CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

EXTENSION OF RIGHT TO VOTE AT ADVANCE POLLS

The house resumed, from Friday, March 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. Knowles for the second reading of Bill No. 121, to amend the Canada Elections Act.

Mr. G. C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Before the mover of the bill closes the debate, if there are no other speakers I should like to say a few words on this matter. I have forgotten the date upon which we had this bill up for second reading, but it was many weeks ago.

Mr. Knowles: It was March 9.

Mr. Nowlan: At that time the Secretary of State (Mr. Pinard) spoke on this matter and presented certain facts to the house which I think are relevant, because I have had the opportunity of sitting on the committee of this house which has dealt with the elections act and proposed amendments over a period of six or seven years, ever since I have been in this house.

This matter contained in the proposed bill, or at least the important phase of it which is the matter of the advance polls, has been considered by that committee on various occasions. Evidence has been taken and views have been strongly presented, but in every case of which I have knowledge the committee has decided that it was not advisable to adopt this proposal.

I think many arguments could be advanced in its favour. I believe one of the things which many people overlook is the difference between our election act and the election acts of Great Britain and other parts of the commonwealth. As I understand it, we are the only part of the commonwealth which does not have a closed election list which enables them to be ready for an election at any time. You get your certificate that you are entitled to vote; therefore elections can be brought on very quickly and with very few complications. In our country, for reasons which apparently are justified because of conditions which prevail here, we have never adopted that practice. Our lists are prepared at election time and that involves a great deal of time and expense. Arguments which may apply in other jurisdictions with respect to this matter, therefore, I do suggest do not apply here.

Now, of course, it is very easy to argue, and it is desirable, that everyone be given an opportunity to vote no matter what the circumstances may be; that is the idea. It is perhaps difficult to argue against that. It is always difficult to argue against something which has a theoretical appeal. We all realize that people are deprived of a vote because of the fact that occasionally they have to be away. I think it is desirable that the elections committee of this house, when that committee is set up again, should consider, as was recommended as I recall it at our last session, enlarging to some extent the scope of the advance poll so as to give more people an opportunity to vote. In fact I believe that scope has been enlarged during the time I have served on the committee.

The proposal contained in this bill is to the effect that any person who signs a declaration that he intends to or thinks he will be away on election day, can vote at the advance poll. As I recall it, the Secretary of State put certain financial considerations on the record which I think should be considered by this house, although they are not definitive and should not be taken as absolute. The mere fact that it is going to cost the country something additional should not be the yardstick we use in deciding whether or not we are going to give people the vote. Nevertheless, it is somewhat of an important factor.

I have discussed this matter with the chief electoral officer, who is an official of the house, and as I recall it he told me, although I did not take time to look up the record, that in the last election we had 243 advance polls in Canada. If this bill is adopted the chief electoral officer assumes we would have to have one advance poll for every 5 polls in urban areas and one advance poll for every 15 polls in rural areas, or approximately 5,000 more advance polls. If we take the cost as it was the last time, $130 a poll, you will see that it means a substantial increase in cost to the treasury. As I say, it is only one factor, but it is one which we have to consider.

There is also the factor that you are going to have a miniature general election over a period of three days instead of one. At the moment everyone knows pretty well who is entitled to vote at the advance poll. The classes are defined and you make your preparations accordingly, in so far as manning the polls is concerned by the chief electoral officer, as well as by the political parties who may or may not decide to be represented at those polls. If you are going to have a situation where anyone may come in and vote it is going to result in a miniature general election for a period of three days rather than one. I assume that would mean that the political parties would have to be represented at these polls.

Again that may or may not be a matter of expense, and as I say expense should not be the definitive factor in this question. It would mean extra expense in most ridings, certainly in the urban areas, though I think there are some rural areas where workers can be found on a voluntary basis and where they would be shocked at the thought of being paid for their services. But I am told there are many areas, and I can see the practice developing even in the rural areas in the maritimes which I think is reprehensible, where you have to pay people to work for a political party at election time.

In urban areas, if you have to employ agents and scrutineers for a period of three days instead of for the one day which is generally the practice, it means that at least this is going to aggravate the problem of getting candidates, running elections, and so forth. I think also it involves the fact that candidates would have to be nominated at least one week earlier than has been the practice heretofore.

That is what the chief electoral officer advised the committee a year ago, and I think we have to take his judgment on this because he is an experienced officer, and certainly a very fair one, and one whose judgment I am sure this house will accept. He says it involves the nomination of candidates for at least three weeks prior to an election rather than the two weeks which has prevailed heretofore. That may or may not be an important factor but, generally speaking, there has been the feeling that there has been difficulty in the past when political parties nominated candidates too early. That is another reason why I think one should consider this very carefully.

I think an important factor above all which hon. members should consider, particularly those from urban areas—and certainly it does not concern me because I come from a rural area—is that in an urban area you would have a situation where a person could vote on an advanced poll certificate. All he would have to do would be to sign a declaration that he thought he was going to be away on election day. The opportunities for impersonation are such that what may have happened in certain urban areas in the past will, to use a slang expression, seem like a Sunday school picnic compared with what will happen if this provision comes into effect.

I have heard these arguments pro and con over the past years. I have listened to evidence of various people dealing with the suggestion. The committee representing all parties in this house gave careful consideration to those representations, and in each case the committee decided by a very substantial majority that it was not in the public interest to enlarge the advance poll to the extent that is proposed in this bill, though recognizing the theoretical advisability of giving everyone a chance to vote.

Opposed to that would be the practical and mechanical difficulties, to say nothing of the cost, which could be imposed on the other side. In every case the committee has voted against this proposal. My own feeling, Mr. Speaker, is that the committee adopted the proper procedure on those occasions. As one who has gone through it in past years, I cannot support the bill at this time.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word or two on this matter. I have had a little experience with elections, and I believe we should make it as easy as possible for people to cast their votes in our elections.

One criticism that is being made everywhere about democratic elections is that people are no longer interested in them. We cannot get the vote out. In municipal elections the number of voters is as small as 30 per cent. In my opinion we should do anything we can to make it easier for people to vote at an election without, of course, irregularities.

I am not greatly impressed with the argument of additional costs made by the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings. I have noticed that in almost every department of life when anything new is suggested there is always opposition to it. Once it is accepted nobody would think of doing away with it. The class of people who can vote at advance polls has been changed from time to time. At one time it was reserved for railroad men and commercial travellers. As hon. members know, a person can cease to be a commercial traveller, still be a member of the commercial travellers' association and carry his card in that association, and vote at an advance poll as long as he lives.

The number of people who may be away from their homes on election day is increasing because of changes in our way of life. A few years ago very few people in this country, with the exception of professional and wealthy people, had holidays. Now almost everybody has holidays and they get them at different times. We found that because the last election was held at the time it was, a great many people were prevented from voting because they were away on holidays. We should use every means we can, with all the safeguards that are necessary, to make it easy for people to vote. If a man or woman knows that on election day he or she is going to be away and would like to cast a vote and takes steps to do that, we should look upon it as an indication of good citizenship and we should help that person to perform his or her good citizenship function.

I imagine at all elections, if voters know the right people, they can vote at an advance poll whether they fall within the class who vote at an advance poll or not. I am going to give a little incident that I have knowledge of myself because it happened to me. I shall not mention names or dates, because in agreeing to this I may have committed an offence under the Canada Elections Act. On the Friday night preceding the election a man called me up and said, "Angus, I would like to vote for you on Monday, but I am a contractor. I have a contract in Victoria and I have to be there. Is there any way by which I can vote at an advance poll?" I said, "No, there is not. There is no way by which you can legally vote at an advance poll, but I will give you a tip. You go to the headquarters of the Liberal party and tell them of your predicament but do not tell them whom you are going to vote for. Then call me up on Saturday night before you leave for Victoria and tell me how you got along". Well, he called me up on Saturday night and said, "I voted". I knew he would vote if I sent him to the right people. I did not ask him how he voted.

Mr. Pinard: Was he not a travelling salesman instead of a contractor?

Mr. MacInnis: I do not know what he was when he voted, but he was a contractor before and he was a contractor after he voted. What he was during the time he cast his vote is not material. We should use every means we can to get people to vote and to vote honestly. We should use every means we can to keep people from having to use subterfuges to perform their duties of citizenship.

The amendment proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre may be too wide. Perhaps it is; I do not know. If it is too wide we should accept the principle sympathetically. If we cannot accept it today we should refer it to the next meeting of the elections committee, and I am quite sure that if we discuss it with the sympathy it deserves we shall increase the number of people who will be able to cast their ballots at advance polls because they will be away from their homes legitimately on election day.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, when this bill was debated on March 9 the Secretary of State (Mr. Pinard), speaking for the government, indicated his opposition to the bill, though he did profess sympathy with my contention that it should be made possible for everyone who is on the voters' list to vote.

The arguments the Secretary of State advanced against the bill were mainly two. In the first place it was his view that if it were made possible for anyone whose name is on the voters' list to vote at the advance poll there might be a tendency for great numbers of people to vote at the advance poll and leave only 60 per cent or half the population to vote on the ordinary polling day. He felt that that would be injurious to the interest in general elections, and for that reason he was not sympathetic to the bill. He also indicated there were certain technical difficulties in connection with carrying out a procedure of this kind. It was mainly on those two grounds, if I remember correctly, that he felt the government could not accept the bill.

The hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska also spoke in opposition to the bill, and as I recall it he echoed the sentiments expressed by the Secretary of State. He also expressed some surprise and perhaps concern over the fact that if this bill went through people simply going off on trips to Winnipeg would be able to vote before they left on such a desirable journey.

I should like to say, Mr. Speaker, that I think the Secretary of State put up a rather absurd argument when he suggested that a large percentage of people would vote at the advance poll even though they were not going to be away from home on election day. The reason I think that argument is absurd is that we already have universal voting at advance polls in a number of the provinces in this country. It happens in my home city of Winnipeg in the province of Manitoba in provincial elections, and although more people percentage-wise take advantage of that right than is the case in federal elections—because of the difference in the law—still the number is not great at all.

Mr. Pinard: That does not make the argument absurd, I believe; but it might well be that the situation would become such in a dominion general election.

Mr. Knowles: I think it is pretty difficult for the Secretary of State to argue from no known facts to the position he takes. I think it is much more logical to deduce what would happen from a parallel situation that already exists.

Mr. Pinard: But it does increase, does it not?

Mr. Knowles: No, and there are other hon. members from other provinces, as a matter of fact, who have expressed the same surprise at that argument. I do not think there is any question but that the general interest would be in the ordinary day of polling, the general election day. All we are asking for here is that those who find they have to be away from home for any reason be given the right to vote at an advance poll.

As to the technical difficulties in carrying out a matter of this kind, I recognize them readily. I did so, as a matter of fact, when I spoke in introducing the bill on second reading. I was able to indicate on that occasion, and express my appreciation in doing so, that I had assistance from two of our officials, the chief electoral officer and our parliamentary counsel, in the preparing of the bill. I take the responsibility for what is in the bill, but I did have their advice and assistance in putting it together, and I suggest that it does contain practical ways in which this principle of the right of anyone who has to be away to vote at the advance poll can be preserved.

Nevertheless, as I suggested when I moved second reading of the bill on March 9, these technical difficulties constitute the kind of details that can be discussed if this bill can have second reading and then be referred to a committee. In other words, Mr. Speaker, what we are dealing with at this point is the principle rather than the details of the bill, and the principle is very simple and clear; namely, that if we are going to have advance polls the right to vote at an advance poll should not be restricted to a limited category of people but should be extended to all who find they will be away from their homes on election day.

As to the point raised by the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska regarding people who go on trips, let there be no doubt about it, Mr. Speaker; one of the main reasons I have presented this bill and one of the main reasons it has support from certain sections of the community to which I shall refer in a moment, is because it is now true that more people have holidays than used to be the case.

It is also true that elections generally seem to come in the summer period. In recent years elections have been held in June or in August or in October, if we go back to 1935. I think it is generally recognized that barring some unexpected event that would force an election at an unexpected time, elections will continue to be held in the summer period. Let there be no secret about it; this bill is advanced partly in order that people who rightly go away on holidays might have the right to vote. Surely going away on a holiday is not a crime for which one should lose his right as a citizen to vote at a general election.

Mr. MacInnis: Legitimate business.

Mr. Knowles: Some people who go away can get back from their holidays, depending on how far away they are or how much money they have to spend to make the trip back home, but for a great many people that is impossible. We feel the citizens of the country should be entitled to vote even if a general election comes in the period they are away on holidays, and that is precisely one of the reasons for presenting this bill.

I shall not take further time to repeat the arguments I made in presenting the bill on March 9, for the obvious reason is that if a vote has to be taken I would not want to keep the house here past six o'clock, so I shall conclude with just this further comment.

Hon. members will recall that they have received, if their experience is similar to mine, quite a few letters in support of Bill No. 121 which is now before them, and I think they will recognize that these letters in the main have come from two types of organizations. They have come on the one hand from the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and from local chambers of commerce. They have come on the other hand from labour organizations. I think that makes it pretty clear this is the kind of bill that appeals to a cross section of the community, for surely if you take those who are represented by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and those who are represented by the labour organizations of this country you have a very large section of the Canadian population. As hon. members are aware, these organizations have given their support to the principle of this bill and have urged that this house give it a favourable vote at this time.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, if the house agrees to the second reading of this bill it would then be my suggestion that it be referred for further study to the committee on privileges and elections.

My friend the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway has expressed surprise at my suggesting that it be referred to the committee on privileges and elections. The reason for that, if I may say so to my colleague, is that the last time the Canada Elections Act was under consideration by a committee of the house, instead of a special committee being set up it was referred to the committee on privileges and elections.

Mr. Pinard: Was not a similar proposal studied at that time in the committee and voted down?

Mr. Knowles: Certainly. This bill was not before the committee, but the principle contained in the bill was considered in the committee. I believe it was on the motion of the hon. member for Dauphin.

Mr. Pinard: I just wanted to mention that because I would have thought it had been given full study at the time, and that was quite recently.

Mr. Knowles: Was it in this parliament?

Mr. Pinard: No, at the last revision.

Mr. Knowles: In other words it was previous to the election of 1953?

Mr. Pinard: No, at the previous session, I meant; it was considered during the revision of the act last year.

Mr. Knowles: May I say to the Secretary of State that sometimes Liberals make progress and accept the things they have been turning down across the years.

Mr. Pinard: Perhaps the same is true of my hon. friend and he might also change his mind.

Mr. Knowles: If the minister wants examples I can keep him here quite a while telling him of proposals which have been made from this corner of the house which were turned down year after year but eventually accepted by the government of the day. I believe the day will come when the wishes expressed by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and by the labour organizations of this country will be accepted by parliament as a whole, and it will be enacted that the right to vote at advance polls in general elections should be extended not to just a few of our people but to all those entitled to vote. I hope the house will agree to the second reading of this bill.

Mr. Boisvert: May I ask a question of the hon. member? Would it not be possible that more people would vote at the advance polls than at the designated polls on polling day?

Mr. Knowles: I suppose it would be possible for the entire population to vote at the advance polls instead of on the general polling day, but if I may say so without offending my hon. friend, for I do not want to do that, I think the suggestion that that would happen is in the realm of absurdity. I do not think it would happen in a federal general election any more than it has happened in provincial general elections in my own province of Manitoba. I think the interest of our people would still be in the general election day, but at the same time this measure would remove one of the most serious grievances we come up against in every general election, when people come into the committee rooms of the various parties and into the headquarters of the returning officer wondering why it is that although there are advance polls no vote is available to them. The purpose of this bill is to correct that situation.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: On Monday we shall take interim supply and, if that is passed, we shall take the resolution with respect to the Canadian National Railway Company financing, the resolution in the name of the Minister of National Defence with respect to the Defence Services Pension Act, etc., and second reading of the bill in my name in respect to the Tariff Board Act.

Mr. Drew: Could I ask the Prime Minister if he has yet reached a decision as to whether there will be an adjournment?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): No, Mr. Speaker, it has not been possible to reach any decision since this morning.

Mr. Drew: I would point out simply, so the position may be clear, that to ask for one month's interim supply with the possibility of adjournment creates a situation which cannot be disregarded. We are not dealing with a normal situation, if there is one month's supply and then an adjournment for several months, and for that reason I think that in asking for any consideration of the procedure that should be adopted it is essential that we know exactly what the position will be.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): We could not suggest an adjournment after having obtained only one month's supply.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

VETERANS' TRAINING EXPENDITURES

INTERIM SUPPLY—STATEMENT AS TO COURSE TO BE FOLLOWED

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in view of the question raised about the business of the house by hon. members opposite on Friday, I should like to make a brief statement which I hope will leave no doubt in the mind of any hon. member about the position of the government in asking at this time for one month's interim supply. Just before the house adjourned on Friday, I stated that the government could not suggest adjourning after having obtained only one month's supply. If one month's supply is granted at the present time, it would be our intention to proceed with the business of the session in the normal way, and before the end of June to ask for a further grant of interim supply and continue the session. In arranging the order of business the government would, as usual, consult hon. members opposite as to the most convenient way of bringing forward matters for debate.

COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE

INQUIRY AS TO AGENDA AND DATE OF DEPARTURE OF PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, can the Prime Minister inform the house as to the date of his departure for the conference, and whether he is in a position to inform us in regard to the agenda of that conference?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I intend to leave for London by plane on the evening of Friday the 22nd, I think it is. The agenda has not been formally determined. There are items which have been suggested, and I think generally regarded by those who will attend as proper items for the agenda for that kind of meeting, involving principally considerations of the world situation. There are different items relating to different areas of the world, and those are the items that have been suggested for consideration at the meeting.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the Prime Minister another question? Is he in a position to inform us now which of his cabinet colleagues he expects will accompany him to the conference. He mentioned just now that economic relations were not discussed; but I think I am correct in saying we had previously understood that the Minister of Finance might be going to the conference.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs has to be in both London and Paris two or three days before the conference, and he will be remaining over with me to attend the conference. It is not intended to have any of our other colleagues unless something special should arise, when either they might be called upon to send their views about it, or, if it became really desirable to do so, there might be some call upon them to join us.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RUSSIA—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF LETTER FROM PREMIER BULGANIN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Might I ask the Prime Minister if he is in a position to indicate any point of view the government may hold in regard to the communication which has been received from Marshal Bulganin? I should like to ask also if the communication from Marshal Bulganin could be tabled in the house?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Yes, I can confirm that a letter from Premier Bulganin was delivered to me by his excellency the ambassador last Friday morning. The letter is one covering the full text of the Soviet announcement made May 14 last concerning the reduction in the level of Soviet armed forces.

I think there has been publication of, if not the covering letters, the memorandum of May 14, which concerned the reduction in the level of the Soviet armed forces. I certainly see no objection to tabling those letters and I shall ascertain whether there would be any discourtesy, of which of course no hon. member would want us to be guilty, in tabling them in the house, but I do not think there can be any question about that.

Inquiries of the Ministry

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON DISCUSSIONS WITH EARL OF HOME

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, perhaps I should direct my question to the Prime Minister. I should like to ask whether any announcement or statement can be made to the house as to the matters which were discussed between the government and the Earl of Home, Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations in the United Kingdom government, on the occasion of his recent visit? If so, what were the results of those discussions?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, I can say in a general way that there was a very friendly discussion of matters which are giving all governments of the free world concern at the present time. I think that is as far as I should go at this moment without referring to the Department of External Affairs. I had a very interesting conversation with the Earl of Home, and the Secretary of State for External Affairs was with me at that time. We did exchange some views about the forthcoming prime ministers' meeting and about other matters. Economic matters were not discussed at that meeting. I shall ascertain from the Department of External Affairs whether there is any memorandum. I know the Earl of Home saw several of my colleagues as well as myself, and I shall ascertain from the Department of External Affairs whether a summary or a memorandum was drawn up after those discussions.

SHIPPING

GREAT LAKES—LICENSING OF SMALL BOATS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Some few days ago I addressed a question to the hon. gentleman requesting information as to the announcement made by a senior official of the department at Toronto, Ontario, with respect to the lake Ontario search and rescue organization. Has the minister any comment to make at this time?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, following the inquiries which the hon. gentleman made, I in turn made some inquiries in my department and found that the remarks which were made by an official of my department were made during the course of a general discussion about conditions on lake Ontario. The account I have had of the matter shows that the official was not delivering a speech or an address; he merely gave some information which I think the hon. member will find is covered by the proposed amendments to the Canada Shipping Act which are now before the House of Commons.

PIPE LINES

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES—INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF AGREEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of Trade and Commerce table the agreement or agreements made with Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited last week. I can find no record of their having been tabled as yet.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Well, Mr. Speaker, I had thought that they had been tabled but I will have an examination made and if there are any documents that have not been tabled I will see that they are tabled at once.

PUBLIC SERVICE

DEFENCE RESEARCH BOARD—INCREASE IN WORK WEEK OF SECURITY GUARDS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, on May 24 last, the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) asked about an increase in working hours for certain security guards employed by the defence research board. I take it that her reference was to a small number of security guards employed by the defence research board at headquarters and in the Daly annex building.

Under the National Defence Act employees of the board do not come under the Civil Service Act, but whenever their working conditions run parallel to civil service regulations, the board can extend to such employees benefits accruing to civil servants of similar classifications.

The guards referred to by the hon. lady are classified by the board as watchmen, and civil servants in the classification of watchmen or security supervisors are required under present regulations to work a 48-hour week.

Consequently, when new civil service rates of pay were being worked out recently, the board undertook to readjust the working conditions of these watchmen to the same basis as that for watchmen in other government establishments in this area. This meant an increase in pay as from April 1 last and this was followed by an adjustment of shifts to bring these employees on to a 48-hour week.

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a supplementary question to the minister. Is it not true that the increase in pay which they received was merely the statutory increase or the regular increase which was given to all civil servants at that time? Despite this fact, I understand that these people had their work week increased from I think 42½ hours to 48 hours for which additional time they received no compensation.

Mr. Campney: That is true, Mr. Speaker, and I would make two observations about it. One is that these people are not under the civil service commission and therefore are not in that sense civil servants. The second point is that we are hopeful we will be able to obtain a civil service classification for watchmen more suitable than the present classification which would make up for some of the discrepancy.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REPORTED STRIKE ON STEAMSHIP "PRINCESS HELENE"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour and in his absence to his parliamentary assistant. Has the attention of the department been drawn to the fact that a strike is proposed on the Princess Helene steamer connecting Nova Scotia with New Brunswick on June 16? If so, and in view of the disastrous consequences which flowed from such strikes last fall, would the minister be able to tell the house what is being done to avoid it?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Well, Mr. Speaker, I shall see that an answer is given to my hon. friend as soon as possible.

ALLEGED IMPORTATION OF UNITED STATES WELDERS INTO BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour and in his absence to his parliamentary assistant and perhaps also to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

Can they inform the house what the situation is in the province of British Columbia with regard to the importation of welders into that province for work on the pipe line that is now being constructed in that area, when there are Canadian welders available who are fully qualified and unemployed?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. gentleman asked his questions the other day I directed the department to make inquiries as soon as possible but I suppose because of the five-day week I have not received a report. In fact I inquired about two minutes before coming into the house. I hope to be able to give the hon. gentleman an answer, possibly even later today.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

INTERIM SUPPLY

Mr. Harris moved:

That a sum not exceeding $264,409,639.92 being one-twelfth of the total of the amounts of the items set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1957, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament; and in addition thereto, a sum not exceeding $652,148.34 being one-twelfth of the total of the amounts of items 212, 213, 214, 216, 222, 228 of the said estimates and a sum not exceeding $36,506,378.25 being one-fourth of the total of the amounts of items set forth in the supplementary estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1957, be granted to Her Majesty on account of the fiscal year ending March 31, 1957.

He said: Mr. Chairman, this resolution asks that the house vote a sum which is one-twelfth of the items of the main estimates for the fiscal year, with an additional one-twelfth of six special items in those main estimates to provide for services of a seasonal nature on which the heaviest payments fall due in the early part of the year—these items will be set out in the schedule to the bill—and also one-quarter of all the items in the supplementary estimates which were tabled the other day.

The general proportions of one-twelfth and one-quarter of the main and supplementary estimates are intended to provide for all necessary ordinary requirements to the end of June. The higher proportion for the supplementary estimates will effect the release of the same proportion of those estimates as will be released for the main estimates by the appropriation bill No. 1, that is one-sixth of the main estimates.

The additional proportion requested is for certain special items of a kind for which it has been usual to request an additional proportion at this time. This is to meet the seasonal requirements of certain services which send out field survey parties during the spring and early summer. In no instance is the total of any item being released.

The passing of the bill which will be founded on this resolution will not prejudice the rights and privileges of hon. members to criticize and discuss any items in the estimates which will come up for consideration throughout the balance of the session, and the usual undertaking is hereby given that such rights and privileges will be respected and will not be curtailed or restricted in any way as a result of the passing of this measure.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, the request for interim supply usually raises no question because of the undertaking that is given by the Minister of Finance in the ordinary course of events in terms similar to those which have been stated today. Naturally there has been a good deal of speculation as to what would happen at this time in view of the circumstances in which we find ourselves. Normally there is no question raised. In fact I believe that there has been only one instance in the history of the House of Commons where there has been any delay and it would appear that the delay on that occasion was through inadvertence rather than for any other reason.

However, the circumstances in this case are not normal. We have indicated clearly that so far as we are concerned our attitude toward the management of the business of the country by the government has not in any way been changed by the disposition of the debate which was before us. I hope we have made it equally clear that the lack of confidence we expressed in the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker was not something to be disposed of by the mere passage of the measure which had been under consideration at the time we were called upon to express that lack of confidence.

The situation with which we are confronted is not going to be affected during the course of the present parliament by a mere passage of time. The things that have occurred are too fundamental in their effect upon our parliamentary system to be forgotten. This is not a case of letting bygones be bygones. To our great regret, the relationship of the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker has become inconsistent with our traditions in this house, so far as their relationship with the full membership of the house is concerned. It is for that reason that we would still express the hope that the government would have the courage to follow the honourable course and to dissolve this parliament and permit the early election of a new parliament which would be in harmony with the sentiments of the people of Canada, who now have knowledge of the whole situation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: I should hope that we should have the assurance that, after the appropriate disposition of business in this house, the Prime Minister would take the constitutional steps to obtain dissolution and permit the people to express their opinion on what has happened here. I leave that request before the Prime Minister. I believe it is a request which in no way becomes diminished in its force by lapse of time. On the contrary, each day that passes gives greater force to the need for the expression of that opinion by our people.

In the meantime, however, we are now called upon to deal with the motion for interim supply. What has happened here is typical of the way in which the business of this country is being done. It is now June 11; the last interim supply motion provided supply until May 31. It is in keeping with the attitude of this government to the house and to the people of Canada that it should now come before us on June 11 to ask that there be further funds advanced to meet the requirements, which are now extremely urgent.

It is altogether likely that the cheques have already been prepared and are ready to be sent out for the payments due on June 15. That is the way in which this house has become accustomed to be treated by this government. It should be remembered, however, that it is the people of Canada that are being treated in this way. This is typical of the way in which time limits are set and the ordinary opportunities to examine curtailed by the severe restriction of time.

It is only natural that there should have been discussion in the press and elsewhere as to what would happen to the very large number of civil servants, members of the armed forces and others whose cheques are dependent upon the voting of interim supply. In waiting until June 11 to present this motion for interim supply, the government showed scant concern for the civil servants, the members of the armed forces or others who work for pay. Everything has been subordinated to the determination of the government to ram the pipe line bill down the throats of this parliament and the people of Canada. Everything else has been set aside, no matter how urgent or important it was. Merely one example in addition to what we now have before us will serve to indicate the way that all other important business has been held in a state of suspense by the compelling demand of this government that they meet a time limit set by the company which has received such concern and consideration from the government during the past weeks.

That other subject is national defence. Nearly half the money that is collected from the taxpayers of Canada goes either directly or indirectly into the vitally important requirements of national defence. It is now more than five months since this session began on January 10 and there has been no discussion of any kind of national defence. During the current sessions of the various legislative bodies of Britain, the United States and Russia, as well as other countries whose activities are important at this time, there has been an examination of national defence and there has been an extensive reorganization of the national defence forces.

As early as December 21 the members of the House of Commons in Britain were informed regarding the nature of the reorganization that was to take place there, including a reduction of the armed forces, a streamlining of the organization and a general modernization of the whole concept of national defence. The same has taken place in the United States where sweeping reorganization has taken place for the strengthening and improving of their defence forces with a smaller number of men. More recently still the same thing has taken place in Russia. So far as we are concerned, this subject has not been before us and the item for national defence has not even been called yet as one of the items that could be brought before the house for discussion in the consideration of estimates.

That is typical of the way that the government has been marking time while it sought by every device first to bring its own members into line and then to impose the will of the government upon this house. There might be many reasons for us to indicate our very strong conviction that the government no longer has any reason to be offered evidence of confidence by the members of this house or the people of Canada. However, the fact remains that what is now before us is the provision of one-twelfth of the amount of money that will be required in any event. We have the assurance of the Prime Minister that business is going to proceed in its ordinary way and that we will have the opportunity to examine the estimates as we should.

The reason I asked the questions I did on Thursday and on Friday was that there were reports coming from what would ordinarily be regarded as very reliable sources to the effect that there was to be an adjournment during the summer months. We certainly would not have agreed to any suspension of the activities of this house at a time when such important business as national defence, national health and other matters of that kind were to be discussed here in the House of Commons. All the important departments that are still to be brought before the house should be examined with the utmost care.

We now have the answer we sought last week, and are told that the business will proceed. In any event we had no thought, and we have no thought, of permitting the civil servants, the members of the armed forces and others to be made the victims of this government's misconduct. We shall, therefore, consent in the usual way to interim supply on the basis of the assurance given by the Minister of Finance and on the basis of the assurance given by the Prime Minister that the business of this house will proceed to its termination in the usual way without interruption.

I hope that the future business of this session, for whatever length of time it may last, will be conducted on a more businesslike basis. I hope that when any request is going to be made which calls for the consideration of supply or other matters, it will be brought forward in time to consider it without being confronted with deadlines which would limit in any way the normal process of debate.

Before I conclude these remarks, Mr. Chairman, may I express the hope that the government will not again cause the concern, and very natural concern, in the minds of the civil servants, members of the armed forces and others which they have aroused on this occasion by the way in which they forgot the interests of these people and subordinated their duty to these public servants in the way that they have on this occasion, particularly for the purpose for which it was done. I would hope that we will have ample opportunity to deal with every item in the same way that we have on other occasions in the past. I would hope that there would be no thought in the minds of civil servants that the sword of Damocles is hanging over their heads and that they must depend on the whims of this government for adequate consideration of their requirements as they have at this time.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have indicated that we shall follow the course that we would follow ordinarily. We shall look forward to an early opportunity to deal with the important items that require consideration, and we shall proceed as rapidly as possible to permit interim supply to be adopted. I repeat my request however, that as we do this we recall that this is merely one more example of the way in which the government has disregarded the rights of parliament, the rights of civil servants and others employed by the government, and above all the rights of the people of Canada. It is hoped that the government will recognize the situation with which we are now confronted in this house and will not impose upon the Speaker and Deputy Speaker, a task with which they should not be confronted because of the actions of the government. I do hope the government will proceed with the business, and at the same time give us the assurance that this whole unhappy atmosphere will be cleared up by the constitutional procedure that can be followed, and that the people of Canada will have the right to choose the kind of parliament they want.

Mr. Knowles: It is still our view, Mr. Chairman, that there is one honourable way in which this government can obtain the supply that is necessary in order to meet civil servants' salaries and other payments due on Friday of this week. This honourable way has been suggested by the Leader of the Opposition, namely that the government should indicate to the house its readiness to dissolve this parliament at an early date and call a general election. If that proposal were made to this house we would have no hesitation in granting whatever number of months' interim supply is necessary to carry on the business of government until a new parliament should meet.

Let me say again, Mr. Chairman, that this group still feels that the government of the day has lost the confidence of the people of this country. It may be possible for the government still to muster a majority vote in the House of Commons, which was elected nearly three years ago. We believe, however, that particularly as a result of what has been done to parliament in recent weeks, this government does not possess the confidence of the people of Canada. Because it does not possess that confidence, a fact which arises because of its own actions in parliament, we say that the government does not have the moral authority to come before parliament today and ask interim supply in the normal way; in other words, to ask parliament to allow it to carry on just as if nothing had happened.

Supply has ended. The civil servants must be paid. Other bills must be met. These very necessities add, we feel, to the insistence that what we should be told at this time by the government is that it is prepared to dissolve this parliament and call a general election. We would be quite prepared for the date of dissolution to be put off whatever number of weeks might be necessary for such important business as is before parliament to be concluded, and indeed for the estimates to be concluded in the normal way. But we feel very strongly that this government does not possess the moral authority, nor does this parliament possess the authority necessary to carry on, in view of what has been done to it by the government, and dissolution is the only answer to the situation.

I quite understand the conclusion to which the Leader of the Opposition has come, but I confess that it is not in my heart to give such ready consent, in terms of letting things go through quickly, to a government that has done to parliament what this House of Commons has suffered during the past few weeks. What parliament does with the request of the government will, of course, be up to the members of this house. But I repeat that in our view the government does not have the moral authority to make the request that has been presented to us. Actually the Prime Minister and the government should reconsider the making of this request. It is obvious the government is hoping that in some way we will let bygones be bygones and that in some way time will heal the wounds, and the government will be enabled to rehabilitate its position before it has to go to the people of this country. We do not think that is the honourable way to deal with this situation. We think that moral standards call for something much better than that.

So far as the relationship between the House of Commons and the government is concerned I am reminded of what Durell has to say in his book "Parliamentary Grants", on page 4, where I read:

> It is, indeed, ultimately to the power of the purse, to its power to bring the whole executive machinery of the country to a standstill, that the House of Commons owes its control over the executive. That is the fountain and origin of its historical victories over the other organs of the state; and since that power was recognized and confirmed towards the end of the 17th century, the House of Commons has remained, whether reformed or unreformed, whether corrupt or incorrupt, the chief arbiter of the national destinies.

That is the position this House of Commons is in this afternoon. We have an executive in whom we believe the people of Canada have no confidence, making a request to us, which is more than a request just for the salaries of civil servants, but rather is a request that we permit this government to carry on in the normal way. Out of concern for the position of civil servants and in view of the position that the Leader of the Opposition has taken, we may have to grant such supply as is necessary to pay those salaries. In my own mind I am not sure just what is the right thing for an opposition to do in a situation like this, particularly after what the Leader of the Opposition has said, but I say, Mr. Chairman, the granting of interim supply will be done, if it is done at all, under protest, with this declaration which I make to the government: You are asking something that you have no moral authority to request from a free Canadian parliament.

Despite what the Prime Minister said on Friday about civil servants and others who should not be called upon to suffer because of party warfare, I assert, Mr. Chairman, that the issue is not whether civil servants are to receive their salaries. Incidentally, because in my remarks I seem to be referring to civil servants only and not to those of the armed forces, I may say that I have done that because it is my understanding that the nature of the national defence estimates is such that there is plenty of money for the paying of the armed forces. As hon. members know, the national defence estimates consist mainly of one large item for something over $1,700 million, and in that item there are included subitems for wages and salaries and also items for ships, guns, planes, tanks and ammunition. Already the government has one-sixth of that total sum. Because some of those other things such as ships, guns and planes have not been purchased there is enough money there, so I understand, for the armed forces to be paid at the middle of this month. Therefore, if there is concern at all about the meeting of salaries this week it is only with respect to the civil servants. But, may I say, Mr. Chairman, that in our view the issue is not civil servants' salaries. This government has no right to claim that that is the issue.

On May 25 when the government's chief concern was in getting its pipe line bill through parliament I asked the Minister of Finance this question, as recorded at page 4325 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. When does the minister intend to ask the house for further interim supply?

On behalf of this government that is now so concerned that it is asking parliament to help it out so it can pay the civil service, this was the minister's reply:

> I presume in due course when I announce it to the house.

I asked a supplementary question which reads:

> As a supplementary question, may I ask the Minister of Finance what he intends to use for money when his present supply runs out.

The reply of the minister was this:

> I am afraid that I could not answer that question because the occasion has not arisen yet.

Despite that effort to bring to the attention of the government the fact that something should be done, and done then, about supply, nothing was done by the government, and so three days later, on Monday, May 28, I put another question to the Minister of Finance which can be found on page 4371 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Is the minister in a position yet to answer my question of Friday respecting when he is going to ask the house for interim supply so he will have some money in June? In the meantime, can he assure civil servants that the present interim supply he has will make it possible for him to pay salaries on the 31st of May?

What was the answer of the Minister of Finance, speaking for this government that is now so concerned about civil servants? Here it is:

> I am not in a position to answer the question, but I will make inquiries.

I thought that would bring forth an answer on the minister's initiative within a day or so, but it did not come. Accordingly, on May 30 I asked again. Here is my question as recorded on page 4461 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the action that has been taken in the other place ostensibly to make it possible to get interim supply through in one day, can the minister now say when he intends to move for interim supply?

The minister's reply was this:

> I cannot, Mr. Speaker, but as is customary I shall consult with the opposition groups before making the proposal.

There you have it, Mr. Chairman. Three attempts on my part during the month of May to bring to the attention of the government the fact that something needed to be done to get interim supply so civil servants could be paid. But what was the government concerned about then? It had only one preoccupation, namely, getting its precious pipe line bill through the house. On Friday when the Prime Minister made his appeal to the house he said something to this effect, that it was usual at this stage to ask for interim supply. I have not turned up the exact quotation but I know that the words "at this stage" are there. May I remind the Prime Minister and the government that one has to stretch words a bit on June 8, or today on June 11, to say that this is the stage at which interim supply is usually sought for the month of June. I have taken the trouble to check back through the Hansards for the past 16 years—those happen to be the Hansards that I have in my office—covering the last four parliaments of which I have been a member. I checked every interim supply bill during those 16 years, and I shall say something in a moment about the picture as a whole, but first I want to say something about supply for the month of June.

After all, that is what is before the house now, supply for the month of June. I tell you, Mr. Chairman, from my research, that not in a single June during the past 16 years—you may go back further, but that is as far as I went in my research—not in a single instance has supply for June not been obtained prior to the end of May. Indeed in some cases it was obtained several days or even weeks before the end of May. Not once in the last 16 years, through all the war years and all the post-war years and all the troubles and fights that we have had in parliament, not once has the government laid aside its request for interim supply for the month of June because there was some other issue that was more important. It was only the pipe line that became more important than interim supply in this instance.

Let me put these dates on record. In 1940 it was obtained on May 28; in 1941, on May 29; in 1942, on May 26. In 1943, the motion which led to obtaining supply was actually made on May 11. There was a bit of debate and even with the debate that took place it was obtained in this house on May 17. In 1944 it was obtained on May 26. The year 1945 was an election year and supply for the months of May, June, July and August was obtained on April 13. In 1946 it was asked for on May 6 and obtained on May 26; in 1947 it was obtained on May 13. In 1948 it was again obtained on May 13. The year 1949 was also an election year and on April 30 a sufficient supply was put through for June, July, August and September. In 1950 it was obtained on May 30. In 1951 it was obtained on May 30. In 1952 it was obtained on May 29. In 1953 the final supply bill was put through on May 14. That, of course, was again an election year. In 1954 it was obtained on May 27 and in 1955 it was obtained on May 26.

There is the record of 16 years, Mr. Chairman; never later than May 30. Even apart from the instances of the election years it was obtained in some instances as early as May 13 and asked for in one year as early as May 6. In other words, the government knows from its past practice that the time to ask for interim supply for the month of June is in the month of May before its May money runs out.

I will tell the present Minister of Finance that he is personally aware of how these things should be handled. Indeed, last year in June when he was seeking interim supply for the month of July I asked him if the fact that he was seeking only one month's supply meant that he hoped the main estimates would be through before the end of July. This was his reply as found at page 5274 of Hansard for June 24, 1955:

> Mr. Harris: There is no certainty at the moment, Mr. Chairman, that that will be so.

Then I ask that these words be noted:

> If we are here on the 25th or 26th of July, I shall make another motion similar to this.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, despite the minister's innocence in his reply to my questions in May of this year, from his statement of last June it is clear that he knows that the time to ask for interim supply is before the end of the month in which the government's current interim supply runs out. This year the government would not do that even when we asked them to. They would not even consider the matter; no, it had to wait until the precious pipe line bill was through and then we are asked to bail the government out of the situation in which it finds itself.

With regard to the instances in the past, I might also point out that in addition to all these cases where supply for the month of June was obtained in the previous month, in the whole period of 16 years the only occasion I can find where interim supply for any month was obtained after the first of the month was in the fall of 1945. That, as hon. members will recall, was an election year. In fact, the 1945 election was held 11 years ago today. As the result of arrangements made previous to the calling of that election, interim supply ran out on August 31. The new parliament did not meet until September 6. What did Mr. King do? He took the matter up in the house the very first day, let the house understand that the treasury was empty and that interim supply would be needed. He indicated he had spoken to leaders of the groups opposite and arrangements were made for an interim supply bill to be put through on the 11th of September. That is the only instance across the 16 years where there was any delay in interim supply to a date beyond the first day of the month for which supply was to be voted. That of course was for a very justifiable reason; namely, there had been an appeal to the country and a general election.

I might also tell the house that in 1942 when supply was sought on May 26 by Mr. Ilsley a rather interesting situation developed. I am sure the Prime Minister will remember it because he was then a new member of the house and that was his first session. He was present that day because he answered a question that was put to him on the orders of the day. He was minister of justice at the time. It so happened that Mr. Ilsley on that occasion asked for two months' supply. The house was in an angry mood over some things that had happened although it had much less cause to be angry than might be the case at the present time. As the result of a considerable debate Mr. Ilsley had to agree on the floor of the house to cutting his interim supply bill in half. It was only the 26th of May but he said to the house, "We need this money now; we need it to pay bills". He was talking about the month of June. The then leader of the opposition, Mr. Hanson, suggested the two months' supply be reduced to one and called upon the the minister of finance to accept the reduction to half of what he was asking the house to give him. Mr. Ilsley replied that he had no option, but that he had to accept. He recognized that the gift of supply was in the hands of the House of Commons.

This government, concerned as it has been to get its pipe line through, has paid no attention to the proprieties concerned with obtaining interim supply from the house and has let all its established practices go by the board. Now it comes before parliament and expects us, despite its failure to respond to the concern we demonstrated in May for the civil service, to bail the government out. I say, Mr. Chairman, the issue is not the salaries of our civil servants. Our position on that is clear. Like the Leader of the Opposition, we feel that although others may have been victimized by the government's action the civil service should not also be the victim of what this government has done. In our view it is a moral issue. What we now have is an executive which has treated parliament in a despotic manner, coming before parliament and asking it for the tools to carry on in the normal way just as if nothing had happened. It comes before parliament as if it had moral authority. We claim that it does not. In our view the honourable course for the government is to withdraw this request and come before us with an assurance that there will be a dissolution, whereupon we would grant whatever supply is necessary. If the government is not prepared to deal with it in that way we can only assume this government is not one that can be appealed to on the moral grounds which we feel are basic to this whole situation.

Mr. Chairman, it is not possible for a free parliament to have done to it what we have suffered here in the last few weeks and then for it to go on in the normal way. In our view the civil service and others should not be made to suffer, but in our view the government has no moral authority to make the request that it now lays before this house.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, the ideal situation would be, of course, to have the estimates through the committee before the end of the financial year; then it would not be necessary for the government to ask for interim supply at any time; but we know from experience and past history that that has been impossible. Consequently it is necessary for the government some time before the end of the session to ask for interim supply as it is doing today.

Now, I have listened very carefully to the arguments that have been advanced today. I have thought back over the years when I have heard similar arguments advanced on many another proposition put forward by the government. At one stage I want to ask the hon. gentleman who was speaking if the situation with respect to the government's request for interim supply was any different fundamentally from the situation which exists when the government is asking for support for any proposition it puts forward. The opposition has argued on every occasion, I think, that I have ever heard in the house when the government has put forward a proposition, that the government ought not to do it because it did not enjoy the confidence of the people of the country. It does not matter what the proposition is, that is the position taken by the opposition; and the only difference it seems to me at the present time is that feelings are a little more in evidence than they were on previous occasions. There is perhaps more evidence of anger than there has been at other times.

I suppose if one were to take seriously the argument advanced here today about this being a dishonourable thing, one would have to consider the reverse position and argue that when we agree to an estimate passing we are indicating our belief in the normal integrity and the support by the country necessary for those who administer it. That is just about the last argument that could be advanced. It is just as reasonable to suppose that one argument could apply as that the other could apply.

I do not look upon this as a dishonourable request at all, and I suppose the reason I do not is that I do not think the government acted in a despotic manner in getting the pipe line bill through. Therefore I am not carrying around a lot of anger and bitterness in my soul because of what happened. I must say that I feel very bad about what happened, but that feeling has not been engendered by any belief I have that the government acted in a despotic manner.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has indicated his concern for the civil service. I have tried to put myself in the position of the Minister of Finance on any one of the last days of May when the request for information was made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I am wondering what the Minister of Finance thought as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre expressed concern or simulated concern for the civil service. I know I would have thought to myself that that was clever of the hon. member in trying to have something else brought before the house so that the bill being considered at that time would carry over June 7. I am not going to say that that was what was in the hon. member's mind, but believe me that is the thought I would have had if I had been in the position of the Minister of Finance at that time.

I wonder if the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre or the Leader of the Opposition would give a clear undertaking today that if the Minister of Finance had called a recess for one day, let us say on May 29, 30 or 31, to ask for interim supply, they would have taken the normal time to discuss it and then got back to the pipe line bill. If they would give that unequivocal undertaking, then that would be an answer that they would have supported it without using it as the means to hold up government plans. If that were the case, then I would be ready to change my attitude, but under the circumstances I can only believe that they would have seized on that interim supply to hold things up beyond the date that was named as the terminal date beyond which they could not go with that bill.

It has been said that the government should have asked for interim supply at an early date. I think they should have done that as it would have been better for everybody, but I have tried also to think when they could have asked for it within the past three or four weeks with any chance in the world of getting it. I am of the opinion that they have asked for this interim supply at the earliest possible time available to them.

An effort has been made to stress that the government is a dishonourable government, that the government is a despotic government, and for that reason we ought to hold up interim supply. I am not claiming any virtue at all in that regard; I simply say that as the government has bills to pay, as time in running out and as we are going to have plenty of time to discuss the estimates in the regular manner and to do the business of the house in the regular manner, it would seem to be the best thing for members of this House of Commons representing the people of this country to get interim supply through and go on with the business of the house.

[Mr. Low.]

I would certainly suggest to the Minister of Finance that he bring the main departmental estimates before us as soon as possible so that we may have ample opportunity to go into them and have all the discussion required in the interests of good government in this country.

Mr. Zaplitny: Mr. Chairman, before we vote on this question I should like to ask the Prime Minister one or two questions. It seems that the government has once more placed a deadline before the house. It seems to be the rule rather than the exception to have government by deadline. I for one resent that. If the government is going to operate in that way this bill should have been introduced by the Minister of National Defence, who is the only one with enough artillery to carry it through.

It seems to me that this is the proper time for the government to disclose some of its plans with regard to legislation. The government has been in such a great hurry to give away the taxpayers' money to United States capitalists that in my opinion they have completely ignored the Canadian people. We are wondering whether the government has any plans for legislation to better the lot of old age pensioners. We want to know what the government is going to do about blind pensioners. We also want to know when the government is going to straighten out the regulations under the Disabled Persons Act. These are things that may not appear to be huge things percentagewise as compared with the $103 million pipe-line bill, but they are important to many thousands of Canadians.

I must remind the government that it is several years since those who are recipients of old age pensions had an increase in their pensions. Since that time there have been two increases in civil service salaries, two increases in judges' salaries and at least one increase in the pay of the armed services. With the cost of living rising all over the country, people are asking when old age and blind pensioners are going to receive some consideration. This session is nearing its end and so far there has been no indication from the government as to whether they intend to introduce legislation this session with regard to old age pensions, blind pensions and the regulations under the Disabled Persons Act. I think this committee deserves answers to those questions before we vote on this motion.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I just want to deal with one thing that was raised, the question that was asked as to what the opposition would have done if there had been time set aside when this motion could have been dealt with. I would point out that after the pipe-line bill was introduced other business was dealt with on Wednesday, May 16. It would have been possible at that time for the government to have asked for interim supply, as it should have done well in advance of May 31. I point that out so the intervention by the hon. member for Peace River will not leave the impression that there was no opportunity for this to be done.

I do not wish to extend my remarks beyond saying that this is June 11 and the interim supply we are now dealing with runs from the beginning to the end of June only. I trust that when we are next called upon to deal with this matter it will be done in plenty of time. Of course the attitude we adopt at that time will depend entirely upon the circumstances of the case.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, I am not at all surprised that the government do not want to go to the country, as I have no doubt they have been reading the editorials which have been published during the past few weeks in newspapers across Canada. From editorials in regard to the pipe-line legislation itself, there were newspapers that supported it and newspapers that opposed it, but in regard to what this government did to the rules of this house the newspapers of this country have been almost unanimous. What we should ask from this government before we grant interim supply is: is this government from now on going to run this parliament according to the rules of this parliament? That is the question that should be asked.

I am rather surprised how easily my friends on my left have been bought. They used to associate the C.C.F. with the Liberal party and the Liberal government. We were socialists in a hurry; the Liberals were socialists who were not in quite such a hurry. But the socialists that were not in quite such a hurry have become quite acceptable socialists just because they helped to buy a little gas that the province of Alberta has to sell. Surely the support of no party was ever bought so cheaply.

As I have said, that is the assurance that the Leader of the Opposition should ask—and he is in a much better position to ask it than we are—from the government, while they are taking time to rehabilitate themselves and hoping that the public will forget what they have done to parliament and that, when the next election comes around some time in 1957, the odor in which they stand with the public will not be quite as bad as it is today.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Zaplitny: I asked the Prime Minister two questions to which I think he was prepared to reply before the Leader of the Opposition stood up. I wonder whether he is prepared to reply now.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): There will be opportunity to discuss all those questions when the estimates of the Minister of National Health and Welfare are before the house for consideration.

Mr. Zaplitny: May I ask whether the Prime Minister does not intend to make any announcement at this time?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): No, I am not in a position to make any announcement at this time.

Mr. Winch: Perhaps I do not understand all these words of diplomacy but am I to understand, from what the Prime Minister said at the presentation of this resolution, that at the present time the government is asking, because of the situation in which they are in, that all they require now is the one-twelfth of the estimates and that, if that is passed—and of course it must be passed, because the bills have to be paid—that means that the house is not going to adjourn this month or next month, either for a meeting in the fall or for the purpose of an election; but, if they get the one-twelfth of the money they require to pay their bills for the month of June, this house carries on with all normal business until it is finished, and that includes discussion of all estimates; and, if they are not finished by the end of June, then they come back again for interim supply? There has not yet been a straightforward statement as to the intention of the government. I guess that is the intention, but I think all of us would like the Prime Minister to get to his feet now and say point-blank what is the situation with all business of this house, all supply and all estimates?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): The situation at this time is that we are asking for one month's supply and that we intend, when that supply is granted, to proceed with the business of the house in the ordinary way. We do not expect that the estimates will be passed by the end of June, and we do expect that at that time it will be necessary to ask for further interim supply, and we intend to carry on with the business of the house in the normal way. Now I cannot go beyond that. I cannot at this time make any commitments about things which cannot be foreseen and circumstances which might in the future arise.

The hon. gentleman knows that there are several hundred items in the estimates, and each one can be discussed. If each one were to be discussed, even if we were to sit here until Christmas, we would not get through with the discussion of each one of those estimates if we were not seriously intent upon disposing of the business of the house in the normal way.

I do not want to say anything at the present time that would appear to be controversial. There will be plenty of controversy about all these matters on appropriate occasions. But I would hope that, for the reasons that have been given—and I am not going to attempt to discuss at this time the qualifications that have been placed upon these reasons—the supply will be granted at this time and that we could then proceed in the ordinary way with the business of the house.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, just before the question is put, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether there is any legislation that the government intends to introduce which is not yet before the house?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): There is not, to my knowledge, any legislation that has not yet been indicated. There is the legislation with respect to the dominion-provincial fiscal arrangements, which is being completed and the tenor of which has been fully disclosed in the proposals that have been made to the provinces, and that have been tabled in the house and even printed as appendices to Hansard. The Minister of Finance did say that he had a succession duty bill that he expected to introduce but that he was not at all confident that there would be time to have it considered. Those are the only two outstanding things, except for one that was forecast by the Minister of Labour for some partial amendment of, I think, section 45 (2) of the Unemployment Insurance Act. I do not know of anything else that is not already before the house.

Mr. Winch: I am sorry to get up again, but I have to go by the words of the Prime Minister that the house will, if granted the one month's supply, carry on in the normal way. If it carries on in the normal way, we should then go through all the estimates, with all our rights of discussing all estimates. That cannot be done in this month of June.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): No.

Mr. Winch: In addition, carrying on in the normal way includes all the business on the order paper, that is, bills and estimates and so on. If that happens and we carry on in the normal way—and that is the interpretation I would like—is that the interpretation of the Prime Minister of the normal way? That could possibly take us into August. Under those circumstances, is there any possibility or probability of the introduction of the required bill, as mentioned by the Leader of the Opposition, on the dominion-provincial relations, because all our present contracts die on March 31 of next year; or is it the intention that carrying on in the normal way means to carry on now until everything is through and then have a spring session? Just what is the situation?

[Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East).]

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Well, Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. gentleman wishes to go much further than I am in a position to go at the present time. The hon. gentleman says that it might even extend into August. That is possible but I would hope not. I would hope that we could dispose, in an orderly way, of all the business including the legislation with respect to dominion-provincial relations.

Mr. Winch: At this session?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): At this session.

Mr. Winch: That is what I wanted to know.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Knowles: Under protest.

Mr. Regier: I want to spend a few minutes to express my great disappointment at the statement of the Prime Minister that no new major legislation is being contemplated. I have reference to the statement made by the Minister of Finance, as found at page 4141 of Hansard, where he made this remark in reply to something I had said in the pipe line debate:

> Bless your soul, if this project gets going we will have enough money for all the things you have asked for.

I understand that this is June 11. I have also been given to understand that the pipe line began moving as of midnight of June 7 and is now rolling. Therefore the minister now has all the money. However, he added this qualification later:

> . . . we would use our usual good sense in deciding which ones should be proceeded with.

In that qualification there is at least the inference that the Canadian people would also get some of the good things and that not all the money would be reserved for foreigners.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Lennard: While this general questioning is going on, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance if it is the intention to bring in this session an amendment to the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act to include widows. It is about time it was done. I think it is a shame that the widows of members of parliament are left high and dry when the member dies.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Lennard: It is nothing to laugh about either.

Mr. Harris: No, Mr. Chairman. I assure the hon. member for Wentworth that this matter has been before the government for some time. I know that in this instance the hon. member has mentioned, as in other instances having to do with the legislation, there have been consultations. I would hope that these consultations could be continued and that we could find a solution to the problem. I think it is correct to say that a great many members share the strong views that the hon. member has expressed. I might admit that the matter had gone out of my mind temporarily in the recent weeks, but now that he has drawn it to my attention I shall make inquiries again as to exactly what the situation is and will say something at a later date.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

INTERIM SUPPLY

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

Mr. Harris moved:

That towards making good the supply granted to Her Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1957, the following sums be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada, namely:

1. The sum of $264,409,639.92, being one-twelfth of the total of the amounts of the items set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1957; and
2. The sum of $652,148.34, being one-twelfth of the total of the amounts of items 212, 213, 214, 216, 222, 228 of the said estimates;
3. The sum of $36,506,378.25, being one-fourth of the supplementary estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1957; as set forth in the resolution concurred in this day in the committee of supply.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Harris thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 414, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1957.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall this bill be read the second time? By leave, now?

Mr. Knowles: Under protest.

Mr. Harris moved the second reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee and reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall this bill be read the third time now?

Mr. Knowles: Under protest.

Mr. Harris moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES, ISSUE OF SECURITIES, ETC.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to make capital expenditures in the year 1956 not exceeding $233,564,000 and to make certain capital expenditures and enter into certain contracts prior to July 1, 1957; to authorize the national company to issue securities to provide amounts required for the authorized expenditures; to provide that, except as expressly provided, the aggregate principal amount of securities outstanding at any time shall not exceed $203,994,000; to authorize the governor in council to guarantee the principal and interest of securities issued by the company for the purpose aforesaid; to authorize the Minister of Finance to make loans to the said company secured by such securities and not exceeding $203,994,000 in principal amount to enable the said company to meet such expenditures and with authority to give financial aid and assistance to other companies of the national system.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, this is the annual resolution that precedes the introduction of the Canadian National Railways Financing and Guarantee Act. Hon. members will recall that in 1952 the form of this legislation was changed so as to include the financing of all capital expenditures whether authorized in that act or in earlier financing and guarantee acts. This procedure has been followed again this year.

The bill to be founded on this resolution is divided into three specific parts. The first part is to authorize the Canadian National Railways to incur capital expenditures up to $233,564,000. The second part authorizes the railway company to make capital expenditures prior to July 1, 1957, to discharge obligations incurred under this act which become due and payable after January 1, 1957 in the amount of $80 million. The third part authorizes the railway company to enter into contracts for new equipment and for its general additions and betterments in the amount of $90 million. To summarize, parliament is being asked to approve financing, either by way of the issue of new securities guaranteed by the government or by way of direct loan in the amount of $203,994,000.

For the convenience of hon. members, I would ask permission to place on Hansard a table giving the details of this amount, for the convenience of hon. members and so they can better take part in debate on second reading after consideration of these financial statements.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Just to keep us in order, is it agreed that the hon. member may have permission to have the figures included?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Benidickson: The table is as follows:

The details of the amounts required are as follows:

Year 1956
Road property	$ 84,077,000
Branch line construction	9,875,000
Equipment	116,147,000
Hotels	9,035,000
Investment in affiliated companies	14,430,000
Less: Depreciation accruals	74,570,000
Year 1957
Interim financing authority January 1 to June 30, 1957, on obligations incurred prior to January 1, 1957	80,000,000

After hon. members review the table they will find, on a study of the report of the sittings of the committee on railways and shipping, that the officers of the Canadian National Railways appeared before that committee and the budget of capital expenses to which this resolution alludes was given very exhaustive committee inquiry.

In addition in this year's bill there will be provided the appointment of the auditors for the Canadian National Railways for the year 1956. Hon. members will recall that prior to last year, 1955, the appointment was made by a special bill. Since it relates to the finances of the railway, it was felt appropriate last year, and has been done again this year, to include in this bill the appointment of the auditors of road.

In the bill to be provided, hon. members will find the usual authority for the making of temporary loans to the railway company and to Trans-Canada Air Lines to meet operating deficits to June 30, 1957. While the budget of the railway company contemplates a surplus of $2·6 million for the calendar year 1956, it has been the experience that deficits are usually incurred in the first six months of the calendar year.

Mr. Churchill: The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance has set out some of the salient facts with regard to this resolution. He is quite correct in saying that the committee on railways and shipping gave careful consideration to the budget presented by the president of the Canadian National. During the month of March we spent two or three sittings dealing with that problem and received from the president a full and frank statement.

However, I should like to have a little more information with regard to the actual figures that appear in this resolution. The first one of $233,564,000 is the total and that was brought to our attention by the president of the C.N.R. This total we approved. If the parliamentary assistant will refer to page 287 of the railways and shipping report for March 22, I think, he will find these figures set out. This grand total was made up of the amounts that were to be spent on road property, $84,077,000; branch line construction, $9,875,000; equipment, $116,147,000; hotels, $9,035,000; investment in affiliated companies, $14,430,000.

However, the president of the C.N.R. went on to tell us how he proposed to obtain the money to meet those capital expenditures, and drew our attention to the fact that there were three sources open to him. The first was depreciation accruals. He said he expected to have an amount of $74,570,000 from this source. Then, I give his exact words on page 287 of the committee report:

> Then, we estimate that the government will provide us with $20,555,000 by the purchase of preferred stock under the provisions of the recapitalization plan . . . which then leaves us with the problem of finding $138,439,000 to finance our requirements for this year. That is the total which we will in the first instance borrow from the government in the form of an advance, and then go to the public market to sell bonds to pay off the temporary government advance.

The question I have to ask is this. When you add together the depreciation accruals of $74,570,000, the $20,555,000 which the president expected to get from the purchase of preferred stock, and then the $138,439,000 which he said was required to be borrowed, then you come to a total of $233,564,000. But if you deduct what he already has on hand in the $74,570,000, the requirement then would be $158,994,000, and the difference between that and the $203,994,000 that is mentioned in the second part of this resolution is what would not be accounted for by way of explanation. Could the parliamentary assistant enlighten us with regard to that?

Mr. Benidickson: Well, Mr. Chairman, I did not have the advantage of being on the railways and shipping committee this particular session as did the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, but I have read the minutes of that committee. I can assure the committee that with respect to the budget resolution arrangements this year I could find nothing that was different from those in former years. I recall that two years ago I was a member of the railways and shipping committee, and we considered the budget in the same way as we did this year. There is always some difficulty in relating the figures in the resolution, and my hon. friend has given two examples, one amounting to $233 million and the other amounting to $203 million, to the subsequent bill that comes before the house. When the subsequent bill comes before the house there are explanatory notes on the right-hand side of the page of the bill. In those explanatory notes there are excerpts given to the 262 members as against the probably 30 members that were on the committee. May I say that the figures I gave to the clerk for filing in some way answer my hon. friend's question. I would think the whole house would find advantage in looking at those figures and re-examining the pages as outlined by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre of the sittings of the railways and shipping committee. I refer to pages 280 onward. We could then probably have a detailed discussion in this committee.

Mr. Churchill: All of that is good advice but the resolution stage provides the house with an opportunity to get a little light on matters which are not clear.

Mr. Benidickson: Quite so.

Mr. Churchill: What I am talking about now is the difference of $45 million over and above the amount that the president of the Canadian National Railways informed us would be required for this coming year. I simply raise the question, what has caused that upward revision in the figures that we were given?

Mr. Benidickson: I am sure my hon. friend is referring to cash requirements as explained in the railways and shipping committee. Cash requirements, of course, would be the balance after cash income had been provided through the railways' operations and in their balance sheet had been offset by such things as depreciation of $74 million and some odd, as I recall it, and so on.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Chairman, I shall be only a minute. I was very fortunate to be on the sessional committee of railways and shipping and to have had an opportunity to question the president of the Canadian National Railways and to hear him explain the over-all financial picture. As a matter of fact, it is not something that I ever thought I would have a chance to do when I took my first ride at four or five years of age in my dad's caboose on the old Grand Trunk.

There still seems to be a very critical situation facing the Canadian National. Mr. Gordon outlined that at the present time all of these expenditures which we have and which are mentioned in the resolution are prudent expenditures, and the railway can be expected to make the necessary profit to take care of the fixed charges on the outlay which is provided in this resolution; but at the same time he has not avoided saying that the railway does face a critical period as the dieselization program is completed and the law of diminishing returns sets in. In connection with that program, at the present time the railway has been able to meet its fixed charges owing to the fact that there has been great savings in connection with the introduction of that new dieselization program. But if that saving does not continue, or if we do have a corresponding increase in wage costs and other operating expenses, then of course, he is going to face a very serious problem in the over-all financing of the road.

In this connection, the company faces a different proposition from that of its competitor, the Canadian Pacific Railway, because if that railway is unable to meet at a specific time the dividend that might be expected on some of its stock then, of course, the dividend is simply not declared; but under the recapitalization program of 1952 there is an indication that the Canadian National has been set up on a basis so that all of its fixed charges can be paid and, as a matter of fact, of necessity must be paid because the government continues as the guarantor of all of the obligations.

I am not an accountant, but it seems to me that sooner or later we shall have to remove some of the shackles which surround railway operations in Canada. Perhaps we should have a look at this thing in the reverse of the ordinary accounting methods. Since it is absolutely essential that the guaranteed indebtedness must be met we shall have to set aside an amount which is absolutely essential to the railway's continued successful operation, an amount to meet the fixed indebtedness. We shall have to use that as a step in the formula and then arrive at a situation where the railway may look at its current operating position and examine its revenue as related to its expenses. If there is an indication that that amount cannot be met, then of course we shall have to give the railway an opportunity to earn the amount of revenue sufficient to meet its current operating expenses. Possibly that is the reverse of the way the operation is carried out at the present time. If operating expenses are so great that they do not allow a sufficient amount to be carried over against the fixed charges, then of course the government has to step in, as it has done in the past. Even taking the 1952 formula into account, it might have to step in and make payments to the people holding bonds. Mr. Gordon said this in the committee: these expenditures are prudent ones. As far as the capital outlay is concerned, they can earn their worth, if you want to put it that way. Then, taking a realistic approach, we must move back in our formula and ensure that the railway itself in its current operations is placed in a position where it can meet its current expenditures. As a matter of fact, if that were done it seems to me we would not be faced with the almost yearly problem of negotiation between labour and management which is very unsatisfactory because first of all labour does not feel that it is being allowed to bargain in an unfettered condition because of the over-all control that has been set down at the top, and management feels just as frustrated because it realizes that no matter what it does in connection with meeting the demands of labour it too is in a position where its over-all operation is pretty well surrounded by government regulation.

At each step it must come back here—perhaps not to this house, but certainly to an arm of the government—and say, "We are in this situation, are you going to help us out?" It seems to me it is about time we took a very realistic approach to the over-all financing problem which confronts the Canadian National Railways and gave considerably more leeway to management in its fight to stay ahead of the increasing operating costs. In so doing I think we would find we would have a much more satisfied labour group on the railway as well.

Mr. Churchill: May I just add a comment to my earlier remarks. It is possible the answer to my question is to be found on page 288 of the committee report although it is not very clear even there and it is difficult to recall discussions we had as far back as March.

One of the problems that arise in all the committees is that the committee reports are published so late they really are of no use to us while the committee is sitting. The question I raise now I might better have raised with the president of the Canadian National Railways present, although I had no printed copy of the report to follow. Obviously when figures in the millions are being discussed in the course of the remarks of the president of the Canadian National Railways or anyone else who appears before a committee it is extremely difficult to follow it all very closely. Perhaps by the time we get to second reading we will have the answer to this particular question.

Mr. Benidickson: Well, Mr. Chairman, if there is anything new in the hon. gentleman's inquiry I can assure him that it will be ready on second reading. I am quite confident, except for the difficulty of presenting it, that it is available in the budget sheets presented to the committee on railways and shipping and incorporated as a part of the minutes of proceedings and evidence, No. 2, of this committee. I would hope that when we discuss this item again hon. members will have had notice of this reference.

Mr. Trainor: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take the opportunity presented by this resolution to call the attention of the committee to a grievance of a group of employees of the Canadian National Railways in my constituency.

Hon. members will recall that during the course of the past year a fire occurred in Winnipeg which partially destroyed the Fort Rouge shops of the Canadian National Railways. I asked on a previous occasion, as did the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, whether or not it was the intention of the railway to reconstruct these shops on the existing site. The minister concerned indicated on that occasion the company did not intend to re-establish the shop on the existing site.

Now the difficulty is this, Mr. Chairman. The employees concerned represent a large number of people. They have their homes in this area and have had them located there for years. The intention of the railroad apparently is to transfer the operation of these shops to Transcona which is approximately five or six miles outside of Winnipeg at the opposite end to Fort Rouge. This involves these employees, if they wish to remain in their own homes, paying transportation costs to the Canadian National station and then paying their railroad fare to Transcona when they go to work in the morning and again when they come back in the evening.

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, this is a gross disregard of the human factor. These people are entitled to consideration. If the company decided to carry out its declared intention it ought to arrange first of all to consult with the employees to see what sort of compromise arrangement might be worked out and secondly it should not be done without adequate compensation to these employees who have to abandon their homes, which they have owned and occupied for many years, and seek new homes in the town of Transcona. I see the Minister of Transport is not here but I should like to have some member of the government give an assurance somewhat along these lines that this type of action might be taken.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, I have listened to what my hon. friend has said. He knows perfectly well the relationship of the government and the management of the Canadian National Railways. I think on all occasions the government has promised to draw to the attention of the management of the railways any matter which is raised in the house which the government feels is a matter of importance and one that should be considered. I now give the assurance my hon. friend has asked for. We shall draw to the attention of the management of the railway what he has said.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I should like to support the request the hon. member for Winnipeg South has made with respect to the car shops at Fort Rouge. I appreciate the assurance the Minister of Finance has given that this will be drawn to the attention of the management of the Canadian National Railways.

I might point out that that assurance was given by the Minister of Transport some weeks ago when we asked questions about this matter on the floor of the house. I thought there would be replies given by the minister to our questions at a later date. Those replies have not been forthcoming so I rise now simply to repeat our insistence that the matter be brought to the attention of the management and also that the management be asked to hear representations from the employees concerned.

As the hon. member for Winnipeg South has pointed out, there are a great many employees in the constituency of my hon. friend who have their homes in that area. They are seriously affected by any change such as this which seems to be contemplated. As the Minister of Finance has said, I hope these representations will be brought to the attention of management as forcibly as the government can do it.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, I should have waited for the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to speak because I knew that he had in fact directed questions to the Minister of Transport earlier in the session concerning this matter. My assurance includes an assurance to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and all hon. members from the city who are interested in this matter.

Mr. Benidickson: As the Minister of Finance has given me the privilege of piloting this resolution through the house, I think in answer to that question it would not be wrong for me to say at this point that I lived in that community for most of my formative years and if anything came up relating to that area on which I could help them I would certainly continue to do so. But everybody knows the Canadian National Railways is a crown corporation which operates its affairs independent of parliament except for representations such as we have heard in the House of Commons today.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, as one of the other members representing Winnipeg I support the suggestion that the Minister of Transport indicate to the president of the Canadian National that appropriate action should be taken with regard to the shops which were recently destroyed and the employees whose work has been interfered with and who may be seriously inconvenienced in the future.

With regard to what the Minister of Finance said concerning drawing the attention of the railways to certain matters, I would point out that in the committee hearings in March there was a little exchange as to whether or not there was responsibility on the government with regard to the Canadian National or whether the C.N.R. acted completely independently. At some future date with some relish, I shall read to the Minister of Transport some of the remarks which are on the record indicating an exchange between myself and the president of the C.N.R. There is responsibility on the government which on occasions in the past has been avoided by other ministers of transport, telling us that the C.N.R. was completely independent of direction. I think the C.N.R. will be anxious to give close attention to any representations placed before it by the Minister of Transport.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Harris thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 415, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system during the calendar year 1956, and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN FORCES ACT

AMENDMENTS TO DEFENCE SERVICES PENSION ACT AND TO NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure respecting the Canadian forces to amend the Defence Services Pension Act to provide for uniformity of pension payments to former members of the forces pensioned as warrant officers or equivalent; also to amend the National Defence Act, inter alia, with respect to the code of service discipline and with respect to the payment of duties and tolls for the use of certain facilities.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

Mr. Campney: Mr. Chairman, at each of the last six sessions of parliament bills have been introduced entitled the Canadian Forces Act, similar in purpose to the bill which will be introduced upon the adoption of this resolution. The bill to be introduced will be entitled the Canadian Forces Act, 1956, and will propose a number of amendments to statutes related to defence. This year the bill is more limited than has usually been the case, in that it contains proposed amendments to only two acts, the Defence Services Pension Act and the National Defence Act.

Three clauses of the bill contain amendments proposed to the Defence Service Pension Act. Two of these amendments are designed to facilitate administration of existing provisions in the Defence Service Pension Act and the other is designed to achieve uniformity in respect of pension payments to members of the three services who are pensioned as warrant officers or equivalent and are subsequently re-enrolled or accept appointments in the public service of Canada.

Nine clauses of the bill contain proposed amendments to the National Defence Act. The amendments to this act deal with a variety of subjects and embody in the code of service discipline some provisions contained in the new Criminal Code adopted at the last session of parliament. Others, it is hoped, will facilitate the administration of justice under the code of service discipline.

One proposed amendment would enable the commander of a unit to issue to persons accompanying his unit enforceable orders relating to the defence or evacuation of the unit area in the event of an enemy attack.

Another amendment proposed to the National Defence Act would incorporate in the code of service discipline provisions relating to persons driving Canadian forces vehicles while their ability to drive is impaired by alcohol or a drug.

An amendment is also proposed which would clarify the authority of the governor in council to make regulations in respect of the enforcement of discipline in service prisons and detention barracks.

A further proposed amendment would enable treasury board to authorize the payment of tolls in respect of the use by Canadian forces vehicles of facilities such as bridges, highways and canals where such tolls are payable by other users.

There are other proposed amendments to the National Defence Act designed to facilitate the administration of the code of service discipline and to effect other changes of a technical nature in the act.

Mr. Chairman, the foregoing amendments are directed to the efficient and equitable administration of our defence forces, and I therefore commend this resolution to the committee for its favourable consideration.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take this opportunity of thanking the minister for his concise and illuminating description of the amendments which are to be proposed by the bill to follow this resolution. However, it seems to me that this is just another example of the government following a bad practice which is used as a precedent and then becomes routine.

For some years now we on this side of the house have pointed out how unsatisfactory it is to combine amendments to several acts in one bill. This year the Minister of National Defence even goes so far as to apologize for the fact that there are only two acts being amended in this 1956 version of the Canadian Forces Act. I cannot help feeling that as these acts have been in existence for a good many years it is not necessary to take up the time of the house year after year bringing in small amendments. Surely the main acts should be reviewed and brought up to date once and for all instead of having to bring in amendments year after year.

For instance, I am quite certain that there were bridges in existence last year, the year before and the year before that which exacted tolls from military vehicles. Why could not this amendment have been brought in before? The Defence Services Pension Act has been in existence for some time. Surely it should have been discovered by this time that there was some difficulty about warrant officers being re-employed, re-enrolled or accepted in the public service of Canada. It does not seem to me that the time of this house should be taken up with such amendments. Next year the Minister of National Defence may be proposing another amendment to deal with sergeants or petty officers. Surely one big effort could be made to bring these acts up to date.

With regard to the amendments made necessary by the introduction last year of the new Criminal Code, I agree that these should be reflected in the military code of discipline. Therefore it is reasonable to expect that prompt action be taken and that the amendments be made. I sincerely hope that the code of military discipline has been carefully reviewed since the introduction of the new Criminal Code, and that it will not be necessary next year to bring in any further amendments.

I notice that there is to be an amendment to deal with the enforcement of discipline in service prisons and detention barracks. I do not suppose there is anything very new about that. Then we come to the amendment dealing with persons driving military vehicles while under the influence of liquor. Unfortunately there have been a great many instances of persons charged in the courts across the country with being under the influence while driving military vehicles. I think it would be a good thing to tighten up the discipline in respect to that, because it not only may cause grievous harm to innocent people who are in the path of such vehicles but it certainly brings the units concerned into very bad repute. On the information we have received, which is rather sketchy, I feel that we shall have to defer any further comments until we have the bill before us.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Campney thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 416, respecting the Canadian forces.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

ORDER OF BUSINESS FOR TODAY

Mr. Harris: Before the next order is called, perhaps I should indicate what I think is the agreed agenda for this afternoon and this evening. We are taking now, as I understand it, the bill in my name with respect to the Tariff Board Act. Thereafter we shall take second reading of the bill to amend the Livestock and Livestock Products Act; then we shall take the Canada Lands Surveys Act amendments; then the gold mining subsidies resolution. At a later time, if that has been completed, I shall indicate, I hope by agreement, what we can take then.

TARIFF BOARD ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE MEMBERSHIP OF BOARD FROM THREE TO FIVE

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 290, to amend the Tariff Board Act.

Mr. J. W. Monteith (Perth): In introducing the resolution on this bill on May 8 the minister mentioned that the increased volume of appeals under the Excise Tax Act and the Customs Tariff Act was the reason for increasing the number of members on the board. I am wondering whether by any chance there could be any clarification whatsoever in the terms of the Customs Tariff Act and the Excise Tax Act that would help to reduce the number of appeals under these acts. I notice that, as reported on page 3698 of Hansard of May 8, the minister said:

> As a matter of fact, we are contemplating a situation where we may have two vice-chairmen and appropriate members of the board working on different things at the same time, either completing a report while another investigation is beginning or having hearings going on at the same time on different subjects.

I can understand that the first part of that statement is quite within reason, but upon reading the bill it appears to me that there must be three members of the board sitting on any one appeal. Consequently I do not see how there can be more than one hearing going on at one time. If there is going to be a real saving of time, of course, we are quite in favour of the bill, but I should like to have clarified what the minister meant at that time by saying there could be two hearings going on at once. Outside of that, I think, we are in favour of the bill.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): If the Minister of Finance speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Harris: To answer very briefly what my hon. friend has said, I quite appreciate his study of the bill and I think there is some point to the question he has asked. The fact of the matter is that I had a situation like this in mind. I did not have two hearings in mind, and in so far as I may have left that impression it was in error. What I had in mind was that the work of the board could be divided in such a manner that there would be overlapping and that we might have a board of three conduct a hearing, then another board of three begin another hearing; and while the former was completing its study and the preparation of its report there would be one member of the board who would be not only sitting in the new hearing but would be working on the old one to complete its report. We thought that in that manner, by providing for the board as we have, we could have in fact a continuation of work which may not be possible at the present time.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Constitution of board.

Mr. Monteith: I wonder whether I could ask the minister for clarification of the statement he made a moment ago on second reading. As I understand it, he means that there could be one group of three sitting with a vice-chairman or the chairman in charge, and then when they have completed that hearing a certain number of that group of three could move on to another hearing while somebody on the first hearing would be completing the report and so on?

Mr. Harris: That is correct.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 2 and 3 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

LIVESTOCK AND LIVESTOCK PRODUCTS ACT

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO HATCHING EGGS, ETC.

Hon. W. E. Harris (for the Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 352, to amend the Livestock and Livestock Products Act.

Mr. Charlton: Is the parliamentary assistant going to explain this bill?

