acted independently and if my hon. friend really means to establish, as I know he does, his regard for the Speaker, this great friendship which has prevailed up until the very last moment, then I do not know what canon of fairness would suggest to my hon. friend to make an assertion that the Speaker did not in this matter act independently. Are we to have guilt by association, accusation by insinuation, and slander by smear, particularly of one's friend, the man who holds the highest office in the gift of this house?

I noticed that when the Prime Minister was speaking the other day the leader of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation applauded the Prime Minister's observation that all or most of us in this house have regard for His Honour the Speaker. The leader of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation applauded that remark. I am at a loss to understand that kind of gesture. If the Speaker of this house was deserving of the implications of this motion, supported by the hon. members I have mentioned, I do not know how they can say that they have regard for the Speaker.

Mr. Gladstone once said when he was bitterly attacked that he did not want the friendship and the fulsome praise of his opponents who had branded his remarks as not capable of measuring up to the truth. I will not carry on the logical implication that flows from this reference to Mr. Gladstone, but it surely on reflection must apply to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who I believe is sincere when he says that he has friendship for the Speaker. Not in any part of his speech, which I read three times since it was delivered last night; not in any place has there been any kind of evidence by which one friend would judge another friend to be guilty of impropriety.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) has presented us with a motion. He did not go as far as the hon. member for Winnipeg

North Centre, but I think his motion deserves to be read at this time. It reads:

> In view of the unprecedented action of Mr. Speaker in (a) improperly reversing his own decision without notice and without giving any opportunity for discussion; (b) repeatedly refusing to allow members to address the house on occasions when the rules provide that they have the right to be heard; (c) subordinating the rights of the house to the will of the government, this house resolves that it no longer has any confidence in its presiding officer.

Mr. Speaker, the very wording of that resolution without any supporting speeches is justification for not accepting the motion at all. Assuming that the Speaker did not give notice and did reverse his own decision, does that constitute a basis for a motion of censure? Supposing the Speaker did refuse to allow members on occasion to speak on points on which they felt they had a right to be heard, is that justification for a motion of censure?

I do not agree that the Speaker reversed himself, but I am prepared to argue that even if he had, at best he could be accused or charged with an error of judgment, with misinterpretation of the rules. But in the absence of intention to be malicious and mischievous he certainly does not under our practice in this house or in the British House of Commons warrant the accusation and implication involved in a motion of censure. He clearly did not reverse himself. At page 4531 of Hansard of May 31 the Speaker is reported as having said:

> It would seem to me, however, that in a matter of this kind the thing to do, after having placed ourselves in a position where we can deal with the matter, especially since I am concerned, is to postpone the consideration of that motion.

I am trying to save time, and I quote now from page 4532, where the Speaker continues as follows:

> —I am not going to object; I am just going to let them go right ahead, but at one stage of the proceedings I want to say that I will have to be heard.

Then at page 4539 the Speaker made his ruling. He said:

> I am prepared to take the responsibility before this house and the country for what I do . . . Today we meet; I make a ruling.

There is nothing to suggest, as this motion suggests, that the Speaker had in any way reversed a decision which he had taken the night before.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Martin: Provided that the Speaker allows me the time taken for it.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Will you give the ruling that refers to my motion, not the one that refers to the other?

[Mr. Martin.]

Mr. Martin: If my hon. friend will put his finger on it—

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Page 4537.

Mr. Martin: I shall come to that at the end of my statement. I have read the speech of the Leader of the Opposition and I think it was, having in mind the context of the preceding days, an admirable example of restraint, but let any member of this house read every word of that speech and he will not find one accusation against the Speaker that would justify our resorting to what Mr. Herbert Morrison has called the rarely used technique of challenging in a fundamental position the authority of the Speaker.

There was never any suggestion by the Leader of the Opposition that the Speaker had not acted independently; he had reversed his decision; he had refused to listen to members who raised points of order; and on that account—and on that account alone—he deserved to be censured by this house. I do not believe that anyone can argue that it is the obligation of the Speaker to permit, or that he is allowed to permit, a debate on a point of order. When the Speaker does permit members to speak to a point of order, they appear before him as amici curiae, friends of the court, but not debating a proposition, with no right to debate the question. If that is the case, how can the Leader of the Opposition suggest that the Speaker at any time refused to permit hon. members to speak?

Even if he had refused them to speak, are we bound only by the letter of our rules? Do we not, in the conduct of any democratic proceeding, in this country or in the western world, recognize that the presiding officer has the right at any time, where the rules do not precisely cover a situation, to use his discretion as to what in the best interests of all concerned is the proper, orderly way in which to proceed? Surely the Speaker must be allowed that kind of discretion.

Mr. Knowles: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Martin: Let me finish this point. I have carefully examined the record during the night, and not one reference have I been able to find where within the rules of this house any hon. member was denied the opportunity of speaking when, as I say, within the rules he had that undoubted right. Even if he had that right, I say that the Speaker, in the context of the situation that confronted us the other day, had the right inherent in his office of presiding over our proceedings in a manner that would direct us out of chaos into orderly processes.

Mr. Knowles: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Martin: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: Whether or not a Speaker is called upon to allow debate on points of order, will the minister not recognize that, according to citation 110 of Beauchesne's third edition, the raising of a point of order is in order by any member at any time? It is there in citation 110 of Beauchesne's third edition, but that right was refused several times.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend makes that point, and I am prepared to say this. Even if what he says were true, I would say that this is not a justification for taking the man who holds the highest office in the house of this free parliament and subjecting him to all that flows from a vote of censure. That is what I say. I find that perhaps no one has stated the situation more effectively than has the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch). I want to remind the house of some of the observations he made before I come to a point that I regard as being extremely important. He had been referring to the background of the controversy—and I use that phrase in order to be as objective as possible in my presentation—one that undoubtedly taxed the patience and ingenuity of the Speaker. Here is what the hon. member for Acadia said as reported at page 4653 of Hansard:

> In my opinion the Speaker has always been lenient in listening to advice on points of order and unfortunately instead of appreciating that the opposition has abused it.

Those are the words of the hon. member for Acadia, not mine. Then he goes on to quote the first part of the resolution as follows:

> In view of the unprecedented action of Mr. Speaker in (a) improperly reversing his own decision without notice and without giving any opportunity for discussion;—

Then the hon. member for Acadia continues as follows:

> We in this group are of the opinion that on Thursday the Speaker did make a mistake in rendering his decision regarding the point brought up by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Cameron). If that situation had been left as it was then it would have created a precedent that would have brought chaos into this house in the future. It would have meant that at any time any hon. member in this house disliked legislation the government sought to introduce and wanted to obstruct it, all he would have to do would be to get a friend of his to write a letter to the press and then bring it up, as did the hon. member for Nanaimo, and we would have obstruction without end because every time a letter is written to the press it could then be raised as a point of privilege in this house, and there would be no end to those points of privilege.

Mr. Speaker, is not that the true assessment of this whole situation? The Speaker was confronted with an unusual situation. There is nothing in our rules which says that, in regard to that kind of a situation, the Speaker cannot use his own discretion as to the best conceivable way of bringing about order. If he had not taken the step that he took, we would not have had whatever degree of order later followed and continued. This statement of the hon. member for Acadia perhaps represented only his own assessment of the situation. He may possibly not have known that he was expressing a view that is not only within our tradition but is part and parcel of the very rules which we operate here and under which parliament operates in the United Kingdom. I was not aware of that fact until early this morning when I took off my library shelf a book written by Herbert Morrison, entitled "Government and Parliament". At page 200 I find this reference which I will read. He was speaking about discussion, private members' rights, closure and so on; the actual title of the chapter is "The Closure". At page 202 he said this:

> For example, although there had been talk about the need to expedite business by curtailing private members' rights, it was only in the panic which followed the successful Irish obstruction in the 1880's that the house parted with its long preserved liberties. One of the most far-reaching of these reforms was the closure (that is to say, the motion 'That the question be now put'). It was first used by Mr. Speaker Brand, on 2 February 1881, who, in the course of a long debate and considerable obstruction, decided to put the question without further debate. He made a dignified statement saying that he considered that a crisis had arisen in parliamentary procedure and that the tedious discussions were against the general sense of the house.

That is the important thing—"against the general sense of the house". The quotation contains:

> He ended by saying that further measure for ensuring orderly debate must be left to the judgment of the house, meaning either that the government must take responsibility by bringing forward appropriate orders or that the house itself must find ways and means of solving the problem.

That is the commentary of Mr. Morrison who spoke for his party on procedural matters in the House of Commons during the years from 1945 to 1951 and who wrote this admirable book which includes many references to procedural questions. After much difficulty and with the help of the librarian I recovered the parliamentary debates that were in the hands of one hon. member opposite, and I refer the house to what Mr. Speaker Brand said in 1881 as recorded in Hansard for that year. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre knows, Mr. Speaker Brand was one of the great Speakers of all time, whose decisions are constantly referred to. He has been referred to by Mr. Churchill as the kind of man who furnishes the standards by which he who presides over our proceedings shall be judged. Mr. Gladstone in 1882 moved closure because of the circumstances that attended the debate on the Irish bill in 1880 and 1881.

Mr. Knowles: How long had the debate been going on?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin: I will come to that. But Mr. Speaker Brand, confronted with a situation for which there was no provision in the rules for the remedial action which he might take, had to give consideration as to whether or not the sense of the house—the sense of the situation, the desirabilities in the matter which every man under our system, even though it may not be written, clearly understands is proper on occasion to have applied. What did he say? Here is what Mr. Speaker said on that occasion. It is the kind of thing that the hon. member for Acadia envisaged in his own excellent observation. Mr. Speaker Brand,—and this is before the closure—with no justification by anything embodied in the rules of parliament, was acting as I say in appreciation of what he felt was the sense of the situation, just as our Mr. Speaker acted, I submit, last Friday in accordance with what he thought, in his best judgment, honestly conceived, was the sense of the situation. I will at once endow hon. members opposite with the right to take issue with this statement of mine, but in the absence of being able to establish that the Speaker did not act honourably, this motion has not the slightest justification for presentation in this house. Here is what Mr. Speaker Brand said:

> A crisis has thus arisen which demands the prompt interposition of the Chair, and of the House. The usual rules have proved powerless to ensure orderly and effective debate. An important measure, recommended in Her Majesty's Speech nearly a month since, and declared to be urgent, in the interests of the State, by a decisive majority, is being arrested by the action of an inconsiderable minority, the Members of which have resorted to those modes of "Obstruction", which have been recognized by the House as a Parliamentary offence.
> The dignity, the credit, and the authority of this House are seriously threatened, and it is necessary that they should be vindicated. Under the operation of the accustomed rules and methods of procedure, the Legislative Powers of the House are paralysed. A new and exceptional course is imperatively demanded: and I am satisfied that I shall best carry out the will of the House, and may rely upon its support, if I decline to call upon any more Members to speak, and at once proceed to put the Question from the Chair. I feel assured that the House will be prepared to exercise all its powers in giving effect to these proceedings.
> . . . I am satisfied that I shall best carry out the will of the House, and may rely upon its support, if I decline to call upon any more members to speak, and at once proceed to put the Question from the Chair.

If that is not the most classical justification for the decision taken by Mr. Speaker, the friend of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), his most cherished friend, the man who knows more about the rules of this house, it is said, than anyone else, then I do not understand the implications of the language of Mr. Speaker Brand.

Mr. Knowles: You have not yet told us how long that debate had gone on.

Mr. Martin: The Leader of the Opposition will remember the circumstances under which he himself, in 1947, urged in the Ontario legislature that the question be now put. That was an unusual procedure. The hon. gentleman, when he comes to speak, will tell me whether or not I am correct in saying that that procedure is not embodied in the rules of the Ontario legislature. There was some question about the authority taken by the Speaker, that is whether or not he was justified in the circumstances. I am sure that the Speaker of the day in the Ontario legislature, as the hon. gentleman, could make a strong argument for the course he had taken. In any event, those who opposed that course would not have had the justification of challenging the authority of the Speaker or saying that he had acted improperly or dishonourably.

There are three alternatives before us in this matter. We have said that none of us like this situation. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said that when he spoke. We have heard the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) say that this was an unfortunate matter to have to deal with. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) said he did not like it either. The leader of this government, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), proposed that the motion be withdrawn but the hon. member for Prince Albert said, speaking in the name of his party, he would not accept the Prime Minister's suggestion. What are the alternatives? The suggestion that an unnecessary election should be imposed at this time on the people would settle nothing. It would not settle this issue. This issue, under our traditions and under our rules, can only be settled in one place and by one group of men and that is by those of us who at this time constitute the House of Commons.

Mr. Herbert Morrison recognized that was the case, for at page 204 of his book on "Government and Parliament" he writes:

> Motions can be put on the order paper criticising or even censuring the conduct of the Speaker or his deputy (the chairman of ways and means) or the deputy chairman of ways and means. These may then be debated and may even be voted upon. Such occasions, fortunately, are very rare.

But they do happen, and on the occasions when they do happen the way that they are resolved is by the house concerned taking a decision as was taken in 1881 and in 1882 in Her Majesty's parliament in the United Kingdom. So, if we cannot have this problem resolved by the acceptance of one of these two alternatives I have mentioned, then what is shameful in this house being called upon to make a decision? Who is more competent than the members of this house who have watched Mr. Speaker operate over the past three and a half years? Are they not the ones who can best decide whether or not he deserves our continued confidence? Speaking as one member in this house, I have every confidence in Mr. Speaker. For three years he has discharged his responsibilities with honour, impartiality and maturity. I may say that I thought sometimes he permitted too much general discussion on points of order which in the final analysis he alone had to decide. But of course that is not a valid argument against him. It is in his favour as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said last night.

I see no justification but one for this motion that is before us at this time. It is one that I wish the Leader of the Opposition, who is an officer of this house and who holds a very responsible post just as the Prime Minister does, will see fit at some time to dispose of in a manner which will be in accord with our traditions and in accord with the dignity and the proper functioning of our deliberations. But that is not for me to say. I simply say, as one member of this house, that I have confidence in Mr. Speaker and I continue to have that confidence. I see no justification in this attempted censuring of a man who, admittedly on all sides, has acted so creditably throughout his speakership.

The Leader of the Opposition reminded us of what Mr. Speaker said when on November 12, 1953, he spoke to this house on assuming his high office. Mr. Speaker said, amongst other things:

> I shall, I assure you, strive to deserve your effective support, and endeavour at all times to prove myself worthy of your trust.