Mr. Robert McCubbin (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have a short statement on the bill which I shall read. Part III of the Livestock and Livestock Products Act deals with poultry production. Under its authority is operated a national breeding program for poultry, known as record of performance, and the hatchery approval policy. The latter policy involves provision for supervision of chick hatchery sanitation and operations. On request of the provinces this policy has been proclaimed for compulsory operation in all provinces but Ontario, Quebec and Newfoundland. It operates voluntarily in those three provinces.

There are two features of hatchery supervision which will be changed by the proposed amendments. At the present time, under the authority of section 43 (b) of the act it is required that all chicks sold from approved hatcheries be marked with a standard grade name. In the present stage of development of the poultry business these compulsory grades have little significance with respect to the economic value of the stock. It is proposed to discontinue the requirement for compulsory grading and to substitute for that a provision which will protect the use of such terms as "record of performance" when applied to poultry. That is the purpose of the amendment to section 43 (b).

The act at the present time requires by section 48 that all advertising by chick hatcheries be approved by the department before publication. Section 52 (g) at present makes it an offence to publish such advertising without approval. This approval of advertising is no longer considered necessary and it is proposed to repeal section 48 and paragraph (g) of section 52.

In various sections of the act reference is made to certain requirements with respect to chicks. For administrative purposes it is desired to apply those same requirements to hatching eggs, which is the purpose of the proposed addition of subsection 2 to section 42 of the act.

Mr. J. A. Charlton (Brant-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I see nothing wrong with the bill. As a matter of fact we think it is good. It relieves poultry hatcheries of a lot of restrictions and red tape with respect to advertising which applied in previous years, and I see no reason to delay the passage of the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

CANADA LANDS SURVEYS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING REMUNERATION OF EXAMINERS

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys) moved the second reading of Bill No. 254, to amend the Canada Lands Surveys Act.

Mr. G. C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, as I understand it this bill simply deals with the licensing of land surveyors under the act in question. It therefore is somewhat technical in its nature and is not one which requires any protracted debate, but when the resolution was introduced and considered the minister made very casual reference to it.

I have gone over the bill and I think it is in keeping with the explanation he gave at that time. I do not know if anyone else is going to speak on it. I certainly am not going to take up the time of the house to speak on it because I have accepted what the minister said on that occasion, but I would hope that when he speaks and closes the debate he will amplify the work that has been done and that is proposed to be done by these examiners. He stated it was of a very limited nature when he spoke before, and if there is anything else he can say to amplify it I think it should be done at this time, because he certainly did not do so when the measure was in the committee stage.

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Speaker, I made quite a full statement at the resolution stage and I really have nothing to add at this time. If my hon. friend has any specific questions to ask when we get into commitee I shall try to answer them.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Remuneration of members and secretary.

Mr. Nowlan: I wonder whether the minister would give us the details of the bill at this time. He said he gave a fairly protracted statement at the resolution stage. I was here when he spoke at that time and I thought his statement was merely an outline such as one usually gets at that stage. He did not deal with the details of the bill at all, and I should like to have him make a statement at this time.

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Chairman, I have no further elaboration to make. If the hon. gentleman cares to ask any questions on any section of the bill I will try to answer them.

Mr. Nowlan: The explanatory note says that the bill is simply to provide for the remuneration of the examiners on an annual basis. I think the minister told us there was some question before as to how they were being paid, and that it was felt it would be better if they were dealt with on this basis rather than in accordance with the situation that prevailed prior to the introduction of the amendment. Could the minister elaborate on that?

Mr. Prudham: For many years the examiners have been paid on the basis of the sittings of the board; and as a great deal of this work has to be done privately by the individual members of the board, usually on their own time at home in the evenings, it has been very difficult to establish for the purposes of the Auditor General exactly what a sitting is. Over the years they have been paid on the basis of so much per sitting, and the total annual payment to each member of the board has averaged around $750.

A couple of years ago the Auditor General suggested to our department that we might be somewhat out of order and not acting strictly according to the provisions of the act, and that we should make a change. It is for that reason that we are bringing in this amendment at this time, in order that the examiners may be paid on an annual basis, which relates very closely to the amount that has been paid in the past.

Mr. Nowlan: Section 7 of the act, which is amended by clause 1 of the bill, refers to members or temporary members of the board. The wording of the new section 7 as provided by clause 1 of the bill is:

> Every member or temporary member of the board and the secretary of the board, whether or not he is employed or paid in any other capacity in the public service of Canada, may, in respect of the performance of his duties and functions under this act, be paid—

Then it goes on to refer to remuneration at an annual rate to be fixed by the treasury board and, of course, his actual living and travelling expenses while away from his normal place of residence. Frankly I am not clear in my own mind as to the distinction between members of the board and examiners who are referred to in the next clause. We are not confronted with that clause at the moment but we will be shortly, and it refers to special examiners other than members of the board. Just what are the functions of the board with respect to examinations? What else do they do and what is the difference between an examiner and a member of the board?

Mr. Prudham: The chairman of the board is the surveyor general and the other two members are at the present time and have been for many years employees of the department. A special examiner would be a man who would conduct an examination say in Vancouver, Calgary, Edmonton, Winnipeg or some other point where there were a number of applicants for examination. It has been found more economical to pay qualified land surveyors who reside in that area than to send one of our examiners from Ottawa, with all the expenses of travelling. It is for that reason we provide for special examiners.

Mr. Nowlan: What are the functions of the board, Mr. Chairman, other than the conduct of these examinations and the licensing of what used to be dominion land surveyors? Do they receive any salary or remuneration as members of the board other than that which is indicated by this bill for their services as examiners?

Mr. Prudham: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Nowlan: What other work has the board? Is the board simply for the purpose of examinations or do they have other functions in connection with the Canada Lands Surveys Act?

Mr. Prudham: Well, Mr. Chairman, the work of the commissioners—

Mr. Nowlan: I am speaking of them as a board, not as individuals.

Mr. Prudham: They have no other duties as a board, although they are paid as civil servants for other work in the department.

Mr. Nowlan: They are officials of the department who are paid in connection with their appointments in the department and then they, as individuals, sit on the board.

Mr. Prudham: Yes.

Mr. Nowlan: And the functions of that board are to conduct examinations for certificates?

Mr. Prudham: That is right.

Mr. Nowlan: And the proposal now is to pay them annually rather than on a per diem basis as had been done heretofore?

Mr. Prudham: That is right.

Mr. Bryce: Has the chief examiner a full-time job?

Mr. Prudham: The chairman of the board of examiners is the surveyor general of Canada. This is only part-time work for him.

Mr. Bryce: You are going to change from this per diem allowance and give them so much a year, is that it?

Mr. Prudham: That is the purpose of this amendment.

Mr. Bryce: Are there any extras going to be employed or will there be the same number of men? What benefit will be gained by paying them on a yearly basis instead of a per diem?

Mr. Prudham: As I explained before, it is because of the nature of the work. They have, first of all, to meet as a board and decide in a general way what should be the framework of the examinations for the current year. Perhaps the members of the board will be assigned the preparation of different examination papers, and that work is usually done after hours at home where they are able to concentrate. Then after the examinations are conducted and the applicants have written their examinations, there is the long and tedious work of marking papers and classifying them. This work is done much more adequately by all members working individually than it would be if they worked together around the table as a board.

Mr. Bryce: How many members are there on the board?

Mr. Prudham: There are three.

Mr. Bryce: Does that include the chief surveyor?

Mr. Prudham: That is right.

Mr. Nowlan: I wonder, Mr. Chairman, if the minister could tell us how many applicants wrote the examinations last year, and how many times the examinations were set? Are there regular times for setting these examinations or does it depend upon the number of applicants?

Mr. Prudham: The examinations are usually held on the first Tuesday in February. Last year there were 93 applicants.

Mr. Nowlan: There is no other classification besides the degree, I take it; or are there various stages such as those in connection with a chartered accountant?

Mr. Prudham: There is the one advance examination for a topographical surveyor, and only 32 have qualified for that certificate since 1875. It is a very advanced certificate and very few attain it.

Mr. Nowlan: Could the minister tell us how much was paid last year for services in connection with these examinations on the basis which existed up until this time?

Mr. Prudham: They received $750 per member.

EMERGENCY GOLD MINING ASSISTANCE ACT

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND APPLICATION TO THE YEARS 1957 AND 1958

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act to extend its application to the years 1957 and 1958.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

Mr. Nowlan: Is the minister going to make a statement on this, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Chairman, this resolution proposes very briefly to extend the provisions of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act at the same rate and under the same regulations for the years 1957 and 1958. This Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act came into operation in 1948, and with certain changes in formula it has been assisting the gold mines since that date.

The emergency, so far as the gold mines were concerned, was due to rising costs of labour and materials and the fixed price for gold at $35 United States funds per ounce. During the war the gold mines had been restricted in obtaining certain materials, and consequently production was less than it could have been under normal circumstances. The payments under the act were to meet emergency conditions and to compensate, in some measure, for the restrictions that had been imposed.

The emergency, so far as rising costs and the fixed price for gold are concerned, still exists. There are many communities dependent solely on gold mining and it is proposed, therefore, to extend the period of time for another two years, 1957 and 1958, at the same rate that prevailed for 1955 and for this year, 1956.

Payments under the act have always been based on a formula which has two factors, namely the rate of assistance and the number of assistance ounces. The formula now in effect, and which this bill will extend for two years, is two-thirds of the amount by which the average cost of producing an ounce of gold exceeds $26·50 multiplied by two-thirds of the production in the designated year. The maximum assistance payment is $12·33 an ounce.

Applications for payment in any year are received up until June 30 of the following year. Advance payments are made on an 80 per cent basis, pending an audit of the gold mining company's books by the cost inspection and audit division of the Department of Finance. When the audit is completed the final payment of the 20 per cent holdback is approved. Under these conditions final payments are not yet complete for 1955 but payments are expected to be in the neighbourhood of $9,300,000.

Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act

In 1954, under a formula which gave greater payments, the total cost when the final settlements are made is expected to be about $16,300,000. In 1953 payments amounted to $14,652,080.26. Payments have varied from a low of slightly under $9 million in 1950 to a high of more than $16 million in 1954. The rate of payment per ounce produced in 1954 was $4.22 and in 1953 it was $4.61, the highest rate ever paid.

Payments are made only to mines whose production of gold is 70 per cent of the total value of their output. In 1955 five lode mines suspended operations while one other mine was absorbed by the parent company. One new lode mine came into production in 1955 and one mine elected to sell on the free market and was ineligible for assistance. No mines were on the free market in 1954. Production of gold eligible for assistance payments under the conditions outlined were 3,795,248 ounces in 1954 and 3,301,501 ounces in 1955. No payments under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act are made for gold produced as a by-product recovered in the smelting of gold-bearing base metals. Thus, the gold that qualified for assistance in 1954 was 86·9 per cent of the total gold production, which amounted to 4,366,440 ounces, and in 1955 the corresponding figure was 72·4 per cent of the total gold production of 4,556,400 ounces.

The gold mines have made strenuous efforts to decrease their operating costs, and with marked success. They have done very well. There has been an increase in grade of the ore found in several mines, and on a recent trip up through the Red Lake camp I was pleased to note that many of the mines there have improved their position. One mine in the Northwest Territories has a very high-grade ore and is doing very well without gold mining assistance. In 1957 there may be as many as seven mines which, on account of the costs of production decreasing, will receive either no assistance or just a very small amount under the terms of the act. Other mines, however, are in a life and death struggle for existence, and some may have to close in the next two years.

It has been estimated by officers of my department that if assistance payments were discontinued at the end of 1956, when the present act expires, 18 or 20 mines with an annual production of about 700,000 ounces of gold would quite likely close after a two or three years' salvage period. During the salvage period the gold now in sight would be mined but no new ore would be sought by further exploration. These mines when closed would be permanently lost.

Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act

For the past several years there has been very little prospecting for or development of new gold mines, and the number of gold producers dropped in 1955 to fewer than half the number producing in 1941, the peak year of production. Most of the potential gold mines which are in the development stage are located in or near proven gold camps, and there appears to be little interest to move beyond those localities. Many of the gold mines, in fact, have used money received from gold production to go into other mining ventures. I think we are all familiar with the names of the mines. Gold mines have branched out into other fields such as iron, oil and uranium development.

I could name several mines but I do not think it would be wise for me in my capacity as Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys to name any mines specifically. I do say this, that the companies that are engaged in gold mining are really mining companies and in many instances they have plowed their profits back into further exploration and new development of base metals as well as gold.

It will be apparent that the continuation of the emergency gold mining assistance has aided many of the gold mines to remain in operation so the communities dependent on them have continued to maintain a reasonable standard of living. It has provided money for new mining developments, as I have said, and they have contributed in this way to the general prosperity which mining is now enjoying, and which has been reflected in the economy of Canada.

The contribution of the gold mines to the Canadian economy can be summarized in a few sentences. The amount of new wealth produced in gold in 1955 was valued at $157,305,152. Salaries and wages paid in 1954 were $63,578,156; fuel and electric power purchased amounted to $6,987,528; plant and equipment installed amounted to $6,385,260, and other supplies purchased amounted to $38,814,500. It is estimated that the total number of employees in 1954 was almost 18,500.

Since the inception of the gold mining assistance in 1948 the amount paid out to March 31, 1956, is over $90 million. This applied to 26 million ounces, or an average of $3.48 an ounce. It is calculated that payments in 1955 will probably reach $9,300,000.

It is expected that if production costs remain the same for 1957 as for 1955 the cost of assistance in 1957 will be approximately $8,600,000. This decrease from the present estimate of $9,300,000 in 1955 and $8,900,000 in 1956, even though it is at the same rate as provided at the present time, is due to the fact that several mines are now mining better grade ores and therefore will receive less help and, as I said before, a few will probably go out of existence.

There has been a marked improvement in efficiency in the last few years and for this the management and the men deserve a great deal of credit. Increased costs for the coming year, of course, would tend to increase payments under the act, but I predict that the present trend toward lower payments under the act will continue.

Gold mines are continuing to make, as I said before, a very valuable contribution to the over-all economy of Canada, and we think the further aid for the years 1957 and 1958 is entirely justified.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, certainly the minister does not have to make any apology for the value of the gold mining industry in Canada. We all realize it is one of the great mining industries of this country, and one which has made a real contribution. I am certainly not going to debate the merits of this resolution at the moment, because even if I wanted to I would not have the qualifications so to do. When the bill is before us on second reading those hon. members who have more knowledge of the industry than I have will be able to discuss the bill on its merits.

As I understand it what we are doing now is extending the life of the bill for a further two years, and the bill itself is being continued in terms exactly the same as heretofore.

It is somewhat of a play on words, I think, Mr. Chairman, to have the title of this bill "The Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act". The minister has told us the emergency arose during the war when the price of gold was fixed at a certain price and when the costs of labour were increasing. Well, the price of gold is still fixed and labour is still going up and up and is much higher than it was at the time the bill was originally introduced. Possibly some consideration could be given to changing the name of the act.

I am reminded of the wartime income tax act which was introduced in 1917 as a temporary measure during the first war and was continued under the same name until about three years ago, when we finally dropped the word "wartime" out of the title and put it on the straight basis of the Income Tax Act. It may be that if this act is to be carried on it should not be called an emergency act but that some consideration should be given to changing the title to put it on the other basis.

Certainly the contribution which has been made by the industry, as the minister said, has been substantial. The amount we are apparently paying this year is going to be quite a bit less than last year. One is faced with the possibility which the minister suggests of a substantial number of mines perhaps closing during the year. Some of these, of course, are probably on a temporary basis, where only camps have been established, but in other cases full communities will be threatened by the closing of these mines. It presents a problem to the minister in the administration of this particular industry which I think is something that has to be dealt with on more than an emergency basis or from instalment to instalment as the minister proposes to do just now. I presume the bill is being extended for two years rather than one so that the industry will have some idea of continuance or permanence for a period of two years. That in itself is a very short time during which one can make plans.

I realize, too, of course, there are other mining industries as well as gold mining which are facing trouble and disaster, and there is one on which some of us could talk more competently than on this. When I see the figures paid out here I am also reminded of the assistance on a comparative basis; I can make a mental comparison with amounts paid out to other mining industries. As I said, I certainly am not trying to discuss the merits of this at all. I simply say that when the bill on which this resolution is based comes before us for second reading we will then have an opportunity to debate its merits and the application of the general principle as such, and I shall reserve any further comments for that debate.

Mr. Rea: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the minister a question. I understand those mines which have taken advantage of the free market to sell gold cannot get any assistance under this act. If that is so why should they be penalized by not being allowed to sell gold in the free market which they have not been able to do since the spring? I understand those which did that are not to be allowed any assistance under this act.

Mr. Prudham: If a mine elected to sell on the free market it would be for one reason only, and that was to get a higher price; therefore it would not need the assistance. That is the only reason a mine would elect to pass up assistance and go on the free market.

Mr. Rea: They might not get as much assistance. Is there not a way that can be worked out whereby if they got part of it they would get half the assistance? In other words, why penalize them and make the government pay the extra cost? You say you are paying about $3.48 an ounce. If they could get an extra $1.50 it would only cost the government the difference between $1.50 and $3.48. There is no reason why that could not be done. It might save the government some money and give the mine a chance to make more there.

Mr. Prudham: A mine has the option of electing to go on the free market with one month's notice, but if its costs were below $26.50 it would not be eligible for assistance. Also a mine has the privilege of delivering its production to the mint or selling it elsewhere on the free market if it so wishes. I do not know if that answers your question.

Mr. Rea: I agree. I quite understand what the minister is saying, but I still cannot get over the fact that if a mine can sell its gold on the free market for say $1.50 an ounce over and above the cost of $26.50, it should be penalized and the government does not pay the $3.48. Perhaps the government would only have to give them $1.50 or less an ounce. We want to stop as much subsidy as we can and yet keep them in business. I think perhaps you are following what I have in mind. Let us suppose they do sell and the government then only needs to give them $1.50 an ounce to make up what they would be getting if they did not sell on the free market. Is there any reason why that could not be done?

Mr. Prudham: You need to have a cut-off point somewhere or you would run into impossible administrative difficulties.

Mr. Rea: You have bookkeeping systems now with the mines. This would be just a bookkeeping entry.

Mr. Prudham: I do not know; it is quite a complicated procedure even now.

Mr. Rea: Not any more complicated than keeping track of the costs. You would be just keeping track of sales.

Mr. Prudham: I do not know why a mine would elect to go on the free market if it could make more money by drawing assistance. I do not think it should have it both ways.

Mr. Rea: We do not know what the free market might be. It might be a good thing to have them try it. We do not know what the free market is going to be. I think you will agree that no one knows yet.

Mr. Prudham: A mine has the option of reverting to either the free market or gold mining assistance on one month's notice. I think that is fair enough.

Mr. Rea: In other words you are penalizing those mines which do not have as high grade ore; they are being penalized in the possibility of creating a market for their product in some other way. There are all sorts of ideas, as you know. They could perhaps decide to make $50 gold coins and sell them to the public and they might create quite a good market, we do not know. They are being penalized because they have low-grade ore. I do not think the idea of the government is to penalize; I think it wants to try to create a free market, as you suggested in the spring. I do not see why you have to cut it off there. Why can you not do it on a graded scale?

Mr. Barnett: As I understand the introductory remarks made by the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, Mr. Chairman, in effect he is asking parliament to extend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act on the basis of the formula which was adopted the last time the act came before the house for revision.

It seems to me it is perhaps regrettable that the minister is bringing in the request at this time inasmuch, as the minister said, we have not received a report which indicates in any detail the operation of the act over the past year. In other words, as I understand it we are not really in a position to make a detailed examination of how the current formula under the act is working out across the country in comparison with how it worked out under the basis of the previous formula.

I believe the minister did make certain general observations and some reference to one or two mines, but I think it would be advantageous if we could have a detailed statement, at least before second reading, as to how the act has been working out for the different mines which are receiving assistance. I think we should have that information before we are asked to extend the act for a further period of two years.

If I recall correctly, the mines have until June 30 of the year following to make their applications for assistance, and perhaps that is one reason we have not before us detailed information of the kind I have been referring to. It seems to me that period is unnecessarily long and that a period of three months, or up to March 31, should be adequate for the making of application for assistance by any mining corporation. If that had been the cut-off date, then the government would have been able to give us a more detailed statement as to the operations of the act. I hope the minister will be able to cast some light upon the situation, and perhaps he will indicate what additional information he can give us to that contained in his introductory remarks.

I would remind the committee that the application of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act is of interest to a great many people besides the mine operators. This is a matter of concern not only to the directors and shareholders of a mining company but also to its employees. I think the minister will recall that such support as he has received in previous years from this corner of the house when similar bills have been before us has been based upon his argument that this assistance would be of some benefit to the men who operate and work in the gold mining industry. These men are concerned with knowing what assistance the mines are going to receive under the act.

We feel that when funds are coming from the public treasury for the assistance of gold mine operators the amount should be decided upon as quickly as possible after the termination of each year's operations so that when the bargaining agents for the employees go into negotiations with the employers they will be in a position to know exactly the position of that mine relative to the assistance received under the act. In carrying on negotiations with mining operators and others, unions have found that negotiations could be carried forward on a sounder basis if the companies were prepared to make clear their actual operating positions and their ability to pay. As hon. members of the committee are well aware, by and large that sort of request is still met with an adamant negative on the part of the operators.

It does seem to me that where public funds are involved the one concern of this parliament should be that the people working in the industry get a fair break. I throw that forward as a suggestion for the consideration of the minister, so that when the bill is brought in he may consider shortening the period in which applications are allowed, for the reasons I have advanced.

Mr. Quelch: Could the minister say how many operators have elected to sell on the free market and what is the highest price that has been received during the past year on the free market?

Mr. Prudham: Only two mines sold on the free market last year, and we do not know what price they received. Those mines were not receiving assistance during that year because their costs were less than $26.50.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni has pointed out that we should have some concern for the workingmen. That is exactly the reason this act was brought in in the first place, and why we have been arguing that it is really a measure to maintain employment in these communities. We believe that the results to date have justified the expenditure of money that has been made. In many instances these communities have been preserved and enabled to carry on. In several instances a mining company has been able to establish operations in base metal mining, probably in the same community, and has invested in other types of mining in other parts of the country, all of which has resulted in the maintenance of employment in the industry.

Mr. Low: Am I to understand that the free market in gold has not diminished the number of requests for subsidy thus far?

Mr. Prudham: For the simple reason that it is not profitable to sell on the free market. There was a period about three or four years ago when there was a lot of speculation on the free market and operators were tempted to forego assistance and sell their product on the free market. But I understand that conditions have settled down.

Mr. Barnett: Will the minister give consideration to the point I raised about shortening the time for making application?

Mr. Prudham: This department would be quite pleased if we could shorten the time; but gold mines, especially placer operations, are scattered in the far corners of this country. Many of them are small operations and it takes time for our auditors to visit them to make a final audit. They make interim inspection trips, as do our engineers, and an assessment of the development of reserve ore is made. A mine is not allowed in any one year to increase the proportion of its reserves in relation to its production beyond a reasonable relationship with what they had when they came under gold mining assistance in the first place. It is a complicated and, I think, of necessity a long drawn out operation. If we could shorten it our department would be very pleased to do so.

Mr. Barnett: How many placer operators are now receiving assistance under the act?

Mr. Prudham: There are two major placer operators and eight or ten small ones at the moment.

Mr. Low: Does the minister see any possibility in the foreseeable future of being able to discontinue this assistance? I am not arguing at the moment that it should be discontinued now. Perhaps under the circumstances it is inevitable that we continue it at least until either costs are down sufficiently to make it possible for the miners to operate profitably or, in the alternative, a more profitable market is created. It would have to depend on one or both of those things. Does the minister foresee a time when we can get rid of this assistance?

Mr. Prudham: Our maximum payments were over $16 million; we are now down to around the $9 million mark, and we foresee the cost coming down to less than $8 million or around the $8 million figure. We think the mines are making very good progress toward self-sufficiency under this act. That is one reason we are extending it for two years, to give them some security, so they can plan their operations more efficiently and plot their development work to get the maximum results. We are very pleased at the way it is going, and we are confident they are moving toward self-sufficiency.

Mr. Low: I have just one more question. I am sorry but I did not quite hear all the minister said in his parliamentary statement, as there seemed to be a good deal of noise. It occurred to me then to ask how many men are employed in Canada today in the industry.

Mr. Prudham: About 18,500.

Mr. Quelch: What percentage of the companies are receiving assistance, and what percentage are subsidiaries of United States companies?

Mr. Prudham: I have no information about that.

Mr. Quelch: I would be rather interested to learn to what extent we are subsidizing United States companies under this act.

Mr. Rea: I noted the minister said that the subsidies had gone from $16 million to $9 million over a certain period of time. Would he state whether in his opinion that is due to the efficiency of the operation of the mines, or have many mines closed up?

Mr. Prudham: The change in the maximum amount paid is related to our rate of payments to a large extent, and also the reduction in costs is due to improved efficiency.

Mr. Regier: The minister mentioned that about 18,000 men were employed in gold mining. I am sure he does not mean to say that 18,000 gold miners are being assisted by means of a subsidy. I believe that a goodly number work in mines that do not receive a subsidy. Could the minister give us any indication of the number of men who are thereby being retained in employment? Is it one-half or is it only one-quarter of them, or perhaps only 1,000?

Mr. Prudham: I cannot tell exactly but, as I mentioned in my statement, about 72 per cent of the total production is assisted. Whether or not that relates directly to employment, that gives a rough idea.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I am trying to tie down whether it is an increase in efficiency that is causing a decrease in the number of claims, or at least a decrease in the amount paid. Is this figure of 18,000 a constant figure, or have you any figures to show how many people have been employed in this industry over the past two or three years?

Mr. Prudham: I think when the act came into force there were about 22,000. I cannot give you the figures progressively, but that is approximately what the reduction has been.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Although you were not able to give us the figures of mines closed, there has been a decrease in the number of people employed to the extent of about 4,000 over the past ten years, is that right?

Mr. Prudham: I would say over the past six years. My figures would indicate about 3,500 of a reduction.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): At the same time has there been a corresponding decrease in gold production? Is that going down?

Mr. Prudham: No, it has gone up.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): So there is increased efficiency then in connection with the operation of the companies that are claiming assistance?

Mr. Prudham: Yes.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I think we are all very much interested in this, and I subscribe to the view that it is very beneficial to have this act extended for two years so there can be planning here. I think all of us agree that it is of benefit not only to the people who are in the mining industry but to the thousands of people dependent on the trade which is generated through these communities.

A great number of the mines are probably in fairly inaccessible areas. I wonder whether the minister has given any consideration, in connection with the assistance that these people may need, to improvement of transportation or the lowering of transportation costs. It seems to me that if these mines were made a little more accessible or if there were general thought given to improving the conditions and the accessibility, we might find a greater number improving their operations and there might be an indication of more that could go into production. Perhaps there is an indirect way here in which these people could be helped.

Mr. Prudham: I think the formula provides for that. We may assume that the mine in the inaccessible place has a higher cost, including transportation, and therefore would get more assistance under the act.

[Mr. Hamilton (York West).]

Mr. Hamilton (York West): In other words the formula does cover the question of transportation costs in addition to the actual production?

Mr. Prudham: Yes.

Mr. Regier: I wonder whether the minister can tell us whether any thought has ever been given to this phase of the problem. I notice that even if we say that 16,000 miners are being helped thereby, the sum of $8 million means $500 per miner. We have been doing this for some eight years. That is a grand sum of $4,000 per miner. What I have in mind is whether any thought has ever been given to spending $4,000 on each miner working in these marginal mines and attempt to rehabilitate him to some other area of Canada or in some more profitable undertaking.

Mr. Prudham: If we did that we would destroy the communities. The actual number of people working in a mine does not by any means represent the number of people that benefit. I have read many times that for every man underground there are at least four people employed on the surface. Further, whole communities depend on the existence of these mines. I am sure that my hon. friend from Timiskaming, when she gets an opportunity, will tell you about that. I think there is ample justification for maintaining those communities in the north. They are helping to roll back our frontiers. As I said before, they are not only engaged in the search for and the production of gold, but their efforts also lead directly and indirectly to the development of base metals and forestry. They consume large amounts of pit props and other lumber, steel and electrical goods. This aid is by no means confined to the actual miners who work in the pits.

Mrs. Shipley: Mr. Chairman, following the last question by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, I think it is high time that somebody from the mining areas had a word to say. I was waiting until the questions were over, and had thought that perhaps I would speak on the next reading of the bill. You know, it is a simple thing to say, and it sounds like an easy solution; why do you not take $4,000 in the first place and rehabilitate these miners?

Mr. Regier: On a question of privilege, I did not offer that as a solution. I only asked whether any consideration had ever been given.

Mrs. Shipley: Oh, quite. I was not trying to imply in any way that the hon. member had said that was what should be done, but it is a simple thing to ask if it has been considered. However, if the hon. member knew the miners I think he perhaps would not make such a suggestion. After all, the men and women in these areas have everything they own in this world invested in these communities. They have worked there for years. We have millions and millions of dollars invested in first class schools, water, sewers and all sorts of sanitary facilities, churches, all those things that go to make modern municipalities. We grew very rapidly at one time, when the federal government asked us to expand the production of gold as quickly as possible because they needed the money to pay for war supplies. That caused our municipalities to expand very rapidly and, I might say, put us very much in debt. However, every available bit of manpower and mining ability was put into meeting that request. It was made at the time when Mr. Ilsley was minister of finance, but I have forgotten the year.

In these communities we also have extensive business sections. We have some secondary industry, most of which is entirely dependent on the mining industry. But in the outlying areas in my particular part of Ontario we have a peculiar land formation. Around Cobalt we have solid rock. If you wanted to have a little vegetable garden you would have to drag in the earth. Just north of that we have what is called the small clay belt. It has some of the finest soil you can find in any country in the world. The people there grow wonderful vegetables, but not in large enough quantities to justify the establishment of the costly storage facilities you would have to have if you were going to hold over your root vegetables in order to export them when you could get a good price. This clay farming area depends on the mining municipalities nearby for its markets. In a sense the people there are just as dependent on the mining industry as are those who actually work in the mines.

North of that clay belt we have the Kirkland-Larder mining area which is almost solid rock with no soil at all. North of that again, and running into the riding of my colleague the hon. member for Timmins, we have a sand belt, and then a rocky belt and then the great clay belt. This part of Ontario will one day be one of the finest parts of Canada, and not only just for mining. We have not exhausted exploration for mines in that area, and I do not refer particularly to gold mines. In certain parts of the area those who explored for gold mines found and developed great base metal mines, and the search still goes on.

It is our hope, and I hope it is the hope of other hon. members—in fact, you have always been most sympathetic to our problem—that either the price of gold will go up or that costs will go down, but we do not really expect that costs will go down because that would mean a depression. Actually our main hope is an increase in the price of gold, which is not an impossible thing. Today the price of gold is determined by the United States government. It used to be determined by the government of Great Britain. It may be that overnight we will have an increase in the price of gold, and then we would not need any help.

This assistance is given in such a manner that only those mines that need it in order to keep operating receive it, and they receive it in varying amounts based on need, that is, their cost per ounce of gold produced.

The question was asked whether consideration has been given to moving these people. How could you compensate; what would you do with the thousands of people we have in these mining areas? Surely it would not be expected that they would give up all their life savings. The provinces are primarily concerned in the situation, and in my case it happens to be the province of Ontario.

Actually I think what should be done is that at this time we should have a most influential committee to study ways and means of establishing secondary industries in these communities, if necessary by subsidy in the beginning if you wish to call it that, before it is too late and we have a serious problem on our hands.

I have more to say, but I should like to speak at a later time when I have heard what others have to say.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Harris: Just before we begin may I say that upon completion of the discussion of the resolution we are now considering the house will, by consent, go into supply, without this particular motion being counted as one of those which is referred to in the rules, and we shall then consider the estimates of the Department of Transport.

Mrs. Shipley: When I was speaking just before the dinner hour, Mr. Chairman, I was speaking in particular to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. He had asked the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys if his department had ever given consideration to computing the amount of money per employee given in gold mining assistance in Canada, and rehabilitating the miners elsewhere. I had pointed out the buildings, the sanitary services and so on existent in those cities. In Ontario alone we have two cities entirely dependent on the gold mining industry, the city of Timmins in the riding of my colleague from the constituency of Timmins, and the city of Kirkland Lake, although it is not incorporated as such, in the riding of Timiskaming. There are many, many smaller villages, towns and hamlets.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni made it quite clear that this was only a suggestion. I should like to suggest to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni that every session since I have been here, and it is true I am but a novice, we have spent almost 50 per cent of the time of this house in discussing the plight of the western farmers. I understand that during election times in the west certain members of a certain party, and one in particular of the party to which the hon. member belongs, object rather strenuously to the assistance that has been given to the gold mining industry. One of the things they say is that you cannot eat it, and they say many other things that are rarely cited in this house.

I just wonder what the hon. member would think if those of us who do not grow wheat suggested that all the proposals from his party would not mean a thing unless this government felt the western wheat farmer was entitled to assistance. What would he think if we suggested, or if I suggested for instance that, after all, according to his party we have difficulty in selling wheat and a major difficulty exists in some areas represented by members of his party, and that we should take the $4,000—I think that was the sum he suggested—and rehabilitate those farmers in some other industry.

Now, of course, I would not be stupid enough to make such a proposal. I worked on a farm myself, and I know that land means everything to the man who is on it. I do not concede we have too much wheat. In spite of the crying to which we have listened hour after hour and day after day in this house about what this government was doing in selling wheat the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who said he would take care of the wheat, has been able to take care of it in the face of serious problems. But day after day we have listened to the cries from these areas. I am rather amazed that the hon. member, who appears to be so sympathetic to the problems facing the individual farmers, would be so lacking in consideration and thoughtfulness for the individual miners. Believe me, the miner works no less hard than the farmer.

[Mrs. Shipley.]

Mr. Barnett: About which hon. member are you talking?

Mrs. Shipley: I was talking about you. Go ahead and ask the question. Are you the member for Comox-Alberni or Alberni-Comox?

Mr. Barnett: Comox-Alberni. I was just trying to recall when I have been talking about the plight of the western farmer. My colleague the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam did say something about $4,000 per miner earlier this afternoon. I am slightly puzzled as to which member the hon. member has been referring in her recent remarks.

Mrs. Shipley: It does not make much difference; it was a member of your party.

Mr. Winch: It does not make much sense, either, the way you are putting it.

Mrs. Shipley: It will in just a moment. Who said that? Was that the hon. member for Vancouver something?

Mr. Winch: It is not Vancouver something. It is Vancouver East, a very important area.

Mrs. Shipley: I assure the hon. gentleman I did not use the term "something" in that sense. I find it very difficult, this being my first session, to remember exactly where people come from.

Mr. Winch: Wrong again; it is your third.

Mrs. Shipley: It is my first parliament; you are a great stickler, but that is all right. I am used to the hon. member. I sit on a committee with him, and I know he can be such a stickler.

I am sorry; the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam made the statement, but it is quite all right. I meant every word I said. We will apply it to the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam. Now, you have disrupted my train of thought and I may have to repeat it so that even the hon. member for Vancouver East can understand the point. As I was about to say, we have listened with great patience and understanding because the members of that party are not the only ones who feel keenly about the plight of the farmers. This government has done many things for the farmers. I will admit that occasionally some of the people in this part of the country say if we can do so much for the farmer, why can we not do something for this group or that group?

Here we have a subsidy, and we dislike subsidies just as much as the western farmer does. I know farmers. They like to be independent. But no matter what we do, from some of the speeches made by some of the members in the C.C.F. party and the opposition it would appear that it is not enough. We have done a great deal. If you divided what we have done over a four-year period by the number of farmers concerned, I am sure the total would probably equal the total quoted by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam. We would not suggest for a moment that as an argument against doing what has been done for the farmer. What has been done for the farmer has been done with 100 per cent co-operation from the members on this side of the house. I am confident that we will continue to do what should be done for all phases of the economy of this country to keep Canada strong.

Here we have the gold mining industry which, as I explained before dinner, has been at the will of government, not solely this government but international government. The price of gold is something over which this government has no control. At one time, and I told you about that before dinner, we were asked to expand rapidly and produce as much as we could. We did that. Then all of a sudden gold mining was not a war essential and all our supplies and our labour supply were cut off. In the meantime municipalities had flourished.

I remember that last year when this bill re-establishing the assistance for two years was under discussion there was much talk on the part of C.C.F. members about this government establishing a special committee to investigate the gold mines, as to their financial problems, the needs of the municipalities and so on. They were told at that time that the type of investigation primarily desired was of provincial matters, and such a committee was subsequently established by the premier of Ontario.

The report I have is a gold mining and economic study in Ontario. The chairman of this committee was Professor F. A. Knox, head of the department of political and economic science, Queen's University, Kingston. The members were Professor E. E. Reilly, professor of economics, University of Western Ontario, London, and Professor H. R. Rice, head of the department of mining engineering, University of Toronto, Toronto. The secretary was James Johnston, Stratford. This is the final report they made to the premier of Ontario and to the government. I am going to tell you more of this report later, but at this stage of the discussion I should like to read from page 48, where they state:

> Although gold has been produced in many parts of Ontario, 82 per cent of it has come from the Porcupine and the Kirkland Lake camps.

The Porcupine camp is situated in the riding of my colleague the hon. member for Timmins, and the Kirkland Lake camp, normally known as the Kirkland-Larder camp, is in my riding. I continue:

> In 1954, these two camps still produced 62 per cent of the province's total. They supported 55,000 or 79 per cent of the 70,000 population of Ontario's "gold mining" communities. By their size alone, they present the major problems of adjustment to changing gold mining trends. Their largest communities, Timmins and Kirkland Lake, would show the most significant impact of any unfavourable shifts. While both of these are almost solely dependent upon the one industry, they do not depend on any one mine.

Kirkland Lake is my home town. Further down on page 49 I find the following:

> Because of the lack of alternative occupations in the area, the miner and his family are especially dependent upon employment in the mines. There are few jobs for young men and almost none for young women. The tax base of the mining municipalities is therefore uncertain also.

That is another problem which I shall not discuss at this time. Although the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam did ask the question, I am sure if he gives the matter a little thought he will realize that he should not suggest such treatment for people who have lived in these communities. I am one myself, though I was not by any means a newcomer. In 1927 it is true the town was in its very beginning. We had no streets, no sidewalks, no sewers, no running water, nothing of that kind. Today it is a modern city, and there are people who have been there 12 to 15 years longer than I.

These people have paid their taxes to build one of the finest fire-fighting services in Canada. We have one of the lowest fire insurance rates, and incidentally we have many buildings that are greater fire hazards than one can find in the whole city of Ottawa, but we have one of the lowest fire losses in the country. Therefore you know how good the service is.

We operate a fine police force. We have built roads, sewers, water mains, churches, schools, and so on. We paid for these as we went along. Hon. members across the way know that in the early days the wages paid to gold miners were the highest in heavy industry in Canada, but for some years past they have been by no means the highest.

We paid. It costs six times as much to put a sewer through one yard of rock as it does to put it through loam or soil. We paid for that, we the people and not somebody who made a million dollars and lives on James street in Montreal or Bay street in Toronto. They do not compose a fraction of one per cent of the people involved in gold mining. It is the miner, the baker, the housewife, the school teacher, the street cleaner. We all own shares in these mines and we helped to build the community.

If hon. gentlemen across the way ever think of asking the question, why not take $4,000 and rehabilitate these people, I sincerely hope they will remember that the people who built these mining communities were also the prospectors. They are the people who found the base metal mines throughout this country; they are the people who are making Canada great, and please do not let me hear any more about taking $4,000 to rehabilitate a miner.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, in the first place I should thank the hon. member for the very interesting political speech we have just heard.

Mrs. Shipley: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, I never thought more of the party to which I belong, and I object very strongly to my speech being called a political speech.

The Deputy Chairman: I think one can hardly claim in an organization like this that a point of order or a question of privilege arises if either side is accused of discussing politics. After all, if I might say so, what are we here for? The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, I may not know everything there is to know about mining. However, I can assure the hon. lady that the people of my riding know a lot less about growing wheat and about the problems of the farmer than I might know about the conditions of the miners in her constituency. On the west coast of British Columbia we are about as far removed from the problems of the wheat farmers as any other hon. members in this house. When I asked the minister whether there was any possible hope of finding a better solution of the problem before us I think I was entitled to a little more responsible answer than, again I must submit, the political reply I received. I think the record of the C.C.F. movement on behalf of the workers, and especially on behalf of the miners of Canada, is well known. Back in the early days it was the miners' union that was responsible for the election of the first labour and socialist member to this House of Commons.

However, we have been concerned with what has happened over the years. When we see, for example, in one year the dividends paid out by the gold mining companies of Canada amount to $18 million and these gold mining companies receive subsidies of $16 million from this government, we begin to wonder just what is taking place. If the subsidy is meant for the miner, as the minister indicated was the reason for the legislation, to help the miner, we are all for it, and in this house we have always been in favour of this subsidy.

However, we have sometimes had the nerve to attempt to find out how much of the subsidy is actually received by the miners. We are not at all interested in helping to line the pockets of speculators in Montreal and Toronto. When I referred to the subsidy to the average miner having amounted to the sum of $4,000 over the past eight years I did have in mind the thought that very little of this $4,000 has reached the pockets and the homes of the miners concerned.

The hon. member for Timiskaming mentioned a few possible solutions, and I was keenly observant of the offering she would make. She said that possibly the only solution is an increase in the price of gold. That, I contend, is a whole lot of wishful thinking. As long as one nation of the world has a virtual monopoly on the supply of gold and on balances of trade, that nation is not likely to allow an increase in the price of gold for any useful purpose.

However, I would like at this point to congratulate her. She did propose a second solution, namely the establishment of secondary industry for those people. My only purpose in raising the question in the first place was that I was wondering whether some more useful avenue of helping those people might not be found.

I wanted the minister to tell me whether any exploration in that field has been undertaken. I notice the minister saw fit to have the hon. member supply me with an answer. Perhaps he does not know any more about gold mining than I know about wheat farming; however, I hope we shall not for long continue subsidizing mining companies and have miners working much longer hours than the average Canadian worker is required to work at wages which, as the hon. member admits, are below standard wages.

Mrs. Shipley: No, no.

Mr. Regier: Yet the taxpayer has to pay a subsidy—

Mrs. Shipley: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Regier: —when these millions of dollars might be found to provide for these people in their own community, or elsewhere as they see fit, some means of employment whereby they can render their contribution to the economy of the nation.

Mrs. Shipley: Mr. Chairman, may I reply to one point. I did not say the wages were below standard; I said they were much lower than they were when we led the field.

Mr. Simmons: I am happy to support this resolution preceding the bill. The minister has explained that all the proposed bill seeks to do is extend the emergency gold mining assistance payments for another two years, namely 1957 and 1958. By making this federal cost-aid policy apply over the next two years instead of only one, it will now be possible for the management of Canadian gold mines to plan their future operations with greater assurance. The two-year extension will serve to strengthen the stability of this industry in Canada.

When this legislation was first introduced in this house eight years ago, we all knew it was not meant to be a cure-all for the troubles that beset this important mining industry. Rather it was planned as emergency help over what was hoped to be a comparatively limited period of years. The industry had been caught in a progressive squeeze between rising production costs on the one hand and a fixed price for its product on the other. That condition still applies, and I assume that some form of federal assistance will be continued to gold mines as long as the industry remains caught in an unfair and ruinous situation.

By this renewed measure of federal aid the government acknowledges that the gold mining industry of Canada is worth preserving and encouraging. It is the pioneer industry of the north country and has done more than any other activity to push back our frontiers of settlement and give Canada depth as well as width. It is an industry that provides employment as well as a market for machinery and supplies. Gold mining is and has been the mainspring of our entire mining economy, especially in the north. The search for gold spurs the search for other minerals.

In 1953, the last designated year under the legislation for which complete figures are available, 20 gold mines in the Yukon territory received a total federal subsidy amounting to $536,954.67. I find that applications for assistance for the designated year 1954 will continue to be received in Ottawa up until June of this year.

There is one strange inherent contradiction in federal gold mining policy in its application to the Yukon to which I wish to draw special attention at this time, which is causing gold mining operators in the Yukon considerable anxiety. Placer gold mining companies in the Yukon receive federal cost-aid assistance, as indeed they should. I fully support this form of encouragement and only wish the amount could be increased. On the other hand, the federal government discourages this placer mining industry by fastening upon it a heavy special tax that has all the earmarks of rank discrimination. I refer to the gold export tax. In its severity and unfairness, as well as its evident contradiction of the purpose of emergency gold mining assistance, this tax provision appears to represent the height of absurdity.

In 1953, for example, one placer gold mining company in the Klondike district paid $20,217 on all gold shipped out of the Yukon, whatever its disposition. This represented over 78 per cent of the year's profit on the company's operations. That imposition is bad enough, but the discriminating feature enters when we realize that the equivalent tax or royalty under the provisions of section 95 of the Yukon Quartz Mining Act would have amounted to $476. For 1954 the equivalent figures are $25,179 export tax on placer gold in contrast to $5,535 on quartz gold under the Yukon Quartz Mining Act.

My contention is that the gold export tax should be reduced in line with the rates of royalty under the provisions of section 95 of the Yukon Quartz Mining Act. The question involves two principles. First of all, is it fair and sound that a depressed industry should be obliged to pay such an exorbitant tax? And secondly, if the royalty is fair and sound in principle, is the amount of the royalty reasonable? I say not.

The gold export tax may have had some justification when it was established in 1897, inasmuch as gold was being shipped from the Yukon to the United States and our government felt Canada should secure some revenue from the tremendous production of gold at that time. Today the situation is much different.

I do not say that this export tax should be entirely abolished. When it was first imposed, gold was being exported from the Yukon to the United States and it was felt that the people of Canada should derive some financial benefit from the depletion of the mineral resources of this country. But let me again reiterate that the present rate of this so-called gold export tax is a heavy and unfair burden on placer mining operations and should be sharply reduced, at least to the point where it is at the same level as taxation on the product of gold quartz mining activity.

This appeal has the support of three major business organizations of this country. I refer to the British Columbia and Yukon chamber of mines and its branches, the Vancouver board of trade and the Yukon territorial council, which on March 28 of this year passed the following resolution:

> Whereas an export tax on gold mined in the Yukon territory was imposed in 1897 to provide revenue from shipments to the United States;

And whereas practically all gold mined in the Yukon today is shipped to the Royal Canadian Mint at Ottawa;

And whereas it is a discriminating tax levied solely on gold shipped from the Yukon;

And whereas it increases the burden of an industry struggling to survive due to ever increasing costs and the fixed price of gold;

Therefore be it resolved that this council recommend that an adjustment be made of the export tax on gold mined in the Yukon Territory.

By bringing the placer gold export tax into line with the tax levied on quartz gold, the government would be encouraging an industry which provides important employment in one of Canada's most northerly communities. Gold mining costs in the Yukon are already high enough. The labour costs of one producer is 70 per cent of the total cost of production. If this export tax is permitted to continue at its present rate serious curtailment of operations may occur.

This export tax on Yukon placer gold, which yields over $40,000 a year in revenue to the federal treasury, has the effect of adding approximately 37½ cents in additional production cost to every ounce of gold produced. There has been no change in this gold export tax provision since 1902. It will not require a change in the legislation, merely a change in the regulations. An amendment to the act itself would be necessary only if the tax were eliminated altogether.

I appeal to the government on behalf of all placer gold mining companies in the Yukon to drastically reduce the rate of the so-called gold export tax to provide encouragement for this depressed mining industry.

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Chairman, this afternoon the hon. member for Spadina asked some questions about the free market, and I am not sure that I was explicit in my answer. Gold mines desiring to go on the free market may do so at the beginning of any quarter in the year by giving 30 days' notice. If they wish to return to gold mining assistance they may do so only on July 1 or January 1 by giving similar notice.

The hon. member for Yukon, who has just spoken, made out a good case for the gold mining industry in his area, but I would suggest that perhaps his remarks would be better directed to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, as we have no power under this act to deal with that tax problem. I do know that under the Yukon Quartz Mining Act royalties are paid on a profit-sharing basis by the lode mines; that is, royalties are paid only when a net profit is made by the mining company. There is an exemption of the first $10,000, and the tax is graduated from 3 per cent to 6 per cent.

Under the Yukon Placer Mining Act, which applies to placer mines only, a tax is levied on gold which is exported from the territory. That tax is 2½ per cent on all production, but it is based on a value of $15 per ounce which is less than half the current value. Under this method of assessment the tax works out to slightly more than 1¼ per cent on gold valued at $35.

Mr. Simmons: The royalties are levied on bar ounces, not on vein ounces, which equals 1·45 per cent on the gross output, according to the figures I have.

Mr. Prudham: I shall not get into an argument on that because I am not very well informed apart from the terms of the act. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam asked what we were doing in a constructive way to provide alternate employment for people in the gold mining industry. I would remind him that the geological survey of Canada has about 75 parties in the field this year. Every year they are mapping the geology of Canada and the records, maps and statistics which they have compiled form the basis for a great many mineral discoveries.

I could mention a few recent discoveries which were based on the reports, maps and statistics compiled by the geological survey, in many cases years ago. One outstanding example is the great iron ore development in Labrador which was based on geological reports made before the turn of the century. More recent ones are the Manitouwadge ore discovery and the discoveries at Blind River, and to a large extent the discovery in New Brunswick.

I submit that this is the most constructive effort that could be made to keep the mining industry advancing and to provide alternate employment for people engaged in a particular line of endeavour which seems to be facing difficult times. I know of one gold mine in Quebec which is nearing the end of its life. During this last year they discovered a copper deposit within 20 miles, which they are now developing. They will use their gold mill for the processing of that copper ore and the community will be assured of continuation. I know of another area in Manitoba which has been depending on gold exclusively for a number of years. The last report I have is that the mill will be turned over to the processing of nickel ore.

I do not think we should take a short-term view of this. It is true that mines come and go, but in the over-all picture a really constructive effort is being made by the industry itself, by the federal government and by the provincial governments to develop these great mineral resources. I am confident that the gold mining industry through its own efforts and through the development of base metals and other minerals in the same areas and in other parts of Canada will come through this emergency period and will soon be self-sustaining. I think it would be a negative approach indeed to take the money which we are now advancing to the gold mining industry and use it to move people away from that industry.

Our economy in Canada is very interdependent. The mining industry is a large consumer of agricultural products and as I mentioned this afternoon of the products of our forests and factories. When one makes a trip to these areas he cannot help but be impressed by the large consumption of goods that is taking place.

I think that is all I have to say at the moment unless some hon. member has another point to bring up.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, I want to say just a few words in support of what the hon. member for Timiskaming has said. I think everyone who has commented on what she had to say missed completely the point she was making. I am in sympathy with her because I represent exactly the same kind of area. During the present session a motion was moved in the house and we had a broad and comprehensive discussion of the whole question of ghost towns investments and areas which were working on wasting resources. There is no need to repeat what was said then.

The Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act justifies itself on the grounds that it creates employment and keeps up industry. On that basis I support it. As the minister has indicated the amount of assistance has dropped from $16 million to $9 million, which indicates that many of the mines are going into the free market. The mines to which this assistance is applicable are marginal mines. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam does not understand that if this gold mining assistance act was not applicable to those particular mines they would close. There would be no employment and the benefit that the miner gets out of this assistance is that he has a job and there are some wages paid. Otherwise he would not have a job.

The point I wish to make is this. The hon. member for Timiskaming has pointed out that all mining areas are the same. They go up, they reach their peak, and they peter out. In the meantime there are millions of dollars invested in the community, in schools, sewers, streets and everything that goes to make up a community. If the community is allowed to go down with the industry, then that total investment on the part of the people is lost.

What was suggested earlier in the session was that realizing that mining is a wasting resource, that it will reach its peak and go down, there should be a continuing research committee set up by both provincial and federal governments to study the area and find out what kind of subsidiary industry might replace the mining industry when it goes out, so the investment on the part of the people in the community may not be lost.

This is a young country and it is growing, and there is much room for development. Over the next 50 years there will be many people in all sections of it. I am sure that, either in northern Ontario or in the mining areas of Cape Breton or in Nova Scotia or British Columbia, if a proper body were set up to make a proper analysis of the future so the investment in a community may not be lost, subsidiary industry in those areas could be found that would be useful in the future. That was the angle the hon. member took, and I support it very strongly.

I take exactly the same view. The coal mines are going down. The miners are moving out to British Columbia. Many of them are going out to the logging industry. That is a long way from home. There are those —a few hundred—now going out to Steep Rock. These people have homes and investments in a community. Many of them are leaving families. They do not want to uproot themselves. I am sure that if a proper study were made of the areas, suitable development could be found in these communities to retain the investments that have been made over many years.

Coal is subsidized, and rightly so, because it provides a means of livelihood. It is holding up communities that otherwise would go out overnight. On that ground this subsidy is justified. But I would stress again to the minister that subsidies are only a palliative, not a cure; that the crux of the whole problem is that sooner or later, whether or not you subsidize these mines, they are going to go out because they are a wasting resource. Ways and means should be found. At the present time research is more necessary than anything else the government could do to find ways and means of retaining the investment in these communities.

If we were an old country I would say it is a tough proposition, but we are not. The future is ahead of us. There is a terrific possibility of development in this country over the next 50 years, and in no section of it should there be any waste. Remember that this is the last frontier. From every section of the world immigrants are coming into Canada, principally because there is no other place to go. We should not allow any sections of our community to become ghost towns or wastes or lost investments. We should be planning to rehabilitate these communities, and I think it can be done; but it requires a continuing research committee in order to do that. I am in hopes that the Gordon commission, when it makes its report, may have something to say on that particular point.

I do not want to deal with the point, because we beat this to death on a resolution during this session. I just wanted to say that the hon. member for Timiskaming was not asking for charity. She was justifying the measure before the house at the present time as a temporary measure, but what she was stressing was the investment in the community and the fact that sooner or later it was going down anyway and that efforts should be made on the part of the government to provide subsidiary industries to protect the investment the people have in these communities.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Prudham thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 417, to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Is it agreed that by unanimous consent I do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of supply?

Mr. Knowles: Just for the record, it is understood that this is not one of the six Monday supply motions provided for under standing order 56.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): It is understood that to all intents and purposes the house resolves itself into committee of supply now as though this were a Thursday or a Friday.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

435. Departmental administration, $1,777,100.

Mr. Nesbitt: On this particular item of the estimates there are a great many things that many hon. members would like to say, but I am going to confine my remarks to a subject which has been of great interest to me and, I believe, to some other hon. members of this house. That is the subject of search and rescue organizations on the great lakes.

First of all, though, I should like to make some brief remarks regarding airport facilities, particularly at Malton airport, Toronto. The subject of airport facilities has been under considerable discussion in the past. I know there have been great plans to improve those facilities. The other day I saw some very fine pictures of what the Ottawa airport is to be like. I was very glad to see that. People coming to Ottawa on business and the public generally are very glad to see that improvements are to be made. However, Malton airport is, I suppose, almost the busiest, if not the busiest airport in Canada, and the facilities there for the travelling public are deplorable.

There is one little scheme they have there which is of interest. You pay 10 cents to stand on the roof and watch the aircraft coming and going. It is rather comfortable, except that there are only one or two benches on which one may sit after paying the 10 cents. In the waiting room below, where most people wait for planes as they come and go, or are delayed, as is frequently the case, there is not enough accommodation for people to sit down. There are ladies, some with children, old people, cripples and so on, and usually the crowds hanging around Malton airport are much like the crowds we have seen in the galleries of the house and in the corridors of the building in the last couple of weeks.

I hope the minister will tell us that plans are going to be made to improve the seating capacity of the waiting rooms at Malton airport. I know they are building something outside, sort of a shed or canopy to keep the rain off people going out to the planes, but there certainly is not enough accommodation. The only thing that Malton airport normally resembles at practically any time of the day when planes are arriving and departing is, with all respect, a twentieth century black hole of Calcutta.

To get back to the remarks I had originally intended to make, they have to do with the matter of a great lakes search and rescue organization to which I have referred already during this session. However, I should like to make some additional remarks. Now that the drowning and accident season on the great lakes is again upon us, this matter has come very much to public attention. There have been numerous editorials in virtually all the newspapers in the southern part of Ontario which, of course, is that part of the country most affected.

I am not going to refer to the remarks I have made in the house on other occasions during this session and last session with respect to the need of a coastguard service on the great lakes. I do not intend to do so because anybody who is interested can always refer to those remarks. But I should like to bring forward some additional information at this time. The whole subject of an improved search and rescue organization on the great lakes has become very much in the public mind and is becoming increasingly so. To summarize what I have pointed out on other occasions, this is largely due to the great increase in population in southern Ontario, the increase in the material wealth of the people since the war, more leisure time and the fact that people have taken to boating to a great extent.

To show the interest that has arisen this spring in this regard I should like to refer briefly to certain editorials. I do not intend to read them in their entirety but I wish to refer them to the minister. First of all there was an editorial in the Tillsonburg News of April 5, 1956, which is one of the largest weekly papers in Ontario. The editorial is headed, "Protection Needed on the Lakes," and ends with these words:

> The federal government, in whose jurisdiction the great lakes fall, should give the matter consideration. Better protection is definitely needed.

I also refer to an editorial in the London Free Press of Thursday, March 29, 1956, headed, "Search and Rescue Service Necessary on the Lakes." It starts off with these words:

> With the summer boating and swimming season approaching, Wallace Nesbitt, M.P. for Oxford, has made a suggestion that merits the attention of the federal government.

Then it goes on to deal with the matter at some length and ends by saying:

> This is a fault Ottawa could and should remedy. Mr. Nesbitt suggests that something like a coastguard service could be set up economically by employing university students on their summer vacations. It might be possible to integrate reserve naval personnel and boat club members in such a plan. In any case, the Oxford M.P. has introduced a suggestion too valuable to be cast aside.

Then I refer to an editorial in the Toronto Globe and Mail of Wednesday, May 9, 1956, headed "Why Not a Coastguard?" The Globe and Mail, I may say, has had editorials on this matter before. I believe this is the third editorial they have had. I shall not waste the time of the house reading this editorial. I should not say "waste the time of the house", but I shall not take the time of the house to read it because hon. members can always read it. However, it touches on the incident that occurred on lake Erie this spring when a number of Canadian fishermen had their boats seized by the United States coastguard apparently for trespassing in United States waters. It points out that if we had some sort of coastguard service it could be used to warn Canadian fishermen to keep out of United States waters and warn them when they are getting into United States waters. Of course this would largely concern only lake Erie, because due to the lamprey problem and other things commercial fishing on the other great lakes is not so much concerned with this problem at the present time.

Then I also refer to another editorial that appeared in the Woodstock Sentinel-Review. This editorial is headed, "Boating Mishaps", and is of very recent date having been published on June 7, 1956, just a few days ago. It refers to the announcement made by Captain G. L. Johnston, assistant chief of the nautical division of the Department of Transport, concerning the future licensing of small boats on the great lakes, something which the minister referred to earlier this day. The editorial points out the great problem on the great lakes so far as search and rescue is concerned. It points out that there is no co-ordination among the services, and that many a life could have been saved had there been some sort of co-ordination.

I do not know what brought about this action on the part of the department. I hope that some of the remarks I have made in the past may have had some influence. However, I am quite sure that the Department of Transport and possibly even the minister have received letters from numerous organizations such as the lake Ontario search and rescue organization, which has been doing a particularly fine job in rendering service by helping people who have become lost and in trouble on the great lakes, and also has been doing very fine work in trying to publicize the situation and interest public opinion in this very important matter.

I do not know what caused these proposed changes, but in any event I am very glad to see that they are going to be made, and I certainly welcome the proposed amendments to the Canada Shipping Act. I do not wish to refer to that matter at this time because it will be discussed on another occasion in the house, but I see that under one of the proposed amendments to the act there will be regulation of the inland and minor waters of Canada and provision for the licensing of operators in such waters, and I am very glad that that is so. While this is not the whole loaf but only half a slice out of the whole proposed loaf, at least half a slice of bread is better than none at all.

Of course there is no doubt that when the Canada Shipping Act comes before us it will be referred to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. At least I presume it will, and I should like to suggest to the minister now that he take under consideration the calling of witnesses before that committee when it is considering the bill. Since one of the amendments to the act is going to concern the regulation and licensing of boats on the great lakes, I should like to suggest to the minister that at that time the committee should call witnesses to give evidence with respect to all the information the committee may require, not only as to the proposed regulations but to provide the minister and the department with information as to the actual need for search, rescue and other similar services on the great lakes.

I see this suggestion was made indirectly by the hon. member for Northumberland in a speech he made earlier this year. I know I am not allowed to refer to remarks made in previous debates during the present session, but without quoting the hon. member directly I think I can say that he suggested that at the present time there was insufficient evidence before the Department of Transport to justify the setting up of a proper coastguard or search and rescue organization on the great lakes, and that we should hear witnesses.

Since the hon. member was, I presume, speaking on behalf of the government at that time—his speech certainly looked like it, to say the least—may I suggest that here is a chance for the government to call witnesses. They could call the president of the lake Ontario search and rescue organization. They could hear the presidents and other officials of the various boating and yacht clubs and also the provincial police and others. These people could appear before the committee while these amendments were being considered.

Then if the minister and the officials of the Department of Transport are not prepared to take my word for it, and are not prepared to take the word of some of the large, prominent newspapers in Ontario such as the Toronto Globe and Mail, the London Free Press and a large weekly like the Tillsonburg News, which are newspapers in the area directly concerned, I feel that, since the department had claimed through its spokesmen that there is insufficient evidence before it, when these amendments to the Canada Shipping Act are before the committee that will be the time to get this additional information.

As I have pointed out before in this house, there are certain rescue and search organizations such as the provincial police, the R.C.M.P. and the R.C.A.F. air search and rescue organization at Trenton. These have all been referred to in the house and most hon. members are familiar with them. As I pointed out before, the big problem is coordination when an accident occurs. If a boat upsets and someone is in the water or a boat is lost in the fog on the great lakes, the question is with whom do you get in touch? Usually nobody knows; even the local officials very often do not seem to know. Eventually Trenton or someplace like that may be informed and under those circumstances will take steps to commence the rescue. Usually there is a heavy fog or a storm, and it is very difficult for aircraft to operate and try to locate boats lost in a fog.

The important element is time. If an accident happens and someone has to search for two or three hours to find out with whom to get in touch, very often the person involved is drowned. While they announce with great trumpeting that they have discovered the body, I do not think that is very much help to the family of the person concerned.

It has been suggested on other occasions by the hon. member for Northumberland that the present regulations are fine and that small boats have to have licences. That is true. It is my understanding that the purpose of licensing motors of 10 horsepower and above is to determine to whom they belong. I know the number has to be painted on the back in 3-inch letters, and if a boat overturns or is lost the authorities can determine to whom it belongs and can get in touch with relatives in case of a fatal accident. It has been pointed out that this is quite adequate, and that the R.C.M.P. are in charge of inspection services.

I should like to know, and perhaps if there is time the minister could tell us although I know it is not directly under his department, just how many R.C.M.P. constables there are in the province of Ontario who are running around inspecting small boats. I would be willing to warrant that there are not very many. I should like to find out if there are any R.C.M.P. constables inspecting small boats in Ontario, and just what they do. What kind of reports do they make? I would very much doubt that they make any report at all or have much activity in this regard. If they do, I would be most delighted to hear about it.

It has been already noted with some pleasure that there are amendments proposed to the Canada Shipping Act which will certainly be helpful in a small way in alleviating this problem. I should like to see further amendments to this act, and it might not be too late for the minister to consider amendments relating to safety devices in small boats.

These amendments might involve the provision of life jackets and the question of small children being obliged to wear such jackets when they are out on the great lakes. In addition, these boats might be fitted with flares or smoke signals of some sort.

Then the question would arise, who is going to enforce these regulations? This question occurs to me right away, even in relation to the proposed legislation. I note that clause 27 of the bill, paragraph (c), refers to the enforcement of any such order or regulation.

Mr. Marler: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member will realize that at the moment the discussion seems to be turning to the amendments to the Canada Shipping Act which I take it we will have an opportunity of discussing later. It seems to me it is quite out of order to be discussing amendments to the Canada Shipping Act when those very amendments are already before the house.

Mr. Nesbitt: Well, Mr. Chairman, I suppose it is probably a matter of degree. I would agree with the minister that it is out of order to discuss a bill that is not yet before the house—

Mr. Marler: It is before the house.

Mr. Nesbitt: —but I was suggesting that there are certain things which are not included in these amendments. We have all had an opportunity of reading the proposed amendments, and I thought before they came before the house the minister should have an opportunity of considering whether or not he could make some further alterations to meet this problem. My remarks were merely directed to that end. However, I shall not continue with them, as I feel I have already said enough. I hope the minister will give the problem a little extra consideration.

There are just one or two other matters I would like to mention. In some previous remarks I made concerning this question I confined my suggestions to the minister, and to the government generally, to the point that the coastguard service on the great lakes be restricted to the summer months and largely to search and rescue work. I did not feel that a further expansion of the service into the customs and excise division to check contraband would be warranted at the present time. I felt the work should be largely limited to search and rescue work, but there might be one exception.

On lake Erie large commercial fishing activities are carried out and a very nasty incident arose there this spring, but apparently it was not too important. Some Canadian fishing tugs were seized by the United States coastguard and taken to the city of Toledo, I believe it was, where fines were levied, and properly so. However, rumours do have a habit of spreading and there were a lot of newspaper reports about the incident which created a bad impression in the public mind. Incidents such as these do not encourage good feeling between ourselves and our great neighbour to the south, with whom we have always had the most friendly relationship.

If there were a Canadian patrol vessel on lake Erie it could warn our fishermen to keep out of those waters, and during the summer months it could also be called upon in case of boating accidents. I suppose that lake Erie has more small boats on it than possibly any other of the great lakes. I had some figures to show that in Ontario alone last year the number of registered small boats increased by 15,000. It is true, of course, that many of these would be in small inland waters which do not come under the federal transport department, such as the Muskoka lakes and so on, but a great number of them would be on the great lakes. The president of the lake Ontario search and rescue organization, which I suppose is the largest and most well organized of these volunteer organizations, has pointed out that there are 300,000 or 400,000 small boats of all kinds in Ontario, a very large proportion of which would be on the great lakes. This number would include canoes, rowboats, boats powered with motors under 10 horsepower and so on.

Since a great number of these boats are on lake Erie a patrol boat, in addition to giving information to Canadian commercial fishermen who work out of Port Dover and other ports, could perform this other very necessary work as well. Lake Erie is probably the most dangerous of the great lakes. It is very shallow and the slightest thunder squall will stir it up.

Since I mentioned this matter in remarks I made earlier I do not wish to duplicate them at this time. Therefore I shall bring my remarks on this subject to a close at this time, though I shall probably resume them, as the minister suggested, when the amendments to the Canada Shipping Act come up for consideration. However, I should like to close by referring to one news item. I started my remarks by saying that the accident and drowning season is upon us again. I should like to refer to a news item which appeared on Monday, June 4 last. It appeared in all the Ontario papers. I happen to have a clipping from the Sentinel-Review Daily of Woodstock. The heading reads:

> Missing Persons Safe After Ordeal On Lake
> Three men and two women paddled their three outboard motorboats ashore today at nearby Whitby after drifting all night on lake Ontario.

The article goes on to give in some detail what happened. It says that fortunately the lake was calm. If it had not been calm there would have been a number of bereaved families. This item appeared early in the season. No doubt we shall have like articles appearing day after day during the remainder of the summer and the warm weather season until September. There will be headlines such as these in the paper saying that five people have drowned, two people have drowned, boat upsets, boat adrift for three days, persons missing, and so on. Every year it is the same.

As I said, the minister has apparently started to do something. Changes are to be made in the Canada Shipping Act, but I do not think they go far enough. I hope the minister and the officials of his department will consider doing something in this regard either by themselves or in co-operation with the appropriate authorities in the province of Ontario, because I do not think any of us want to see a repetition of what we have seen year after year, namely an increase in the number of drownings in the lakes in the summer time.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Chairman, it must be obvious to anyone who examines the estimates of the Department of Transport that one of the surprising things in the set-up of this government is the number of matters which should properly come under the Department of Transport but which are not actually there. One outstanding example, of course, is that of Trans-Canada Air Lines. It is a major transportation system in every way similar to the Canadian National Railways in so far as it operates as a transportation system, but we find that it does not report to the Minister of Transport.

In recent weeks in this house we have seen one of Canada's greatest advances or great beginnings in a new field of transportation, namely the trans-Canada transportation of gas. That has been pushed through the house, and whatever happens in that field will ultimately be reported to a minister other than the Minister of Transport. We find again that while the Minister of Transport has the responsibility for most canals, there are canals turning up under the aegis of the Minister of Public Works. We find that while the Minister of Transport has the responsibility for most wharves and most harbours, certain maritime transportation operations carried on by the government respond again to the Minister of Public Works.

I was amused just before rising to discover that two of my colleagues who sit right next to me, one from the Kootenays and the other from Selkirk, are in this position. The hon. member for Kootenay West has an inland lake in his constituency, and the Department of Transport operates the aids to navigation, wharves, and the like. The hon. member for Selkirk, who sits immediately behind him, has an inland lake in his riding, namely lake Winnipeg, and apparently the responsibility for similar functions in his area come under the Minister of Public Works. Certainly that is so in so far as the wharves are concerned. I would suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that it is quite impossible to have any sort of efficient, coherent and sensible transportation operation in so far as the government is concerned when we have this widespread diversity of responsibility in various aspects of it.

It would seem that one of the first tasks which faces the Minister of Transport and his department is to go out and bring under the wing of his department in some sort of sensible pattern the operations carried on by the government which should properly be responsible to the Minister of Transport. One does not want to suggest why his department might have been burgled in the past and had these various operations either stolen from it or never given to it, but whatever the past reasons may have been the present situation is, from an administrative point of view, most unsatisfactory and could well be corrected.

That leads almost automatically to the suggestion of a national transportation policy of some kind for Canada. Here again we have the responsibility in various fields of transportation widely separated and governed by a number of different committees and groups, and this policy is causing inconsistencies and raising many problems which would not exist if we developed a more sensible and more coherent alignment of responsibility. I have as one authority at least no less than the Turgeon report of 1951 which, hon. members will recall, is the report of the royal commission on transportation. At page 280 of that report we find the commissioners pointing out, and I quote:

> Today there are three separate bodies, each charged with the control (a more or less extensive control in each case) of a part of Canada's transportation system. They are the board of transport commissioners, the air transport board and the Canadian maritime commission. It must be difficult, with this dispersion of control, to apply to all of Canada's transportation agencies like principles of regulation for the accomplishment of a common purpose, viz. that of enabling each agency to perform its service advantageously and properly as part of a national transportation structure. The tendency of a separate independent body is to formulate policy affecting transportation without regard to the relationship of the various agencies to each other. This anomaly should give way to the constitution of a central authority which will be able to take in hand the major task of co-ordinated control, having at its disposal all the benefit acquired from the experience of the separate bodies in recent years.

That is only one authority which could be quoted; there are many others, and they seem to agree along those fundamental lines. Of course, we realize that one of the principal factors in transportation today is highway transportation, and within the bounds of the provinces that is beyond dispute under the control of the province itself. By a finding of the privy council in England, if my memory serves me rightly, or a body of appeal in England at any rate, interprovincial highway transportation systems are essentially under the control of the federal government. Last year the federal government returned or abdicated that field—"abdicated" might be a better word—and decided to leave it to the provinces for the time being.

Mr. Marler: I think if you said it was under the control of the federal parliament it would be more exact.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): All right, under the control of the federal parliament, if the minister prefers it, although since recent days we have seen great evidence that the federal parliament is being so completely subjugated to the government itself it might be said that any suggestion that matters are subject to the control of the federal parliament is rather a mockery, it seems to me.

The question of integrating highway transport by means of a national approach to transportation or a national transportation policy, as I have suggested, does present certain difficulties; however, we have managed in other fields, at times when the provinces had control of a given section or area of our economy, to work out a modus operandi by means of meeting with them, by means of discussion with them, which has brought about very satisfactory results in some cases.

It would seem to me something of that nature is urgently required in the present instance. Certainly it is unfortunate with the tremendous growth and development which is taking place in this country at the present time that we should have our manifold means of transportation—our airways, our railways, our maritime transportation, our highways, our pipe lines—all at sixes and sevens, the majority of them reporting to different bodies of control, the majority of them quite properly competing with one another, but competing without any attempt at co-ordination on the part of the government which has none the less intruded itself by means of regulatory bodies into almost every one of the fields I have mentioned.

Nowhere is this intrusion more evident than in the field of railway transportation and nowhere, Mr. Chairman, is there greater need for a new and imaginative approach to the regulation of transport, the control of transport, than in the field of railway transportation. I do not think we can expect the free enterprise type of activity—which is represented by at least one of our great railroads in complete measure and a quasi-free enterprise type of activity by the other, the Canadian National Railways—I do not think we can expect them to operate indefinitely with success unless they have a genuine opportunity to express their managerial discretion and equal opportunity to act in accord with the basic principles of a free enterprise system.

There was a time when it was necessary to impose the strictest measure of control on railway transportation as such because at that time it occupied a monopoly position. When the railroads grew up, when they first laid their lines across this country, when they divided it almost into a checkerboard pattern with line after line, the only measure of competition was one railroad as against another railroad; there was no air transportation and in great parts of the country there was no opportunity for maritime transportation. There was no such thing as pipe lines, and the gasoline engine being almost unheard of in those days there was no such thing as highway transportation.

Therefore when you had a monopoly system of transportation as was the case with the railroads, it was perhaps necessary that a firm measure of control be exercised; but that measure of control, it seems to some of us, has been continued in almost the same pattern right down to the present despite the tremendous differences in the economic framework within which the railroads are now operating.

The highway transportation system in this country is today a major factor in the transportation and transit industry. Buses carry great loads of passengers; heavy transport trucks, each of which comes very close to carrying the same tonnage as a railway car, whine along the highways of this country day and night. Overhead, by the tens of thousands, passenger traffic is being taken away from the railroads by the airways. Overhead again, the high value freight and express traffic is being picked up by the airways. Under these circumstances it seems to me the old pattern under which the railroads are held under rigorous control and given no opportunity to engage in ordinary economic enterprise which is available to most fields of enterprise in our economy is unrealistic in relation to the present day structure of our transportation pattern.

Mr. Marler: Will the hon. member permit me to ask one question at this point? He has just spoken about the rigorous control of the railways, and a little earlier he spoke about the fact that what the railroads needed was the opportunity to exercise their managerial authority. The hon. member has gone on to describe the conditions which I take it he believed had changed the position of the railways from a monopoly to one in which they are now faced with vigorous competition.

I wonder if I might ask the hon. member what forms of rigorous control he has in mind that are now interfering with the operation of the railroads? I know it is very easy to talk in generalities, but I wonder if the hon. member would give one example of the type of control to which he is referring.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Perhaps I should have covered that point at the beginning, but I thought it would have been reasonably obvious and certainly it would have become obvious—

Mr. Marler: Well, if it is obvious let us have it.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): However, I am very grateful to the minister for pointing out that I have not perhaps defined the particular field that was in my mind at the beginning of these remarks. I had particularly in mind the question of the rate structures of the railroads, and the necessity for the railroads at the present time to go through a complicated and lengthy process whenever they desire a lasting change in their rate structure; a process incidentally, Mr. Chairman, which very often has a tendency to result in rates which are unrealistic in the light of all the circumstances surrounding a particular situation.

Now, the minister does not need to take my word for that, because I am sure he must have had representations from the president of his own railway, the Canadian National Railways. He must have read the speeches of Mr. Gordon as reported in the newspapers, in which he has pointed out this difficulty. He must have read the remarks made at the annual meetings by Mr. W. A. Mather, chairman of the board of the C.P.R. and Mr. N. R. —better known as "Buck"—Crump, that very remarkable man who is now president of the C.P.R. They have both pointed out this particular difficulty.

Having made reference to the point I would not want to leave the committee with the feeling that I am advocating throwing the rate-making structure of the railroads completely over and allowing them a complete measure of discretion. We are at a stage where some measure of control is admitted to be, shall we say, necessary in many segments of our economy, and certainly transportation is no exception. But I do suggest that we might allow the railroads more freedom than they have within a certain broad framework.

For example, there should certainly be a ceiling on rates where a railroad enjoys a monopoly on a certain variety of traffic or in connection with transportation in a given area, so that it would not be able to mulct its passengers or those who give it freight to carry. Again there certainly should be a floor in some cases to guard against cutthroat competition designed to drive competing forms of transportation out of business.

Finally I suggest that there might well be certain cases of transportation—western wheat is probably the most outstanding example—where some special measure by the government will be called for if a realistic rate structure is to emerge from the present picture. What that course of action may be is difficult to suggest in the short time at my disposal, but I do suggest, and most strongly, that it is unfair to ask the two railroads of this country to carry a burden which is the direct result of government policy.

It may well be that it is advantageous to Canada as a whole to have a particular rate set for the transportation of western wheat. I think we must take into consideration the position of the western farmer and the need for him to remain economically successful. But having said that, let me suggest that if the transportation rate established for his wheat happens to be uneconomic from the viewpoint of railroad operations, then I think it is unfair to ask and force the railroads to continue to carry that wheat at that uneconomic figure. Some provision should be made for a wider distribution of that burden. Having established a given policy in respect to the carriage of a given commodity the government should accept responsibility for the results of that policy, and not expect the railroads to underwrite it.

No later than tonight we have this article appearing in the Ottawa Journal:

Increasing Rail Freight Rates

The board of transport commissioners announced today it plans to grant the railways shortly an interim increase in freight rates subject to review next fall. The amount was not specified.

I suggest to you that when you have a business running into the hundreds of millions of dollars—if my memory serves me rightly the gross last year of the C.N.R. was some $600 million—it is rather difficult when it has to go to the board of transport commissioners and get a temporary across the board increase which has no relationship to specific problems and which may be revoked in the fall. Earlier there was reference to the government doing business like a peanut stand, and I suggest that the temporary fixing up of a situation like this is again a reflection of a peanut stand mentality rather than a $600 million mentality.

Finally I should like to quote in summary an article which appeared in the Montreal Gazette of May 25, 1955. In this editorial they say:

> It would seem that the railway problem is not just a Canadian problem; it is a North American problem. It is caused by the same thing: over-regulation of the railways in an age when they are under severe competition from other means of transport. And for this there would seem to be only one cure.
> As the report to the president says: "Adjustment of regulatory programs and policies to these competitive facts is long overdue".

For the benefit of those who may read Hansard or who are listening, may I say that the report to the president refers to a report of a committee set up by President Einsenhower.

There are a number of items which could be taken up under the estimates, but for a moment I should like to touch upon one item which reflects an historical situation which is now due for a change. I refer to the provision of private railway cars for the use of members of the government. This originated many years ago. At that time they were four in number, and probably there was ample justification for their existence. Certainly we did not have air transport at that time, nor did we have the high quality of ordinary rail transport which is available today.

However, over the years and particularly in the last few years we have reached the stage where air transport is the normal method of transport for senior executives. Many corporations have their own private planes. The government has a fleet of private planes which they use day in and day out for the transportation of ministers from one point in Canada to another. Let me say at once that I have no objection to the use of these aeroplanes for that purpose when the end purpose is proper government business.

Despite the fact that ministers have taken to the air in large numbers, we find that no one has yet got around to doing anything about this fleet of private railway cars. The same four cars which they have had over the years are still being kept up with a staff of seven people. The estimate this year is $56,240 for their operation. I suggest that we may need one or perhaps two of these cars only. The Prime Minister on occasion may need that type of transportation. Visiting dignitaries may require that the car be put at their disposal. There may be occasions on which a minister going into a particular part of the country to do business needs to take his travelling hotel along with him and park it on a siding. I am not averse to operating a limited number of these cars, but I suggest that the retention of the four of them as at the present time is a completely unwarranted waste of the taxpayers' money.

Furthermore I suggest that the existence of the cars, lying there idle a good deal of the time, leads the ministers sometimes down unfortunate paths. We had the case, originally denied and then admitted by the Minister of Transport, in which he used one of them to whip down to Montreal and address a political meeting immediately upon his arrival. He did not need the car, and that is obvious from the fact that the next day he came back in an ordinary train, the Canadian.

We have had other cases. Last year, I remember, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration had occasion to travel from one end of Canada to the other with the Minister of Fisheries, one of them at least accompanied by his family, in one of these private cars, for a holiday trip plus a little bit of business on the west coast. These are the devious paths down which people will be led when you leave a little temptation in their way. I suggest that when you have a luxurious private railway car on a siding just waiting to be used, somebody is going to use it and perhaps even take it down to his summer home and park it down there for a few days as a means of transportation. That is costing the taxpayers money. It is not necessary, and it should be cut out.

I see you rising, Mr. Chairman, so I shall take up the other questions further on in the estimates.

The Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has just expired.

Mr. Herridge: I wish to make a few brief remarks on this first item. I shall have a few things to say on one or two of the other items as they come before us.

I understand that the public works department builds wharves and other structures in navigable waters. I am told that the Department of Transport's function is to administer those wharves and certain other structures and supervise them after construction. Before proceeding with the few remarks I wish to make, I want to say that I have every respect for and confidence in the minister's engineer in Victoria, who I think is doing an excellent job, but in my opinion he has a very large district to cover and personally I think he requires more staff. Particularly owing to the development of the interior, I think it is necessary that a senior official of the department, like the district agent in Victoria, have the opportunity himself to visit wharves and certain localities when problems arise and not have to depend in all cases on the report, say, of the junior official of another department.

Up until recent years the arrangements that had been in effect for 50 years were quite satisfactory, but I am speaking now of circumstances of which I have some knowledge. Those intangible arrangements, shall I say, are not sufficient under present conditions, with the development of the logging industry, the lumber industry and the mining industry and the consequent increase in the number of tugs and barges towing logs and things of that sort, and with the necessity for more navigational aids, buoys and that sort of thing. I think there should be a much clearer definition of the responsibilities of the Department of Public Works and the responsibilities of the Department of Transport, and the public should be informed of those definite responsibilities.

I believe that is necessary for the satisfactory supervision of wharves and for the reporting of damage so it can be repaired before greater damage occurs through neglect, and also for the application of the department's regulations without fear or favour, regardless of whether it is a large corporation or a single isolated rancher. Everybody is entitled to be treated alike. I do not believe in the poor man in his little launch being chased away from a government wharf and a corporation being allowed to tie up its vessels for its own purposes. I think there should be some clearer definition of the regulation in that respect.

I realize the difficulties in these isolated cases in the administration of wharves and other structures by the Department of Transport, but I think the difficulty could be largely overcome by having the R.C.M.P. informed that they can report immediately any damage to these structures and things of that sort, and in other cases perhaps the local postmaster could do this. I have already referred to the considerable damage being done to a wharf in my district because the situation was not reported in time to the department. That is all I have to say on that point.

I think it is time we had a revision of the Navigable Waters Protection Act. I find it is an act that is not very effective in many cases. It needs thorough overhauling in the light of modern developments and the changed conditions we find nowadays in industry and on navigable waters. There are clauses in that act with respect to the pollution of navigable waters by sawdust, by slabs, by mill waste and by industrial enterprise. So far as I know, I have never heard of any industry being reported in 50 years as a result of the violation of that act. There again I think the whole act needs overhauling and amending so that these responsibilities are defined as between the Department of Public Works and the Department of Transport and so there is control over this pollution of waters.

This was a minor matter until recent years but now, with the great increase in the lumber industry and other industries, it is becoming a serious matter. It has not developed serious proportions to date, but unless there is some strict application of the law in the near future these things will develop and become very serious in the years to come.

I also think it is necessary to have a clearer definition of the responsibility for the renting of space around wharves for gas stations, boat service stations and things of that sort. The department should have a closer check on the driving of piles in navigable waters, and the placing of obstructions in waters by companies or individuals. I am not at all blaming the officials. As I have said before the circumstances have changed, and I am quite certain that the district engineer or district agent for the minister's department in British Columbia needs an addition to his staff so that some senior officials will have an opportunity to get around the province more frequently than they are at present able to do. I think it is particularly necessary that there be a definition of the responsibilities of the two departments and an application of the law in all cases without fear or favour.

Mr. Stanton: I should like at this time to take a few minutes to make two or three observations, and I hope that in making his reply the minister will be favourable to the comments I wish to make at this time.

I do not know whether or not it has been brought to the attention of the minister but it has been brought to my attention on different occasions that a particular situation exists with regard to the pensions of some of the employees of the Canadian National Railways. Some of these men are getting on in years. We might say that they are in the sunset of life. In the years between 1930 and 1940 a few of them were laid off through no fault of their own and were not credited with pension rights during those years. I believe they are willing to contribute their payments to the pension fund for the time they were laid off. At that time they were willing and ready to go back to work whenever they were called.

I believe it is very unfair to these men to have these years of credit deducted under their pension scheme. I believe they should be eligible for superannuation without these years being deducted. I hope the minister will give the matter very serious consideration. I do not believe there are too many of these men. There are some in the Brockville district in the constituency I represent, and I presume there are a few more across Canada.

I have another problem about which I have spoken before. I believe I spoke of it first three years ago and have brought it up on a couple of occasions since. I refer to the situation in the city of Brockville with respect to the railway station and crossing the railway tracks. I believe the president of the C.N.R., Mr. Gordon, journeyed to Brockville last summer and made an inspection of the conditions that exist there. I did not know of his visit until afterwards; apparently it is the policy not to inform opposition members of such visits. However, I was wondering whether the minister could inform me what decision the president of the C.N.R. had made on his visit to Brockville, or if he has made a decision yet.

It is a burning issue so far as the people of Brockville are concerned, not only the residents of Brockville but the community at large and also visitors to the city. The railway lines completely block off two of the main arteries coming into the city from the north. In addition, passengers leaving trains have to travel a long distance back to the station. When the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace was speaking about private cars I was wondering whether it would not be a good idea to put the private cars on the siding and bring the passengers who get off trains from the east or west to the station. There is also a long wait for passenger cars, especially when freight trains are going through, and it is very tedious for the passengers.

If there should be a fire and the fire reels were held up at the crossing, think of the additional damage that might be caused by having to wait for only a few minutes. Then there is the matter of ambulances going to the hospital. I am not quite sure whether I have mentioned this to the house before, but some four or five years ago an ambulance was going to the hospital with an emergency case and was held up for quite some time at the crossing, so long that it did not arrive at the hospital in time. However, I am glad to say that the mother and child are doing fine.

What we greatly need is a subway and a new station. The station is very old and is one that would be appropriate for a little village. We need a subway very badly at that particular point. There are two large public schools on the north side of the town and the children have to cross the railroad tracks. I plead with the minister to do something about this matter. In fact I hope within the next few days to crave his indulgence so that I may have an interview with him for a few minutes in order to go over the whole situation with him.

We are greatly in need of better and safer railway accommodation in the heart of Brockville. Brockville is growing very rapidly to the north and it will only be a short time until the railroad will be in the very centre of the city, which will be most inconvenient if the present situation goes on. When the new by-pass highway, No. 401, is built to the north of the city the main road leading from that highway will cross these tracks, and it is doubly necessary that some provision be made for accommodating that traffic in the next two or three years.

I plead with the minister to do something to alleviate the serious situation we have there. It has been spoken of many times by other members of the house who have been travelling through Brockville and have had to change trains there to come to Ottawa. Many members of the house have said that it is a very undesirable situation. I hope the minister will give very serious consideration not only to the question of the employees and their pension plan but also to the need of a new station and a subway at Brockville.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall take second reading of the bill with respect to the Defence Services Pension Act, second reading of the bill respecting the Canadian National Railway Company financing legislation, second reading of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act amending bill, then the resolution in the name of the Minister of Labour with respect to certain provisions for equal pay for female employees, and then the resolution in the name of the Minister of National Health and Welfare with respect to unemployment assistance costs in the provinces.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, may I point out to the minister that the defence services pension bill has not yet been distributed and we do not know how complicated it is. We may not be able to go on with it tomorrow.

Mr. Nowlan: Has the gold mining bill been distributed?

Mr. Harris: I spoke to the staff about an hour and a half ago about this particular bill. If it is not already distributed, certainly it will be made available very early in the morning. If it is complicated and for any reason hon. members feel that they should not proceed with it, if they will let me know we will arrange the agenda otherwise.

Mr. Nowlan: What about the gold mining bill; has that been distributed?

Mr. Harris: I do not think it has at the moment, but it will be.

Mr. Nowlan: There are some hon. members who want to speak on that, and I see it is scheduled for tomorrow.

Mr. Harris: We will be glad to make any arrangements that are suitable.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

WAR DEBT WRITE-OFFS

Question No. 153—Mr. Hahn:

1. Has the federal government written off any war debts owing by countries to Canada?
2. If so, what countries and in what amount?

Answer by: Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance):

1. Yes.

2. Pursuant to the United Kingdom Financial Agreement Act, 1946, the government of Canada agreed to cancel the amount owing by the government of the United Kingdom to the government of Canada with respect to the British commonwealth air training plan, which amount the two governments agreed was $425,000,000.

"KING EDWARD" DREDGE BUNK-SCOW

Question No. 513—Mr. Regier:

1. Is the bunk-scow of the King Edward dredge, owned by the Department of Public Works, for sale?
2. If not, what use is being made of it?
3. For how many days in 1955 was it in use?
4. What was the cost of its operation for the year 1955?
5. How many watchmen are employed on it?
6. Who makes out their time schedule?
7. Are there always watchmen on board?

Answer by: Mr. Bourget, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Public Works:

1. No.

2. To provide accommodation for the crews of the dredge and tugs.

3. 365 days.

4. Cost not available as it forms an integral part of the plant. Expenditures are charged against the operation of the dredge.

5. Four.

6. The dredge master.

7. Yes.

HIGHLANDS PARK, CAPE BRETON, N.S.—EQUIPMENT PURCHASES

Question No. 521—Mr. Nowlan:

1. Has the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, or any other department or agency of the government of Canada, within the last year, purchased for use in Highlands park, Cape Breton, Nova Scotia, a shovel, crusher, and other machinery and equipment incidental thereto?
2. If so, (a) from what firm or firms was such shovel, crusher and other machinery purchased; (b) for what price?
3. Were tenders or invitations to bid invited?

Questions

4. If so, (a) what firms replied to the invitation to bid; (b) what was the price quoted by each of such firms?

Answer by: Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources):

1. Yes.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, June 12, 1956

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Sir:

Ottawa, June 12, 1956

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Patrick Kerwin, Chief Justice of Canada, acting as Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber today, the 12th June, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
sir,
Your obedient servant,
J. F. Delaute,
Secretary to the Governor General (Administrative).

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Seventh report of standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Hunter.

CALLING OF BILL TO AMEND THE INCOME TAX ACT

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the house will recall that when the resolutions on the income tax bill were passed by the house the bill itself had not been printed. It has now been printed and I would ask leave for you to call the first reading of bills so I may present the bill today.

INCOME TAX ACT

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 418, to amend the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. gentleman leave to introduce this bill?

Mr. Knowles: By leave.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

HOUSING

ALLEGED SCARCITY OF MORTGAGE FUNDS IN METROPOLITAN AREAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance —I was going to ask the Minister of Public Works the same question also, but perhaps the Minister of Finance can answer for both —what steps the government proposes to take in the light of the situation resulting from the conflict in government policy between the tightening of money on the one hand, under the measures taken by the Bank of Canada with government approval, and on the other hand the lending operations under the National Housing Act, which have resulted in a very serious scarcity of mortgage funds in metropolitan areas?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) sent me notice a few moments ago that he intended to ask the same question, based on a telegram that had been received from the Toronto area. I would not want to give an answer—

Mr. Fleming: The Toronto metropolitan home builders' association.

Mr. Harris: I think the same telegram went to both hon. gentlemen. I would not want to give an answer at the moment, sir, in the absence of the Minister of Public Works. I understand he will be returning perhaps tomorrow—I am not sure—and I will speak to him about it.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TUNISIA AND MOROCCO—RECOGNITION BY CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. Wilfrid Dufresne (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs but in his absence I will direct the same question to the Prime Minister. Does the Prime Minister care to comment on a press report that appears in the French paper Le Droit of today from the France-Presse agency to the effect that Canada would now be ready to recognize Tunisia and French Morocco?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The matter, Mr. Speaker, is under consideration. Tunisia and Morocco have been recognized by several powers and the question as to whether or not it would be appropriate for us to extend recognition at this time is under consideration.

Inquiries of the Ministry

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON DISCUSSIONS WITH EARL OF HOME

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Could I ask the right hon. gentleman whether he is now in a position to make a report as to the discussions that took place between members of the Canadian government and the Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations of the United Kingdom government, about which I inquired yesterday, and as to the conclusions, if any, arrived at as a result of those discussions, which I assume might form a basis, as it were, for the forthcoming conference?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): There were no conclusions arrived at. They were very frank discussions about many of the problems which are of concern to all of us who are interested in commonwealth affairs. They were of a confidential nature, of course. There was no memorandum or summary prepared afterwards of these discussions, and quite frankly I do not think it would be helpful to go beyond what I have said about the details of those conversations.

There were no conclusions reached. We were endeavouring to explore with a view to being able to reach a position where we would, after discussion at the conference, come away with a disposition and the material that would enable all of us to make such decisions as were required and that would be in accord with each other.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ALLEGED IMPORTATION OF UNITED STATES WELDERS INTO BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Labour whether he is in a position today to give a reply to my question of last Friday concerning the importation of United States welders into British Columbia to work on the Westcoast Transmission line?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, the hon. member for Vancouver East and others have raised this point.

On the subject of the complaint from the British Columbia welders' association regarding the entry of 14 welders from the United States, our regional office of the unemployment insurance commission in Vancouver is keeping in close touch with this situation and has worked closely with the immigration branch, to which employers must first apply for the admission of various workers into Canada. The immigration branch in turn gets in touch with the national employment service to ascertain whether or not Canadian workers are available who are able to do the work concerned, and only if they are unable to recruit the skilled workers needed are American workers admitted to Canada.

The united association of plumbers and pipe fitters, who hold a collective agreement with the pipe-line contractors, the British Columbia office of the unemployment insurance commission and the immigration branch considered that the employers' requests for stringer-bead men for front end crews were genuine, as it is not always possible at the moment to find in Canada a sufficient number of stringer-bead men.

I think I should say, Mr. Speaker, that this type of employee, namely the stringer-bead man, is the ultimate as a welder. He starts the weld at the joint and it is most important that this start be made faultlessly. The joint must be firm and exact, and it requires highly experienced men to effect it. Less experienced welders complete the joint started by the stringer-bead man who continues on to start the next joint. Thus, for every two stringer-bead men employed, 12 to 18 other welders are required. Our office was unable to find sufficient bead men who were able to meet the rigid test required for this operation and, as a consequence, the 14 welders in question were allowed in from the United States.

Our regional office made a study of the various companies presently employing welders and found that, of a total of 79, 66 are Canadians and 13 Americans.

All the pipe-line contractors are still field testing welders and building up their crews for maximum activity. It is anticipated that in the weeks to come all qualified Canadian welders will be employed either on the main line, the feeder lines or on municipal distribution systems.

Mr. Green: May I ask the minister a supplementary question. Is there any limit on the length of time these United States welders can remain in Canada, because so often this is used as an excuse to get them in and then they stay? Can anything be done to prevent that occurring in this case?

Mr. Gregg: That point will be watched, Mr. Speaker. I might say that as the men I have referred to here as follow-up welders are trained to be bead men they can take the places of those now doing that part of the operation.

Mr. Green: Is any limit placed on the time these men may remain in Canada?

Mr. Gregg: I have no information as to that at the moment.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): May I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Labour. In view of his statement that the immigration department inquired of the employment service in British Columbia if there were any qualified welders available, was inquiry also made of the union of welders as to whether they had any qualified men?

Mr. Gregg: The three bodies are working in close co-operation, that is the union, the immigration branch and the national employment offices.

Mr. Winch: Why is it that we have received a wire from the union stating that they have qualified men and at the same time men are being brought in from the United States? How could that happen if they have been working in co-operation with the union?

Mr. Gregg: I cannot answer the question as to why, but from the information I have been able to get the figure of 80 which was mentioned is in excess of the number of qualified Canadian welders who had taken training in welding and were not yet employed under this arrangement

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): In view of the seriousness of the question I raised yesterday—I realize it was only yesterday—I wonder whether the Minister of Labour is in a position to reply to that question, with respect to the strike on the Princess Helene.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): The matter is being considered by the parties concerned today. I am not prepared to make any statements with regard to the matter as yet.

Mr. Nowlan: As a supplementary question, can we understand that the minister will make a statement after the consideration of today?

Mr. Gregg: Just as soon as I receive a report.

EDUCATION

SHORTAGE OF ENGINEERS AND SCIENTISTS—INVESTIGATION BY GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister advise when he will be able to answer the question I asked on May 9 regarding the shortage of scientists?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I did secure the information, and I was informed that there was constant contact between the employment services and those who require skilled labour. I was informed that this was almost a daily occurrence at some one or other of the employment services. I was told also that at the present time there is an intensive survey being made for two purposes: one, for the publication this year of the biennial report on the skilled labour situation in Canada, and the other to supply the commission on Canada's economic prospects with information about the skilled labour situation. This will be a more intensive and direct survey than has been made at any time previously with regard to skilled labour.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REVISION OF SALARIES OF TEMPORARY EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Can the minister say whether the pay cheques to be received by the sessional employees of the House of Commons on June 15 will include the salary increases announced by Your Honour on April 9 and confirmed by Your Honour and the minister on May 7? If not, can the minister say when these increases will come through?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): If my hon. friend is referring to the sessional employees the answer is that the internal economy commission has authorized an increase in pay which was spoken of at that time and presumably it will be in time to have it included in the June 15 cheques. However, the decision was made only yesterday and it may take more than a day or two to do that. But the decision has been made, and I am sure the employees will receive additional pay.

Mr. Knowles: Is it understood that these increases will be retroactive to April 1?

Mr. Harris: Yes.

COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE

CYPRUS AND CEYLON—INQUIRY AS TO POSITION TO BE TAKEN BY CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the right hon. Prime Minister whether it is anticipated that at the forthcoming commonwealth prime ministers' conference such matters as the status of Cyprus and Ceylon, and indeed the whole position in the Middle East and any such similar matters will be brought up for discussion and, if so, what will be the position with respect thereto taken by the government of Canada?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): With respect to Cyprus, the hon. gentleman knows that is a matter which concerns the government of the United Kingdom, and I would not anticipate that there would be advice or criticism volunteered. I have no doubt that the matter will be raised for discussion at the conference. With respect to Ceylon, I do not think it would be proper for me to say anything publicly. The hope is that Ceylon will wish to remain in the commonwealth, and it would be the opinion of the Canadian representatives that that would be a desirable solution.

I hope that with a frank discussion of these problems, which are real and serious, it will be possible, if not to make decisions, to get ourselves into a frame of mind where the decisions of all those participating will be similar and will be conducive to the settlement, or at least the easing, of those problems.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REQUEST FOR ANSWER TO QUESTION ON ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Can the Minister of Transport inform the house when an answer will be forthcoming to my question No. 518 on the order paper?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): I think it is the intention, in view of the question of my hon. friend, to make it an order for return tomorrow and give him the information as soon as it is available.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): As a supplementary question, is the minister aware that this information is constantly tabulated in his own department?

Mr. Marler: I have not got to the point where I require information from my hon. friend as to what goes on in my own department. When all the information asked for is available it will be brought down.

NATURAL RESOURCES

AUGUST FONTANA—PETITION REGARDING LOSS OF MINERAL RIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): May I direct a question to the Minister of Northern affairs and National Resources? Has the minister received a petition from Mr. August Fontana, of Virden, Manitoba, seeking redress for the loss of certain mineral rights as a result of action taken by this government? If so, what action has the minister taken as a result of this petition?

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, if my memory serves me right there was a petition addressed to the government last year, and after considering the petition the government decided not to grant it.

Mr. Zaplitny: The petition I refer to is of more recent date. Perhaps I should send a copy to the minister, and I shall do so in order to refresh his memory.

IMMIGRATION

HAL BANKS—INQUIRY AS TO CITIZENSHIP STATUS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): May I direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Can he advise the house if Mr. Hal Banks, president of the S.I.U., has acquired the status of a naturalized Canadian citizen?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I should think, sir, that as he was only landed as an immigrant the day before or a day or two after I became minister, I cannot remember which, he would not have been here the required five years.

Mr. Nowlan: May I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. In view of the fact that, according to my recollection, the house was informed by the minister's predecessor some time ago that Mr. Banks arrived in Canada in 1951 as a landed immigrant, would the minister recheck his files so as to be in a position to answer the question?

Mr. Pickersgill: It is quite unnecessary to do so, sir. Mr. Banks was in Canada as a visitor for quite some time before he was landed as an immigrant. Although I cannot say whether the precise date was June 30 or July 1, 2 or 3 of 1954, it was some time within that week that he was landed as an immigrant, and his time for citizenship would count only from that date.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS—INQUIRY AS TO AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the statement of the Prime Minister yesterday that a bill on dominion-provincial financial relations will be introduced at this session, can the Prime Minister inform the house at this time whether agreements have been reached with all or a majority of the provinces as a result of the proposals of the federal government respecting the rental of their corporation and income tax fields? If not, is it the intention of the government to hold any further conferences in order to reach agreements, or will the bill be a fait accompli as far as all the provinces are concerned?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I did not catch the last few words.

Mr. Winch: I am sorry.

Mr. Dufresne: It is in French.

Mr. Winch: Will the bill respecting dominion-provincial financial arrangements, which the Prime Minister told us yesterday was going to be introduced at this session, be a fait accompli that all the provinces must accept or have you reached agreements with all or the majority of the provinces and, if not, are you going to try to arrive at agreements before the bill is brought in?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): It is not expected to have another conference before the bill is brought in. The bill will be one that would authorize the making of agreements, but no agreements have yet been reached.

PIPE LINES

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES—STATEMENT AS TO TABLING OF DOCUMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra asked me about the tabling of documents associated with the contract with Trans-Canada Pipe Lines. I can advise him that the last document, P.C. 1956-860, authorizing execution of mortgage and indenture of mortgage dated June 7, 1956, Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited to Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation, was tabled this morning. I have a list of the various documents that have been tabled and their numbers. Perhaps I can send it across to the hon. member for his convenience if he wishes to check any others.

Mr. Knowles: Perhaps the list of documents could be put on Hansard.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I would be glad to put it on Hansard if that is the wish.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the document be inserted in Hansard?

(For list of documents see appendix, page 4982.)

TRANSPORT

WITHDRAWAL OF SECOND SECTION OF TORONTO-OTTAWA POOL TRAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that the second section of the pool train from Toronto to Ottawa has been withdrawn, can the minister say whether or not the information that the house would have suspended its sittings by June 10 came from the government?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I must admit that my contact with the actual operations of the Canadian National Railways is not close enough for me to have acquired that information. However, I shall make inquiry of the railway in order to find out how this report circulated. I was most interested to hear the hon. member mention July 10.

An hon. Member: June 10.

Mrs. Fairclough: May I ask a supplementary question. When the minister acquires his information, will he also inform members who come from southern Ontario how they are to return to Ottawa on Sunday nights?

Mr. Marler: I am surprised that they should even have left by that time.

CANADIAN FORCES ACT

AMENDMENTS TO DEFENCE SERVICES PENSION ACT AND TO NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence) moved the second reading of Bill No. 416, respecting the Canadian forces.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): Is the minister going to make a statement?

Mr. Campney: Mr. Speaker, yesterday in speaking to the resolution I pointed out that three of the sections are amendments to the Defence Services Pension Act and nine are amendments to the National Defence Act. As the sections are not related to each other nor do they all deal with one subject I assume that we shall not be able to discuss the principle of the bill as is usual on second reading. I would suggest therefore, if hon. members will agree, that we follow the usual custom in respect of this act, namely give it second reading and then go into committee where we can discuss each section in the light of its own circumstances.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Speaker, before we move into committee and come to the detailed discussion in relation to the various sections of this bill, I should like to comment on the manner in which the bill is now being introduced to the house. It is typical of the blundering and panicky way in which the government has been conducting its business all throughout this session. The resolution preceding this bill was placed on the order paper on January 12, five calendar months ago today. There it remained until yesterday afternoon, when the resolution was briefly discussed. The minister made a short statement and I asked a question or two. I was told that there were several amendments and that the sections were not related, as the minister has said today.

There are 13 different sections in this bill. They deal with amendments to two different acts, namely the Defence Services Pension Act and the National Defence Act. The National Defence Act has been amended several times, and in order to understand at least one of the sections of the bill it will be necessary to refer to the amendments which have been made to the National Defence Act. In addition to that consideration, in the bill and the notes attached to the various clauses reference is made to the United Kingdom act, the new Criminal Code of Canada and the Penitentiary Act. In order to study various clauses properly, those acts all must be referred to.

This bill was given first reading yesterday afternoon. At the close of yesterday's sitting the Minister of Finance said that if the bill was not already printed, it would be available early this morning. I arrived here and cleared my mail box at nine o'clock. There was no bill in it. Since I thought it would be discussed today I went down again just before the committee on external affairs met at eleven o'clock. There was no bill there then. I remained in the committee on external affairs until lunch time. I had my lunch, and then I found this bill.

That certainly is trying to railroad things through this house. I do not know whether other members have studied the bill. I have looked through it, and I shall do the best I can to offer some comments from time to time on the various sections. In view of the very limited time that hon. members have had, I do think we have the right to expect a full and detailed statement by the Minister of National Defence on the various clauses. We have not had the time to give them the proper consideration that we normally do. I feel that I am not coming to the discussion of this bill prepared in the way I usually am with any comments I have to make on the actions of this government. If, therefore, my questions may not be strictly relevant it will be for that reason, and I shall ask for some latitude in that respect.

Again I draw attention to the fact that for five months this resolution remained on the order paper and then in less than 24 hours—less than five hours, in fact—after we have received the bill we are asked to discuss it.

Mr. Campney: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should—

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): It will be too bad if the minister closes the debate, because we have not started. I must join with the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich in offering a protest against the method of introducing this bill in this house with such great haste. It has just come to my attention now in the bills which have been filed on our desks by the page boys and I have not had time to read it over. Under such circumstances the minister can hardly expect the best of co-operation in getting the bill through this house.

We have protested in other years against this method of bringing in an omnibus bill which amends more than one statute. This time I notice the minister says that this amending bill deals with just two statutes instead of the half dozen statutes that were amended last year. But it is wrong to do it this way, and I think we shall continue to protest as vigorously as we can against this method. We make a further protest against bringing the thing in as rapidly as this when there was plenty of time to have the bill printed and in our hands long ago.

This is the type of bill that requires careful study because the matters dealt with, particularly in the amendments which deal with the code of service discipline, require close attention. If we hastily pass this through we may be putting into the code of service discipline something which should not be there. How the minister expects us to understand this bill with the very limited explanation that he has given I do not know. I think he should have taken his time and at the resolution stage yesterday given a much more detailed statement as to the amendments which were to be introduced, and today he might very well have spoken at some length on the matter.

To approach a bill of this nature in this frame of mind is not conducive to its passage in short order, and I would hope that the minister would take note of our feelings in the matter and when on any other occasion he has to introduce an amending bill in this house he will do so differently.

We faced this problem last year and the year before. How can you discuss the principle of a bill when it amends two statutes? What is the principle? Do you divide it into two parts and say there are two principles in this bill, or how do you approach the subject? At this stage if we go into the question of the clauses I am sure we will be informed that that is not an orderly procedure, and that should be taken up at the committee stage. But that is the problem we are faced with this afternoon. A hastily introduced measure which is of an omnibus character does not lend itself to a discussion of the principle involved.

Then the minister in his introductory remarks has not been helpful. According to the information I have before me, in his statement yesterday at the resolution stage he just touched on the various amendments that were being brought before us without more than a sentence or two of explanation. For example, where the amendments deal with persons accompanying a unit to whom the commander may issue orders, he does not tell us what types of persons he has in mind, and I would certainly want to know that before I could comment upon it. There are persons who are subject to the code of service discipline, yet apparently they are not actually in uniform. According to this amendment the commander of the unit will be able to issue orders to them to take certain action under certain circumstances. Well, what type of person is involved in that?

Then the restriction that is to be imposed on drivers of vehicles who are considered to be impaired might have merited greater explanation than the minister offered. What is the standard of evidence that is going to be required with regard to this matter of impairment, either due to the use of alcohol or a drug? What drug, for example, is being considered? Then what has required the necessity for a further amendment, or an amendment, with regard to the enforcement of discipline in service prisons and detention barracks? I presume these things arise because of something that has to be corrected. Well, why did the minister not tell us what has to be corrected? What is wrong now with the code of service discipline that necessitates an amendment respecting the enforcement of discipline in service prisons and in detention barracks?

Then there is his amendment with respect to service vehicles paying tolls on bridges, highways and canals. What is being done at the present time? He did not give us any explanation of that; and so it goes. The minister does not deserve to have this bill given second reading this afternoon. As the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich pointed out, we have not had time to look at the thing very carefully; we have not had time to get the statutes and the amendments of recent years and compare these new amendments with what is already on the statute books and put them in their proper places, with the result that we cannot discuss the question with the care and attention that a matter of this kind deserves.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise just to support the protest that has been made by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich and the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre with respect to the form of this bill. This is a protest that these hon. gentlemen and some of us have been making for four or five years now. I do not know how many years we are going to have to keep on making the protest before the practice is changed; but it does seem to me it would be far more logical, when the government wishes to ask parliament to amend the Defence Services Pension Act, to bring before parliament a bill amending that act; also, when it wishes to amend the National Defence Act, to bring before parliament a bill amending the National Defence Act.

This practice that has been followed now for several years of bringing in a bill entitled the Canadian Forces Act in which are included amendments to a number of different acts—only two this year, but in other years there have been a number—seems to me to be an illogical and shall I say sloppy way of dealing with the matter. I think it would be far better if on this occasion the government would consider the proposal that has been made from this side of the house, namely that these acts be treated on their own and amended by separate bills amending each act by itself.

I have made that plea on a number of occasions. As I say, it seems to have fallen on deaf ears. I feel it is with justification that the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich and the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre have made this protest once again today.

Mr. Campney: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Campney: Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that I regret that hon. members opposite did not receive the bill until lunch time, as was made apparent by the remarks of the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich. The bill has been printed for a good while, but it had to be dated and numbered either during the night or this morning. I made inquiry early this morning and I understood the bill was on the way to the distribution office. I was not aware that there had been any delay, and I know that some hon. gentlemen did receive the bill early. In any event I can assure all hon. members there was no intention on my part to try to crowd this bill.

This is not a bill the sections of which are of great similarity in detail, and for that very reason it is not a bill that could be thoroughly discussed on second reading without creating more confusion than could be cleared up on account of the fact that each section has its own subject matter.

As to the remarks that have been made with respect to omnibus bills, we have found over the years in the department that by following this method we have obtained better service throughout Canada, Europe and England, wherever servicemen may be, much better success than under the old dispensation. Hon. members will recall that on one occasion there were 21 bills amended while this year there are only two, both of which are of direct and immediate interest to the services.

There is always the cumulative index in each annual volume of statutes where most people who look for bills can generally find them. I think the advantage to the services of having one bill each year covering matters that deal particularly and specifically with them has been of great benefit, in that it provides a means of quick reference and a means of getting the new changes known quickly, both of which are of advantage generally in the administration of the services.

As I have said, the sections of the bill are completely independent of each other. I think that is why in all previous cases—and I would like to suggest in this case also—it has been found that the practical and realistic way of dealing with them is to pass second reading of the bill and then take each section by itself in committee and discuss it at length, at least to the extent that hon. members wish to discuss it. In that way we will be talking about one subject at one time and shall deal with all of them successively, rather than trying to deal with them all simultaneously.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

[Mr. Campney.]

On clause 1—Title.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Pearkes: Would the minister please explain this to us?

Mr. Campney: Clause 1 is just the title.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Expiration of fixed term.

The Chairman: Shall this clause carry?

Mr. Pearkes: Would the minister explain this one?

Mr. Gillis: Are you going to make a statement?

Mr. Campney: Go ahead.

Mr. Gillis: This is of course the Defence Services Pension Act. The minister is aware of the fact that on a good many occasions both in this house and in committee I have raised a point with respect to this act. I notice that despite the amendments before us the matter I raised has not been taken care of.

What I had in mind is this. A member of the forces who contributes to the superannuation fund may die while in the service. Perhaps he has paid into that pension fund for 14 or 15 years. After he passes away in the service his contributions are then returned to his wife or his dependents. When that contribution is returned the income tax department will make an assessment against the total contribution—it may be $3,000 or $4,000—and they will tax it. I know of one case where a young officer contributed for 10 years and there was a sum of $600 deducted by the income tax department from the contribution when it was returned to his wife. I think it is a pretty rank piece of injustice, and for four or five years now I have been bringing it to the attention of the minister, and I did so in committee when the defence act was amended a few years ago.

I believe the department is being lax. That is a matter which is much more important, I think, than any amendment that is contained in the present act. It merely involves making arrangements with the income tax department. The superannuation contribution that is returned to the widow of a man who died in the service is not income because he has already paid income tax on his salary while he was in the service. Of course he would be allowed to offset that contribution, but the contribution is perhaps the only thing the widow has to depend on in the future, and I do not think it could be considered as income.

I wonder if the minister has taken the matter up with the Minister of National Revenue. I myself have done so. I also wonder if the defence department and the Department of National Revenue have had any discussions on the matter, because I think it is a pretty raw piece of business. I am running into quite a bit of it; I have had several cases. Would the minister care to comment on that?

Mr. Campney: Well, Mr. Chairman, as my hon. friend well knows the question is primarily one for the income tax branch. I would point out, however, that at the time the contribution was paid in no income tax was paid on it. When the sum is paid out I presume the Department of National Revenue feels that it should be subject to income tax. It is not a matter over which we have any real jurisdiction, but I know my hon. friend feels quite strongly about it because he has brought it up several times. He has now pointed out that he took it up with the branch which has control of taxing or not taxing the payments. I shall be glad to note the hon. member's further comments, but it is not a matter with which this department can deal by itself.

Mr. Pearkes: I hoped perhaps the minister would have given an explanation of the advantages and purpose of this particular amendment. As far as I can understand, if an officer is offered and does not accept a further fixed term of employment, then he is compulsorily retired. On the other hand, if he is offered and refuses an indefinite term of employment, then he is retired at his own request. What is the purpose of those two different sets of circumstances?

Mr. Campney: This section is to take care of an officer who has risen from the ranks and has taken a fixed term commission. At the expiry of the fixed term he may be granted a permanent commission or he may be released entirely or he may have his fixed term commission extended, as is often the case. Under the act as it stands if at the completion of his fixed term he is offered but does not accept an extension of his fixed term commission he is deemed to have voluntarily retired. Therefore he gets only the gratuities payable under the pay regulations for his service during his period as an officer, but he loses any gratuities he might have as the result of his service as a man in the ranks.

In addition to clarifying the law as it exists, this section takes care of that situation and enables a man who has risen from the ranks and who has proceeded in the manner I have outlined to get a gratuity based on his service as an officer and as a man in the ranks. In other words it works to his advantage.

Mr. Pearkes: Does this apply only to a man who has risen from the ranks, or does it apply to a man who has what is usually referred to as a short-term commission?

Mr. Campney: It applies only to the man who has both qualifications, who has a short term commission and has risen from the ranks.

Mr. Pearkes: The minister referred to a permanent commission. Is that just another expression for the indefinite period, which is the term used?

Mr. Campney: Yes.

Mr. Pearkes: I think the wording in paragraph (b) of clause 2 is rather unfortunate. This reads:

—and such retirement of an officer mentioned in subparagraph (i) of paragraph (a) shall be deemed to promote economy or efficiency in the forces.

I know that is the term frequently used, but it is possible that it would cast doubt as to the efficiency of the person's services while he was in the armed forces. When he enters civilian life and applies for employment the prospective employer would see that he was released from the services in order to promote economy or efficiency in the forces. The would-be employer might be apt to hesitate and say, "Here is a man who has been released from the armed forces in order to improve the efficiency of those forces." That would not be a very good recommendation for a man whose only crime apparently has been that he was not prepared to accept re-engagement under the terms of the act. Would it not be possible to adjust that in some way?

Mr. Campney: As the hon. member knows, that is a phrase which runs through the Defence Services Pension Act and has for many years. Among those who are familiar with it, it does not carry any connotation of inefficiency or anything wrong. We are now engaged in a revision of the act and this very point is being considered. We hope we can arrive at some better nomenclature than this, but I repeat that this phrase has for a good while been used throughout the act.

Mr. Pearkes: I know it has been there for a long time, but that does not mean that people who are not connected with the services understand its full significance. I realize I have criticized the minister for bringing in amendments to the Defence Services Pension Act, but if he will bring in one next year to adjust this particular matter I shall be a little more lenient in my criticism.

Mr. Churchill: How is the pension affected as between these two methods if a man voluntarily retires?

Mr. Campney: Generally speaking, an officer who has retired voluntarily merely has his contributions returned. If he is compulsorily retired he gets a gratuity or pension depending on the length of his service.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, the remarks I intend to make with reference to clause 2 will apply equally to the 13 clauses of the bill. I concur in the remarks made by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich. I am very interested in the amendments to these acts, but the bill was distributed at about eleven o'clock this morning and as I happened to be in the external affairs committee I did not receive it until much later. Clause 2 and the other clauses of this bill are quite technical and complicated, and I do not think it is fair to hon. members of this committee, particularly members of the opposition, to expect that they will be able to comment upon or criticize the bill when they have had it in their hands for such a short time.

I think in fairness the minister should consider adjourning this matter until another day. While it is quite true that as we reach the different clauses we will be able to make superficial criticism by reading them over hastily, the fact is that we cannot give the clauses the careful consideration we would normally expect to give them.

Mr. Goode: It is hard for me to understand why hon. gentlemen who have served so long in the forces would consider this bill to be complicated. I certainly did not have the service of the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich, but to my limited intelligence this bill is quite simple. I do not think the minister will have any difficulty in answering questions.

One thing I want to bring to the attention of the minister is what was said by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich, who expressed my opinion completely. Many of us have known men who have served in the armed forces and whose discharge papers did not state the reasons for their discharge. I submit that those reasons should have been included. I submit that the Minister of National Defence should do something about this. If a man is retired at his own request why should that not be stated in his papers, instead of adding other words to it?

Mr. Harris: Hon. members will recall that last evening I said that if this bill was not distributed in time, suitable arrangements could be made if desired. I made inquiries this morning and I made inquiries at noon, and I was not informed that it was the desire of hon. members to postpone the consideration of this bill.

Mr. Churchill: From whom did you make inquiries?

[Mr. Churchill.]

Mr. Harris: Shall I say the usual channels. This is not by way of reproach of anyone, but those inquiries were made. However, if hon. members feel that they do not desire to go on I would be glad to suggest to my colleague that we leave the matter as it stands. On the other hand I may tell hon. members that had I been informed that they felt this way about it, we would have called some other item rather than taken the time that has now been taken. I leave it entirely to hon. members as to what they wish to do.

Mr. Pearkes: As I indicated, the time has been extremely limited, but provided a reasonable latitude is given to us to ask questions and provided the minister is prepared to explain these various clauses—and it will take longer than it would have done had we had time to consider this beforehand—we are prepared to go on, as far as this party is concerned.

Mr. Harris: Thank you.

Mr. Pearkes: At the end of clause 2, in the part dealing with other ranks, there is a different wording in connection with re-engagement and the offer for re-enlistment. Is there only one type of enlistment in the forces, namely for a fixed period? Is there no indefinite period?

Mr. Campney: Not in the ranks.

Mr. Pearkes: Just for a fixed period of so many years? Is that uniform in all the services?

Mr. Campney: It is not uniform as to years, but it is the uniform practice.

Mr. Pearkes: Would that apply to apprentices as well as to men who are in the regular units?

Mr. Campney: Yes.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 3—Employment of officer pensioner in the public service of Canada or the forces.

Mr. Pearkes: Regarding clause 3, the addition seems to be the words "chief petty officer first class or second class." There have been chief petty officers in the navy from time immemorial. How is it that it is necessary now, at this stage, to add these special words, and what has happened to the chief petty officer in the past?

Mr. Campney: Chief petty officers now are classed under the law as warrant officers, classes 1 and 2. At the time the law was passed with regard to people entering the public service they were not warrant officers. The only point in this amendment is to make them warrant officers for the purpose of adjustment of their salaries and pensions, the same as warrant officers have always been in the other two services.

Mr. Pearkes: If they are now warrant officers, why do we have to put in chief petty officers first class and second class? If it had been in before, I could have understood it.

Mr. Campney: I do not know why we have not called them warrant officers. Probably we would have to consult the chief of the naval staff on that. It is a time-honoured term, and as long as they have the legal status of warrant officers they do not have to change the name.

Mr. Pearkes: The whole point is that we should get this cleared up. We have chief petty officer first class and second class in the navy, and warrant officers first and second class in the army and air force. Why is it necessary to put in "chief petty officer first class or second class"?

Mr. Campney: The chief petty officer first class is the same as a warrant officer first class, and the chief petty officer second class is the same as a warrant officer second class.

Mr. Pearkes: So I understand, but I am asking why you do not have to put in "a contributor who has been retired as an officer, warrant officer first class or second class, or chief petty officer first class or second class."

Mr. Campney: I understand that originally the navy had warrant officers, and they were not commissioned, and so there is some complication in terms. A chief petty officer has come to have a certain status, and it has been retained in the wording of this section, but he now has exactly the same status as the warrant officer in the other services.

Mr. Nesbitt: This clause says:

> A contributor who has been retired as an officer, warrant officer or chief petty officer 1st class or 2nd class . . .

Does this include warrant officers in the navy?

Mr. Campney: I am informed that there are not now warrant officers in the navy. There were at one time, but not now.

Mr. Nesbitt: I realize that, but it says:

> A contributor who has been retired . . .

What about those who held the rank of warrant officer? Does it include them?

Mr. Campney: As they were not commissioned officers, as warrant officers were not in the navy in the past, the same rule would apply as is under this clause. I understand also that there have never been any warrant officers in the navy who come under part V of the act.

Mr. Nesbitt: Perhaps the minister might explain this. It is a rather technical point. In the navy there were formerly commissioned warrant officers and warrant officers. Perhaps he would explain the difference between those two.

Mr. Campney: I understand that many of the warrant officers in the navy were subsequently commissioned and that now there are none moving up to commission. The rank has been abolished in the navy. A chief petty officer first class or second class is the equivalent of a warrant officer, but I am informed that there are no warrant officers in the navy.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): The term "warrant officer" is not restricted to any part of the forces anyway, as I understand it. That would cover the categories mentioned if there were any to qualify, would it not?

Mr. Campney: Yes, I think that is true.

Mr. Pearkes: May I ask whether there have been any chief petty officers who have been retired in the last six years who might be adversely affected by the fact that this had not been previously included?

Mr. Campney: The number is approximately 77 altogether.

Mr. Pearkes: What has happened to them? Have they received their pensions, or how have they been dealt with, seeing they were not included under the old act?

Mr. Campney: Up to the present time they have received a full pension.

Mr. Pearkes: In spite of the fact that they have not been shown? They have been included as having been in effect covered?

Mr. Campney: No.

Mr. Pearkes: What I am trying to get at is that we are suddenly adding these words "chief petty officer first class or second class". It is not a new rank; that rank has been in existence ever since the pension act has been in existence. What has happened to the chief petty officers first and second class who have retired during the time part 5 of the pension act has been in effect and until this amendment is passed?

Mr. Campney: They have been treated exactly the same as staff sergeants in the army. Prior to the effective date of the bill they will not be affected. This is so even though payments may have exceeded the restriction, which is a general restriction that obtains with respect to people from the services within the limits of this act who later take up civilian occupations with the government.

Mr. Pearkes: These 70-odd men who have been retired have been adversely affected owing to the fact that these words have not been included in the act?

Mr. Campney: They have gained, because they have their full pension not subject to the adjustment that is provided for in this section. I think the general rule is that you get that part of your pension which when added to your salary does not exceed the pay and allowances of the position you had on retirement, so they have really gained.

Mr. Pearkes: The navy will not be very pleased about this amendment.

Mr. Campney: It is only fair.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 4—Idem.

Mr. Pearkes: Clause 4 refers to the collection of debts. In the old act reference was made to a man who was a debtor on account of pay. I believe that was there, though I have not had a chance to turn it up. Does it only refer to pay?

Mr. Campney: Perhaps I could shorten the discussion on this clause by saying that the only point in it is to provide a method of giving notice to the debtor. The law as it stood before this amendment provided that there should be a set-off from the man's pay account upon notice, but there was nothing in the section to indicate how the notice must be given. Therefore you had to find the man. Having regard to the usual procedure in matters of this kind, the amendment provides how notice may be given, either actual or constructive. Otherwise you have to find the man or you cannot give him notice.

Mr. Pearkes: This refers to overpayment, where there is a debt on the part of the man.

Mr. Campney: Yes.

Mr. Pearkes: He may have received more pay than he was entitled to owing to various circumstances.

Mr. Campney: That is correct.

Mr. Pearkes: Does it refer only to pay? Does it cover allowances? Does it cover any loans which may be made under the new act, whereby loans may be made to men in the various units or ships?

Mr. Campney: From the wording I think it would certainly apply to any debit balance resulting from, for example, any equipment he might have purchased and charged to his pay account. Any debit balance in his account, however it arose, would be collectable under this section.

Mr. Pearkes: Then that debit may be taken from his pension. Is that correct?

Mr. Campney: That is correct.

Mr. Pearkes: That raises the whole question of debts incurred by servicemen. If the services themselves are going to assume the right to collect a debt which is owing to the service by a man in the forces, should consideration not be given to the collection of debts which are owed to civilians by men who are in the services? I regret to say that from time to time there are men in the services who do not meet their civilian obligations. They escape paying their debts either by transfer or by the mere fact that they remain in the unit or retire on pension, and the civilian land owner or person who has rented accommodation to them or the man who has sold them a television set on time and so on cannot collect. Recently, as the minister knows, the bar association of British Columbia passed a resolution which I presume has been brought to his attention. It reads in part as follows:

> Whereas many merchants and others through dealing with persons in the employ and pay of the government of Canada, by giving to them credit, have suffered hardship and in many cases grievous loss because advantage is taken by such persons of the fact that their wages or salaries cannot be garnisheed—

Then it goes on to recommend that service personnel and other personnel in the employ of the government should come under the various provincial acts which govern these circumstances. There are not a great many cases so far as the armed forces are concerned, but there are a limited number. These men who do not live up to their obligations bring discredit to their ships or their units. If the government is now bringing in an amendment so as to be able to collect debts owing to the government, should the government not also consider providing some relief for those unfortunate persons who have been victimized by persons in the services who have not lived up to the traditions of the service, are not a credit to the service, and who may have gone on pension? It seems to me that if this is suitable procedure for the government for the collection of debts, then there should be an obligation on the government to see that debts owing to civilians are paid.

Mr. Campney: The pay account of a man in the services has always been regarded by the services, and I presume by the man himself, as a private matter between the two parties, the paying party and the receiving party. To open up that position to the extent of allowing the paymaster to deduct alleged debts owing to other people would certainly be initiating a new principle, particularly if this practice were extended to the civil service. There may be some reasons why at first blush it would seem to be a desirable thing, but I am sure that on second thought my hon. friend will realize that it would hardly be practicable, and certainly would not make for good relations between the man and his employer, the government service.

Mr. Pearkes: Has this resolution of the bar association been brought to the minister's attention?

Mr. Campney: Yes. As a matter of fact we have received representations from time to time, as I presume those concerned with the administration of the civil service have, from interested bodies, I think that has been going on for quite a while. However, it is a very large subject and a very novel approach which, so far as I know, has not been accepted in any government circles, either civil or military.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I should like to add my voice to that of the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich. I do not know whether it should be suggested that we are asking the government to act in any way as a collection agency, but certainly the brief that has been referred to has suggested that members of the armed forces should be placed in the same category as any civilians in connection with their civil obligations. At this time I do not think we should simply put the matter off by saying that in the past there has been a well-recognized principle.

It may be that in times of national emergency it would cause considerable dislocation in the armed forces to have the personnel subject to garnishee or attachment in some way for civilian debts, but in times such as these there would appear to be no reason why the same obligations should not be shouldered by these people as are shouldered by everyone else in the country. I strongly suggest that we do not rest this case simply on the basis of an old principle. As the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich has said, it brings no credit on the armed forces if there are people in the forces who avoid their obligations.

I think the vast majority of the people in the forces, no matter what branch they might be in, would be quite satisfied to see some change in this type of regulation. As I have said before, I do not think we should suggest that the paymaster become a collection agency; but if the government is prepared to take steps to protect its own position, as it is here, it should be willing to recognize the same principle on a broader basis.

As to the section itself, may I say this. It seems to me that here is an example of the lazy-man approach. If there is any credit left in the account of the person receiving the pay or the pension, obviously it is going to be necessary for the department to track that person down in order to make the payment; but it would appear that it would be much easier, if it is simply the case of a deduction, to send him notice of it. We are removing from the person who might be considered a defendant considerable of his rights in the first part of the section when we say that the governor in council by regulation may prescribe the manner in which this money can be collected. What excuse is there to take the next step and say "We can just send you notice of it by registered post"?

I do not know whether this is the ordinary type of contra-account transaction we have where we say, "We have $10 of yours, you owe us $5 and we are sending you on $5". But in any case it would appear that the combination expressed in the first part of the section and the second removes the opportunity for the man to put in his defence and say, "I do not owe you this money and I am not going to pay you until you prove it". Under this regulation the department simply has to say, "You owe this money, we have deducted it and that is what you have left".

Clause agreed to.

On clause 5—Subordinate officers and men.

Mr. Pearkes: We now come to the consideration of the amendments to the National Defence Act. In the notes with respect to clause 5 I see the following:

> This clause would permit the enrolment of a subordinate officer in the Canadian forces for either an indefinite or a fixed term of service . . .

Are they permitted to change from one to the other? Can a person who starts off on a fixed term change at his request to an indefinite term?

Mr. Campney: Generally speaking, if an officer starts off on a fixed term commission, he is working up to a permanent commission later on. This amendment deals with a particular type of officer known as a subordinate officer. I understand that a subordinate officer in the navy is an acting sub-lieutenant or a midshipman or a naval cadet; in the army he is an officer cadet; and in the air force he is a flight cadet. He is enrolled but not commissioned, although he is looked upon when he is enrolled as being a proper candidate, subject to check as his activities go on, for a commission. Under the act as it now stands a subordinate officer can enrol only for a fixed term. The amendment provided by this clause would permit him to enrol either for an indefinite term or for a fixed term as at present. In other words it gives him wider latitude than he has under the law as it now stands.

Mr. Pearkes: That did not quite answer my question. I asked whether he would be able to change from enrolment for a fixed term into enrolment for an indefinite term. For instance, I have in mind a cadet at the H.M.C.S. Venture college at Esquimalt, who would be there for a fixed term of so many years. Could he during the period of that service change to an indefinite period?

Mr. Campney: Only with the consent of the service concerned.

Mr. Pearkes: Oh, yes.

Mr. Campney: It would be given, if it were given, after some period of observation as to his likelihood of becoming a successful officer.

Mr. Pearkes: Would the minister say why subclause 3 has been eliminated? In the present act paragraph 3 reads:

(3) A person under the age of 18 years shall not be enrolled without the consent of one of his parents or of his guardian.

That paragraph has been eliminated from the new amendment?

Mr. Campney: No. Subclause 3 is not being eliminated. The amendment that is made is just being made to subclause 2. Subclause 1 of section 21 and subclause 3 remain as they were.

Mr. Pearkes: They remain?

Mr. Campney: Yes.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 6—Persons deemed to be under command of superior officer.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Before I make any remarks about this clause, may I say that I assume it covers people whether they are affiliated with the armed forces in Canada, within the jurisdiction here or in a foreign jurisdiction. Would that be right? Is that a proper assumption?

Mr. Campney: This section practically speaking, applies only outside of Canada.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Perhaps that answer limits my remarks to a certain extent, but I am wondering whether the department has taken into account the fact that the use of nuclear weapons may necessitate the officer commanding having authority not only over those affiliated with the armed forces, as set out here, but that his authority perhaps—although some question of sovereignty may arise in connection with my remarks—may necessitate his having control over all the persons within an area and, in so far as our act is concerned, that he should be protected in connection with orders to remove all civilians within a certain area. Perhaps we cannot get around any liability which he might have in a foreign jurisdiction but certainly we should be able to provide that he is protected, in so far as our own armed forces are concerned, if he orders all civilians out of a certain area. This section would not appear to take that situation into account.

Mr. Campney: This section has nothing to do with civilians generally as a class. It has to do only with those within the definition of persons accompanying a unit outside of Canada. They have already been made subject to the code of service discipline but, under the law as it now stands, they have not been made subject to the orders of the commander of the unit to which they may be attached or which they may be accompanying. The purpose of this amendment is to give him some authority in certain cases.

These things take place, of course, in potential war areas. The idea is to give the commanding officer authority to take them under his command for purposes of defence and evacuation except as regards bearing arms. In other words, he could move them out of there or move them about for these purposes other than for active service in the sense of engaging in the bearing of arms. It is just a small gap that was found in the general law which provided that something could be done but did not provide who could do it.

Mr. Churchill: I wonder whether the minister could help us out here. Who are these people who are subject to the code of service discipline by virtue of the paragraphs that are mentioned here? Would the minister refresh our memories on that point?

Mr. Campney: Well, principally, of course, they will be dependents together with other civilians who for certain reasons would be accompanying the unit. The definition covers persons who participate with a unit or other element of the service in carrying out any of its movements, manoeuvres, duties, warlike operations, and so on. It would go no farther than those categories, plus the dependents of the members of the unit. These two general classes cover practically all cases.

Mr. Pearkes: May I ask whether I heard the minister correctly when he said this applied only to persons accompanying Canadian forces out of Canada? Where is that contained? I do not see it in subsection 8 of section 56 of the National Defence Act, as amended.

Mr. Campney: It was covered in the 1954 amendment. Subsection 7 (a) of section 56 defines persons accompanying the Canadian forces, and if I recollect correctly I think it deals only with dependents accompanying them out of Canada. Subsection 7 (a) of section 56, subclause (c), which defines classes of persons accompanying Canadian forces as, "a dependent out of Canada or of any officer or man serving beyond Canada in the unit", and so on.

Mr. Pearkes: That would not apply to any personnel who might be in the northern parts of Canada?

Mr. Campney: No, Mr. Chairman.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 7—Parties to an offence.

Mr. Pearkes: I have not had an opportunity of looking at the Criminal Code. Can the minister give assurance that this conforms exactly to the wording of the Criminal Code?

Mr. Campney: Yes, it does, Mr. Chairman. The new Criminal Code changes a little the results which flow from common intention in respect of offences under the code, and we have made the same changes in respect of service offences. I think the amendment is identical, word for word, with the Criminal Code.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Would the minister answer this question. With respect to personnel serving outside of the country, what law is taken into account in defining "unlawful purpose"?

Mr. Campney: I think an unlawful purpose would be defined as under the Canadian Criminal Code in respect of Canadians, or under the National Defence Act, where we have our own code of service discipline which we administer whether at home or abroad.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Would this not include any civilian law of the locality where the armed forces are serving?

Mr. Campney: Only to the extent that the National Defence Act makes an offence against the local law an offence under the National Defence Act. If the National Defence Act, as it does in some cases, makes the law of the place applicable, then the jurisdiction rests under the National Defence Act, but it would have to be within the limit of the provisions of that act.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I have only one observation then, sir, in connection with this. As I understand it, this section did not appear in the previous act at all, and therefore it is an additional responsibility or liability of members of the armed forces. My concern is this. Certainly numerous situations arise in the armed forces which ordinarily may not arise in civilian life.

This section talks about an intention in common to carry out an unlawful purpose. In some sections of Europe to ask for a drink between eight and ten o'clock may be a breach of some code. Under these circumstances it would be most unfortunate if a group of Canadian soldiers were involved in some type of a dispute, many of whom had no thought of being involved in anything serious at all, and wound up being charged with a very serious offence because of the meaning of this section. I should like to feel that there was no question but that unlawful purpose was designated entirely within the realm of our own law and not by any definition of an outside jurisdiction.

Mr. Campney: Under the NATO arrangement, of course, we have usually the first opportunity to deal with those cases: otherwise the civil courts can deal with them under the amendments to the act which have already been brought into the house. As I understand it, so long as we apply the Canadian law that would cover unlawful purpose or any other subsidiary matter. Because we have generally the first right to try people in foreign countries for transgressing their law, it becomes a question, I should think, of relying on the judgment of the commanding officer or whoever is in charge of the unit or the area. If he failed to apply Canadian law then, in the second instance, such people can be tried under the law of the place where they are, but I cannot imagine any practical situation in relation to our own people, in any serious case, where a Canadian officer charged with the jurisdiction would pass it over to someone else.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I am thinking of the places where the minister has indicated that by statute there has been an application of the law of the foreign jurisdiction. Notwithstanding the fact that the commanding officer, or whoever is going to be in charge of a court martial, may have the first opportunity to try an accused, would I not be right in saying that under whatever conflict of law exists he might have to apply the law of the civilian jurisdiction which has been made applicable by a previous statute or regulation to our own armed forces? If that be the case, even though he might have jurisdiction to try, he might be working under a definition in those areas which would create considerable disability on the part of defence counsel.

Mr. Campney: It would appear in the case the hon. member has mentioned that the Canadian officer or tribunal having jurisdiction would apply, under all the existing regulations and the act, the Canadian law in determining any of these matters. But if there were no Canadian law—if it happened to be an act not made an offence by Canadian law—I would think he would have to apply the law of the place where he was at the time because if he did not the foreign court could then step in and apply it.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 8—Parties to an offence.

Mr. Pearkes: Clause 8 obviously provides penalties for what might be called an extension of looting or the searching of and stealing from bodies of the fallen. I was wondering whether the words "in the course of warlike operations" were not a rather strict limiting factor. Suppose circumstances occurred during extensive training periods where you might perhaps find an R.C.A.F. plane had crashed and the bodies might possibly be then tampered with. Would they be covered by that clause, or does this clause only refer to the strict interpretation of the words "in the course of warlike operations"?

Mr. Campney: Mr. Chairman, in most cases, of course, the ordinary law of theft would apply. It was felt however that the same amendment as was made to the army act of the United Kingdom last year after a good deal of investigation should be adopted. These particular offences which have to do with activities in the field are of a more serious nature and should be more stringently dealt with than ordinary cases of theft. I think that would also be why in subclause (g)—and this incidentally is taken directly from the British army act—the words "in the course of warlike operations" were added.

The net result of the clause which we have adopted from the British army act is that it has increased the maximum penalty. That is about the only real change; the reason being, as I have said, that it is felt that this type of offence is more heinous, more serious in the midst of activities in the field than ordinary theft.

Mr. Pearkes: I can see it being classed as ordinary theft here in Canada, but let us suppose our troops in Europe were engaged in extensive activities, as they have been in recent years, and there was an unfortunate accident there and a case occurred where, to take subclause (g) as an illustration, an attempt was made to steal from some of the men who had become unfortunate casualties. Would they be covered by this subclause or not?

Mr. Campney: The point the hon. member has raised would not come under subclause (g). It would be a case of theft, for which the penalties are also stringent but not as stringent as they would be in this case.

Mr. Pearkes: That is why I said I thought perhaps this was a rather strict limitation, and I wondered if you had considered expanding it?

Mr. Churchill: I was wondering if the minister would give us a little more explanation as to why this amendment is introduced now. It is all very well to say it is similar to section 30 of the army act, 1955, of the United Kingdom, but what has brought about the need for this to be introduced here in so far as the Canadian forces are concerned? We are not now engaged in warlike operations. Have we had anything like this in the past? Something must have brought this to a head.

Mr. Campney: Mr. Chairman, these subclauses of course do not apply in Canada at the moment. I think the reason they were introduced is because the investigation that took place in Great Britain and the changes made in their act—we try to keep in touch with the changes to the relevant acts in the United Kingdom and United States as well—commended themselves to us as being useful sections in the event of war and as being of assistance under such circumstances. There is no application at the present time, of course.

Mr. Churchill: It is aimed at looting, is it? Were the investigations carried on in Britain as a result of looting in the second world war, or were they the result of something which happened in Korea or Malaya?

Mr. Campney: There are probably a number of reasons but I think one of the reasons is that frequently plans, documents and identification and so on which might have proved useful were removed and thrown away or scattered about. The fact that such actions have been made serious offences might tend to correct some of that sort of thing. Also in time of war I should say one has to be pretty stringent in regard to the punishment of anything savouring of theft.

The only difference in the application of these subclauses would be that the maximum penalty for stealing would be increased under the code of service discipline from 7 years, or 14 years, under certain circumstances. Incidentally, these penalties are somewhat less than those imposed under the Criminal Code.

It is a question really of making the punishment fit what they regard as the crime, I suppose. It is not a change in the definition of what constitutes theft or what constitutes an offence, but it is making optional the gradation of the seriousness of punishment.

It has also just been pointed out to me that while it is generally true that these three subclauses deal with theft, some of the offences listed here would not be strictly theft at all, but are peculiar to the war-like conditions under which we would be operating.

Mr. Churchill: Yes, Mr. Chairman, but does not section 68 deal with property of the government and matters pertaining to that? Yet this amendment, certainly in subclause (i), extends to property abandoned by the enemy. The present section 68 does not go quite that far at all; it has nothing to do with enemy property.

Mr. Campney: Well, property abandoned by the enemy of course automatically becomes the property of the government of the successful country engaged. It does not lapse; it becomes the property of that country immediately.

Mr. Herridge: I would like to ask the minister a question with respect to subclause (g), which reads:

> Steals from, or with intent to steal searches, the person of any person killed or wounded, in the course of warlike operations;

I remember at Ypres we were advancing on one occasion. We had been in the trenches for a week or two and my feet swelled up so I could hardly bear my boots. When we were advancing I ran across a poor unfortunate Australian, and I stopped for a few minutes and took off his boots and put them on. Would a soldier be guilty of an offence under this clause under those circumstances?

Mr. Campney: I would not think he would under the circumstances outlined by the hon. member.

Mr. Herridge: I suppose it would be a question, as the deputy minister of justice says, of being morally innocent.

Mr. Quelch: I remember in the first war we were quite short of equipment, and it was a common practice to take a pair of binoculars or a revolver from a German officer and use it for our own personal use. We did not call it stealing, we called it commandeering. Would a man doing those things be liable under this clause?

Mr. Hamilton (York West): In the last war you just gave them a receipt signed "Joe Blow".

Mr. Churchill: I think this matter deserves a little more consideration. As has just been mentioned, enemy property taken during the first war was considered to be commandeered, whereas in the second world war it was considered to be liberated. I think a little haste has been shown in inserting this particular amendment without giving full consideration to all the possibilities. A good example was given by the hon. member for Kootenay West. Anyone who served overseas can recall multiple instances of these things; and while the minister may say that under those circumstances an officer or man would not be charged, I am not too sure. If we had a particularly efficient adjutant general's department and a very efficient provost corps, troops who were doing commandeering or liberating at the front might be borne down upon quite heavily. I would not want to give the adjutant general or the provost corps any more power than they have at the present time.

I fail to understand why this amendment should be suddenly brought forward during peacetime. In case of war it might be necessary to be more careful with regard to looting, although section 68 of the National Defence Act seems to provide sufficient protection against this offence. I think it goes far enough. If we write into the National Defence Act something which cannot be enforced, then we will be bringing the law into disrepute. I do not see how you could enforce this clause in the field under actual service conditions. There would be enemy property that was abandoned, and it would be taken otherwise than for the public service. I can assure you of that. If a person were on the stand he might be able to declare that what he had done with the abandoned enemy property was for the public service, but he would be in an awkward position.

If this section concerned only our own people or our allies from whom things were taken, that would be a different matter entirely; but when it comes to the enemy I am not at all sure that you can effectively guard against what appear to people in the field to be legitimate operations. I suggest to the minister that he withhold this particular amendment for further consideration.

Mr. Campney: This clause has been brought forward because the people in the department agree with the British that we should profit from some of the experiences of the past and get our statute in shape to deal with emergencies that might occur, although we hope they will not occur. It seems to me that any provisions which might tend to discourage the wrongs that might occur in warlike operations, particularly anything savouring of looting or of dealing carelessly with valuable documents and so on, would be of extreme value. Such provisions would prove to be most beneficial if war should break out.

The subsections do not apply in peacetime, but if unfortunately we should be involved in a war I think we should be able to deal with these matters very stringently. Probably in a new war we would have to deal with them more stringently than was the case in any past war.

Mr. Churchill: I still am not convinced that we have to introduce this section. British experience may point to the need of it, but Canadian experience has been rather extensive. I gather from the minister's remarks that the request for this has emerged from the intelligence branch. I imagine they have felt that some valuable material was lost in the last war, or perhaps in Korea, which would have been most useful to their service. Of course a good point can be made on the basis of the requirements of intelligence, but I still am far from being convinced that we need to write this into the act at the present time. I do not know that the minister has advanced sufficient reasons for it being incorporated in the act when section 68 has served so well up to the present.

I do not object to the department looking at what is being done in the United Kingdom or the United States with regard to matters of this sort, but we have a very extensive Canadian experience in service problems, and if this has not been brought up by Canadian service personnel as the result of Canadian experience in active theatres of war I think it might well be held over.

Mr. McIvor: I think the word "steal" should be defined. A man who takes for his own use and does it out in the open with everybody knowing about it is not stealing, but a man who takes in order to sell so that he may put money in his own pocket is really stealing.

Mr. Pallett: What about the man who holds up a bank?

Mr. Jones: I think the last suggestion is worthy of consideration. The word "stealing" should be defined. I remember losing my compass in France and I was lost without it. I found another, and made use of it. Was that stealing? It was not mine, but it helped me out of a difficulty.

Clause agreed to.

[Mr. Campney.]

On clause 9—Improper driving of vehicles.

Mr. Trainor: Dealing with paragraph (c), the minister will be aware that certain drugs are used in the treatment of illness which are capable of impairing the ability to drive a motor vehicle. It seems to me it would be unfortunate if the penalty provided by this clause were to be applied in such cases. I think some exception should be made in paragraph (c) to cover drugs which are used under a prescription by a medical officer.

Mr. Campney: Surely if a man is impaired by the use of a drug he should not be driving a vehicle, even though the drug has been administered for medical purposes. The person certainly would be aware that he had been treated with such a drug, and whether his driving capacity had been impaired to the danger of the public and other motorists on the highway. Surely the test must be whether, by reason of alcohol or by the use of a drug, under any circumstances he has become a danger or a menace on the highway.

Mr. Churchill: Subparagraph (c) states:

> having charge of a vehicle of the Canadian forces knowingly permits it to be driven by a person whose ability to drive such a vehicle is impaired by alcohol or a drug;
> is guilty of an offence . . .

Private soldiers are placed in charge of vehicles. If the private soldier has that vehicle taken by an intoxicated superior officer, whether he is a corporal, a sergeant, a sergeant major or a commissioned officer, who bears the blame? It is the private soldier against whom the vehicle is charged. Would he bear the penalty, or what would the army do under those circumstances?

Mr. Campney: Generally speaking, the senior officer in the vehicle is in charge of the vehicle, and this amendment is intended to make that very clear. Under certain circumstances, if the senior officer is in charge of the vehicle and is not capable of exerting the charge, he is still liable, I would say, and he is also responsible, whether he is impaired or whether he is not, in law for the acts of the junior driving the vehicle. He should not be in that condition, and the intention of this subclause is to make the officer in the vehicle responsible for the driving, whoever under him is actually driving it. I think it is only fair and proper that he should be.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I think the minister has missed the point of the question by the hon. member. The situation that he referred to was that the man junior in rank had actually been placed in charge of the vehicle and that the man senior in rank, who might be intoxicated, had come along and taken the vehicle away from him, or asserted his authority. Would the junior still be chargeable under this clause? I think that was the question.

Mr. Campney: I should not think he would be. Under those circumstances, I think the junior would be exonerated. He cannot be held responsible for something he cannot prevent, and he certainly could not be said to have permitted it to take place.

Mr. Pallett: As a hypothetical question, supposing there is a sergeant in charge of the vehicle and an officer comes down insisting on a vehicle, what happens then?

Mr. Campney: I think the general procedure would obtain that, if the sergeant received an order from an officer, prima facie he has to carry it out. I do not think this would be any different from any other circumstances.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Then is the minister saying that, if the person senior in rank to the person who had been placed in charge of the vehicle takes the vehicle on his authority, he then is the person who becomes in charge of that vehicle and the only one who can be charged under that section?

Mr. Campney: That would certainly be my understanding.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): In regard to this clause I notice too that the wording of subclause (b) does not conform exactly with the wording of the Criminal Code, section 223. The Criminal Code says:

. . . drives a motor vehicle or has the care or control of a motor vehicle . . .

Whereas the clause here says:

. . . drives or attempts to drive such a vehicle . .

We have had numerous cases under the Criminal Code where convictions have taken place, where the accused had been under the influence and had been simply sitting in the vehicle. Is this change in the wording going to make it better for the accused and perhaps give some leeway in his defence or perhaps make it more stringent for him?

Mr. Campney: I presume the hon. member has looked also at subclause 2 of the amending clause, which must also be read in this connection. The change to which he refers is from the words "care or control" to "drives or attempts to drive." In many cases the care or control of the vehicle would be vested in the senior officer in the vehicle. It was changed to make it tie in with military conditions.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Then in this particular case, if I might pursue it, reading subclause 2, it has even removed one of the possible defences available to the accused under the Criminal Code. In this particular case it is established that if he is sitting in this particular seat he in fact is considered to have attempted to drive such a vehicle and must assume the burden of proving otherwise. Is that not a greater burden than is presented under the section of the Criminal Code and the ordinary rules of evidence?

Mr. Campney: I should not think that is correct, because in the Criminal Code the words used are "care or control." That is a rebuttable presumption in the Criminal Code; and it is also in this subclause 2 a rebuttable presumption that he entered the vehicle in order to drive it. I do not see that there is very much difference in the implications except that in the Criminal Code the words used throughout those sections are "care or control" and in this clause the words used are "drives or attempts to drive."

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Perhaps I may be splitting hairs on this, but suppose a person who does not own a car at all and might be considered by some people under the influence gets in the car and sits there. Under the Criminal Code it would be the obligation of the crown to prove that that person either drove the car or had the care or control of the car. The obligation would be on the crown to prove that. Under this clause if the same circumstances took place, the burden of proof —and I think ordinarily we are very jealous of these particular rules of evidence—under our Criminal Code would shift over, and it would be on the accused to prove that he did not have the care or did not attempt to drive, as the case may be.

Mr. Campney: I think the hon. member is in error, because the same presumption arises in each case. Section 224 of the Criminal Code, subsection 2, reads as follows:

For the purpose of sections 222 and 223, where a person occupies the seat ordinarily occupied by the driver of a motor vehicle he shall be deemed to have the care or control of the vehicle unless he establishes that he did not enter or mount the vehicle for the purpose of setting it in motion.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): That would appear to answer it.

Mr. Campney: The same presumption exists here. The crown does not have to prove anything under this section of the Criminal Code; neither does the prosecutor under the proposed amendment.

Mr. McIvor: I should like to ask the minister a question. I had a case some years ago of a lady who was hit by an army truck and the driver was guilty of breaking the law. She could only get a box of chocolates from the army surgeon. There was no way that she could collect, and I must say that I did my best. Is there anything in this provision that will afford protection in a case like that? She had a good position as a dressmaker and had to go to the hospital. She got a box of chocolates but she sent it back.

Mr. Campney: I am afraid that on the meagre facts adduced I could not very well express an opinion.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 10—Appointment of commissioner.

Mr. Carrick: Mr. Chairman, I am wondering what reason the minister may have for thinking that he will be able to get evidence taken on commission from a witness in a foreign country where that witness is reluctant to appear voluntarily before a court martial.

Mr. Campney: I can think of one or two cases which might arise. For example, a man some distance from the place where the trial is taking place might be unwilling to leave his business to attend the trial whereas he might be quite willing to give evidence if someone duly authorized would come and take it. There are a number of other instances, I am sure, if I could think of them at the moment, where that would obtain. It is just an attempt to try to increase the likelihood that all the evidence in any of these cases will be brought in in one way or another, acceptable in law, of course. We hope that it may prove useful in cases such as I have mentioned and others that may occur to hon. members. It is probably not going to be effective in a great many cases but it could be helpful.

Mr. Jones: Paragraph (a) refers to the securing of evidence for both the prosecution and the accused. It ends by saying:

> . . . or that the attendance of a witness for the accused person is not readily obtainable—

And so on. But paragraph (b) only takes care of the prosecution. There is no provision made for the taking of the evidence of a witness for the accused when the witness is outside of Canada. I think the accused should be treated in the same way as the prosecution. I do not know whether it is an omission. You cover it in paragraph (a) but you do not in paragraph (b), and I think the accused should be protected.

Mr. Campney: Well, it seems to me that the defendant is protected in any case.

Mr. Jones: In paragraph (a), yes, but if you read paragraph (b) there is no mention made of the taking of the evidence of a witness for the accused who is outside of Canada.

Mr. Campney: I am not just sure that I understand the hon. member's question clearly, but all this clause does is to extend the mechanics or the method or the possibility of obtaining evidence for the prosecution. The defendant has the widest possible latitude and evidence can be taken where it is not readily obtainable at the trial for any reason.

Mr. Jones: Where the serviceman is outside of Canada and more or less at the mercy of the service he should be protected in the same way as the prosecution, and apparently he does not have the same power to call witnesses according to this provision.

Mr. Campney: Frankly, it seems to me that he is more fully protected.

Mr. Carrick: May I ask the minister if he considers paragraph (a) of subclause 1 applicable to courts martial outside of Canada so that the provision where the attendance of a witness for the accused person is not readily obtainable for any reason would apply?

Mr. Campney: Yes, paragraph (a) is applicable outside of Canada.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): There must be some reason for the additional words, "under the law of that place there is no provision for compulsory attendance" in paragraph (b) when they are not in (a). I would feel that the observation that the wording should be extended to include the accused person is probably right. It is an additional reason over and above that stated in paragraph (a).

Mr. Campney: The general principle underlying these amendments is that we give the widest possible latitude to the defence under any possible circumstances to call evidence. The rights of the prosecution are more limited, and this is an attempt to extend it slightly.

Mr. Pearkes: But why is it necessary then to add the words in paragraph (a), "or that the attendance of a witness for the accused person is not readily obtainable for any reason"? If it is necessary to include them in paragraph (a), surely it is desirable to add them to paragraph (b).

Mr. Jones: I think paragraph (b) could read, "that the attendance of a witness for the prosecution or the accused". I think it is only just.

Mr. Campney: I might put it another way. The intention of the amendments in this clause is to give the accused the widest possible latitude to call his witnesses and to keep the prosecution within reasonable limits. In other words, the section is in favour of the accused.

Mr. Jones: No, the section is in favour of the prosecution. It is going to enable them to secure further evidence and that is not necessarily so as far as the accused is concerned. I think that is quite clear.

Mr. Dickey: No, that is not clear at all. Paragraph (a) says that the judge advocate general or such other person as he may appoint for that purpose may appoint an officer or other qualified person as a commissioner to take the evidence of a witness under oath if the attendance of that witness for the accused person is not readily obtainable for any reason. That is complete. But paragraph (b) limits the authority of the judge advocate general with respect to appointing a commissioner to take the evidence of a witness for the prosecution to instances outside of Canada where the attendance of that witness cannot be forced by the provisions of the law of that country for compulsory attendance. In other words, it is only operative where there is no law in that country under which the prosecutor can go and enforce the attendance of the witness. That is not being required of the accused. That is all.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I think there is a fair amount of reason to the observation of the senior member for Halifax, but in connection with paragraph (b) is it the practice of the department always to extend to the accused's officer counsel the opportunity to attend upon an examination by a commission for the purpose of cross-examination? I think that would be a very important item to consider in connection with paragraph (b).