Is there any hon. member in this house who will divorce himself from the incidents of the past weeks or who will confront those incidents objectively who can authoritatively assert that the Speaker has not sincerely carried out his trust? What evidence exists anywhere for any suggestion to the contrary? If there is no evidence, mere innuendo, mere insinuation, is not worthy of any hon. member in this house. He is a man whose office is a symbol as well as the prop of the existence of this institution.

My final words are these. I am not misled by this resolution. It is not the Speaker who is the real target of this attack, it is the government.

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin: It is the government that is sought after by this motion by the hon. member who now says, "Hear, hear". It is not Mr. Speaker, it is the government.

Mr. Knowles: We are after the government for what you did to our Speaker.

Mr. Martin: In their eager desire to try to force on the people an unnecessary election which will not resolve this question, some of my hon. friends opposite care not, Samsonlike, if they pull down the Speaker's chair and the pillars of parliament along with it.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, even as the minister asked me a question the other night at the end of my speech, I am sure he will permit me to ask him one before he concludes. Is he not aware that it is precisely because of my regard for Mr. Speaker that what the government has done to him is so tragic?

Mr. Martin: I am glad the hon. gentleman has asked me this question because it clearly confirms what I said at the end of my speech, that it is not the Speaker whom hon. gentlemen opposite are challenging in this house, it is the government.

Mr. Knowles: For what the government has done to Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Martin: No matter what the government has done it is no justification for pulling down the reputation and the authority of the Speaker of the House of Commons.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Health and Welfare has just concluded an address in which I found it rather difficult to perceive any consistent argument. In concluding this speech he used a simile or metaphor in which he accused the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and, by inference, all the opposition of acting in a manner similar to that of Samson when he destroyed the temple by pulling down the pillars. If that simile has any application may I remind the minister and hon. members opposite that Samson's actions were brought about inevitably—the tragedy of Samson's actions was brought about—because he had been betrayed. He had been delivered into the hands of the iniquitous by Delilah.

Perhaps, there is some applicable simile here. The government has betrayed not only the Speaker but the House of Commons and parliament, and it was the government's betrayal of its responsibility and of its trust as equal custodians, with the others of us who sit here, of the rights of parliament, that had the result, if it has that result, of pulling the pillars and bringing the edifice crashing down. The responsibility rests with the government. But, sir, that is about the only part of the minister's speech that had any practical application to the situation now before us.

The minister tried to pretend—I will not say "tried to pretend"—the minister said that he somehow or other found this motion of censure almost repulsive, that there was something horrifying in the fact that it should have been moved. I can assure him and assure you, sir, if the assurance is necessary—I think indeed the statement has already been accepted by the Prime Minister and by the Minister of Finance—that the motion was not moved lightly, nor was it moved except after there had been some opportunity for mature consideration. It is true that we base the necessity for the motion on the fact that the government has produced the situation which gives rise to the motion. But let me remind the ministers, particularly the Minister of National Health and Welfare, that all during the time of this steady deterioration of the relationship between the house and the Speaker, all during the course of this debate when consistently and time and time again precedent piled upon precedent, what we sincerely regarded—and I submit shall be able to demonstrate—as incorrect rulings were given and incorrect actions were taken;—when those actions were protested to the Speaker, when we sought to bring the relationship back on an even keel and to remind the Speaker and the government of the rights and privileges which it is the duty of the Speaker to protect—nevertheless, instead of our course succeeding in restoring the balance, it resulted on at least two occasions, and I believe it may have been on three, in the Speaker virtually challenging us to move a motion of censure. The Minister of Finance shakes his head.

Mr. Harris: No.

Mr. Fulton: He will find absolute proof of what I say in Hansard.

Mr. Harris: I did not shake my head in either agreement or disagreement.

Mr. Fulton: I take it, then, that the minister accepts as a fact what I have said. It is a fact, as can be seen by consulting the record.

[Mr. Fulton.]

The Minister of Finance made a speech yesterday in which he, in effect, held out the olive branch and invited us to forget everything. He invited us, as it were, to say to ourselves, "Well, we moved this motion of censure in a fit of very strong emotion. Perhaps we were justified in moving it under the turmoil of the emotion then prevailing, but now that it is all over perhaps the best thing to do would be to withdraw the motion and to forget the situation which gave rise to it".

Mr. Harris: I never said that.

Mr. Fulton: The Minister of Finance says that he did not say that. I took it from his speech. I hope I am not being unfair. If he says that was not his intention I will accept it, but I do say—I am sure I am accurate here—that he hoped that when this was all over the old relationships would be resumed and that parliament would be able to carry on regardless of what had happened. Sir, I have some doubts as to whether that is possible. Certainly, all of us must try to carry on in the proper relationships that should prevail between government and opposition and to that end I certainly—and I am quite sure my colleagues will subscribe to this—shall try to do that. But I assure you, sir, that it is going to be extremely difficult because it is not going to be easy, indeed, it may not be possible, ever to wipe out the recollection of what was done to parliament by the government, and I do not see how it is going to be possible ever to restore the relationships to what they were before and to what it might be desirable to have them in this parliament, because the government that did that to parliament is the same government we still see here and will see here until this house is dissolved.

As I followed the Minister of Finance yesterday and as I read his speech in Hansard, I tried to understand the argument that he put forward to us, and I must confess that I have not been able to get any very clear interpretation of his argument. That may well be my fault. I know the minister is capable of putting forward a clear argument and does so on most occasions, even though we do not necessarily agree with him. On this occasion I find it difficult to draw out of his speech a clear argument as to what gave rise to the situation and what should be done about it. About the main argument I draw from his speech of yesterday is that under our system, with Speakers appointed and changed every parliament, it is difficult, if not impossible, to get an impartial Speaker and difficult, if not impossible, to achieve a situation where the Speaker's ruling would be viewed impartially.

Mr. Harris: I am afraid I did shake my head in negation of that one.

Mr. Fulton: The minister says he did not say that, but I refer him to two passages on page 4810 of Hansard, which certainly come very close to saying that. In the first he said:

> Let me ask hon. members opposite, is there any solution to dissatisfaction with a ruling of the Speaker except to put it to a vote of the house and to have a vote in which in all likelihood there would be a party division? So long as we have appeals that is bound to be the outcome in most cases.

Then he went on to say later on:

> When hon. members opposite in this particular matter express regret that we shall not be able to come to a conclusion except on what they think is a partisan vote, let me point out that since I came to parliament, and long before that, appeals with respect to the Speaker's rulings were decided in that particular way. Now, it surely is a matter for consideration that if that is the case, one wonders whether any useful purpose is served except to continue to remind the Speaker that there are members in the house who disagree with him, and nothing much beyond that.

It did seem to me—and I may be wrong but this is my interpretation of the main import of the minister's argument—he may say this is not what he intended, and, if so, I accept it—that under our system it is difficult if not impossible, to get impartial rulings and to get rulings accepted as impartial and regarded as impartial by members on different sides of the house. I do not accept that view but I take it to be the minister's.

Mr. Harris: That is not my view.

Mr. Fulton: Very well; the minister says that is not his view. I wish he would interpret his argument for us on some other occasion. But I do say that what he actually said, whether or not my view of his argument be correct, emphasizes the necessity of the government's being scrupulously careful in its relationship to the Speaker, being scrupulous not to place any burden on the Speaker which would make him less able to be impartial, not to enter into any relationship with him or to embark upon any course of conduct in the house that will make it difficult for the Speaker to be impartial. I submit, sir, that the government's course in the conduct of this debate particularly has not measured up to that standard of scrupulous conduct that is necessary.

The Minister of Finance did not deny yesterday having a meeting with the Speaker after ten o'clock on Thursday night. He denied the passing of a certain note but he did not deny—and I submit that no one over there can deny—that they made every effort and in fact suceeeded in the course of this debate in influencing the Speaker in the judgments and decisions and rulings he was about to give.

Mr. Harris: May I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, to deny at this point that I at any time influenced the Speaker in any manner whatsoever in the course of the debate.

Mr. Fulton: Well, sir, I shall come in a few moments to some representations concerning what was seen in this house both by members of the press gallery and by hon. members, and I shall state what I myself saw in connection with a certain incident in the course of the debate. Before I get to that, however, let me deal with another matter the Minister of Finance dealt with in the course of his remarks. He said we should not blame the Speaker because the government imposed closure. I quite agree and I take it that the implication of the minister's remarks is that he felt it was possible that we in a spell of poor judgment, shall I say, were in fact without realizing it taking out our anger and our concern by a motion of censure on the Speaker, our anger having been aroused by the fact that the government introduced closure. Let me assure him, sir, that is not the case, as I have already pointed out.

Let me then return to the minister's argument. I agree with him that one should not blame the Speaker because the government imposed closure. No; but I do say that when closure is applied then the Speaker must be more careful than ever, more concerned than ever, to preserve the rights of the minority, because closure is of course the most violent, the most tremendous imposition that can be made on the ordinary rights of the minority. It is a method which is provided under the rules of the house although its application in this case, I still maintain, was not in accordance with the rules of the house; nevertheless, it is a method provided for. However, when it is invoked then the Speaker, the protector and the ultimate custodian of the rights of the house, must be more careful than ever to see that those rules which protect the minority even under closure are scrupulously observed; and unfortunately, sir, instead of that happening we saw the contrary.

After the application of closure by the government we saw a steady deterioration in the regard of the Chair for the rights of the minority which had become so much more important by virtue of the application of closure, and we saw—and the minister must accept what I say—what we believe to be a deterioration in the regard and the care of the Speaker for those rights under the pressure of the government.

I regret to say, as a matter of fact, that in the course of this debate the Chair as a whole came into disrepute. We have one Speaker, it is true, but the Chair is shared by the three presiding officers—the Speaker, Deputy Speaker and deputy chairman—who normally rotate, and the pressure was such that in my view the Chair as a whole was brought into disrepute by the pressure applied by the government in the course of this debate, pressure applied as a result of its desire not only to invoke closure but to make closure as restrictive, and improperly restrictive, as it could possibly do.

There are three branches of the motion of censure before the house and I should like to deal with the central or middle branch first; that is, with the portion dealing with the action of Mr. Speaker in repeatedly refusing to allow members to address the house on occasions when the rules provide they have the right to be heard.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) said there is not a shred of evidence of the improper conduct which is alleged against the Speaker or against the Chair, but just previous to that he had dismissed one of the very substantial pieces of evidence that we had brought; that is, the disregarding of the rights of members with respect to points of order and questions of privilege. The minister dismissed that as irrelevant, saying that the Speaker may have refused to see an occasional member but after all the Speaker is the final judge. But disregard of the rules is what we are complaining about, and how can the minister say, in view of the actions of the Chair in refusing to hear points of order and questions of privilege, that we have not brought evidence to substantiate the motion?

I would remind you, sir, that under standing order 17, and by virtue of the provisions of citation 110 of Beauchesne's third edition, it is clearly provided that a question of privilege or a point of order must be taken into consideration whenever it is raised. That is what is stated: "must be taken into consideration,"—and yet what did we see? Repeatedly we saw members disregarded on points of order and questions of privilege. As a matter of fact, it went so far that on one occasion the chairman stated that he deliberately disregarded members who rose, deliberately ignored them. You will find that at page 4560 of Hansard, where the deputy chairman admitted that he had deliberately ignored members who rose on points of order and questions of privilege. Why did he deliberately ignore them? He ignored them in order that he might put the question desired by the government before its propriety could be brought into question. Now, if that is not serving the purposes of the government then I do not know the plain meaning of ordinary words; but that was done, notwithstanding the rule which made it an improper act on the part of the chairman.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member at one point mentioned the chairman and at another point mentioned the deputy chairman. My recollection is that I made no such statement. I wonder if the hon. member would clarify that for me?

Mr. Fulton: Yes. It is found at page 4560 of Hansard and it is made clear it was the deputy chairman who was concerned at that moment.

Mr. Pickersgill: I suppose the hon. gentleman would not be willing to permit a question?

Mr. Fulton: Yes, if it is short.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is very short.

Mr. Knowles: We would be glad to have a speech from the minister.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the hon. gentleman contend the standing order he referred to gives any member a right to rise on a point of order when the chairman himself has the floor?

Mr. Fulton: Well, Mr. Speaker, citation 110 reads:

> Points of order are questions raised with the view of calling attention to any departure from the standing orders or the customary modes of proceeding in debate or in the conduct of legislative business, and may be raised at any time by any member, whether he has previously spoken or not.

Now, sir, in order that I might deal with the question raised by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill) let me say that on the occasion to which I refer—and I know of other occasions—members rose before the chairman rose; practically simultaneously perhaps, but in my recollection, before the chairman rose. What is material, however, is what the chairman said. I am reading from page 4560:

> I was not unaware that one or more members were on their feet desiring to raise either points of order or questions of privilege, which I do not know. I did not hear them; I did not see them, let there be no doubt about that. I knew they were there but I did not officially recognize them. I consider that I was right in my action.
> Mr. Fulton: You deliberately ignored them.
>
> The Deputy Chairman: I did not officially recognize them. I consider—
>
> Mr. Fulton: Put it the straight way and say that you deliberately ignored them.
>
> The Deputy Chairman: If the hon. member prefers that expression I will not argue about it.
>
> Mr. Knowles: If the Chairman is accepting that as a statement of his position, that he deliberately ignored members, how can we continue on that basis?

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the hon. member permit one more question?

Mr. Fulton: I hope to be finished before the end of my 40 minutes, and perhaps the minister will therefore defer his remarks.

Let me now go back to the first branch of the motion of censure, that the Speaker improperly reversed his own decision without notice and without giving any opportunity for discussion.

Mr. Tucker: Does the hon. member suggest that these things can be raised during a division?

Mr. Fulton: I heard the hon. gentleman's question, but these points of order and questions of privilege were not raised in the course of a division. We did try to raise some of them but many of them were not raised in the course of a division.

The chairman and Mr. Speaker on many occasions simply refused to recognize us or to hear members who were raising points of order or questions of privilege which it was their right to do. That refusal on the part of the Chair was in direct contravention of the rules and precedents of this house.

I said I was coming back to the first part of our motion of censure, that the Speaker improperly reversed his own decision without notice and without giving any opportunity for discussion. Standing order 34—this is the sort of evidence which the Minister of National Health and Welfare asked for—reads as follows:

> Any member addressing the house, if called to order either by Mr. Speaker or on a point raised by another member, shall sit down while the point is being stated, after which he may explain.