Mr. Campney: Yes, it is always the practice to have the representative of the accused present. In fact, it is required by the act itself, section 155, subsection 4.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 11 agreed to.

On clause 12.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Perhaps I should reword this question. This addition does not in itself indicate that tolls or charges will be paid. It simply says that the treasury board may authorize payment of duties and tolls in respect of such use. Is it the intention that tolls and charges of the kind mentioned here in the explanation will be paid from now on?

Mr. Campney: The hon. member is talking about clause 13.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I am sorry.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Can the minister tell us why subsection (2) of section 178 is now being repealed? Is there some difference now?

Mr. Campney: No. It is just being re-enacted in order that it may fit into the proper place in the act.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I understand.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 13—Duties or tolls on roads, bridges, etc.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): May I have an answer now to the question I just asked?

Mr. Campney: The section as it stands in the act is a complete bar to the payment of tolls, in the circumstances set out in the section, by the Department of National Defence, on bridges and highways, over canals and so on. But certain circumstances have arisen in a number of places which make it desirable that under these circumstances we should be required or might reasonably be required in the department to pay tolls. It is not an automatic abrogation of the section. It is merely putting a rider into the section to permit—where treasury board thinks the facts warrant it—the payment of tolls by the department.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): How will that work out? We can envisage an army convoy coming to a toll bridge. What is the procedure going to be as far as the payment of tolls for the whole convoy is concerned? Have there been any problems in the past in connection with manoeuvres, where convoys have been stopped and payment has been charged or attempted to be charged?

Mr. Campney: The bridges and other facilities which we shall have to deal with will necessitate making agreements in relation to convoys and so on, as the hon. member implies. But the section is worded in that way purposely so that where the circumstances arise—there are not very many toll bridges in the country—or where the question does arise treasury board in fact may be the judges as to what sort of arrangement should be made what payment will be permitted and so on. In other words, it is a purely permissive addition to the clause.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Instead of causing great confusion in army convoys, may I suggest to the minister that he might use his influence with the Minister of Finance and see whether he could not get a little bit more help for the municipalities. Then he would not have to pay any tolls over their bridges.

Mr. Pearkes: A much bigger problem arises in connection with Her Majesty's ships tying up at wharves. In the past I believe Her Majesty's ships have paid no wharfage when they have tied up at any pier in a harbour. Is it now the intention to reimburse municipalities where there are wharves other than government wharves? Suppose a naval vessel ties up at, shall we say, a C.P.R. wharf. Is it now the intention to pay the C.P.R. wharfage?

Mr. Campney: It would depend upon the circumstances. I may say that so far as I know that particular phase of the question has not arisen. At any rate, it has not been brought to my attention.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to ask the minister whether this section would make it possible for provinces or councils or municipalities to be compensated for damage to highways or roads or bridges caused by heavy army vehicles and that kind of equipment?

Mr. Campney: No.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Can the minister tell us what sort of circumstances they would be that would make it proper to pay in one instance and not in another? I must confess that I find that matter difficult to understand.

Mr. Campney: In some cases the federal government has contributed substantially to the cost of a bridge and has made agreements exempting all departments from tolls. We have one case where a municipality purchased at the going rate and paid a substantial sum to the department for some of the land for part of the abutment to a bridge, and paid cash. There are two different sets of circumstances. In one there is a contractual freedom from tolls because it was part of the deal. In the other case the government contributed nothing; in fact, it profited by the transaction. I think of at least those two instances at the moment. I do not think they can be treated in the same way.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Would not the fact of the existence of contractual agreement exempt the government from paying without this amendment at all?

Mr. Campney: Oh, yes.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): You do not need this amendment to cover that feature. What are the other circumstances?

Mr. Campney: We need this amendment only where circumstances make it seem that we should pay.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): You have not yet told us what circumstances they might be.

Mr. Campney: I am instancing a case in point where a bridge has been constructed and where in the construction of the bridge we—the government—did not contribute anything; and where we sold a piece of land at a reasonable price and received the money for it. In that case the municipality says, "You should pay tolls; we have bought your land and paid you for it and we have no agreement with you". In each case it is a matter of making out a case that we should pay. It is only in cases of that nature where this amendment would have effect.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): How many such cases are there and where are those cases situated?

Mr. Campney: The question arose in the first instance in connection with the Halifax-Dartmouth bridge. The only other bridges that I know of, other than international bridges, are the Lions Gate bridge in Vancouver; the Victoria bridge in Montreal; the Jacques Cartier bridge in Montreal and the Canso causeway. I think those are about the only ones that I am aware of.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall this bill be read a third time?

Mr. Pearkes: Next sitting of the house.

Mr. Speaker: Next sitting of the house.

INCOME TAX ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING ASSESSMENTS, BOOKS AND RECORDS, ETC.

The house resumed, from Tuesday, April 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fulton for the second reading of Bill No. 52, to amend the Income Tax Act.

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the debate was adjourned on April 24 by the hon. member for Middlesex East (Mr. White). Does he intend to continue?

I wish to make a few remarks with reference to the argument put up by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) and the hon. member for Middlesex East. In the debate the hon. member for Kamloops dealt at some length with the principles which he considered were involved. However, the argument of the hon. member for Middlesex East was mostly along the line of particular cases. I think the particular cases could, with all reasonableness, be dealt with when the estimates of the department come before the house. I may say that the estimates of the Department of National Revenue, taxation division, have already been before the select committee, and most of the principles and a lot of the details were dealt with in that committee. If those who are interested would follow the report of the proceedings that took place there probably they could get answers to most of the questions of the type that had been raised both when this bill was before the house and by hon. members on different occasions.

What I want to say is there can be no doubt at all that it is highly desirable—and the department agrees with this—that every taxpayer in the country should be able to settle and determine with finality the amount of his liability for income tax as quickly as it is practically possible. The government has accepted in principle the idea that there should be a point beyond which the crown cannot go back and change an assessment unless the taxpayer was guilty of fraud or misrepresentation. With this in mind, the six-year limitation was introduced in the income tax in 1944. Since that time progress has been made in getting the work of the taxation division more up to date and the Minister of Finance, who perhaps may have something to say in the course of this debate, has considered the possibility of shortening the six-year term; that is under consideration. Whether the three-year limit proposed in this bill is suitable or not, it is not a limitation that we can accept at this time until further studies have been made.

Mention has been made here of the fact that very considerable progress has been made in getting the work of the taxation division up to date. Ten years ago, or 12 years ago, from 1945 on, there was a great backlog of work which had to be done. That backlog was the accumulation of unassessed returns, because of the fact that during the war years a great number of our staff had been diverted into private enterprise and it became increasingly hard to recruit people to do the work. At that time I remember we had somewhere between 11,000 and 12,000 employees in the central office here, in what we call the head office, and in the 28 divisions which we have throughout the country. I am very happy to say that that backlog of work has been cleaned up and we are now on a current basis. The same amount of work, or considerably more work, is now being done with 6,000 to 7,000 employees that was formerly done by 11,000 or more.

From the consideration of the precise period of time, three years, which has been suggested, I should like to turn briefly to the technical aspects of the bill. The bill recognizes the possibility of conflict with section 42 of the act. Section 42 has to do with assessments averaging for farmers and fishermen. Therefore, if the investigation were only a three-year period there would be a conflict in that averaging which is given to farmers and fishermen.

It should be noted that section 43 operates in much the same way as section 42. It is immediately apparent that the operation of sections 53, 64 and 80 might be seriously affected. Further study will no doubt reveal other provisions that would require some changes. This is not the kind of thing we should rush into without first deciding what to do about those other provisions, some of which have been inserted for alleviation of the tax burden.

Let me deal with the technical aspects of the bill. I suggest it does not say what the hon. member for Kamloops has in mind. In line 18 we find the words:

> Such assessment shall be deemed to be final.

In lines 21 and 22 we find the words:

> Such assessment shall not thereafter be subject to be re-opened or varied.

The words "such assessments" refer back only to the original assessment mentioned earlier in the section. No account is taken of the possibility that there may already have been a subsequent assessment that varied the original assessment. Furthermore, this language is much stronger than that found in section 46, and it appears to be in conflict with subsection 7 of that section, which provides for the assessment being varied as the result of an objection or an appeal.

I feel sure the sponsor of this bill did not intend that court decisions must be reached within three years. I only point this out as one of the technical oversights that makes the bill somewhat objectionable. More serious objection to be found with the substance of the bill is the manner in which it would hamper investigation. As I read it, it specifically provides that the taxation division cannot investigate returns more than three years old unless fraud is alleged in respect of that particular year. To allege fraud or wilful misrepresentation is a very serious matter. It is not something that can be done before investigation starts. Though the officials investigating might have very good reason for thinking some income has been omitted from a taxpayer's return, or that income has been incorrectly calculated, or even though they may suspect fraud, I assure the house it is not their practice to allege fraud before seeking substantial corroborative evidence. Even where fraud has been proven in a current year I would hesitate to ask anyone to allege fraud in a previous year before it had been possible to investigate those previous years. Yet this is what the bill appears to require.

Early in 1955 a case was completed in a certain city in Canada involving a group of individuals and corporations engaged in a certain type of business. The corporations and the individuals were convicted of evading more than $600,000 of taxes, with charges laid for each of the years 1942 to 1952. This investigation was started in 1952. Careful and thorough planning was necessary to ensure that evidence would be available. This was particularly true because immediately prior to starting the investigation reassessments involving additional taxes of only a few hundred dollars were made, based on the books and records made available by the corporations and the individuals concerned. Does the house wish to circumscribe and hinder investigations which have produced and will continue to produce such results?

I do not think this matter of investigation should be left without pointing out to the house that in fraud cases much of the information is obtained from sources other than the taxpayer's own books and records. The right to inquire from or require information from persons applies to "any person" and not just the person being investigated. The proposed bill would make it impossible to get information, in many cases, from suppliers, customers and banks without advising those parties that the department has alleged fraud. It is bad enough, indeed, to tell the taxpayer at an early stage of the investigation that the department is alleging fraud, but surely it is highly undesirable, to say the least, to insert provisions that would spread the knowledge that the department has alleged fraud or wilful misrepresentation to many of the taxpayer's business associates. His name would be blackened before the matter was brought before the courts.

I am not suggesting, Mr. Speaker, that the author of this bill had any intention of giving any protection or assistance to anyone who is deliberately evading taxes. I am quite sure that he had not. However, I feel sure that after close scrutiny of the provisions before us the house will agree that something more than the words before us is necessary and that we should take a cautious approach to this subject.

Mr. Speaker, I repeat I am not averse to a further limitation of the powers to reassess, having regard to all the considerations this house had when the present six-year limitation was introduced, and I may say the matter was considered before the present income tax bill was brought down. To my knowledge, however, the change has not been made but I am going to let the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) give the reasons for that. The ramifications of the effects of this bill, in some cases adverse to taxpayers, have not been fully studied in its drafting. I accordingly must oppose the bill at this time in its present form.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I am going to be very brief indeed; I have not the capacity this afternoon to talk for more than about three minutes.

We commend the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) for his diligence and attention to this problem. I am quite sure he has brought it forward because he realizes it is a matter of serious concern to a large number of Canadians. Hon. members in this group have received similar complaints and have had similar suggestions made for some amendment to the present form of assessment going back for a number of years.

While we feel the bill would possibly not achieve all the hon. member aims to achieve at this time—and I listened with great interest to the minister's remarks—and although possibly it has some minor defects, nevertheless we in this group intend to support the bill, Mr. Speaker. We give our support to the purpose of the hon. member for Kamloops in bringing this matter before the house and introducing this bill. That purpose is one we heartily agree with. It is to provide justice for all Canadian taxpayers and a system of income tax administration that will receive the unqualified support of the majority of fair-minded citizens.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I too shall be very brief because my colleague the Minister of National Revenue has placed before the house the reasons why we feel obliged to oppose this bill. Nevertheless I think I should add something he probably could not say, and that is that one ought to consider the remarks made just this moment by the hon. member for Kootenay East.

Mr. Herridge: Kootenay West.

Mr. Harris: Kootenay West; I beg your pardon.

Mr. Herridge: There is some distinction.

Mr. Harris: We must consider what in fact is justice to the taxpayers of Canada. I am not going to argue anything at all except this. The payment of taxes is the greatest form of justice that can be exercised to the taxpayers of Canada. A government must be in a position to collect taxes equally and fairly from those who should pay them. It may very well happen that with a staff which, while not limited in numbers, nevertheless is not increased particularly at any given time, that a government collecting agency would fall behind in normal work in collecting taxes. It also means that the person who inadvertently, as well as the person who deliberately, avoids the payment of taxes may not possibly be reached in the ordinary way without the passage of some time.

I think we all agree on this, that if we are going to exempt people from taxation because they have not been assessed by a particular period of time, it must be on the assumption that first of all we can afford not to have those taxes and secondly that we should place in the hands of the government every facility to have assessed that person and collected the taxes by that particular time.

Now, that is the issue at this particular moment. My hon. friend says he wants to limit the amount of time within which the government can collect taxes, except on certain conditions, from the Canadian taxpayers as a whole. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) has indicated that in the normal course of events it is likely that people will not be assessed until a certain time has elapsed. I am in the position as the Minister of Finance of having to say to my colleague that if that is the case it will be necessary then for me to give that department at the expense of the Canadian taxpayer additional people, additional inspectors, additional assessors, in order that we can be sure the three or four million people who pay taxes in this country can in fact be assessed within a given time.

Now then, in addition to that, we are going to say to the Minister of National Revenue that if in the course of his investigations he finds that Mr. A has not paid his taxes when he should have and if he finds this perchance by some other means—not by just going to his house—he is not entitled to use that information if a certain time has run by unless, as I understand the bill, he can prove that the individual deliberately and fraudulently avoided the payment of taxes.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, there is bound to be a period of time after which you will not do this. We have always thought the six years was a reasonable length of time. As far as I am concerned, I quite understand the vexation that may be attendant upon a person who thinks he has and who has in fact settled his accounts and then finds at a later time that he has not. On the other hand, I am conscious of the fact that six years is not in my view too long generally for this kind of work to be done under present circumstances and that if you abridge the time—at least if you abridge it as substantially as the present bill suggests—you are undoubtedly going to place the government of Canada in a position—I am not going to say of doubling the number of people employed for this purpose—of substantially increasing it or of asking me to admit in the house that it will be impossible to collect all the taxes that ought to be paid by citizens who want to pay their taxes and those who try to avoid so doing.

Under those circumstances, sir, we gave consideration last year—I might say before the budget was presented—to this problem and we gave consideration to it again this year and we could not come to the conclusion that we should abridge the time at the present moment without the possibility that we would be deprived of a considerable sum of money which we think we are entitled to in fairness to all the Canadian taxpayers who are paying their taxes. It may be possible that the time could be abridged less than what the hon. member for Kamloops has in mind. I quite agree that we would remove some of the vexatious difficulties if we did that, but I am not satisfied yet, and I accept the responsibility for the decision, not my colleague the Minister of National Revenue, that at this moment we cannot accept the bill. All I can say is that we have made progress in the two discussions we have had last year and this year in examining the whole problem to see if we could not cut down the six years. Therefore in the meantime I propose to oppose the bill for that reason, and that reason alone.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, when the minister was speaking I was wondering whether what he told us implies that the department has been gradually falling behind in this work.

Mr. Harris: No.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): If not, it would appear to me that the question he raised of having to appoint more staff is not as serious as one might perhaps think. It merely means that there is not a large enough staff to review these cases within the set time. I would suggest that we should have more information as to how many extra staff will be required before we are asked to accept that explanation. Surely once that backlog is caught up with, and there must be a backlog, it should be possible, if you are not falling behind with your present staff, to do this work in three years instead of six years. If it is taking six years you must be falling behind at some point.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I think this bill is a good one. Many cases have been brought to my attention in the past few years of farmers who thought they had paid their taxes in full and then one day receiving a notice that an inspector would be in the district and they were to appear before him with their records for the past six years. In many cases they had not those records as many of them had been destroyed and consequently a net worth statement had to be filled out in which arbitrary figures were used. I am satisfied that in many cases the farmer had to pay additional taxes which should not have been paid simply because some records had been lost and arbitrary figures were used in filling out the net worth statement. I admit that there are certain difficulties, but I think that is the responsibility of the department. I do not think farmers should be penalized as a result of the government not having sufficient inspectors to do this work more efficiently.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) said at the beginning of his remarks that the department was considering the possibility of reducing the time available for reopening assessments—the minister would not agree with the three-year limit suggested in my bill as he said he had not made up his mind as to what shorter period would be appropriate—I was inclined to say to myself that it might be appropriate to defer asking for a decision on the bill. However, when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) rose he used words which seemed to suggest to me that in his view he was not prepared to admit that six years was too long. In fact I think those were the words he used, that he was not prepared to admit that the six-year period was too long. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am in the position of having had my hopes raised by the Minister of National Revenue and then having them dashed by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Harris: Would the hon. member permit an interjection? I do not think that I said that at the moment I was prepared to admit that, but we have been considering whether or not the time could be abridged.

Mr. Fulton: The minister has modified somewhat my impression of what he said earlier, but I think it will be found on Hansard that he did say something very much to the effect that he was not prepared as yet to admit that six years was too long, that in fact it could be reduced below six years. It seems to me that the only thing to do is to call for a decision on the bill and the principle involved in the bill.

The principle involved in the bill is that there should be a limitation of three years after the date of a final assessment within which the department must reopen an assessment unless it alleges fraud or wilful misrepresentation, and that after a three-year period from the date of the final assessment the assessment will become not subject to reopening or review unless, as I say, there is then an allegation of fraud or wilful misrepresentation.

The Minister of National Revenue said that there was some possible conflict with sections 43, 53, 64 and 80 of the act. I do not pretend to be an expert draftsman but in the short time available to me I have looked at the act and I cannot see that there is any irreconcilable conflict. I believe that by and large those sections have to do with averaging and they would prevail if there were no conflict. The bill expressly preserves the right of averaging given in section 42 and therefore I cannot see that there would be any conflict which would work to the detriment of the taxpayer as between the new clauses set out in this bill and the sections of the act mentioned by the minister.

I was interested in his criticism of the proposed amendment. The minister referred to the words in paragraph (b) (i) as follows:

> Such assessment shall not thereafter be subject to be re-opened or varied.

The bill does not take account of the possibility of a reassessment having been made after the first assessment but within a three-year period. I would refer the minister to the provisions of subclause (b) of the proposed new clause 4, which reads:

> After the expiry of 3 years from the day of the original assessment, and subject only to the provisions of subparagraph (i) of paragraph (a) of this subsection,— Subparagraph (i) of paragraph (a) gives the minister the right to insist on an investigation in the event of wilful misrepresentation or fraud at any time after three years, notwithstanding whether reassessments have been made or not. That situation is protected by the use of the words "subject only to the provisions of subparagraph (i) of paragraph (a)".

Then the minister said that the language with respect to the final nature of the assessment was stronger than the language of the present section 46 in that it would now be necessary for the department to allege fraud or wilful misrepresentation if it wanted to reopen after three years. That result does follow from the language of my bill and it is a result which I deliberately sought to accomplish in wording the bill. Let me point out in answer to the many objections raised by the two ministers that if the three-year limit from the original assessment was adapted it would still give the department virtually four years to carry out its investigations.

The original assessment, whilst it is provided in section 46 that it must be made with all due dispatch, is nevertheless not made usually for some months and in some cases going on for a year after the filing of the return. By the proposed bill there is a further three-year period from that time, within which they may carry on investigations, so that in effect they are given from 3½ to 4 years to carry on investigations and make reassessments if there is found to be any irregularity. That should be, in my submission, ample time, so that one is justified in providing that, after that time has expired, then the assessment can be reopened or varied only if the department is prepared to allege fraud or deliberate misrepresentation.

In my view, as I said in introducing the bill, and I repeat now, I am not seeking to protect the dishonest or fraudulent taxpayer. The necessity of the allegation of fraud or misrepresentation after there has been plenty of time to make an investigation, that is, 3½ to 4 years, would have a rather wholesome effect in that it would discourage the making of investigations which in many instances at the present time smack almost of persecution. I know it would be a serious allegation and I think it would give the department second thought before it instituted an investigation if it had to allege fraud or misrepresentation. I am not at all uncertain—in fact I am satisfied—that that would not be an unhealthy situation, because on the basis of the evidence now available it is our view that there are too many investigations too carelessly undertaken after the lapse of six or seven years, when the taxpayer has no possibility of producing the evidence that is required and, simply because he cannot prove his innocence, all the cards are in the hands of the department, and the innocent taxpayer is presumed to be guilty.

Sir, it is to correct that situation that I introduce the bill. Nothing said by the two ministers this afternoon has led me to believe that the principle should not be accepted, and I therefore recommend it for the verdict of the house.

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES, ISSUE OF SECURITIES, ETC.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 415, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways System during the calendar year 1956, and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, is the Minister of Finance going to conduct the bill at this stage, or is his assistant?

Mr. Harris: Well, Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to say anything at this stage. I thought we covered the main points yesterday and my parliamentary assistant felt the same.

Mr. John B. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take long tonight in connection with the second reading of this bill since I spoke only yesterday at the resolution stage. I think however I might refer again to the fact that this bill, which provides for the money to be available for the Canadian National Railways for capital expenditures during the current year, and also covers a sufficient amount to take care of the same type of expenditure for Trans-Canada Airlines, is the usual type of bill. But at the same time it seems to me we might seriously devote a little more attention to the problem of the railway's financing, because if we do not look at these expenditures as we go along it may be possible the formula which was put into effect in 1952 covering the capital outstanding at that time might again be placed in jeopardy.

The president of the railway was very fair in giving the sessional committee on railways and shipping the benefit of his experience in connection with these financing problems. I think it is well to remember that Mr. Gordon is a man with a vast banking and financial background. I think he has brought to the railway that wide experience, and we should pay considerable attention to what he says in connection with the financial position of the railway.

I would like to read to you, if I may, some of Mr. Gordon's words as reported at page 261 of the minutes of the committee dealing with the very crucial problem concerning the ability of the railway to continue to carry the carrying charges on the outstanding capital and at the same time to meet its operating expenses. This is what Mr. Gordon said:

> But two questions have to be met. One is that this apparently satisfactory result has been due in large measure to the high returns which we obtained from our capital expenditure on the dieselization program. In the early stages of dieselization those savings were at their maximum because we deliberately selected those services which would give us the biggest return. We have now entered upon the stage where though the whole program is still based on economic considerations the amount of return will be subject to the law of diminishing returns. I can say therefore that we are just at the point of having to worry about our ability to keep ourselves in that position, and one of the most difficult problems confronting the Canadian National management is to ensure that the economic benefits which are scheduled to accrue in connection with this capital expenditure—

I might say that is the capital expenditure we are talking about voting here tonight.

> —are not diverted into meeting steadily increasing current costs, the most important of which are wages and materials. If we find that the savings which we get from these capital expenditures have to be used to meet rising current costs they will not be available to prove the point I am making. If we cannot increase current revenues and get them adjusted to offset the effect of current cost increases the net result would be a growing inability to provide any return whatever on our equity investment and make it increasingly difficult to service the outstanding debt out of our earnings.

And then on the next page, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Gordon referred to the fact that the amount of money which was being spent was on expenditures which he deemed prudent.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Page 262. This is what Mr. Gordon said:

> Up to this moment I can defend all this expenditure as being prudent expenditure earning its keep, and if we can maintain our current costs in proper relation to current revenues this property will stand on its own feet and it will be able to show a profit though perhaps never to the point where we shall fully service our equity capital to the extent it should be—but at least providing a reasonable return on equity capital.

This is getting back to the position I discussed very briefly yesterday. Capital expenditures themselves require a certain fixed sum to be made annually by the railway to meet the carrying charges on the same. The president of the railway has said that these are prudent expenditures. The expenditure of these moneys will show a return sufficient to carry the outlay made, but if the railway finds itself in the position, in connection with its current operations, where it has to cut down to the point where it cannot make sufficient money to take care of that fixed amount, then of course we are going to find ourselves back in the same position we were in several years ago when the government had to put up the money to meet the carrying charges on the guaranteed bonds.

I suggest, sir, that perhaps we have to take a different outlook in this connection. Perhaps we will have to arrive at a new formula. If these expenditures are prudent, as the management of the railway believes they are, then there is a fixed amount which must be set aside as the amount which must be earned annually out of those prudent expenditures to take care of the carrying charges on them.

If it is apparent in the other half of the formula that the current revenues are not in a position to do that job and meet the current operating expenses, then I think we have reached a stage where the railway must be given more freedom in order to carry out its operations. It must not be left in the position where it is always between the squeeze on the one hand of keeping certain of its expenditures down, the squeeze of keeping its charges down, and at the other extreme facing the annual demand for increasing wages.

As I said previously, I do not think labour is very happy with this situation because they feel there has been placed on top of the whole operation a blanket type of control, and when they move into negotiations they are not moving into unfettered negotiations and there is a ceiling put on their aspirations. They are not going to be happy, I believe, until they see management in a position to meet their legitimate demands and at the same time plot the course for the railway without a continual reference year after year to a board of some kind to see exactly where they stand.

I am not suggesting tonight the board has to be removed. I simply say that we should be plotting a course to put in management's hands more of the ability to meet every-day competition and to plot its own future without being hamstrung at every turn.

In connection with this situation I think it is advisable for us to move along that line in any case. It seems to me, once we have determined that there should be an operation of a company by the public and once we have provided for the public corporation to do the job, it is our duty to see that the company has the tools with which to carry out the job.

I think one of the things we should be making a point of is that we do not snipe continually year after year at some type of operation such as this. We should give them the tools to do the job and as long as they are not coming back and calling on us to meet recurring types of operating deficits—they have some excuse if they do not have the freedom they need—but as long as they are not doing that, I do not think we should be bothering them at every turn in connection with their policies.

In connection with this legislation I notice that Trans-Canada Air Lines is mentioned. It seems to me that we are moving to the point where even with government corporations there can be a conflict of interests and I submit that these two corporations should be separated. As far as I can see there seems to be no particular reason why the capital expenditures of Trans-Canada Air Lines should be intermingled with legislation dealing with Canadian National Railways.

As a matter of fact, I am a little confused as to who is responsible for this type of legislation. I notice that questions having to do with Canadian National Railways are answered by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler), but when legislation deals with the financing of Canadian National Railways it is handled by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris), and then when Trans-Canada Air Lines enters the picture the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) squeezes in. There is certainly confusion in connection with this type of legislation and I think it is time that the two corporations should be separated before a real conflict of interests arises.

I might suggest also that it is about time the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who has a big pipe-line job on his hands, should divest himself of T.C.A. and let it come back where it should be, to the Minister of Transport. The minister has several jobs and it might be a good thing if he were to divest himself of eight or nine of them. Then perhaps the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) might resign six months earlier and let the minister finish his career as Prime Minister, a job which he seems to be carrying out anyway.

Mr. McIvor: May I ask the hon. member a question. Has the Minister of Trade and Commerce not made a success of anything he has taken hold of? Why quit it?

Mr. Fleming: Like wrecking parliament. He made a great success of operating the steamroller.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I am suggesting that we might let him be Prime Minister for six months, which should be an adequate reward for any service he has rendered.

I notice that we are carrying on the same process of guaranteeing the bonds of this corporation. I should like to see a hands-off attitude adopted toward the corporation so it might be in position to carry out its job properly without interference. I wonder if it has ever been suggested that future issues of the securities of this corporation be made without a government guarantee. Perhaps the government guarantee goes with the securities of any government corporation—I am not sure of that—but I am thinking specifically of the requests which are made at various times for the construction of branch lines in different parts of the country. There seems to be a need for these branch lines which is brought out in the committee and it is indicated that they are likely to be a good business proposition. Instead of lumping all the securities together, as we do today, would it not be possible at some stage to say, "Here is a good business proposition; this community needs this line and the evidence is that it can make money; we are prepared to go ahead with this and issue debentures, mortgage bonds or whatever is necessary to put out and let it stand on its own; let us see if we cannot make new financing as we go along possible without this over-all guarantee".

I mentioned this in the examination of Mr. Fairweather, the vice-president, and he indicated that it had never been contemplated. The thing that worried me was that it had never been contemplated as far as the bookkeeping system was concerned. As I understand it, it is impossible to bring figures to indicate that any particular segment of the line is a paying proposition while another segment is losing money because everything is lumped together. He could not say, "This particular area pays and it would be a good investment, while another area does or does not pay. It seems to me that these are things we should think about annually in connection with this legislation, because I understand it comes before this house each year.

We heard complaints today, in connection with the previous bill, that it had been placed in our hands just before we came into the house. The Minister of Finance was quite right in saying that he indicated yesterday that if the notice proved to be too short he was quite prepared to allow the legislation to stand over. I remember distinctly his having said that. He mentioned also something about the bill having to have a date on it, and I understood it was difficult to have it printed with the date on it and distributed in time for consideration. If that is the case, I would make the suggestion that bills such as this one and the one we had earlier should be circulated in draft form without a date and then there would be no question of our having to come to the house with only one or two days' notice.

Mr. Benidickson: A date plus a consecutive number.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): That does not change my suggestion that if the bills were distributed in draft form we could have them much earlier. In this particular instance, with the pipe line debate intervening, we could have had a draft bill several months ago and really studied it before we were asked to discuss the various clauses.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, there is just a brief word I should like to say about the form of this bill. There are many matters in relation to the Canadian National Railways in which I am interested, but they are not covered particularly by this bill and I shall not try to drag them in by their heels.

There is something about the form of this bill which reminds me of the other bill we had this afternoon; that is, it combines subject matters which for many years were dealt with in two separate bills. I must not break the rule by referring to the clauses but there is no law against Your Honour looking at the bill which you have in your hand and noticing that the last clause deals with a subject matter which for many years was covered by a completely separate bill.

As I say, this afternoon we had a bill which amended two different acts of the parliament of Canada. I wonder sometimes just how far this practice can be carried. I recognize that it is much more convenient for the government to reduce the number of bills it has to bring before parliament. If it could go on combining bills into one it might do something about the length of the session and something about the problems which this government has in facing parliament.

Frankly I see no reason why the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney) should be allowed to put all of his bills for the session into one bill; I see no reason why the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) should be permitted to put in one bill what used to be in one bill introduced by the Minister of Finance and in another bill introduced by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler), unless the same privilege is to be extended to the other ministers. I certainly hope it will not be done, for I checked and discovered that so far this session the Minister of Transport has presented five different bills, the Minister of Finance has presented six or seven different bills, the Minister of Public Works has given us three, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce has given us at least three bills. So I might go on with the rest of the ministers.

The excuse given this afternoon by the Minister of National Defence was that it was a matter of convenience to have all the national defence legislation for a year in one bill. I am sure, too, it is a matter of convenience to the Minister of Finance to be able to do this, but I suggest that if that can be done there is nothing to stop each minister in the cabinet from putting all his legislation for the year into one bill and saying, "This is my department's legislation for the year." Maybe it is carrying it to the point of absurdity, but we have seen this government do absurd things, to say that after a few years of that kind of practice the Prime Minister might bring before us one bill containing all the legislation for the session.

Mr. McIvor: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: My hon. friend from Fort William says "hear, hear." I have no doubt that would be a pleasant way for him, as far as the business of parliament is concerned, but I am sure it is hardly the way to do things. I recognize that it may be argued by the Minister of Finance that this provision for the appointment of auditors which is contained in this bill is relevant to the affairs of the Canadian National Railways. I reply that it is not covered in the title of the bill. Previously, when we had a separate bill for the appointment of auditors for the national railways, that separate bill was so identified. But I suggest in all seriousness that the argument of convenience which was given to us this afternoon by the Minister of National Defence for putting all his bills into one, and now the practice that is developing in this case of combining two bills into one, is a course that should not be carried too far.

Bills that are distinctly separate matters, that should stand on their own feet before parliament, I suggest, should continue to be dealt with as separate bills. In this case I feel that the appointment of the auditors of the Canadian National Railways should have been kept in a separate bill. I would say at the same time that it is still our view that that work should be done by the Auditor General rather than by a private firm, but my main point in rising is to protest this practice of telescoping numbers of bills into single bills, two examples of which we have had today.

(Translation):

Mr. J. Wilfrid Dufresne (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to avail myself of the opportunity offered by the bill now before the house to make a few remarks.

Once more I ask the government for something which I have been requesting time and again in the nearly three years I have been sitting in this house. When we are called upon to vote more than $200 million to provide certain improvements for the Canadian National Railways, I would ask the government again to provide the city of Quebec with an additional railway station.

It is a well known fact, especially to the hon. members who are from Quebec city or from the surrounding area, that at the existing station there is a traffic congestion which delays passengers each time a train comes in. I have already asked that consideration be given to the possibility of building at the entrance to the city of Quebec, more exactly at the foot of the hill called Saint-Sacrement boulevard, another station which would serve approximately 100,000 people. This would only mean a five minutes delay in the arrival time of the train and it would accommodate thousands of travellers arriving at Quebec. It would also help to relieve the traffic congestion around the present Palais station.

This request, Mr. Speaker, seems very legitimate. It is necessary to the progress and advancement of the old capital. I do hope—and I feel that in speaking in this way I am accurately expressing the feelings of most of the people of Quebec city—that the government will see fit to grant this request and to construct, at the foot of Saint-Sacrement boulevard, the station I have already asked for and for which I am once more asking today.

I should also like to avail myself of this opportunity to ask the government to bring pressure to bear on the authorities of the Canadian National Railways so that they hasten to settle the matter of the lots surrounding the station. These lots are to be used for the construction, in the near future I hope, of the new postal terminal for Quebec city. I know that, for nearly two months, the civic authorities of Quebec have been negotiating with the management of the Canadian National Railways. I hope that those negotiations will be successful and that there will be no delay in the exchange of these lots required for the construction of that terminal eagerly awaited by the city of Quebec and which will provide jobs for a fairly large number of people who are still unemployed.

In the same line of thought, I should also like to draw the attention of the government to some news items which appeared in Montreal and Quebec newspapers to the effect that, especially in Montreal, the authorities of the Canadian National Railways did not observe the Lord's Day Act.

It is not necessarily a matter of preventing trains from running on Sunday, nor am I suggesting that those who operate them stop working. However, I insist, as was stressed in the articles published in the press, on the fact that it is in no way urgent that Canadian National employees load and unload freight cars on Sundays.

There is a Lord's Day Observance Act in the province of Quebec, and I hope that the management of the Canadian National—

Mr. Richard (St. Maurice-Lafleche): They allow transport of alcoholic beverages on Sunday; they allow liquors to be served on Sunday.

Mr. Dufresne: That has little to do with the Canadian National.

Mr. Richard (St. Maurice-Lafleche): Talk about working on Sunday.

Mr. Dufresne: It seems to me that the hon. gentleman could have dispensed with so irrelevant a remark.

I therefore urge the management of the Canadian National, Mr. Speaker, to respect the Lord's Day Act. That is one of the main reasons for my intervention tonight, and I hope that the government will set an example by taking the appropriate steps to ensure compliance with this Quebec law, which demands of everyone to observe the Lord's day.

As to my hon. friend who has just mentioned the Sunday sale of liquor, it is unfortunate, but I imagine that, if ever the Liberal party came to power in the province of Quebec, I mean in 25 or 30 years from now perhaps, this situation would go on just the same as it does now.

Mr. Maurice Boisvert (Nicolet-Yamaska): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words in reply to the remarks just made by the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dufresne).

In the first place, the first two points he raised have nothing whatever to do with this bill. It is a bill which concerns the financial aspect of the Canadian National Railways operations, and those first two points are therefore quite irrelevant.

The third point raised refers to the enforcing of the Lord's Day Act. I have no doubt that my learned friend is perfectly aware that the enforcement of that act is a provincial government responsibility. No step can be taken towards enforcing the Lord's Day Act without previous consent of the attorney general of the province in which such work is carried out.

I only wanted to call the attention of this house to these matters, and I believe I can leave it at that.

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Speaker, if I may be allowed a further remark, I would say to the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Boisvert) that, from my seat tonight, I am asking the attorney general of the province of Quebec, who may not be aware of this violation of the Lord's Day Act by Canadian National Railways authorities, to be kind enough to investigate and have the law applied as it should be.

(Text):

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

On clause 3—Capital expenditures authorized.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): What capital expenditure is envisaged on hotels, and is it the intention of the Canadian National to sell any of its present holdings of hotels?

Mr. Benidickson: The hon. member knows that certain hotels of the Canadian National system were sold a year or so ago. I have no knowledge of any other sales in contemplation. My hon. friend is referring to the capital expenditure of $9,035,000. The greater part of that, I think $8 million plus out of the $9 million, is the cost of the capital expenditures contemplated during the year 1956 for the new Queen Elizabeth hotel in Montreal.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 4 agreed to.

On clause 5—Guarantee.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I am wondering whether any thought has ever been given to the issuing of securities against specific parts of newly constructed line.

Mr. Benidickson: I listened quite intently to the remarks of my hon. friend when speaking on second reading of the bill. I think that is very difficult for a crown corporation. I have in mind in the province to which he and I belong, Ontario, the expansion being carried out by Ontario hydro and I can contemplate that there would be considerable difficulty in providing financing for some of the important things that Ontario hydro is doing in my own area as distinct from the operation of the entire system.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Has there ever been any thought given to the issuance of non-guaranteed securities as we replace outstanding securities? That takes place almost every year. There are securities which are redeemable and new securities are issued to provide funds to replace those securities. Has any thought been given at any time on a general basis to the issuance of non-guaranteed bonds or other type of securities?

Mr. Benidickson: I am not going to answer my friend directly with respect to whether any thought has been given to the matter, but I would remind him that it is obvious that the possible cost of financing would be greater without the guarantee. My hon. friend would recognize that certain specific projects might not go ahead if the cost were greater than under the original plan.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Would that not, however, simply bring the issuance of those securities into line with the issuance of similar securities by a private corporation carrying on the same type of business, and would the cost not be the same?

Mr. Benidickson: I simply refer the hon. member again to the analogy that I suggested, Ontario hydro.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I do not think that answers my question. In answering the previous question the parliamentary assistant referred to the financing of a particular segment as being more difficult than if it were financed as part of the general plan, but what I am referring to now is the over-all financing and the issuance of securities. He has said that it would cost more if they were not guaranteed. My question is, would it cost any more than it would cost a private corporation in similar circumstances?

Mr. Benidickson: Well, Mr. Chairman, having been assistant to the Minister of Transport and in the last couple of years assistant to the Minister of Finance, I may say that I have had the responsibility of piloting this bill through the house on several occasions and this point has not been raised previously. I can assure my hon. friend that it will be looked into.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 6 to 9 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 10—Trans-Canada Air Lines.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Is there any logical reason for the continuation of the policy of carrying out the operation and the financing of the operation of Trans-Canada Air Lines by means of this act? Has any thought been given by the department to separate legislation for that purpose, and has there been any thought given to placing this back under the department where I suggest it should be, the Department of Transport?

Mr. Benidickson: Again, I listened very carefully to what my hon. friend said. I thought perhaps he had given too little attention to the preamble of the bill in which there is special emphasis on the fact that this bill is a financing bill. Parliament itself has enacted that Trans-Canada Air Lines shall be a completely owned subsidiary of Canadian National Railways.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Here again I might make a suggestion. From what I can see we are asking the people of Canada to guarantee, by the issuance of certain securities through Canadian National, sufficient money to carry on the operations of Trans-Canada Air Lines. I think what we would like to see is Trans-Canada Air Lines carried on as a separate financial entity. Here again I should like to emphasize that with the record T.C.A. can achieve, if it has not already achieved it, that company could go out into the market and obtain its financing without, I am quite sure, the necessity of a guarantee by the government or the people of Canada. If it costs a little more to do it, again the company will simply be putting itself in the same position as any private corporation carrying on a similar type of work. I would say that here is an opportunity for us to detach ourselves from the annual job of setting up and approving this capital expenditure for Trans-Canada Air Lines through Canadian National Railways. It would be an opportunity, as a matter of fact, to ensure that less and less government interference took place in connection with the operation of that crown corporation. I would strongly suggest to the parliamentary assistant—because I feel I am on very firm ground—that as far as the operation of the air line is concerned, any financing could be obtained in the open market without having to be done in this manner.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

EMERGENCY GOLD MINING ASSISTANCE ACT

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND APPLICATION TO THE YEARS 1957 AND 1958

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys) moved the second reading of Bill No. 417, to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have little to add at this time to what I said at the resolution stage. The gold mining industry continues to face difficult economic problems. The fluctuation of the exchange rates has resulted in a slightly higher return from the sale of gold. I believe the net returns per ounce during the past year or during 1955 was somewhere about 40 cents higher than in the previous year. There has been an improvement in the position of the mines or in many of the mines, I would say, because of increased capital investment in machinery and general improvement in efficiency. A few mines have improved their position because of higher grades of ore. However, the fact remains that many mines and their dependent communities still must rely on cost aid in order to survive. Approval of the proposed two-year extension of the provisions of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act at this time will enable the mines to plan their operations for the next 2½ years with confidence and efficiency that would not be possible otherwise. It naturally follows that the more efficient is the operation of the mines, the less assistance will be required from the public treasury. That is why we are proposing the extension at this time.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, this is a very brief bill. It purports to add the word and figures "1957 and 1958" to the provisions of one of the clauses of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. This measure has been in effect now for eight years. The subsidy has been offered since 1948. In that period of time there have been various debates on measures to extend the effect of the subsidy. In each case the measure has been supported by the house, and no new principle is involved in the present bill.

I think a word should be said on the matter of subsidies. I think that any subsidy requires some justification in normal times. There are dangers in subsidies. There are particular dangers in hidden subsidies. The subsidy we are dealing with here is not a hidden subsidy. This subsidy has been, from the outset, nothing more than a stop-gap, hand-to-mouth form of emergency assistance to the gold mining industry. It has never been a solution of the problems of that industry. When I say "hand-to-mouth", I am stressing particularly the fact that the measure has never been in effect at any one time for more than a couple of years. Hence the industry has not known very far in advance how long it could expect to receive this form of assistance.

There are justifications for this particular subsidy, far as it falls short of being anything like a solution of the problems of the industry. There are several grounds upon which, for lack of a proper solution, the subsidy can be justified. First of all, this is one commodity on which government sets the price. I do not say that the Canadian government has the absolute control of the setting of the price. Nevertheless, it is a commodity the price of which is definitely determined by government. In that respect it differs from almost any other commodity that is produced in Canada.

In the second place, there can be no question as to the need of the industry for some form of assistance in the absence of a proper solution of the whole problem. The plight of the gold mining industry in Canada is serious, as it has been for some years. It has been ground between the upper and nether millstones, the upper one being the set price, a ceiling on the price realized from the product, and the nether stone being the rising cost of production. Indeed, as the Canadian dollar has strengthened in terms of international exchange the position of the Canadian gold producers has deteriorated correspondingly.

It is not simply a matter, though, of the need of the industry as a producer of wealth. We are obliged to look more widely at the plight of those communities which are dependent on the gold mining industry, and there are many of them in Canada. The growth and prosperity of such communities on the one hand or their atrophy and depression on the other depend in effect on whether the ore bodies in the adjacent mines are to be operated and worked at a profit or not. When the margins are so narrow as they have been in the gold mining industry, a very slight difference in price can mean the difference between value for an ore body and literally no value at all in terms of workability.

The plight of the industry is not the fault of the industry. I do not think anyone in this house is going to question the fact that the industry has done its best, in the face of the difficulties that have confronted it, to keep itself on an efficient basis. The recent report of the Knox committee in Ontario as well as things that have been said in this house bear testimony to the fact that the industry has not been lacking in energy, enterprise and the desire to maintain all possible efficiency in production.

I have mentioned two factors, Mr. Speaker, that lend justification to the provision of a subsidy with respect to gold: The fact that the price is established by governments, and second, that the industry needs some form of assistance, otherwise it is going to close down further.

The third of these factors is the national interest. To an extent that some Canadians unhappily have forgotten, the gold mining industry in Canada has been one of the most effective contributing factors to the health of the Canadian economy. The search for gold has been an impelling factor in the development of great areas of Canada, not confined alone now to the extraction of gold but of other metals as well, both precious and base. In the depression years the gold mining industry stood out like a beacon light in the Canadian economy. Indeed, the prosperity of that industry in the days of the depression went far to sustain a weakened economy in Canada. In the war years the industry played a leading part, particularly in the early years of the war, again in the strengthening of the Canadian economy; and who can say that the day may not come when we shall again need the strengthening quality of the gold mining industry to help to lend support to the rest of the Canadian economy?

At any rate, this industry has an assured market for its product. It has an assured market for its product in the country where we most wish at the present time to sell some of our products. I refer to the United States. With that country in our commodity trade we are incurring a huge trading deficit. In 1955 that commodity trading deficit with the United States amounted to close to $1 billion, and in the first four months of this year it is evident that that commodity trading deficit with the United States is increasing. We have these figures from the dominion bureau of statistics. For the first four months of this year, 1956, our imports from the United States amounted to $1,363 million. Our exports to the United States amounted to $860 million. Therefore, in these first four months of the present fiscal year, Mr. Speaker, we have incurred a deficit of $500 million on our commodity trading account with the United States.

In the face of that situation and particularly having regard to the historical strength of the gold mining industry and what it has meant to the health of the Canadian economy, I submit to this house that it would be extremely dangerous to the Canadian economy if we contemplated a serious decline in the gold mining industry. Apart from a few mines which are blessed with very high-grade ore, the fact is undeniable that without some form of assistance, lacking an adequate solution to the problem, mines will be closed and the industry will suffer a body blow under present conditions. There are also many communities in this country directly dependent upon the gold mining industry which would atrophy and decay.

We may remind ourselves that already the process of decay in the gold mining industry has gone far, even with the very limited form of assistance that has been available to the industry under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. There are today in operation only half of the producers that were in operation in the year 1941, which is just 15 years ago. Had growth been normal there would have been many additional mines added to the group of Canadian producers. Development work has been curtailed. No one is seeking to open up new gold mines today and half of those mines that were producing in 1941 have closed down in these intervening 15 years.

It is fair also, Mr. Speaker, that we should ask what this form of assistance has cost the treasury of this country. In the eight years that it has been in effect it has cost the treasury $90 million. The extent of this aid was greatly reduced in 1955 as compared with the previous year, 1954. That year, 1954, was the record in terms of assistance advanced to the gold mining industry, when $16·3 million was paid out of the treasury of this country to the industry under the terms of this legislation. In 1955 the total of assistance under the revised formula that was introduced at the time the legislation was before this house last was just $9·3 million, and it is estimated that if this measure is continued in effect for the remainder of 1956 and the years 1957 and 1958, as proposed in the present measure, the assistance in this year, 1956, will cost the public treasury $8·9 million, and in the year 1957, $8·6 million. The scale of assistance under the revised formula is moving steadily downward.

The purpose of this bill, sir, is to extend the effect of the legislation for two years. It is right and proper that this measure to extend the provisions of the act should be introduced now rather than that the industry should be left in doubt until the legislation would otherwise expire at the end of 1956. It is right and proper that it should be introduced now. Indeed, if it had been left until later, serious injury would be done to the industry because the mines must know in time to make their plans. Had it been the intention of the government to let this form of assistance expire at the end of 1956, or had the industry been left in doubt as to the plans of this government or as to the intention of the government with respect to it, then the plight of the industry would have been very serious, indeed.

I have emphasized, sir, that this measure is no solution of the deep-seated problem of the gold mining industry. The difficulty and the flaw in measures of this kind is that they often lull the government and lull parliament into thinking that the problem has been solved, or at least the problem has been met for the time being. No hon. member should delude himself into thinking that this measure is any solution, even on the short-run basis, of the needs and the problems of the gold-mining industry. These problems are going to require much more farsighted solutions than are offered by the hand-to-mouth, stop-gap type of assistance that we have in the present measure.

The importance of gold in the world has not receded in these recent years. There is not a country in all the world that does not want more gold. The heroic measures of austerity which the British government has found it necessary to impose upon the economy of that country have been designed to retain and recapture an increased quantity out of the world's store of gold. The possession of gold is a leading factor in the fiscal and trading policy of every country in the whole world.

Last year parliament approved some easing in the restrictions that theretofore had been applied in this country with respect to the holding of gold in private hands and the coinage of gold. But, Mr. Speaker, no one I am sure is going to pretend that these were anything more than very, very slight palliatives. These were no solution. What is required is something much more far-reaching. That leads me to say just a brief word about the relationship of this country and of this government with the International Monetary Fund.

It is evident that our engagements with the International Monetary Fund are such that the government has not a free hand to pursue the goal of an increased price for newly-mined gold apart from some permission on the part of the International Monetary Fund. I have been urging for years now that the government has the responsibility to Canada and to the gold mining industry to pursue with very much greater vigour and determination the need of a higher price for newly-mined Canadian gold. That, in the last analysis, is the only solution of the problem of the gold mining industry. An upward adjustment in price is overdue.

The government has been very chary in even acquainting the house with what it may have proposed at meetings of the board of governors of the International Monetary Fund. It has been like drawing teeth to try to extract any information from them as to what they have urged. We do know that South Africa with similar interests has been pressing its case very strongly before the International Monetary Fund for an increase in the price of newly-mined gold. This country, this house and the gold mining industry of this country are entitled to know what the Canadian government is doing in the same regard, and are entitled to expect vigour and determination on the part of the government and the exercise of the utmost ingenuity at meetings of the governing body of the International Monetary Fund in seeking some solution to this problem, which is not going to be solved apart from an upward adjustment in the price of newly-mined gold.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, we are entitled in this regard to ask the Canadian government for a statement of its own policy with reference to the holding of gold. What is the degree of confidence that the Canadian government is prepared to demonstrate in the future of gold—gold as a factor in our fiscal, trading and, indeed, all our economic relations? If the Canadian government wished to give some striking evidence of their belief in the future of gold to a country that is a substantial gold producer, and would be a much greater gold producer if a profitable market awaited it, it could give a striking demonstration of that confidence in the future of gold by making a bold declaration in regard to its own policy in reference to gold holdings.

In the budget papers tabled by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) which are appended to the speech he delivered on the occasion of the introduction of his budget on March 20, we find in table 11 on page 24 the holdings of gold and of United States dollars of the exchange fund account and the Bank of Canada.

In 1952 gold holdings were $885 million; United States dollars $961·8 million. In 1953 gold holdings had increased to $986·1 million; United States dollars had decreased to $802 million. In 1954 gold holdings had increased to $1,072·7 million; holdings of United States dollars had increased to $833·4 million. In 1955 gold holdings had increased to $1,133·9 million; holdings of United States dollars had decreased to $692 million.

It is evident from even a quick perusal of those figures that our holdings of gold in Canada have increased slightly in each of the last four years. Our holdings of United States dollars have fluctuated year by year but at the end of that four-year period they were less than they were at the beginning of it. Figures are not available in detail for 1956, but what I have seen of government figures indicates there has been a decline in the holdings of gold in the exchange fund account and the Bank of Canada in the portion of this year that has expired.

It is for that reason, Mr. Speaker, that in the presence of the Minister of Finance as well as the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham) I urge this is a time when the Canadian government ought to be bold in declaring a policy with regard to the holding of gold in the exchange fund account and the Bank of Canada. Here again the government has been very chary about making any statement of policy.

I do remember that two and a half years ago when Mr. Abbott was minister of finance he did allow himself to say that as far as the holding of gold was concerned it was found to be somewhat unproductive. Well, there are wider considerations to be taken into account than those which impelled Mr. Abbott, when minister of finance, to take that position.

Having regard to the seriousness of the plight of the gold mining industry, having regard to the imperative necessity for finding a solution, having regard to the fact that any subsidy measure like the present one is at best only to be supported on the basis of an existing emergency, then I submit, Mr. Speaker, we must have a serious engagement on the part of the Canadian government to address itself to the problem and to bring forth a solution. The solution lies in part with such pressures as the Canadian government may be in a position to exercise upon the International Monetary Fund and also upon the United States government which is the principal buyer of newly-mined Canadian gold; and given those factors, we still ought to have from the Canadian government some statement of its own policy and position with reference to the acquisition for government account of newly-mined Canadian gold.

Mr. Speaker, I have indicated there is no new principle in this bill. We have supported the measure, inadequate as it is, in the past. Having regard to the seriousness of the situation we must, of course, continue to support the provisions of this subsidy; but, sir, this is no excuse for postponing our search for the solution for which this industry and the national interest are crying today.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) has more or less dealt with the rarefied and to me somewhat mysterious atmosphere of international finance and gold supply and so on. My remarks will be directly related to the somewhat more earthy subject of the lives of the miners and the communities in which they live.

This group has supported the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act since it was first introduced in the house as a temporary legislative palliative that maintains employment and in so doing protects the livelihood of the miners and others concerned, their investments in their homes and their investments in their communities. However, Mr. Speaker, we are not certain that the legislation is being used to the best advantage of the miners and the others concerned and of the country as a whole. We think it is about time there was some consideration given to a possible amendment to the act to make it more flexible to meet a situation which is not only temporary but which appears to be somewhat like some positions in the government service—it is a permanent-temporary situation.

Until comparatively recently all mining operations, whether base metal or gold, generally speaking followed a similar wage policy throughout Canada. While rates varied somewhat from area to area, within a given area the wages were practically identical in all types of mining. I am informed that this was particularly true in Canada's two main gold mining camps, Kirkland Lake and Porcupine. In fact I am informed that their wage policies were identical and extended into the base metal mines in northwestern Quebec. I am informed also that this solid policy or front which extended to even having the same negotiators handle their dealings with the unions was broken down about a year ago when Noranda, a base metal producer at Noranda, Quebec, granted the 44-hour week and certain wage concessions. I presume the reason for that change was the rise in the price of copper from 36 cents to 46 cents in a little more than a year and the development of the uranium mines in the Blind River area.

I understand that at that time the Ontario and Quebec mining operators were faced with a labour shortage. I am informed also that hundreds of miners left the Kirkland Lake area and the Timmins area last fall and winter for the base metal and uranium mines because of the higher wage scales and better employment advantages. As a matter of fact, regardless of the beneficial effects of the act, it has not been completely effective in preventing a lessening of the population in those two important areas.

The gold mining operators under that situation were faced with two alternatives. First, the prosperous gold mines could raise their rates to compete with the base metal and uranium mines for labour which would have provided a somewhat realistic view of the prosperity of the gold mining industry. Second, they could join together with the marginal mines and present the gold mining operators' version of a solid wage scale front on behalf of the operators concerned.

As I understand it, the gold mining operators chose a combination of these two alternatives. They introduced the 44-hour week without making any wage concessions. They thus left themselves considerably behind the base metal and uranium mines in regard to rates. Apparently they had hoped that the fact that most of their miners had an investment in their homes would force them to forgo the higher rates of pay available elsewhere in the mining industry. That was their first proposal.

The second part of their plan provided for the tapping of a labour supply willing to accept rates of pay averaging up to 50 cents an hour less than those paid in the base metal and uranium mines. Obviously no such labour supply was available in Canada, or indeed anywhere else where people knew the score so far as employment in the mining industry was concerned. I am informed that about three months ago the gold mining companies sent representatives to Europe to import necessary miners to work under those conditions. I have also been reliably informed that one of the men who went to Europe was Mr. William Ramsay, the manager of the unemployment insurance commission at Kirkland Lake.

On this account the gold mines are now being operated with older miners. I am told that the average age of miners in the gold mining industry in Kirkland Lake is now in excess of 40 years. These miners are held captive by their investment in homes and by the fact that mining operators will not hire men over 40 years of age. I understand it is the intention of these mines to operate with these men, in some cases plus labour imported from Europe which is willing to work for the lower wage scales provided in the unorganized mines. I understand it is difficult to organize some of these submarginal gold mines because the union cannot offer the men very much in the way of hope for better wage scales and working conditions.

I suggest that the time has come to consider the present distinction between base metal mines and gold mines as being artificial. In our opinion it should be somewhat along the line of profitable and non-profitable mines. I must admit that I am not aware of the details of conditions in northern Ontario, although I am completely at home in the southeastern portion of British Columbia and understand mining conditions there, but I have received my information from what I consider to be most responsible and reliable sources. I understand that there is a large iron prospect at Boston Creek in the Kirkland Lake area which is undeveloped. I wonder whether the government has given consideration to amending this act to provide more flexibility in its administration and purposes and to permit assistance to such developments, either by way of loan or by way of the form of assistance now provided by the act.

In our opinion this act can be effectively administered only as a result of co-operation and a study of the situation in total in the mining industry by the Department of Finance, the Department of Labour and the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. We in this group are firmly of the opinion that the time has come for a co-ordinated approach to this problem by the three departments I have mentioned. We think that is very necessary. We should give consideration to making the act more flexible and more realistic in order to meet a situation which apparently is at least temporary-permanent or permanent-temporary, whichever way you like to put it, and thus be able to deal more effectively with the conditions faced by the miners and the communities concerned.

Before concluding I wish to ask the minister a number of questions which I would appreciate his answering when we reach the committee stage. My first question is this: Is Mr. William Ramsay, who has gone to Europe to recruit labour for the mining industry, still an employee of the federal Department of Labour? My second question is this: Is it the government's policy to continue emergency gold mining assistance to certain mines especially in view of the fact that a labour force made up of young, single immigrants will have almost the same effect on those communities and their property values as would the closing of the mines? These immigrants may be willing to work for these substandard wages, but the purpose of the act is to maintain the communities and the standards of the employees concerned. The effect of the employment of these single immigrants on these communities will be almost identical with that which would follow the closing down of the mines.

These men will live in bunk houses and will only be temporary residents. As soon as they know the score and become aware of Canadian conditions in general they will do the same as did a good many others who came here to work on the farms; they will disappear to more lucrative areas. They live in bunk houses or rent rooms and as temporary residents they will not be purchasing property, nor be investing in the community and, as I said before, will not do anything to stabilize the communities or assure their permanency.

My next question is: what is the attitude of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration to the mass importation of European labour to work in marginal gold mines under the circumstances that I have outlined, and what co-operation has the department extended to the gold mining operators who are seeking this immigration from Europe to carry out the work in the gold mines? That question is of considerable interest to a good number of persons who work in the mining industry in northern Ontario.

My last question is: has the government given any thought to forcing mining operators receiving emergency gold mining assistance to hire over-age miners in their own communities when the mines they are working in close down?

Here is the situation that exists. Canadian miners that have been employed in the mining industry all their lives have an average age of over 40 years. If it happens that the mine in which they are working closes down, because the other mining operators would not employ miners over 40 years of age—and I think that is related to pension plans and things of that sort—then these good Canadian citizens find themselves out of employment, with their investment in homes and so on in the mining community concerned, while at the same time immigrants are brought in from Europe to take the employment that they otherwise could obtain. We think it would be a wise policy on the part of the government to insist that the mining operators who are accepting gold mining assistance give employment to these miners even though they are over 40 years of age, by some special arrangement.

We think it is most unfortunate that these good Canadian miners should be out of employment and the vacancies taken by miners being brought into this country under these conditions. We are not opposed to planned immigration and the location of immigrants according to proper circumstances and conditions, but I for one am very much opposed to bringing in immigrants from Europe to take the positions that are vacant while under certain circumstances Canadian citizens are unemployed.

Mr. Prudham: Will the hon. member permit a question at this time?

Mr. Herridge: Certainly.

Mr. Prudham: Do you actually know of instances where that has taken place?

Mr. Herridge: As I said before, I do not know from personal experience but I have had the information given to me on good authority and I shall be only too pleased to look up my file and give the information to the minister.

That is a serious situation. I am very pleased to see that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration is now listening to what I have to say because I am sure he is interested in this question. That is why we say that the time has come for much closer co-ordination between the Department of Finance, the Department of Labour and the Department of Citizenship and Immigration in relation to the satisfactory administration of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. I make those few brief suggestions and ask those questions of the minister. I shall look forward to his answers to the questions when we reach the committee stage.

Mr. Roland Michener (St. Paul's): This short bill No. 417 simply extends for two years more the bill that was introduced last year. As has been pointed out, there is no change in principle nor in application of the emergency gold mining assistance to the problem of the gold mining communities.

Last year, as reported at pages 2177 to 2184 of Hansard, I dealt at very considerable length with the economics of the gold mining industry and all the social consequences of the problems of that industry and the gold mining communities and the miners and citizens who live and have lived there, many of them for a generation or more, and are firmly established there, in considering the proposal that was then before the house in regard to reducing the assistance to be paid. I consider that no good purpose would be served in repeating what was said there, as it is readily available in Hansard for anyone who wishes to reconsider the problem with which we were faced a year ago.

I urged at that time that the government reconsider its proposal to reduce the amount of emergency gold mining assistance, but the government proceeded with its program. The minister expected that there would be a reduction in the over-all payment of assistance from $16 million in 1954—in fact it turned out to be about $16,300,000 in 1954—to $11 million in 1955. Now, in introducing this extension of the policy, the minister is able to tell us that in fact the total payment in 1955 will be in the neighbourhood of $9,300,000, about $1,700,000 less than he estimated when he introduced this policy to the house a year ago, so that in effect the reduction in payment to the gold mining industry is from $16,300,000 to $9,300,000 in one year, with anticipated further reductions over the next three years of the life of this program. That is a reduction of 43 per cent, and it is a very considerable and substantial reduction.

How the government justified the reduction which was made last year was more than I could see from anything that was said, except on the ground of saving an immediate outlay of funds. I endeavoured to show the importance of the industry at that time, with its 18,500 workers, its great communities, well established permanent communities, many of them based entirely on the gold industry, with no possible alternative means of support. In that connection I suggest to the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) that it would be desirable for him to visit some of these communities because his idea of what they are is somewhat removed from the facts as found in the gold mining report made by the committee in Ontario, at least the facts as they apply in the province of Ontario, of which I believe he was speaking.

I commend this report to the members of the house. It has been mentioned already by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mrs. Shipley). It was the report of a committee of inquiry into the economics of the gold mining industry in 1955, under the chairmanship of Professor F. A. Knox of Queen's University, and with a very competent committee supporting him. An interim report was made last year, and the final report this year. It is interesting to note the composition of the mining group in the Ontario camps. I think the Porcupine camp is the largest and probably the most representative. In that camp, according to the table on page 83 of the report, there were 6,135 men who were reported for the purposes of this committee, and the number of Canadian-born were 3,556. That is a little more than half. Of these, 942 were French speaking and 2,614 were English speaking. Then I come to those who came from abroad, and here is where the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) would be interested from the point of view of verifying the statements which he was making on

"very good" authority. Those from the British Isles numbered 598 while those from east and south Europe numbered 1,728 which shows that the miners who are there are about half newcomers and about half Canadian born.

Even more interesting are the figures on recent arrivals. Immigrants into that camp since 1945 numbered only 452, of those who reported, less than 10 per cent, and since 1950 there have been only 305. That does not show any great change in the composition of the miners in the camps. The ages were also the subject of a study made by the same committee, and I think members might be interested in the ages of the miners in the Porcupine camp because after all this assistance is a guarantee that these men will be able to continue to work in the jobs they have known and where their homes are, where their children go to school and where they expect to live their entire lives.

Under 19 years of age there were only 185. From 20 to 24 years there were 1,053, from 25 to 34 years there were 3,064 and from 35 to 44 years 2,801. That is about the breaking point that the hon. member for Kootenay West suggested. Up to that point we cover substantially more than half of the miners. From 45 to 54 there are only 2,451, and in the group from 55 to 59 there are only 798. That is by way of a description of these communities and the consideration of the social consequences of this legislation.

Apart from the industry itself, gold is of great importance in our economy. It has a permanent value, and I do not need to repeat what I have said before and what has been said by others on that score. The Ontario report at page 67 may be some authority for the relative importance of gold, the continuing importance of gold, and I will read one paragraph which illustrates the point to which the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) drew attention earlier.

> During the depression of the 1930's gold exports were of considerable importance in our balance of payments. In the two years 1935-37, for instance, gold exports averaged 14·5 per cent of our total merchandise exports, the average gold export being $132 million and merchandise exports $909 million. In the first two years of the second world war, before other methods were devised to finance essential war imports from the United States, the Canadian government urged all-out gold production from the mines.

It is not likely that proportion will return but that illustrates the great role that gold played, as anyone who lived through that period, particularly in Ontario, knows, in maintaining the stability of the economy.

Then, the place of gold as a monetary reserve is, I submit, a basic consideration in support of an advanced policy of assistance. The gold reserves must be placed opposite the inflow of capital because the capital which comes into Canada, which we all welcome, and which is playing such a part in the building up of our resources, is all exportable again. As I pointed out last year, in the period of emergency gold mining assistance $3 billion in new capital had come into Canada in the same period all of which, if it were demanded, would have to be paid back. In consequence the establishment of a substantial reserve in an acceptable form of money, namely, gold, is the necessary counterpart of our policy of permitting the free investment of foreign capital in Canada.

In addition, gold mining is not simply an industry to itself. As the minister has recognized, gold mining has led to some of the forms of mining which are now more profitable such as the base metal mining which is being carried on today to an ever-increasing degree. It was gold that gave the boost which started hard rock mining in this country and exploration for base metals. Gold mines have played a very substantial part in financing base metal mines and have supplied the engineers, the technique, the capital, everything necessary for the great expansion in the base metal industry. They have played and are playing an important part not only in the production of gold but in the mineral development of Canada.

What has been the effect of the policy which the minister introduced a year ago? His own statement indicates that the industry is a failing industry, and I think that is the most important consideration before the house in determining whether this policy should be renewed just as it is or whether the assistance ought to be increased, as was urged last year. It is a failing industry. It is true that total ounces produced last year were slightly greater than the year before and to that extent there is cause for satisfaction, but that production is at the expense of the future. The minister admits that five of the lode mines, as opposed to placer mines, have suspended operations in the course of the year. One was absorbed by the parent company and one new mine was opened. The net loss is five of the lode mines out of a total of about 54, I believe, which are receiving assistance.

The minister, to use his own words, says that other gold mines are in a life and death struggle for existence. That does not indicate a very healthy industry to anyone who has heard him support continuation of this policy in its present form and the results it has achieved over the past year. In addition, the minister says that some of the mines may close. After the present act expires it is anticipated that 18 to 20 mines may close permanently.

A more serious consequence of the present condition of the industry is that there is very little prospecting and there are very few new mines being discovered, opened up and operated. In the period from 1941 to 1955 the number of mines in operation has been reduced by more than half, and one has only to project these trends into the future to see that the gold mining industry, if it depends on this temporary assistance and is not restored by a more permanent solution, is doomed to disappear in Canada.

The cost of what the government has done has been pretty well reviewed by the hon. member for Eglinton. I should like to point out to the house that the total cost of this assistance from its inception in 1948 is only $90 million. That $90 million has accounted for the production of $950 million worth of gold so that putting it at the highest the cost of putting into being gold which would not otherwise have existed as an asset in the Canadian treasury has been only 10 per cent of the amount of newly-mined gold in this country over that period. That is a very small premium for the insurance which this gold gives as part of our reserves.

In the period of the subsidy our reserves have increased by about the amount of the newly-mined gold, although not quite as much. In December of 1954 our reserves stood at $1,072 million, as has been said, and at the end of the last calendar year they stood at $1,134 million, an increase of $62 million in the course of the calendar year. The costs I have put at 10 per cent, being the relation of the assistance to the total production. But those costs are offset by a great many forms of taxation which bring back into the treasury a good part of the emergency gold mining assistance. Those are direct taxes on the profits of the mines and also taxes on the mining communities where the emergency gold mining assistance is largely put into circulation. Hence the net cost of providing Canada with this kind of insurance against its external obligations in the form of a vast reserve of gold, now well over $1 billion, is negligible as compared with its permanent value. In addition, this industry lends itself particularly to assistance because it is not a competitive industry. There is only one purchaser of its product, basically, and that is the government. Therefore in subsidizing in an indirect way by public funds we are not interfering with other enterprise. Furthermore, there is no danger of overproduction which is another hazard of a subsidy as the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has found out to his great embarrassment.

[Mr. Michener.]

The net cost then is small in proportion to the values which one can see from the application of this policy. I have only two criticisms to make. The first is the criticism that I made last year, namely that the minister was wrong in reducing the assistance. If he had not reduced it the production would undoubtedly have been greater. Not only would some of the mines which have gone out of production have stayed in production but there would have been more incentive for exploration and the development of new mines. I know of gold mines where there are substantial tonnages of ore waiting to be mined when it is profitable to do so. Hence I think it is fair to say that the production of gold, the amount of gold put into being and flowing into the reserves of this country, would have been greater had the assistance not been reduced. There is a marginal point where gold ore will be left in the ground if the assistance is withdrawn. The minister knows that very well.

Then the other criticism—and it has already been voiced—is that the government does not appear to have attempted to find a permanent solution. At least, if they have done so, it has been kept quiet. I should like to ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) what approach he has made to the international monetary fund or bank, whichever institution has authority in these matters, or what efforts have been made in international consultation to find a means of increasing the price of gold. The minister last year accused me of being in favour of gambling with public funds, I believe, when I said there was a real possibility that these reserves which he is providing for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) in the form of $1 billion in gold valued at $35, might very readily by the stroke of an international agreement become worth another $1 billion if the price of gold were doubled, as has been done in the past and as, I am sure, will be done again one day, because these things have a habit of recurring under similar conditions. Hence it is reasonable to expect that there can be no loss on this gold which the government is helping to produce. It is also reasonable to expect that there may very readily be a substantial profit to the Canadian economy and the Canadian people as a whole; and in the meantime there is a substantial benefit to those who are directly engaged in this industry as miners and their families and those who serve the mining communities.

On those two points I suggest that the government has failed in its duty. Of course I cannot complain of the fact that the act is being extended for a further two years because it is obviously of great benefit to the country and to the gold mining industry particularly; it is of great benefit to know two years in advance just what the course of events will be. I therefore do not propose to vote against this bill but I would have liked this year—as I would have liked it last year —to see the assistance kept at the level at which it had been established. I should like to know what the government has been doing, or what effort it has made to have a review of the price of gold among the nations of the world who are concerned with it. It is 10 years since the Bretton Woods agreements were made and in all conscience that is enough time to know what the consequence of that $35 fixed price of gold has been to the great gold-producing countries like Canada, South Africa and others.

Mr. Charles E. Rea (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few brief words about this matter. I wonder whether all hon. members in their mind's eye can go back to the beginnings of this industry in Ontario. Many of them are not old enough perhaps to go back to the time when the Ontario government first started to build the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario Railway in northern Ontario and to know what happened. First it opened the great town of Cobalt which became a great silver centre which remained for many years. Then as those with pioneering spirits started to get ahead of the railway, the first thing we knew gold was discovered up in Timmins. It must have struck a tremendous chord with everyone in Canada when it became known that gold had been discovered in northern Ontario. First there was just a little camp, with a few tents and someone who had a general store. Then as time went on these things grew, and finally a great big town appeared. Then we had gold discovered in Kirkland Lake. I can remember, back in 1922, getting off the train at Swastika. You had to get the old bus and go six miles from there into Kirkland Lake. It was a town of shacks at that time. People were buying Teck-Hughes stock at 15 cents a share; and if they bought it, they did not know where they were going to sell it. Now when you walk into Kirkland Lake, what do you find? It is a terrific town, one that you can be proud of. Then you went over to Larder Lake, Elk Lake and so on and so forth. This gold mining industry of ours just seemed to cause towns to spring up all over the place. As has been mentioned already, back in the early thirties, there was one place in Canada to which every traveller wanted to go to sell his merchandise, namely to northern Ontario because that is where business was good. Why? Just because of the gold mines.

Then along came the first increase in price, and away things went again. Prospectors went out looking for more gold, this precious metal which meant so much to everyone. Then all at once what happened? World war II came along. The cost of everything started to go up. Here was an industry with a level selling price and the cost of everything going up. Miners had to be paid more money; and it was right and just that they should. Merchandise cost more; machinery cost more; everything cost more. But the poor mining companies had a ceiling on what they could get for their merchandise. Things became so bad that eventually you brought in this Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act in order to help many of these companies out.

It is said that this is a failing industry. That is a terrible word for us in Canada to use in talking about any industry. I do not think it is a failing industry. There is just one thing that keeps any industry from failing and that is salesmanship. All right. What have we to sell? We have a couple of things to sell. One of them is up to the government. They have to sell to the United States of America the idea that the price of gold must be either "upped" or freed. There is no question about that. We do not know how hard the government is going after it, or just how sincere their intentions are. I realize and understand that the United States is worried perhaps a little bit, or perhaps a lot, because we do not know what this might do to Russia. We hear they could be the second largest gold-producing country in the world. These are things that we do not know at the moment.

As I said on the resolution stage of this bill, those who are allowed to get the subsidy are not allowed to sell gold on the free market. That is something that I just cannot understand. I mentioned it before. If we allow everyone to sell on the free market and they are getting $3.48 subsidy now, and if they got an extra $2.48, the government would have to pay them only $1 an ounce when they produced the ore, if their sales averaged that.

I have another thought in mind for doing that. It would mean that all the gold mining companies could get together and have a sales force to start to re-educate the people of Canada about gold, what gold is and what they could do with gold. Hon. members can recall, as I can, when we used to get $10 gold pieces and $5 gold pieces for gifts and we used to get them as presents, and so on and so forth. But there are many people living in Canada today who have never seen a $5 or a $10 gold piece. Why can these gold mining companies not get together and build up a sales force and re-educate the Canadian people in the use of gold and perhaps in other ways? Let us go back and see what happened to the nickel companies. You know what they did. They built up a research department and they are finding more and more uses for nickel. Why are the gold mining companies not encouraged to do that sort of thing instead of being left to themselves? Why should we say to them, "We will give you so many dollars. Do not go above that. We are going to give you your subsidy, but also let you go out on the free market." In case it does not work out and they lose their subsidy the minister says to me that they can come back on January 1 or July 1. I know all that, sir; but in the meantime, how much money have they lost?

Mr. Prudham: Will the hon. member permit a question? Is the hon. member aware that on the so-called free market the price of gold is less than $35 an ounce?

Mr. Rea: I realize that, but perhaps on the free market they could get more than that. That is what I am trying to tell the minister. I know you can buy gold at the mint, too, but all you can get there is a gold brick. You cannot go and get a $10 gold piece, or anything like that. You might be able to get $38, $39 or $40 an ounce for units of small articles that could be sold. There is no reason why that could not be done. If the government will only try to get the United States to increase the price of gold or let it go free, it would be a great help. Once again, we are hamstrung by our neighbours to the south. This is an actual fact. We must admit that. We know that Canada could not raise the price up to $50 or $60 an ounce or every country in the world would be sending their gold here; that is certain. The United States is different because they are the biggest purchaser of gold in the world.

Gold is something that we have to keep because of the fact that all these towns and all the people that are in these towns and all the industries that are tied up and allied with it are dependent on gold. You know, there is not a prospector today out looking for gold. I can imagine there is all kinds of gold in Ontario, but it does not pay. Suppose a prospector finds a great strike of gold, who wants it? I can remember back in 1936, I think it was when they made the strike in the O'Brien mine in Cadillac township. It was free gold; it was not too big. I was down in the mine; I saw it. It was the most gorgeous looking thing you ever saw. It was solid gold about the size of the top of this desk. There is lots more of it around this country. I have staked hundreds and hundreds of claims in my time. I never got a big one. Like every prospector, you always look for some bonanza somewhere along the line. But now no one is encouraged to go out and look for gold at all. I always say this: no matter where you are in the world, if you have gold you can do business and trade. That is what brought this country to where it is today. I just hope we can continue on to do that.

Certainly, we must have this subsidy. There is not any question about that. I still think that the minister should allow every mine, whether they are getting the subsidy or not, to try to see what they can do to develop a free market for gold. They have no sales force. That is one thing the gold mining companies never had, is sales force. They just shipped it down to the mint. That is all they had to worry about. So long as they had insurance on the bullion coming from the mine to Ottawa they were through. That is all the selling they had to do. I think they should get together and start a research and sales department, and I think everyone would be surprised at what could be done.

Of course, I am going to vote for this bill. There is nothing else one can do. It is a help; it is not enough. But I do hope—and I want to repeat this once again—that the minister will seriously consider allowing all the mines to go into the free market regardless of whether or not they are getting the subsidies. If they make more than the present price it will come off the subsidy. It will not entail any bookkeeping work. They must keep track of their sales anyway; therefore the extra bookkeeping work, if there is any, would be small.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Application of act to 1955, 1956, 1957 and 1958.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, it is ten o'clock. I hope that, while it is a very short bill, we are going to have from the ministers some statement of policy along the lines that were suggested tonight by several of those who spoke on second reading.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall I report progress and ask leave to sit again?

Clause stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, I presume we can finish this bill tomorrow in committee of the whole. Then we shall go on with the estimates of the Department of National Revenue. I may say, sir, we shall call any third readings before that.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

TELEVISION PROGRAM "YOU'LL NEVER GET RICH"

Question No. 514—Mr. Hamilton (York West):

Question

1. Has application been made to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for television time on any of its stations for the United States television program "You'll Never Get Rich"?

2. If so, has objection been raised by any department of government or anyone else to the telecast of the program in Canada by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and, if so, by whom?

3. Has any check been made by any government department with the United States government to determine if the said program has aided recruiting?

Answer by: Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue):

The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation advises as follows:

1. Inquiries were made to the C.B.C. regarding time availabilities for the program.

2. Not to the knowledge of the corporation.

3. The corporation has no information.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, June 13, 1956

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

DISTINGUISHED VISITOR—PRIME MINISTER OF NEW ZEALAND

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members will permit me, I am sure, to draw to their attention the presence in our gallery of the Prime Minister of New Zealand. We all wish to extend to him the assurance of our most sincere friendship and our best wishes; and that assurance we extend to him personally, to the members of his parliament and to the people of New Zealand.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Eighth report of standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Hunter.

STARRED QUESTIONS

Mr. Robertson (Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, questions 53 and 54 as asked by the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) deal essentially with the same matter. In view of the extensive nature of the reply I wonder if I might have the permission of the hon. member and the house to table these replies?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Does the same request apply to question No. 54?

Mr. Robertson: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed. Questions Nos. 53 and 54 are answered.

DISABILITY ALLOWANCE APPLICATIONS, N.B.

Question No. 53—Mr. Stuart (Charlotte):

1. How many applications for disability allowance have been received from persons in the province of New Brunswick since the Disabled Persons Act came into force?

2. How many applications have been granted?

3. How many individuals are now in receipt of disability allowances in New Brunswick?

Answer by: Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare):

1. The total number of applications for disability allowance received in the province of New Brunswick from November 1954 to February 1956 numbered only 2,887.

2 and 3. The number of applications granted already exceeds 1,000. The number of allowances paid in April 1956 was 992 and will exceed 1,000 for the first time in the present month.

DISABILITY ALLOWANCES—CONSULTATION WITH NEW BRUNSWICK

Question No. 54—Mr. Stuart (Charlotte):

1. Was the government of the province of New Brunswick consulted regarding the legislation passed by the federal government in 1954, to provide allowances for disabled persons?

2. Was the government of New Brunswick consulted with regard to (a) regulations; (b) definition of "total and permanent disability", as set forth in section 2, under the Disabled Persons Act?

3. Did the government of New Brunswick, in 1954, at the time the regulations and definitions were being considered, make any suggestions or proposals for broadening the coverage of the act, that were not adopted?

4. Has the government of New Brunswick at any time made representations to the minister as to the desirability of amending the legislation, the regulations, or the definition of "totally and permanently disabled", contained in the act?

Answer by: Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare):

1 and 2. The government of New Brunswick was represented by Dr. J. F. McInerney, minister of health and social services, and Mr. J. Ernest Anderson, chairman, old age assistance board, at a conference with all the provinces convened on January 26, 1954, to discuss the proposed federal legislation on the subject of disability allowances. Again on September 20 and 21, 1954, it was represented by Dr. McInerney and by Dr. Stewart, chief welfare officer of the provincial department of health and social services. In the course of these meetings the New Brunswick representatives expressed their views as to the desirable scope and extent of the proposed legislation, the age of eligibility, the income ceilings which should be considered, and the provisions to be included in the regulations having to do with the definition of "total and permanent disability". The definition which now appears in the regulations was agreed to by all the provinces, including New Brunswick, after full discussion, in the course of which various suggestions made by the provinces were incorporated into the wording of the regulations.

3. No. Except in respect of one item, the age of eligibility, the present legislation and regulations conform fully in all respects to the positions taken and suggestions made by the representatives of the province of New Brunswick at these meetings.

4. No.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL DEBTS

Question No. 152—Mr. Hahn:

What was the total gross and net of federal debt in 1935, 1939, 1945 and 1954, and what was the gross and net debt of each province for the same years?

FEDERAL EXPENDITURES—TAX RENTAL AGREEMENTS

Question No. 487—Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain):

1. What was the total expenditure in each province for the fiscal year 1954-55 by the federal government, including the statutory subsidy and payments under the tax rental agreements?
2. What was the total expenditure during the fiscal year 1954-55 by each federal government department and agency?

H.M.C.S. "QUADRA"—CATERING CONTRACT

Question No. 506—Mr. Barnett:

1. Is the messing for H.M.C.S. Quadra (formerly H.M.C.S. Naden III) provided by a caterer under contract?
2. If so, is this contract awarded on an annual or other basis?
3. Was the contract awarded after call for tenders?
4. Is the contract on a per head per day basis?
5. If so, what rates have been paid in each of the last three years?
6. If not, on what basis and at what rates have payments been made during the last three years?

FEDERAL EXPENDITURES, QUEBEC

Question No. 509—Mr. Lafontaine:

Since April 1, 1944, how much money has been spent or paid in the province of Quebec, each year, by each department or agency of the federal government?

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION, CAMPBELLTON, N.B.

Question No. 510—Mr. Van Horne:

1. Does the unemployment insurance commission have offices in the Rosenhek building in Campbellton, New Brunswick?
2. If so, how long have they occupied such premises?
3. What is the total amount of money paid for such premises to date?
4. What is the current monthly rental?
5. Does any other government agency rent space in this building?
6. If so, what is the rental paid?
7. Does any other government agency rent space elsewhere in Campbellton? If so, what rental is paid?

[Mr. Martin.]

TRANSPORT—USE OF PRIVATE RAILWAY CARS

Question No. 518—Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace):

1. Between April 15, 1956 and May 28, 1956, what trips were made by private railway cars controlled by the government from (a) Ottawa to points in the province of Quebec; (b) points in the province of Quebec to Ottawa?
2. Who was carried on each such trip?

PORT STANLEY, ONT.—FEDERAL PROPERTY

Question No. 524—Mr. McBain:

1. Is any land at Port Stanley, Ontario, owned by government departments? If so, what departments?
2. How extensive are these property holdings and how are they defined?
3. How much of this property, if any, is leased to any municipality or individuals or businesses, and who are the holders of such leases?
4. For how long are such properties leased and on what terms?

MOTION FOR PAPERS

UNITED STATES CORPORATIONS—CANADIAN SUBSIDIARIES

Motion No. 81—Mr. Hodgson:

For a return showing a list of the names and head offices of all Canadian subsidiaries of United States corporations in Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, after talking to the parliamentary assistant I have learned this would probably entail a lot of work and it is quite all right to take that motion off.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed the motion be dropped?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion dropped.

HEALTH INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO PARTICIPATION BY PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Elmore Philpott (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Will the minister inform the house how many of the provinces have intimated acceptance of the federal government's proposal to establish the first stage of a nation-wide system of health insurance, and how many more will have to agree before the government can go ahead with the scheme?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman was kind enough to indicate yesterday that he intended to ask this question. Three provinces have announced that they would accept in principle the proposal made by the federal government for a system of hospital insurance. Under the formula announced by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) it requires six provinces representing a majority of the people in the country.

Mr. Philpott: May I ask a supplementary question? Does the minister consider that the appointment by the government of Ontario of a commission to report on hospital administration indicates early acceptance of the federal government's offer?

Mr. Martin: I could not say whether or not the decision of the Ontario government to appoint a hospital commission indicates any more than what was said by the premier of the province when the personnel of that commission were appointed. I can only say what I have said elsewhere, that I remain very hopeful.

Mr. Dufresne: Could the minister give us the names of the provinces which have accepted?

Mr. Martin: Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia.

HOUSING

ALLEGED SCARCITY OF MORTGAGE FUNDS IN METROPOLITAN AREAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, may I ask if the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Public Works is in a position to answer the question I asked yesterday concerning the dearth of mortgage money in the metropolitan area of Toronto?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance did speak to me this morning about this question which I understand arose out of a telegram which he received. I might say that I have received the same telegram as have other members of parliament.

Mr. Fleming: The metropolitan home builders' association.

Mr. Winters: The telegram told of difficulties being experienced by some builders in obtaining mortgage credit. Briefly the situation is that up to the end of May, 1956, housing starts, in centres of 5,000 population and over, numbered 31,000, slightly above the corresponding period of 1955. Housing completions have run ahead of last year during the same five months, 35,000 in 1956 as compared with 33,000 in 1955. In a few centres there is some evidence of a decline in the volume of lending under the National Housing Act. At the end of the fifth month of this year, although the number of units approved for National Housing Act loans was down somewhat from the levels of last year, we are nevertheless assured of a good level of completions for 1956. The matter is kept under constant review by the government. I might point out that at the present moment the government does not contemplate any direct steps to increase the flow of mortgage funds for housing purposes.

Mr. Fleming: Is the minister not conscious of a contradiction in government policy as indicated by the express wish of the government through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to assist in the expansion of home construction, on the one hand, and the operations of the Bank of Canada with government approval of making money tight and dear, on the other hand?

Mr. Winters: Just before coming into the house I read the story in the Toronto Globe and Mail which referred to a contradiction, as did the telegram. I am aware of no contradiction. As a matter of fact, before we decided recently to raise the interest rate from 5¼ to 5½ per cent we had detailed discussions with the Department of Finance and the Bank of Canada. I am satisfied that what we have done is in harmony with the government's over-all fiscal policy.

[Later:]

INQUIRY AS TO REDEVELOPMENT IN MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Claude Richardson (St. Lawrence-St. George): Now that the Minister of Public Works has had a good rehearsal, may I ask him a question? It relates to a question that I asked on May 16, as recorded on page 4003 of Hansard. Has the government of the province of Quebec asked the federal government to co-operate or participate with the city of Montreal and the Quebec government in a slum clearance or rehabilitation project? If not, has there been any communication between the federal and the Quebec governments on this question?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): The answer to the first part of the question is no. Regarding the second part, I have received a resolution passed by the Montreal city council approving the project. After studying the terms of the resolution, I wrote to the premier of Quebec asking if the government of Quebec is prepared (a) to give approval as required under section 23 of the National Housing Act, for a slum clearance project and (b) to enter into an agreement with the federal government, as required under section 36, for a housing project on the cleared site. My letter to the premier was dated May 31, 1956.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TRADE

GATT—POSSIBLE EFFECT OF TARIFF CONCESSIONS ON TRADE DEFICIT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. O. C. Trainor (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Would the minister care to comment upon what will be the possible effects of the tariff concessions to the United States under GATT which he announced recently upon the already formidable Canadian deficit in the balance of trade between the two countries?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that the concessions gained from the United States will have a considerable effect in stepping up our exports to that country. On the other hand, I think the concessions Canada has made to the United States will have a very limited effect upon the trade in the particular articles indicated, practically all of which are of a class or kind not made in Canada.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

REQUEST FOR AIR CONDITIONING IN CAFETERIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Could the minister advise the house what steps have been taken during the past three weeks, the time since I first asked my question, to reduce the temperature in the cooking and serving area of the cafeteria to a liveable temperature?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): The hon. member raised the question in the house, and it was brought to my attention as well by other people. Admittedly the temperature in the cafeteria on warm days is high.

Mr. Fleming: It is about 110 degrees up there right now.

Mr. Hees: Particularly in the cooking and serving area.

Mr. Winters: The matter is being investigated, and we do propose to take some steps to correct it. There are several other parts of the building as well that need corrective action to be taken. They will be corrected at the same time, at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. Hees: Could I ask the minister when this action can be expected? It is now three or four weeks since the question was brought up, and the conditions are unliveable. I have investigated them personally, and the minister would know from his own knowledge if he went into that cooking and serving area what they are like. Can he give us some idea of when this job will be started?

Mr. Winters: The design work is being undertaken now. While I am not in a position to say when the work will be started, I should think it could be within the next, say, four weeks.

CANADIAN FORCES ACT

AMENDMENTS TO DEFENCE SERVICES PENSION ACT AND TO NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence) moved the third reading of Bill No. 416, respecting the Canadian forces.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

EMERGENCY GOLD MINING ASSISTANCE ACT

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND APPLICATION TO THE YEARS 1957 AND 1958

The house resumed, from Tuesday, June 12, consideration in committee of Bill No. 417, to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act—Mr. Prudham—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—Application of act to 1955, 1956, 1957 and 1958.

Mr. Fleming: In speaking on second reading last evening, I asked the government, through either the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, to make some statement concerning government policy, the kind of policy that might, we hope, lead to a solution of the problems of the gold mining industry rather than simply depending upon stop-gap emergency palliatives of the kind embodied in the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. May I ask the ministers if they will now make a statement of government policy in that regard? That statement should embrace government policy in regard to the price of gold so far as that is determined by the international monetary fund; second, their efforts to persuade the government of the United States to increase the price at which it is prepared to buy newly mined Canadian gold and, third, the policy of the Canadian government in purchasing newly mined gold for the Canadian government's own reserves.

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Chairman, I think that the question the hon. member has brought up with regard to the government's policy of holding gold reserves could much better be directed to the Minister of Finance when his estimates are before the house. So far as the efforts of the government to persuade the United States to increase the price of gold are concerned, I am sure that everything possible has been done in that regard. The fact that the United States is willing to buy all the gold offered at $35 per ounce gives a stability to the gold mining industry that does not exist in any other section of the mining industry or any other industry that I know of.

Hon. members have urged that the United States be requested to abandon that policy and to free the market for gold. As yet I have never heard anyone in the gold mining industry suggest that would be a good thing. At the present time the so-called free market for gold is below the fixed price of $35 per ounce. The high prices that have been quoted as having been obtained on the free market in years past have, I think, been related to conditions of panic that existed in various parts of the world and in no sense could be considered a stable market. The present quotation of between $34 and $35 an ounce in Switzerland would of course be decreased by the cost of transportation of gold to that country and the various service charges involved.

I believe that at the present time the fixed price of gold is really a stabilizing influence in the industry. We all admit it would be much better for the industry if the price were raised, but the raising of the price of gold would simply mean that the United States would be willing to give more United States goods and services for an ounce of gold.

Mr. Fleming: Or dollars.

Mr. Prudham: Or dollars. I contend that is a decision that rests with the United States. All producing countries would favour an increase in the price of gold, but in the final analysis it is a decision that the United States will have to make.

Mr. Fleming: I am not at all unmindful of what the minister has called the stabilizing effect of the assured market for gold production in the United States. Undoubtedly it has been a supporting and guaranteeing factor of considerable importance to the gold mining industry that there has always been that assured market at the price of $35 U.S. per ounce. Whatever has been said in times past about freeing the market has never been put forward by anyone, as far as I am aware, with any thought of losing the benefit of the assured market and assured price in the United States.

Mr. Prudham: The hon. member for Spadina advocated that last night.

Mr. Fleming: I am not sure that was involved in his advocacy of freedom in the marketing of gold. We have had extensive discussions in former sessions about permitting freedom in the marketing of gold, and a couple of years ago the government did move in the direction of permitting Canadian producers to market some of their production in the so-called free market. But I wish to say that I do not think anyone is proposing that we should lose the benefit of the assured market in the United States. We are mindful of the fact that it is a good thing to have an assured market for production when it is so important to this country that gold production be maintained.

As I understood him, the minister said that the government had taken some steps in the direction of seeking on the part of the United States government some increase in the price at which it is prepared to buy newly mined Canadian gold. Would the minister just confirm that understanding and indicate to the committee what steps have been taken in that regard? Is the Canadian government today urging upon the United States administration a policy of increasing above the prevailing $35 U.S. per ounce the price that the United States administration is prepared to pay for newly mined gold?

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Chairman, that matter has been the subject of discussion on different occasions. I cannot tell when the last occasion was, but the matter has been discussed several times.

Mr. Michener: Following up the question asked by my friend, I have a supplementary question to ask. I think we should press the minister for a specific answer to that question which he has just been asked. We know that Britain, France, South Africa and the minister himself are interested in an increase in the United States price of gold. The minister now tells us that he does not know when the government last made an attempt to consider that matter by conference with or request to the United States and others who are necessary parties to this change in price. I think the house is entitled to know exactly what steps the government has taken in the last 10 years—during which time this price has been covered by international agreement—to urge or request others to join in an increased price, and to know when the last attempt was made.

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Chairman, that is a fairly broad question. I cannot give that information in detail. I will say this, however. The last time President Eisenhower visited our capital I personally spoke to him about it.

Mr. Michener: Perhaps the Minister of Finance could assist his colleague in this matter?

Mr. Harris: I beg the hon. member's pardon?

Mr. Michener: I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the house is entitled to a better answer than we have had.

Mr. Fleming: The Minister of Finance did not hear your question.

Mr. Michener: The specific question was this. When was the last attempt made by this government to interest the necessary parties in an increase in the fixed price of gold by joint agreement?

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, if I may do so, I should like to answer this question instead of my colleague the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. I am not aware of any action that has been taken by this government with respect to asking the United States government to increase the price of gold. The answer which was last made on this subject in the house was made by my predecessor about three years ago now. At that time he made it quite clear that he realized it would be in the interests of the gold mining industry and the gold producers of Canada that there should be a higher price for gold. But he also made it clear that that was a matter which rested solely in the hands of the United States government which purchased the gold and that he did not feel that we should interfere in what he at that time termed a domestic matter in the United States. That answer was made by him in the course of a certain amount of questioning by my friend the hon. member for Eglinton, and I think it was his policy until he left office. Certainly it has been mine since I entered into the office on July 1, 1954.

Mr. Michener: Would the minister go a little bit further and indicate whether the government has considered the matter since then and whether it does not think that the time is ripe to bring this matter up again? After all, there are more countries involved than the United States, although everyone appreciates that their concurrence is necessary. I should think that very substantial allies would be found in a move in that direction, and what is the government thinking about that at the present time?

Mr. Harris: I think I have made my answer. Surely, everyone recognizes that a decision of the United States government to fix the price of the gold content of the United States dollar is within the sole competence of the United States government. We have many friendly and close contacts with that government in many fields. This is one however in which, in so far as I am concerned, while a certain amount of this kind of discussion might be desirable, I do not think it is the kind of thing on which we ought to approach them formally when, as a matter of fact, congress fixes the price of gold and it would not be a matter of the administration making a decision. It would be a matter of the administration recommending to congress and congress taking the appropriate action to increase the gold content of the dollar. As I say, I think that is wholly a domestic matter, and that probably we would have a better advantage in our other transactions if we did not enter into that particular one at the moment.

Mr. Fleming: Surely, the price the United States is prepared to pay for newly mined Canadian gold is not merely a United States domestic matter. Surely, it is a matter of interest to Canada as well as the United States. It is certainly a matter of interest to the United States, but I do not understand that it excludes the interests of this country where those interests of this country definitely lie with the gold mining industry in this regard. It seems to me there is some contradiction in the statements we have had here in regard to government policy.

Mr. Harris: No, there is not.

Mr. Fleming: Let us clear that up then, because it is evident from the statement made by the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys—

Mr. Prudham: I will do that right now. My colleague has spoken about the fiscal policy of the government. This department has nothing to do with policy in so far as the holding of gold is concerned or negotiations with the United States in regard to the price of gold. The Department of Finance does that.

Mr. Fleming: The minister spoke earlier about some discussion he had had with President Eisenhower when he was here last time, which was about a year ago. What was the substance of his discussion with the President? What did he ask of the President in relation to the price of gold?

Mr. Prudham: He was non-committal.

Mr. Fleming: Did the minister ask the President if he was prepared to recommend an increase in the price of gold? Was that the substance of the minister's request?

Mr. Prudham: Yes; I asked if there was any likelihood of an increase, and he was very non-committal.

Mr. Fleming: It is indicated by the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys that he considers an increase in the price of newly mined Canadian gold would be in the interests of Canada and would maintain the gold mining industry. I think it has been made quite clear by the Minister of Finance that during the two years he has been minister, and prior to that time, the government was not prepared to make any representations to the United States administration in that regard. I think it is about time the Canadian government decided what its policy is.

What is the interest of Canada in this respect? The statement that this is a matter of purely United States domestic concern completely ignores the fact that this is a matter of very lively concern to the Canadian economy. I do not at all follow the remarks of the Minister of Finance, Mr. Chairman, when he says that the price the United States is prepared to pay for gold is established by congress, and for that reason the Canadian government should not make representations to the United States administration in that regard. Surely, that is a very far-fetched kind of theory, because many of the fields in which representations are being made, as we understand it, on the part of the Canadian government to the United States administration at Washington are fields in which action is required or action has been taken by the United States congress. Of course, action on the part of congress would be required to change the price that the United States is prepared to pay for gold, but surely that is no reason why representations ought not to be made by the Canadian government to the United States administration, if it is in the interests of this country to seek an increase in the price the United States government is prepared to pay for newly mined Canadian gold. It is perfectly obvious, Mr. Chairman, there is no likelihood of the administration at Washington making any recommendation to congress in this regard if the Canadian government is not prepared to support the interests of Canada and of the Canadian gold mining industry by making representations to the United States administration at Washington to the same effect.

I think it has been made quite clear here today that one minister considers Canada should seek on the part of the United States administration an increase in the price they are prepared to pay for newly mined Canadian gold. It is perfectly evident at the same time that the Minister of Finance, and I take it the rest of the government, concurs in a policy of remaining silent and ignoring this problem and doing nothing to lay the interests of Canada before the United States administration at Washington with suitable representations in that regard. If that is the lackadaisical kind of attitude the Canadian government is going to take we shall be obliged to go on with the kind of measure now before us—hand-to-mouth, stop-gap, emergency, palliative measures—and ignore the essence of the problem and the need for facing up to it and seeking a solution.

If the Canadian government does not see fit to make any kind of representations in this matter to the United States administration at Washington, our nearest neighbour, I suppose there is not much use expecting this government to make any representations in the interests of the Canadian economy at meetings of the board of governors of the international monetary fund.

We do know that the South African government is not labouring under any such apathy or inhibitions. The South African government, as one of the great gold producing countries of the world, has not hesitated to lay its case before the international monetary fund and to request action on the part of that fund to increase the price of newly mined gold; but the Canadian government apparently is content to remain apathetic, lackadaisical and silent. Well, Mr. Chairman, that policy is just not good enough. It is that policy evidently that is making it necessary to continue measures of the kind we have before us. Of course, the gold mining industry should not be permitted to suffer further in the face of the apathy and indifference of this government. We shall have to have measures of this kind as long as the government is going to shirk its duty and ignore its responsibility; but believe me, Mr. Chairman, this government is going to have to face the strongest kind of criticism of which the opposition is capable if the government is going to go on ignoring the problem and the need of finding a solution.

Why should the Canadian government be so indifferent or so proud that they will not even take this matter up with Washington? There is just one minister, and I give him credit for it, the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, who had the courage and the realistic appreciation of the plight of the Canadian gold producers, and with that the plight of their employees and the communities dependent upon those mines, to lay this problem even briefly before President Eisenhower when he was here and to ask the president what the United States administration might be prepared to do.

It is not to be wondered at that the President was non-committal when the Canadian government has not the good sense to back up that kind of approach by the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. I give the minister full credit for that approach. I just wish that among his 19 colleagues there were some who had realism and concern enough about the plight of this industry and the employees and communities that are dependent on it to support him and make some representations at Washington.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, last evening when I was speaking on second reading and dealing according to information I had received with the plight of some miners in northern Ontario who were laid off in certain mines and could not obtain employment in others because they were over 40 years of age, the minister asked me this question:

Do you actually know of instances where that has taken place?

At that time I did not have my correspondence on the desk and on checking it over I find I was given this information: I find that nine miners were laid off at Kirkland Lake Gold last November and were not able to obtain employment at any mine in the area because they were over age. Their seniority ranged from 12 to 25 years and none of them is eligible for a pension.

My point was, of course, that according to the information given to me these nine married Canadian miners with long service in the mining industry are not able to obtain employment because they are over 40 years of age and their places will likely be taken in the near future, as will the jobs they wish to obtain, by single immigrants who are being brought out to this country.

Mrs. Shipley: Mr. Chairman, I would like to reply to this specific point raised by the hon. member for Kootenay West. In the first place these miners' places will not be taken by anyone. This was an unfortunate occurrence and the only one of which I have any knowledge in the whole Kirkland Larder gold camp. The ownership of the particular mine to which the hon. member referred changed hands and part of the new policy was to reduce the total number of employees, not to increase at all. These nine unfortunate miners were laid off.

I do not want the impression left that they were just over 40 years of age and therefore could not obtain employment in other mines. Inexperienced miners, those who have never worked in mines, are not taken on if they are over 40 years of age as a general rule, but experienced miners are taken on all the time if they are over 40 years of age. However, there is a limit to the age at which other mines will employ even experienced miners and that is the circumstance in this case.

Mr. Hodgson: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the minister a question. Why was the amount of subsidy on gold reduced in the 1949 formula and again in the 1955 formula when the cost of producing gold is still increasing?

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Dumas: —I do not intend—

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Chairman, the formula has been changed several times since the inception of the act in 1948. In the early years the mines were given an option of choosing a base year. These formulas are very complicated and I do not think it is advisable to go into them in detail. This last formula does not extend assistance to any mine whose costs are below $26.50 but it does apply to a large number of ounces; thus it gives greater assistance to the mine with high costs and especially a mine that has a large production of comparatively low grade ore. It is designed, as I say, to help the high cost mines and also to conserve our resources by encouraging the mining of lower-grade ores in many instances.

The mining associations—there are several —have all commended us for this last formula. They say it is fair; they would like to see more money made available, but they say it is very fair and possibly more fair than any formula that has heretofore ever been presented.

Mr. Hodgson: That would be the 1955 formula you are speaking of?

Mr. Prudham: Yes. There has been no complaint from any mining company or from any mining association that I know of.

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to take up more time of the committee than is necessary and I shall be brief in my remarks. However, I cannot allow this legislation to pass without saying a word on behalf of the gold miners, the ordinary working men, the businessmen and the small property owners of my constituency. The people of northwestern Quebec were not only pleased when the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act was enacted in 1948 and extended thereafter; they were greatly relieved because one of the principal industries of the district was able to continue its operations. They have been grateful to the government. Although they were convinced that some form of assistance was forthcoming, they appreciate the fact that this legislation is passed at this time.

From what has been said during the course of this debate it is evident that hon. members on all sides of the house are satisfied that this legislation should be extended for another period of two years. The Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act is evidence of the recognition by the government of the importance of the gold mining industry in the national economy. The welfare of the gold mining industry has always been regarded by the government and by parliament as of great importance. For this I wish to express my thanks for the fact that the government has come forward at this time with this legislation which is encouraging to industry and to residents of gold mining communities. We are all grateful for that.

When this legislation was enacted in 1948, and when it was extended and amended from time to time, there was little or no opposition. For this the residents of the gold mining communities are certainly grateful to all hon. members on all sides of this house. However, for the benefit and information of those who may have some doubt as to the wisdom of this legislation, I wish to repeat what I have said on numerous occasions when I have had the privilege of speaking on this matter.

It is true that there was no definite opposition to the measure, but from time to time hon. members have expressed the opinion that there have been some abuses in connection with this form of assistance and that it did not benefit the miners and communities dependent upon the industry as it should have done.

In 1947 the average annual wage of a miner working in a Canadian gold mine was $2,277; the corresponding figure for 1950 was $2,763, an increase of 21·3 per cent over 1947. In 1954 the average wage of a miner working in a Canadian gold mine was $3,400, an increase of 49 per cent over 1947. For the period for which figures are available from the dominion bureau of statistics, that is from 1948 to 1954 inclusive, we find that the total increase in wages and salaries paid by the gold producers was equivalent to more than 85 per cent of the total assistance paid by the Canadian government.

During that same period the gold mining industry paid over $40 million in federal, provincial and municipal taxes, which item alone represents 50 per cent of the total assistance received. During the same period the total amount of wages and salaries paid by the gold mining industry amounted to $443 million. The aggregate cost of supplies, plant and equipment, buildings and machinery in the same period amounted to $383 million. These figures are impressive and it is important to take them into consideration. While wages, supplies and freight are the principal items of cost in operating a mine, they are by no means the only factors which contribute to an increase in the cost of operation. In addition, account must be taken of improved health and welfare services, increased rates of workmen's compensation and many other items which total some quite substantial amounts.

We must be reminded that the gold mining industry is the only industry which has to absorb these increases in the cost of operation without being able to pass on to the consumer any portion of the increased costs. In order to give a striking example to hon. members of this house and to establish the extent to which operating expenses have increased in the gold mining industry during the last 15 years I should like to cite some figures taken from the annual report of an important gold mine in my own home town of Malartic.

During the year 1940 the gross revenue of this mine was $3,424,000, substantially the same as for 1955 when it amounted to $3,473,000. However, in 1940 the operating costs were $1,319,000 with a net profit of $1,568,000. In 1955, notwithstanding more efficient mechanical equipment and other economies, the costs soared to $2,527,000 while the net profit shrank to $261,000.

The price of gold has been kept down to the 1934 basis of $35 U. S. per ounce while the cost of production has gone away up. In view of this it must be realized that the industry has no alternative but to accept government assistance even if this assistance falls short of compensating for the rise in production costs.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to say something regarding the dividends which are being paid out from time to time by Canadian gold mines. The remark was made the other day that in one year the dividends paid out by Canadian gold mines amounted to $18 million and that these gold mining companies received $16 million in subsidies from the government. I did not verify the amount of $18 million paid out in dividends by the Canadian gold mines during 1954, but I accept this figure. However, I wish to say this, in order to put the record straight. The gold mines that did not alter their dividend rates and those which are paying the bulk of this $18 million in dividends are those which are not in the receipt of assistance.

Whatever dividends are being paid these days by most of the gold mines are taken from surplus earned from other sources than their actual operations. Others are squeezing their dividends from accumulated surplus earned during the good years before the second world war. Many other gold mines are not paying any dividends at all. How long they will be able to continue to do that, we do not know. For how long they will be able to ask their shareholders to be patient, we do not know either. They certainly cannot tell their shareholders that this is a new way of operating a business.

From 1948 to 1954 inclusive, out of 27 Quebec gold mines which received assistance from the government, 15 never paid any dividends. Five others paid less than $500,000 each during those seven years. The six other remaining gold mines paid dividends on a reduced rate, and it is important to note that during that same period those six gold mines paid over $75,000 in increased wages alone, over and above what they received in assistance from the government.

The shareholders in the Canadian gold mining industry number many thousands and the great majority of them are small shareholders. We must keep that in mind. I will go so far as to say that the government, both in its role of tax collector and in its role of representative of the broader interests of all Canadians, has the responsibility to hang on to the gold mining industry, and hanging on to the gold mining industry means helping the shareholders, the employees, the small property owners, the farmers and the business people dependent on gold mining.

I also wish to remind the members of this house that the gold mining industry, important as it is, is only one branch of the metal mining industry of this country. This mining industry gives employment to some 130,000 men, who in turn are the supporters of more than 500,000 people. So, in trying to establish some comparison between the assistance allocated to the gold mines and that which is granted to other key industries, it would be only fair to keep those figures in mind.

An advance in the price of gold, I will admit, is the only permanent solution to the problem of the Canadian gold mines; but, as our country is not the largest producer or the largest seller of the precious metal, we cannot dictate a price and much less influence buyers by refusing to sell. We are faced with this problem, that the price of gold can be raised only by joint international action in which the initiative rests with our neighbours to the south, the United States of America.

The Canadian gold mining industry is passing through very difficult years, and the only final solution lies in a realistic valuation for gold in terms of the inflated United States dollar. The argument that this would result in further inflation and would help the communist nations more than those of the free world is only wishful thinking.

Meanwhile we are all aware that the production and sale of gold are of great importance to the Canadian economy. As it is, and until there is an increase in the price of gold, we must agree that the government will have to continue its assistance to the gold mines of our country.

Mr. Herridge: I wish to thank the lady member for Timiskaming, apparently the unofficial parliamentary assistant to the minister, for kindly reading her well-prepared answer to my question. But I want to say that, when a member asks a question of the minister, I think he is entitled to a reply from the minister. I wish to say also that the hon. lady member did not deal very fully with the situation. There is much more to it than that. But we are going to leave that until the Minister of Labour's estimates come before the house.

Yesterday I asked the minister some other questions. Would he mind answering them now, not forgetting Mr. Ramsay?

Mr. Prudham: My hon. friend asked me a number of questions yesterday on second reading. This morning I reviewed Hansard and made a note of those questions. The first question, I believe, related to a certain Mr. Ramsay, and I am going to ask my colleague the Minister of Labour to speak to that in a moment or two.

In regard to the employment of immigrants in the gold mines, my "unofficial parliamentary assistant" has dealt with that to some extent, in relation to the problem in that particular area. This morning I had my secretary call the department of immigration to find out how many new immigrants had come to Canada recently to work in the mining industry. These are the figures for the last ten years from January 1, 1946, to December 31, 1955, inclusive:

New Brunswick	19
Quebec	467
Ontario	1,349
Manitoba	140
Saskatchewan	66
Alberta	435
British Columbia	335
Yukon and Northwest Territories	18
	2,889

That makes a total for the ten years of 2,889 people. That averages about 288 per year, and that is not a figure that should alarm anyone. That is for all mines. I believe that any immigrant who comes to this country and does an honest day's work, whether it be in agriculture, forestry, in the factories or in the mines, is a real asset to this country.

Some time ago my hon. friend from Timiskaming brought up the question of employment and labour conditions in mining areas and she had a word with my colleague the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. He suggested that it would be a worth-while experiment to employ Indians in the mines. That matter was taken up with the secretary of one of the mining associations, and he relayed the suggestion to members of that association. I was very pleased indeed, on a recent trip to the gold mines of northwestern Ontario, to see quite a large number of Indians working in the mines along with the other people and doing a good job.

I do not think there is any cause for alarm about new people coming into the industry. They will help to rejuvenate the industry rather than to destroy it. I think two or three of my hon. friend's questions were related to the same subject. He spoke of the problem of over-age employees of a mine that has closed down having difficulty in finding new employment. That is common in the mining industry generally. It is true in the coal mines and all the way through. But I believe that the mechanization that is taking place in the mines is going to make it less likely that people over 40 years of age will, as my hon. friend has said, have extreme difficulty in finding new employment.

The old hard slugging type of labour in the mines is gradually being done away with and the efficient operation of the mines depends on skill, on men who have experience in operating machines. I am sure that if a mine found it necessary to hire additional personnel and had a choice between one man 40 or 50 years of age, with long experience and who was well qualified in a technical way, and another person without experience they would favour the man with experience. I believe that is the tendency so far as employement in the mines is concerned.

There is no doubt that the mining industry as a whole is suffering from the lack of skilled labour, and I do know that various individual mines and associations of mining companies are trying to recruit skilled employees from Great Britain and Europe. When my colleague, the Minister of Labour, speaks, I believe he will mention that fact and will also tell about the efforts of his department to place in steady employment those people who happen to have lost their jobs because of a shut-down.

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, last night, as my colleague has said, the hon. member for Kootenay West asked the following question as found at page 4975 of Hansard:

> Is Mr. William Ramsay, who has gone to Europe to recruit labour for the mining industry, still an employee of the federal Department of Labour?

Mr. William Ramsay has been an employee of the unemployment insurance commission and has been the manager of the office of that commission at Kirkland Lake. Mr. Ramsay has been working in very close association with the mining industry and knows very well the qualifications required so far as workers are concerned. It happens that he is now approaching or is at the age of superannuation. Because of his knowledge the Canadian mining association made special representations asking that Mr. Ramsay be granted permission to proceed overseas to recruit workers for the mines. I want to point out at this juncture that the most important part of that recruitment was not wholly or solely intended for the gold mining industry. The purpose of his trip was primarily to secure workers for the base metal mines.

Mr. Herridge: At whose expense?

Mr. Gregg: I am coming to that. Mr. Ramsay was granted leave of absence without pay for three months to so act and he has gone overseas. His remuneration and expenses are being taken care of by the mining association. Before he went overseas he discussed the whole question with the officials of the department of immigration in Ottawa, and in his work overseas he is working from and in close association with the offices of that department in the United Kingdom and in Europe. That is the story with respect to Mr. Ramsay.

My colleague has indicated the comparatively small number of workers who have come here from other countries to work as miners in Canada, and it was because of the great need that the mining association asked that this step be taken. I have looked over the other matters mentioned on page 4975 with regard to the conditions of labour, to which the hon. member for Kootenay West referred. I am inclined to think that the reports he has received are perhaps a little bit overdrawn. There are several safeguards. One is that organized labour is going to see to it that workers in the mines, whether they come from overseas or wherever they come from, are not going to be forced to accept unduly low wages for their work in the mines. Another safeguard is the eagle eye of the provincial departments of labour under whose jurisdiction these workers come. Finally, of course, there is the freedom of action that still exists for workers in Canada. If a worker in a mine finds that conditions are as bad as my hon. friend has had reported to him, there is nothing to forbid that worker from finding work elsewhere in Canada or in other mines in Canada. Therefore I should like to stress my feeling, that there is no justification for fear with regard to the dangers that the hon. member for Kootenay West foresees in bringing in a few more workers.

Mr. Herridge: I thank the minister for his explanation. I do not foresee danger in bringing in immigrants as workers provided they are not going to be used in positions that could be filled by men such as I have described, particularly when they are older men with their homes and investments already established.

I want to ask the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys another question. As the one responsible for administering this act, would he do what he could to bring about some arrangement with the companies seeking assistance under the act whereby any company receiving assistance will give consideration to the particular circumstances involved where a man may be laid off from one mine because it has closed down and because he is over age he cannot obtain employment in another mine? He has got his investment there as a Canadian citizen of long residence, has worked for a long time in the industry, and I think he should receive every consideration. Is the minister willing to go into that situation with the mining companies concerned to see that everything possible is done to protect these Canadian mine workers who are affected?

Mr. Prudham: The purpose of the act is to keep these mines alive and to provide employment for miners and the dependent communities. Under the act we cannot wield a big stick. As my colleague has stated, labour relations come under the provincial governments. So far as this act is concerned, we only pay out assistance on the basis of the cost of production within the terms of the act.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the hon. gentleman would allow me to say one word. Whenever any special representations are made to the department of immigration by any industry that there is a shortage of workers of a particular kind for that industry, we always go to the Department of Labour and find out if, according to their records, there are any people anywhere in Canada who would be available to do these things before we look for immigrants, and we intend to continue to do so. The reason I am speaking at all is to say that I have reminded any employer or group of employers who have come to see me in the last year from any industry that there are in Canada an increasing number of Indians who have got to find employment other than their traditional employment, and I should like to express my gratification at the response I have had everywhere to that request, and from nowhere more than from the mining industry.

Mr. Herridge: I am very glad to know it.

Mr. Michener: Mr. Chairman,—

Mr. Barnett: I wonder whether the hon. member for St. Paul's was intending to pursue a different line of questioning?

Mr. Michener: Yes.

Mr. Barnett: I was very much interested in the question which was raised yesterday on second reading by my friend the hon. member for Kootenay West and also in some of the replies he received today from the ministers concerned. I think it is important —as I perhaps said the last time this matter was up for consideration—that this question of the standard of living and the working conditions that are going to apply under the circumstances where the public funds are being paid out should be of great concern to the members of this house. The Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys earlier made reference to some figures, and mentioned the number of immigrants who had been brought into the country to work in mines. He stated that was the total for all classifications of mines. However, I think it might perhaps be fair to say that the admittedly substandard or—and I think this was the word used by the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys yesterday—lower wage rates and the admittedly somewhat poorer working conditions that apply in the gold mining industry when contrasted with those in the base metal mines have probably resulted in a large proportion of those immigrants who have come to work in mines ending up in the gold mining camps. This would be generally true in the mining industry as a whole.

I know—and I mention this because it verifies in part the claims that were made by the hon. member for Kootenay West last night—that in one of the gold mining camps in central British Columbia which I visited last summer—actually it was part of a holiday trip on the way home from the end of the session—that that particular matter was drawn to my attention in conversations I had while I was there. By way of explanation, I might say that this was in a gold mining camp in which I had lived for eight or nine years, and that I was talking to people whom I had known since 1933, and who had been continuously since that time—and probably prior to that time in some cases—engaged in one manner or another in the gold mining industry. That was the comment I heard in that particular camp from a good many quarters, from people who were intimately familiar with all that had gone on in the period that had elapsed since I had left there. That comment was in effect that the mining operation was being flooded by recent immigrants to this country.

I think perhaps it is understandable that the experienced miners of British Columbia who have been in this country over a longer period of years may have gravitated to other mining camps engaged in other phases of the mining industry where wages and conditions may be somewhat better. I think it is an unfortunate situation—and one that should give us pause—to realize that there is a good deal of truth in what the hon. member for Kootenay West was suggesting last night, namely that these people who come as strangers to our land all too often seem to end up in the least desirable situations and occupations that are to be offered in this country. Some might argue that there is perhaps a certain rude justice in that situation and that they should be obliged to do a bit of the dirty work before they graduate into the more lucrative and desirable occupations. Nevertheless there is a tendency—and I have seen too many concrete examples of it here and there; and in this reference I may say I am not referring particularly to the gold mining industry—to exploit these people coming as newly landed immigrants to our shores.

I think it is certainly right that the hon. member for Kootenay West should have raised this particular question while we were considering a bill to extend the provisions of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. I think we all recognize that a great deal of what was said a short time ago about the situation of the gold mining industry, in the analysis that was given to us, is perfectly true. Anyone who has been associated with the industry in any way or who lived in a gold mining area back in the days of the early 30's recognizes the basic economics of the situation that exists today in relation to the fixed price of gold. But nevertheless, every time this question comes up, as far as I am concerned I feel that every emphasis should be given to the fact that, if we are going to allow this money to be spent from the consolidated revenue fund of Canada for the assistance of this industry, our primary concern should be a humanitarian one.

The place of gold in our economy is a subject that has already been discussed and I would not like to argue with some of the things that have been said both by hon. members from the government side of the house and by some of the hon. members of the official opposition who have an interest in and a knowledge of conditions in the industry. But certainly I feel that the hon. member for Kootenay West was fully justified in bringing the matter directly, in the form of questions, to the attention of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys and also in indicating that this question was one which should be of concern to other ministers such as the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and the Minister of Labour.

Mr. Eyre: Mr. Chairman, I hope you will not call me to order too often. I had intended to speak on the motion for second reading of this bill, but yesterday I was in committee from 10.30 o'clock in the morning until after ten o'clock in the evening and I did not get an opportunity to do so. Hence if I am a little bit out of order in speaking on the bill, I hope hon. members will let me go on.

Since the introduction of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act in 1948 and since my election to this house in 1949 I have never taken part in any previous debates on this particular subject. At that time I felt that the house did not want too much repetition and that there were others who were probably more qualified to speak than was I. However, at this time I think probably I should say a few words because this may be the last opportunity that I shall have to speak on this legislation. I say that for several reasons. I might not be here at the next parliament—and the bill is to give an extension to 1958—maybe for political reasons and maybe for others. I should therefore like to get a few things on the record.

May I say this to the minister at this time. You and your department are doing a good job as far as the gold mining industry is concerned. I want it to be understood right now that any figures I quote and anything else I say are going to apply strictly to my constituency. I am not going into the situation in Canada as a whole. That matter has been very well covered by my colleague the hon. member for Villeneuve. I am not going to tell you what a fine town Timmins is. It has been there for a long time and it is one of the biggest gold mining towns in Canada. This can be verified by those in this house who have visited it. To those who have not done so, may I say that I hope they will come up there some time and look over our modern town. My constituency is predominantly a gold mining area, except for one asbestos mine over at Matheson which came into production a few years ago. In my opinion we have weathered the storm very well. We have not lost too much in production nor have we lost too much in population. We are not as well off as we were prior to 1948, but by and large the town of Timmins is in good shape and some of the mines are in pretty fair shape, too.

I want to say at this time that the extention of this gold mining assistance act is welcome news to the mines in my community and to the people as a whole. Gold, as some of you know, was third in 1955 amongst the metals mined in the province of Ontario. The Porcupine mines shared in that to the extent of about 45 per cent of Ontario's whole production. You can see from that that gold mining is rather the major and basic industry in Timmins.

Yesterday or the day before there were figures put on the record, and I am not going to get into a controversy with anybody about figures. If I happen to quote figures and they happen to be out a little bit, that is to be understood. In his very fine presentation on behalf of the gold mines I noticed that the minister made a reference to four people being employed on the surface for every one employed underground in the mine. This reference appears on page 4916 of Hansard for June 11, 1956. I think what the minister had in mind was the local vicinity. I am asking that question because I think I have read somewhere, although I could not find it this morning, that for every man employed underground in a gold mine to take out a ton of ore, in the neighbourhood of nine people were supported in other industries and services on the surface. I am not trying to correct the minister in any way whatever, and I may need to be corrected on my own figures.

I noticed in yesterday's Hansard that the hon. member for Spadina spoke for a few minutes about the minting of gold coins. This question was brought up in the house two or three years ago and at that particular time I supported the minting of gold coins. I advocated that we should try it. I notice that you can now carry gold coins with you. In fact, I happened to see the first one in quite a few years the day before yesterday.

I believe it was the hon. member for Kootenay West who referred to immigrants who were brought in to work in the mines. I believe this question was well answered by the Minister of Labour. I have been asked several times why this was allowed, and why the department brought in these immigrants, and I did not know the answers. I understand the policy better now. So far as Mr. Ramsay is concerned, I have known him personally for over 40 years, and they could not have picked a better man to go over to select help for the mining industry. It was also my understanding that this help was for the mining industry as a whole. I do not agree with the hon. member for Kootenay West that the immigrants live in bunkhouses and rooming houses. It has been my observation over the past few years that the men who have come into Porcupine from other countries to work in the mines, a few from England, Scotland, not so many from Ireland, and from Germany or Italy, have all made fine citizens and have bought homes. I think probably the hon. member had in mind the single men who come to that area. It is my understanding that they are bringing married men and their families as well.

Mr. Herridge: I was informed that they were largely single men.

Mr. Eyre: You spoke of that, but you did not speak about the married men.

Mr. Herridge: I did not know anything about them.

Mr. Eyre: I noticed that, according to the newspapers, a fellow in England wanted to come to Canada to work in the gold mines. He was talking to Mr. Ramsay and said he wanted to come. The next day he said, "I cannot go; my wife will not let me. What am I going to do?" Mr. Ramsay said, "You had better take your wife's advice and stay at home." I understand they are bringing married men over here.

Mention was made of the salaries. As I said before, I am going to deal with one mine and I am not going to put the name of the mine on the record. I did not get these figures from the mine but I got them from a source connected with the mining industry. These figures refer to one of our larger mines but they apply to most of the mines in my constituency. In the year 1947 the payroll was over $3 million. In 1954 the payroll was close to $4·5 million, and the average number of employees during all these years runs about the same. In fact, they have 105 more employees now than they had in 1947. Basing it on those figures for 1947 and 1954, I would say that in my opinion every man received a fairly good increase in wages. The figures refer to some members of the staff but do not include management. I am not going into the wage question and try to say what the wage should be.

Mr. Herridge: What rate per hour are they getting now?

Mr. Eyre: I cannot put that figure on the record at the moment because I do not happen to have it with me. If you base your calculation on 1,100 men and take a payroll of $3¼ million and then take 1,100 men with a payroll of $4·5 million, you will be close. That is just about the way it runs all the way through.

I noticed also that according to yesterday's Hansard the hon. member for St. Paul's spoke. I must say that the hon. member for St. Paul's is quite qualified to speak about gold mines. I know of several with which he is connected in my constituency. The hon. member has dealt with the international monetary fund, and so on. I have no intention of getting involved in a debate on that subject but I will say, sir, that the hon. member for St. Paul's put some fine figures on the record which are general and apply in large part to the mines in my constituency.

The hon. member spoke about the average age of the miners. Having been connected with mining directly and indirectly for a number of years I have built up a substantial library on mining, especially gold mining. I have in my hand some figures covering the pre-war period and up to the end of 1954 as they apply to some of the mines in Porcupine. The average age prior to the war was 35·16 years. The average age in 1954 was 39·09 years. There may be something in what the hon. member for Kootenay West said, because I notice the highest average age in any one mine in 1954 was 41·2 years and the lowest average was 34 years. This, of course, refers to Porcupine only.

I have some further figures which can be verified. Porcupine, including all mines, employed 7,300 men in 1951. At the end of 1954 they employed 6,315 men. There has been a decrease as far as the number of employees is concerned in my constituency.

I must say the new formula that was put in last year is in my opinion the best formula we have had throughout the life of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. I would like to see more money available, but be that as it may, I hope the day will come before the act expires when we will not have to ask for any assistance for the gold mines.

Hindsight is so much easier than foresight, but if there had been a formula of this type in operation at the beginning it would have done away with a lot of our troubles. When I refer to our troubles I refer more or less to the controversy concerning wages and things of that nature. There were mines that were receiving a large amount of subsidy, and when you saw headlines in the papers that a mine had paid out two or three million dollars in dividends and received $1 million in subsidy, the reaction right off the bat was that the government was paying 50 per cent of the dividends and that is not a true picture at all.

With reference to the nine men or nine families that were supported by the man in the mine—that may include him also—I would like to leave a thought with you concerning what this means to other communities outside the immediate mining community. If we take 50 per cent of the number of people who are living off the production of a mine as representing those who do not live in the community, in my opinion it affects the prosperity of a great many other communities.

I hold in my hand figures concerning a particular mine. In 1951 this mine purchased $2,422,340 worth of supplies from outside the immediate community. I wish to put on the record the number of communities that benefited from those purchases. In the neighbourhood of 50 communities in Ontario, 14 in Quebec, and St. Boniface, Winnipeg, Port Alberni and Vancouver benefited. You can readily see, therefore, how the purchases of mining communities affect communities outside the mining area. In the good old days—and I mean when the price of gold was high and things were going along pretty well—one mine up there purchased outside supplies to the total value of $5,818,000.50. That is a lot of money to distribute in various communities located outside the mining area, and I notice that the figures for an 8-year period are about the same.

With reference to dividends, I do not know what some people consider a proper dividend to receive on money invested. I guess it is human nature to want to receive all that one can. I have here figures for the year 1951 concerning some mines in my constituency and I notice the yield has been greatly reduced since 1951. I shall not give the name of the mine, but the highest yield on the investment was 7·05 per cent. I find the lowest yield on the investment was 1·80 per cent. This particular mine employs a considerable number of men and at the moment I do not think it would pay any dividend, although of course I do not know.

When the new formula came in I thought it would probably adversely affect the cost of production of mines in my constituency, but I find that it has helped them. I would like to go into that matter for just a moment if I may be allowed the time, Mr. Chairman, and if the hon. members are willing to bear with me; but before I do so let me say a word concerning the number of ounces produced.

The figures I have are not right to the ounce. My constituency produced 110,114 ounces of gold in 1953, a decrease of roughly 17,000 ounces from 1948. In 1955 we produced nearly 84,485 ounces of gold, which was a decrease of approximately 8,796 ounces during the years in which the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act has been in effect. If you consider the figures for 1948 and 1953 it will be seen that the difference in production is not too great. Taking the 11 producing mines in my constituency—there was one I did not consider because there has been an amalgamation in the last two or three years and I could not separate it—four mines show an increase in production since 1948 while six show a decrease. The increase amounted to over 50,000 ounces while the decrease totalled 71,000 ounces, which left a net difference of approximately 20,000 ounces.

These mines are doing a fine job in trying to keep their costs down. Every man employed in the mines is trying to find ways and means of keeping costs down and inventing ways to do things more cheaply.

For just a moment I should like to deal with the question of secondary industries in northern Ontario as a whole and in my own constituency in particular. This matter has been referred to by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, the hon. member for Timiskaming and others, and it has been said that the government should do something to assist in the establishment of secondary industries. I should like to put on the record the fact that two years ago a survey was made in my constituency by most capable men under the direction of the Minister of Defence Production. A report was submitted, and I have hopes that something will be done in the near future.

In addition others have been looking into the possibilities of establishing secondary industries which would be beneficial to Canada as a whole. An association has been formed in northern Ontario to cover the area down to Sault St. Marie and Sudbury. The office is in North Bay and operations are carried on under the direction of the provincial government, which is paying $10,000 a year toward the cost of keeping up that office and employing an administrator, an investigator and so on.

The town of Timmins has an aggressive industrial commission which works in conjunction with the Porcupine chamber of commerce. In the past few months the town of Timmins employed a firm of experts in Montreal to come in and make a survey, working in conjunction with the local industrial commission, the commission set up in North Bay and the dominion government. I have hopes that something will be accomplished in the Porcupine area. If that should come about it would be of assistance also to the hon. member for Timiskaming. We have a few secondary industries, but they are small and are related more to the local scene.

Reference has been made to subsidies and assistance for the gold mines. I appreciate that, and I appreciate also how much it appears to be costing the taxpayers. However, actually I do not think it is costing the taxpayers anything and I shall try to prove my point. The figures I am going to give do not come from the Department of National Revenue or any department of government. In the last couple of years alone over 6,000 miners working in the mines in my constituency have paid nearly $2 million in income tax. I do not know what the other local people would have paid in the same period, but it would be a considerable sum. Then when we consider the industries which are supported by the gold mines we would find that the income tax there would be substantial. The amount received under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act in my area in 1953 was a little over $3 million; in 1952 it was around $2 million, and in the years prior to that it was over $3 million.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but it is my duty to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Eyre: Perhaps it is just as well that you are closing me off.

Mr. Michener: Mr. Chairman, now that we have heard from the hon. member for Timmins there would seem to be support for the proposition we made to the minister that he should consider amending this bill and restoring the rates which were in effect a year ago. We heard from the hon. member for Villeneuve, who knows a good deal about this industry, having had long experience as a surveyor, and I believe he agrees with us when we say that while changes in the formula might have to be made from time to time, the substantial reduction which took place last year, amounting to 44 per cent, should be eliminated. On the forecast of next year's payments it will be a reduction of 50 per cent in the course of two years. However, that appears to be the government's fixed intention.

In tribute to the gold mines I wish to put on record one or two facts from the report of the Ontario committee on gold mining, which was referred to last night. That is the committee under the chairmanship of Professor Knox which reported last year to the Ontario government. It collects much useful and up to date information about gold mining in Ontario.

One figure in which I think the committee will be interested is the increase in wages paid by gold mines. The average wage over and above the payment of this assistance has increased 50 per cent, from about $2,200 to $3,200 a year. For the 10,600 gold miners in Ontario that is something like a $10 million increase in annual wages over the period during which this assistance has been paid, so one can see that the increase in wages paid in Ontario alone is more than the entire subsidy in all Canada in the same period. The entire subsidy is estimated to be $9,300,000. The increase in wages is something like $10,600,000 over the wages paid when the subsidy first came into force. This indicates that the gold mining industry is helping itself as well as receiving this emergency assistance which it needs from the government.

There is a very interesting table, too, on the composition of the men in the different gold mining camps of Ontario, and I commend it to those who have spoken about the age groups. It is an interesting fact that of the 10,988 gold miners who are tabulated and classified according to age at page 84 of this report 2·2 per cent were over 65 years of age, which I think bears out what has been said, that the mechanization of the mines makes it possible for men to carry on after their years of greatest physical vigour. Some 3·5 per cent were between the ages of 60 and 64. I understand that in the civil service a man is considered ineligible after 65, and in some places after 60, but here we have 3·5 per cent of the gold miners in Ontario between the ages of 60 and 65. The table is there for those who wish to see it, and I shall not take the time of the committee to read it. As I say, 64 per cent of the miners were under 44 years of age, but the fact that they are distributed over the entire working period indicates the stability of these communities and the social value of this measure, which will help to save these solid communities where men work throughout their entire working days.

Now I wish to ask one question in concluding my remarks on this section. The minister indicated that five gold mines closed during the past year when the reduced rates of assistance were in force. I should like to have the names of the five mines which found it necessary to close their operations.

Mr. Prudham: There were two mines closed in British Columbia. One was the Nickel Plate mine and the other the French mines of Kelowna Mines Hedley Limited. In Quebec there were the Powell Rouyn Gold Mines Limited and the New Senator-Rouyn Limited. There was also Young-Davidson Mines Limited in the Matachewan area of Ontario.

Mr. Michener: Not the Matachewan Consolidated Mines?

Mr. Prudham: No.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the minister whether any consideration has been given by the government to the revision of the scale? I am not thinking so much about the basis for the formula because, as has been indicated, there has been some reason to think that the formula as such is more satisfactory than the preceding formulae. Could it be made a little more generous?

Mr. Prudham: We think this is working out quite satisfactorily. We do not think we would be justified in asking parliament to spend the taxpayers' money to assist mines whose costs are below $26.50 per ounce. Mines whose costs are above $26.50 per ounce are receiving in most cases as much as they did previously under the other formula.

Mr. Fleming: How many mines now in operation is it estimated will not be in operation a year from now?

Mr. Prudham: It is very difficult to answer that question, as my hon. friend knows, but our officials say there will possibly be two.

Mr. Fleming: Two more casualties?

Mr. Prudham: Two casualties, mainly because of the exhaustion of ore.

Mr. Fleming: There was one other matter touched on last night on which nothing has been said yet. The Minister of Finance is not here, although he was here at the opening of the committee sitting this afternoon. There was a matter raised last night in regard to government purchases of gold for various reserve funds that the government maintains, whether in the Bank of Canada or in the exchange funds. Can we have some statement of government policy in this regard?

Mr. Prudham: I believe the government reserves of gold are somewhere about $1 billion. My hon. friend from St. Paul's mentioned the fact that last year I suggested that he was willing to gamble the taxpayers' money. I think it is a matter of exercising good judgment as to how large a reserve the government should hold. If the United States were to take the advice of the hon. member for Spadina, abandon the fixed price for gold and throw the world on the free market again, I am a little doubtful whether it would be considered good business for the government to have as large a hoard as we have right now. On the other hand, if the United States government were to accept the advice of the hon. member for Eglinton and raise the price of gold the government would stand to profit. I think it is just a matter of exercising prudent judgment as to the level at which the government reserves of gold should be maintained. If the fixed price for gold should be abandoned by the United States and the price went down, I am sure my hon. friend would criticize the government for having such a large stock on hand and losing money. On the other hand, if they should raise the price I think he would say we should have had a larger hoard.

Mr. Fleming: I am a little surprised at the minister's remarks. It does not sound to me as though he entertains much confidence in the future of gold. If he does not entertain much confidence in the future of gold, I think it is going to be a factor in qualifying the outlook for the gold mining industry in this country. I had hoped from what the minister said in his remarks yesterday that he did have a sense of confidence in the future of gold. It is an important industry in this country. If there is no future for gold, there is no future for the gold mining industry in this country.

It seems to me, as I endeavoured to say last night, that the Canadian government could do something quite useful for the outlook for this important industry by showing its confidence in the future of the commodity they are producing. Nobody is proposing any vast increase in the holdings. However, as I indicated last night, while there has been a slight increase in the government's holdings of gold in each of the last four years my information is that in 1956, that portion of it which has elapsed thus far, the government's total gold holding has decreased. That is not a very good advertisement. That does not suggest that the government has confidence in the future of this important Canadian commodity.

I think the minister's last remarks this afternoon are disappointing. Has the minister nothing to say as Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys to indicate his confidence in the future of this Canadian commodity, a commodity that is still being sought by every country in the world and which is a factor in the fiscal and trading policies of every country in the world, whatever its system of government, and that includes the totalitarian governments as well? Is the Canadian parliament now to be told that the government is lacking in faith in the future of gold and is timid about making purchases of gold for holding in reserves that the government keeps anyway? After all, it is only a question whether the government holds gold or United States dollars in that fund.

The minister conjures up the possibility of the United States government withdrawing from its policy of purchasing—

Mr. Prudham: The hon. member for Spadina recommended that last night.

Mr. Fleming: I do not think he recommended that last night at all. I think what the hon. member for Spadina recommended was that more leeway should be given to the Canadian mines to market their product, whether in the free market or in the United States. After all, some of us on this side had to press the government hard before the government embarked several years ago on the policy of permitting sales of gold in the free market, and we had to complain afterwards that the terms upon which the government was permitting those sales in the free market were very rigid. So rigid, in fact, and so stiff were the terms that they really nullified to a substantial degree whatever benefit the mines would have had from that limited right to sell their product on the free market.

Mr. Prudham: Are you suggesting that situation still obtains?

Mr. Fleming: There was a good deal of criticism in regard to rigidity, and I think I was one of those who urged on the government that they should be much less rigid in the application of that policy, that they should remove some of the fetters that were still imposed upon the gold producers and let the producers enjoy as much benefit as they could from the still limited basis upon which they were entitled to enter the free market.

But let us come back to the point with which I was dealing. The minister conjures up the possibility that the United States might abandon its policy of purchasing newly mined gold at the price of $35 U. S. per ounce.

Mr. Prudham: I did not suggest that.

Mr. Fleming: The minister puts that before us and says that if the United States administration did so we would then be left holding a lot of gold and there would be criticism over our holding so much gold. If the Canadian government is going to hold itself aloof from all communication with the United States administration in this regard, then I suppose we are going to be operating in the dark. If the Canadian government would measure up to the responsibilities that I tried to describe earlier this afternoon it would not be very hard to learn what is United States policy in this regard or what are the possibilities of a departure from that policy.

I am sure there is no evidence that has come to the attention of any member of the government to suggest for one minute that the United States administration is going to abandon or modify its policy of purchasing all newly mined gold offered at a fixed price of $35 U.S. per ounce. The modification we were urging that the Canadian government should seek was an upward adjustment in the price. I was glad to hear the hon. member for Villeneuve support this afternoon what we have been saying in that regard.

But it is all a question of what is good sense in relation to the total Canadian interest, and I think the Canadian government has an opportunity here to show its confidence in the future of this industry. It would have a good effect if the Canadian government, instead of contemplating a reduction in its holdings of gold as reserves, would say, "We have confidence in the future of this important Canadian commodity and we are going to increase rather than reduce our holdings of gold in our reserve fund".

Mr. Eyre: I did not intend to suggest to the government for one minute that gold miners should be exempt from income tax or any other tax, because I know they want to pay their fair share. However, when the hon. member for Yukon was speaking yesterday with regard to a situation that exists in his particular constituency, his remarks gave me the thought of trading dollars. That was all. That is why I put that on the record. I should like to refer for a moment to our gold reserves. I am not going to say anything about the monetary fund because I do not know enough about it. I leave that to others who are much more capable than I am.

A few months ago a very responsible mining man made the statement at a public meeting that it looked as if the government was hoarding gold, not selling any to other countries but storing it, waiting for a higher price in order to profit from the production of the gold mines. I cannot speak for the government but I do not think any government would do anything like that. I have faith in gold. I think and hope that at some time in the near future it will come back and play its proper part in the Canadian economic sphere, and pay its own way. But I would suggest this. If the government does not export gold or sell any and if the price should go up, shall I say to $50 or $60 an ounce, the government would be making a considerable profit from the gold mines. If that should happen, consideration should be given to handing that profit back to those mines with a string attached, namely that a percentage of it would be given to the men who were employed in the mines at that time.

Secondary industry is one thing I wanted to mention. I spoke about it for a second and then I lost the trend of thought. As I said, I did not want to open up discussion of anything that was not relevant. However, there is one thing that is relevant to secondary industry, and that is the gas pipe line in northern Ontario, which is going to go right through my constituency. I believe this pipe line will have a big effect in attracting secondary industries into my constituency and into other constituencies in northern Ontario.

I do not want to put on the record any suggestion as to price, but it would appear to me that with a pipe line that is some 400 miles closer to the source of supply than, shall we say, cities like Toronto or Hamilton, we should enjoy a cheaper price for that fuel in my constituency. Time alone will tell whether or not we shall do so. If we enjoy a cheaper price, that fact will help us to compete, having regard to transportation problems, because we have to transport our products greater distances in order to reach a market.

That is about all I wish to say at this particular time. I hope those who are here when a similar bill comes before parliament in 1958—and I refer to members of all parties—will give it the good consideration that they have given it during the past seven years and will support it if the gold mines should need assistance.

Clause agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): When shall this bill be read a third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. MacInnis: By leave.

Mr. Prudham moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

285. General administration, $3,348,014.

The Deputy Chairman: I am told that the resolution appears at page 52 of the estimates, the details commencing at page 381.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Chairman, the estimates of the Department of National Revenue have been before the estimates committee. There were some six meetings of that committee and some 136 pages of evidence were taken.

I think it was a worth-while study of the department, but I do not think it was as complete as it might have been.

One thing we know, of course, is that the committee was not permitted to hear witnesses. It occurs to me that it would have been well worth while if we could have had appear before the committee representatives of the Canadian tax foundation. During the course of the sittings of the committee we discussed certain of the tax provisions and regulations, but we did not discuss the actual collection of taxes. If we could have had before us representatives of this foundation I think we could have had much more information put before us.

I do not propose to go into the details as set forth in the items other than to say this. I would bring to the attention of the committee one item which appears to be somewhat out of line. I shall be quite frank and say that, on requesting information throughout the sittings of the committee, we had very clear answers as to the expenditures involved. However, I should like to mention the fact that the total law costs in items 289 and 290 are up from $220,000 to $335,000. That is an increase of $115,000 or over 50 per cent. There was an explanation—

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the hon. gentleman for a moment?

Mr. Monteith: Yes.

Mr. McCann: In discussing these estimates in former years we took them, as a rule, in two divisions. It is well known that the Department of National Revenue is made up of two divisions, one being customs and excise and the other taxation, each with its own deputy minister and its own administrative staff.

I agree entirely with what the hon. gentleman has said so far, but the item that has been called has to do with the general administration of customs and excise. In the interests of good order and in accordance with the former procedure, if we deal with customs and excise estimates first and then come to taxation I think we would probably get along much faster. The officials I have before me have to do with customs and excise. They probably know little with regard to the taxation division and probably would not attempt to give any answers with reference to it. If the hon. gentleman would just wait until we clear the other division and then make his remarks with reference to taxation, it would suit our convenience much better.

Mr. Monteith: That is perfectly all right, Mr. Chairman. I would just say this in passing. I have not many remarks to make concerning the customs and excise division other than that we had a full explanation from the officials of the department. It was evident that there had been a definite increase in the volume of business. As a consequence the staff has had to be enlarged.

I should, however, like to say this, and I think this comes into the over-all picture and probably could be mentioned at this time. I should like to point out my remarks as recorded at page 853 of the proceedings of the estimates committee. This was on Tuesday, May 29. These remarks are to be found at the end of the committee meeting, actually, but my remarks had to do with the over-all picture of the department, including the customs and excise division and the income tax division. These were my remarks:

> Mr. Monteith: I would just like to make an observation. I notice the estimates for 1952-53 for the whole department were $49,714,000-odd, whereas the actual expenditure was $47,313,000-odd dollars. In other words, the excess of estimates over expenditures was roughly $2,400,000. There was an excess of estimates over expenditure in 1953-54 of $1,200,000, and in 1954-55 of $1,700,000-odd. My only thought was that this worked out to an average of around 3 per cent, and I think Mr. Sim mentioned that figure in his evidence. It occurs to me that if we had an excess of estimates over actual expenditures in all government departments on total estimates of $4,500 million there would be an estimated surplus of something in the neighbourhood of $135 million. I am just wondering if that is close enough estimating. I know it is nice to have a cushion, but I am wondering if the taxpayer likes you to have a cushion to that degree. There would also probably be supplementary estimates.

I shall read what the minister said in discussing that:

> Hon. Mr. McCann: We submit them, that is true. They are gone over by the treasury board and the Department of Finance and they consider them in their best judgment, but those are the amounts that are submitted.
> Mrs. Fairclough: Would it be fair to ask you how much of a cushion you had before the treasury board knocked it down?
> Hon. Mr. McCann: In some years we have had them cut down as much as 10 per cent. It depends a good deal on the department. There are certain estimates put in covering undertakings that we decide should not be gone ahead with this year, and out it comes.

My only point there, Mr. Chairman, is that although I realize that this estimating is done some time before and it is difficult to project it into the future, I do not see why the estimates should be continually over the expenditures. As I understand the evidence that was presented to the committee, even in the customs and excise division each year they have had more expenses than they had originally expected but they still have a surplus. In other words they must be definitely estimating for a surplus which, in my opinion, is not fair to the Canadian taxpayer.

Now, sir, I think that is about all I have to say in these opening remarks, but I shall come back later when the income tax division is being considered.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, during the discussion which took place in committee I brought up an item which I should like to place on the record now. In the first instance I had spoken about exemption from sales tax for church publications, and at that time the minister made this remark as reported at page 736 of the committee report:

> Of course, this is a question of policy and, as you have already said, the matter was brought up when the finance estimates were up. Our estimates have to do entirely with administration. I can say that the matter has been given consideration, and when the bill is brought up this year I think you will see there is a change being made that in part at least will meet your request.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the minister, since that date, has had anything further on this subject? I wonder whether the bill to which he referred is now on the order paper, and if not when we may expect it? In the same vein, I should like to ask him whether he has made any representations to the Minister of Finance, as he indicated he might do, with reference to the sales tax on chancel furniture.

Mr. McCann: I have brought the matter to the minister's attention, and if any changes are made they will be made when the Excise Tax Act comes up as a result of the budget discussion.

Mrs. Fairclough: This year?

Mr. McCann: This year.

Customs and excise divisions—
Ports—

287. Operation and maintenance, $24,616,357.

Mr. Green: On item 287 I notice there is quite a large increase of over $809,000, and in the supplementary estimates there is a further amount of $100,000, making an increase of nearly $1 million. Can the minister explain the necessity for such an increase?

Mr. McCann: This vote covers some 424 offices with a total staff of close to 6,531 persons, and shows a net increase over last year of $809,815 or 3·4 per cent. The objects under this vote which show an increase are principally salaries and wages, which increased by 4·6 per cent. Of this increase, $219,000 is for 75 new positions which have been provided to satisfy unforeseen demands for staff during the course of the next fiscal year. Incidentally, 20 of those positions have been filled up to February 29, 1956. The balance is to cover the salaries of 162 additional officers as well as the normal annual increases and some reclassifications.

Then in freight and express there is an increase of $5,000; publication of regulations, memoranda and annual report, $5,000; repairs and upkeep of buildings and works, $25,000; light, power and water charges, $2,000. If you break that down, the operation and maintenance vote shows a balance of appropriation not required—oh, that is something left over. That accounts for the principal increases.

The hon. member mentioned the supplementary estimates, vote 659, and that is for the continuation of construction of our facilities at Dorval and Malton.

Mr. Green: Why is it necessary to have such an increase in the personnel? I see that according to page 388 of the estimates book the number has gone up from 6,294 to 6,531 or an increase of about 240 employees.

Mr. McCann: That is very easily explained. It is the result of the five-day week. We have to have a six days per week service in most places, and in some places seven days per week. In addition, there is the increase in the normal business of the country in imports and the like, and it takes more people and more officers; it takes more people because the ordinary people do five days' work and you have to provide for the extra days.

Mr. Fulton: Does the minister's last statement mean that at most ordinary customs ports you can get things cleared on Saturday? That is not my impression.

Mr. McCann: No, but at border points it is sometimes very necessary to supply that service for more than the normal five days.

Mr. Fulton: That is true of the ordinary border crossing points and relates to vehicular traffic, but the bulk of the ordinary customs clearance that is usually done at one of the ports of entry, that is where large shipments would have to be cleared, is not done on Saturday. If I am correct, I cannot follow why the five day week would impose the necessity for this large increase in staff.

Mr. McCann: It is not ordinarily done on Saturdays. There may be special circumstances, such as repair machinery or something like that which is imported, where an officer would have to go out and clear it. The vehicular traffic is much greater on the weekends than any other part of the week. Approximately 16 million vehicles came through border points in the whole of 1955, and in order to service them it takes more people longer hours.

Mr. Nowlan: This question probably should have been raised on item 286 because it deals with the operation of the ports, but I should like to draw a relatively minor matter to the attention of the minister. It has to do with the operation of the train between Boston and Saint John. The Canadian Pacific Railway has changed the operating schedule of this train—and I admit immediately that I have not personally had any experience with this whatever—and I have been told by people who have come off that train recently about the bitter complaints made concerning the hour at which they are awakened in the morning for customs inspection when coming from Boston to Saint John. Apparently there is a difference from what has prevailed heretofore in the operation of the train.

People have suggested that they believe it would be a relatively easy matter, and whether or not that is so is for the minister to determine, for customs inspection to be made more efficiently and certainly to the better convenience of the large number of passengers coming from Boston to the maritime provinces. I am drawing it to the minister's attention. I know he will ask to have a report made, and possibly something can be done to improve the situation.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, we will take note of that objection, look into the situation and try to improve it.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, in the details on page 388 it shows that the vote for the last fiscal year was $23,806,542 but the actual amount spent or estimated to be spent was $23,153,000. That is a difference of about $650,000 between the vote of last year and what was actually spent. In addition to that gap of $650,000 we have an increase of about $810,000 in this year's vote. That makes a difference of about $1,400,000 between the amount spent last year and the amount it is estimated will be spent this year. That looks as though there must be some padding, or just what is the explanation for that difference? The minister dealt with an increase of approximately $809,000 but there is another $650,000 to be explained.

Mr. McCann: Well, there are a couple of factors there, Mr. Chairman. It may well be that there have been delays in filling positions which we asked for; perhaps we cannot get the right type of people but we have to provide for them in the estimates. We have to provide for them because there is no other way of getting the money when you estimate in November of one year what you are going to need until a year from the next March. That is the way it is done; your fiscal year is the first of April to the end of March. You are estimating for about 18 months there. We base it on the average growth over the years and the number of people we will need. That takes up quite a lot in salaries.

In addition to that you have to make provision in your estimates for an increase in salaried positions for the period of the next 18 months, so all told it cannot be estimated to the dollar and nobody expects that. We do attempt, however, to estimate as accurately as possible based upon our experience in former years.

Mr. Green: Why would not the increase of $809,000 be added to what was actually spent in the last fiscal year rather than added to what you estimated for the last fiscal year?

Mr. McCann: Well, Mr. Chairman, that gives the actual expenditure and, as a matter of fact, that is good policy because we have saved money on what we received; yet we have to go ahead and provide for the normal increases there will be in position and wages. That is the principal item of all our expenses. If you go over them you will find this whole department is entirely administrative. I think 89 per cent of all the money we ask for is to pay in wages. Our next largest expenditure is to provide facilities in different parts of the country. Now, out in your part of the country we have spent money down at the Pacific highway. At Coutts, Alberta, it cost us about $1 million on account of changed conditions.

Mr. Green: That is not under this vote.

Mr. McCann: No, but I am referring to former years and the changes that have taken place because of changed conditions. As the result of the development of the oil field in northern Alberta trucks by the thousands come over United States highways, enter Alberta at Coutts and go up to Lethbridge, Calgary and on to Edmonton. That is a changed condition of transportation that has obtained over the years. That obtains not only in the case of freight transport but it obtains in passenger transport.

There are similar items at other places. Down at Lacolle in the province of Quebec we spent about $1 million for increased warehousing on account of the great traffic there from various states through Lacolle and Rouses Point and these other places leading into the city of Montreal. That obtains at Windsor, Fort Erie, Sarnia and at these places, Lacolle and Rouses Point; out in your country, at Coutts, Alberta and down the Pacific highway.

Last year I was down at the Pacific highway and I saw truckloads of cars going through there that had been exported by General Motors. They entered the United States at Detroit, went clean across the country and came up north into British Columbia at the Pacific highway. We therefore have to have facilities to carry on that business, and it is increasing all the time.

Mr. Green: That is all true and we are glad to see the development, but what I am criticizing is the method of estimating. Last year the department estimated it would require $23,806,542 or—

Mr. McCann: Where is that, on page 388?

Mr. Green: Yes. The department spent $650,000 less than that. In other words you overestimated last year by $650,000. You must have known that all these developments were taking place; they did not all happen overnight.

Mr. McCann: But take the other item right above that, "Less amount recoverable from firms requiring special services, $500,000." No one could tell whether that was going to be $5,000 or half a million.

Mr. Green: But you estimated that you would need $24,306,542 and you only spent $23,153,000. This year you are estimating for $25,316,357, and I am just asking if it is not possible to get a little closer to the actual figures. It seems to me with a gap of $650,000 last year between what was voted and what was required the department may be quite a bit too high this year in the amount they are asking for. The Department of National Revenue of all departments should be able to estimate these figures accurately because this department has to raise the money.

Mr. McCann: Well, Mr. Chairman, it appears to me I am being criticized for saving money.

Mr. Green: No, you are being criticized for asking for more than you need.

Mr. McCann: Well, I know, but that is only $800,000 out of $25 million, and that is about as close estimating as you can do.

Mr. Green: But $800,000 is a lot of money.

Mr. McCann: Certainly it is, but what is it relative to? It is relative to the total expenditure we are asking here of $24,616,357, or $25 million without the receipts we take in. So I think that is as about as close estimating as I would ask the department to do. It works out better to have your estimates such that they will cover your expenditures than to have supplementary estimates or have to find some way of getting more money to carry on. There is a principle that is endorsed by the treasury board of changed allotments. We do not have the money in our department to switch it from one vote to another.

Mr. Green: If the minister goes through the estimates of the other departments he will find some of them are estimating a good deal more closely than this. I might say that other departments have been subject to criticism on the same point, and I think it will be found to run through the estimates of all departments. We find for example that last year a department asked for $1 million for an item and spent only $750,000; they come back this year and ask for $1,125,000. To the opposition it looks as though some sort of padding is going on. The net result is to budget for more money than is actually required. If these figures were brought more nearly in line it might be possible to reduce taxation.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether this is the right item to bring up what I have in mind. I have received representations from the Vancouver island turkey improvement association with regard to the tariffs on turkeys coming in from the United States. This is an ad valorem duty and they term it a fair weather friend, because the tariff is at its peak when it is least needed whereas the low rate operates when turkeys are overly abundant in the United States.

They present figures to point out that the expectation in the United States is to have an increase of about 6 per cent this year in the production of turkeys as compared with last year, which may well result in a surplus of turkeys in the United States. Because of low prices there the tariff on turkeys being imported will not be effective in protecting the Canadian producers.

Mr. McCann: May I suggest that this matter be brought up when the Minister of Finance is dealing with his items. We simply administer these things; and while I will not say it does not make any difference to me what is the tariff rate, the fact is that I am supposed to put it into effect whether it is 5 per cent or 105 per cent.

288. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment, $1,119,500.

Mr. Green: Would the minister explain this item.

Mr. McCann: The net increase in this vote over last year amounts to $249,350. The increase in this item is attributable to two factors, one of which is an increase of $167,500 over last year covering new construction of office buildings and temporary warehouses. The department intends to construct 11 office buildings and three warehouses at international boundary crossings at a cost of $332,500, as opposed to our program last year which called for the construction of three new office buildings and alterations to three existing office buildings at a total cost of $165,000.

The other factor is an increase of $218,350 over last year covering a revote for office buildings and housing where the sum of $225,500 was placed in the estimates this year as opposed to $7,150 last year. The difference is accounted for by the fact that extremely inclement weather conditions prevented contractors from completing several projects, one of which was at Snag Creek, Yukon Territory, where the contractor was unable to commence a contract in the sum of $100,000 due to early winter conditions, and as a result the entire project had to be delayed until this year, when actual construction was only in its early stages.

Another reason was the inability to close property purchases in time to permit construction at certain points, notably Carway, Alberta and Aldergrove, British Columbia. As a result it was necessary to carry these projects over until this year. To offset these increases is a decrease of $100,000 in warehouse facilities at airports this year, and a decrease of $6,000 in our new construction of housing.