On Friday morning, June 1, the Leader of the Opposition had the floor by virtue of standing order 7 and citation 216. The Speaker raised a point of order, which it was his right to do, but the effect of that point of order was to interrupt the speech of the Leader of the Opposition. While perhaps we should not, because we are members of the opposition, be overly assertive in stating the rights of the Leader of the Opposition, it is a fact which I think is recognized in their hearts by members and ministers opposite that the Leader of the Opposition occupies a peculiar place in the house because, as has been pointed out, he is an officer of this house. He occupies a position of peculiar priority with respect to his right to be heard. The Leader of the Opposition was interrupted by the Speaker, who raised a point of order, and the Leader of the Opposition indicated most clearly, as is shown by Hansard of June 1, his desire to speak to the point of order and also his desire to continue his speech once the point of order had been settled. Yet notwithstanding the position just referred to, the Speaker refused to hear the Leader of the Opposition or anybody else on that point of order, in contravention of standing order 34 (1) which says that the hon. member shall sit down while the point is being stated, after which he may explain.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Speaker had made a ruling.

Mr. Knowles: Which he had no right to make at that point.

Mr. Fulton: That standing order gives a right to the member concerned to speak to the point of order before the ruling.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Speaker had made a ruling which the hon. member knows was not open to review and was not debatable.

Mr. Fulton: That is my point, that the Speaker made his ruling at that time improperly and in contravention of the rules of the house because the rules of the house say that when a point of order is raised the member who has the floor shall have the right to explain, in other words to speak to the point of order. He was denied that right and the Speaker, again seeking to advance the course of the government and under the influence of the terrific and terrible pressure which the government was exerting on him, improperly disregarded the rules of the house and reversed himself without giving an opportunity to anyone to discuss the point of order which he had raised.

Mr. Harris: I wonder if the hon. member would permit me to ask just one question. The argument which he is advancing is somewhat new. Does the hon. member contend that, under standing order 34, when an hon. member, not the Speaker, is speaking and a point of order is raised, Mr. Speaker is obliged, after the point of order has been stated by the one seeking to make it, to hear then the member who has the floor? In other words, is it the contention of my hon. friend that this does not permit Mr. Speaker to do either one of two things, to say that the point of order is not well taken or that the point of order is well taken, without hearing any further argument?

Mr. Fulton: I think the rule speaks for itself; it states that if a member is interrupted by a point of order, he shall sit down while the point is being stated, after which he may explain. Perhaps I should read the whole thing:

> Any member addressing the house, if called to order either by Mr. Speaker or on a point raised by another member, shall sit down while the point is being stated, after which he may explain.

What could be clearer, whether the point is raised by Mr. Speaker or an hon. member?

Mr. Tucker: Why do you not go on and read the rest?

Mr. Fulton: I have read it already.

Mr. Tucker: No, "Mr. Speaker may permit debate." He may do it, he does not have to do it.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker)—I am not going to spend too much time on this point—is disregarding completely the first part of the standing order which says, "after which he may explain." Nothing could be clearer than that, that at least the member who is interrupted by the point of order may speak to the point of order if he wishes to do so. Mr. Speaker may then permit other debate subsequently, but he does not have to; but the rule says that at least the member who is interrupted may speak to it. I cannot see any other meaning that could be given to it. If my hon. friend disagrees with me, and as my time is running on, I would ask him to state his contrary arguments on a later occasion.

Dealing still with the first portion of our motion for censure, Mr. Speaker in an absolutely unheard of course of action then put a proposition to the house of his own motion. He tried to avoid having it described as a motion because Mr. Speaker realized he should not make a motion. He did in fact let his tongue slip in view of the tremendous pressure he was under and when it was actually being put he said, "Those in favour of this motion." That was corrected next day on a question of privilege.

But the rules of debate have come down to us from antiquity and they establish—I should not think that this would require any argument—that there can be nothing before the house for decision by way of a vote unless it is put in the form of a motion. How can you get a question before the house for decision except by way of a motion? The fact that the Speaker did not call it a motion but rather called it a proposition does not alter its basic nature. Mr. Speaker was not only improper in raising the matter himself but he put it forward at an improper time and in an improper manner because standing order 43 says:

> All motions shall be in writing, and seconded, before being debated or put from the chair.

The motion of the Speaker did not even have a seconder, nor was it in writing. Furthermore, standing orders 41 and 42 provide that such a motion must have 48 hours' notice unless unanimous consent is obtained to put it forthwith without notice. In addition, citation 136 of Beauchesne's third edition makes it clear, and I shall repeat it, that:

> All motions referring to the business of the house should be introduced by the leader of the house.

This extraordinary proposition certainly related to the business of the house. It suggested that we wipe a whole day from our records. Here then we had the extraordinary, unprecedented and tragic situation that the Speaker rushed to the rescue of the government under pressure of such a nature that he substituted himself for the government leader in the house in advancing government business through the house.

Now, sir, I come to the third subparagraph of our motion of censure, which of course is the most important. The Speaker is accused of subordinating the rights of the house to the will of the government. I think it would be equally correct to say that the Speaker is subject to censure for having permitted the rights of the house to be subordinated to the will of the government, because that is what happened. The government imposed its will, and Mr. Speaker, no more than the others who from time to time occupied the chair in the course of this debate, was humanly not able to stand up to the pressure imposed upon him. I find it difficult to criticize him for that. I find it difficult to believe that there would be any ordinary human being, subject to the ordinary human emotions and temptations and frailties, who could withstand the pressure that this government put on this Speaker under the circumstances. But, sir, the fact that the happening may be pitiful or tragic, whichever way you like to look at it, cannot blind us to the fact that it happened, and we must record our disapproval of the happening and our censure of what happened.

But the main responsibility still rests with the government, and of course this situation arose because of the government's determination to ram this bill through and to ram this closure through and to use the most improper, violent and vicious form of closure. We have heard some discussion of closure before, but I think it is necessary to refer to it briefly again. I think it is desirable that the record should be cleared up and that the misinterpretations and distortions placed by the government on closure in the British house should be removed. We have heard ad nauseam about the number of times that closure is used in the British house and the suggestion made that it is a normal thing over there and that it is the same sort of closure as is used here, and therefore we are absurd when we protest about the use of closure four times in one session; but the British closure is entirely different.

Mr. Harris: I said that when I spoke.

Mr. Fulton: You are about the only one who did, and you said it very sotto voce. The British closure is entirely different. The British closure is what we know as the previous question, and even that takes a slightly different form from our previous question. It is true that the previous question is used over there on frequent occasions. It is true, as the Minister of Finance said, that it may be invoked in the middle of the afternoon by any member of the house, but, sir, there are these two safeguards: first, that it shall not be put if the Speaker thinks it is an undue curtailment of debate and, second, it requires the support of 100 in the house even then before it will be put.

But there is this third and most important difference which explains so clearly why it is used over there so frequently as a matter of course. The previous question is available to private members as a means of bringing about a vote on their own proposals then before the house. Here we do not have that course available. Here, if the government finds a private member's proposal embarrassing, then they can talk it out, and they do. Over there, in order to avoid that happening and in order to enable a private member to bring to a vote a proposal he puts forward, he has the device of getting one of his friends to move the previous question. Then, if the Speaker thinks that there has been adequate discussion, he puts it, because he thinks it is desirable to have a decision of the house on the matter. So the previous question applies to private legislation and private members' proposals in a way that simply does not prevail here and it is a device which helps private members get a decision on the propositions they put before the house.

That is the reason why closure is used 121 times a year, or whatever it may be, in England. To suggest that the situations are comparable is to distort the facts and to misrepresent them to the house and the country.

Mr. Harris: My hon. friend would not suggest that the government there does not use it as well as private members.

Mr. Fulton: I quite agree, but it has those important safeguards mentioned.

Mr. Harris: Quite so.

Mr. Fulton: I think this should be pointed out, when we are talking about closure and about obstruction by the minority over here. It was just last session, on July 1, 1955, that the opposition in parliament accepted some very serious limitation on debate under the rules. The rules applying since then provide for limitation of debate to a far greater extent than they did just a year ago. We accepted them, after negotiation and compromise. We were not happy about them, but it was better than what we would have had forced on us if we had not. We accepted a limitation on the throne speech debate and a limitation on the budget debate and a limitation to six motions for going into supply. Yet the government is trying to say that the opposition refuses to accept any limitation on debate.

Now we come to the closure rule as it was applied by this government on this occasion. This, as I have said, is what started the deterioration in the relations between the house and the Chair. The invocation of the closure rule requires the most vigorous insistence by Mr. Speaker on the scrupulous adherence to the rules which protect the minority. Instead of that, we saw a steady whittling away under government pressure, of even those ordinary rules which protect the minority.

Now I come back to the question of the pressure brought by the government on the Chair, and the evidence of it. We saw, sitting here, what my hon. friend the member for London (Mr. Mitchell) referred to as that other pipe line, the pipe line between the house leader and the Chair. I well recall, sir, when I made the motion that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration be now heard, when the Minister of Trade and Commerce was trying to get the floor to make his motion, that it caused consternation for a moment. I do not think I am putting it too srongly to say that there was momentary confusion on the government side.

Mr. Pickersgill: It certainly confused me.

Mr. Fulton: The confusion, however, was rapidly resolved in his own mind by the Minister of Finance, who suddenly realized that, if he could get the Minister of Trade and Commerce to pass to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration the papers containing the motion he then was going to move, and if the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration was given the floor by the chairman, their difficulties would be resolved. So, sir, the signals that were being made here by the Minister of Finance to the Chair, the nods, the smiles, the waves—

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. Fulton: —and the passing of papers back and forth between the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration were humorous to behold, or would have been if the situation itself were not so tragic.

Mr. Pickersgill: How silly can you be?

Mr. Fulton: We saw the papers being passed. How silly can you be?

Mr. Harris: Between the two ministers.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, you yourself were in the chair on that occasion, and as I call on my colleagues over here to witness, you were at that moment so fully engaged that you missed the signal.

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. Fulton: You were completely engaged. It is understandable that you were concerned, and you were engaged in discussion with members on this side trying to recollect when the motion to get the floor had first been made, and you were not able to direct your attention over there, so the signal was missed—

Some hon. Members: Oh! No.

Mr. Fulton: —and you did not put the motion which you were being invited to put from over here, that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration be heard. You ruled it out of order and then we saw the papers being passed back from the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration to the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Richardson: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Fulton: I am sorry but I must answer no. I have only two minutes left. I would ask the hon. member to defer his question. We saw the culmination of this thing on Friday morning when a decision arrived at the previous night—an important decision —was reversed in the most calculated, brutal and callous manner and under the most calculated, brutal and callous pressure. I do not want to leave my own words as the only witness for that belief. I should like to bring forward in evidence an article written by a press gallery correspondent who would not normally, I think, be described as pro-Conservative. Perhaps he would not normally be described as pro-government either. He may be one of those who are in the happy position of being truly impartial. But at least I am satisfied that I am safe in saying he is not pro-Conservative.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I am obliged to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Knowles: The questioners opposite did it again.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I wonder if I might at this time crave the indulgence of the house on a question of personal privilege since my name entered into the latter remarks of the hon. member for Kamloops. I should like to assure hon. members that I am very conscious, as I stand here, of the fact that above my head is part of the wood from the old Westminster Hall and that, looking down on me, are generations of British constitutional history. I should like to say this. I am very conscious of my responsibility and I am most certainly not the recipient of signals from either side of the house. I have always tried to render my decisions in an impartial manner.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, may I ask if the time allotted to me included the time taken to answer questions?

Mr. Harris: We do not do that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: As a matter of fact, I purposely failed to look at the clock at 12.33.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, with reluctance I rise to take part in this filibuster—

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. May I interrupt my hon. friend?

Mr. McIvor: Very well.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, I had an understanding—if it was not a firm one, I thought it was—about the order of speakers today. We had not thought that my friend the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) would want to take part in this debate.

An hon. Member: Closure.

Mr. Harris: If I had not engaged myself to hon. gentlemen opposite to have a certain arrangement as to speakers, I would not have intervened.

Mr. McIvor: It is quite all right.

Mr. Harris: I am quite prepared to let this go forward—

Mr. Knowles: Let him speak.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. As a matter of fact the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny) had risen before the hon. member for Fort William rose and my attention was directed to him.

Mr. Harris: I think he had better be heard.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I did not recognize any hon. member but I am sure in my own mind that the hon. member for Dauphin rose first and it had been my intention to recognize him. I now recognize the hon. member for Dauphin.

Mr. Zaplitny: Mr. Speaker, may I say that I shall be glad to yield the floor to the hon. member for Fort William.

Mr. McIvor: No, thank you. I want to keep to the rules.

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, several of the members on this side of the house who have taken part in this debate have expressed their distaste for doing so on the basis of personal friendship with the Speaker. I cannot claim to have an intimate friendship with the Speaker although our relations in this house and outside it have always been the best. As a preface to the remarks I wish to make today I should like to point out that I was one of those who, not so very long ago, rose in this house on a question of privilege in order to defend the Speaker when I considered that a report in one of the newspapers erroneously reported what he had said on an important occasion. I stand by every word I said at that time because the address which I heard him deliver on that occasion was, in my opinion, an excellent one and one which could not have been interpreted in any sense as being partisan. It was on that basis that I rose to defend Mr. Speaker and because we on this side of the house—as are hon. members, I am sure, on all sides of the house—are very jealous of the position of the Speaker with regard to impartiality. That is the reason why all of us, I am sure, take part in this debate; but we do not do so with any great alacrity because we know we are debating a motion which expresses lack of confidence in the Chair.

I wish first to draw attention to some of the remarks made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin). In my opinion the minister made an excellent address from a partisan point of view. But in a debate in which partisanship is the least desirable of all ingredients, I regret to say that his contribution was not of his usual best. He made quite a point of quoting with approval the remarks of the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) when that member spoke earlier in this debate. I am not at this point going to express my own opinion of that particular contribution. I would rather call on an independent opinion, from a source which—because of the fact that the writer is not a member of this house—could probably be depended upon to be non-partisan. I refer to the Winnipeg Free Press, a newspaper which is not notoriously unfriendly to this government. Here is what they have to say with regard to exactly the same point. I quote from their editorial:

> The three party leaders—Mr. St. Laurent, Mr. Drew and Mr. Coldwell—are all to be congratulated for their handling on Monday of the debate concerning the Speaker. (Mr. Quelch, for the Social Credit party, made a nasty speech; but its inappropriateness to the occasion is merely an additional sign that the Social Credit philosophy is without understanding or care for the principles of parliamentary democracy.)

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): It was the truth he stated.

Mr. Zaplitny: Mr. Speaker, my regret is that the Minister of National Health and Welfare, by quoting with approval what is referred to in this editorial, has placed himself in the same category of being without understanding or care for the principles of parliamentary democracy, in the view of the Winnipeg Free Press.

Mr. Martin: If that is true, so has Mr. Speaker Brand.

Mr. Zaplitny: I do not think that remark is going to take away anything from what I have just said. I feel it is unfortunate that, in a situation of this kind, the government should be trying to leave the impression, in their so-called defence of the Speaker, that the members on the opposite side of the house are attacking the Speaker for partisan purposes. That is not the case.

In his address the minister said that the members on this side of the house—particularly the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—had tried to get at the government through the Speaker. I suggest that the very reverse is the fact, namely that the government got at the opposition through the Speaker and that they are the ones who caused this whole mess. Not only will members of this house who were eyewitnesses to the whole of these events confirm that point of view. After all, the newspapers of this country, for the most part,—particularly on the question of procedure—are not taking a partisan point of view but are trying to call the shots as they see them. One has only to look through the newspapers these days to see that there has been a long procession of opinion in which it has been plainly stated that the government is responsible for having undermined the authority and the dignity of the Chair in the debate which has just ended.

Now, with the preponderance of evidence and opinion on the part of disinterested persons outside this house, I think it would have been better for the government to have admitted its mistake at this point and in that way to have salvaged the dignity and decorum of the Chair, rather than try to place the responsibility on the other side of the house. I am quite happy to support what I have just said by a further quotation from the same newspaper. On the editorial page of the June 4 issue under the title, "Mr. Speaker", I find this:

> That Mr. Speaker Beaudoin should be a casualty of the pipe line debate at Ottawa is more than a personal tragedy. It is also a political disaster.

Then they go on to say:

> It is that which makes the personal tragedy of the censure motion on the Mr. Speaker so acute.

Mr. Pickersgill: From what is the hon. gentleman reading?

Mr. Zaplitny: From an editorial in the Winnipeg Free Press of June 4, 1956. I continue:

> Unfortunately, the painfulness of the tragedy does not lessen the hard reality of the political disaster. No opposition could have failed, in the circumstances of last Friday, to declare its loss of confidence in the Speaker and move censure on him.

Then farther on they say:

> The government thought that a bulldozer was the right instrument to clear the path of the pipe line bill and learned too late that the result was in fact a chaos and bitterness in which probably no Speaker could achieve what parliament requires of him, because parliament is not meant to function this way.

Those are strong and unequivocal words. They do not beat about the bush. They place the responsibility squarely on the shoulders of the government where, in my opinion, it belongs.

Mr. Martin: Why take it out on the Speaker then?

Mr. Zaplitny: May I ask the hon. gentleman who has just asked that question, what other way an opposition could register a protest under those circumstances?

Mr. Pickersgill: By a vote of want of confidence in the government, of course.

Mr. Zaplitny: That, I am afraid, would be much too late because the Speaker has already been crucified by the government.

It is not my intention to review the events which led up to this censure motion, the points of order and procedure that took place on last Thursday and Friday, because that has been thoroughly done in this debate. The experts on both sides of the house have already put that on the record and I wish merely to make this reference in that regard. If there is any doubt in the minds of members opposite as to the role that has been played by those who took an active part in the procedural debates in this house I would refer them to an editorial which appeared in the Ottawa Journal a few days ago. The whole editorial was devoted to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) but out of respect for his modesty I will not quote it. One has only to read that editorial to realize that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre deserved better at the hands of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) than he received today. It is quite clear the hon. member was fighting for a principle that is vital to the functioning of this parliament and that has been recognized by the press right across this country, not by a press that is friendly to the party to which he belongs but by a press that recognizes genius and ability when it sees it.

The matter which I shall discuss particularly today is not a question of technicalities or procedure but rather more in a philosophical vein concerning what I regard to be the greatest error made by members sitting behind the government. What the government itself has done has been well laid on the record already. I contend that the rank and file of members who support the government have the primary responsibility because it is by their grace that the government holds power. It is their attitude to which I wish to draw the attention of the house, and which I think resulted in the tragedy we have seen.

I want to refer to the address made by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George on May 29 in which he, while talking on a point of order, placed on the record the quotation from section 49 of the British North America Act. One sentence in the quotation is this:

> Questions arising in the House of Commons shall be decided by a majority of voices . . .

Now, he proceeded from there to argue that because of section 49 of the British North America Act the majority shall always decide. He fell into a trap that is often the result of over-simplicity. The same argument was taken up later by the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Boisvert) and some other members supporting the government in which they insisted that it is the duty and the right of the majority to rule. If one were to follow that to its logical conclusion, we would have the most vicious type of one-party government in this country that could ever be envisaged. It would come, in my opinion, very close to the theory set out by Karl Marx in which he argued for the dictatorship of the proletariat on the basis of the fact there was more of the proletariat than any other class and therefore that class shall rule and the rights of the other people shall be taken away. In other words, it is rule by majority, by brute strength. We cannot subscribe, we cannot even entertain, such a thought in this parliament or in this country.

Mr. Richardson: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Zaplitny: Certainly.

Mr. Richardson: Does the hon. gentleman deny that section 49 of the British North America Act is in existence now?

Mr. Zaplitny: What the hon. member read into the record was the main part of section 49. I think that was the only part he did put on the record, that questions arising in the House of Commons shall be decided on a majority of voices. I do not quite get the point of his question. Certainly, I do not deny the British North America Act is in existence. Unless the hon. member meant to ask something else, I am not quite sure how to answer. There is no debate about that. Section 49 of the British North America Act does exist and it does say what the hon. member put on the record. I am not questioning the accuracy of his quotation. All I am pointing out is what he and others who spoke as he did took that quotation to mean and the implication that carries with it.

The standing orders of this house are the British North America Act of the House of Commons. We are talking about minority rights. I am not particularly concerned about the minority in this House of Commons, which is the opposition. We are probably a less vulnerable minority than any in the country because in this house we are in a fluid position. The minority of today may be the majority of tomorrow. We are in a position to speak up for ourselves and make a protest when we see the rights of the minority in this house being trampled upon. Therefore, I am not particularly concerned as to what happens to members of the opposition in this House of Commons, but I am very much concerned about the philosophic acceptance of the philosophy, with all its implications, that the majority shall rule. If we accept that as a philosophy and apply it, particularly in a country such as ours where, as a matter of fact speaking from the point of view of our population in this country we are a nation of minorities, there is no telling what may happen.

With respect to racial origin, there is no group in this country that has a majority. We are a nation of minorities, and if we ever allow ourselves to follow the implications of the arguments presented by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Richardson), the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Boisvert), and others who have spoken on that side of the house, that the majority shall rule, it is their right to do so, then we shall be heading for very serious trouble, much more serious than that which we have witnessed in the House of Commons.

Mr. Richardson: I would not like to interrupt the hon. member, I do not propose to do so unless he permits it. May I ask another question? Does the hon. member now propose, either in this session or in some early session, to move an amendment so that section 49 of the British North America Act will be changed?

Mr. Fulton: There was never any question about that.

Mr. Zaplitny: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. member is serious in asking that question. I think the content of the question itself indicates that he is not expecting an answer.

Mr. Richardson: I am.

Mr. Zaplitny: Certainly, I have no intention of moving that that section of the act be taken out; in the first place because I see no reason for removing it, and in the second place because it is not this House of Commons that would amend the act, anyway, it would be the British House of Commons.

Mr. Carrick: May I ask a question? What does the hon. member understand it to mean when section 49 says that questions shall be decided by a majority of voices? What does he understand that to mean?

Mr. Zaplitny: I am glad that question was asked, because it brings me exactly to the point I was about to make, Mr. Speaker, namely, that in the acceptance of a majority decision we must remember that it has to be applied and understood on the basis of rules and laws. If we applied the bare theory that the majority shall rule, without taking into consideration the rules under which they shall operate, or the laws of the land under which they shall operate, then we would find ourselves in an impossible position. Let me put it this way. Suppose we applied that theory in its bare implications to a court of law and said that the majority in court shall decide. Then, of course, we would not have justice. We operate in courts of law under certain laws and they are applied according to the way they are interpreted by the presiding judge. It is not a question of who has more lawyers in court; it is not a question of the jury being composed of 12 and the accused only one person and therefore he has automatically to lose the case. The laws are interpreted and adhered to strictly, and that is exactly what has to be done in this house. The standing orders of this house are the British North America Act of the House of Commons, and the moment the government decides that the standing orders are a mere obstacle in its path and begins to find ways of circumventing those standing orders and the rules of this house, at that point it is abusing section 49 of the British North America Act and not using it. That is the point exactly. The rules of this house provide for certain procedures; they provide for the way in which legislation shall be brought forward step by step; they provide for points of order, questions of privilege and so on. I contend, sir, it is not the Speaker's responsibility nor his right to concern himself with the speed or effectiveness with which legislation passes through this house. That, I contend, is the responsibility of the members of this house. The Speaker's responsibility and function are strictly to interpret the rules as they are and to treat with fine impartiality all members on both sides of the house.

As the very controversial debate proceeded, one could perhaps draw this type of analogy from what happened. Here we were on a very controversial bill. The government was presenting its side of the argument and the opposition its side of the argument. It was something like a see-saw based on a fulcrum. At one point the government felt that the opposition perhaps was placing arguments that were more weighty and the see-saw began to come down in favour of the opposition. It was at that point that the Speaker moved the fulcrum and that is what started this whole controversy so far as the Speaker is concerned. At the point at which the see-saw was finely balanced, when the weight of the argument on each side was particularly heavy and the slightest shift of the fulcrum made a great difference as to the outcome of that controversy, at that point the Speaker shifted the fulcrum in favour of the government. I am not going to go into the question of why he did so; I am not going to go into all the details of how he did so. That is already on record. But the fact remains, and it is unanswerable, that the Speaker shifted the fulcrum in favour of the government at a very crucial point in the debate. Because that was done and because it was done contrary to the rules of this house, the opposition had no other recourse than to do what it eventually did, and therefore the motion is before the house.

Mr. Carrick: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Zaplitny: Yes.

Mr. Carrick: If the Speaker honestly felt that he had made a mistake—

Mr. Dufresne: What proves it?

[Mr. Zaplitny.]

Mr. Carrick: Would you give me an opportunity to ask the question?

Mr. Drew: Make your own speech.

Mr. Carrick: I am speaking to the hon. member for Dauphin. If the Speaker felt that he had honestly made a mistake in not allowing the house to express its wishes on the appeal from the chairman's ruling, what was his duty to do except to try to restore the position?

Mr. Knowles: He could have asked the leader of the house to move a motion.

Mr. Zaplitny: Two reversals of decisions were made on Friday morning. One of them had to do with a motion, the other one with a point of order. I contend that in either case, if the Speaker felt that he had made an error the day before and felt that a different type of decision should have been made, his duty would have been to inform the house that on a future occasion, under the same circumstances, he would rule in a different way; but he was not justified, without notice and without an opportunity for hon. members of the opposition to discuss the matter, arbitrarily to rule that we go back to the position we were the day before, and to place before the house what he termed a proposition for which there is no precedent. On that basis and for these reasons I regretfully say I find that this censure motion is perfectly in order.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the Leader of the Opposition speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Harris: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock I shall leave the chair.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, with the statements that I am about to make, the discussion of this motion will terminate and we shall then deal with this matter in one of two ways. I shall come back later to the ways in which this can be dealt with.

When I spoke first on the introduction of this motion I made it clear it was with the utmost reluctance and with very deep regret that we found it necessary to introduce a motion of this kind against a Speaker for whom, as I said on that occasion, we have had not only respect but personal affection.

Since I presented that motion a number of speeches have been made; three have been made by members of the government. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has spoken, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) has spoken, and today we heard from the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin). If there had been any uncertainty before about the necessity for a motion of this kind that uncertainty would have been removed by the nature of the speeches which have been made by the members of the government.

The Prime Minister washed his hands of all responsibility. Not only did he wash his hands of any personal responsibility but he imputed to the opposition motives which indeed would have made us unworthy to sit as members of this house if they had been true. I challenged the statements of the Prime Minister at that time but instead of withdrawing from his position he re-emphasized it. The Prime Minister had this to say, as reported at page 4657 of Hansard:

> This situation will appear to many, in spite of the elevated tone of the addresses made in the house this afternoon by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) and by the leader of the C.C.F. party, as being one more attempt to prevent the majority in parliament from reaching a point where it would be entitled to vote upon the propriety or otherwise of this controversial measure.
> Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I must intervene on a question of privilege. I think it is a most improper suggestion that a matter brought forward in this way should in any way be suggested as a means of delaying debate in the pipe line proceedings.

I then went on to say:

> I repudiate any suggestion of that kind and greatly regret that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) would have thought of making such a suggestion.

To that the Prime Minister replied:

> Mr. Speaker, not even the Prime Minister could avoid thinking that each and every move that has been made since the pipe-line resolution was first brought before the house was designed to prevent it from reaching a point where it might become a statute of the Canadian parliament.

That was the position taken by the Prime Minister. We were dealing with a most unusual situation. We were dealing with a situation in no way correctly interpreted by the Minister of Finance or the Minister of National Health and Welfare. We were dealing with an unqualified decision by the Speaker a week ago Thursday night to accept a motion which he in fact had suggested in form and assisted in drafting; and then the following morning without notice, without authority, without precedent of any kind, he rose in this place to say he had come to the conclusion that he had made a mistake.

Mr. Speaker, if there was any uncertainty about the decision the night before it was the duty of one member of the government, whoever it might be, to raise that question. The members of the government were not caught by surprise. It was apparent they knew what was going to be done; it was evident. It was equally evident when the organized applause started immediately upon the announcement by the Speaker of what he was doing. Had they not known they would not have realized the significance of the decision which had been made.

An hon. Member: What do you think we are—dumbbells?

Mr. Drew: It was not a decision merely to reverse the acceptance of a motion the night before on which debate had proceeded, it was a decision which was in keeping with the desire of the government to circumvent the rules of this house, a decision about which there was no surprise; a decision which, right or wrong, should never have been made except upon an application by a member of the government or someone on the other side and consideration by the Speaker of arguments from both sides as to the propriety of following such a course. This was no ordinary decision.

Then we had the Minister of Finance washing his hands of responsibility and making the unctuous suggestion that he had sought as no one else had to prevent the disturbances. The Minister of Finance now nods his head in support of that statement. The Minister of Finance sat here without a comment while the organized bedlam that is recorded in Hansard was carried forward by hon. members opposite largely under the direction of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill).

Some hon. Members: Nonsense.

Mr. McCann: Ridiculous.

Mr. Drew: Hansard shows perfectly clearly the nature of the interjections, the frequency of the interjections and the kind of organized bedlam which went on under the benign approval of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Prudham: After the bell had rung; after the vote was called.