Major projects are referred to the Department of Public Works, and I have in mind that the Department of Public Works built warehouse facilities at Coutts, Alberta, and Emerson, Manitoba, but they do not undertake the construction of houses for the staff. These houses may run from $10,000 to $15,000. Take the case at Snag Creek in the Yukon Territory. This is only a little town and living accommodation was necessary, and construction costs in the Yukon are two or three times as much as in other places.

Mr. Green: Does the Department of Public Works do all the construction work for the Department of National Revenue?

Mr. McCann: That is just what I was trying to explain. They build any office buildings we may require but we have authority, either under the Public Works Act or from the treasury board, to construct buildings at border points in the way of temporary quarters or housing accommodation.

Mr. Green: Why should not that be done by the Department of Public Works, especially when Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is under that department?

Mr. McCann: They have expressed the opinion that they do not wish to take on these smaller jobs.

659. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment—further amount required, $100,000.

Mr. Green: Is this for work at Dorval?

Mr. McCann: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Taxation division—

289. General administration, $2,702,629.

Mr. Monteith: The estimates committee dealt in some detail with the estimates of this department, and as a consequence I do not intend to ask too many questions concerning the individual items. However, I would like to point out that the law costs under item 389 have increased from $80,000 to $165,000, and under item 390 from $140,000 to $170,000, a total increase from $220,000 to $335,000. The increase amounts to $115,000 or over 50 per cent. When we queried the minister in committee we were told that there were one or two special cases. This is quite a sizeable increase and possibly the minister could give us some more details.

I understand that these law costs are involved in different places across the country where the department has instigated proceedings. I am wondering how the representatives of the legal fraternity are chosen, if there is a preferred list from which the lawyers are picked. It appears to me that the thinking of the Department of National Revenue, taxation division, has changed considerably in the last number of years. When a taxpayer or his representative went to the district office he received every courtesy, which is still the case, but there seems to be a change of thinking. Now it is, how much can we get?

The taxpayer should pay his just tax—there is no complaint about that at all—but when there is any give or take, as there is upon occasions, I am quite sure he does not very often get the benefit of it. I am not suggesting that the department should assist the taxpayer in making out his tax return. We appreciate that that is not right. He is supposed to be given assistance and advice and that sort of thing, but the various district officers of the taxation department work on directives to quite a degree, I would say, from the head office. They must come from the head office. These are supposed to be interpretations of the Income Tax Act and rulings by the department.

There has been a tendency, in recent times at least, no doubt as the result of directives to the various district offices, as to how to interpret capital gains. As a result, in some instances we almost have the capital gains tax despite what the various ministers of finance have said over the past few years to the effect that we do not have one and they are not in favour of it. When inquiry of the minister was made on this matter he maintained that all the departmental officials did was to follow the letter of the act.

In questioning the minister we came to the conclusion that possibly he would be in a position to offer advice to the Minister of Finance as to changing some of the provisions of the Income Tax Act. Several times we suggested to him that he take up this matter with the Minister of Finance. There were several instances in the evidence where he admitted there were inequities as regards the collection of taxes and perhaps as regards the actual rulings or the interpretations placed on them. If they need clarification, I think the Minister of National Revenue should advise the Minister of Finance that these items should be clarified.

If the departmental officials' rulings did not result in costing the taxpayers money, possibly nobody would complain, but I contend that some of the money that the taxpayer has to pay in his own defence is unnecessary. In an appeal board case the taxpayer puts up his $15. If he wins his appeal he is refunded his $15. In the meantime he has perhaps had legal and accounting advice costing him, we may say, hundreds of dollars, and I am given to understand he is not permitted to deduct those expenses in future years. The minister might correct me if I am wrong in that, but I think that evidence was given.

I had the feeling in the committee as we went through these various items and through the discussion periods that although many times we contended that the Department of National Revenue should advise the Department of Finance on certain corrections in the interpretation or in the actual wording of the act so the interpretations would be more just and equitable, there was a reluctance on the part of the department to so advise. In fact I almost felt as though it did not want them to be corrected. There seems to be an atmosphere—as a matter of fact it is the case—in the department that the taxpayer is actually guilty until he proves himself innocent. This is far from what we have always considered as ordinary British justice, in that it has always been felt that any person is innocent until proven guilty.

We mentioned in the committee a few instances of what we felt were inequities. We suggested to the minister that he bring these to the attention of the Minister of Finance. As one small item, I am given to understand that an actor who is working on salary and is on tour cannot deduct the expenses of his tour. The minister was intimating that he was allowed his expenses, that he got an increased salary because of the simple fact that he was not allowed to make deductions. However, he is paying tax on that increased amount. In other words he has to pay tax on what would be considered additional increment for travelling expenses.

There was another point that we brought to the attention of the minister, and it seems to be a question of a ruling. The departmental officials admitted that a party willing a farm to his son is allowed at present a fair market value, whereas if a farmer sells to his son the son cannot deduct depreciation of an amount greater than the residual value, one might say, in the father's hands. There is no doubt that this is penalizing the son. I understand that the minister has intimated that some adjustment has been or is being recommended to the Department of Finance, but the whole thing is so ridiculous that I think it is high time something was actually done.

I should like to say a few words on the iniquitous net worth system of collecting taxes, and it applies to all people, not only to farmers. First of all I should like to mention to the minister that I quite realize that he and his departmental officials have a very tough job and a very unenviable one. After all, collecting taxes is coming close to a man's pocket, and he does not like it. I realize that they meet circumstances which the average person in business possibly does not meet, because the taxpayer sometimes feels he does not get full value for his tax. However, I am not concerned, in speaking of net worth, with the treatment of a case after it has actually got into the chief assessor's hands in an income tax district office. As I say, one gets very courteous treatment from the officials. I realize that they will listen to reason when it can be shown where a previous statement made was not correct or had been misunderstood by an inspector who had made the original assessment, and that sort of thing is very frequently adjusted.

I am not so much concerned with the taxpayer who has had legal or accounting advice from the beginning of the case. If he has been advised by his lawyer or his accountant, then I think it is up to the lawyer or accountant to shoulder any responsibility. I am not concerned about that taxpayer, but I am concerned about the individual taxpayer who has not filed a return. Perhaps he should have filed the tax return, and perhaps he has never filed one. Very frequently many of them are not actually taxable. However, the taxation department inspector or some official in the district office who keeps files on all sorts of things, thinks that a certain resident of a community should be paying taxes. He probably gets a demand for a tax return for one, two or three years, and he files it. He is a farmer and he is entitled to file on the cash system. He does not appear to have to pay any tax on that basis. The cash system shows that he should not pay any tax. However, the department may have some further reason for thinking he should, so an inspector goes to visit the man. The inspector, failing sufficient documents and records covering the past few years, undoubtedly will undertake to make up a net worth statement. He asks questions as to the date of purchase of equipment, the farm and that sort of thing.

One of the purposes of the questions is to prepare a depreciation schedule so the farmer can actually be allowed proper depreciation when the time comes to prepare his net worth statement. However, I do not think sufficient questions are asked as to what possible disposals the farmer may have made of machinery or equipment, which disposals are capital gains and not taxable.

Then we come to living expenses. I do not know of any particular case myself but I have heard some pretty gruesome tales of things that have happened such as the inspector making a tour of the house and all that sort of thing without the owner's consent. But I do know that many personal questions are asked as to what the man has spent.

In this connection we have to remember that the inspector is dealing with somebody who has not had any previous experience with this sort of thing and no doubt he is frightened stiff because the inspector is there. First of all he should be put at his ease and should have things explained to him by the inspector. When the inspector is asking him what money he may have spent personally I think he should point out to the man the simple fact that the more he claims to have spent the more it is going to cost him taxwise. The average person does not understand that and I think that is a simple courtesy that should be extended. I do not believe it is done. From the evidence we receive I understand it is not.

A summary of the various living expenses is detailed, and let us not forget that it is probably all done very hurriedly. The inspector has not spent two, three or four days there. I imagine he has spent a morning, and then moves on to some other place in the afternoon. But the inspector may have covered a period of six years. He has asked these questions, has got a list of so-called living expenses, and the farmer is asked to sign it.

[Mr. Monteith.]

I am quite free to admit that I have known instances where, after the farmer has signed one of these statements as to his living expenses, the amount has been changed. If he can prove that he was wrong in his guess as to a certain item, that a certain medical bill was paid or something like that, that is quite all right. The department will change the amount. But at the same time there is no doubt that once the farmer has signed the statement there is something there that is used upon occasion.

I admit, as I say, that I have known cases where the assessment has been prepared and then changed after somebody has been able to prove something to the satisfaction of the department, but I have also known cases where the assessor has intimated to the taxpayer that he may have something there but if he changes it the department will change his living expenses so the amount of tax may well remain the same as in the initial assessment. To me that is absolutely wrong, and I think it should be stopped. I am not saying anything against these inspectors as individuals other than I do not think they know what they are dealing with. I do not think they know the problems of the farmer. I doubt if very many of them have ever lived on a farm. I do not think they realize how a farmer lives. He does not live as a city man does. He does not spend money on personal living expenses. He does not wear the same kind of clothes, because he does not have to in his particular occupation.

I believe these inspectors should have a better knowledge of the industry with which they are dealing when they set out to make up one of these net worth statements. My contention is that the average farmer, unless he is specializing in some particular cash crop or in poultry, beef cattle, fur farming, or something of that nature, does not do any more over his lifetime than pay off his mortgage. As a consequence I think there are a great number of farmers throughout the country who are being victimized, one might almost say. I believe that the average farmer, the average citizen, wishes to pay his tax just as much as any inspector might wish him to, and he wants to pay his just tax. Finally, Mr. Chairman, I should like to suggest that the department should readjust its thinking to a point where it will not believe that every taxpayer is guilty of evasion.

Mr. Thatcher: Mr. Chairman, before this item passes I should like to appeal to the minister to clarify the government's position on capital gains. As he knows, this matter came before the estimates committee but I for one felt that the explanation still was not clear enough. Hon. members know that in Canada we have never officially had a capital gains tax. We have not had such a tax because it has been felt that in a new, developing country every encouragement should be given to venture capital, and I think that is a sound attitude. If we had a capital gains tax today risk capital would probably be discouraged.

Several months ago the Minister of Finance made a public statement to the effect that the government's attitude toward a capital gains tax had not recently changed, but I cannot help wondering whether the officials of the department we are now discussing read that statement or are aware of it, because fears have been expressed recently in many quarters that without any new authority from parliament the department has been pursuing a policy which could alter completely the concept of taxable income in Canada. Recently, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Perth, there have been examples of the Department of National Revenue taxing gains or profits made on real estate transactions, and there have been examples where the department has taxed profits made in the stock market. I think there have been examples where the department has taxed profits made in the buying and selling of mortgages.

I think most Canadians and most members of parliament have considered up to now that this kind of profit was a legitimate capital gain, and they cannot understand why such gains should be taxed. The income tax laws in the past, unwisely I think, have given a good deal of leeway to the departmental officials to decide what is capital gain and what is income. Until recently I think the departmental officials have been fairly liberal in interpreting the law, but in the past few years they seem to be getting a little bit stiffer in their attitude, and I believe there is a very real fear in the country today that Canada may be getting a capital gains tax not by any act of parliament but through the interpretation given to the law by the taxation officials.

There are certain judicial decisions which have tended to increase those fears. Because our laws at the present time do not define capital gain and do not define income, the Canadian courts appear to have been extending the concept of business transactions subject to income tax.

Mr. Chairman, what I want to say is this. If we are to have a capital gains tax, then let parliament pass the law bringing it in. I do not think it should be brought in by any back-door method. I would call on the government this afternoon to give a clear-cut definition—by statute if necessary—as to what is capital gain and what is income. Then the people of Canada would know where they could go from there. In other words, I think the government should spell out precisely what are the definitions of these terms. I would appreciate it if either the Minister of National Revenue or the Minister of Finance would comment on that matter, and I wish they would do it this afternoon.

Mr. Zaplitny: Mr. Chairman, first of all I want to express my agreement with what the hon. member for Perth had to say about the net worth statement, particularly as it referred to farmers. It has been my experience as well as his—and perhaps it has been that of others who have had something to do with assisting farmers in making their returns —that in many cases the farmers have been victimized by a lack of knowledge on the one hand of what is required and on the other hand by officials who were a bit too arbitrary in setting down in the net worth statement their own interpretation of the values on the farm.

There are two chief ways in which, in my opinion, the assessments are made higher than they should be in regard to net worth statements, namely the overvaluation of the buildings and equipment which are found on the farm at the end of a particular period, and the undervaluation of the equipment and, in some cases, buildings that were disposed of during the period in question. There is also the question of the cost of living. I think that is a real injustice which would warrant a fairly close look by the department, where inspectors take it upon themselves to decide what the farmer's cost of living is over the years.

I have examined personally a good many net worth statements in the last five or six years, and I can say that in almost every case they have materially overestimated the real cost of living of the average farmer. There are exceptional cases, of course, always. There may be some farmers who are in the habit through necessity, of spending a great deal more money than others; but on the average I have found the tendency to be to overestimate the farmer's cost of living. The difficulty arises here because no farmer—nor, I suspect, is any other person—in our country is in a position to go back five or six years and prove to the inspector or to the department what his actual personal expenditures were. People have become more or less conscious of the necessity of keeping records of their business transactions, whether it is on the farm or elsewhere, because they realize that is part and parcel of their income tax return. But no one has been in the habit of keeping a very close track of his personal expenditures. And when it comes to the point of the farmer's word against the word of the inspector, the department naturally will accept the word of their own officials. I think some real injustices have resulted with regard to these net worth statements on account of the factors I have mentioned, as was very well set out by the hon. member for Perth.

However, there is another angle with regard to this item that I wish to pursue at this time. It arises out of a question asked in this house by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on April 9 of this year. The question will be found at page 2729 of Hansard. I shall read the question and the answer in order to set out the background clearly. On that occasion the hon. member asked a question of the Minister of National Revenue in these words:

> Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Will the minister re-examine the income tax files of the breweries of Manitoba to ascertain whether any of them claimed income tax deductibility for the contributions they made, as revealed in Winnipeg last week, to the Liberal, Conservative and Social Credit parties of Manitoba?

At that time the minister replied as follows:

> I can comply with the request of the hon. gentleman but I doubt very much whether I can give him information about other people's business.

Then as a supplementary question the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked:

> May I make it clear that I did not ask the minister to give publicity to information that is secret by law. I asked him if he would examine the files to ascertain for the benefit of the treasury whether or not such deductibility was claimed by the breweries of Manitoba. May I assume the minister will conduct such an examination?

The minister's reply was this:

> Mr. Speaker, I understand the question and will take it into consideration.

No doubt the question is still under consideration and will be under consideration for some time to come. At this time I think it would be only fair to the minister and to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to set out the background upon which his question was based. I think it is also necessary to point out certain things to the committee and to the minister because of the fact that ministers do not seem to be aware of the basis upon which these questions were asked. I find that on the same day I directed to the Minister of Justice a question in the following terms:

> Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Justice. Is the minister aware of any financial contributions made by the breweries to the party with which he is associated?

The reply I received was:

> Mr. Speaker, the answer is no.
> [Mr. Zaplitny.]

It was to me a rather astounding answer, because for a week or ten days prior to that time, we had been reading newspaper headlines and hearing over the radio about the rather astounding developments in Manitoba with regard to these contributions. Yet one of the ministers of the crown gives the answer that he was not aware of it.

In case the minister may think this has to do only with the situation in the province of Manitoba, may I refer to the statement made by the representative of the breweries in giving evidence before the committee of the Manitoba legislature on April 6, 1956. I shall not read it all. If the minister wishes me to do so I will send it across to him. In that statement you will find that the representative of the breweries stated that not only did the breweries of Manitoba make cash contributions to the political parties within the province of Manitoba but that they made them also to the federal political parties. That immediately, of course, involves the consideration of this parliament.

I think it is a perfectly fair question to ask whether the minister and his department have in fact carefully and scrupulously checked the income tax returns of these breweries—and the same, of course, applies to any other corporation which makes financial contributions to political parties—in order to make sure that they did not do this at the expense of the taxpayers of Canada. I personally suspect very much that not only are the breweries of this country and some of the other corporations using undue influence upon the political parties in this country, but that they are doing so at the expense of the public treasury. I believe that, in fact, they are claiming deductibility from income with respect to their income tax for moneys spent either in cash or perhaps to a greater extent in some of the huge advertising campaigns they put on in order to assist the political party of their choice, which expenditure is marked down as advertising from a business point of view but which is not really advertising at all but is propaganda in the pure sense of the word.

In case the minister or the committee is in doubt about what happened in Manitoba, may I refer them to some of the newspaper headlines. For example, the Winnipeg Free Press of April 4, 1956, carried this headline, "Breweries Bare Gifts to Three Parties; All But C.C.F. Shared $28,075 since 1945". May I point out that this $28,000 was raised to about $30,000 later, and that refers only to contributions made to political parties within the province of Manitoba. The figures with respect to contributions made in the larger field to the federal parties were not revealed, because the evidence was given before a committee which had to do with liquor profits in the province of Manitoba.

May I just comment that the thing that struck me when I read this headline was the reference to "gifts" to the three political parties. I think that was a rather unfortunate use of the word "gifts", because I do not consider these moneys as gifts at all, and I am sure the political parties concerned did not either. They could be more correctly described as cash advances to the political parties concerned, and particularly the Liberal party because the next headline is in the following terms: "Liberals Got Lion's Share of Donations". It was revealed to the committee that they got 59 per cent or $16,400 of the total.

These financial contributions to political parties are made for a purpose. None of us is so naive as to think for a moment that this is done out of the goodness of heart of the breweries or any other corporations because they have so much money they do not know what to do with it, and so they decide to give some of it to the political parties. The fact that none of it was asked for or given to the C.C.F. indicates it is being done for the purpose of promoting the political parties of their choice. Incidentally, I mentioned the two major political parties, the Liberals and the Conservatives, but there was a small amount for the Social Credit party, about $500. Considering that they have not been in power in Manitoba or Ottawa, I suppose you could put that down as unearned income.

I would say this, that the breweries involved broke no law when they made financial contributions to the political parties of their choice. They are permitted to do so under the elections act, provided there is no evidence to show that they either asked for or were promised any economic considerations for the moneys they turned over to these parties. But there is a moral side to it. There is a moral law which is even more important, and that is to what extent are these breweries, such as the ones in Manitoba which deal directly with the government and were instrumental in influencing the government to set a price for beer which resulted in four breweries making a profit of over $18 million—

Mr. McCann: This has nothing to do with a discussion of the administration of the taxation division. I can make a statement in 10 words that will clear up this point. It is to the effect that political contributions are not a deductible expense of doing business for any organization in this country.

Mr. Zaplitny: The statement may be in 10 words or it may take 10 hours, but so far as I am concerned that is not the question. The point I am getting at is that these breweries are making these contributions to the political parties of this country, and in my opinion there is a danger that they are padding their expenses with regard to income in order to hide that money which is going out in the form of contributions.

The minister says it is not deductible. We have attempted on several occasions to find out from the minister whether any attempt has been made, without asking for the names of the corporations or the breweries concerned, by these corporations to claim deductibility. The minister has refused to answer. Apparently on April 9 the minister was not as sure as he claims to be today, because then he said he would take the matter under consideration. If he were going to take it under consideration on April 9 of this year, it would indicate he had not given it any consideration before that time. I think that statement by the Minister of National Revenue on April 9 was an admission that the department and the minister had not given proper consideration to that situation, but had in fact neglected the public treasury by leaving the door open to these breweries to make political contributions to these three political parties, for the purpose of influencing these parties.

Now, I hope that in the future what the minister has just stated will be strictly adhered to and carried out. I hope the minister can assure the house that no corporation, or any other business for that matter, will have the privilege of using their income for the purpose of making cash contributions or paying for huge advertisements which are, in fact, propaganda and not business advertisements, and then deducting that amount from their income in order to reduce their taxable assessment and reduce the amount of taxes which should go to the public treasury.

I want to make it quite clear that I do not think it is moral or right that the huge corporations of this country should make large amounts of money available to the political parties. I do not think it is a good thing for democracy that the political parties of this country should be influenced by the huge monopolies in this country. At the same time, it is adding insult to injury when you realize it is possible for those corporations to do that and deduct the amount from their income and thus make the public treasury pay for the propaganda which they are putting out in favour of the parties of their choice.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: We shall continue with these estimates tomorrow and then take labour, and then national health and welfare.

Mr. Barnett: May I ask the Minister of Finance to repeat what he said? Did he say the estimates of the Department of Labour?

Mr. Harris: National revenue, labour, and national health and welfare.

Mr. Barnett: The reason I raise the question is that I understood the labour estimates were going before the estimates committee.

Mr. Harris: They have been, and they have been returned.

Mrs. Fairclough: Is the minister aware that the estimates committee is sitting on labour estimates tomorrow morning?

Mr. Harris: Yes, Mr. Speaker, that has been fully understood among the parties, that the labour estimates we would consider would not include the unemployment insurance commission.

Mrs. Fairclough: I do not know how you are going to stop it.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

JEAN ROGER DURANT

Question No. 413—Mr. Dufresne:

1. Is Mr. Jean Roger Durant, of Loretteville, Quebec, an employee of the Department of Agriculture?
2. If so, has the department authorized his acceptance of the position of secretary treasurer of the town of Loretteville, Quebec?
3. Is the department aware that the said Jean Roger Durant is the owner of a firm known as Durant Import and Export Registered?

Answer by: Mr. McCubbin, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Agriculture:

1. Mr. Jean Roger Durand, Loretteville, Que., is an employee of the Department of Agriculture.

2. Mr. Durand's acceptance of the position of secretary treasurer of the town of Loretteville, Que., was authorized by treasury board minute 350483 of March 25, 1948, which directed exemption from order in council P.C. 71/751 of March 29, 1939, as amended, respecting outside employment by government employees. Mr. Durand's duties in this capacity are carried on in the evenings and require approximately 7½ hours per week.

3. The firm of Durand Import and Export Registered was registered by Jean Roger Durand at the Quebec superior court on September 10, 1954, and cancelled at that court on July 14, 1955. On the same date the firm was registered in the name of Julienne Bastien Durand, wife of Jean Roger Durand.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, June 14, 1956

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

Eleventh report of standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. Henderson.

Fifth report of special committee on estimates.—Mr. Nixon.

FREIGHT RATES

COAL—INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE INCREASE IN SUBVENTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. Has the minister been advised that the recent interim increase in freight rates granted to the railways will add 25 cents per ton to the cost of moving Nova Scotia coal? Is it the intention of the dominion coal board to add to the subvention a sufficient amount to offset the increase in freight rates?

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): No consideration has been given to that as yet.

Mr. Gillis: The reason I ask is that it has been the practice in the past.

ATOMIC ENERGY

CANADIAN ATTITUDE TOWARD POSSIBLE POSTPONEMENT OF FURTHER NUCLEAR TESTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct one question to two ministers, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) and the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of recent statements by scientists concerning radioactivity and its effect on human beings, could these ministers tell the house whether any further consideration is being given—I put this to the minister to my right—to the Canadian government opposing further nuclear explosions and—I put this to the minister to my left—will a further statement be made as to the effect of such things as X-rays, and so on, on human beings?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) suggests that I might deal with both questions. With regard to the question addressed to him, as he has indicated previously, in the proposals which were recently discussed in the subcommittee of the disarmament commission in London and in the discussions which took place in that committee last fall at the United Nations, it was clearly demonstrated that the United States, Great Britain, France and Canada gave support to a plan which would provide for the banning of tests within the limits of a comprehensive scheme of disarmament which would work without prejudice to the security of the nations concerned under an adequate system of inspection and control.

With regard to the health aspects of the problem, the situation is that there is now in existence a special scientific committee, created by the United Nations, of 12 states, of which Canada is a member, represented formerly by the late Dr. Cipriani, and now by Dr. Watkinson of the department which I administer.

In addition to that, the Department of National Health and Welfare makes assessments, along with other departments of the government and with the United Nations agencies, to determine the extent of the levels of radioactivity normally produced or produced through recent atomic detonation tests. There is no reason for believing that the health of the people of this country or of other countries has been affected in a way that would cause serious concern. This matter, however, continues to receive careful study and assessment.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask a supplementary question? I wonder whether the minister would consider making before the end of the session a comprehensive statement on this matter, bearing in mind the recent pronouncement made by scientists, not only with respect to atomic and nuclear explosions but with respect to the frequency with which some people submit themselves to X-rays of their feet when buying new shoes and other similar practices.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

COMMUNIST CHINA—INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE RECOGNITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Ordinarily I would direct this question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs but.

in view of the fact that the Prime Minister will be attending the commonwealth prime ministers' conference and there is reference in the press to the effect that there will be a reappraisal there of the attitude of the several commonwealth countries towards the recognition of communist China, would the Prime Minister say what Canada's attitude before that conference will be in connection with that problem?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I would not like to make any definite commitment. Of course, we have these conferences for the purpose of obtaining further information and endeavouring to increase such wisdom as we may have about what is best to do in the general interest of the free world. I doubt that we could reach the conclusion that there should be immediate recognition of the government of the republic of China.

An hon. Member: We hope not.

PIPE LINES

REFERENCE TO STATEMENT ON TELEVISION PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Does the Prime Minister agree with what his colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) said on the television program "Press Conference" last night in dealing with the recent pipe-line legislation? I have his words: "We violated the rules."

Some hon. Members: No.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I said no such thing.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): My impression was that my colleague said that we violated no rules.

Mr. Rowe: That is not the impression the public got.

Mr. Fleming: A belated amendment.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

Taxation division—

289. General administration, $2,702,629.

Mr. McCann: Before we begin today's discussions with reference to the estimates of the taxation division, I think it might be well if we were to clear up some of the points that were raised before we adjourned last evening.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

A question arose with reference to law costs, raised by the hon. member for Perth. In the two votes which you have to consider we are asking for a total of $335,000 for law costs, which represents an increase of $115,000 over what we asked for last year. However, $85,000, or 75 per cent of the increase, was requested to cover the probable maximum fee and costs we would have to pay in connection with the Anaconda appeal which was at that time pending before the privy council. The Anaconda case is one of the most famous cases that we have had to deal with and the final appeal in the matter went before the privy council. I might say that the decision rendered by the privy council was in favour of the Department of National Revenue with reference to the stand it had taken relative to the taxation of this company. If the decision in that case had been rendered against the Department of National Revenue the costs might possibly have been $100,000.

The remaining 25 per cent of the increase is requested in the light of actual expenditures at the time that our estimates were prepared. Careful consideration of the expected number of legal actions indicated that we should provide for an increase of about 10 per cent over the actual expenditures for the previous fiscal year. It is worth noting that last year in the district offices we spent more on law costs than was provided in our estimates. While I am dealing with that particular case, I might say that the total costs in the Anaconda case were $34,976, approximately $35,000. We have provided in the estimates for $85,000 so that we have provided for $50,000 more than we have been actually called upon to spend. It is my intention when we come to the conclusion of the discussion of the item to have one of my colleagues move that this resolution be amended so that item 289 may be reduced by the amount of $50,000.

With reference to legal agents, another point brought up by the hon. member, as hon. members know, litigation on behalf of the government is the responsibility of the Department of Justice, but actually when the Department of National Revenue requires an outside lawyer to take action or to defend it in some proceeding taken against the department it would request assistance from the Department of Justice. In this way the Department of Justice would choose the lawyer to act as its legal agent. The expenses incurred by the Department of Justice are charged against the department for which the work is done. That is the general procedure, so that we have to provide for those costs.

Another item was changes in the act. The hon. member for Perth has repeated certain items which were mentioned in the hearings before the special committee where the operation of the law seemed to work hardship on certain taxpayers or where there was uncertainty as to its application. My officials are more or less in continual discussion with the officials of the Department of Finance on matters of this kind, and they are all carefully reviewed when the budget is being prepared. I have taken note of the items raised before the special committee and they will be brought to the attention of my colleague, the Minister of Finance, prior to the next budget.

With reference to the matter of net worth assessment, the member for Perth has again brought up the question of assessing income tax on a net worth basis. I have spoken on this matter from time to time over the years and I made a rather complete statement on it which is to be found in Hansard of June 23, 1954, pages 6597 to 6600. In his testimony before the special committee the deputy minister indicated that the department does not favour this method of assessment where an assessment based on actual facts is possible. However, the department does have a responsibility to see that all taxpayers discharge their proper liability and in the absence of books and records assessment on the net worth basis is often the only way open to the assessor. The assessor is instructed to use this basis only when all other methods of determining the correct income and tax liability fail and to explain the method to the taxpayers when it is used.

Another matter which was brought up had to do with capital gains. The hon. member for Perth and the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre suggested that the department was improperly trying to tax certain profits commonly known as capital gains. First of all, I should like to reiterate that the taxation division has purely administrative responsibilities. It does not make law. It only applies the Income Tax Act and the Dominion Succession Duty Act according to the terms in which those two statutes have been passed by parliament. Naturally, in interpreting the wording of these statutes the law officers of the division must try to find the meaning that the courts would give to them. As cases go to the courts and decisions are rendered, they are given indications which assist them in their interpretation.

The distinction between capital gains and business profits has not changed over the years. The difference was well explained by Lord Justice Clark in the case of California Copper Syndicate v. Harris in the British courts in 1904.

Mr. Knowles: Which Harris?

Mr. McCann: He said this, and I quote:

> It is quite a well settled principle in dealing with questions . . . of income tax that where the owner of an ordinary investment chooses to realize it and obtains a greater price for it than he originally acquired it at, the enhanced price is not a profit . . . assessable for income tax. But it is equally well established that enhanced values obtained from realization or conversion of securities may be so assessable where what is done is not merely a realization or change of investment but an act done in what is truly the carrying on, or carrying out, of a business. The simplest case is that of a person or association of persons buying and selling land or securities speculatively, in order to make gain, dealing with such investment as a business and thereby seeking to make profits . . .
> What is the line which separates the two classes of cases may be difficult to define and each case must be considered according to the facts; the question to be determined being—"is the sum of the gain that has been made a mere enhancement of value or realizing a security, or is it a gain made in the operation of business in carrying out a scheme of profit making?"

That is the end of the quotation. This quotation has been cited repeatedly in subsequent cases both by the English and by the Canadian courts. It has been repeatedly said that each case must be determined on its own merits. The courts take into consideration various factors which include the intention of the taxpayer, the number or frequency of the transactions, the relation of the transactions to the taxpayer's regular business, the nature of the transaction and the course of conduct of the taxpayer. None of these factors are deciding in themselves but all the circumstances must be regarded as a whole.

I do not think that the courts have had greater difficulty in deciding these matters than they have with other legal problems which are continually coming before them. Perhaps there has been more interest in the matter in recent years because the income tax appeal board has provided an easy method of settling differences between the taxpayer and the department and the period of high prosperity through which we have been passing has given many people an opportunity to make side profits in property dealings.

In that connection, Mr. Chairman, the Canadian Tax Journal of November-December 1955 has a very interesting article called "The Capital Gains Scare". It is written by Robert Tresilian who I presume is an anonymous writer. I am not going over the whole of the article, although it is very interesting reading for anyone who is interested in this particular subject. However, I should like to quote this much:

> Some weeks ago the press reported that a case was to be heard shortly by the tax appeal board in which an appeal was to be made from an assessment on gains made in the stock exchange. Though no such case has yet been reported, the press announcement appears to have caused a minor panic.

I think most hon. members are familiar with the law of the United States where there is a tax of 25 per cent on capital gains throughout the year. I am not going to go through the whole of the article, but I am going to read the conclusion which is very significant to me at least.

To conclude, it would appear that the concern expressed by the press is unfounded. The few court decisions to which references have been made are merely evidence of the process of separating the wolves from the flock, the former—being those enterprising persons who attempt to wear the sheepskin of the ordinary investor, while carrying on the ordinary trading, businesses or ventures which the law has always declared to be taxable.

In addition, Mr. Chairman, there is the question asked by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny) with reference to the deductibility of donations for political purposes. I have announced the policy of the department, and that has been the policy of the department during the past 11 years I have been there. He referred to the question asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and the reason I gave the answer I did that day was that I did not hear the whole of the question. But that is the general principle which has been followed, and I have discussed it with every deputy minister I have had. It is the policy which has been carried out. After a firm has paid its taxes, if it wishes to make a donation for political purposes it is not my concern what they do with the money or to whom they give it.

The Chairman: Did I understand the minister to say he had an amendment to send up?

Mr. McCann: Yes, and I would ask the Minister of Finance to move it.

Mr. Harris: I move:

That item 289 be reduced in the amount of $50,000.

Mr. Monteith: I should like to take a moment or two of the time of the house by making a few remarks concerning this capital gains tax or supposed capital gains tax which the minister has been attempting to explain. I should like to read just a few lines from the evidence of the estimates committee appearing at page 779, near the bottom of the page. There is some preliminary talk about the possibility of the capital gains tax and then we come to this:

Mr. Monteith: In the instance of, shall we say, a retired person. He has an amount of money, maybe a couple of hundred thousand dollars. He has it in stocks. He deals fairly frequently. Would you be curious about his transactions?

[Mr. McCann.]

Mr. McEntyre: Of course we are curious about every taxpayer, but I do not think in that case we would be particularly curious about that individual.

Mr. Monteith: Do you think that if parliament should see fit to, shall we say, make better definitions as to what stock market transactions are, or what capital gains are, that it would assist you in your department with respect to whether or not you should investigate a certain person's stock market transactions, for example?

Mr. McEntyre: I think perhaps it would.

Mr. Monteith: In other words, you might be inclined to think, or say that the law as it exists now does not sufficiently determine whether a transaction is a capital gain or not?

Mr. McEntyre: I think as we go along, and with the courts examining more of these cases, that more principles are laid down, and in that way the law is becoming more certain in that respect.

Mr. Monteith: Of course, the courts and the appeal board, and so on, determine their cases according to how the law stands at the moment, do they not?

Mr. McEntyre: That is right, sir.

Mr. Monteith: If the law were changed to determine or to clarify exactly what a capital gain is, then the appeal board would naturally follow the law as it existed then?

Mr. McEntyre: Yes, sir.

It was clear in the evidence that the collecting department of the Department of National Revenue is not clear in its own mind as to how to determine the laws that exist, and in my thinking they should advise the Department of Finance as to how the act should be revised so that capital gain can be definitely specified.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, in answer to that, there is no definition in the law of what constitutes a capital gain. On several occasions it has been brought up when we have had the preliminary meetings on the budget with the finance committee, and the best legal advice is that up to date they have not been able to define what constitutes a capital gain.

Mr. Viau: In the discussion of this first item of general administration of income tax yesterday the hon. member for Dauphin, in his opening remarks, referred to the net worth statement as it affects farmers in the province of Manitoba and expressed his grievances with the attitude taken at times by the officials of the Department of National Revenue in dealing with farmers and in continuing at times to make a net worth statement which is not in accordance with the net return, I would say, of the farms in the previous three or five years. His remarks in respect to the net worth statement were very brief. I listened attentively to what he had to say, and in his first remarks and in the latter part of his speech which I read carefully this morning I notice that of the five columns of his speech four columns refer to the question which was asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on April 9, which I shall read. It was addressed to the Minister of National Revenue and is recorded at page 2729 of Hansard, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue? Will the minister re-examine the income tax files of the breweries of Manitoba to ascertain whether any of them claimed income tax deductibility for the contributions they made, as revealed in Winnipeg last week, to the Liberal, Conservative and Social Credit parties of Manitoba?

Then, of course, the hon. member for Dauphin continued his remarks on this question and he referred to the report which was discussed at Winnipeg at that time, which was issued by the royal commission established by the provincial government of Manitoba with respect to the liquor situation in that province. I shall quote the remarks made by the hon. member for Dauphin, as reported at page 5010 of Hansard:

In that statement you will find that the representative of the breweries stated that not only did the breweries of Manitoba make cash contributions to the political parties within the province of Manitoba but they made them also to the federal political parties.

I may say here that by using the plural "political parties" he does not include the C.C.F. party. I continue:

That immediately, of course, involves the consideration of this parliament.

In the last paragraph on the same page we find the following:

In case the minister or the committee is in doubt about what happened in Manitoba, may I refer them to some of the newspaper headlines. For example, the Winnipeg Free Press of April 4, 1956, carried this headline, "Breweries Bare Gifts to Three Parties; All But C.C.F. Shared $28,075 since 1945".

The remarks continue with respect to these gifts made only to the major political parties of the province of Manitoba. The members of the C.C.F. party stand up in this parliament and in the province of Manitoba with halos over their heads and rejoice that they receive no contributions from any corporation, either in Manitoba or throughout Canada. That is not a clear picture of the situation. We all know that political organizations have certain work to do and they have expenses to meet, and it is well known that contributions are received to help defray those expenses.

Our friends of the C.C.F. party are trying to set up a different picture. They say they receive no cash for their political organizations throughout western Canada. As I say, they go around with halos over their heads telling us that they receive no contributions from any corporation. But that is not the clear picture at all. The reason I rise today is to set out the situation that exists in Manitoba, especially in my own city of St. Boniface. I want to indicate the way in which the C.C.F. raise their political funds. They are now operating one of the largest gambling joints in the province of Manitoba right in my own city of St. Boniface.

A few years ago the C.C.F. party applied to the provincial secretary of Manitoba for a charter to operate what was called the commonwealth recreation society. This was being formed in order to round up all their friends. I call them their friends because the attitude they have taken in the past on public platforms in Manitoba is that they are the only friends of those Canadian citizens who are receiving social benefits, of the farmers and of labour.

We all know that members of the C.C.F. must contribute a certain percentage of their indemnity to the party funds, and no doubt in addition they receive contributions from individuals. But once this charter was obtained the picture was different. I should like to place on the record the names of the directors of that organization. I think I am fair in doing this because these names are taken from a public document.

One director is W. C. Leitkie, who is well known to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. He has been an organizer for the C.C.F. and is an employee of Canadian National Telegraphs. Another is A. R. Paulley, member of the legislative assembly for Kildonan-Transcona. Another is Dave Mulligan, alderman for ward 1 in the city of Winnipeg. The last is none other than the Rev. Lloyd Stinson, the provincial leader of the C.C.F. party.

This recreation society was formed for the purpose of holding social evenings with their friends, but they operate bingo games. These were first started in the city of Winnipeg but the law officers advised the members of the C.C.F. that bingo or any form of gambling would not be allowed in Winnipeg. So they crossed over the Red river to St. Boniface and rented large quarters from an individual where they could operate this commonwealth recreation society. I might say that last year the individual from whom they rented these quarters was fined $16,000 for having made fraudulent income tax returns.

If the C.C.F. intended to operate this for fraternal purposes or as a social gathering they would probably have a bingo game once a week or twice a month. We all know that organizations in certain parts of Canada, particularly in Ottawa, service clubs and the like, operate bingo games possibly once a month. Valuable prizes are given, sometimes amounting to about $10,000, but the Kinsmen or the Kiwanis clubs which operate these bingo games in Ottawa obtain large returns which they use for their social work.

The C.C.F. party did not operate their games in Manitoba once a week or twice a week; they operate thirteen nights a month. Last week the fire chief of St. Boniface made a complaint to the city council and asked that the necessary measures be taken—this was not within the power of the fire chief to do himself—to prevent these quarters being crowded with from 400 to 450 people thirteen nights a month. The fire chief claimed this created a fire hazard.

An entrance fee of 75 cents is charged, and if you multiply 400 by 13 by 75 you will see that the C.C.F. party in Manitoba is obtaining a large return from this recreation society. This money is not being spent for social or fraternal work, it is used primarily for political work in the province. I might use some of the words used yesterday by the hon. member for Dauphin when he referred to the contributions made by the breweries to the main political parties in the province of Manitoba and asked if these contributions were considered as being deductible for income tax purposes.

I believe I have stated clearly the situation that exists in the province. As I say, these people go around the prairies with halos over their heads saying that they receive no contributions from corporations, yet they tax their friends so much a night when they attend thirteen times a month at this recreation society. The total received would be far more than the $30,000 received from 1945 to 1955 from the breweries in that province.

I bring this matter to the attention of the committee because of the remarks yesterday by the hon. member for Dauphin. I do hope that the Minister of National Revenue—I am using part of the question asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—will re-examine the income tax returns of the commonwealth recreation society of the province of Manitoba situated in St. Boniface to ascertain whether any claim has been made to a deduction for income tax purpose of these contributions received in the form of gambling.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, the minister has reiterated the general tenor of his remarks in the committee when he said that his department was concerned only with the administration of the act and disclaimed any responsibility for the actual enactment of income tax legislation.

However, it seems to me that the minister must recognize that he, in his capacity as a member of the executive, has probably more influence than any other member except the Minister of Finance himself with regard to the formulation of policy. I think this is borne out by some of the remarks of the Minister of Finance in his budget speech. On the evening when he presented the budget to the house, the Minister of Finance referred to the fact that he and the Minister of National Revenue conferred. I think he used the expression, "the Minister of National Revenue and I have given considerable thought" to certain aspects of the legislation. I do not doubt that that is true. It would be very odd indeed if they were not in conference almost continuously as to the administration of the department and also the policies that the government proposed to put into effect.

I have just been looking back on the budget debate. I cannot find the actual place but I remember that on that evening the Minister of Finance tendered his thanks to the Minister of National Revenue for the collecting of substantial sums, but I must say that I did not hear him proffer the same thanks to the taxpayers who paid those sums. No doubt it was an oversight, and possibly the Minister of Finance would permit me to make that correction in his remarks at this time. Because I believe that the Minister of National Revenue must have some influence on the forming of policy, I believe that there are some things that should be said in this debate on the estimates of his department. A few of the things that I wish to bring up now, I did comment on in committee, but I should like to have them on the record of this house. Now that the Minister of Finance is in the house also, I hope that he will likewise bear in mind the suggestions I make.

In the first place I should like to refer to the practice of the department of taxing rental revenue as investment income when it comes to the taxpayer from an estate or trust. I draw attention to the remarks I made in the committee, which were to the effect that it has been ruled in court on many occasions that income does not change its character by reason of passing through a trustee to a beneficiary. As a matter of fact, I think the rule is so well established that it scarcely needs to be mentioned, but I believe that that should be borne in mind when we consider the practice of the department of assessing income from trusts or estates as investment income without regard for the source of that income.

On the T3 form, the estate or trust return, in the section that deals with surtax on investment income, there is a little note to which I drew attention previously in the committee. It says:

> Rental income from real property and income from a business or farm operated by the executor or trustee are not subject to surtax in his hands.

Yet on the new T1 general form, the only place where you can report income from estates or trust is in the investment income space. That in turn is carried forward to be reported for the purposes of surtax on page 2. It seems to me that this is a matter which the government should consider.

Since the Minister of National Revenue disclaims responsibility for policy, then I appeal to other members of the government to consider this in the executive and, because there is apparently no foundation in law for this departmental practice, to see that steps are taken to have rental income assessed for tax purposes as it should be, without regard to whether or not it passes through intermediate hands before reaching the ultimate beneficiary. I suggest that that could be done simply by making space available on the T 1 general form for the reporting of income from rental accruing to a beneficiary from an estate or trust. It would be a very simple matter to arrange, and I suggest that consideration be given to it.

There was another question which I brought up in the committee and about which I wish to speak for a few minutes this afternoon. That is the apparent discrepancy in the allowance of charitable donations. In speaking on this particular aspect in the committee I drew attention to the fact that apparently in some sections of the country there had grown up a practice of allowing donations to the sum of $25 unsubstantiated by receipts. I admit that the minister and the officials of his department expressed surprise that this was the case but since the day when we discussed that in the committee, because of the surprise which was shown by the government minister and his officials, I checked into it again and I find that that practice has been adopted in certain centres. I fancy that bringing the matter to light in this way will result in a directive from the department to the effect that taxpayers in all parts of the country must be treated in precisely the same manner. If it is the department's desire to allow donations up to $25 without receipts, then that allowance should be made to all taxpayers. Whether or not a portion of their taxable donations is substantiated by receipts, they should be allowed to add to that amount $25 for sundry causes. I suggest to the minister that they should do one or the other; either they should allow it to everyone or they should allow it to no one. I do not believe there should be any discrimination with regard to these allowances.

There is another matter which was discussed in the committee and about which I should like to speak this afternoon. That is the interpretation that has been placed on clause 11 (1) (j), which resulted in the disallowance of alimony in a specific case which I cited in the committee. I do not intend to go into the details of this case. I merely wish to quote Mr. Fordham, a copy of whose judgment in this particular case I hold in my hand. In giving his judgment he set out clause 11 (1) (j) and he made these remarks:

> Much to the taxpayer's surprise, however, the minister disallowed such deductions and ruled that they did not come within the purview of the provision set out above. At the hearing it became clear that this was because the word "alimony" did not appear after "divorce" in the fourth line of paragraph (j), above. An appeal to the board duly followed.

Then Mr. Fordham went on to say:

> The matter reveals for the first time, where the board is concerned, what appears to be a remarkable and unfortunate oversight or omission in the drafting of the foregoing enactment. Although alimony, as such, is clearly deductible by the payer when a court has made an award of alimony in a decree, order or judgment for divorce, or a husband or wife have executed a separation agreement providing for the payment of alimony, subsection (1) (j) does not take cognizance of an action for alimony alone. No reference to such a proceeding is to be found in its wording. Hence, the unfortunate appellant cannot have the relief that is ordinarily afforded to those obligated to pay alimony periodically. The words "judicial separation" do not assist him, as the Ontario courts are without jurisdiction to entertain actions for judicial separation.

Those are the words of Mr. Fordham. You can no doubt look them up. However, the point which he makes is a point which I ask the government to consider, namely, whether or not clause 11 (1) (j) should be amended by insertion of the word "alimony" in that clause to permit the deduction of alimony where it is a matter of agreement and has been sanctioned by the courts without going through the formalities of divorce proceedings. I trust the government will consider that because it seems to me a grave injustice that people who accept their financial responsibilities in this manner should have such allowances removed from their list of recognized deductions for income tax purposes.

Over the past few years, Mr. Chairman, there have been a number of pleas made in the house for the removal of the floor on medical expenses, and I could not speak on the estimates of national revenue without mentioning this particular point and once more urging the government, as I am sure other members also will, to remove that floor. The arguments in favour of so doing have been set out on numerous occasions. I do not intend to go into them at any length this afternoon. I would be merely reiterating arguments which I have made previously and which other members of the house have made. I still believe it would be a sound move and I think also it would be just simple justice to people who, in time of great need, are forced to pay out large sums which undoubtedly causes them considerable distress, and it seems to me they should be permitted to take all of these items as deductions and not just the portion in excess of a certain percentage of their income.

There is one other matter I should like to bring before the house this afternoon. I refer to the position in which the self-employed person, whether in business or the professions, finds himself with regard to the building up of retirement funds. There have been a great many articles written on this matter as well as letters to the newspapers and presentations made to members of parliament and to the government. I have in my hand a letter written by a well known Hamilton doctor to the Hamilton Spectator in which he describes the situation in which a physician finds himself with regard to setting up some sort of scheme to give him security late in his life. He says in part that the physician in attempting to set up an estate invests in annuities or some other insurance scheme to ensure security later in life but because he is self-employed this deduction cannot be allowed. He draws attention in a personal letter to me to the presentation to members of parliament by the Canadian Medical Association which requested in part tax deferment on personal contributions to annuities or other retirement funds.

I want to emphasize once more that in speaking in this vein this afternoon I am not speaking solely on behalf of professional people because I think there are a great many businessmen, small businessmen particularly, who find themselves in precisely the same position as those who operate professional practices. In the letter from the Canadian Medical Association accompanying the presentation to members of parliament they draw attention to an article by Dr. T. James Quintin of Sherbrooke which appeared in the October 1, 1955, issue of the Canadian Medical Association Journal. In Dr. Quintin's article he made some very pertinent comments. He started out by quoting part of a statement taken from the Millar Tucker report to the British House of Commons on the taxation treatment of provisions for retirement, and I should like to read into the record two sentences that he quoted.

[Mrs. Fairclough.]

> It has to be remembered that the law of income tax is not one of the laws of nature. It is purely man made and the principles governing the imposition of the tax therefore depend on the will of the creator.

Dr. Quintin refers to this statement taken from the Millar Tucker report and he comments that it is used in referring to the changes needed in the income tax law as it applies to self-employed persons. Dr. Quintin refers only to physicians, but as I said before I refer to all self-employed persons. Dr. Quintin goes on to say:

> It is they, the self-savers, who suffer from this discrimination in our present Canadian Income Tax Act, as opposed to the pension savers who, because they work for a group or an industry, are allowed postponement of income tax on a portion of their income, if they are eligible for membership in approved pension plans.

I do not intend to read much more of what Dr. Quintin has to say but his remarks seemed to me to be so pertinent that I could not improve on them myself. Therefore, if the house will permit me, I should like to read one or two paragraphs. Dr. Quintin says:

> The physician suffers with all the self-employed under the inequities of the present system, but he suffers more because he requires the longest training amongst the professional groups.

Some members might challenge that but nevertheless this is his presentation. He says:

> His earnings are concentrated in a shorter period of time, and during these peak years he is often taxed in a higher income bracket than if he had had his income spread out over a longer tax period.

Then he goes on to point out the effect which this situation is having on the profession in general and he makes this comment:

> Instances of the "old doctor" who has had to hang on to his practice because he has nothing on which to retire are too well known to all of us. Or the middle-aged physician who is ill and who has served his hospital, his patients and his community well, and yet can't take it easy or retire, as he was not able even at his peak years to save after paying his income tax.

Then speaking of the young doctor he says.

> Where are the young graduates who could be our much-sought-after general practitioners or self-employed family doctors? They are to be found in the clinic groups or among the company doctors, where among other things they will have a certain security which appeals, and a guaranteed retirement income paid for by income tax relief allowed to them because they are not self-employed.

To my mind, Mr. Chairman, this situation, apart from being unfair, does little to encourage individual initiative.

I should like to refer to another source, namely a brief, if such it can be called or rather a memorandum as they describe it, sent by the Canadian Dental Association to the government with respect to the deductibility of pension payments from taxable income. In the first paragraph of this memorandum which is headed "Fundamental basis of Proposals", the dental association has this to say.

> In making this presentation, we feel justified in claiming that we are not asking the government to consider any new principle for surely it is long accepted and incorporated in income tax legislation that is just, and desirable as a matter of public policy, that the individual who has laboured throughout the productive years of his life should be rewarded over a longer period than his actual service: that some of the income of the productive years should be deferred to the years when work is no longer possible.

I am sure the minister would agree with me, Mr. Chairman, and the Minister of Finance also, that this was, after all, the way in which people in this country have planned their lives for many years. The income tax is a comparatively new field. Years and years ago persons were able to save from income and lay aside their savings. Then when their years of activity had ceased they were able to have funds with which to support themselves for the rest of their lives. But in periods of high taxation it is almost impossible to save sufficient to guarantee a retirement income purely from personal savings. So there has grown up over the years the demand for an insured period of retirement and schemes have been promoted and have become popular in industry. Even the government itself has such a scheme which is available to purchasers. But I should draw attention here to the fact that a man who subscribes to a retirement scheme and who is employed in industry, where that scheme is recognized by the government, is permitted to deduct the premiums from income for taxation assessment. However, a self-employed person can purchase precisely the same kind of annuity from the same source, pay the same premiums and be allowed no deductions. It just does not seem to add up to equitable treatment, and I trust that the government will give some consideration to this extremely important matter.

In closing these remarks I should like to read again two short paragraphs from the brief of the dental association:

> We believe the government desires, as a matter of good public policy, the maintenance of income as a stabilizing factor in the economy of the nation, contributing to the maintenance of employment and the general well-being.
> Finally, we believe it contrary to good public policy that professional men, however able in their prime, should be compelled as a matter of personal subsistence, to continue practice after their faculties are impaired.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, it will just take a moment to answer some of the criticisms offered by the hon. member for Hamilton West. She appears to be in the right church but probably in the wrong pew at the present time because of all the matters about which she has spoken, including rental revenue, charitable donations, alimony, medical expenses, pensions and all the rest, the only one that has to do at all with the administration of the department is that with reference to charitable donations. The others are matters which are very interesting but which may well be brought before the Minister of Finance either in committee or when he brings in his income tax act or before the next budget.

Mrs. Fairclough: May I suggest that I was making my remarks to the house and to the executive at large.

Mr. McCann: With reference to charitable donations, I am only going to quote what the deputy minister of taxation said with reference to the complaint that there are rumours afloat to the effect that a person may claim $25 as donations without providing any receipts. The deputy minister said this at the committee meeting as reported at page 822 of the proceedings:

> The policy certainly is, if a claim is made for charitable donations, that it must be supported by proper receipts. There is that principle of—

There are some Latin words here which I will have to have translated for me.

> —deminimis non curat lex. Occasionally you get into the question of a very small adjustment which requires you to write the taxpayer a letter and ask if he has receipts for this amount of $5 or some small amount. When you think of the amount of tax involved, 20 percent of $5 it may be only $1, so we do overlook sometimes very small items that are not going to make any particular difference in the tax involved.

But the general principle and the administrative principle is that if any claim is made for charitable donations, it has got to be supported by proper receipts.

(Translation):

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, the study of the estimates of the Department of National Revenue gives me an opportunity to make a few remarks which I consider quite relevant.

It is worth noting that, despite a number of recommendations made by the official opposition over the years, the government has not seen fit to give the Canadian taxpayer the relief he is entitled to expect.

The war has been over for almost twelve years already and, although all public groups have kept asking for tax cuts, taxpayers are still staggering under the burden of excessive taxation. This cannot go on for ever and Canadians, as well as our most astute businessmen, realize that by keeping taxes at such a high level the government can only jeopardize the future of Canadian economy. Personal taxes, I think, particularly deserve the attention of the government, and a long overdue reduction should be seriously taken into consideration. The government is no doubt planning personal income tax reduction prior to the general election which is sure to take place early in 1957, in a fresh bid for the popular vote.

The people of Canada, however, want sizeable cuts right now. They refuse to play the game of those who take such action for the sole purpose of clinging to power. If the government is turning down the opposition's legitimate request that we go to the people, we may gather, convinced as we are that those who are now governing this country have lost the confidence of the Canadian people by their dictatorial and anti democratic attitude and by jeopardizing the very foundations of our parliamentary institutions, we may gather that they intend, before going to the people, to sweeten the pill once more and try, unsuccessfully that time, to have it swallowed by the Canadian taxpayers.

That is why, in spite of protests coming from all over the country, the government stays put and has no intention to give the poor taxpayer the relief to which he is entitled and which he hopes to get as soon as possible.

As the cost of living index has not changed since the end of the war, and has remained at a very high level, it is unquestionable that small wage earners are desperately trying, at the cost of many sacrifices, to provide for themselves and for their family.

To protect our own economy, it is more urgent than ever that the revenue of the wage-earner be raised substantially, especially in the case of the small wage earner whose family responsibilities are ever increasing.

The Canadian workers, both those with a small revenue and those in somewhat higher brackets, would like to have the opportunity to provide for their family. He would like the advantage of giving his children an education sufficient to ensure their future. How can he contemplate a brilliant future for his children if he is ruthlessly deprived by the government of that part of his revenue which he could use for that purpose?

If it is true that the government must collect the taxes necessary for the administration of the country, it is no less true that it must ensure the future, the prosperity and the security of the people. If the government does not take the steps necessary to that end, it is lacking in its administrative duties and, at the same time, it is taking an anti-social, anti-familial and anti-Christian stand.

A married man, with all the obligations of married life, can barely exist if he is allowed but $2,000 a year to keep his home, clothe and feed his family, pay for urgent medical care and think about. . .

(Text):

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order; I have no desire to interrupt the debate which has been most helpful in what has already been said this afternoon, but I really must say to hon. members that when we come to discuss points of policy, as has been the case, and in particular when we discuss the level of taxes as my hon. friend is now doing, those are matters which should be debated either on the budget or on my estimates and not the estimates of this particular department. I will be quite glad to do what I can to give such time as hon. members want on my own estimates to discuss these things, but we have had our budget debate and the level of taxation has been set for the rest of this session. I would hope hon. members could confine themselves strictly to the matters that really are of concern to the Minister of National Revenue and, for my sake, not interject questions I cannot really answer at the moment, and for the sake of the Minister of National Revenue hon. members should confine themselves to those things with which he has to deal. I accept the full responsibility for matters of policy and I would hope the hon. member for Quebec West, while I admit we allowed a certain amount of latitude to the hon. member for Hamilton West, would confine himself, if possible, to matters before the Minister of National Revenue and not the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Dufresne: I have always felt that deductions from income tax were always under the Department of National Revenue.

Mr. Harris: No, they are not.

Mr. Dufresne: I do not think any hon. member can contradict me when I say that the Department of National Revenue is getting the taxes.

Mr. Habel: Collecting the taxes; they have nothing to do with fixing the tax.

Mr. Dufresne: That is what I am speaking about; I am saying his department is taking too much out of the poor people, those who have only a small salary. The Minister of National Revenue can always refer what I have said to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Harris: That is budgetary matter and perhaps it is one for my estimates. I do not know that until I examine what my hon. friend has said. However, it is a matter of financial policy, how much taxes we pay.

Mr. Dufresne: Why did you get up if you did not know what I said?

Mr. Habel: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman.—

Mr. Dufresne: What point of order?

Mr. Habel: I am coming to that. In fact, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Quebec West was making a good political speech on behalf of his constituents but there is no doubt he is entirely out of order when he talks about the amount of taxes, the exemptions and so forth. I understand that those are budget matters and once the budget has been decided then all he can talk about on these estimates is the collection of taxes. The minister was quite right in his point of order.

Mr. Dufresne: I believe that speech, as usual, is not too brilliant. I guess it cannot be otherwise since it is coming from the hon. member for Cochrane.

Mr. Habel: I will tell you any time you want.

The Chairman: Order. I was not able to follow the hon. gentleman's earlier remarks as closely as I would have liked as he was speaking a language with which I regret I am not yet too familiar. I was going to congratulate the Minister of Finance on his knowledge of the language until he admitted he himself would have to read the hon. member's remarks later.

However, I did follow enough of the remarks to know that the hon. gentleman was dealing with matters of financial policy rather than the collection of taxes, which comes under the purview of the Minister of National Revenue. I would ask the hon. gentleman not to deal with matters of fiscal policy, but with matters which more particularly come within the taxation division of the Department of National Revenue which, after all, is a collection department.

Mr. Dufresne: All right, Mr. Chairman. I will agree, and I will wait until the estimates of the Minister of Finance come before us to bring to the attention of the committee the remarks I have just made.

(Translation):

However, Mr. Chairman, I would like to call the minister's attention to the blameworthy—to say the least—conduct of those who are entrusted with the inspection of the books of taxpayers supposedly in arrears in their payments.

I admit that the government has to claim its due, but I am opposed to certain brutal methods employed to ensure that result. It must be admitted that the people who are asked to pay taxes are no criminals, no dangerous bandits, and must therefore not be treated as such.

Let us make an end of this uncalled for intrusion in highly personal matters especially those directly connected with married life and the relationship between man and wife.

May I be allowed to read a letter which came to me recently from a prominent professional man in the province of Quebec. I hope I may dispense from giving his name.

(Text):

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, I believe that, according to the rules of this house, when a letter is read in the house we must have the name of the man who sent it. The hon. member was about to read a letter after saying that he would not mention the name.

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, it is not the letter I wish to read; it is a copy—

Mr. Lesage: That is what you said.

Mr. Dufresne: It is a copy of some remarks made by a very prominent professional in the province of Quebec who wrote to me. Of course, the minister will not be surprised if I hide the name because some members on the other side might be glad to find out who is writing to us. I do not think there is any rule of this house, Mr. Chairman, that prevents me from reading a document that I am ready to table.

The Chairman: If, in the course of his remarks, the hon. member wishes to read a letter he must, of course, give the name of the sender of the letter.

Mr. Dufresne: It is not a letter, Mr. Chairman. I just explained that it is a copy of a document which the gentleman had sent to a newspaper in the province of Quebec, and it was not printed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: Unprintable.

Mr. Dufresne: Like the minister's speeches.

Mr. Pickersgill: I get my speeches printed; that is the trouble.

Mr. Dufresne: Like the kind of speeches the minister makes here.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, this document reads as follows:

(Text):

Mr. Lesage: Oh, no; I am sorry. I am coming back to my point of order. The hon. gentleman is now endeavouring to read what he calls remarks made by a professional, which have been sent to him. He says it is not a letter; it is a document containing remarks. Well, a document containing remarks sent by a professional to the hon. member is certainly a letter, or some kind of a letter, and the rule applies to it. I do not believe the hon. member should start reading a letter without giving the name of the sender.

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, I shall just make my own remarks based on what I have in hand. I shall read them exactly as if they were my own. I do not think anyone will stop me. I will not use the copy that I have in hand.

The Chairman: The hon. member referred to this matter first as a letter which had been sent to him, and said that he wanted to read it.

Mr. Dufresne: If you allow me, I said it was a document attached to a letter that I had.

The Chairman: It is a document which has been sent to the hon. member and which he wishes to read to the house. The situation is covered by citation 270, which reads:

An unsigned letter should not be read in the house. On the 16th May, 1928, a member stated during debate that a letter which he had been quoting was not signed. The Speaker said: "Such a letter should not be read into Hansard; all letters when read must be signed and they become part of the documents of the house."

The ruling is quite clear. The hon. member is quite at liberty to read the document into the record, but if he wishes to read it into the record, then he must of course indicate its source by giving the name of the sender.

Mr. Dufresne: I think I will give the name of the sender because it will be very interesting even to those who do not speak my language to be able to read the translation tomorrow. This letter comes from Dr. Andre Legendre of Shawinigan Falls, in the province of Quebec. The document attached to the letter is the following one. It is entitled:

(Translation):

That letter was written by Dr. Andre Legendre, of Shawinigan Falls. It is entitled: "All they need now is a revolver in their hand."

Usually the work of the assessors and inspectors of the income tax division is not an easy one. Their task is not pleasant when they have to investigate mistakes, sometimes deliberate mistakes, made in a financial statement. But in democracy there are, between civilized people, certain limits beyond which it is nothing less than abuse, which borders on sadism. Witness the following instance of a case recently reported in one of the cities of this province.

One fine spring morning, six or seven automobiles drove into town, each carrying a member of the R.C.M.P. and one or two accountants from the income tax division. At exactly the same time, a group calls simultaneously at the office and at the home of three professional people of the city; the man in charge shows to the wife or the secretary an authorization from the Deputy Minister of Finance and a search warrant signed by the president of the Exchequer Court. The two documents, requested by a French Canadian and concerning French Canadians, and authorizing a complete search of the home of a French Canadian, are drafted exclusively in English. But that is of no importance to those gentlemen who give a brief explanation of their significance, without bothering to make sure that the meaning of the document is fully understood, (French legal texts are already not too easy to understand, let alone the meaning of such a document for one who is not conversant with legal terms or with English) and they immediately ask to be led to the bedroom or the office of the boss. The moment chosen is of course one when the head of the family is away from his home and from his office. Then begins a complete search; those people even take upon themselves to read excerpts from the personal diary or the intimate correspondence of the husband or wife. Nothing can be done to avoid that search of one's treasures. If permission is refused, everything will be taken away and then . . . When the victim of such a brutal investigation arrives, having been advised by telephone, and tries to discuss the matter with them, the investigators, relying on their power and their position, reply politely, but without giving any definite answer, except the following: "We have been instructed to take with us anything that may pertain to accounting. We are entitled to see everything, to look everywhere and to examine all documents, whether personal or not." And search of the premises goes on; nothing is overlooked, not even the box of sanitary napkins or the garbage pails. The investigators take away all documents they see fit to seize, without giving any receipt for the items taken away, leaving it up to the owner to list them and make a claim (what chance would he have to be heard?) if everything which has been taken is not given back. Except for the use of a revolver and brutal treatment of women and children, one would think that we were living behind the Iron Curtain! It remains that such a method of investigation is unjustified, if steps have not been taken previously to obtain the required information and such attacks are led first against respectable citizens. Secret police methods and intimidation have no place in a true democracy; one is led to wonder whether all that deliberate and systematic campaign by the government against certain professions, does not aim to lower their prestige and give it a freer hand in taking certain political steps. But there is one thing that is even more serious, and it is the use in such cases of documents in English only. When the authorities force the door of a taxpayer, violate the privacy of his home, and take contemptible and despicable means to find fault with him and take away his money, that is already more or less democratic, but when insult is added to injury by the fact that no respect is shown for the victim's mother tongue, that goes beyond the limits and adds insult to brutality. That also shows the spirit which prevails in the income tax division, a contempt for the taxpayer, especially the French-speaking taxpayer. Let us hope that one of our members of parliament will rise in the house and mention the fact.

I think this letter speaks for itself, Mr. Chairman, and does not call for any comments. However, I have another duty i.e., to tell the government, and more especially the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann), to give strict orders to stop such abuse at once.

I now would like to touch upon another point, Mr. Chairman, a point I consider of the highest import and which cannot be ignored by this government.

The leader of the communist party in Quebec, named Gui Caron, has just applied to the superior court of my province for an order compelling the C.B.C. to grant him broadcasting time on the radio and television networks.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Dufresne: The leader of the communists approached the court with a mandamus.

(Text):

Some hon. Members: Out of order.

Mr. Habel: The hon. member for Quebec West is out of order, and he knows it perfectly well. He is now talking about the C.B.C.

Mr. Dufresne: Radio Canada is under the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. Habel: You are out of order and you know it.

The Chairman: We are dealing with item 289, which has to do with the taxation division of the Department of National Revenue. There are subsequent items which relate to the C.B.C. and it has always been our custom to deal with them separately rather than under these items of the Department of National Revenue. The items in question are Nos. 54, 55 and 56.

Mr. Dufresne: I will save those remarks for later on.

(Translation):

And now, Mr. Chairman, I should like to inform the Minister of National Revenue of a letter that I received recently—let not my hon. friend from Cochrane (Mr. Habel) worry, the rules allow me to read this letter—

Mr. Habel: As long as you are in order, you are free to speak.

Mr. Dufresne: This is a letter from one of my constituents or rather a letter I wrote to the minister about one of my constituents who is afflicted by a most crippling disability. In order to go to work, he has to use some means of transportation which he could do without. So that hon. members may have an idea of this man's situation, I shall read the letter that I wrote recently:

Mr. J. C. Patenaude,
Taxation Division,
Department of National Revenue,
Jackson Building, 122 Bank St.,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Sir:

Re: Mr. Hosea Cantin,
46 Christophe-Colomb West,
Quebec City, Que.

The above-mentioned has been suffering since birth from a very painful disability. In fact Mr. Cantin is barely 3 feet in height and must drag himself painfully on legs about six inches long. Even if you have not seen him you can picture to yourselves his condition and, like me, I am sure, you must have pity on his misfortune. A few years ago, some charitable people managed to find a job for Mr. Cantin at the Quebec parliament.

However, Mr. Cantin's sole means of getting to his place of work in the morning and back home at night is to hire a regular taxi for which he has to pay $1.20 a day. He even brings his lunch to avoid extra expense. I need not add that the taxi driver has to help him to get in and out of the taxi. Without this means of transportation, Mr. Cantin would have to rely on public charity since it is impossible for him to travel in any other way.

Being a bachelor, his tax exemption is only $1,000 while his annual salary is $2,000. Mr. Cantin is asking, rightly so, and I support him without reservation, that an amount of $360 a year be allowed to him for unavoidable expenses of transportation. Up to now, his request has been repected. In my opinion, this is a rather exceptional case and a spirit of humanity should prevail over normal bureaucratic rule.

I strongly urge therefore that permission be given to Mr. Cantin to deduct from his personal income tax his legitimate and unavoidable transportation expenses since this is the only way for him to avoid being a charge to the public.

I hope that this request will be granted without delay. I thank you in advance. Please accept the expression of my best wishes, dear Mr. Patenaude.

Yours truly.

Mr. Chairman, I have read that letter in order that the minister may understand that there are exceptional cases—they are not very numerous—which deserve special attention.

Mr. Leduc (Jacques Cartier-Lasalle): I wonder if the minister of health and social welfare in the province of Quebec could not get a grant in a case like this, since it involves an employee of the Quebec government? Grants are made rather liberally in the province of Quebec, and I am sure he could get one.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Dufresne: This applause could very well be toned down, there being no call for it under the circumstances.

Mr. Chairman, the government of the province of Quebec is already contributing its full share in the case I have mentioned. This disabled man has been given a job for which he is paid $2,000 a year. On the other hand the federal government—this man is single—taxes his salary after $1,000. I agree that the government is acting according to the law, but it seems to me that, in such a special case, it would be only fair, as I said in my letter, if humanitarian considerations prevailed over standard bureaucratic practice. It seems to me that it would not harm anyone if this poor chap were allowed to deduct $360 a year for such absolutely necessary transportation, since otherwise he could not get to work at all.

I personally took it up with the minister; I was very well received, and he told me that his only responsibility was to administer the law enacted by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris). I agree.

Mr. Cauchon: By parliament.

Mr. Dufresne: By parliament. I raised that point this afternoon, in order to show that there are exceptional cases. I ask the minister to submit those cases to the authorities or to the cabinet. It should be possible, without harming anyone, to make the necessary changes or to grant the necessary exemptions in such pitiful cases as the one I just referred to.

Mr. Habel: You know very well that we cannot legislate for individual cases. It is a rather difficult case, but the government of Quebec could help that man by increasing his salary to cover the additional expense. The government in Ottawa cannot make special regulations for each individual case.

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, I am not here to discuss what the Quebec government should do. I stated what the Quebec government was doing for that man and I congratulate the said government for giving him some kind of employment, without which he would have been a charge upon the state. And God knows that one cannot live with the $40.00 monthly pension paid to invalids. One cannot live on that.

The Minister of National Revenue stated as follows in a letter he wrote me on March 14, 1956:

[Mr. Leduc (Jacques Cartier-Lasalle).]

Such an expenditure cannot be authorized as a deduction for income tax purposes owing to section 12 (1) (h) of the Income Tax Act, which we must administer as it was passed by parliament.

I agree with the hon. member that we cannot legislate for individual cases, isolated cases, but I am convinced that without causing prejudice to anyone and without going against the act, the authorities could use common sense and logic; they could be led by some sort of humanitarian spirit in the case submitted to us. In fact, I believe that the department should grant the requested deduction.

Mr. Habel: Can the hon. member tell me what that tax reduction would amount to if that $360 deduction were granted?

Mr. Dufresne: I did not calculate it.

Mr. Habel: $54 a year, for the information of the hon. member.

Mr. Dufresne: I am not here to report on deductible amounts.

Mr. Habel: Yet you are making a great fuss about a deduction which represents only $54 a year.

Mr. Dufresne: I would like to continue my remarks, Mr. Chairman, without being disturbed by the insignificant interruptions of the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Habel).

Mr. Habel: You are here to make speeches.

Mr. Dufresne: Not insignificant ones.

Mr. Viau: When the time comes to make a speech, you are there!

Mr. Dufresne: Sit down, I have the floor.

Mr. Habel: You do not want to pay any attention to my calculation.

(Text):

Mr. Knowles: Six more days and the election will be over.

(Translation):

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, these were the remarks I wished to make. I hope that the hon. minister for whom they were intended will take them into consideration without paying any attention to the stupid interruptions from various points; I hope that he will be in a position to solve the problems I have put to him.

(Text):

The Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I am obliged to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Quelch: Mr. Chairman, I have just a few remarks to make on the question of net worth statements. I have spoken about this on a number of occasions in the past and I believe the minister has already made quite a lengthy statement and has given the pages of Hansard on which I could find it. But the point is that I have received a number of protests from farmers, and the protests they have made are not covered by the statement made by the minister. I should like at this time to draw these to the attention of the minister.

I am not complaining regarding the type of inspectors sent out to get these forms filled. As a matter of fact, the men that have been sent out to the part of the country I come from have been men with very great experience in agriculture. Farmers have said to me that they know all the answers and that you could not get away with anything. I am not saying that the government should not send out men like that. I think it is good that they know the full score. But I would point out that this is a situation where the odds are loaded heavily in favour of the Department of National Revenue. The inspector knows all about agriculture and he knows all about income tax; the farmer knows about agriculture but he does not know much about the income tax. Therefore it is possible for the inspector to put many things over on the farmer—I would not say intentionally—perhaps unintentionally. I think that often happens. It seems to me that too often the inspector is too much interested in trying to collect more revenue than in just collecting the amount of revenue that the government is entitled to obtain under the Income Tax Act.

I am going to give the minister a few illustrations of what I mean. First of all, it seems to me that, as soon as the farmer goes into the office, the inspector should immediately explain to him the purpose of the visit. The minister says that they do that, but unfortunately they apparently often enter into what might be called a friendly conversation. I have never been in myself and I have to depend on what farmers have told me but, in view of the fact that quite a number of farmers have told me a very similar story, I think there must be something in it. For instance, they say that when they walk in they are treated very courteously by the inspector. The inspector says, "I'll bet you have a difficult job with the prices you are called upon to pay now". The farmer agrees with him. Then he says, "I suppose you find the cost of living high these days". The farmer agrees. Then the farmer agrees that the cost of living has gone up to perhaps $2,000 a year or some other figure. Right then and there the farmer has two strikes against him. Then they get down to business, but the farmer has already put his foot in it. Then the inspector explains the purpose of the visit. By then possibly the farmer begins to realize that he has committed certain indiscretions.

It seems to me that the very first thing that should be explained to the farmer is that according to his income tax returns the increase in his capital seemed to be greater than his return of income would warrant. That should be explained at the very start. That is done, but unfortunately not at the very start. Very often the farmer is able to give a satisfactory explanation. He is able to explain that his father has given him some capital or made a loan to buy machinery, which accounts for the increase in capital that did not appear to be justified in the report of income; or it may be the result of a small legacy.

The inspector should be very careful to see that no item is included in the cost of living that is deductible or, if it is deductible, he should be very careful to see that it is actually deducted. I could give an example. This is a case that I brought up with the department in Ottawa and it was straightened out, but there must be many similar cases that have not been brought up, with the result that the farmer has been charged tax that he should not have been charged. In this case, a farmer having the cost of living expenditures made up, admitted that he had made a charitable donation of $240, and that was included in his cost of living. That should have been also allowed as a deduction. The farmer had never received a deduction for it, but it was shown as cost of living. The inspector should also have been very careful at that moment to see that that $240 was included as a deduction. Consequently, of course, the farmer had to pay an additional tax as a result of having that charitable donation shown as a cost of living expenditure, and without being given any credit for a deduction.

There is another point, and this is, I think, a little harder to deal with. From what I have gathered from farmers, if they bring this matter to the attention of the inspector it is allowed, but if they do not bring it up it is not allowed. In a case of this kind, where the inspector has all the experience and knowledge of the act, he has a responsibility to draw to the attention of the farmers where they can cut down their taxes by giving certain statements which apparently they do not think are needed. I shall explain that. Take the question of machinery. At the beginning of the five-year period the machinery may be shown, we shall say, as $5,000 in the income tax return. At the end of the five-year period that machinery may have gone up to $10,000, with the result that there is an appreciation of $5,000. But that may not be the true picture. Actually the farmer may have traded in the old machinery and received a trade-in value of $7,000 for it. We know that during the past ten years farmers have been able to get very good trade-in values on machinery, but unless the farmer drew the inspector's attention to that, although the actual value of that machinery may be shown on the income tax return as only $5,000, he had traded that in on new machinery and received a trade-in value of $7,000—unless he draws the inspector's attention to that, he does not get the benefit of the extra $2,000. Consequently he has to pay income tax on that additional amount.

It is little things like that that could very well be brought to the attention of the farmer by the income tax inspector at the time the statement is being made out. The farmer has not a sufficient understanding or knowledge of the act to bring up points of that kind. I shall admit that, any time a matter of that kind has been referred to me and I have referred it to the taxation division at Ottawa, they have been very good in taking it up in Alberta and getting the matter straightened out. But it should not be necessary to do that. The inspector should safeguard the interests of the farmer by seeing that something of that kind does not happen. So I would urge upon the minister that he give instructions to the inspectors to be very careful to see that at all times the interests of the farmer are guarded in matters of that kind.

Mr. Barnett: The matter I wish to bring up is in no way related to what has just been said by the hon. member for Acadia, but while he was speaking I was reminded of an incident that came to my attention a number of years ago which affected not a farmer but a small storekeeper. One of the officials of the department to which he has been referring did act in accordance with the suggestion made by the hon. member for Acadia. I remember thinking at the time that that was a very right and proper attitude for officials and inspectors of the department to take—that their interest should be to collect the tax due, neither more nor less.

However, the matter upon which I particularly wished to rise for a few minutes at this time has to do with a question which I had answered by the minister on May 28 with respect to arrangements for having income tax deductions made by Canadian civilians employed in Canada by the United States navy. I placed the question on the order paper asking whether income tax deductions were made by the United States air force and the United States navy from Canadian civilians employed by them in Canada. The answer I received indicated that such deductions were made by the United States air force but that that was not the case as regards those employed by the United States navy. The answer further indicated that certain negotiations had been going on between Canadian and United States authorities in Washington with regard to this matter.

I raise it briefly here to indicate my continued interest in this question and to ask the minister whether he is able to supply any additional information at this time with regard to the progress of the negotiations. I notice that the Minister of Labour also happens to be in his seat at the moment. I think he will realize that this question is one which affects the working people, those on salaries and wages, and is perhaps somewhat related to questions I have directed to him previously with respect to arrangements for unemployment insurance coverage for Canadian civilians employed by agencies of the United States government. Therefore I should like to find out at this time whether the Minister of Labour's department is aware of this situation and in particular whether the Canadian labour attache in Washington is concerned with it and is doing whatever he can to expedite the negotiations referred to in the answer I received to my question.

Mr. Fleming: Is the minister going to answer that question now?

Mr. Gregg: I think the hon. member directed his question to me. Perhaps I could take notice of the question and refer to it on my own estimates, if that would suit the hon. member.

Mr. McCann: Just before the hon. member for Eglinton speaks, I have nothing further to add at this time to the answer which was given the other day.

Mr. Barnett: You will continue to look into it?

Mr. McCann: The matter is being followed up.