Mr. Fleming: It was immediate.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to be diverted from the course of my remarks by ordinary interjections but I do not intend to overlook the interjection of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham). He said, "After the bell had rung".

No, it was not after the bell had rung. It was immediately after the Speaker announced he was going to reverse his earlier decision that a bedlam of applause broke loose in this chamber. It came from men who knew what was going to happen.

Some hon. Members: Nonsense.

An hon. Member: Prearranged.

Mr. Drew: The Minister of Finance had this to say, as reported at page 4683 of Hansard:

> I am going to say something that is rather difficult for me to say under the circumstances. Both the Leader of the Opposition and the leader of the C.C.F. this afternoon said that all of us ought to regret what has happened, particularly what happened on Friday. I am going to agree with both of them. However, I hope that in expressing agreement in that sense I am not to be taken as having accepted any responsibility for it.

Oh, Mr. Speaker, those words will go down in Hansard as the words of a man who put before the house one of the most tawdry pretences that has ever been heard in this chamber. Men who sat here heard the bedlam raised by the supporters of the government without a word of objection; then the minister is quite ready to agree that others are responsible; but, oh, not the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris). Listen to what he said, as reported on page 4684 of Hansard of June 4:

> A week ago Thursday night I did what no other member who has spoken in this debate has done. I rose in my place and appealed to the followers on this side of the house to remain in a condition which would not excite any feelings in this house, and from that day to this they have done so.

Let anyone examine the pages of Hansard between the Thursday night to which he refers in the previous week and the time at which he spoke and the answer will be found to a sanctimonious statement of that kind, completely denied by the record for all time.

This subject was dealt with further today by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin). I would have hoped that the Minister of National Health and Welfare would have acted more in keeping with the reputation which he has deserved of respecting accuracy and the responsibilities of this house. Again from him we heard a distortion of the record. That is a shameful thing as it stands permanently embedded in Hansard for years to come. He said:

> I am not misled by this resolution.

No, he was not misled by the resolution. Then, even worse, he went on to say: "In their eager desire to try to force on the people an unnecessary election which will not resolve this question, some of my hon. friends opposite care not, Samsonlike, if they pull down the Speaker's chair and the pillars of parliament along with it."

The simile may not have been inappropriate. It will be recalled that the temple which was torn down was a temple of evil men. It was a temple of the Philistines, not a temple of freedom like this House of Commons. It may be worth recalling also that Samson in that ultimate act of despair used his strength to relieve himself from the chains which bound him, Yes, the simile may not have been inappropriate.

Mr. Martin: He was defeated too.

Mr. Fulton: He destroyed his enemies.

Mr. Drew: The Minister of National Health and Welfare says, "He was defeated too." In that single remark the Minister of National Health and Welfare condemns this whole government. That is his estimate of their attitude toward this situation; it was not whether Samson was rightly chained or not; the people that had the power, according to him, had the right, and the man who tore down the evil things, according to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, lost too. I do not believe there is one hon. member on this side of the house who has been expressing his opinion in regard to this unhappy incident who would not far rather lose in a decent and honourable cause than win by the sheer use of force to which the government has appealed on this occasion.

The government has been poorly served by those who have sought to divert attention from the issue before us. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) said that I had tried to argue in regard to the Speaker's ruling; that is not so. I had tried to be heard on a point of order, to point out that it was not the role of the Speaker to become counsel for the government and judge as well. I was denied a hearing, and so were other hon. members who sought to be heard.

Oh, we are told that when the Speaker is on his feet others cannot rise. That statement can only be made by those who do not know our rules or have not followed the proceedings in this house. Points of order are frequently raised while the Speaker is standing. If he deems it appropriate the Speaker resumes his seat and permits the point of order or the question of privilege, as the case may be, to be heard.

Unless it were possible for members to rise while the Speaker is standing, particularly when he is making some comment about the proceedings in this house, it would not be possible for any effective discussion of the rules of this house, and the procedure in this house, and the rights of members, to take place. Certainly they have a right to rise while the Speaker is standing. It is true that they have not the right to rise to engage in an argument with the Speaker while he is standing. Nevertheless there is not an hon. member of this government or an hon. member opposite who has taken any part in the legitimate and proper debates of this house who has not seen many occasions where points of order or questions of privilege could be raised only by the person rising while the Speaker was standing. In that way the member indicates his intention to state the question when the Speaker resumes his seat.

Let it be said that on most occasions in the past the Speaker has acceded without question to the demand to be heard on a point of order or a question of privilege. It was only on this black Friday that has just passed, when he had taken the unprecedented course first of all in acting on behalf of the government in presenting a proposal and second in passing judgment without permitting hon. members to be heard, that he denied to any hon. member in this house the right to be heard. In an affront, not to members of parliament but to the people of Canada, he rang a bell which could have been the death knell of freedom unless there had been members here who were prepared to stand up for their rights on that occasion.

As we all know, every decision of that kind becomes a precedent embedded in the records. What a dreadful precedent to have established on this occasion. The Minister of Finance, referring to my statement that there had been newspaper criticism outside of this house before it arose here, professed his ignorance of any such criticism. Within the rules of this house, it is not possible for me to use terms appropriate to such a statement. I cannot believe that the minister does not read the newspapers. I cannot believe that he was unaware of criticism which had been levelled against the Speaker and the Chairman for conduct which had already aroused the indignation of certain members of the government as well.

The minister sought to convey the impression that if there had been criticism outside it was criticism prompted by what was said by the members of the opposition. Let him point to a single case where that criticism had been directed to the subject of the widespread criticism that was coming from outside because of the manner in which debates were being conducted here under the lengthy admonitions of the Speaker, under the unnecessary repetition of precedents to support his position at times when no member of the government had raised any question at all. It was then that the criticism came from outside, not from here. Even then we were prepared to hope that, as so often happens, this advice from outside might have its effect. Unfortunately, the Speaker did not heed the warnings.

The criticism that was made was not merely criticism as to the long and extraordinary statements being made by the Speaker; it was due to the fact that the Speaker was substituting himself for the government in raising issues which had not even been brought forward. That was the situation which finally came to a head.

Then the Minister of Finance has sought to interpret the statements made a week ago Thursday night as statements indicating that the Speaker was reserving his decision in regard to the admission of a motion which he himself had helped to frame and upon which debate had already taken place. There was no suggestion of any such thing. He had accepted the motion; he had emphasized the fact that before this house met he had already examined and carefully read one of the letters referred to by the hon. member for Nanaimo, who presented the motion, and that in his opinion this was not only a matter of privilege but of serious privilege. It was upon that basis that he accepted the motion.

May I make it clear? We are not speaking here about dissatisfaction with the Speaker's ruling. We are talking about the way in which the ruling was made. As I said in the opening remarks in support of this motion, we certainly would not present a motion of this kind simply because of what we thought had been a mistake on the part of the Speaker. What we were directing our criticism to was the way in which the Speaker made this ruling, and his conduct on Friday morning. That is the point that is before the house.

I know that it is not appropriate to quote newspaper editorials by way of argument in a manner that reflects upon the house. I would point out, however, that the Prime Minister and others who have spoken have used editorials, and to that extent I would certainly question the propriety of any denial at this time of the right to read an editorial or article relating to this subject. However, I shall qualify what I intend to say still more. I propose to read certain things that have appeared in the press, not as arguments but as an indication of what the impression is upon the minds of experienced observers. That is something which surely cannot be a matter which is of no concern to the members of this house.

Already reference has been made to an editorial appearing in the Winnipeg Free Press on Monday, June 4. I shall not repeat that part which has already been read into the record. Whatever else may be said about the Winnipeg Free Press, it would not in the ordinary course of events be regarded as a newspaper whose leanings had been unduly toward the opposition. I should like to read that editorial simply to indicate what the attitude of responsible observers is in relation to what has taken place in this house, because, as I have already pointed out on an earlier occasion, this is the house of the people, and it is the people's rights that are at issue here. We as individuals are merely the servants of all those millions of Canadians whom collectively we represent on both sides of this house. In an editorial headed "Mr. Speaker", this is what the Winnipeg Free Press had to say on that occasion:

> That Mr. Speaker Beaudoin should be a casualty of the pipe-line debate at Ottawa is more than a personal tragedy. It is also a political disaster.
>
> The Canadian House of Commons has had few Speakers who have worked as hard and commanded such general respect as Mr. Beaudoin. The proper measure of him can be taken by asking this question: under how many Speakers would the House of Commons have got as far as it has, in the unprecedented circumstances of the pipe-line debate, before the opposition was stirred to censure the Speaker? What if Mr. Beaudoin had not started out with a great fund of goodwill? What if the opposition had not previously learned to respect both his impartiality and his great knowledge of the rules and precedents of parliament? The government's handling of the pipe-line bill could readily have created yet more chaos and bitterness, even sooner in the parliamentary proceedings, than it has.
> Respect for the Speaker is an essential lubricating oil in the functioning of parliament. When the machine is running so hot it is bound to burn some of that oil. The measure of Mr. Beaudoin's quality is that the asset was so large and survived rapid consumption for as long as it did.
>
> It is that which makes the personal tragedy of the censure motion of the Speaker so acute. Unfortunately, the painfulness of the tragedy does not lessen the hard reality of the political disaster. No opposition could have failed in the circumstances of last Friday, to declare its loss of confidence in the Speaker and move censure on him.

Then I omit the part that has already been read into the record and I continue reading from the same editorial:

> Whether the Speaker was right or wrong in his first decision is open to prolonged discussion, of little public interest. But it is perfectly plain that, by changing his mind over night, so greatly to the government's advantage, the Speaker becomes exposed to opposition suspicion of having yielded to government pressure. The opposition is fully entitled to act on the basis that its confidence in the Speaker's impartiality is completely destroyed. And without that confidence, the normal proceedings of parliament are impossible.
> Mr. Beaudoin in this is the unhappy victim of circumstances beyond his control. The government thought that a bulldozer was the right instrument to clear the path of the pipe line bill and learned too late that the result was in fact a chaos and bitterness in which probably no Speaker could achieve what parliament requires of him, because parliament is not meant to function this way.

Then, Mr. Speaker, I wish just to refer to another article which is not an editorial. It is an article by a man who is generally regarded as one of the most competent reporters and observers associated with any newspaper in Canada. I refer to Mr. I. Norman Smith, whose rewards for the quality of his reporting have won for him an enviable reputation not only in the newspaper field but in the sphere of letters as well. Let me read just a short quotation from what he said in an article to which reference has already been made and which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of June 4 under the title "They Tore Up a Part of My National Pride". Let is be remembered that the writer of this article was writing not as an editorial writer detached from the scene but as a reporter who had been in parliament and who was in the House of Commons at the time the events in question occurred. I quote from that article:

> Isn't it kinder to say that House Leader Harris was ignorant of what he was doing when several times he was so lacking in taste as to go up to the Speaker's chair and speak intently with that officer whose impartiality is anciently unapproachable? The Speaker and his rulings were under fire and question during all this time. Perhaps Mr. Harris wasn't giving him instructions; perhaps he was just asking where he was going for Christmas.
> But surely Mr. Harris must have been ignorant of the fact that for him to discuss Christmas or anything else with the Speaker at that particular time was to sully the Speaker and parliament and himself beyond the belief of any citizen sensitive to what parliamentary democracy means? "Get out of there!" cried out a Conservative member, but Mr. Harris saw no wrong and felt no discomfort—a state explained only by ignorance of a fairly high order, for instinct and institution were alike revolted.

I hear the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) laughing. A man who had that indictment presented by one of the most competent reporters in this country who sat in the gallery and saw what happened here is strangely unworthy of his responsibilities in this house if he can laugh at such an indictment.

Mr. Speaker, there was no question about the fact that messages were being passed. There was not an hon. member who did not see them; not one. There was not an hon. member who was not conscious of the atmosphere on Thursday night. There certainly was not an hon. member on Friday morning who was not conscious that it was the will of the government which had prevailed.

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Drew: I wish to read also the words of another reporter. Again this is not an editorial. It is from a report by a man who once again can be properly said not to have been unduly influenced by his close association with the Conservative party. This is an article by Mr. Douglas Leiterman which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of Saturday, June 2, under the title "An Axe Flailing at the Root of Human Rights". Mr. Leiterman is a member of the press gallery who had observed what took place here in this house, with an opportunity to see what took place which is perhaps not afforded to all hon. members. Let me quote from that report:

> For you were witnessing not only the debasement of a proud and accomplished Speaker. Not only the irresponsibility of a sorely-tried opposition. Not only the indecent haste of a thoughtless government. You were witnessing the axe flailing at the root of human rights, and fear wrapped around you as you watched.
> Mr. Speaker Beaudoin had ruled honestly, according to his lights, the night before. The opposition had outmanoeuvred him, so resourcefully and so successfully that the pipe line bill was dangerously delayed.
>
> What happened, over night, no one will ever know. But from the opening Friday morning Mr. Speaker behaved like a man under the gun.

Then I pass over some part of the report and read this:

> Then the whirlwind. The Speaker, in carefully memorized phrases, proposed that all Thursday night's proceedings be wiped out; that the house go back to where it was at 5.15 p.m. Thursday. Why? Because he had made a "serious mistake" in everything he had done after that hour. The house was thunderstruck. It was a preposterous proposition. "Why not", demanded a member, "go back to last week, or last year?"
> Beaudoin wavered but Finance Minister Harris, alarmed at the Speaker's floundering, admonished him to get on with it. Stiffen your back, Rene, he said in effect. The Speaker stiffened.

Then I pass on to the closing paragraphs of this report written by Mr. Leiterman:

> What mattered was not that it was unfair, but that it was unjust, and unconstitutional. Mr. Speaker followed the rules until they got in the government's way. Then, he threw the rule book in the Ottawa river and proclaimed: "Let the house decide". That could only mean, "let the government decide", since the government controls the house. The rules, whose purpose is to protect the rights of parliament, ceased to protect. The oligarchy could do what it would—and it did.

Mr. Speaker, I have read those extracts from three highly responsible newspapers written by very responsible men who are highly trained observers. I did so, as I said before, so that the hon. members in this house might be fully aware of what the impression is outside of this house. Others could be read as well, equally critical—

Mr. Lesage: Or to the contrary.

Mr. Drew: —and equally damaging to the relationship between the Speaker and the house, but above all equally revealing as to the relationship between the Speaker and the government.

In his solemn oath of office the Speaker has sworn to serve parliament, to serve all the members. It is upon that clear duty that our whole concept of the parliamentary system has grown through the centuries as a result of trial and error. Break that sense of service to the whole house and you not only deny the possibility of the Speaker properly performing his duties, but you shatter the relationship between the house and the Speaker without which orderly debate cannot proceed.

The Minister of Finance made much of the fact that there had been numerous appeals against this Speaker's rulings in recent days. He made much of the fact that there had been few appeals on earlier occasions. Yes, it is true. The reason for those appeals was because—

Mr. Lesage: To kill time.

Mr. Drew: —it was only in those recent weeks that it became apparent that Mr. Speaker was not accepting his responsibility to the whole house but that the government was imposing its will to meet a deadline imposed by strangers to this house. What right was it of theirs what date saw the termination of a legitimate discussion on a subject proclaimed by the government itself as one of the most important ever to come before this house? What right was it of anyone outside of this house to impose terms and tell us when we must conclude our proper discussions of the affairs of the people of Canada? The Speaker's rulings were appealed because the Speaker was no longer making rulings consistent with the rules presented only last year by a committee of which he had been chairman. The words of these rules, clear words not open to misinterpretation, were twisted and distorted in their meaning. Again, there might have been criticism but not condemnation of this man if the Speaker had merely made a mistake in the interpretation of these rules.

The significant thing was that the misinterpretation of clear words, in English and in French, contained in those rules approved by this house served in every case the interests of the government in their demand that, no matter what happened, debate be terminated by a date that suited a United States controlled company about whose welfare they were so greatly concerned.

Today we heard a speech from the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin). Amongst other things he said the motion had not the slightest justification for presentation.

I have already read a statement made by a man who certainly would not be accused of any known sympathy for the Conservative party, except in this particular instance. May I at this point say that every Canadian should be proud of what has been said by the newspapers which have been openly associated with the Liberal party for many years. Never before in this country's history have we seen greater tribute to the real freedom of the press than has been expressed in relation to the incidents which have occurred in this house. We said at the outset of this debate that one of the reasons that we sought full opportunity to debate the measure that was before us in an orderly, unhampered way, was that one of the main functions of debate in this house was to shape public opinion outside through the thoughts and information gained from the press which reports what we do here.

We saw the valuable consequences of that relationship between the press and the public in the defence production debate last year. We saw the government finally bow, and graciously I concede, to the overwhelming demand of the people of Canada when they expressed opinions which were shaped and formed and reached by an examination of what they read in the press or heard over that other great medium of information, the radio. That was after weeks of debate. Unless every hon. member opposite felt that the Prime Minister had been wrong when he rose on the last day of that long debate last year and indicated what the government intended to do, then hon. members opposite should have been the first to say, "We wish to retain that evidence of democracy in action which we saw clearly expressed here in this house last year after the public had become informed as to what the facts actually were."

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) quoted a very great Speaker of the British House of Commons, Mr. Speaker Brand, seeking to justify the attitude of the Speaker in this house in refusing to hear anyone in regard to proceedings which he had undertaken on his own initiative, or rather on his own initiative so far as this house was concerned. The Minister of National Health and Welfare quoted Mr. Speaker Brand in this way: "I shall be justified if I refuse to call upon any more members to speak." What a difference, Mr. Speaker, what a difference between the two illustrations. There had been extended debate in the case when Mr. Speaker Brand made this decision; exercising the right he had as Speaker, he indicated he felt that he had heard enough in the debates that had already taken place in regard to the point of order that had been raised. It was only then, after hearing many speakers, that he said: "I shall be justified if I refuse to call upon any more members to speak." In this case, these words are not applicable. The Speaker, with no motion before him, with no pretence of a motion, because he cannot make a motion, and with no suggestion of a debate, because he is not allowed to participate in debate, made a decision contrary to every precedent and then refused, not to hear any more members, but to hear any members at all even to the extent of a single word.

This was no ordinary refusal. It was the effect of what he did that must be examined in considering the motion now before us. The effect of what he did was to remove the first roadblock in the way of the government's steamroller. There was still another. The other roadblock related to proceedings which had taken place between 5.15 of the day before and the time we met on Friday morning. It was necessary to remove that second roadblock. Then, the Speaker proceeded with something that has no precedent here or in any other parliamentary institution. Not a word had been said by any member of the government suggesting that this be done on that Friday morning. Nevertheless, the Speaker rose and said that he was going to put a proposal before us. That proposal was to strike out, for all practical purposes, everything that had happened between 5.15 on Thursday and the time we met on Friday morning. As it has been aptly described in the press, it became the day that never was. We then reverted by an unprecedented procedure to 5.15 the day before. Yes, as the Minister of National Health and Welfare has said, we can all make mistakes; we all do—that is, except the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance. We all make mistakes. There would have been no serious objection if the Speaker had made a mistake. It was not the fact that there had been a mistake; it was the obvious purpose of that unprecedented action which we could not ignore, as has been so properly pointed out by the Winnipeg Free Press.

We would be derelict in our duty as members of the opposition, Mr. Speaker—might I go further and say hon. members opposite are derelict in their duty if they are unwilling to recognize the need for the restoration of the authority, the traditions and the responsibility of this house in a manner in keeping with the seriousness of what occurred. By that weird device for which there is to be found nowhere in any record even the pretence of a precedent, the second road block was removed and the steamroller moved on to its stated objective and the time limit set by those outside this house.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare, in quoting Mr. Speaker Brand, said, "If that is not the most classical justification of the course followed by the Speaker I do not know where it could be found." There is not even the slightest hint of a similarity; there is not even the slightest hint of a suggestion. When the Speaker did raise the question of delay on Thursday night it was not delay—and the minister knows it—in regard to a ruling on the motion. He sought delay so that he could prepare a statement as to his position in relation to the example of what he regarded as serious prejudice. He had made his finding. He had not merely stated that he had read the letter; he said that it was a question of privilege and a most serious question of privilege. I am not going to argue as to whether he was right or wrong the night before. As has been pointed out, that is utterly unimportant. He had made his decision. The house had become seized of this matter and he had no right of any kind to withdraw that from the house. Certainly, he had no right to do so without hon. members being in a position to argue as to the merits of that course. It was not a case of arguing with the ruling; it was a case of dealing in appropriate terms with our rights. That, the Speaker refused. I repeat, the refusal must be examined in relation to its effect and not merely as an ordinary mistake.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare, for some reason in regard to which I am not clear, and I fancy no hon. member in this house is very clear about it, sought to convey the impression that I had introduced closure in the Ontario legislature. I moved the previous question. The Minister of National Health and Welfare knows perfectly well that the previous question has been moved frequently in this house. It was moved by the Minister of Finance last year in the defence production debate.

The Minister of Finance will recall that on that occasion there were a great many speeches after that motion had been put. The previous question does not deny debate; the previous question is merely a devise to prevent debate on other matters coming before the house before a vote is taken, that is all, and the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Health and Welfare are well aware of that affect. The previous question permits debate to proceed in its normal manner. The previous question permits debates of the full length permitted by the rules of this house, not the limited debates of 20 minutes which are imposed under the closure motion.

Yes, I moved the previous question in Ontario; but the Minister of National Health and Welfare did not have to go to Ontario. I have moved the previous question here in this house; so have ministers of the crown on a number of occasions. It is something very different; and if that is the best evidence of any inconsistency on our part I would suggest that a little more research be done on this question.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare implied that there was something shameful about bringing this extraordinary situation to the attention of the house. These were the minister's words, or certainly the context of his words: What is shameful is that the members of this house will be called upon to make a decision. Well, I have already suggested to the Prime Minister a way by which he can avoid that decision which the Minister of National Health and Welfare regards as shameful. What is shameful about dealing with the destruction of the rules and traditions and practices and the established procedure of this house?

The Minister of National Health and Welfare referred to my statement that there had been criticism outside. He said that I had indicated there had been rumblings long before the debate arose. Yes, I am sure the minister is well aware of the criticism to which I referred. That was not related directly to any criticism in this house; it was related to the opinion of competent observers with regard to the proceedings which had taken place here, something that is not only the right but the duty of the press of this country, a free land.

Then the Minister of National Health and Welfare used words that should not be overlooked. He said that he did not know what standard of fairness prompted this course of slander by smear. If he wants to speak about shame, then let me say that is one of the most shameful statements I have ever heard in this house.

Mr. Martin: Would the hon. member permit me to point out I had clearly said that did not apply to the hon. gentleman who is now speaking. There was nothing in his speech that suggested impropriety. I was directing my remarks at that moment to the observations of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Knowles: The words of the Leader of the Opposition apply.

Mr. Drew: I will simply say I believe the words I have just used apply with equal force if the minister's remarks were directed to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who has justified the high regard of the people of Canada for the fight he has waged for the rights of this house during the past three weeks.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare says that the very wording of the resolution is justification for not accepting it. The wording in the simplest and most moderate form describes exactly what took place here in this house last Friday, as the record will unfortunately show for just as long as the Hansard records of this house are read.

The minister asked, is reversal of a decision by the Speaker justification for such a motion? Is refusal to hear the members justification for this motion? No, and we never suggested that. What we have said and what I say now is that it was the reversal of a decision on his own initiative and without any precedent while at the same time refusing to hear any member of the opposition with regard to what he was doing. That is what we have said and that is what I say now.

The situation now before us is one which can be dealt with by this house. It is also one which can be dealt with by the government. This was no mere question of mistake. I said at the very outset we would never have thought of a motion of this kind that dealt only with a mistake in a ruling. I have indicated what was the impression of experienced reporters who observed this scene clearly, after they had witnessed the events of a week ago Thursday night and last Friday morning.

This is something that goes to the root of our continuing ability as members of a parliament with a government and an opposition. This is something that goes to the root of our ability to serve the people of Canada effectively here in this chamber. There can be a vote on a strictly partisan basis, as was indicated by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I do not agree with him in that assessment. I do not agree this will be on a strictly partisan basis. I believe, however, it will be a vote which if it is taken, will divide this house in a manner that is wholly inconsistent with the relationship of the Speaker to the house if he is to serve the house as a whole.

As a minority we are not claiming the right or the ability to impose our will upon the government; nevertheless, in the most earnest terms I could employ I sought at the time I introduced this motion to impress upon the Prime Minister that something ugly has come into this house, that the relationship of hon. members to each other, the relationship of hon. members to the Chair, and the traditions, decency and standards of this house are all affected by what has occurred. I said then and I repeat now as I close these remarks that this parliament cannot be the same again. A government which was prepared to do what was done at the close of this house a week ago last Thursday and the opening on Friday morning, a government which is prepared to defend this action with the specious arguments we have heard, cannot again command that measure of confidence in this house which a government should command no matter what party may form it.

There will not again be a return to that easy relationship and mutual understanding which with all our differences is essential to the performance of our duties, until the people of Canada, whose house this is, have an opportunity to choose the members, which will be done with the full knowledge by those people of all that has occurred in this house. If that were done a new parliament might well start in with that relationship which is so necessary. What has happened unfortunately cannot be forgotten. A new parliament, however, need not be hampered by the unhappy precedents which have been established in these past few days.

The Prime Minister has it within his power to restore the dignity of parliament by assuring the house now that at an appropriate time which will permit him to attend the conference in London and to carry out the necessary duties of government in the meantime, he will dissolve this house and seek from the people a mandate for a new parliament to bring parliament itself into harmony with the will of the people. If the Prime Minister would do that then I am sure there would be ready acceptance on this side of the proposal that this debate be adjourned.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to draw attention to it, but when I hear laughter—

Mr. Brown (Essex West): On your own side.

Mr. Drew: —at a statement of that kind, may I say to the hon. member who sits on my own side that it was not from my own side of the house but from Liberals who sit to our right.

An hon. Member: Behind you.

An hon. Member: From the minister.

Mr. Drew: And from a minister as well.

Mr. Lesage: I did not laugh.

Mr. Drew: When we hear laughter of that kind, then we know just how much the supporters of this government have yet come to realize the extent to which the traditions of parliament have been injured and wounded and damaged by what has occurred here in this house.

The Prime Minister has a course open to him which will make it possible for the government to fully carry out its responsibilities. What has happened is the responsibility of the government. It is the government in the course it has followed that has led by one inevitable step after another to this unhappy position. Let the government deal with this in the way it should. In that way it can avoid the necessity of a division upon this motion, but not otherwise.

I hope the government will accept its responsibilities in a sense of duty to the people of Canada, whose servants we are, and to future generations of Canadians whose happiness, whose opportunities, and whose welfare will be determined by what we do here.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I waited until the hon. gentleman had finished, as Your Honour has directed, in order to draw attention to a question of privilege which he raised almost at the beginning of his remarks. As I apprehended his words, he said that at the opening of the session on June 1, when Your Honour made a ruling, I had led this house in bedlam, as would be shown from the records of Hansard. I have examined Hansard for June 1 and the first time my name occurs in it is at page 4546 where I answered a question on the orders of the day after the incident to which the hon. gentleman refers had taken place.

What is more, the hon. gentleman has presumed to quote—I do not question his right to do it in the circumstances of this debate—three distinguished journalists—

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: That is not a question of privilege.

Mr. Pickersgill: —to support his charge.

An hon. Member: No.

An hon. Member: That is not a question of privilege.

Mr. Pickersgill: This is an allegation made against me personally and it seems to me that I should have an equal right to quote a brief extract from another distinguished journalist, Mr. Norman M. MacLeod.

Some hon. Members: Order.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Knowles: The Speaker is on his feet.

Mr. Speaker: The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration may say that what was alleged by the Leader of the Opposition about his conduct is not true, but I do not think he can go beyond that to prove other statements emanating from outside this house that some of the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition are not founded on fact. I do not think he can go beyond the words necessary to state that what the Leader of the Opposition has said about him is not correct. See standing order 37.

Mr. Pickersgill: I state that what the Leader of the Opposition stated about my conduct is not correct. It was contrary to the truth. I was horrified by what happened.

Mr. Casselman: You should sit on this side and watch yourself.

Mr. Weir: Very good.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REPORTED LAY-OFFS IN FARM IMPLEMENT AND AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Roland Michener (St. Paul's): May I direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Is the government developing any plans to deal with the present threatened unemployment due to lay-offs in the farm implement and automotive industries? If so, when will such plans be made known?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Well, Mr. Speaker, no specific plans directed toward absorbing the personnel being so laid off are being worked out, but I can tell my hon. friend that while it is unfortunate that skilled workers in that field may need to take other employment for the time being, nevertheless I am sure other employment will be available for most of them.

In the period since the middle of April down to about two or three weeks ago the number going off our application lists for employment across Canada has been almost a quarter of a million workers. The opportunities for employment are going to be quite numerous, and I hope those who are being laid off, not only in this industry but in others, will find the kind of employment that will carry them over. I can assure the house that our employment offices will work toward that end.