Mr. Fleming: There are two or three matters I should like to put before the committee in connection with the estimates of this department in relation to the taxation division. The first concerns a practice which prevailed in certain, at any rate, of the local offices of the taxation division of the department until not long ago. It was the practice under which taxpayers could bring their returns to the office supported by their receipts, including receipts for charitable donations and other documents that might require to be filed, and could have a receipt given to them consisting of the stamping of a form of receipt on the duplicate return. I am informed that practice was abandoned some months ago. While it is not a practice that has ever affected me personally in any of the returns I have had to file in a professional capacity, I am told that it is a matter of concern to a number of those who file in various local offices, and questions have been asked as to why the practice was abandoned and why it cannot be restored. Does the minister wish to deal with that before I go on to the next matter?

Mr. McCann: I am informed that we made that change a couple of years ago and we have not found any serious objection. Of course, it is a matter of trying to save some money and trying to save a lot of administrative work.

Mr. Fleming: If the minister's answer is correct, I do not think he has grasped the point. It is to give some guarantee to the taxpayer that his documents have been received by the department. As it is, the taxpayer who sends his return through the mail, perhaps with a number of charitable receipts or other accompanying documents, does not know whether the documents have arrived. In due time he will receive his interim receipt form in respect of his payment but it may be some very considerable time before he has any communication from the department by which it is made clear that the department has received the documents.

The practice to which I have referred was one which enabled the taxpayer who chose to go to the local office with his supporting documents thereby to have a form of receipt from the department so that no question could arise afterwards as to the delivery of the supporting documents. I cannot for the life of me follow the minister when he says that this practice was discontinued to avoid expense and administrative difficulty. Surely there is no expense involved in the department in asking them to put a stamp on the duplicate return of the taxpayer who takes the trouble to go to the local office and deliver his return with the supporting documents.

Mr. McCann: There would be very few who would bring their return with them and take the duplicate home. I am familiar with the practice. I remember that in the old days you would present your form and get a receipt for your payment at that time. If you were giving a cheque you did not need it because your cancelled cheque is a good receipt. I presume the hon. member is talking about the actual date on which you make your return and whether or not you get a receipt for your return, for your hospital receipts, charitable donations, and your money, if there is any. As I say, that was discontinued a couple of years ago.

We have not had any complaints to amount to anything and it does cut down the work because the receipt would have to be stamped at the time, and if you go into any of the offices on the last days of filing returns people are lined up as at a football game, so that it all takes time. However, it is only a little thing and we will look into it. If the service can be improved by stamping them as they come in we will have no hesitation in re-establishing that practice.

Mr. Fleming: I thank the minister for that. I can see the difficulty if the taxpayer waited until the last day. There would certainly be difficulty then in handling the situation. It is not a question of the receipt for payment. It is a question of a receipt that will assure the taxpayer that the department has acknowledged receipt of his accompanying documents.

The other matter I should like to mention relates to the question of succession duty. In the budget papers tabled by the Minister of Finance on March 19 in connection with his budget speech, which are to be found as an appendix to Hansard of March 20, I find this statement at the top of page 44 concerning succession duties:

> Revenue from succession duties is estimated at $75 million in 1955-56, an increase of $30 million or 67 per cent over the previous year. Two-thirds of the increase came from payments in respect of one unusually large estate.

I think it must be common knowledge to everyone, Mr. Chairman, as to what is that unusually large estate. The press has made the country acquainted with the fact that an estate fell in this year which is the largest in the country's history and will involve the payment of the largest succession duties in all the country's history. I have no doubt that the settlement of the succession duty with respect to that estate will be a very difficult and involved matter. It is something that it will not be possible to settle in a short time.

But there is a broader question that is raised in regard to it. I am referring, of course, to the estate of the late Sir James Dunn and to the fact that one of the executors of his estate is a minister in the present government, the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The stockholdings in the Algoma Steel Corporation apparently form the bulk of that estate, and that corporation has wide business dealings and I suppose at some stage or other comes in contact with government departments, no doubt such departments as defence production.

I wish to put before the committee this consideration. In an estate of such unparalleled size, where the Department of National Revenue presided over by the minister is faced with the duty of collecting the largest succession duty in the country's history, it is not right or proper that one of the executors of the estate, who represent that estate and its interests in negotiations with the department, should be a minister of the crown. There is here a question of duality of interests which should not be permitted to arise. The principle would exist in connection with an estate of any size, but it takes on a particularly striking form where the department is dealing with the largest estate in the country's history and where the responsibility cast upon the Minister of National Revenue is to collect the largest succession duty collected in the country's history.

This may not be the point at which to raise the question as to the extent of the business which that corporation is doing with the government. On the estimates of other departments there will be an opportunity to go into that question. But I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the position of the Minister of Trade and Commerce in this situation is untenable. He is a member of the government. He sits alongside a colleague whose duty, as a minister of the crown, is to collect an amount of succession duty unparalleled in the country's history. In a situation of this kind it seems to me that the minister's course is to make his choice either to be an executor of the estate or to be a minister of the crown, but that in a transaction of this kind he should not be in that double position. I do not think it is fair to his colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, among other things. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that whether or not the Minister of Trade and Commerce is taking an active part in the detailed administration of the estate is something that does not matter. Here is his position.

There are other executors, of course. It may be that the fact that there are five other executors of the will of the late Sir James Dunn is sufficient reason why the Minister of Trade and Commerce should now relieve himself of the dual position in which he finds himself as an executor. But I say there is a duality of interests or a conflict of interests which can only be resolved if the minister chooses one course or the other. I say he cannot hold both positions in face of the fact that shortly there will be approaching a situation where the executors must determine what their liability is to the crown, and where the Department of National Revenue must assess the liability of this estate for an amount of succession duty without precedent in the country's history. I therefore suggest that in this situation the Minister of Trade and Commerce must make a choice. I submit that there is here a conflict of interests which cannot be otherwise resolved.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. Zaplitny: Mr. Chairman, I wish to take only a few minutes in order to refer to the statement made by the hon. member for St. Boniface earlier this afternoon in reference to what I had to say yesterday. I regret, and I am sure he will also regret it on reflection, that the hon. member used the term he used in describing the recreational organization in his own constituency as a gambling joint. By doing so I am sure, whether he intended to do it or not, he has cast aspersions upon a great many organizations in our country, including Legion clubs, church organizations and service clubs which carry on exactly the same type of activity in order to raise finances for their various organizations.

I want to make it perfectly clear that even on the basis of what the hon. member himself said, his own description of the activities of this organization in his constituency, that organization is certainly operating strictly within the law. It is a non-profit organization. There is no question of income tax involved in the operations of this organization. With regard to their raising finances in order to support the political party of their choice, I would consider it to be one of the finest ways in which to do it. Certainly it is much better for the people who wish to support the party of their choice to get together in the form of an organization and voluntarily contribute toward that cause than for a party to depend upon large contributions by interested corporations.

The hon. member tried to slough off the donations made by the breweries to his party in the province of Manitoba by saying, "Well, it is a mere $30,000". He is aware, as is everybody else, that it is not a question of $30,000. The party to which he belongs receives millions of dollars from various corporations across this country. This is only an indication in our own province, and the reason it has drawn more public attention than usual is the fact, as he well knows, that here is an industry that operates under a price system set up by the government of Manitoba. Their product is all sold to the government of Manitoba or to the liquor commission at a price, and that government sets the price; and it has set a price which has resulted in a profit of over $18 million to four breweries in that province since 1946.

It is perfectly improper in my view, and I think in the view of the people of Manitoba, that an industry which deals so closely and intimately with the government of that province should offer financial contributions for political purposes to the party in power. That does not exonerate the other parties that participate in those contributions, but they do not have the same responsibility. The Liberal party in that province must bear the responsibility, because it is in power, of having received contributions from breweries which operate under a price system set up by that government. I regret that the hon. member tried to wriggle out of that position by attempting to cast aspersions upon a perfectly legitimate recreational organization that operates within the law, does nothing wrong and voluntarily makes contributions toward the party of its choice.

I would be perfectly satisfied if the Liberal party in Canada were to operate on the same basis. They could have any number of clubs set up for the purpose of raising finances for their party, and I would not have one word to say in objection because I think it is a legitimate way and a good way in which to raise finances. But it is not a good way when contributions are made by huge corporations that deal intimately with the government.

Perhaps the most classic example we have had in very recent days is Trans-Canada Pipe Lines. Here is a company that has, through the medium of the government, dipped into the public treasury in order to finance its operations. If that corporation is found to be making huge financial contributions for political purposes to the party in power, the people of Canada will have a perfect right to feel suspicious and to feel that they are being sold down the river.

Instead of trying to slough this matter off by saying, "What's a mere $30,000?" in a sort of pale imitation of the Minister of Trade and Commerce who said, "What's a million?" I think the hon. member might stop, think, and ask himself this question. Is it a good policy for his party to appeal for money to the rich and votes to the poor on the promise of defending one against the other. That kind of thing can lead to almost unimaginable kinds of corruption in this country.

I have no apologies to make for what I said yesterday. I still believe that there is a danger. I not only believe that the political parties in this country are likely to fall under undue influence by accepting contributions from corporations which, in themselves, might become a form of political bribe, but I believe that there is also the danger—and I am not yet satisfied on that point—that they are attempting to make these contributions by deducting them from their income at the expense of the public.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, I suppose one might say that the taxation division of any government is always the most unpopular branch of it, human nature being what it is. I might even go as far as to say that such has probably been the case ever since the days of Pharaoh, the Romans and King Herod. I think, therefore, that any observations a person might make on this particular item of these estimates should be of a general and a constructive nature to try to assist the minister and the officials of his department in correcting certain abuses that I think exist at the present time. The estimates of this department were before the special committee on estimates, and as a result there are certain general observations and recommendations I should like to make. I feel that these conclusions could be drawn from the evidence that was brought before that committee.

First of all, with respect to succession duties I should like to mention the question of the valuation of real estate. As hon. members know, the federal government has its own system of succession duties and certain of the provinces have their systems. As a result of having two different administrations frequently, not in all cases, Mr. Chairman, the provincial authorities and the federal authorities arrive at different valuations on the same piece of real estate. We can all understand how that comes about, because of course the federal department has no right to tell the provincial departments how to value real estate and vice versa. These niceties of distinction as between governments are not so apparent to the ordinary person on the street; and the general public can see no sense in the federal government valuing a property at $30,000 and the provincial department valuing it at $35,000. I think there is some justification for that attitude.

I know there are great difficulties in trying to arrive at uniformity in this matter, but one reasonable recommendation that might be made would be for the federal Department of National Revenue to try harder to work out some arrangements with the provinces whereby valuations could be uniform. I repeat that we all know there are difficulties, but the ordinary man on the street does not understand these things and it does not bring any government, be it federal or provincial, into better respect if we have this situation where one office values real estate at one amount and another office at another amount. Undoubtedly some arrangement could be worked out if a real effort were made and a common system of valuations, even common valuators, could be arranged in most parts of the country. Then one valuation for the provincial and federal succession duties could be arrived at.

The second thing with respect to succession duties is this. I feel that the department should issue new directives and instructions with respect to the procedure to be followed. I think these new directives and instructions should be complete, clear and concise. They should be uniform. They should leave no room for ambiguity, particularly with respect to certain matters which are as follows. First, disclosure to executors and legal representatives of estates should be made as soon as possible of the rules and regulations that the legal representative or executor should take into consideration before assessment of the assets is made by the department. In this respect I think it should be made clear also to the local officers that the government does not have the attitude, as the minister told us in committee, of "get all you can." This has been mentioned by other hon. members this afternoon. The minister made it quite clear to us in the committee that this was not the attitude of the government. There seems to be some misunderstanding in this respect, and if new directives were sent out it could be made quite clear that this was not the attitude of the government. Annoyance and difficulty as between the government department and the taxpayer could thus be avoided.

Another thing that should be made quite clear to the members of the department and the local offices—and again the minister pointed out very clearly in the committee that this was not the policy of his department—concerns their attitude that they are not missionaries. I have heard numerous complaints from reliable authorities that the local offices have the idea they are not missionaries and they will not disclose to executors or legal representatives of estates rules that might be helpful. As I have said, apparently the attitude of some officials in local offices is, "We are not missionaries". I think a directive from the department should make it quite clear to these local officials that this is not to be the case. The minister has told us that in the committee, and I think it should be made clear to these officials.

I believe it should be made clear to these officials as well that promotions are not the result of "getting all you can." The minister made it clear to us in committee that this was not the policy the department follows in naming promotions. As I pointed out on other occasions I know a great many people, not only in the Department of National Revenue but in totally unrelated and non-government departments, who have the idea that they stand a better chance of promotion if they take this attitude. If the minister made it quite clear to the officials of local departments that they are much more likely to get promotion by giving all the information possible to legal representatives and executors and by doing everything they can to be helpful, further annoyance and further difficulty as between the department and the general public would be alleviated.

Those last two remarks of mine might also be applied to the income tax branch of the department. Another matter I should like to mention is this question of the valuation of what you might call the non-liquid assets of the estate. As hon. members know, when a man dies the assets in his estate are valued as of the date of death. There is no difficulty with things such as stocks, bonds, cash in the bank, mortgages and so on. Frequently the difficulty arises when you get fairly large estates, possibly between $50,000 and $150,000, where the assets are not liquid, in other words not easily disposed of. This situation occurs when you get large farms, and in the southern part of Ontario this applies to tobacco farms and fruit farms. Fortunately it does not often apply to dairy farms, but to the more specialized type of farming such as tobacco and fruit farming. It applies also to various types of businesses. You may have a small garage business or a merchandising business which may be worth $200,000 or $300,000. Even a specialized type of farm may be worth $50,000 or $150,000 under normal conditions when it can be sold without any rush.

However, as hon. members know the succession duty must be paid within a certain period of time. Very often while the valuation of the property is taken as of the date of death, when there is no ready cash available to pay the succession duties these farms or businesses have to be sold at a considerable sacrifice in order to raise the cash to pay the succession duty. As a result the estate, instead of being worth let us say $150,000, may only be worth $80,000 or $90,000; yet the taxes have to be paid on the higher figure. We all understand that there is to be a new act introduced this session, the estates act I believe it is to be called, and I hope when that act comes down this disagreeable stiuation will be remedied.

There is another item which does not come under succession duties but I will include it for convenience sake, and that is the matter of joint tenancy. I would say that a property owned jointly by a husband and wife should not be taxable as a gift even if it amounts to over $4,000, in other words if the property is worth over $8,000, even if the wife contributed nothing, provided that all the surrounding facts show that the property was placed in a joint tenancy only for convenience in case the husband dies.

I may say that this is a very common procedure in Ontario, and I have no doubt elsewhere as well. A young couple get married and buy a house. The conveyance is in their joint names. In some provinces lawyers and conveyances will put the property in their joint names. As I say, this is a matter of convenience; it is a matter of protecting the wife. If the man dies the property will automatically go to her. Because of the present prices of houses it is not uncommon—in fact it is quite usual—for people to pay more than $8,000 for a house. If all the surrounding facts show that the property is in fact the property of the husband, that he pays all the taxes and carries out all the dealings in connection with the property, if it is in the name of the husband and wife only for convenience sake, then there should be no question of a gift tax.

The regulations require that today as a matter of policy. There is little doubt, Mr. Chairman, that policy and procedure cannot help but overlap to a certain extent. In fact, Mr. Chairman, I would go so far as to say that the family home—I repeat, only the family home—should be considered as jointly owned by husband and wife, if they so desire it, with no question of gift tax at all. I think that is a socially desirable thing. Young couples start out by buying a piece of property. After all, the wife does contribute to the value of the home. She looks after the children, cooks the meals and maintains the property. I do not think the Department of National Revenue or the government would be out very much money if the husband and wife could consider their home—and I say only their home, not any other property—jointly owned so that no gift tax would be payable at all.

I should now like to say a word with respect to income tax. I think it is rather a pity, Mr. Chairman, that the amendments to the Income Tax Act proposed by the hon. member for Kamloops were not adopted. That is past history now. We hope that in the future they may be considered more favourably by the Minister of Finance. However, I should like to recommend that directives be sent out to ensure uniformity of procedure in all local offices of the income tax division. Those directives should be clear and concise. According to the evidence given recently in the committee on estimates that is not always the case.

Let me give one example. I refer to a matter which I mentioned in the special committee on estimates, which may be found at pages 820 and 821 of the proceedings of that committee. It was stated at that time, for instance, that medical receipts were returned to the taxpayers if they required them for record purposes, and so on. However, at that time I read into the record a letter from the London office which clearly showed that in that particular instance medical receipts were not returned. Although the department clearly stated it was the policy at that time to return them if they were required, yet I read a letter showing that medical receipts were refused a taxpayer. It would be wise if a complete set of uniform directives were sent to the various branch offices of the department.

Again on this matter of income tax, I would urge the officials here to see that the policy and instructions of the head office are carried out a little more closely than they have been. Again I refer to volume 20 of the proceedings of the special committee on estimates. At page 843 the hon. member for Middlesex East referred to documents that are taken by the department for purposes of investigation. The minister said, as reported at page 843:

> They are released as quickly as we possibly can release them. Take for instance a doctor's cards that we seize, and the like of that. The way the doctors keep books nowadays they usually have a card system with the history of the patient on one side of the card and the account on the other side. When those are taken into the office, as I have said on one former occasion, we have photostat machines in every office throughout the country, and photostatic copies are taken of these different cards, and the accounts, and they are released as quickly as possible.

Then the minister went on to make other remarks in this regard. He said:

> We think that we are within our rights in retaining them until that can be done.

No one questions or quarrels with the minister's policy in that regard. However, earlier this year, in remarks I made on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I pointed out that one businessman in the city of Woodstock had the records of his business taken by officials of the department last July, almost a year ago. At the time I made my remarks on January 16 last those books had not been returned. That was six months ago and to my knowledge, Mr. Chairman, they have not yet been returned. I may be mistaken in that, but I believe they have not yet been returned. Certainly they were not returned six months ago. This is a large commercial business in the city of Woodstock and the retention of those documents has caused a great deal of inconvenience. I mentioned also that the departmental officials had lost some of the records. It was an accident that could happen to anyone. I am not objecting to that; it was an accidental thing, but here is a case where records were not returned for at least six months, and so far as I know they have not been returned yet.

I have another matter that I should like to touch on briefly. These matters were not brought up in the committee. There are additional subjects that I should like to mention. The first has to do with investigation. The department, of course, has to make investigations in certain parts of the country. The department has to make spot checks and investigations to see that people are making just tax returns. We all recognize that. I think when the department are doing this they should follow some sort of impartial policy. In other words, if they feel that in a certain township a certain area has to be investigated, that is all right; investigate every farmer along the road.

But it is my information—and a great many people believe it, and I hope the minister will clarify it—that very often someone who has a grudge against a neighbour will write into the department and say, "I think Tom Jones has been getting away with a great deal of income tax; you ought to investigate him". The department then comes along and investigates the person who may or may not have been attempting to evade income tax. Regardless of what the situation is, I do not think it is good policy for the departmental officials to make investigations on complaints received by letter. On an earlier occasion I mentioned the situation at the time of the French revolution. If somebody wrote a letter the person was arrested and locked up the next day. This system might cause endless inconvenience to people. It is something that should be considered.

It is my understanding—again I hope the minister will give us some clarification on it or deny it—that very often the books of professional men, doctors, lawyers, accountants and so on, are taken and held for investigation, not for the purpose of investigating that particular doctor, lawyer or professional man but for the purpose of getting comparative records to investigate somebody else.

Mr. McCann: That is not so at all.

Mr. Nesbitt: The minister says that is not so. I am very glad to hear that. I shall not continue with my remarks.

[Mr. Nesbitt.]

Mr. McCann: You cannot give one single instance of where it has occurred.

Mr. Nesbitt: The minister says it is not so. I am happy to hear that. That is why I raised the question. A lot of people have suspected it. I am glad the minister has cleared it up.

With regard to keeping the books of professional people, the minister says they are returned as quickly as possible. That may well be, but I do not think so. I know of one case, and this is certainly not hearsay. A veteran was trying to get his medical expenses deducted. He was in receipt of a pension, and he had certain receipts from the doctor. He tried to get the receipts and could not get them because the Department of National Revenue was holding the books of this particular doctor and held them for months. Eventually the matter was cleared up. The inconvenience in this particular case was caused after the man was declared eligible for a pension but medical receipts had to be produced within a certain time and the doctor could not provide them. As I say, fortunately it was cleared up but there was some difficulty.

I have one last item to bring up, the matter of allowable deductions for entertainment costs incurred by commercial firms. As hon. members know, this deduction is rather elastic. It must be reasonable. The head of a company brought to my attention a case where certain entertainment expenses had been incurred. The department agreed that they were reasonable and wanted to know how many people had been entertained. This man told them five people, including himself. He was told that he could not deduct the cost of his own dinner. It was a trifling amount but it illustrates my point. I hardly think the department would expect the head of a company entertaining other men at dinner or luncheon to bring his own sandwich. I believe this is a matter that might very well be brought up. I see my time is moving on, and as other hon. members may want to say something, I shall terminate my remarks.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I have been quiescent on these estimates up to now but I do want to make a few observations on a matter which will be of interest to people engaged in the mining and lumbering industries in British Columbia. Before doing that may I say that I appreciate the courtesy I have received from the minister's officials in Ottawa and in the district office in Vancouver. I have found them willing to go into all aspects of any case brought to their attention.

I am informed that after the war certain industries which were of a wartime nature and therefore temporary were allowed to charge the cost of plant, in some cases the cost of equipment and in other cases the cost of houses they had erected, to their operation costs. In some cases companies had made arrangements with their employees to purchase houses, and as a result of the arrangements made with the taxation department those employees received back certain sums which the company had been able to recover because the cost of the houses was considered to be a cost of operation.

That was a very proper thing to do, but we have another situation in British Columbia where mining or lumbering operations are brought to a close because resources have been depleted. As a result the investment made in plant, equipment and perhaps housing is of no value. I have received my information from several sources, and I am not sure if I am completely or accurately informed, but could the minister state if the government has considered applying this principle to mining or lumbering operations which are brought to a close because the resources being developed are exhausted and therefore the investment in plant, property, equipment and housing is valueless.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, I am not familiar with the matter to which the hon. member has referred and perhaps it would suit his convenience if I looked into it after I receive a report of what he has just said and give him an answer privately.

Mr. Michener: Mr. Chairman, I should like to raise one question of administrative efficiency having to do with the deduction of income tax at the source and the liability of the employee for such taxes. In effect you have two parties responsible for the payment of the taxes, the employer whose duty it is to deduct and remit the taxes and the employee whose duty it is to pay the taxes. Perhaps the minister could tell the committee how this administrative problem is handled. I had noted some questions I should like to ask. Is there a file for the employer with respect to each employee? Is there also a separate file with respect to each employee? Which is the control file? How is information passed from one file to the other? Does the same member of the administrative staff have the responsibility for both files?

I ask these questions because there is a problem in connection with collection and not demanding the same taxes where two people are responsible. I have a case which I intend to cite to the minister. If the employer has paid, it is important that no demand should be made upon the employee for the payment of the same taxes. It is not only bad administratively, it is most annoying to the taxpayer to be asked to pay something which has been paid already.

Before the minister answers I should like to cite a particular instance which was brought to my attention. I do not expect the minister will know about it because this arose in Toronto. A Miss Marjorie E. Dixon was employed as a temporary stenographer in certain law offices, moving about from one to the other. In the case of employment at one office she had noted the amount of pay received and made her return on that basis, but her employer was in error in thinking that she had been paid $50 a week instead of $55 and he deducted and remitted her tax on that basis. When she filed her return there was an obvious discrepancy, as there was an amount which should have been paid by the employer. The employer was advised of this and he paid the amount promptly, but the officer of the department who was trying to collect the difference from the employee did not seem to know this and for a period of weeks when an exchange of information might have taken place, demands were made upon the employee for payment.

Mr. McCann: The case the hon. gentleman refers to indicates the small errors that can occur in any office or in any business. In the set of tables which are distributed before the beginning of the year are set out the deductions that should be made relative to weekly wages or annual salaries. Those deductions are to be made from the employee's salary and remitted to the district office before the 15th of the following month. The director of the district office is the person who has full charge of that, no matter which official or set of officials of the division it is referred to. At the end of the year he sends in a form which indicates the total deductions that have been made from the salary of that employee throughout the year or, if he has not been employed by the same person, the number and the amount of the deductions made. The employee himself fills in a form, his return, and he says that he has had deducted $10 per pay or per month, or a total of $120. Those two are put together in that district office, and if they do not correspond then we attempt to find out where the discrepancy has arisen.

It may well happen that there has been a change in the rate of payment. That employee may have worked for only six months, so he may have had three or four jobs in the one year. If so, then he has deduction slips from these different people. I may say that with the millions of returns—and it runs into millions—where money is deducted at the source, we do not have very much bother with them, and in the matter of the sending in of the amount of money, we take into consideration where the employer is doing business. He may be a lumberman or he may be in a mining operation, and you cannot have that man sending the amount so as to reach the district office by the set date. We are very considerate of that, but if an employer persists in being dilatory in sending in his returns it is sometimes necessary to take into consideration what is in the law and what has to be done with that employer, and the penalty probably is inflicted in order to spur him up and have him conform with the law. I do not know whether there is any other answer I can give.

Mr. Michener: I have followed the minister's answer so far, but can he carry it one stage further? In this case the discrepancy was discovered when the employee's return was received. Then it was brought to the attention of the employee, who went to the employer who had made the error. The employer then paid what he had failed to pay, plus the penalty that was charged. At that point there seemed to be a breakdown, because that payment was not communicated to the person who was demanding the same payment from the employee. Payment had been made by the employer, but there was nothing to let the left hand know what the right hand was doing.

Mr. McCann: I get your point. A further slip should have come in that would make it known that the difference had been paid. That is where the employee had a right to protest. But the employer was not under obligation to pay that amount, because he had deducted on the basis of the wage that he thought that this employee was obtaining. The difficulty was that they notified the employee that he or she owed a certain amount of money that should have been deducted at the source by the employer. I presume the employer realized that it was his mistake, and rather than have a whole lot of negotiations he paid it.

Mr. Michener: Yes, that was so; but what I was concerned about was the state of the communication or liaison in the office in Toronto, where you have the employer paying and the employee liable, so they are coordinated in some way. Does the control lie with the employee's file in a case of that kind?

Mr. McCann: Yes.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Knowles: I wish to speak either to the amendment or to the resolution as amended.

[Mr. McCann.]

Mr. Monteith: Are we still on item 289?

The Deputy Chairman: Item 289 as amended.

Mr. Knowles: It was my intention, Mr. Chairman, to comment on some of the matters that were discussed by the hon. member for Hamilton West, but I noticed that later the Minister of Finance suggested that she had been given quite a bit of latitude and I think the implication of the minister's suggestion was that he hoped others would not claim the same latitude. I assure him that I shall not do so. I should like, however, just to say in a sentence or two that I was glad that the hon. lady raised once again the question of the floor under medical expenses.

In spite of the fact that the house has made a decision on that matter at this session, and despite the fact that no change in that regard has been included in this year's budget, I hope the Minister of Finance will give consideration to it in preparation of that next budget which the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration reminded him earlier he might be making before the end of this parliament. Whether or not there will be another budget before the end of this parliament is not a certainty, but if there is one I hope he will do something about that floor. If he follows the practice of recent years he will reduce it another notch. That is better than leaving it where it is, but I hope that next time he will wipe it out altogether.

Now I turn to two or three things which I believe are administrative rather than in the policy field, though the first one may be on the borderline between administration and policy. On several occasions cases have been brought to my attention similar to one about which I received a letter a short while ago. This is the case of a taxpayer, a married man, who is contributing rather heavily to the support of a widowed sister in law who has a number of children. The taxpayer and his wife are both working now, although that gets away from the main point about which I am concerned, for the result is that the taxpayer in question has to file his return on a single basis.

However, what did disappoint him greatly when he went to the officer in charge—this was in Toronto, I may say—was to discover that there was not any way in which he could claim the deduction for the children of his widowed sister in law, who of course are his nephews and nieces. The officials whom he saw in the Toronto office read to him section 26 of the Income Tax Act. When he saw the part that refers to child or children without any reference to them belonging to the taxpayer, he was hopeful that since he was contributing to the support of these children he would be able to claim $150 or $400 deduction for them. I believe they are all of family allowance age in this case, so the amount he was seeking was simply the $150 each. However, the officials indicated to him that the reference to child or children is only in that part of section 26 which deals with the right of the taxpayer to claim $2,000 exemption as a person who is maintaining a self-contained domestic establishment, supporting therein a child or children under 21 years of age, and so on. It was pointed out to him, on the other hand, that later in the section, indeed in the subsections where his case has to fall, the reference is to a child or grandchild. The reason I say this might be a policy matter or might be a matter of administration is that the income tax official with whom this taxpayer dealt did use the word "interpretation". He said that as the law was now being interpreted, though nieces and nephews were not excluded in a case such as his, they were not included, and therefore the official who handled this case felt that this man could not be granted this exemption.

It has been indicated to me that it is not an unusual type of case where, as the result of the death of a brother, someone else in the family does make a substantial contribution to the maintenance of the fatherless nephews and nieces. I would hope that the minister might take a look at this and see whether it is a type of case that can be dealt with by a reinterpretation of the section, by regulations based on the section or in some other way. I appeal to him to attend to it as soon as he can if it can be done in an administrative way; but if after studying it he comes to the conclusion that the matter cannot be dealt with administratively and does call for an amendment to the act, I hope he will take the matter up with his colleague the Minister of Finance. In human terms it does seem that in a case like that, where a taxpayer is contributing substantially to the support of nephews and nieces, he should have the right to deduct the $150 or $400 allowance with respect to those nephews and nieces.

The next point I draw to the minister's attention is one I have raised on various occasions in the past, but I ask him once again to study the matter of including on the T-4 slips a place for amounts deducted for trade union dues, particularly in the case of some of the large employers who handle the payment of trade union dues under a check-off arrangement. The employer is already doing the bookkeeping involved in the check-off, and it does seem that it would be a matter of simplicity and a matter of fairness if the T-4 slip had on it, in addition to the other items such as income tax deducted at the source, pension fund contributions and so on, a place for the entry of the amount of trade union dues deducted in that way.

I know that one of the answers the minister may make is that the law with regard to the deductibility of trade union dues has certain qualifications. Not everything that is paid to a trade union as dues, though it may seem to the member of the union to be dues, is allowed as dues for the purposes of the act as it now stands. However, there are some cases where everything that is paid does meet the conditions of the law; and in those cases where it does not—in other words if this issue is also part administrative and part policy—I would hope the Minister of National Revenue would deal with it himself in so far as it is administrative and make appropriate strong representations to his colleague the Minister of Finance in so far as the matter is one of policy.

Mr. Gillis: Initiation fees.

Mr. Knowles: My colleague the hon. member for Cape Breton South has mentioned the initiation fee as one of the items involved in joining a trade union which is not allowed for purposes of income tax deductibility. It seems to me that some less complicated way could be found than now obtains with regard to the portion of trade union dues that is allowed. Just as a suggestion I throw out to the minister that instead of the complicated set-up now existing, which requires some trade union secretaries to do quite a bit of arithmetic and establish the percentage of the dues that have been paid that is allowable —and sometimes it is a percentage that runs to at least two decimal points—some ceiling on the amount could be fixed.

I have heard the fear expressed that if there were no limitations of any kind some union members might decide to pay rather fantastic sums to their unions for benefits that might come back to them so they could get the benefit of income tax deductibility in that way. I certainly do not know of any instances where a practice of that kind has been tried but, as I say, a way to avoid that would be to survey the field as to the level of trade union dues being paid. It would work out as a certain percentage of the wages of the worker, and some reasonable percentage sufficiently above that figure could be set so that everything a trade unionist paid by way of dues might be allowed as deductible for income tax purposes provided it did not go over that reasonable percentage of his wages. It does seem to me that would be a far more practical and fairer way than the one that obtains at the present time. I am free to admit that this is in part administrative and in part policy; therefore I am glad that I have the attention of both the Minister of National Revenue and the Minister of Finance on this point.

I move on to another suggestion I should like to make to the minister. In the page of information that is attached to the T1 short form which was put out this year there is one paragraph which reads as follows:

> Income from pension fund—If you received a lump sum payment out of a pension fund during the year, the amount must be included in your income for the year but may be subject to a reduced tax rate. For further information on this point, inquire at your district taxation office.

As the minister knows, this relates to the special treatment that can be accorded a lump sum that a taxpayer receives out of a pension fund by virtue of the terms of section 36 of the Income Tax Act. As the minister also knows, earlier in the session I inquired whether the department would not consider putting out some special forms to enable people to deal with a claim they might be in a position to make under section 36 of the act. The minister did not feel that that was necessary, but drew attention to the fact that there is this paragraph in the explanatory notes attached to the income tax form.

What I wish to point out is that there is more in section 36 than is referred to in this explanatory paragraph. If one reads section 36 carefully he discovers that it is possible to get the special treatment that is accorded payments of that kind, a treatment that involves comparing the total amount of tax you paid over the past three years with the total amount of income you had over the past three years, but what I was about to say was that in addition to it being possible to get that special treatment for lump sum payments out of a pension fund there are certain other lump sum payments than can receive the same treatment.

For example, if a person is dismissed from his employment and is given a lump sum in lieu of a period of time—weeks, months, or what have you—I am told that also is the type of lump sum that can be accorded special treatment. A person can receive money because he has been retired or laid off for other reasons than going on pension. What I am suggesting at this point is that this paragraph I read from the explanatory notes that are attached to the income tax form should tell the taxpayer more than it tells him at the present time. At the moment all it tells him about what is contained in section 36 is that he can get special treatment for a lump sum payment out of a pension fund; but since the section provides for special treatment for certain other lump sum payments as well I think some reference to them should at least be included in the explanatory notes attached to the income tax form.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Chairman, I should like to draw one other matter to the attention of the minister. As he knows because of the sessional papers he has tabled this year in response to questions I have placed on the order paper, it is now common knowledge that the department has on hand a rather sizeable sum of money in refunds that have not got back to the people to whom they belong. I refer to sessional papers No. 106-C and No. 106-D, both of which were tabled on Wednesday, March 14, 1956, in response to questions I had placed on the order paper. One of them had to do with wartime compulsory savings refunds. It is quite a while now since those refunds were all to be paid back to the people to whom they belong. But apparently as of January 31, 1956, there were still refunds due to some 63,203 persons. The amount on hand for those persons was $2,923,951.48. In addition to that, it turns out as follows; if I may, I should just like to read one sentence regarding income tax refunds in general from sessional paper No. 106-D:

> The total amount of income tax refunds outstanding as unpaid to individuals, as of January 31, 1956, was $2,501,393.05.

If you add those two sums together you will find they add up to something over $5,400,000 of money which is in the possession of the department and which rightfully belongs to individuals across Canada.

The minister included in the sessional papers his answers to my questions as to what steps the government has taken to get these refunds to the persons to whom they belong. He indicated that a certain amount of investigation has been carried on and that a considerable amount of advertising has been done. But it still seems to me that if the government were as anxious to get this $5 million back to those people as it would be to get in the money that the same number of people might owe to the government, it could make better headway than that.

I would appeal to the minister to give some more serious thought to ways and means of finding out where these people are and getting this money to them. In all probability these people who have wartime compulsory savings refunds coming to them are little people. The so-called big people seem to know their way around with respect to getting back refunds of this kind. I am sure that while many of these refunds will not be very large sums of money, they will belong to people to whom any sum of money would be a godsend. I would urge that some serious thought be given to finding a way of getting this money back to the people to whom it belongs.

In that connection—and in part of what I am now going to say I shall make mention of the other side of the coin—I was also interested in the question of whether there are people who have had tax deducted at the source but who, through failure to file an income tax return at the end of the year, have not got back moneys to which they are entitled. Undoubtedly there will be people—and this ties in with the discussion that was held just a few minutes ago between the Minister of National Revenue and the hon. member for St. Paul's—from whom deductions are made at the source during the year but with respect to whom, for one reason or another, perchance because they do not work the whole year or because they move from one job to another and the rate of pay changes, when the year is done the total amount deducted at the source can be greater than the amount which the taxpayer would really be obliged to pay.

There are many people who find it difficult to dope out income tax matters and who just do not bother to file their returns. There can be people—and I am sure there are—in that category who have overpaid their income tax during the year by means of amounts deducted at the source but who, because they do not file returns, do not get their money back. This was a question I put on the order paper. It is found at page 2587 of Hansard of March 23, 1956:

1. For each of the last five taxation years for which the statistics are available, how many persons from whom income tax was deducted at the source did not file an annual income tax return?

The reason I asked that question was as I have already indicated. I am concerned about these people who have too much deducted at the source and who do not get it back. The answer to that question was: "No information available". My next question read as follows:

2. By years, how many of such persons were found, or believed, to have a refund coming to them?

The answer again was, "No information available". That answer rather startled me for two reasons. First of all, it seemed rather strange that there could be people making payments through deductions at the source, and overpaying during the course of the year, with the government through this department having no information about those people. In other words, by virtue of not having that information, by virtue of not checking such files, these people inadvertently are left in the position of having paid more than they should have paid during the year, yet they do not get their surplus back.

But what I realized when I saw that answer —though I admit that this was not what I was out for when I put the question on the order paper—is that the reverse can be true if the answers here are correct. As I interpret these answers, they seem to be at variance with what the minister was saying to the hon. member for St. Paul's in another connection a moment ago. As I interpret these answers, no record is kept to ascertain how many people there are from whom deductions are made at the source but who at the end of the year file no return.

As I say, I started out concerned about the little fellow who pays in too much, but there may be some of the other variety. There may be people who have not paid enough through deductions at the source, and they just let it go. They just do not bother to file a return. The Minister of Finance said the other day that one of the jobs of the income tax department is to collect taxes fairly; he said it is just as important to collect the taxes that are due as it is to grant the concessions that are provided by law. Well, if this answer means what it says, I suggest it may well be that there are people who, whether through inadvertence or whether it is because they do not know how to fill out an income tax form or for any other reason, have not had enough deducted at the source but they do not do anything about it. They do not file a return.

The minister says there is no information available as to how many such people there are. I assumed that there would be some means of cross-checking between every person for whom a deduction at the source is made and every person who files an income tax return. Assuming that is done, it would seem to me that then if there are people who have deductions made at the source who do not make any returns, the government would know how many there are and would be able to ascertain whether that situation arose because the people concerned were paying too much or paying too little. The minister says, in reply to my question at page 2587 of Hansard, that no information is available as to how many people there may be in that category.

Now, the Minister of Finance and I will join in making representations to the Minister of National Revenue on this point. The Minister of Finance, I am sure, would want some checking done with regard to those people who have not paid enough, and the representations I make are for the other people who through deductions at the source pay in too much during the year but who through failing to file a return do not get a refund of the surplus they have paid. It seems to me there is an obligation on the department to meet the representations the Minister of Finance is making through my mouth—

Mr. Harris: But not exactly as you describe it; not as much as I can get but as much as the statute provides.

Mr. Knowles: I am sure the minister would not disagree with what I said, that he wants what the statute calls for to be collected.

Mr. Harris: That is right.

Mr. Knowles: That is the position of the minister. My position is that I do not want any more than that to be collected, through inadvertence or through the department not having the records and not having the information as indicated by the minister's answer to my question. I would hope, Mr. Chairman, that this matter, as well as the others to which I have referred in these remarks, will be looked into by the minister. I would be glad to have his answers during the course of the debate on any of the items I have raised. In so far as they may call for some research and some administrative changes, even after today, I hope he will give them serious attention.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Earlier in the session I made some remarks regarding the bill presented by the hon. member for Kamloops. On that occasion the amount of time available was limited, and I was not able to finish all I wanted to say to the house and to the minister.

It was my privilege to be a member of the estimates committee, and I just want to draw some conclusions from my experience on that committee for the benefit of the house. First of all we considered the estimates of the excise and customs branch. I was certainly very favourably impressed with the results of the work of that committee. All the questions and criticisms that were brought forward were very ably handled, and I think to the satisfaction of the committee. Very good explanations were given for the decisions and rulings that were made in cases dealing with customs and excise.

I was a bit, what shall I say, shocked at the change of pace and attitude with respect to the income tax division in that committee. It seemed apparent to some of the members —I will not say most of the members—that there was not likely to be any admission by the department that any errors could possibly arise. In practically every case where a member brought forward a complaint there was evidence brought forward to show that somewhere along the line there was some mistake, and it just could not possibly be that way. There were a number of things I wanted to bring to the minister's attention in that committee, but I felt it would be futile and the result would be more or less an okay of the work of the department and discrediting, as far as possible, the member who brought forward the objections. Perhaps I am wrong, but I regret that is the feeling I brought out of that committee.

The hon. member for Kamloops introduced his bill, and I mentioned that it did not go far enough. His suggestion was that the returns should be finalized in a three-year period. I mentioned last session, and I mention it again now, that in cases involving $10,000 or less the department should be able to process the taxpayers' returns and give a final receipt—except in cases of deliberate fraud—within 12 months from April 30. The taxpayer is given 4 months after the end of the calendar year to make up his return, and surely if the department had one year from that time it would be adequate, if they are as efficient as they would like the public to believe. At that time I brought to the minister's attention the fact that many county councils signified their belief that that could be done and should be done.

The hon. member for Perth dealt very fully with the net worth statements. Therefore I shall not comment further except to say that I heartily endorse what the hon. member for Perth said yesterday. The hon. member for Hamilton West dealt with payments to retirement plans. I just want to point out here that self-employed persons are not allowed to deduct payments they may make to any retirement plan, yet self-employed persons are contributors to all these other plans because of the fact that payments become part of the costs of the things these particular companies make and sell. Consequently these self-employed persons are not allowed to deduct pension payments made on their own account but they are helping, in a way, to pay into these other retirement plans.

From time to time I have mentioned in this house the advantages of profit-sharing plans in industry and the good relations that can be developed through such plans.

These profit-sharing industries in Canada and the United States have made representations to the effect that until the profits that accrue to any employee are actually in the hands of that employee they should not be taxed; otherwise he may be taxed on funds he never will receive. Even the chambers of commerce recommended that the right to assess be limited to one year dating from the assessment, but that is not good enough because the assessment may be delayed one, two, three, four, even five years or more, and consequently the taxpayer would not stand to gain under such a plan.

Just recently I listened to the minister, and I am going to quote what he said as recorded on page 820 of Hansard for February 2 of this year. That he of all men in the house should use these words and then have his department act as they do is something I can hardly understand. This is what he had to say:

> As everyone knows from common knowledge, from time immemorial the Englishman's home has been his castle, and all matters pertaining to him and his family are protected by law from trespass or exposure. You cannot enter his house without his permission. You cannot ascertain his private affairs without voluntary disclosure. This right of privacy that every Englishman possesses is as strong in this country and in all the countries of the commonwealth as it is and has been from time immemorial in England, from whence we draw so many of our laws and so much of our tradition. This right of privacy that every Englishman possesses is, as I said, as strong in this country as in any other.

Then his department goes about denying all these things. Probably, after the furore of last week, I should not say a great deal about abuse of power, but all through history we find individuals seeking power. The more power they get the more power they want, and the more power they get the more glory they get. I would point out to the minister that power is fleeting. I need only mention a few names; Peron, Mussolini, Hitler, and all down the line. Power is fleeting, so be careful how you use that power.

The people with whom you are dealing are, in most instances, hard-working people. They are not acquainted with all the fine points of the law. In fact I intended to have on my desk the office consolidation of the Income Tax Act and all the amendments that have been added to it. The minister has heard, and I have heard, of Philadelphia lawyers, but all the lawyers in Philadelphia could not interpret them alike. Yet the taxpayer is expected to know just where he stands in connection with these many laws. Just while I am dealing with that may I say I have on my desk a letter from a constituent of mine dealing with the joint ownership of property. He says:

> Six months after death of the wife income tax assessed for a few hundred dollars.

He said they had owned the property jointly for six years. He also said that a well-known firm of lawyers had advised him that no gift tax would be assessed in this particular case. Yet six months after the death of his wife he was confronted with a demand for an amount which he paid, and then of course he protested about it to me, but there he was. He goes on to say:

> When I confronted my lawyer with the statement he made to me, he said, "It is quite evident nobody knows just what the income tax department may do; nor can any ordinary citizen interpret their rules and regulations".

That is what the taxpayers are up against. They find that a rule that may be applied in one case does not apply in another. I am not blaming the minister too much. These things go on because the people in the different districts have a considerable amount of power, and perhaps these things go on without his knowledge. These usages and customs have grown up like Topsy over a period of years. I imagine the minister may admit that some of these questionable practices have gone on, but he will defend the system.

I want to point out that, on the other hand, knowing about the practices and allowing them to go on is a disgrace. If he does not know that they are going on, it is certainly time he did. We have heard a lot in years gone by about the four freedoms, the freedom from want, the freedom of religion, the freedom of speech and the freedom from fear. I mentioned this question of fear before. Not only the taxpayers, but accountants and lawyers do not want to take any part in it because they are afraid of what might happen.

Mr. Chairman, it is six o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose at six o'clock I was dealing with the administration of the Income Tax Act and had pointed out to the committee a statement made by the minister on February 2, 1956, in which he upheld the traditions of British justice and the fact that the home of a Canadian as well as that of an Englishman was his castle. I pointed out what power was doing to and for these men.

I should have mentioned that during the years since the Russian revolution one thing that has been pointed out to us as something to fear as probably the greatest menace to the freedom of the individual was a knock on the door in the middle of the night by a member of the gestapo. These fellows do not wait for night; they do not even knock on the door. They just walk in. They do not take possession of your person but they take possession of your papers and you are lucky to get them back, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Oxford not only in committee today but in the committee on estimates. I do not want to dwell too long on that aspect of the situation, but it gives us cause for thought as to how far we can go along this line.

When I was dealing with income tax problems earlier this session I brought a case to the attention of the minister. I did not mention the name then, but I shall mention it now. I pointed out that for some ten years a girl named Mary Vegso had worked for her father barefoot in the tobacco fields. When she was married her father gave her all her back wages, and in all some $1,900 was paid over, on which she was taxed. An appeal was taken to the income tax appeal board. At that time I neglected to point out that in order to justify his findings the assistant chairman of the board went back to Partington v. Attorney General, a case decided by Lord Cairns in 1869, two years after confederation.

I want to point out to all new Canadians that ten years from now they may find themselves in a very difficult position. I know of many cases where families have come to this country and purchased farms with small down payments. There may be some older children in the family who go into town to take positions and bring home a good portion of their weekly or monthly earnings in order to help the mother and father pay for the farm. What is going to happen ten years from now? The income tax department will come along and slam on a net worth statement, and the hard-working father and mother and children will again have to pay income tax. I warn all new Canadians to beware and so guide and guard themselves that they will not be caught in this trap a few years later.

When I spoke on this matter earlier in the session I mentioned the fact that Eaton's and Simpsons were able to service 50,000 mail orders within 24 hours, and in some cases have the order in the mails within 20 minutes. At that time the Minister of Finance questioned my statement and intimated that they must have many more employees. In the time that has elapsed since then I have found out that Eaton's employ 5,500 in their mail order departments. Simpsons would not give me the exact number they employ, for one reason or another, but I think we can assume the number would be about the same. A return in answer to question No. 442 in my name shows that the taxation division of the Department of National Revenue employs 7,454 people. It should be noted that these mail order houses handle 50,000 orders a day, not a week or a month or a year. Consequently they must operate much more efficiently than does the department.

[Mr. White (Middlesex East).]

I point out to the minister most seriously that an election is coming up in the not too distant future, and if he wants to hang on to the reins of power I think he should follow the suggestion I make that income tax returns for $10,000 and less should be processed within 12 months of April 30. If he did that he would gain himself a lot of favour. As far as I am concerned it is probably just as well if he does not do that, because then we would be sure of coming back.

Before my time expires I should like to draw the attention of the minister and the committee to an article which appeared in Saturday Night of September 4, 1954 dealing with the responsibility of ministers of the crown to the people and how they should act under certain circumstances. This article reads as though it were written only yesterday and not prior to a week ago. I quote:

> When ministers refuse to share the blame for waste, inefficiency and worse in their departments, they are admitting that the job of government has grown too big for them; they are claiming, in effect, that while they should still be trusted with the direction of the nation's business, they should not be expected to worry about the people they have hired for the day to day handling of that business. If we condone this attitude, we must be prepared to accept the inevitable result: the end of our control, as electors, over the way we are to be governed.

I ask the minister to give serious consideration to this case. There are many people who after years of paying income tax may find that the whole thing is thrown open again and they may not know where they are at.

Many people think agriculture does a lot of howling, that our farmers are not too badly off, but such is not the case. With another round of increases apparently in the offing for labour and industry the farmer is going to find himself in a still tighter squeeze. I do not know how he is going to find money to pay increased taxes, and I think many of them will just throw up their hands and decide to get jobs with the government. They just will not be able to find the money with which to pay taxes. It is just that serious. I want the minister to give this very serious consideration before the next budget rolls around.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, I am going to try to give the minister a little advice. I would like to see him come back next time. The hon. member for Middlesex East has done his best in this regard.

Mr. McCann: Don't be too worried over that.

Mr. Gillis: I have a few odds and ends which I have taken up with the department in an effort to get them ironed out behind the scenes, but I was not successful. I want to follow up for a minute what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was saying with respect to union dues. I took up with the department the matter of initiation fees. A new member going into a union may have to pay an initiation fee of from $50 to $200, and that is paid within the year.

The answer I got from the deputy minister was to the effect that the act as it stands at the present time only makes provision for annual union dues. Those words "annual union dues" constitute the crux of the situation. If the word "annual" was taken out items like initiation fees could be included. This is a much larger item than the annual union dues.

Second, there is not only the initiation fee that is contributed to the union; there are other special assessments. For example, some unions set up a yearly assessment on the membership for the purpose of creating a fund that would take care of indigent members of the union. That is a contribution of perhaps $50 a year on the part of the average member.

Third, there are times—and the Oshawa strike is an indication of this—when either a strike or a lockout occurs over which the average member has no control. That may run on for six or ten months, and during that period the union makes provision in many cases by providing credit with merchants and so forth for the membership. That organization may accumulate a bill for $300,000 or $400,000. When the men return to work a special assessment is put on the membership to pay off the bill that accrued during the period of the stoppage of work.

These are all union contributions. The wording in the act today, "annual union dues", prevents any consideration being given these other union contributions. I am suggesting to the minister that he might give consideration to changing the wording of the act so as to provide for these other legitimate contributions that take place from time to time.

Mrs. Shipley: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Gillis: Surely.

Mrs. Shipley: Would the hon. member suggest that the contributions made to the C.C.F. party for political purposes should be tax free?

Mr. Gillis: The union member as such makes no contribution to the C.C.F. party. In my own case, for example, I belong to the mine workers of Nova Scotia, who have always followed the British pattern. As far back as the 1900's, when we first formed our labour party in that province, the mine workers of Nova Scotia did exactly what the union membership in Britain does. They affiliated with the labour party. They paid 5 cents per month per member into the union treasury. That did not mean any special assessment on the membership. A member paid his regular dues, but the main union office, out of its share, made that contribution, so there was no additional contribution on the part of the member.

Mrs. Shipley: May I ask another question?

Mr. Gillis: Yes.

Mrs. Shipley: Am I to conclude that the contribution to the C.C.F. party on the part of unions in Canada is at the rate of 5 cents per member per year?

Mr. Gillis: No.

Mrs. Shipley: Per week?

Mr. Gillis: Two cents per month per member at the present time. I said that 35 years ago it was 5 cents to the labour party. But, as I said a moment ago, there is no special assessment for it. The executive office makes that contribution from its share of the dues, so there is no additional contribution.

Mrs. Shipley: On what basis?

Mr. Gillis: Two cents per month per member.

Mrs. Shipley: At present?

Mr. Gillis: Yes. That is my own union.

Mrs. Shipley: And that is tax free?

Mr. Gillis: Certainly not. The tax is deducted at the source. None of these expenditures are taken into consideration until you file your tax return. But the question is not analogous to the argument I am making as to the other contributions to the union on the part of the membership, which are additional assessments. I leave that with the minister to look at some time in the future.

The second matter I should like to bring to his attention—and it is something I have done before on several occasions—is this. Today in Canada if a merchant, for example, puts in a new freezer he has a tax offset. If he puts in a new set of scales or spends money on anything to improve his business he can write it up for tax purposes. Now this question is with respect to the mine workers again. The money he has to spend in order to earn his living is not permitted as a tax offset. For example, he has to buy his explosives and the caps that set off the charges. That costs a good deal of money.

The average miner will use at least six pounds of powder a day and perhaps half a dozen caps.

Second, he has to buy special shoes with steel toe caps. That is obligatory. The company enforces that rule. Third, he has to buy a special helmet to protect him while underground, and that helmet costs between $2.50 and $3. Perhaps he will buy two or three of them a year. He has to purchase an ax. Those are four items that are obligatory. On the one hand they are safety measures and on the other hand the explosive caps are necessary to knock down the coal.

I think permitting those items as a tax offset is just as legitimate as allowing the travelling salesman the car depreciation allowance that he gets, or giving a merchant an allowance for improving his business by buying a new refrigerator and so forth.

Mr. McCann: May I correct you in regard to the cost of the supplies you mentioned? The expenditure on caps is allowed as an offset; all that the miner uses except his clothes.

Mr. Gillis: If it is allowed most of them do not know about it, because during this session I have received letters about it.

Mr. McCann: It is right in the act.

Mr. Gillis: I am glad that will get on the record and they will find out that it is permitted and they will put in those expenditures. I know that during this session I have received letters asking me to take it up again. I hope the minister will take a look at the shoes, hats and so forth.

There is another item that has been in the sling for some time, and that is the superannuation contribution made by the soldier in the services. I have argued it with the Department of National Defence and Department of Veterans Affairs, and it is always thrown back to national revenue. It is a rather pathetic thing. Today the services are a career for many people, and will be for a long time. The soldier, airman or sailor may contribute to a pension fund for 10 or 12 years. I have heard of cases where it was 10 years. If he dies from natural causes while in the service the pension commission says no pension is indicated because it is not attributable to service. The war veterans allowance officials say the widow cannot get anything because she is too young but that the superannuation contribution is returned to her; and the Department of National Revenue then considers that as income. In the one case I had, where the serviceman was in the forces for 10 years, the contributions were returned to the widow, who had three small children, and the income tax division took $600 out of that refund of contributions as income tax.

I believe the Department of National Revenue should consult with the other departments concerned. They tell me they are quite willing to consider the matter provided the Department of National Revenue will also consider it, and I think this is something that should be corrected. It is bad enough for the young woman to lose her husband and be left with a small family, no income and no pension rights because her husband died from natural causes despite the fact that he was in the services, but to have the pension contributions made over a period of ten years all assessed as income in one year when they are returned is most unfair.

The argument is advanced that the pension contributions were tax free. That is quite true, but only with respect to a very small percentage of the money. A lot of the money was still taxed because if he paid $100 into the pension fund during the year and he put in the $100 as a tax offset he was only allowed a percentage of that for income tax purposes, maybe 25 per cent or 30 per cent. Sixty or 70 per cent of that money was money that was taken straight away from him. It is not all tax free, just the percentage that is allowed for income tax purposes, and I think in a case of that kind there are extenuating circumstances.

To begin with, I cannot understand how the pension commission could take the position that the death of a man who had been in the service for ten years, who had seen combat service, who had gone through Italy and western Europe, who had come back here and remained in the service and had then died from a heart attack while in the service, was not attributable to his service but to natural causes. I think the wear and tear and the strain of war were contributing factors to the man's death.

Having regard to the circumstances in which this woman found herself, I thought it was a pretty callous and heartless thing to take $600 in income tax when the money was being returned. I have been arguing this matter for at least six or seven years. All the departments have considered it, and while I do not want the Minister of National Revenue to make a decision tonight I wish he would take a square look at it and at some time in the future give us a firm decision. I like to get either a yes or a no, and to date there has been evasion. The matter has been passed back to the Department of National Revenue.

That is all I have to say. I hope the minister will take a look at this matter and at some time in the future give a firm answer.

Mr. McCann: In respect to what the hon. member has said about pensions, that was brought up in the house a day or two ago in a debate with the Minister of National Defence, and he promised that he and I would have a look at the matter.

Mr. Huffman: Mr. Chairman, a great deal of information has come to the attention of the minister and his officials since these estimates have been before the committee. I am sure that after a full analysis of the information the minister and his officials have received, some benefit will accrue to the taxpayer.

I was very pleased to learn from the minister this afternoon that net worth assessments were the last resort of the department. I hope that every avenue will be explored by the assessors before resorting to the net worth method. A great deal of confusion is created by taking returns which have formerly been based on cash and converting them to a net worth statement. I think that is where many of the problems arise, because in rural areas most of the returns are made on a cash basis and not on a net worth basis.

There are two problems peculiar to my area and to southern Ontario that I wish to raise. One of them relates to tile drainage. In southern Ontario, which is rather flat land, under-drainage is almost essential for the successful operation of the farms. Over the years the municipalities have advanced money for the installation of such drains and the loans have been repaid over a normal period of 20 years. Some 40 years ago, when money was more expensive than it is now, it used to take $8 for each $100 to repay the loan over a 20-year period. The rate is not as high at this time.

People who kept account of the expenses of their farming operations had always put in their taxes in one sum, and in the tax notices the tile drain loans were included. I find now that with respect to summary assessments in my area the assessors are delving into the amount represented by the carrying charges of the loan. It does not amount to a great deal for any one farm. If you reassess one farmer who has his land tiled, then it is right that every farmer who has his farm tiled should be reassessed. I contend that the amount of detail that would be involved in reassessing all the returns would not warrant the expense and would not be warranted by the amount of money that would be returned to the department.

There is one other thing that is peculiar to my area, and it concerns a request from a number of people. We live almost halfway between two taxation offices, one in London and the other in Windsor. At the present time our area is in the London district. If an assessor leaves London and goes to the extreme western section of the country from which I come he must drive approximately 90 miles. I realize that the assessor must be compensated by way of a nominal and statutory amount for the use of his car and his mileage travelled. He also must be provided with accommodation while he is away from home.

Our people feel that accommodation for assessors should be provided in the new building being erected by the Minister of Public Works in the city of Chatham, and that the time now spent by assessors in driving from London to our area could very well be employed in making assessments of returns in the area. In addition, quite a number of succession duty returns could be handled in the same way. I am not fully aware of the procedure of the department but what we would like, if it is at all possible, is to have assessors located in the city of Chatham. We believe it would not add one more person to the personnel of the department, and in so doing we would have better public relations with the taxpayers. We feel that it would provide an excellent service. When a taxpayer must drive 80 or 90 miles to the tax office he is often tempted to do his business by mail, and it has not always been a satisfactory way of looking after his affairs. We feel that this would be excellent public relations, and I would commend it to the attention of the minister.

Only recently I noticed a civil service requirement for a number of assessors for the London office. The same thing is true in a number of the offices throughout this country. From the number of requirements that have been advertised from time to time it appears to me that there must be quite a turnover in the personnel of the department. I do not know what the reason is, but I would hope that the officials of the department would learn the reason for the excessive or seemingly excessive numbers who are leaving the service and going into private practice. I believe one of the reasons is that very often the assessor is not paid according to the responsibility he must assume. Under those circumstances I would hope that we could have in all our offices personnel who would remain with the department for all their years, so those who are fully acquainted with the problems could give the best service to the department.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, I should like to intervene in this debate very briefly because all the points which have been raised heretofore I think are common to almost every place in Canada and there is little one can say which has not already been suggested by some other hon. member.

On the other hand, as the hon. member for Oxford pointed out this afternoon, I think the tax collecting department is always the most unpopular department of any government. A member is justified, in my opinion, in expressing his opinion—and should do so—of a department which reaches into the homes of almost each and every constituent he has. I am going to speak for a very few moments entirely with respect to matters which affect every rural constituency or rural area in this country.

Much has been said about the net worth statement. I did not hear the minister this afternoon; I must have been out of the chamber for a moment. However, I was glad to hear the hon. member for Kent a few moments ago state that the minister had said this afternoon that the net worth statement was the last resort of the department in dealing with these matters. Frankly, I find it rather difficult to understand that statement, Mr. Chairman. Although I have not been very close to these matters during the last few years owing to the fact that we are here from January until July or August, at least in previous years one of my jobs was to deal with scores of these matters every year in my own office, and I know they are still going through the office with which I have some connection.

I may say that I do not think these net worth statements are entirely the last resort. You get farmers who file their income tax returns, and assume that everything is all right. Then suddenly, for no apparent reason, the inspectors appear, start investigating the affairs of the farmer and then a net worth statement is submitted to him. The farmer is faced with this situation.

I must say this. I think the inspectors who handle these matters are perhaps dealing more courteously with the taxpayers today than they did in the past. They are not as brusque. They are not quite as—shall we say, to use a polite term—dynamic as they were a few years ago. I think the complaints which have been raised in this committee during these years with respect to these net worth statements have had a considerable influence on the department. I want to compliment the minister for the progress which has been made.

After all, what is the situation with respect to these net worth statements? Yesterday afternoon we had a speech by the hon. member for Perth who spent considerable time in this committee dealing with the net worth statements and complaining of the way in which they are sometimes administered. Last night we had the hon. member for Dauphin also reiterating those statements and emphasizing their importance. Then we had the speech by the hon. member for Kent. Although he did not commit himself in any way, I think it is a fair inference, when he expressed his pleasure that the net worth statement was the last resort, that he is not too happy about the way in which they have been administered. Then you have myself at the moment speaking for Nova Scotia on the same matter.

As the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre said the other day in another debate, when you have reasonable men who are aroused or, as in this case, concerned about a matter, I think it is something which should impress itself upon the minister. You have these members from various parts of Canada who are still saying that the way in which these net worth statements are administered is something to which, to put it mildly, the minister should give very careful consideration.

What is the situation? A farmer is confronted with a net worth statement. He is told, "If you can prove we are wrong, we will accept it. You prove that we are wrong". How can that be done by a farmer whose records are usually somewhat incomplete—at least I am speaking for the farmers whom I know, namely those in Nova Scotia—and who does not purport to keep records over a long period of years? He is confronted with a net worth statement and is told that by the inspector, as I say, very politely and very courteously. It is somewhat different from what they used to say.

I emphasize that point again. There has been a change in the way in which they deal with these matters. Nevertheless, they say, "If you can prove we are wrong, we will be very glad to hear from you; otherwise this statement stands". What is the farmer going to do? As we all know, under the act the inspector goes back for six years without any question; and if there is an allegation of fraud—we will use that term—then he can go back to the inception of the act and we are back to 1917.

The farmer just cannot present details, invoices or anything of that kind which can meet that situation. I can speak with some feeling on this matter because, as I said, at least in earlier years I had to deal with scores and scores of these cases every year, and I felt that in many cases men whom I knew to be honest, men whom I knew were trying to file a proper return, who thought they had filed it and who had paid the tax which they believed was due, were subsequently confronted with these net worth statements and were embarrassed and sometimes seriously penalized because of that procedure.

Again I repeat that I want to give the department full credit for the fact that there has been an improvement in this approach. I am only stressing the matter now in order to urge on the minister that he consider again this whole matter and try to improve still more the approach to it.

I read the evidence given in the committee, of which I was not a member. I heard the statement of the minister and the officials to the effect that there was no scrutiny of the taxpayer's affairs and that these net worth statements were made only because of investigation which had been made and when they found something irregular. Perhaps the farmer bought a brand new Buick when he reported a loss the year before, and therefore the department thought the matter worthy of scrutiny.

I can tell the minister that I have heard inspectors of his department say, "We were driving down the road; we saw where you were building a new fireplace on the outside of your house, so we came in to investigate and see what was going on". Another time I was told that they said, "Your wife was seen in Kentville and we saw her with a new fur coat. We did not know how you could buy a fur coat for your wife". Whether it was a Christmas present from her father did not make any difference. They said, "We did not think you could buy a fur coat for your wife. We therefore decided to have you investigated and we are now presenting this net worth statement".

As the hon. member for Perth emphasized last night, I realize and quite admit that there are times when net worth statements are necessary. I know that all farmers, 100 per cent of them, have no monopoly on virtue. There may be the odd one—I do not think there are many—who perhaps has been a little bit light on his pencil when he has filled in his income and a little bit heavy when he marked down his expenditures. That has been known to happen. I am willing to admit that it even happens with farmers, although I doubt if it happens very often. There may be the occasional justification for a net worth statement and a farmer being assessed on that basis.

I want to say to the minister with all the seriousness I can command that I do think, whatever may have been the improvement in the technique of his officials, the improvement in the approach to this thing, there is one phase of that net worth statement in which they have refused to face the facts of life, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Perth last night. That is when these inspectors continually and universally insist upon a cost of living being assessed against the farmer which is out of proportion with the realities of the situation.

I suppose in earlier days I have gone over scores and scores of these statements every year. In almost every case I know the farmer was assessed on a cost of living basis which was greatly in excess of that which he actually paid. You get his assets and you will find he has paid a little bit off the mortgage, a little bit off the bank loan or bought a new tractor. Then you say it costs him $2,400 or $200 per month to live. It did not cost him that. Very often it did not cost him half that. Very often he is assessed on that basis and the officials very generously say, "If you can prove we are wrong we will accept it".

From my own personal experience I have seen scores and scores of men whom I know have been treated unjustly on that net worth statement basis, and particularly the cost of living item. I hope that is something the minister will consider very, very carefully. I cannot join with the hon. member for Cape Breton South, who said a while ago he hoped the minister would be back here next year. Personally I hope he will not be back, and unless he reconsiders this matter of the net worth statement his chances of coming back are very dim indeed.

There is another matter to which I wish to direct his attention in connection with the rural economy, and that is the right to elect. I know that now possibly we are verging on the statute or on policy rather than on administration, but I think the dividing line in this case is so narrow the minister will not raise a point of order. As the hon. member for Moose Jaw pointed out last night, I think there has been legislation by administration in this department anyway in dealing with capital gains. All those who are interested in the rural economy have seen farmers who were selling property, some of whom have been assessed on a capital gains basis without any change whatever in this legislation, and they realize that the dividing line between administration and legislation is very narrow indeed. I am not going to develop that now because I am speaking mainly from an agricultural standpoint.

It always has nettled me that farmers who happen to employ an auditor like the hon. member for Perth or perhaps retain a lawyer like the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings, and get advice, can just file a statement about electing and thereafter can average. If they do not file that statement then they cannot average. I realize that the right to average applies to others than farmers. It applies to businessmen and to people in other walks of life. They always have their auditors or solicitors to give them continual advice.

However, I think the thing is perhaps somewhat outmoded today. I believe most of them today know about the right of election, but I can say from my own small experience in a very limited area that I have seen hundreds of farmers treated unjustly because they were not advised of the fact that to average they had to elect before the first day of May or whatever it was. Not having done that and having had one good year and four bad years, two before and two after, but not having averaged, they were ruined. I have always thought it could have been part of the act that they should have been given the right to elect and to average. The question may be somewhat academic today because I think the practice is fairly widespread, but certainly it is purely a matter of administration.

I had a case before the officials here within the last six months in which a farmer had not averaged so that a gross injustice was being done to him as compared to his neighbour across the street, who had averaged. I say that from the standpoint of administration, you should consider these cases and perhaps legislate by administration by saying. "We can assume that you averaged". However, the officials always say, "Well, it is too bad you did not put that in; it is not date stamped on the first day of May. Therefore your election is out." That is something which, as I say, has nettled me because I have felt it was an absolute injustice.

Then the third thing and the only other matter I shall bring to the attention of the minister tonight, again from a rural standpoint, is the matter of the gift tax in so far as it affects farmers' sons in this country. Again I am speaking of my own area, the only area of which I have intimate knowledge. In Nova Scotia a farmer may have one son or perhaps if the farm is large enough two sons who remain with him on the understanding that when the farmer retires or dies they are going to take over the farm. The farmers there being economical and sometimes afraid of legal fees—I do not know why they should be afraid of lawyers in Nova Scotia, but some of them are perhaps a little bit afraid of lawyers or the probate fees because they think they are astronomical when we all know they are not—perhaps five years before they die deed the farm over to the son or to the two sons.

I can recall several years ago when the Minister of National Revenue and this government took great credit for the fact that they were raising the ceiling on succession duties. Thereafter you would only have to pay succession duties on X dollars instead of as heretofore on Y dollars. That sounded wonderful. What happened? In my constituency within three months after that change had been made there were at least 10 different farmers sons in my office—when I say "sons" they were not youths but some of them were 35 or 40 years of age—whose fathers had died and they had taken over the farms. The Department of National Revenue came along and said they owed a gift tax, sometimes of $2,000 or $2,500 or $3,000. This was the gift tax on this farm which had been deeded by the father to the son.

Now, with an expert or fairly competent legal advice, it is an easy matter to meet that situation. You can always bring forth an agreement of some kind, and I do not think the department insists that it be in writing. There can be an agreement whereby the son stays on the farm, and so forth. Some farmers who could employ a lawyer and spend quite a lot of money could perhaps beat that.

But I know scores of farmers' sons who have had to pay substantial gift taxes simply because the farmer deeded the farm over to them before he died instead of willing it to them. Certainly that was not the intent of this act and that certainly is more than a matter of administration. I know the provisions of the gift tax act provide for a gift of $4,000 to one person, per annum $1,000 to each child or 50 per cent of the difference between your income tax and your taxable income. Those matters can be applied in gifts of securities and various other things. But when you are dealing with a father who has deeded his farm to his son, who has lived on that farm from the time he was born until he was perhaps 35 or 40 when his father died and he took it over, you find that the department comes back and says, "Two years before your father died, unfortunately, instead of deeding this farm and taking back a mortgage he gave it to you." The father could have written off $4,000 per year; there are other things that could be pulled off—perhaps that is a slang expression—a dozen other legal expedients which all of us know and which the department would welcome, but instead of getting legal advice they fall into that trap and are penalized. I know of one man who, before he got legal advice, had been assessed and borrowed $3,500 from the bank to pay the government tax, which he certainly did not owe morally, and thereafter was broke.

That is a matter of administration. As I see it, I think the department should scrutinize these transactions much more carefully in the future than it has in the past, and when it comes to that particular type of transaction, a transfer between father and son of a farm, I say the administration as such should not even suggest that a gift tax be paid.

These are all the matters I want to bring up at the moment. There are a whole host of matters that I could deal with. I am speaking from the standpoint of a member for a rural constituency and of problems with which I have been associated personally during all the years I have been in practice.

Mr. Monteith: Before the item carries, I understand the hon. member for Oxford asked the minister whether in certain instances an inspector ever went into another business similar to one which he was inspecting to get an average concerning the type of income that should be accountable in that business. The minister said no. Is that correct?

Mr. McCann: I think the question was, did we ever seize the records for the purpose of getting information. My answer to that was no.

Mr. Monteith: I beg your pardon. I think the minister will admit that they do use averages for comparison purposes to come to their own conclusions, and that sort of thing.

Mr. McCann: That is right, we do, and we use averages for another purpose. We get from the bureau of statistics the average cost of living of farmers in a community, and that is very often the basis we use in a net worth statement; whether the farmer has a family of two or three, or what is his average cost of living. Not only do we take his statement but time after time it has been reduced. He has given too much. When he was making his statement as to what it cost he thought the higher it went the better it was for him. That is not the case; it is exactly the reverse. We have used the average given by the bureau of statistics and to my personal knowledge, in a great many cases, his cost of living and his net worth statement have been greatly reduced.

Mr. Nowlan: I have never seen it.

Mr. Monteith: There seem to have been a great many complaints made during yesterday afternoon and today in the debate on these estimates. After all, where there is so much smoke there must be a small bit of fire. I think the minister should consider closely all the good advice that has been given to him in the last few hours. I feel the administration of the department could well benefit from that advice. I would also take considerable satisfaction from the fact that vote No. 289 has been amended and reduced by $50,000. I am quite sure this would never have happened and would never have been brought to light, had it not been for the very close examination of these estimates by the Conservative members in the estimates committee.

Mr. McCann: That is perhaps an overstatement. We accept your advice and are very glad to have it, and also your criticism. I may tell you it has been my practice in the last 12 or 13 years to review meticulously the debate that goes on here with reference to taxation and the other part of the department, and that is considered not only by myself but by a committee of the taxation division. We try to work out recommendations to the Minister of Finance, or administrative conditions within our own department, that will take into account the recommendations that have been made.

I did not intend to speak any more. It is good advice, but I cannot meet all the arguments that have been put up here tonight. In the first place, I cannot remember them all. But I want to refute one argument of the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings with reference to having the most unpopular department in the whole government. That is not so. In justice to the people who work for me, let me say that we receive thousands of letters of commendation on the way in which we have handled cases. They have come from the Canadian taxation society, from corporations, from individuals and all the rest. Don't forget this—

Mr. Nowlan: The opposition has done a good job in helping to improve your department.

Mr. McCann: I will give you credit for that if you wish to take it. Don't forget this. We took in 4,900,000 returns last year. What other departments, or all the departments put together, have contact with as many citizens of Canada as has the Department of National Revenue? I work at this job 12 months of the year in the busiest department, on a day to day basis, that exists in the whole government. It is comparable to a trust company, for which I was castigated a year ago, and it is comparable to good business.

I ask hon. gentlemen when they cross Canada to look at the type of offices we have set up. They are some of the finest business offices in the whole of Canada. I have tried to put the department on a business basis and to make it look like a business office. I ask you to look at our office in London and the new one we are building in Toronto. Right here in Ottawa we have the poorest office in the whole of Canada. Look at the one down in your country, at the one in Saint John and the new one we are building in Halifax.

I contend and I submit to this house that this department has improved greatly, probably as a result of the criticism and the suggestions that have come in, but there is no better critic of the whole department than myself. I criticize them and try to put the business on a business basis. I submit that we are doing the most important business in Canada, and the collecting of the taxes of Canada is Canada's biggest business.

Mr. Trainor: How about the comparison of the minister's department and Eaton's that was mentioned by the hon. member for Middlesex?

Mr. McCann: There is a lot of difference between taking 100 pounds of salt off the shelves and sending it to somebody and examining income tax returns. I do not think the two things are comparable at all.

Mr. Charlton: As I was about to say, the minister was very careful this afternoon to explain that he had nothing to do with policy; he had to do only with the administration of the act. I think most hon. members would agree—and I think the minister himself will agree—when I say there are hundreds of regulations under the act for which the minister himself or some of his officials are responsible. Of course that is partly administration. Under the rules and regulations of the act and with respect to many sections of the act the minister knows very well that he has his own discretion as to what interpretation he puts upon the wording of the act.

Mr. McCann: I do not know whether the hon. gentleman was here—probably he was—in 1945 when an investigation was made of the national revenue taxation division. At that time we had I think about 27 discretions. The accountants and all the rest of them who gave evidence took all these discretions away. I have heard many times since that they wished they had not gone so far; that the minister who knew his business was much fairer and probably more lenient with them than a strict interpretation of the law would allow. The law is handed to me to administer, and I have not the discretion to vary it. A lot of the criticism and a lot of the suggestions might rightly come before the Minister of Finance when the Income Tax Act is being revised or when the amendments to it are being put to the house.

Mr. Charlton: The minister seems to think he has a halo around his head. If he will recall section 113, I believe it is, he will see that he has discretion as to what is the major portion of the income of a taxpayer and what it comprises. He can classify that taxpayer as he wishes. The minister may check that. It used to be section 113. There have been various occasions under that section when the minister has used his own discretion. That is partly policy. I want to make it clear at the outset that I do not want to be misrepresented.

Mr. McCann: I think the hon. member is referring to section 13, which reads:

> Where a taxpayer's chief source of income for a taxation year is neither farming nor a combination of farming and some other source of income, his income for the year shall be deemed to be not less than his income from all sources other than farming minus the lesser of
> (a) one-half his farming loss for the year, or
> (b) $5,000.

That was to deal with what they called hobby farmers who wanted to write off losses, either real or fictitious, against their incomes. We changed the law so that such a man could not write off more than $5,000. If I were free to mention names I could give the names of people who contended that they were doing a great thing for this country in the way of stock breeding and special lines of farming and wanted to write off their losses. One instance I remember was for $189,000. In fairness to the rest of the taxpayers that could not be allowed, and I suggested that the law should be changed and we now limit that to $5,000.

Mr. Charlton: It still does not alter the fact that the minister has discretion in some of these cases. As I said, I do not want to be misrepresented as condoning wrongdoing. I realize there are some people across the country, farmers and others, who probably evade paying their proper income taxes, but I do not condone that practice. There are many farmers who do not keep books, and a farmer may think he does not have to make out an income tax return if he is not taxable. He may go on that way for some time, and then he becomes afraid to make out an income tax return. He delays doing it because of fear from year to year, and what might happen to him I do not know.

Mr. McCann: He is already breaking the law because he is not keeping some kind of record.

Mr. Charlton: I admit that. There are not many farmers who are able to keep accurate records, especially small farmers. If the minister were looking after a small farm I imagine he would not be keeping many books, because he would be too tired at night to sit down to look after a lot of books. In the main that is the reason they do not do it. A farmer cannot carry a pencil and piece of paper around with him to jot down every time he spends a nickel or a dollar.

As the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings said, unless you can prove the assessor to be wrong, you have had it. I submit that every assessor having anything to do with farm assessments should have a farming background, and I know that is not always the case by the questions they ask farmers and by the statements they make. It is quite obvious quite often that they have had nothing to do with farming. I know of cases where an assessor has gone to a farm and tried to charge $2.50 for a chicken which the farmer's wife has used on the table because that is what he had to pay in the market in the city. Perhaps I should not use the word, but at times these assessors use a form of trickery to get information and quite often assess the farmer or someone else more than he should be assessed for income tax purposes.

Obviously farm costs have gone up, as has the cost of living. An assessor may question a farmer as to what it costs him to live. He may ask leading questions like, "It costs you more to live now than it did five years ago?" and the farmer agrees. Then the assessor might go on and ask, "Does it cost you $2,500 or probably $2,600 or $2,700?" The farmer may think he is getting something off his income tax and he agrees with that figure, and he is caught.

Mr. McCann: In most cases he is told he is wrong. He is told the average cost of living in that particular section.