ALLEGED IMPORTATION OF UNITED STATES WELDERS INTO BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): May I direct another question to the Minister of Labour. Complaints have been wired in from Vancouver to the effect that Westcoast Transmission Company Limited has brought in about 14 welders from the United States within the last two weeks to work on the pipe line from the Peace river, although there are approximately 80 qualified welders in Vancouver who are out of work. I wonder if the minister is aware of that situation, and if he can tell us whether anything can be done so these Canadians may get that work.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): The hon. member's question the other day to my parliamentary assistant was reported to me, and on that as well as on the other information I have had, I have asked the commission for a report. I shall give it to the house just as soon as I get it.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): May I ask a question of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Has he in the past two months issued any permits to United States welders to enter the province of British Columbia to work on the same pipeline proposition?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I have no recollection of having done so, but I think it would be wise for me to make inquiries before giving a definite answer.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

135. Departmental administration, $301,000.

Mr. Nowlan: When the committee rose many weeks ago there had been a great deal of comment on the first item and many questions were asked. I am not sure whether there are any hon. members who wish to speak on this now, but I assume the minister will want to deal with the matters raised or I suggest respectfully he should.

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Chairman, as the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings has said, we have had two full days so far on the first item, and almost every member from a fishing area did speak on things concerning his riding.

I must start by thanking hon. members for the manner in which they have discussed the estimates of this department. The praise they gave will be most encouraging to the very devoted officers of the Department of Fisheries who have done such a good job in conserving and developing our fisheries resources. The criticism will be a spur to me, as minister, to correct those things that hon. members feel should be improved upon.

Almost all the members who spoke touched on two or three main issues so far as fisheries were concerned. First and foremost was the matter of unemployment insurance for fishermen. This, of course, is a matter under my colleague the Minister of Labour, but my two colleagues the minister from Newfoundland, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and the minister from Nova Scotia, the Minister of Public Works, as well as myself, are keenly interested and hopeful that a way can be found to include the fishermen of Canada under the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

We have an interdepartmental committee working on this problem, and I think we have made quite good progress. I think it is fair to say that there would not be too much difficulty in bringing the British Columbia fishermen under the present act, mainly because British Columbia fishing is governed by fixed seasons, the length of which is set by the Department of Fisheries. So long as it is the intention not to pay unemployment insurance during the fishing season but merely for those who are unemployed outside the fishing season, it would not be too difficult.

It is a much more difficult problem in the maritime areas, where the major fisheries do not have fixed seasons. But we are hopeful we can come up with a satisfactory solution. We had a very helpful meeting with the officials of the big fishermen's unions on the west coast, who put forward their views on this matter.

The second matter discussed by almost every member from a coastal fishing riding was the matter of territorial waters. Almost all members seemed to agree with the fishermen and the fishing industry that the present three-mile limit is inadequate so far as conservation of our fisheries resources is concerned. The Fisheries Council of Canada and the fishermen's unions of Canada have supported an extension to at least 12 miles out, based on a straight base line drawn along our coast. As you know, this fall this whole problem is going to be the subject of a formal discussion at the United Nations, at which the Secretary of State for External Affairs will put forward the case which has been prepared.

The maritime members spoke about the very difficult problem of trawlers. The member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings especially raised it. The complaint results from the fact that we keep our own Canadian trawlers, our big ships, 12 miles out to sea and so preserve the 12-mile coastal zone for fishermen who use smaller boats, draggers and even smaller, so there will be no interference between the big ships and the smaller ships. Unfortunately, however, we have no way of preventing foreign trawlers from coming into the three-mile limit since that is our present territorial boundary. We do not have that problem in British Columbia or in Newfoundland; it is a maritime provinces problem. It is a very difficult thing to decide because of the fact the inshore fishermen are vociferous about keeping the big ships out so they have a fair chance at the inshore fisheries, and naturally the Canadian trawlers who are 12 miles out and who see Spanish, Portuguese and other foreign trawlers inside that limit feel a sense of injustice.

In Nova Scotia they had a royal commission on this question, and our present policy is pretty well based on the findings of that commission. I cannot see that there is any clear-cut opinion in the fishing industry of Nova Scotia today for a change in the present regulations. We hope that a satisfactory conclusion will be a change in the territorial waters which will keep foreign trawlers out. This of course will be dependent on the United Nations discussions this fall.

One other question which almost every member raised was the need for more public works in the fishing ridings; anchorages, wharves or floats. This, of course, comes under my colleague the Minister of Public Works. I do the best I can in putting forward these requests from the fishermen for improved facilities. The entire assets of most fishermen are tied up in their fishing boats and gear, so naturally they want to see these things protected as much as possible.

Turning from these general questions raised by almost every member to other questions raised by members, I think the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings, who led off in the debate, spoke with pride of the value of the fishing industry to Canadians. It amounts to over $200 million a year in market value. I heartily agree with him that it is a very important industry. It is a very scattered industry. I have calculated that there are over 40 constituencies where the fishing industry is an important industry. It is a great resource which we in Canada have done our best to husband, and I think we can look forward to a steadily increasing fishing industry in this country.

He and other maritime members emphasized the importance of not forgetting the importance of the cured fish and the salt-cured industry of the maritime provinces. It is quite true we have had a very important development in the fresh and frozen fish industry, especially in fish sticks, and that is an added strength. I agree there is always going to be a need for a sound industry in the salted and cured fish of the maritimes. We are doing our best to encourage it. We do think it will be helpful to have a more diversified fishing industry, and not be totally dependent on markets in the Caribbean and Mediterranean.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni raised a question of why we do not make more use of our herring as human food. We have a very large catch of herring. This season on the west coast we caught an all-time record of a quarter of a million tons, and our east coast catch added to that, which means that about one-third of our fisheries catch in Canada is herring. Less than 2 per cent of the west coast herring is used for food. There is a larger percentage of the east coast herring used in that way, but we do put more than 90 per cent of our herring into fish meal and oil through reduction plants. This is not lost as a food resource, because these are the principal ingredients of the things which are added to food for our cattle and poultry, and they have resulted in improvement in growth and size.

The fishermen's union of British Columbia asked me to visit Norway on my way to Russia last summer to see what the Norwegians were doing with their herring. They felt that there was a much greater use being made of herring. So I made inquiries, and found to my surprise that over 80 per cent of Norwegian herring is also made into fish meal and fish oil, so the answer is the same in both countries. Herring is a small and bony fish, and the actual labour needed to fillet herring for the market and put it in a form acceptable to the modern housewife makes the cost so high that it is no longer competitive with other fish foods. We do not lose the value of herring as fish food in using it the way we do. We certainly would like to encourage the development of other uses for herring. At the moment it seems the principal use is going to be for fish meal and fish oil.

The hon. member asked me about our scientific program in the north Pacific. Last year the Americans, the Japanese and ourselves covered the entire treaty area of the north Pacific with the first real hydrographic and fisheries survey. We gained a lot of knowledge last summer. We shall have 25 ships out there this summer, all helping in the work of trying to find out the migration routes of the salmon, trying to find out the exact dividing line between those salmon which return to our shores and those salmon which go to Siberian and Japanese streams. I was very much surprised last year to see the extent of the scientific work done by the Russians in their part of the Pacific. They are sending two of their scientists to the meeting of the north Pacific commission in Seattle this year, who will make a contribution in that field.

The hon. member also mentioned the difficulty between our Russian friends and our Japanese friends in the north Pacific last summer. Last month the Japanese and the Russians had a meeting in Moscow and agreed on a conservation treaty in the north Pacific, and have so stated. We have not yet got the particulars of it, but I am told it pretty well follows the pattern of our own three-nation north Pacific treaty.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni also raised the question of the spawning forecast issued by our department, which would seem to indicate that we had lost quite a heavy brood of salmon eggs because of the floods in British Columbia last fall. That is so. It was an act of God about which we can do very little, but we have had very encouraging reports this spring. Our scientists have noticed the greatest seaward migration of sockeye salmon from the Adams river in all our history.

He asked whether Indians were eligible for loans under the Canadian Fisherman's Loan Act. That is a matter for decision pretty well by the bank managers. Indians are protected by law in many ways against being sued. Many of them have no real assets. Those who cannot obtain loans under this act, of course, have still the resources of the Indian affairs branch, which can make direct loans to Indians.

Then he asked what we were going to do when the great blast at Ripple Rock takes place to remove that obstacle to navigation. It will be at a time when the migratory fish, salmon and herring, are at a minimum. That is when the blast is scheduled to take place. There are no great numbers of ground fish in that area, mainly because the tidal sweep is so strong that ground fish do not hold their place. No doubt there will be some ground fish killed by the tremendous blast that will take place. They will come to the surface, and I am sure my hon. friend's constituents will be out there quickly to salvage as many of them as they can.

The hon. member for Burin-Burgeo commented on the place of the salt cod industry in Newfoundland, and indicated that the new plans were not the sole answer. He commented on the salt assistance program. He said it was a good program, but that the fishermen were required to fill out a form which only a chartered accountant or a Rhodes scholar could understand. I am not a chartered accountant but I am the other. I must confess that I would have very great difficulty in filling out this form. Because of his observation I have given instructions to our officials to try to simplify this form for the benefit of the fishermen of the Atlantic provinces.

The hon. member for Nanaimo spoke of the great importance of fisheries in our history. In fact he said it was the search for fisheries that led to the discovery of Canada. In reading the recent biography of Sir John A. Macdonald I was impressed with how important the fisheries debates were in this house in the early days of our confederacy, and the negotiations in Washington between the United States and Britain which affected our fisheries, at which we were only bystanders. We have fortunately improved that situation since that day.

Then he raised a question which was novel to me, on the rights of the Indians in the Cowichan river with respect to their weirs. I had never heard of the weirs, but I found that our Indians up to 1939 did have their weirs on the side of the river, which was the only place in British Columbia where such weirs existed. It was in 1939 discussed at a meeting between the Indian band and the department and they agreed to abandon the weirs in return for the permission to use dip nets, spears and gaffs, which they have done quite satisfactorily.

Last season was a very poor season for chum salmon. It was a low run and some Indians had difficulty getting the number of salmon they usually get for food purposes for themselves, so blamed it on the lack of weirs. There is practically no limit on what Indians can take or how they take them as long as the salmon is for themselves or for their dogs.

The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich raised a point that he was very much bothered about, namely my refusal to accept the recommendations made by the international salmon commission that part of the Canadian fisheries area be completely closed. I gave the reasons why I had to do that at that time. Since that time the salmon commission have framed other regulations which are in keeping with the treaty passed in this house. I feel, from talking to members of the commission, that they think the time may be ripe to suggest changes in the treaty which, of course, will have to come before this parliament and the United States congress.

He raised one point which was very important to the work of our department. He turned to me and said that I should look at the beam in my own eye, because he felt our fisheries officers were not being paid enough. That is a feeling I have, too. I was glad to have his observations, because at that time I was conducting a very strenuous campaign with the chairman of the civil service commission about the status of our officers as compared with other departments. It was a battle which I am glad to say I won, and I thank him for his comments which I was able to show as being illustrative of the fact that on both sides it was believed there was need for remedy there.

We have, of course, a problem in British Columbia because of the higher wage rates in effect in industry there as compared with the maritime provinces. We have uniform pay rates for our fisheries officers across the country. I think in the maritimes this pay is quite attractive in comparison with industrial pay, but in British Columbia there are many who feel that they can make more money in industry or in fishing itself rather than accepting employment as fisheries officers.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam raised the matter of our price support action a couple of years ago on bloaters from the Magdalen islands. He pointed out that we had sent salt cod to Korea and Greece, and that instead of condemning these bloaters and putting them into fish meal we should have sent them to the Congo or some depressed area. It is quite true we provided almost $1 million worth of salt cod after the earthquake in Greece and the war in Korea, but both these countries asked for salt cod. Salt fish is a staple of their diet.

These particular bloaters were a part of a very big catch in 1953. Bloaters have a very limited market. They are a very simple form of fish, a herring slightly salted and smoked whole. There is a limited market for them in Haiti and the Dominican Republic. The private industry had sold all their bloaters, but the co-operatives down there had held out for a market increase. There was a great drop in the market and they were unable to sell the bloaters without help for almost a year, and finally they asked for a price support.

Our price support program only relates to the fishermen themselves. We examined these bloaters. Those unfit for human consumption were destroyed. There were some not unfit for human consumption but they could not be sold to anybody because they were stiff and hard and crumbled into powder when touched. These we got at a very low price and turned over to the fish plant to be reduced into fish meal. I do not think the people in Haiti, the Dominican Republic, Greece or Korea would have welcomed the bloaters, and the cost of transporting them there certainly would have been far more than the worth of the bloaters.

The hon. member for Charlotte raised the question of the suggested move of two sections of the St. Andrews research station to Halifax. The hon. member for Royal also raised the question. Since it has been before the house I have asked the fisheries research board to hold up any action on that proposal. I have appointed as an industrial member of the research board from New Brunswick the manager of one of the fish plants in Charlotte, Mr. Leigh Williamson, who is also the mayor of the city of St. Andrews, and I am sure he will put forward the reasons against making any alterations at the next meeting of the research board.

I think those are the major points that were raised on item 1. There are a number of other matters directly connected with other items, such as the vessel indemnity plan, which I think probably could be best answered on those items.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, I have just one question at the moment. The minister has referred to the problem of territorial waters. We realize this is a serious problem, one which has been before this committee now for several years, and which I am sure will be before it for some years yet to come.

When I raised the matter last year and asked the minister particularly with respect to the Curtis report which was to be submitted to the government, I think the record shows the answer I got at that time was that this report had not yet been studied by the government but it would be shortly and thereafter the report of the Curtis commission would be made available. I may be mistaken about this, but as far as I know the report has not yet been made available. I was wondering where that report is and if it now could be produced so we could study the situation further.

Mr. Sinclair: The report has been completed. It is in the Department of External Affairs. I do not know whether my colleague has prepared his submission to the United Nations for this fall, but I do not know of any reason why the actual Curtis report should not be made available. I have told my colleague of the undertaking I gave here in the house, and I am sure the report will be made available.

Mr. Nowlan: I hope the minister will take this matter up with the Secretary of State for External Affairs, because we were told last year it was in his hands and certainly this matter is going to go on for some considerable time. It seriously affects some constituencies because it is allied with the trawler problem, and it is one of very great importance to the fishermen in my own area. I am not going to pursue this matter further, but I would urge the Secretary of State for External Affairs when he takes the matter up at the United Nations to strive to achieve a little more action than we have had heretofore.

Mr. Barnett: I wish to bring a matter up for a little discussion while we are still on item 1 of these estimates. I did not have the time or opportunity to do so when we were considering these estimates earlier this year. The matter about which I am concerned relates to a problem which may have been brought to the attention of a number of hon. members of the house by the united fishermen and allied workers' union of British Columbia in respect to the problem which they feel they have in connection with having representatives or observers of their organization in attendance at meetings of the various international fisheries commissions.

I realize that one might say this comes within the purview of the Department of External Affairs; nevertheless I feel it is a matter which, like a number of other matters, is of active concern to the Department of Fisheries and to members who are concerned with fisheries problems. Certainly the lead which the present Minister of Fisheries has given in the matter of international treaties I think would bear out the fact that this is a matter which can be properly raised at this time.

I think one might as well state what is part of the problem in frank terms. Part of the problem arises out of the question of the passing of communists or alleged communists across the border which exists between Canada and the United States. Part of the grievance which the fishermen's union raised was in respect to the treatment some of their members have received in an attempt to cross the border. Quite frankly I have a great deal of sympathy for them in that particular problem, because I happen to have had a little experience on one or two occasions.

I shall not elaborate on the experiences in detail, but I remember one occasion in particular when I was attempting to cross the border as a delegate to attend an international union convention and certain circumstances developed which in my opinion were rather unfortunate. The most vivid recollection I have of that incident, as a matter of fact, is that one of our delegation who happened to be a member of the Liberal party of Canada was subjected to a great deal of suspicion immediately the immigration officer discovered the membership card of the Liberal party in his wallet.

As I say, that problem is one aspect of this matter, and one which I agree is not primarily the concern of the Minister of Fisheries as such. Nevertheless I think perhaps the minister would agree that attending these meetings either as an observer or an adviser by those who from time to time are chosen to represent a body such as the united fishermen and allied workers' union is a legitimate desire on their part.

Quite frankly I do not know what the solution is, in so far as we in this house can have no jurisdiction over the regulations that are put into effect from time to time by the congress of the United States, other than the solution which the fishermen's union actually did propose in one of their communications. They suggested that arrangements should be made to hold these meetings either in Canada or at some place where citizens of both countries who enjoy the normal right of freedom of movement in their respective countries would be in a position to attend if they so desired.

I have almost come to the point of suggesting to the Minister of Fisheries that he might give serious consideration to erecting a building for the holding of meetings of international bodies on the border at the Peace Arch near Blaine, one-half of which could be on one side of the border and the other half on the other side of the border. In a situation of that kind naturally the citizens of both countries would be free to be in attendance. I think this is a matter that should be receiving some consideration, in view of the number of these international commissions which we now have in which both Canada and the United States participate. I would welcome any statement on this problem which the minister might feel like making.

Mr. Sinclair: As the hon. member has pointed out, this is a matter primarily for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. We have Canadian members on these international commissions, and since I have been minister I have appointed one commercial fisherman on each commission so the fishermen would have a direct voice in the commissions. We have never had any trouble whatsoever with members of the commissions travelling back and forth between countries.

In addition there are advisory committees whose members are nominated by the fishermen's union, the fisheries association, the vessel owners and other groups. It is true that on occasion certain members of these advisory committees which were picked by the fishermen's union have been stopped at the boundary on the ground that they were communists or communist sympathizers. I wrote to the union and pointed out that we have no direct control over what the United States do in the way of permitting entry into their country. I pointed out to the fishermen's union that only a fraction of one per cent of their members are communist, and therefore it should not be too hard when they know what barriers there are to choose able fishermen who are not under suspicion as being communists or communist supporters.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I agree with what the minister has said, but I still think we should recognize that any organization should have the right to conduct its own internal affairs and select any of its people to represent it. It should be possible to make arrangements so that can be done. Whether the minister or I may consider that a man is the best delegate the union could have chosen, that in fact is not our business. Perhaps some arrangement could be made to facilitate this movement in accordance with basic democratic principles with which I think both the minister and I agree. I pointed out earlier that a member of the political organization to which the minister belongs was under definite suspicion by a certain immigration officer. This would indicate that even with the best intentions an organization such as the united fishermen and allied workers' union might have difficulty in sending perhaps the most innocent of their members across the line.

Mr. Goode: Mr. Chairman, I doubt that this has very much to do with the Minister of Fisheries, but the matter has been allowed to be brought up on the floor of the committee and I want to comment briefly upon what the Minister of Fisheries has said. He represents my views entirely. I have a large fishing population in one part of my riding, and at Steveston in my riding is located the largest cannery in the British Empire.

I am at variance with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. If I understood him rightly he said the united fishermen should be allowed to send delegates to other countries without difficulty. I want to take issue with him on that. This country has a responsibility in regard to those who are sent to other countries to represent us. As he knows and as the minister knows, if a representative of the united fishermen's union is chosen to go to another country it will be the secretary treasurer who ran against me in the last election as a labour progressive candidate. I hope the Minister of Fisheries and the Secretary of State for External Affairs will never allow that person to represent Canada in any foreign country outside of those behind the iron curtain.

Mr. Barnett: I believe the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond has put a slightly incorrect interpretation upon what I said.

Mr. Goode: If I did, I apologize.

Mr. Barnett: I was not suggesting to the Minister of Fisheries or to the minister of external affairs that we should assume the right to choose certain citizens of our country to be sent to other countries. All I was suggesting was that the minister canvass the possibility of arranging for these commissions to meet in Canada or in line with the suggestion which I put forward, not too seriously in its exact form but nevertheless with some seriousness as far as the principle involved is concerned, to make it possible for those who might be chosen from time to time to attend as advisers or observers on behalf of the union. The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond has mentioned one particular member of the union and has referred to certain of his political activities. Let me make it clear at once that I am no more in agreement with the policies which that member espouses than is the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond.

Mr. Goode: I am sure of that.

Mr. Ashbourne: Mr. Chairman, I had hoped to have spoken the first day the estimates of the Department of Fisheries were before the committee, but another hon. member was anxious to get away before we took up private and public bills that afternoon and I gave my place to him. The second day the estimates were before the committee I was on my way back from Newfoundland where I had attended a conference on northern Newfoundland affairs. I did not get back until Saturday morning, having been delayed. I had taken part in the conference during that week as it had opened on Tuesday and finished on Thursday.

I should like to draw a few points to the attention of the minister and I shall be very brief, as I did not know that these estimates were to come up this afternoon. We have heard quite a bit about the need for unemployment insurance for fishermen, and as the minister has mentioned this afternoon the fishermen are looking forward to having something done in their behalf in this regard.

There has been quite a decline in the volume of fish caught around Newfoundland during the past few years, and one reason is the lower earnings of fishermen as compared with the wages they can earn from carpentry and employment in other industries. There is a great demand for their services at the present time. The small catch is reflected in the amount of our exports to those countries to which we have habitually been forwarding codfish. That represents less money for our people. The fact that there has been a decline is quite evident, and I think steps should be taken to counteract this decline.

The granting of 50 per cent of the cost of salt last year has been greatly appreciated by the fishermen of Newfoundland, and we are glad to hear that this is to be continued for another year. Some of us were hoping that something might be done to encourage the making of more light salted fish rather than heavy salted fish. The markets of Italy and Brazil and also Spain have a preference for that kind of fish, the slack salted, hard dried fish. This granting of the 50 per cent of the value of the salt does not really tend to improve the total catch and the total production of the light salted fish. It rather helps in the way of encouraging the heavy salted type, and much of it, of course, has been going from Newfoundland to the Nova Scotia fish plants, where they have been drying this fish which they have been buying from the Newfoundland fishermen.

Last year I spoke about the need for encouraging a better cure for fish. I understood from the minister that he would make certain studies in that regard. I should like him to let the house know what have been the results of his studies in this regard, because I think it would definitely be of great advantage to give some positive inducement to the fishermen in order that they would make more light salted fish. If some inducement in that regard were offered to the fishermen, it would be a means of encouraging them to do that.

The only other matter to which I would like to draw the minister's attention at this time is that I consider something should be done to increase the number of cullers, who have to cull the salt cod which come in from the fishermen. It is no easy matter to stand up and pass judgment on the fish, but there have to be cullers. Whilst it is not a job that many people relish, because they are often called into question, I would suggest that a school be set up or some instruction be given to the younger men in order that they might be in a position where they could more easily grade the different qualities of fish that are presented to them. If the government took a step in this direction I think it would be very helpful to the industry.

Mr. Sinclair: I have short reports to make on both these matters when we come to the items concerned: item 162 on salt assistance, and item 142 on fish inspection. I can speak at more length then and answer the points raised by both the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador and the other Newfoundland member.

Item agreed to.

Items 136 and 137 agreed to.

138. Industrial development service, $590,000.

Mr. Nowlan: I notice that there is a very substantial reduction in the estimates for this year as compared with the year before, amounting to $385,000. This is the item dealing with the industrial development service. I wonder whether the minister could give us a word of explanation as to what is involved in this reduction.

Mr. Sinclair: The vote in the past two years covered our new experimental station at Valleyfield in Newfoundland. That is almost completed. I think most of the difference is due to that one big project.

Item agreed to.

Field services—

139. Field services administration, $768,470.

Mr. Nowlan: There are several questions that could be asked about item 139. That is the first item dealing generally with field services. I would be perfectly happy to have that carried now if it is understood that someone will make a more general comment on the field services on some future occasion.

Mr. Sinclair: Agreed.

Item agreed to.

Protection branch—

140. Operation and maintenance, $3,288,650.

Mr. Barnett: I rise at this point on a specific item which has to do, as I understand it, with the operation and maintenance of the protection branch. First of all let me say that I was very pleased to hear the minister's statement earlier, in referring to the remarks made on the first item by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich, on the matter of the salary levels of some of his officials in the field, and I am glad that some adjustment has been made there. I was certainly in agreement with the remarks made by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich earlier this year.

The other point I wish to raise is in connection with the field service officers of the department, and in particular with respect to the question of the patrolmen who are hired on a seasonal basis, as I understand it, every year. This question was brought to my attention during some of the travels in which I engaged during the last recess. It is in respect to what I understand to be a new regulation calling for the compulsory retirement of patrolmen at the age of 65.

I might state briefly that it was brought to my attention in one instance by one of the patrolmen. If it had been only a matter of that single instance I might not have considered it was a matter to raise at this time, but from other conversations I have had with fishermen and people who have a knowledge of the fisheries and the functioning of the protection service on the coast, it does appear to me that this compulsory retirement in all cases of the patrolmen at the age of 65—if that is actually the situation—is something which could very well militate against the effectiveness of the protection service which is maintained on the coast of British Columbia. The minister would probably agree with me that in many cases the patrolmen who are engaged by the department are senior fishermen who have had a good many years of active experience in the game of fishing, and in some cases according to anecdotes to which I have listened—

The Chairman: Order. It being five o'clock, we must proceed to the consideration of private and public bills.

Mr. Barnett: If I might just finish my sentence, Mr. Chairman, I was going to say—who had some experience in the problems of beating the game, as far as fisheries protection is concerned, in their earlier and more exuberant years.

Mr. Sinclair: Is that a recommendation for patrolmen?

Mr. Barnett: Perhaps for that reason they make very wise and efficient servants of the department when they assume the obligations of the department.

Progress reported.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Private and public bills.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, it just occurred to me that it is possible the whole hour may not be taken up. I am not aware whether it is going to be taken up or not. If it is not, the committee might have leave to sit later this day, if that occurs.

Mr. Speaker: Is that proposal agreed to?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVATE BILLS

MARITIME STOCK BREEDERS' ASSOCIATION

The house in committee on Bill No. 340, respecting the Maritime Stock Breeders' Association—Mr. Purdy—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Exhibitions.

Mr. Weir: May we have an explanation of this bill? It is a rather important one, and I think there is a good deal of interest in it on the part of hon. members of the house. Is the sponsor of the bill going to say anything about these various sections.

Mr. Purdy: This is a bill amending the charter of the maritime stock breeders' association, which was passed by this house in 1922. I might say that the maritime stock breeders' association is the concern which sponsors the Maritime winter fair at Amherst in the constituency of my friend the hon. member for Cumberland.

The only change we are asking for is this. In the original incorporation the association was given the privilege of holding exhibitions of livestock. We are now asking, in addition to that, for the privilege of holding exhibitions of livestock, agricultural produce and any other products, goods or services produced on or for a farm, and also to make available its facilities for the purchase or sale of any such livestock or other such agricultural produce, products, goods or services.

The second clause is a new one. Formerly the association had not the power to borrow money. It is now seeking the power to borrow money in order that it may temporarily finance. Formerly the money was advanced by the directors. I might say that this is a great institution, bringing on the livestock in the maritime provinces which in a few years will be in active competition with the livestock from the wonderful province of Manitoba, in which is the constituency of the hon. gentleman who asked the question.

Mr. Weir: I thank the hon. member.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Pearkes: May I ask a question? Does this act refer to fur-bearing animals as well?

Mr. Purdy: If you call the hides of livestock fur, I suppose it does. Otherwise it does not.

Mr. Pearkes: That is no answer. I should like to know whether it applies to fur-bearing animals. There are many farmers who are engaged in the raising of fur for domestic purposes. There are fox farms, mink farms and that sort of thing. Are they included in the provisions of this act?

Mr. Purdy: May I just say this. It refers to exhibitions of livestock. My definition of livestock would hardly include fur-bearing animals. It might come under the definition of fur farms.

Mr. MacLean: The sponsor of the bill is of the opinion that it does not include fur-bearing animals. I have been at this exhibition at various times, and I may say that one of the most interesting exhibits is that of live mink. I believe they also have foxes, but I am not sure about that second exhibit. I would therefore think it might include fur-bearing animals as livestock.

Mr. Knowles: What about wolves?

Mr. Purdy: I can only say that I have attended this fair since it originated in 1900, and that I have never seen any mink exhibited and I have never seen foxes exhibited. They are a separate industry, as I would understand it.

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry to disagree with my hon. friend from Truro. I have also attended this fair for some years. They have an excellent showing of foxes and an excellent showing of mink each year.

Mr. Nowlan: I can say that I have also been to this fair, Mr. Chairman. It is an excellent fair, in any event. Certainly what this association has done has been to promote its activities. Although this bill is subject to some scrutiny and some questioning here —that is proper on all bills, closure not having been invoked—I suggest that nevertheless it is an association which is doing good work in the maritime provinces. I hope it will commend itself to the support of hon. members.

Mr. Weir: I am entirely satisfied.