Mr. Charlton: I am interested in seeing that the Minister of National Revenue is taking cognizance of the fact that the bureau of statistics puts out figures which are accurate when his colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, does not think too much of those figures. I hope the Minister of National Revenue is not getting individual figures from the bureau of statistics, because they are supposed to be confidential.

Mr. McCann: The bureau of statistics will not give us individual figures.

Mr. Charlton: I know of cases where notices of extra taxes due have been sent out stating a particular amount, but when the department was asked, either by letter or personal interview, to justify that figure they would not do so and the matter was dropped. I wonder if those figures are just taken out of the air. It makes one rather suspicious.

I know of one chap who had done very well in business. He had expanded considerably, and he had an employee of the income tax department make out his income tax returns after office hours. They have now come back on that particular man and have assessed him for some tens of thousands of dollars. He will have to sell one of his farms or go out of business. The hon. member for Kamloops brought in a bill which would have limited the department to a period of three years in which to go back and assess. I think the department should give more consideration to that.

A farmer must keep books until he receives permission from the minister or the department to destroy them. If the records kept piling up a farmer would not have room in his house for all his files. He might have to keep them in perpetuity. The books kept by a farmer are not based on any special accounting system; generally they are pretty rough. It is a terrific job to keep these books for a number of years. The fear is always there that you should not destroy anything or you may get into trouble. They can come along any time and reassess you, even after eight or ten years.

There is one more thing I should like to bring up which concerns not only this particular item No. 289 but the whole department. It seems strange to me that telephones and telegraphs should cost so much. It would appear that people do not want to write letters. The Post Office Department do a very good job in providing mail service, but when one considers that in this department alone these items amount to $290,600 he must realize that it is a tremendous item. That is over a quarter of a million dollars for telephones and telegraphs. Apparently many officials in the department consider it is much easier to pick up a telephone, and I agree with them; but I would suggest that while the average telephone call probably costs $1 a postage stamp costs only 5 cents. A considerable amount of money might be saved if more letters were written and fewer telephone calls made. Imagine; $290,600 just for telephones and telegraphs in one department. No wonder the Minister of Trade and Commerce asks, "What's a million?" when a quarter of a million dollars is spent just on telephoning for that department alone. So I would suggest that when the minister criticizes his own department he ask them to get a secretary and write the odd letter instead of picking up the telephone and using it whenever they want any information.

Mr. McCann: Don't forget that this amount of $150,000 for telephones and telegrams covers 30 offices.

Mr. Charlton: I have admitted that. I said that it was for the whole department. The $11,000 is for customs cases and the $150,000 for the income tax branch offices.

Mr. McCann: That is what I am quoting; $150,000 for the district taxation offices. We have 29 district offices.

Mr. Charlton: Twenty-nine district income tax offices. That is over $5,000 per office.

Mr. McCann: That is right.

Mr. Charlton: That is $5,000 per year. Does the minister not think that amount to be a little excessive?

Mr. McCann: That is not all for long distance calls. That is also telephoning within the communities in which we have the offices.

Mr. Charlton: The minister does not have to explain that to me. I have a telephone too, for which I have to pay as well as anybody else. These are telephone services. It is the telephone that he has in the office. There are the extensions, of course, but I suggest that most of it is for long distance telephone calls.

Mr. McCann: No.

Mr. Charlton: Then I should like the minister to give me a breakdown of what the service is costing and what the long distance telephone costs are in the various departments.

Mr. McCann: We do not have a breakdown of it, but that is about $5,000 in an office.

Mr. Charlton: That is $100 per week.

Mr. McCann: I do not consider that is too much when you have an office with 400 or 500 employees. Take the Toronto office or the Montreal office; those are the ones that cost a good deal of money. Almost every official or every division would have a telephone in that particular spot. I figure that for my own personal telephone in my own home it costs $200 or $300 per year.

Mr. White (Hastings-Frontenac): I would ask the minister if he would make any comments on the remarks made by the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings about the cases of injustice in regard to the gift tax on the transfer of property from father to son. Would he care to comment on that?

[Mr. Charlton.]

Mr. McCann: No, I have no particular comment to make on it at this time. We shall look into it. I will say this, that it is in accordance with the act.

Mr. White (Hastings-Frontenac): When the minister says he will look into it, does he mean that he periodically checks the various registry offices or wherever the registrations are made to get this information, or how does it come to his attention?

Mr. McCann: I am told that we occasionally look at the registry offices, but most of that information comes to hand when they are making returns with reference to the succession duties. It might be a case where there is no succession duty payable federally because there is an exemption of $50,000, but we have an exchange of information between the different provinces and the federal succession duty division, and it is in those instances that much of the information comes to our attention.

Mr. White (Hastings-Frontenac): Taking the province of Ontario, I would ask the minister how he gets the information from the registry office of any county about what is registered in regard to mortgages and things of that nature. Do they make a periodic check, or do the registrars of these offices make a periodic return to the minister's office giving that information, and so on, or how does he get that information?

Mr. McCann: We have no arrangement that the particular information that they would have in the registry office comes to the succession duty office, but our officers occasionally—and probably with some regularity—follow up these cases in the registry office.

Mr. White (Hastings-Frontenac): I am not speaking about cases that come to the minister's attention through a mistake in the succession duty office, but I myself have observed on various occasions that within a very short period after a document such as a mortgage or something of that nature is registered in the registry office for the first time, somebody goes to the office to see about income tax. I have always been curious as to how this information gets to the department so quickly from the local registry office—not that I am saying there is anything wrong with it.

Mr. McCann: We have a good system of keeping records within the department. When we see notices of deaths of people we investigate whether or not that particular individual has been up to date and, if he has died in the middle of the year, say in July, he is taxed for that period of that year.

Mr. White (Hastings-Frontenac): The minister misunderstands me. I am not speaking about estates and so on, but ordinary business transactions with regard to the sale of property, the loaning of money and things of that sort. It has nothing to do with an estate. How does the department keep track of all these sales? How does it get the information that so and so has taken out a mortgage or bought a farm, and things of that nature?

Mr. McCann: We follow in addition the transfers of properties. They will be found in any newspaper. You find them here in Ottawa.

Mr. White (Hastings-Frontenac): You do not find that in the country.

Mr. McCann: I do not know about your particular region, but there are many important towns in the province from which we get the information we need in carrying on our business.

Mr. Nesbitt: I have one last question. This afternoon I made a number of suggestions as a result of the hearings of the special committee on estimates. I do not expect the minister to pay attention to all of them, but there was one in particular about which I should like to have a reply from the minister if I could.

The minister told us in the estimates committee on one occasion that, as a matter of practice in the department, when books are taken over from any individual or small business for the purpose of investigation they are photostated and returned as quickly as possible. This is a point of administration, and the only one I know from personal knowledge in regard to which there is something seriously at fault. I was wondering whether the minister would give an undertaking that when books are taken from businesses and individuals such as lawyers, doctors and accountants, they should be photostated and returned just as soon as possible and that possibly a new directive could be sent out to the offices.

Mr. McCann: Yes, I shall give that undertaking. I know quite well the case to which the hon. gentleman has reference, or I can make a pretty good guess at it, and there were two truckloads of books and documents that were taken. It takes some time to go over that and have photostatic copies made of the important documents. I may say that the policy of the department is to do that work as quickly and as expeditiously as possible. With some of these investigations, we do not know how important they are or the length of time they will take. Some of them take a couple of years. We have all types.

This is confidential and I am not going to give any names, but I will give some of the types of offences. Here is a case of omitting payments and diverting cheques. The tax in that instance was $29,000. Here is one of diverting limited company receipts to personal use. In that case the tax and interest were over $50,000 and the assessment was over $186,000. Inventory suppression, fraudulent vouchers and non-recording of sales, the tax and interest were $225,000 and the evasion was $581,000.

Then we have suppression of equipment rentals, falsification of donation receipts, suppression of sales, preparing and selling false refund claims. In the last instance the man was sent to jail for nine months. Then we have suppression of sales and inflation of expenses, suppression of sales, suppression of sales, suppression of sales. Here is another one, suppressed sales. Then we have falsification of T returns, diverted rebates, suppression of income payments, diverting part of fees of audits. I could go on for a long time.

Let me give you a couple of nice ones; fictitious credit notes, suppression of sales, suppression of log sales and machinery. The tax and interest were $136,000 and the assessment of suppressed sales was $363,000. Here is one I referred to the other day, forged donation receipts, suppression of $100,000 in ticket sales, fictitious donation receipts, suppression of sales by means of duplicate invoice numbers. The tax and interest were $411,000 and the amount was $503,000. Here is another one, false purchases, falsifying statements, suppression of sales. Here is one where there were false purchases. This had to do with a fellow who was buying stuff and putting out something else. The tax and interest were $80,000, the fine was $20,000 and in default a total of 14 months in jail. The amount suppressed was $593,000.

I want to tell you that by carrying on the work of revision, reassessment and prosecution we took in last year over $89 million above the regular assessments, three to four times as much as it cost to administer the whole department for a year.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I suppose it is safe to assume there were no farmers prosecuted?

Mr. McCann: In this whole file there was not a farmer who was prosecuted.

Mr. Nesbitt: We are certainly very interested in the recital of naughty deeds the minister has just given us, and I am very glad they are so successful. The only thing I mentioned had to do with the taking of books and photostating them. The minister said with respect to the case I had in mind—I am pretty sure he and I know which one it was—that there were two truckloads. Of course trucks do vary in size. I had another case in mind of a doctor's books that were taken and held for a long time. I am satisfied as long as the minister has undertaken to have his department hurry up with the photostats.

Mr. Cardiff: I should like to ask the minister a question with regard to some complaints I have had in my section of the country. Is it a common practice of the department to send two assessors around to make investigations?

Mr. McCann: Yes.

Mr. Cardiff: For what reason?

Mr. McCann: Not necessarily, but in most instances two are sent.

Mr. Cardiff: For what reason?

An hon. Member: One to watch the other.

Mr. McCann: Yes, they do. In some instances it takes two men to do the work. However, if you have one man who can substantiate the statements of the other you are in a much better position than if one man goes alone.

Mr. Cardiff: I agree with that, but the complaint I have is that the two of them get hold of a man and take statements from him, and if they want to bring the matter up in court or make an investigation of any kind there are two against one with regard to whatever the man happens to say if he is foolish enough to open his mouth and say anything, and the people complain about it.

Mr. Knowles: I wonder whether the minister has obtained answers to any of the questions I put to him this afternoon. In particular, I wonder whether he can explain what I thought was a rather strange answer to certain order paper questions, particularly when I asked about people from whom deductions at the source are made during the year which exceed what they would have to pay but who fail to make any return at the end of the year and hence do not get any refunds coming to them. As the minister will recall, the answer he gave to several questions along that line, as recorded at page 2587 of Hansard for March 23 of this year, was that there was no information available.

May I put it this way. Are records kept of all those from whom deductions are made at the source and is a check made at the end of the year to see that every person from whom deductions were made at the source files a return? If so, why was an answer not available to my question? If not, the minister can take it from there.

[Mr. Nesbitt.]

Mr. McCann: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked a lot of questions. Of course that is not unusual, but he gave the answers to most of them himself. He put in the proviso that they might have to do with matters of policy rather than with matters of administration. I did make a few notes with reference to some of the questions asked but I do not know just where they are at the moment. However, I think there was only one that had to do with administration. It had to do with the matter of spreading a pension under section 36 over a period, and I believe he asked whether we could not put something on the form.

Mr. Knowles: I asked whether a special form could not be provided, but I also asked whether the note on the explanatory page should not include the kinds of payments other than pension payments to which special tax treatment can be accorded.

Mr. McCann: The great percentage of forms that are filed are short forms, and we have as much crowded on that form now as we can possibly put on it. A few years ago there was a demand to reduce the length of the general form. We were able to reduce it to a size that has saved a lot of money and a lot of work on the part of taxpayers. I would hate to think that we had to go back now to the old, longer form.

Mr. Knowles: I am not complaining about the shortness of the form. Let me say it again. I have not the sheet here now because it has gone up to the Hansard office, but the sheet of explanatory notes that is attached to the short form has on it one short paragraph telling the taxpayer that if he received a lump sum payment out of a pension fund he can get special tax treatment and he is advised to consult his district taxation office.

My point is that section 36, which provides for that special tax treatment, provides that it can be accorded not only to lump sum payments out of pension funds but to certain other lump sum payments. If I can boil my suggestion down to its simplest form, I am simply asking whether that explanatory note could not include as another phrase in the key sentence the fact that there are certain other kinds of lump sum payments about which the taxpayer might be well advised to consult the district taxation office. If the minister feels he cannot answer now I hope his officials will look into the matter.

Mr. McCann: I promise you that we will give the matter consideration.

Mr. Knowles: That is fine. Can the minister answer the last of the questions which I put to him this afternoon and which I suggest is not policy but is a matter of administration? My question was based on the answers he gave to my order paper questions which appear at page 2587 of Hansard for March 23, 1956. The answers to those questions, in so far as they say "no information available", seem to suggest that no checking of the records is done to ascertain how many persons there are from whom deductions are made at the source but who do not file a return at the end of the year.

As I said this afternoon my chief concern —and the minister can understand that—is for people who have paid in too much and who since they do not file returns do not get their refunds. The Minister of Finance must also be concerned about those from whom not enough was deducted at the source. But if no return is filed it could be that a person did not pay the amount he should pay.

I took it for granted that there would be some system in the minister's department whereby in the case of every taxpayer from whom deductions were made at the source a check would be made as to whether each of those taxpayers filed his return at the end of the year. I should like to know whether that is being done. If it is not being done how do you take care of the two situations I have described, namely the taxpayer who overpays through deductions at the source but files no return at the end of the year, and the taxpayer who, through deductions at the source, underpays but does not file a return at the end of the year?

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, I think I understand the problem. For the taxpayer who is overdeducted, there is a refund given to him and he gets that refund.

Mr. Knowles: Is that not true only if he files a return and claims it?

Mr. McCann: Yes, that is right.

Mr. Knowles: All right. Let me ask it again. What about the taxpayer who, through deductions at the source overpays but who does not file a return? What happens to his case?

Mr. McCann: In the first case he is breaking the law by not filing a return; and in the second place, if he makes application for his refund he will get it provided that he puts in a return. There is another question the hon. member asked. He asked what steps the government had taken to get such money back to the persons to whom it belongs. The answer is as follows:

The prompt issuance of refunds to all persons from whom overpayments of tax have been collected is a constant objective of the taxation division. This objective is one of the aims of an extensive annual publicity campaign employing newspaper, radio, T.V., newsreel and street car advertising. Persons entitled to refunds are advised frequently by such means to make application for their refund and to provide the department with the information necessary to enable a refund to be issued.

Mr. Knowles: Now that the minister has read that, I know he is looking at the answers to the questions to which I have been referring. I ask him to look at the answers to questions 1 and 2 of the same set where the answer given was "No information available".

Mr. McCann: Exactly. I am telling you that our statistics are not kept in such a manner that we can give you those answers. There are twelve million slips that come in with reference to this matter in a year.

Mr. Knowles: If the answer as given is correct, that no information is available, does that mean that, in the case of the taxpayer who the minister said is breaking the law, you do not check on him? You fail to check on the taxpayer from whom too much is deducted at the source but who does not file a return at the end of the year? Similarly, do you fail to check on the taxpayer from whom not enough is deducted at the source but who fails to make his return at the end of the year?

Mr. McCann: I am told by the officials that we do not make a full check. We make what is called a spot check on them.

Mr. Knowles: That means, Mr. Chairman, that there probably are some people, whether they are wilfully breaking the law or whether they are doing it inadvertently, who through deductions at the source are overpaying and because they do not file returns they do not get their money back. They are not caught in the spot check. Likewise there are some other people who through deductions at the source fail to pay what they should pay and they fail to file a return, whether wilfully or by inadvertence. They are not caught in the spot check and they get by without paying their full share of income tax as prescribed under the law. I recognize that it is a huge problem with these twelve million slips that the minister refers to, but it seems to me that the efficiency on this point should not be on a spot check basis but rather should be on the basis of a complete check. I think you should go down the line and make sure that all these deductions at the source are checked to see whether the people from whom these deductions are made make a return at the end of the year and either pay what is still owing or get whatever refund is coming to them.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mrs. Fairclough: No.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I shall not pursue this matter any further, since the minister does not seem to have an answer to it. However, I hope that he and the officials of his department will give consideration to the point I have been making.

Mrs. Fairclough: Pursuing the same point, may I ask the minister to say whether or not these slips are cleared through a central office or whether they are kept in the district office to which they are originally sent by the employer. What I am getting at is this. Suppose a man works in Toronto for three months, then goes from Toronto to Ottawa and works there for three months, and then goes on from there to some other centre and works there for three months. I wonder whether these slips are all brought together in one place. I realize that it may not be indicated, from one place to another, that he has left town. But are any steps taken to try to bring these slips together in one spot?

Mr. McCann: It is common practice to transfer the files to where the taxpayer is at the end of the tax year.

Mrs. Fairclough: Provided that he lets you know where he is?

Mr. McCann: Yes.

Mrs. Fairclough: What I mean is this. Is there any pooling of these slips?

Mr. McCann: Pooling of the knowledge?

Mrs. Fairclough: Yes. Any one of the district offices is bound to have at the end of the year a number of slips for taxpayers for a portion of the year, where it is obvious that either the man has had some other employment because he has not worked a full year in that place or he has moved to another place. Is there any check-up on those slips? Is there any attempt to bring them together in a central place to determine whether or not the taxpayer has moved around from place to place?

Mr. McCann: Yes; and more particularly if a request is made for a refund. If a taxpayer makes a return and he states that he worked in Toronto for three months, and has worked in Ottawa and then moved to Montreal, they are brought to one central office from which his assessment will be made.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mrs. Fairclough: But only if he requests it himself or makes a return?

Mr. McCann: Yes, I think that is correct. We have different methods of attempting to trace him and we do it through the office that is most convenient to him, which would likely be the office in the district in which he was working or employed at the end of the year.

Mrs. Fairclough: I know that at the time claims were being made for refunds of compulsory savings, in some cases it was extremely difficult to trace the matter back through the district offices. Sometimes a taxpayer had forgotten just where he was in a certain year. I had two or three cases in which it was very difficult to trace the matter back. It led me to believe that they did not forward these slips to a central spot. Incidentally, now that I have mentioned the matter of compulsory savings, may I ask whether there is still an amount which has not been returned?

Mr. Knowles: Nearly three million dollars.

Mrs. Fairclough: If so, how much is it?

Mr. McCann: Yes, there is. In reply to the previous question asked by my hon. friend, may I say that our biggest problem is with women who change their names. They get married, and it is hard to locate them when they have changed both their name and their address.

With reference to the refundable compulsory war savings, $515 million was collected. The number of taxpayers who participated was 4,222,000. The number of cheques yet on deposit are 63,000. Of the $515 million we have repaid $512 million. It therefore leaves a balance of $2,922,481, which is deposited in the consolidated revenue fund. When people make application and give proof, the cheques are immediately issued.

Mrs. Fairclough: Are claims still coming in?

Mr. McCann: Through the press, through radio, television and every other medium we can use, we try to indicate to the people that these cheques are available to them and are on deposit. You will read every year, though I have nothing to do with it at all, about unclaimed deposits in banks. You wonder why people, if they are alive, do not take an interest in the matter and make a request for the payment of that money. The same thing obtains in this department. People seem to get very careless about small amounts of money unless they need it very badly. They do not take the pains to make a request for it. We have used every method we can to try to locate them.

Mrs. Fairclough: Have the requests for these refunds practically ceased or do you still get them? Do you get them in any quantity?

Mr. McCann: We get a few every month. This number of 63,000 has been brought down very considerably in the last few years.

Mrs. Fairclough: That is 63,000 refunds?

Mr. McCann: That is the number of cheques on deposit, and the 63,000 cheques divided into the $3 million would give about $50 each.

Taxation division—

290. District offices, $24,835,694.

Mr. Dinsdale: I should like to ask the minister a question on item 290, concerning the possibility of establishing an income tax office in the city of Brandon. I asked him this question on the orders of the day and he told me to be patient and wait until the estimates came along. The reason I bring the matter up at this time is that, as the minister knows, a new public building is under way in Brandon and it would provide ample office space. This city is the heart of the agricultural area of Manitoba. I know from personal experience that people communicate with me constantly for information concerning income tax problems. In every case we have to make a pilgrimage to Winnipeg to obtain that information. We do not mind going to Winnipeg, but we would much rather stay in Brandon if it were possible.

During the month just preceding the final date for filing income tax returns there are two officials who come out and establish themselves in the lobby of the post office. They provide a very worth-while service. It is the feeling that if that service could be spread over the 12 months it would be much more useful.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, I can well understand the hon. gentleman's desire to have a public office in his community. It adds a little to his prestige, but do not forget these things cost quite a bit of money. It costs about three times as much to collect $100 in a small office like Brandon as it would in a larger office. Our average rate for collecting money is about 87 cents per hundred dollars. We know, from the experience we had with one small office in the west at Prince Albert, that it costs between $3 and $4 to collect $100 in these small offices. We have to take into consideration the costs. We believe we can do the work more efficiently in the city of Winnipeg than we could if we had three or four offices.

We have difficulty in getting assessors of the right type. In order to man an office in Brandon we would have to have corporation assessors, individual income tax assessors and a full staff even in that smaller office. It is for that reason we have concentrated our offices in the larger cities and in places where we believe the best service can be given. The hon. member will criticize me for that statement when I tell him that we are establishing an office in Penticton. It is a long way from Vancouver, with difficult transportation facilities and all the rest of it. But I will give you a very frank answer. I think Brandon can be equally well served by Winnipeg and at much less cost than if we had an office in your city. I can conclude by saying we are not putting an office in Brandon at this particular time.

Mr. Dinsdale: With regard to the question of cost, it might mean a slight additional expense to the department; but I should like to point out to the minister that it also represents a considerable cost to the farmers who have to go all the way to Winnipeg to settle any income tax problems they might have. I was not thinking in terms of an office staffed with complete income tax assessing facilities. If there could be some service established, particularly for the farmers, I think the purpose would be served, because western Manitoba is an agricultural region and Brandon is the urban centre for that agricultural region. I think if the service were designed particularly for the farm population it would not be too costly and it would certainly save the farmers a lot of expense and inconvenience. It would avoid this rush of people climbing over one another, as I have seen them, in the post office lobby when the two assessors come out for a few weeks prior to the final date of filing.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

179. Departmental administration, $702,905.

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words before this item is dealt with. First of all I should like to say how much I appreciate the fact that the committee on estimates has had a chance to review the estimates of the Department of Labour proper, and has completed that task. I am sure that the discussion there has been valuable. I should like to pay tribute to the keen interest, to the fair appraisal and the helpful discussions that took place with reference to items 179 to 195 inclusive. This afternoon those items were referred back to the committee of supply. Those items include matters related to the Department of Labour as distinct from the unemployment insurance commission. The items covering the unemployment insurance commission are two, namely 196 and 197.

The committee on estimates considered that those two items I have just mentioned might stand before that committee for the present time. It was felt that discussion of those two items, either in the estimates committee or the committee of supply, would be perhaps somewhat unrealistic without knowledge of the government's policy regarding any changes in section 45 (2) of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

I made it clear to the committee on estimates this morning that at this moment I was not in a position to give details on this matter because the commission itself, the actuaries and the unemployment insurance advisory committee have not yet quite finished their analysis of the effect of possible amendments. I undertook to have this work pressed forward to a conclusion as rapidly as possible. At today's sitting of the estimates committee it was agreed that we might proceed this day, if there were time, with the items starting at 179.

Now, arising out of the earlier discussions in the committee on estimates, very interesting discussions were held on the question of professional and technical manpower. At that time it was pointed out that many of the factors relating to that very interesting topic had to do with the unemployment insurance commission, the dominion bureau of statistics, the department of immigration and other government agencies, and I undertook to get together as much information as could be obtained at this time on so important a matter. I have done that. I could not dispose of it in the six minutes that remain. I am in your hands, sir, as to whether to proceed with it at a later sitting or not.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the minister moving that we rise and report progress?

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, in the circumstances I assume the committee ought to rise and report progress.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed that I rise and report the resolutions, report progress on others and ask for leave to sit again?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

Mr. Knowles: Should not one of the resolutions have been reported as amended?

Mr. Harris: Yes.

The Deputy Chairman: I think the hon. member will find that money resolutions amended in committee are regarded as having originated in the committee and are not reported as amended.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Tomorrow we shall take the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare and then the resolution in the name of the Minister of National Health and Welfare with respect to certain payments on relief.

I move that the house do now adjourn.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 9.55 p.m.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

Taxation division—

289. General administration, $2,702,629.

On motion of Mr. Harris item reduced by $50,000.

290. District offices, $24,835,694.

Income tax appeal board—

291. Administration expenses, $80,580.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, June 15, 1956

The house met at eleven o'clock.

ORDER OF BUSINESS FOR TODAY

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Apparently I was under a misapprehension as to the wishes of the house last night with respect to today's business. We shall take labour estimates first, then national health and welfare.

EXCISE TAX ACT—INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENTS THIS SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the Minister of Finance whether it is his intention to proceed with the resolutions respecting amendments to the Excise Tax Act in the committee of ways and means and, if so, when?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): I shall be proceeding with the resolution, but I think that next week's work has already been outlined, and it certainly will not be until the week after next.

Mr. Fleming: Is the government going to proceed with all the resolutions of which the minister gave notice in his budget address on March 20?

Mr. Harris: I suppose that is one of those things I will announce when we reach the resolution stage.

Mr. Fleming: Can the minister make any announcement about the proposed 20 per cent tax on advertising matter in magazines?

Mr. Harris: I have made no announcement and would not do so until that time, sir.

ATOMIC ENERGY

INQUIRY REGARDING EXCHANGE OF INFORMATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): May I direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce? Press dispatches today report an agreement having been reached between the United Kingdom and the United States for the exchange of information on atomic energy developments. I should like to know whether or not Canada is to get all this information which is now being made available to the United Kingdom, in view of the fact that historically the three nations have been working together.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Canada was the first to sign an agreement with the United States for the exchange of atomic energy information. Whether the agreement with Canada covers all phases of the atomic situation that may be covered by an agreement with the United Kingdom, I will have to explore, but it is my impression that Canada signed an agreement some months ago which is parallel to the agreement recently signed between the United States and the United Kingdom.

Mr. Green: Perhaps the minister could let the house know on Monday what the situation is.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes, I shall be glad to inquire and get a more complete statement for Monday.

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REPORTED RADIOACTIVE RAINFALL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Under whose authority were Canadian citizens in British Columbia recently subjected to radioactive rainfall, and what measures is the government proposing to take to ensure that Canadians will never again be subjected to that sort of thing?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) is an expert on atomic rainfall. I was not aware that any part of Canada has been exposed to it, but I am sure that my colleague would be glad to make a statement.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am sure my hon. friend will find comfort in the statement that I made yesterday. I suggest that he look at it and reflect on it.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether he could answer my question. Under whose authority were Canadian citizens subjected to this rainfall, and what steps is the government taking to ensure that it will not happen again?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, perhaps after my hon. friend has read what I said yesterday, he and I can talk about the matter further, and he can give consideration as to whether he wishes to pursue the question.

NATURAL RESOURCES

OIL—REPORTED SURVEY INDICATING 90 PER CENT FOREIGN CONTROL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that a so-called confidential federal survey indicating control of Canada's oil industry as being 90 per cent foreign is referred to in the press, may I ask the minister if that survey or that document is not something which should now be tabled?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I know of no survey other than the survey of industry conducted by the bureau of statistics, and I have seen no publication bearing directly on the oil industry. I will make inquiries and if there is any such document I will, of course, be glad to table it.

Mr. Knowles: Is the minister in a position to confirm the statement made, which is based on a federal survey, that Canada's oil industry is controlled outside of Canada to the extent of 90 per cent?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No, Mr. Speaker, I am not. I would say that 90 per cent is very much too high, but I will be glad to look into the matter. In any case, our oil industry is not controlled outside of Canada. It may be owned outside of Canada but it is not controlled outside of Canada.

GRAIN

WHEAT—BOX CARS, QUOTAS AND MARKETING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. What plans has he under way in order to assure that a larger number of freight cars for the transport of wheat will be made available? Also, what is the hope of the quotas being increased, particularly the low figure quotas, and what is the general attitude of the minister toward action being taken to ensure that the largest possible portion of the wheat in storage on farms will be marketed before the new crop year?

[Mr. Regier.]

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was good enough to give notice of his question. Deliveries of wheat by producers to date this present crop year are well ahead of the same period a year ago. Up to June 14 wheat deliveries amounted to 248 million bushels against 218 million bushels in the same period a year ago. Deliveries of all grains are 12 million bushels ahead of the comparable period of the last crop year. As at June 15, all points have a 3-bushel delivery quota or better. One hundred and six points are at 3 bushels, 538 at 4 bushels, 509 at 5 bushels, 741 at 6 bushels and 168 at 7 bushels.

The Canadian wheat board is endeavouring to achieve as great a degree of equality as possible before the end of the current crop year. At the same time, the board must give preference to those grades and kinds of grain which have been sold for export or for which there is active demand. I might mention that exports of wheat and flour from August 1, 1955, to June 6, 1956, are 244 million bushels as against 215 million in the same period a year ago, an increase of 29 million bushels. Although later official figures are not yet available, I would think that as of today Canada has exported as much wheat and flour this crop year as during the whole of the crop year 1954-55.

There has been particularly heavy demand for grades of wheat No. 4 northern and lower and for malting barley. This has been one of the reasons for the differences in quotas at country points. I am hopeful, however, that before the end of the crop year most of the lower quota points will have been raised substantially. Certainly that will be the aim of the Canadian wheat board, the transport controller and the railways.

I may say that in my years of association with the wheat business I have never seen wheat moving at the rate that it is moving today. We have ocean boats waiting at all ports. Churchill will be opening shortly for a record movement already booked. Loadings in the country are running around 2,200 cars a day, and from now until the end of the crop year every effort will be directed toward levelling up the deliveries at country points. It may not be possible to do that completely. Points where there is a predominance of No. 3 northern grade are difficult to handle because No. 3 northern is the one grade that is not moving freely into export. Nevertheless, we will endeavour to find a place for that No. 3 northern so that deliveries can be brought up to correspond with those at points that have a free movement.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to ask an additional question in view of what the minister said. He said that all areas of the 3-bushel quota, as of June 15, have been filled. That must have been in the last couple of days. What is the hope of increasing those 3-bushel quota areas, particularly where No. 3 northern wheat is located, as it is extremely difficult for the farmer to get credit in those areas? Is there not something that could be done to increase the quotas in areas producing that grade?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): As I said, Mr. Speaker, we are now finding a place for that No. 3 northern wheat in eastern storage and it is the intention to concentrate on the low quota points in an endeavour to balance them out. However, I may say that the advisory committee to the wheat board has agreed with the wheat board's viewpoint that the total movement from the ports should not be jeopardized by moving forward wheat that is not in demand, if there is any possibility that by doing so the export movement would be slowed down.

WHEAT—INCREASED BREAD PRICES DUE TO ALLEGED SHORTAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. E. Cardiff (Huron): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It has to do with an article that appeared in the London Free Press of yesterday. The heading is "Bread Prices up Penny, Blame Wheat Shortage". In my opinion this is a misleading statement for the purpose of unnecessarily increasing the cost of living index. Has the minister anything to say about it?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I am sorry but I did not hear the first part of the question. Would my hon. friend read the statement again?

Mr. Cardiff: The heading is "Bread Prices up Penny, Blame Wheat Shortage".

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, there is no possibility of any wheat shortage causing an increase in the price of bread. The price of wheat has not varied and the supplies are ample. I am sure there is no wheat shortage in any area in Canada.

HOUSING

ALLEGED SCARCITY OF MORTGAGE FUNDS IN METROPOLITAN AREAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to two cabinet ministers.

An hon. Member: Is one not enough?

Mr. Nesbitt: You need two to answer this one. I refer to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) or in his absence whoever is acting in his behalf. What does the government intend to do to alleviate the serious and extreme shortage of mortgage funds available for the construction of new homes? I ask this question, Mr. Speaker, because this morning I received 18 telegrams from various groups and individuals in my city. They are very much concerned lest this lack of mortgage funds cause unemployment and a shortage of badly needed low-cost new homes.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Public Works I think all I ought to say is that he will be back here this afternoon and that I will draw my hon. friend's question to his attention. I should add, however, I have not received any copies of the telegrams he has received, and if he would give us the gist of them we would look into it.

Mr. Nesbitt: I would be delighted to send the 18 telegrams over to the minister.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF NEW SUCCESSION DUTIES ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): On May 21, 1956 at page 4114 of Hansard the Minister of Finance, in reply to a question I asked as to whether the government intended to introduce the new succession duties act for this session, said:

> I am hopeful that we can introduce a new succession duties act, but it would depend on the length of the session whether we can pass it at this time.

Can the minister indicate whether the bill is to be introduced, if so when, and whether the intention of the government is simply to introduce it and not to ask the house to proceed with it at this session?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): The bill is almost ready for consultation with my colleagues. I would expect that we could have that done within the next couple of weeks. I would doubt very much if we could pass the bill at this session.

Mr. Fleming: I take it the minister has in mind that it is the kind of bill which should be brought in and considered carefully by the public before it is proceeded with.

Mr. Harris: I would think so.

Inquiries of the Ministry

FREIGHT RATES

REPORTED INTERIM INCREASE—INQUIRY AS TO ACTION OF GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the unprecedented action of the board of transport commissioners in providing for an interim increase in freight rates even before the evidence was heard, what action, if any, does the government intend to take at the present session to meet the detrimental effects of this increase on Canada's trade, and in particular on the Canadian farmers who will not be able to pass on any portion of the increase in freight rates that is being made? The result of this will be that the farmers in general will suffer a further reduction in net income.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the board of transport commissioners is a judicial board. As my hon. friend knows, the government has no jurisdiction over its decisions. Personally, I have not seen a definite announcement of the judgment of the board granting an increase, although I did read a press story to the effect that the board intended to grant an increase. If any action of the government is indicated as a result of the action of the board, the government will consider the matter and take the appropriate action.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Has the government any immediate intention of taking action to meet the situation or has it been considered at all?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Until the judgment is in the hands of the government, the government is hardly in a position to consider such decision as the board may announce in due course.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the minister if he is not aware that although the board has not given judgment they have awarded an interim increase—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Of how much?

Mr. Fulton: I think it is 15 per cent.

Mr. Green: It is 10 per cent.

Mr. Fulton: In any event, whatever the increase, they have awarded an increase and the hearings will be held later. I think it is that point to which my hon. friend's question is directed.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): My friend has stated the board has awarded an increase. I am not aware of that, and I doubt the accuracy of my hon. friend's statement. Certainly, I doubt the accuracy of his statement that the award has been a 15 per cent increase but I will be glad to look into the matter.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When the minister says it is a judicial board, does it not strike him as strange that a judicial body would be providing an as yet undetermined increase before any evidence was heard? Does that not strike him as a strange action?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I have been brought up not to comment on the actions of judicial bodies.

Mr. Rowe: You are getting a little better all the time.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—DATE OF CONFERENCE WITH PREMIER OF BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): May I ask the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources whether or not a definite date has been set for his conference with the premier of British Columbia concerning the Columbia river and other questions of a similar nature?

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Yes, Mr. Speaker, July 4 at Victoria.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

INQUIRY AS TO REMOVAL OF TUNICS IN HOT WEATHER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): In the absence of the Minister of Justice, may I be permitted to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce? I am wondering whether it would be possible to ask the officers of the R.C.M.P. who are working in front of the parliament buildings in the torrid weather we have been having in the last few days, and which I am sure has reached 110 degrees above zero, to take off their tunics for a period, because I was really sorry to see them in the sun yesterday?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to call my hon. friend's comments to the attention of the commissioner of the mounted police, but I doubt whether anything can induce a Royal Canadian Mounted policeman on parliament hill to appear without his tunic.

COMMITTEE ON ESTIMATES

REQUEST FOR REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance in his capacity as house leader. In view of the fact that the estimates committee is just about out of work except for one item that is standing, will the government consider referring the estimates of the Department of National Defence to that committee?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to give consideration to what the hon. member has said.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

179. Departmental administration, $702,905.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Chairman, when the house rose last night I had just given a very short report from the estimates committee, and in the course of that I had said that early in the discussions of the estimates committee there had been a good deal said about the matters of professional and technical manpower. Since those are questions that come under a number of items, not only in my estimates but in others, I undertook before the estimates committee to provide at a later date some information on those topics. With your permission, sir, I would like to do so now.

I want first to speak about some of the steps we have been taking with regard to professional manpower and later with respect to other types of skilled workers and technicians who are non-professionals.

Although the training of manpower is essentially an educational matter and hence is the responsibility of provincial governments, the federal government is actively concerned with our resources of skilled manpower because they are vital to Canada's whole future economic development, and also because there is a need for national studies and analyses which are of value to the whole country.

Among the Department of Labour's activities directly related to professional manpower in Canada are: one, the provision of some financial aid to those at universities; two, continuing assistance to professional workers in finding employment and to employers in securing professional workers; three, the provision of information about careers in many professional fields; and, four, regular studies of requirements for and supplies of professional workers, and the accumulation of a wide range of detailed information about professional manpower resources in Canada.

First of all, financial aid: Financial assistance to university students has taken two forms. The Canadian vocational training agreements with the provinces provide for sharing with the provinces on a fifty-fifty basis expenditures on bursaries to worthy and needy students at universities.

The second type of financial assistance to people studying at universities takes the form of grants made for specific research purposes. For several years, my department has been stimulating research in the universities on important labour problems by making financial grants to senior graduate students and staff members.

Second, placement of professional workers: The executive and professional division of the national employment service has the day-to-day responsibility of helping professional workers find suitable jobs and of assisting employers to secure the kind of people required for professional work. In addition to bringing together workers and employers in the same locality, these activities include scouring the country for certain types of professional people in scarce supply and, in some cases, recruiting such workers overseas. The national employment service also makes special efforts each year to help university graduates find continuing employment and to help undergraduate students secure jobs during the summer months.

Third, guidance information: The Department of Labour provides information to help youth make a wise career choice, and which also assists guidance and counselling people. This information includes both monographs and filmstrips on many professional and other occupations.

Fourth, requirements for professional manpower: Every two years, the economics and research branch, in co-operation with the executive and professional division of the national employment service, surveys the major employers of professional people to find out their requirements for such workers during the next three years, and to obtain other information about the demand for these workers. The 1956 survey, which has been enlarged to cover provincial and federal government agencies and universities, is at present under way.

A longer run forecast of requirements has to be based on a general assessment of the growth of the Canadian economy. Such an assessment is now being made by the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects and, as was mentioned by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) the other day, the Department of Labour is preparing for this commission a study of Canada's resources of professional and skilled manpower and the long-run outlook for them.

In connection with the study of professional manpower, one of the most important activities of the department is that of maintaining in a systematic way detailed information on such items as education, experience and occupations, of the majority of Canada's engineers and scientists. Similar information is being maintained on doctors and other key health personnel by the Department of National Health and Welfare.

These data are the only comprehensive sources in Canada of information on the characteristics of our manpower resources in natural science, engineering and health personnel. It should be pointed out that this information is obtained on a voluntary basis. Not everyone replies to the inquiries made, although a high proportion does so. Under conditions of emergency, such information would be highly valuable and could be extended as needed very quickly.

I should mention that there exists also information about the number of people being trained each year in various professional fields. The dominion bureau of statistics publishes data on university enrolments and graduations each year by professional field, while the Department of Citizenship and Immigration provides figures on the immigration of professional workers. There also is information on the number of professional workers emigrating to the United States, and this is by far the largest part of all emigration from Canada.

I have referred to various sources of information about our professional manpower resources. We are regularly using this information as a basis for analyses and studies. Most of this material is published in a quarterly technical personnel bulletin prepared in the economics and research branch. Over recent years this bulletin has contained special studies of the important engineering groups, physicists and mathematicians, geologists, and of the employment experience of several of the recent science and engineering graduating classes.

The Department of Labour recently convened an advisory committee on professional manpower to serve as a medium for the exchange of ideas and opinions about scientific and other professional manpower in Canada, and to act as a consultative body to assist the department in its work in this field. Representatives on the committee came from a number of professional associations, and from government departments and agencies interested in professional manpower problems.

I do not want to leave the impression with you that we know all the answers about professional manpower. Some of my earlier remarks have indicated we do not. What we are trying to do is to use our resources in the department in ways that will pay the greatest dividends towards increasing our knowledge about Canada's resources or professional manpower. There are many problems which should be examined, and this is being done.

I have here a number of tables and charts, not very long, which give statistics. Perhaps I might outline them and thereafter ask for permission to have them printed in connection with my statement. They are as follows. Table No. 1 shows immigration to Canada in professional occupations during recent years. Table No. 2 shows the new supplies of professional persons from that immigration and from graduations over the past four years. Table No. 3 gives the same for engineers. Chart No. 1 is on the new supply of professional personnel from 1946 to 1953. Chart No. 2 is on the growth in selected professional occupations from 1931 to 1951. Finally, chart No. 3 gives a comparison of the degree of shortage and graduations of engineers from 1947 to 1955.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there unanimous consent that these tables and charts be printed in Hansard.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gregg: The tables and charts follow:

COMPARISON OF THE DEGREE OF SHORTAGE AND GRADUATIONS OF ENGINEERS
CANADA, 1947 - 1955

(1) The degree of shortage has been calculated from N.E.S. data. The figure of employers registering vacancies is presented as a percentage of the number of persons applying for work. 100% represents a situation in which vacancies are exactly equal to registrations. If vacancies exceed registrations this percentage exceeds 100.

What I have been talking about so far has been related in the main to Canada's professional manpower. I would now like to make some comment about a broad study of Canada's requirements for non-professional skilled tradesmen and technicians in relation to future supplies. Apart from the importance of professional workers, adequate supplies of skilled and technical manpower are fundamental to the healthy development of a dynamic and progressive economy such as ours.

The productivity of industry and our competitive position in world trade depend very heavily on the skills of our labour force and on their adaptability in the light of changing technological requirements. In addition, over the next decade, many more young Canadians will be coming forward for training than has been the case over the past decade, owing to the rapidly rising birth rates of the early forties. It is also possible that Canada will not be as successful in securing skilled immigrant workers over the next few years as we have been in recent years.

All these reasons strongly suggest that increasing emphasis should be placed on the training of skilled tradesmen and technicians if our resources of skilled manpower are to meet the technological challenge of today's world. A program of research had been developed to throw light on these problems with a view to providing reliable information to assist management, labour, government agencies and educational authorities in reviewing and assessing the policies and actions which might best be taken in this important field.

Present and future skilled manpower training needs have been under consideration at recent meetings of the national vocational training advisory council. At its last meeting, the council requested that a study of this kind be undertaken as soon as possible by the federal Department of Labour in co-operation with the appropriate provincial departments and other interested agencies. This request was subsequently endorsed very strongly by the national apprenticeship advisory committee.

This research program will, of course, be centred on vocational and technical training as distinct from general education. It is recognized, however, that technical training must be built on the basis of a sound general education.

This research program might be described in terms of a three-pronged attack on the problem of vocational and technical training. The first part of the program is a project designed to evaluate industrial requirements for skilled and technical workers as they are being affected by the rapidly changing technology of industry in several important industrial groups.

As we are all aware, the pace of technological development is being stepped up very rapidly in this country and other industrial nations and, for this reason, its effect on training requirements for skilled and technical workers will become of increasing importance. Through interviews with key personnel in selected industrial plants, associations and unions and in other ways, an examination will be made of the relationship between technological change and requirements for skilled workers. Highly competent engineers on the staff of two of our leading universities are assisting in this part of the research program.

The second phase of the program is designed to secure information on typical ways in which skilled workers acquire their competence. This is important in assessing the adequacy of present methods of acquiring skills. In this phase of the work, experienced social scientists from university staffs are assisting in interviewing electronic technicians, tool and die makers and other selected occupational groups.

The third phase of the research program is designed to evaluate our existing resources for training skilled workers and technicians in public institutions, in private trade schools, and in industry. This will involve a review of physical facilities, staff resources, enrolments and graduations, the content of typical vocational courses and plans for future expansion.

When put together with the information from the other two projects, it will help in making an assessment of the adequacy of our training facilities in the light of future requirements and future technological developments.

This part of the project is being undertaken in co-operation with the appropriate provincial departments involved, with industries, unions and other groups having responsibilities for the training of skilled workers.

I am sure that hon. members will appreciate that this sort of study cannot be completed quickly. We hope, however, as the facts come in, that we shall be able to put together a picture of our resources for vocational training in Canada and a picture of the probable requirements for skilled and technical workers. This will enable governments, industries and other groups having responsibilities in the training field to evaluate their training programs in the light of changing conditions.

Mrs. Fairclough: I had not intended to deal at the outset with the matter just raised by the minister in this statement which he has given to us. But, inasmuch as it is fresh in our minds now, it might be appropriate to say a few words on that particular point. When we were in the committee we spent a considerable length of time trying to secure from the minister's department some information on this most important subject. I think that without exception the members of the committee felt frustrated in those attempts. Certainly it did appear that, despite the best efforts of the department—and I must say now that I think an excellent job is being done by the economics and research branch—obviously they did not have at their command at that time the information which was sought by the committee.

Mr. Gregg: May I just interject something?

Mrs. Fairclough: Yes.

Mr. Gregg: Because of the fact, as was evident in my statement this morning, that a great deal of it had to come from other sources that were not available on that particular day.

Mrs. Fairclough: That is just the point. I hope the branch now has the direction it needed to secure such information, because I must say I felt that the officers of that department had been handicapped in their efforts to secure information. Now, with the statement that the minister has made this morning, we have before us information we did not have previously.

I suppose there is nothing in our whole picture that causes us such grave concern as does the prospect of insufficient numbers of engineers, and other professional people and of skilled workers, and I am sure I do not know how we are going to keep in step with the changing economic picture unless we have these people.

Referring to the difficulty that we had in the committee, I think it is fair to say that the description of one of the reporters seemed particularly apt when he said it was like trying to nail a jelly to the wall. We certainly had a difficult time trying to procure the information we wanted. I am pleased at least some of that information will be before us in the report the minister has read to us today. Certain it is that the shortage of engineers in particular could seriously affect the Canadian economy, and I do not think that even now we know what we are likely to need. I do not think that the report the minister has given us this morning necessarily gives us that information. There was quite a bit of generalization in it, and while he talked about increasing emphasis being placed on certain things and the technological challenges which face us, nevertheless it seemed to me there was quite a bit of generalization in the report, and I would hope that the research which he indicates is going forward at the present time would result in something more definite than we have so far procured.

I notice that the president of the engineering institute of Canada had something to say on this point just recently. He fears that the lag in the production of qualified engineers will be a serious threat to the Canadian economy. I see that one of the writers who covered the event felt, in commenting on Mr. Heartz' words, that he was quite correct in emphasizing that the lag we are faced with is particularly unfortunate when the nation's continued prosperity depends to such a large extent on its ability to produce trained manpower.

However, I am also reminded that the Prime Minister, in reply to questions in the house early in May, confessed, I believe, that the government had no plans for increasing the output of scientists, technicians and engineers. I should like to point out to the minister that in this position, if it is true that nothing is being done apart from assessing our present position and apart from trying to direct young people into channels after they have procured their education, it might be well to note that in this respect Canada lags far behind other countries. Certainly in a free economy we cannot force people into occupations and professions into which they do not wish to go, but it is a fact that proper planning and proper instruction could probably encourage a good many people to take advantage of educational facilities which they might not feel otherwise that they were able to take advantage of.

I should like to draw the minister's attention to a bulletin, which he probably has already seen, issued by the United Kingdom information service. The leading article in it describes the plan for technical education in the United Kingdom. The lead paragraph, which is set out almost as a subheading, has this to say:

> Britain is planning a big expansion in technical education which is to be put in hand immediately. In England and Wales it is proposed to increase by half the output of students from advanced forces at technical colleges and to double the number of those released by their employers for part-time courses during the day. It is proposed to spend £85 million on buildings and equipment during the next five years.

In the course of the article—and I may say this is along the line of the minister's remarks in his report—it points out that technologists must be adequately supported by large numbers of technicians and craftsmen, and goes on to say:

> . . . and the new plan will strengthen the base of this pyramid by improving education in all types of secondary schools and raising the number of school leavers able and willing to take courses at technical colleges.

All of this is in line with what the minister has reported to the house, but what I was particularly interested in with respect to this report from the United Kingdom was the action taken by the prime minister of that country and his words at a meeting of the parliamentary and scientific committee in London. At that time he appealed to both sides of industry, to management and to trade unions, to support the scheme and enable young men to have time off to study at technical colleges or universities. I should like to quote his closing words. Sir Anthony Eden said:

> It is not only that we cannot afford to lag behind with technical education, though that is true: it is not only a question of keeping up with research, though that is important; it is that countries which are now beginning to develop their industries are crying out for technical assistance. That is the further call to us. We must not fail to answer it and it means not so much machines as men. There is no one and no country who would not rather learn to help themselves than rely forever on help from others. They want the know-how. That is an item in the cold war.

We have in the past trained many young people and a great many of them have left this country. We have also procured from the United Kingdom and from the free nations on the continent skilled technicians and professional people who have been of value to us. But apparently even yet we have no knowledge, upon which we can depend for reasonable accuracy, of just what our requirements are, just how many of these people we have, just how many may be needed in the next few years, and all of this in an economy which is growing rapidly and the very nature of which is changing rapidly, an economy which has been described, by more than one person whose knowledge of affairs is extensive, as something in the nature of an industrial revolution.

Certain it is that many things that are strange to us now face us as a possibility or probability in the almost immediate future. So, Mr. Chairman, in the face of the demands which we may expect to be made upon us in the next few years I earnestly urge the minister to accelerate the endeavours being made by his department in co-operation with the provincial departments and through the committees which he has set up to inquire into these matters, and not to be satisfied with vague references and wordy reports but actually dig into the meat of the matter and come up with some sort of definite plan which he can present to parliament, even if it is a plan which is going to call for the expenditure of money, a plan which will produce greater and greater numbers of qualified professional people, technicians and skilled workers.

There are a number of things I should like to speak about in the course of the consideration of these estimates but some of them I shall leave for the appropriate items. There is one general observation I should like to make and I spoke of it briefly in the committee. From the answers received from officials of the department in the committee it seems to me that little or no consideration has been given to a decentralization of authority which could take over in the event of an emergency.

If perchance we should find ourselves in a difficult situation it will be too late to do anything about this. But certain it is that we have across this country a network of regional offices of the national employment service. The men who are in charge of those offices have now had extensive experience. They know their various localities. They know their local people. They work on the local committees. They are friendly with heads of industry and they are friendly with the members of the various unions and with the officers of the local trade councils. It therefore seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that there should be a very definite plan of action and that these persons in charge of districts should be instructed as to their responsibilities in the event of disaster and that they should be given the authority to confer with such persons as those in the civil defence organizations.

I do not mean that they should sit in with them in the plans which are being formulated at the present time. I mean that it should go beyond that. I mean that in the event that there should be no one to whom they could refer in the event that the person to whom they immediately report should be outside the sphere of communications by reason of breakdown of services or anything worse than that, I think they should have the authority to proceed without further reference to the department. I think this could be an extremely important point in the event of disaster striking this country. I urge the minister to consider this point seriously with a view to having every section of this country adequately manned by people who are willing and ready to spring into action at a moment's notice. I think it is important that this should be done. We all know that, particularly in the civil service, there is a setup which is admirable and by which each person reports to a superior. I very much fear that, in the event of a breakdown in those communications, the persons who are charged with the local responsibility of maintaining order and of providing for maintenance of services will find that they will run into a stumbling block with regard to the procurement of the assistance which they need and which could be provided through the local offices.

Mr. Chairman, I think there is just one more point that I wish to raise on this first item, and that is the matter of a complete overhaul of the labour code. This is not a new point. I have spoken about it before. It is now several years since we were told in committee that this was being proceeded with. The rapid change in our working conditions and the changes which we face in the years immediately ahead of us have contributed in part to the outmoding or outdating of much of our present labour code. In fact, I do not think I would be guilty of any exaggeration at all if I were to say that the conciliation procedures and so on are antiquated. I know that in a department which has operated smoothly for a great many years there is likely to be a tendency to shy away from change, particularly overall change. There is a great tendency to feel that everything is quite all right as it is because nothing very serious has happened. But, Mr. Chairman, the time to make sure that nothing happens is in the comparative calm and quiet of times of industrial peace.

I suggest that we have had our danger signs. One of these was the necessity which the government felt it was faced with—with which we did not agree—of imposing compulsory arbitration on the railways five or six years ago. That action has had its reflection on negotiations with railway employees ever since. I must say that it is my opinion that the successful conclusion of the recent negotiations was due in large measure to the excellent services which were rendered by the chairman. I might point out that that chairman is a highly qualified person who has had startling success in that field, and that he is not a member of the judiciary.

Despite the very casual way in which the minister has brushed off the suggestion that some of the existing unions may run into difficulties over their certification, I feel that it may very well happen that the minister will be faced with a whole rash of judicial actions which will prove without doubt that the board actually has no power to recognize a bargaining unit where the name has been changed. I greatly fear that result. I know the minister has repeatedly said that all is well and that this will not happen. I feel that this is one more place in which action should be taken immediately in order to make sure that these certifications will stand up.

With reference to the conciliation procedures which are currently in operation, may I say that I do not think there is any member of this house who does not recognize the fact that in many instances they are so prolonged that, instead of providing a cooling off period—as was said in the brief of the Trades and Labour Congress and the Canadian Congress of Labour to the Gordon commission—they frequently provide a heated-up situation which does little to help solve the dispute that is under consideration. Then, too, in those long periods of conciliation proceedings there arises at the time of settlement the grievous question of retroactivity of terms, and quite properly so because it is a fact that the worker feels that his advantage should extend back to the time when the contract was up for renegotiation. It is also difficult for the employer to make his concessions back to that date because in the meantime he has been carrying on business or supplying services under the old terms. Hence here you have a conflict of interests where you might say that both sides have a real point. Yet the whole matter could have been solved by a speeding up of the conciliation proceedings. I think that one thing that is needed is more effective conciliation board services. I must say that in some ways I agree with the brief to the commission which I previously mentioned, where it is pointed out that probably the best manner of accomplishing this would be to appoint qualified and highly paid officers who would be able to move immediately into the field and effect a settlement in the manner in which Mr. Taylor did just recently.

But I do not think these things can be done offhand. I believe the minister should take immediate steps to set up a select committee to investigate the position in which contracting parties find themselves today. I believe this committee should be composed of representatives from all those bodies who will be affected. There should be representatives from the labour congress, such representatives from management as may be appointed by their respective organizations, legal representatives, and such others as may be named by the minister, who have had long and successful experience in this field. In the last 50 years much has happened in this country in the field of labour negotiations. It is well to remember that where at one time a member of a labour union was considered to be one step above a criminal, today he is a highly respected member of his community.

A survey conducted by the economic research branch on January 1 of this year showed that in Canada today there are, it is estimated, 1,346,000 persons who are members of unions. That is too many people, Mr. Chairman, to brush off lightly. It is true that where a man is a recognized, responsible citizen in his community, who takes part in civic affairs and who is recognized by his employer as a valuable and conscientious worker, that man, as someone has said in a brief which I read recently, though I cannot remember which one, does not change overnight into an irresponsible individual. If he is goaded into actions which may appear to others in the country as irresponsible, then I think it would be well to examine why he was forced into that position.

I have seen a man whom I respected very highly, whom I had known for many years, whose word had been taken by his neighbours and his associates in church work and civic affairs as well as other fields of activities, who suddenly was placed in the position of being a striker because of conditions which he and his fellows found completely foreign to them. This man then found himself, along with others, criticized publicly in the press and by speakers as an irresponsible individual. I saw quite a number of men in that situation just a few years ago. When I read these remarks recently which I have just described, they struck home. It is true that people do not change their characteristics overnight. If they are responsible members of the community they do not suddenly become irresponsible because they feel that they must take action which may be deemed by others to be violent. In this particular case there was no violence at all involved. It was a very peaceful strike.

Now, Mr. Chairman, for all of these reasons I feel that action must be taken by the minister's department to bring up to date the provisions of the labour code, and in particular those provisions dealing with conciliation procedure. I ask him to take another look at it. I ask him to listen to the advice which I am sure must have been given to him by responsible members of the labour congress. If he has been led to believe in the past that what was good enough for people 15 or 20 years ago is good enough for people today, then I suggest he take another look and consider this matter very seriously. I ask that we have no more delay in actually coming to grips with a complete revision of the code. We have seen no evidence at all that anything has been done, despite the fact that almost yearly we have been told it was under consideration. I have other things I should like to bring up, Mr. Chairman, but I think I will be content to deal with them when the appropriate items come before us.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, the question posed by the minister in his statement is one with which I am not going to deal at length. The hon. member for Hamilton West stressed that question of the shortage of engineers. I would advise any member of this house who thinks there is a shortage of engineers to take a look at the St. Lawrence seaway project. Most of the development of that project is on the Canadian side. I was there last Wednesday and took a look at it from Iroquois falls down to the Lachine canal. This project was mapped out and is being constructed by Canadian engineers. It certainly dispels the illusion that has been created over the years that we have to go to the United States for know-how because I think there is a much better job being done on the Canadian side by Canadian engineers than is being done on the other side. They are doing something on our side and that is pouring cement in the winter time which apparently they cannot do on the other side as yet.

If we are short of engineers, we sure have a lot of them working on that project and they are doing an excellent job. I shall have more to say on that at some other time. I think this talk about the shortage of engineers and the shortage of scientists has been overworked. I do not think there is anybody in this country in a position to give you any facts on it as yet because I do not think there has been any study.

Mrs. Fairclough: That is the trouble.

Mr. Gillis: Why anticipate it; why go into the realm of prophecy; why talk about something that we do not know anything about? It has been overworked. Any project in this country that requires engineering skills today will find engineers in Canada to handle the job.

I am not going to deal with the national labour code. I was a member of the committee that set up the code. I know its limiting factors. I think one of them is the enforcement of the code. I have argued a good many times in the house and I introduced a bill into this house that was designed to take the enforcement of the code, in the matter of certification, violations, penalties and fines, out of the hands of the courts of the country. Labour relations do not belong in the criminal courts of Canada. The department has a lot of trained personnel. Just as the government enforces the Income Tax Act, the motor vehicles act and so on, a competent national labour board should function and the enforcement of the code should be in the hands of the labour board and not in the hands of the judiciary of this country. That is one of the things that are badly needed. I believe that if they were enforcing their code, handling the thing themselves, ultimately the limiting factors in the code today would disappear because I think they are largely matters of administration.

Then, there is the other point made by the hon. member for Hamilton West to the effect that in the event of an emergency the national employment offices should occupy the position of directors of safety in the different areas across Canada. That, of course, would mean that you would have to have national emergency powers. It was not popular in some sections of the house when we were arguing to retain it to meet the very things the hon. member for Hamilton West fears.

I was glad the minister decided to lay over any discussion of the Unemployment Insurance Act until he and his officials have had an opportunity of further studying the matter and making up their minds as to what might be done with respect to amendments, and then taking it back to the industrial relations committee, the committee which worked on the amendments to the act last year, for the purpose of further discussing it and finally bringing it back to the house and handling the matter here when there is nothing else in the way. That was a good decision. As a member of the committee I appreciate the fact that hon. members co-operated with the minister to the extent they have on this particular point.

There are many spots in the minister's department that we could be critical of, and we must be, but this department is doing a lot of good that is not generally known. I do not think the sending of the estimates to the estimates committee shortens the time or serves very much purpose except that it gives the members who are on the committee an opportunity to get a lot of information that they would not get were the estimates taken up in the house cold. I know the briefing we got in the committee from the minister's officials was valuable in so far as the members of the committee were concerned, and, of course, it is our job to pass on to the members of the house any information we receive.

There is one spot that I was rather critical of, and I still am, and that is the movement of workers in Canada from province to province. There are spots in this country where we have permanent unemployment which necessitates the movement of workers from that area to other parts of Canada. For example, there are men going from my own area to the logging industry in British Columbia. That is a long way from home. They are going as far from home as an immigrant who comes in here from Europe. The transportation of those people to British Columbia is not assisted in any way by the government, but immigrants who come here from Europe under the department of immigration can go to a hostel in Montreal and be housed there and maintained while the immigration department goes out and finds jobs for them. If they have to move to another part of Canada they are assisted in their passage and at the same time they are guaranteed medical coverage for the first year of residence in any province of Canada while they are in the country and go out to a job. My criticism is that if we can do that—and I am not objecting to it—for immigrants, the same principle should apply in the movement of workers from Cape Breton island to Vancouver, which is taking place, or to Steep Rock, where others are being sent. I am asking the minister and his cabinet colleagues to take a look at the question of assisted transportation for workers who are moving within Canada. Never forget that many of these people are ex-service men and many of them were previously employed and were taxpayers for a long time. Unfortunately, their employment has disappeared because they were working at mining which is a wasting resource. They find that although they had an investment in the community they had to move on. The least that can be done is for the government to assist them with transportation.

Mr. Gregg: Will my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. Gillis: Yes.

Mr. Gregg: Would he or would he not draw a distinction on the one hand between a large group of workers such as he has referred to moving out to work for the British Columbia lumbermen's association, perhaps hundreds or more, many of whom may come back, I would hope, and on the other hand a few people who are moving from a depressed area without any prospects of ever getting permanent work in that area and who are leaving the province for another part of Canada to settle and work and to make their homes there? I would like to have his views on that because in the latter case we do have some discretion, as he knows.

Mr. Gillis: No, I would not draw any distinction. When the British Columbia lumber industry comes down to Cape Breton island and takes a hundred men, as they have done recently, and moves that hundred men out to British Columbia, I think the government should give the same protection to that group of people that they give to the immigrants who come here from Europe. I believe their passage should be assisted. Under the circumstances that the minister and I know with respect to that particular movement, the extent to which the government chips in is that if someone dropped off en route and did not make his destination the government covers it. I still think that once this problem is nailed down and the cabinet understands it the minister will have no difficulty in selling the idea of assisted passage. Most of these people who go to that industry and to Steep Rock—there is a movement of possibly 200 people to Steep Rock—will remain. I do not think 1 per cent of these people will come back.

Mr. Herridge: Not from British Columbia, once they get there.

Mr. Gillis: It will be good for British Columbia, of course, if they stay. They will not come back because there is nothing to come back to; no new employment is being created in the area. I am going to leave it with the minister. I hope that the minister's colleague will consider this matter and amend the legislation.

As I said before, the department are doing many things which are beneficial but they are not known. Take vocational training for example. The officials of the department gave us an excellent brief on what is happening in that field. That brief was quite wide and comprehensive. It indicates that the legislation provides many opportunities for the provinces to do something with respect to training young people or retraining unemployed. I have in my hand the document with which we were supplied and it proved a real revelation to me. I try to keep track of all these things, but I did not know about much of the material in this document. It is a worth-while plan and hon. members of the committee should take a look at this kind of thing.

The minister is authorized to undertake and direct research work, to disseminate information in the field of vocational training. It is provided that the minister may enter into an agreement with a province for a given period to provide financial assistance up to an amount equal to that expended by the province. Many types of training are provided for. There is the training of supervisors in industry, rehabilitation training of disabled civilians, training to increase the skill and efficiency of workers in agriculture, forestry, mining, fishing and other primary industries, including homemaking.

The initiative in taking advantage of the legislation rests with the province. That is something which is not generally known. Many people will ask what the federal government is doing in connection with vocational training and they do not understand that the initiative must be taken by the province. Agreements must be entered into. In my judgment the legislation can do a good job of work in any province provided the province is willing to co-operate.

As the minister knows, a school was set up in North Sydney during the war for rehabilitation services. It did a good job and trained a total of over 3,000 people, many of whom are scattered across this country in responsible positions. The school was allowed to run down and the equipment was practically all moved out. A couple of years ago the minister and I began to talk about the rehabilitation of that school to re-train unemployed. That was done and the school has been in operation for the last two years.

When I was home last November I visited the school and it happened that 20 students were being graduated in diesel mechanics. They have a very good setup there to train diesel mechanics, about as good as you can find anywhere in the country. They have over $200,000 worth of diesel equipment on which the boys are working under a competent instructor. Every one of those 20 young boys who were being graduated was going to a job, many of them to the C.N.R. shops, to work on diesel equipment.

The supervisor of the school is a most capable person and recently I wrote to him to ask how things were going. He tells me he has a course in diesel mechanics, sheet metal, two classes of auto body mechanics, and courses in welding, carpentry and plumbing. He is teaching six different trades. The enrolment shows that approximately 24 per cent never worked before; 33·8 per cent are receiving further training in their chosen trades, while 42·2 per cent were unemployed and are being re-trained in other trades. The school can accommodate about 200 pupils and I understand there are about 80 enrolled at the present time.

These students are learning trades which are most essential today. The brief I have here indicates that the Department of Labour is conscious of the need of training in various trades. It is indicated that there is a shortage across the country in the skills which are being taught in this little school. In my judgment vocational training and trade training in these centres is most important.

Of course every section of the country wants a vocational high school which would come under the department of education of the particular province. While trade training is carried on the entrance qualifications are a little more difficult than in the case of the trade training centres. I hope to see a vocational high school on Cape Breton island before long, but the people I am chiefly concerned about at the moment are those who have been able to go only to the eighth or ninth grade and do not intend to go through a high school. A high percentage of boys and girls leave school after finishing the eighth, ninth or tenth grade. They are not interested in university training, either because they are mentally handicapped or because it is financially impossible for their parents to have them go any further. As I say, the department is doing an excellent job in connection with trade training, but I want to stress again that it is up to the province to take advantage of the federal legislation. The legislation is available to solve the problems which exist in that field.

There was another matter in connection with which we received a brief which was all information to me, and that is student's aid. I received many letters in this connection. A boy may finish high school and perhaps his first year in university and then find himself financially embarrassed. He wants to know where he can go to get a loan in order to finish university. I was not aware that the minister's department was able to supply an answer to that question until I sat in on this committee.

The mechanics are that a board is set up in each province which receives applications from students requiring loans. A student must be recommended either by his high school teacher or by a member of the faculty of the university to which he intends to go. But loans, grants and bursaries are available. With the legislation that exists and is being administered by the minister's department and other departments of the federal government, I do not think there is any need for any young person in this country who possesses the necessary capabilities to be denied a university education. I believe the machinery is there in the minister's department.

The first approach is to the local board in the province. I am putting all this on the record because I want this information to get out to the country where people may read and understand it and know exactly where to go. There have been many a young boy and girl who could have gone through university had they known about this legislation, but they did not. In my judgment the minister's department has the answer to getting a boy or girl through university, provided they know the proper approaches to make and the people to contact.

Another section with which I was very much impressed was the women's bureau.

[Mr. Gillis.]

For the first time in the committee we met the lady who administers the women's bureau and we were handed some literature. That bureau, in my judgment, is going to make a valuable contribution to the minister's department. The work that they are doing and the grasp that that woman has of her own particular section of the department in the short time it has been functioning were very encouraging, and, I might say, very complimentary to her. I hope that over the years that section will be built up and that more women will take part in studying labour relations, because it is a very important sector of our society, it is the wealth-producing end of our society, and women can play a very important part in it. I just want to compliment that lady for the job she is doing now in setting the mechanics for the future in that particular section of the minister's department.

Next I wish to say a few words about annuities. That, of course, is a very unpopular subject to some people outside the house. A few years ago the minister tried to amend the act and to write in a cash-surrender clause, which I think should have been written in, but with the barrage from coast to coast of pressure groups he retreated. I hope it is just a retreat and that he will organize and move forward at some time in the future. That is another branch that is not generally understood. The person who administers that department gave us a very good picture of what the annuities branch is doing, and I am going to put that on the record.

There are at present 64 full-time and 21 part-time annuity representatives located in 50 major centres from Halifax to Victoria. Overhead expenses, including the compensation of annuity representatives, are paid from general government funds. The proportion of expenditure to receipts is less than 2 per cent. That is not much to complain about.

The annuities branch consists of six divisions and is located in No. 5 temporary building, Carling avenue. These divisions are: group, actuarial, individual contracts, accounts, sales and administrative services and legal. There is a staff of 174. This is a reduction of 38 since 1949-50, even though there has been an increase in the volume of work. Contracts and certificates under administration are 100,000 more in number than in 1949-50, and there are 30,000 more cheques being sent out each month.

As of March 31, 1955, there were in force and under administration by the annuities branch 159,532 individual contracts and 190,129 certificates under 966 group contracts, a total of 349,661 contracts and certificates; payment of annuity is being made under 68,130 of these contracts and certificates. The annuities fund as at the end of March 1955 was $864,543,038, and the net receipts for the year were $68,594,250.

I just thought I would put those statistics on the record for the information of those who scream from time to time: "You should not be subsidizing these annuities." Well, there is not much of a subsidy, but the important thing to remember about the annuity is that it has been a yardstick for the insurance companies across this country over the years. It has at least kept them looking at their rates.

Another point I wish to make is this. The group insurance contracts that exist in industry all over this country are based on the actuarial work done in the annuities branch. Industry does not have the facilities to do that. That branch has done a very important job in setting those group contracts, and they are still farming them out.

I wanted to say that and to put those few statistics on the record, but I hope the minister will get around to writing in that cash surrender in the annuity. Mistakes have been made in taking in people, for example, veterans and civic employees. I am thinking of my own end of the country now. Many veterans established contracts under the annuities branch, and these veterans were taken in under protest. They said, "We do not have to go in; we have the protection of the War Veterans' Allowance Act." But they went in, and after one or two years the department finally permitted their release. They were released, but the money is still there for the two years when they paid in, and they cannot get it back under the present contract or under the present act. Many of these are young men who have since married and are building homes. They have a few hundred dollars that they would like to get out to use for building homes. I believe that is merely an administrative matter. I think that even under the present act, where there are extenuating circumstances such as that, the minister and the administrator of the act might be able to sit down and release the money that was tied up and that belongs to people who did not want to go in in the first place but were taken in by the town or city as the case might be. That is found right across the country, but it is a pertinent question in my own end of the country.

I notice that my time is just about to expire. Like the hon. member for Hamilton West, there are odds and ends that I have not dealt with yet, and I shall have to deal with them under the appropriate items.

Mr. Dinsdale: Could I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Gillis: Yes.

Mr. Dinsdale: I did not want to interrupt when he was dealing with the shortage of engineers, but is the member aware that our engineering schools have announced that there are jobs available for 1,500 more engineers than were able to graduate this year?

Mr. Gillis: I do not know, and I do not know how they know.

Mr. Dinsdale: The graduates are in demand.

Mr. Gillis: I do not think there are any data. I think everybody is guessing. I shall have to be shown some statistics. Universities are in business; taking in students and getting tuition fees is their business, and I do not blame them for looking for more students. We will not know until such time as there is some information available. I have talked to different government departments and tried to get statistics. We tried in the minister's department. There is no information. When we started to build the St. Lawrence seaway I heard the story that we would not be able to get enough engineers. There are 16 different contractors and there are all kinds of engineers. We are doing that job ourselves. Not one man came in from the United States. Actually our fellows are showing the Americans how to do it. The hon. member asked me if I knew. I do not know and I do not think anyone knows. The minister's department is going to make a study of it, but until the study is completed and we have the statistics we will not know. It is a hypothetical question at the present time.

Mr. Blair: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Gillis: Certainly.

Mr. Blair: Is he aware that the universities have had to increase their fees and that some of the universities are running these courses at a loss? They are practically all running them at a loss. The hon. member made the statement they were in business. I cannot agree with that. They are not in business, and they are running these courses at a loss.

Mr. Gillis: They are not running charitable institutions.

Mr. Blair: No, they are not.

Mr. Gillis: So they are in business.

Mr. Blair: Yes, but not for profit, not that type of business.

Mr. Gillis: I do not know anything about the question.

Mr. Blair: I know that some of these courses are run at a loss.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Chairman, I will let the hon. members argue between themselves whether or not the universities are in business. All I know is that they are doing a pretty good job of training men for the various professions for which they are responsible for the training. The hon. member for Cape Breton South said there were a lot of loose odds and ends that they would pick up eventually. I quite expect that will be so. These odds and ends, including the one we have been talking about, can be picked up during the discussion of the minister's estimates.

I am not going to deal with odds and ends. I am going to deal with what I think is something of fundamental and basic importance. I am going to deal with the matter in very broad terms. The minister is administering a very large department. We will have to vote altogether in the neighbourhood of $70 million to $75 million for his department this year. We know that labour plays a tremendously big part in the nation's business. It seems to me that the particular function of the minister's department is to see that labour and industry run as smoothly as possible and to make regulations here and regulations there in order to get out of labour and industry the very best that they can give to this nation's welfare.

I do not place myself in any position of severe criticism of the minister or his department. I will say, however, that generally speaking I think that industry and labour in Canada will run smoothly enough while industry is able to expand, while we have a time of comparatively full employment. I wonder though what may happen should the eventuality arise where industry ceases to expand. What then? Suppose industry ceases to expand by reason of a recession or depression. We do not like those words. We hold up our hands in holy horror as we think of that possibility but we must not put on the ostrich act and put our heads in the sand.

We here are not only responsible for the things that happen today. We are responsible for the things that may happen in the years to come, and we must legislate and discuss legislation on the basis of what is going to happen tomorrow. I do not look for any immediate depression. I am not going to appraise the future but I do believe that if a recession or depression should happen and industry fails to expand the country is going to be plunged into chaos.

My hon. friends who have preceded me have discussed the lack of engineers. I too do not know what the statistics are but I believe we have good reason to say that there is a lack of engineers. I am told that engineers are given positions by private industry long before they graduate from our universities. I know that for a fact. I am not discussing the statistical aspect of the question. However, I am going to say that, should industry come to the point where it does not expand, should there be a recession or a depression, then, notwithstanding what the hon. member for Brandon-Souris says about our lacking 1,500 engineers, you would be able to buy them for a dime a dozen.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Not that cheap, surely.

Mr. Hansell: Of course, that is a phrase.

Mr. Gillis: They were in the bread lines in the thirties.

Mr. Lennard: Anybody can make wisecracks but it is another question to back them up.

Mr. Hansell: Well, you give me a phrase to use. I will use your phrase.

Mr. Lennard: Oh no, I will not.

Mr. Hansell: I said a dime a dozen. Maybe they will not be that cheap. But I do know that if a major depression should overtake the country you will find that engineers and professional men as well as labour will be thrown upon the relief rolls of this country. I am not too much concerned about the phrase, "dime a dozen", but I am concerned about what might happen to the future of this country. We have all experienced the days of the hungry thirties. I experienced those days.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): May I make a suggestion to my hon. friend? Do not worry too much about the engineers. They do all right in good times and bad.

Mr. Hansell: I can assure the minister I am not worrying too much about them. I was only picking up the loose ends my hon. friends were talking about.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): There is also a shortage of clergymen, is there not?

Mr. Hansell: I am going to say to my hon. friend that some of us have experienced depressions. I experienced the depression, and although I was a clergyman in those days I will tell my hon. friends that I was on relief then. When I went to get my relief cheque every couple of weeks I stood in line with professional men. I do not know that there were any engineers in the line but there were one or two lawyers, and if lawyers cannot make a living in a depression I do not think anybody else can. Those are facts.

I am not talking about engineers or any particular profession. I am saying that everything is nice and rosy, everything goes along lovely as long as the country is going through a period of expansion, but as soon as that expansion ceases we are plunged into depression and chaos, and even the strong labour movements we have in our country cannot cope with that sort of situation. I would proffer this thought to the minister, whether he will agree with it or not. The labour movement have fought over the years for the position in which they find themselves today. That is well and good and I do not want them to lapse into any inferior position having regard to the position they are in today. In days of prosperity even the labour movements become stronger, if I might put it that way, and are able to accomplish for the working people of this country the thing that they are after; but as soon as depression comes, even labour movements begin to break at the seams and fall apart. That is something that I think even organized labour itself should take into account, and I think it should prepare itself for that possible eventuality.

Unless we get down to the basic and fundamental principles of our whole industrial system we are not going to solve what eventually might be a terrible problem that this country would have to face. I think that labour and management and government perhaps at all levels should take a new look at those basic principles which make our entire industrial system function. Several questions must be asked. There is no use in dealing with secondary things. If there is something basically wrong, you will not heal that basic ill by fooling around with secondary things that may appear to be wrong. We must ask ourselves some questions such as these: What is the purpose of industry anyway? Is the purpose of industry to give people jobs? As I have said before in this house, I say that the purpose of industry is to produce goods and services. I am not going to debate the pipe line but that, to my mind, is an advance in this country's expansion. If I had my way, we would have many pipe lines. If I had my way, we would have many trans-Canada highways. There is a great deal that we can do provided that the purpose of these things is recognized and provided that the basic principles are made to apply in order that we may serve that ultimate purpose.

What is the purpose of industry? Is it to give people jobs? We assert it is not. We assert that the purpose of industry is to produce goods and services that can be distributed to the people so that they can have a higher standard of living. What is the purpose of production? Is the purpose of production to give people jobs? No; the purpose of production is to produce in order that the nation may consume. What is the purpose of labour? Is it to make money? Is it to make a fast buck? Is it to increase salaries? The purpose of labour, of course, is so to fit into industry that they are able to produce the goods. That is the purpose of a job. But of course we have lapsed into a complex where we have become so money-conscious that we think the purpose of a job is to get money; that the purpose of industry is to get money; that the purpose of everything in the country is to get that dollar which is so hard to get. We might go a little bit further and we might say, "What do we want to get the dollar for?" That is the thing. We want to get the dollar because we believe it will buy something. What do we want to buy something for? Because in the ultimate conclusion the things that make for life and happiness are the things that we produce.

We have said over and over again that we are living under a dog-eat-dog system and that is why, in a system that is basically wrong, one class is pitted against another. A man once said to me, "If you do not beat this system, the system is going to beat you". So what do you have? You have a scrap. I do not like to refer to dogs because I might get into trouble by referring to them. However, the system works like six hungry dogs fighting over five bones. What is basically wrong? There is no use saying, "We will have to produce better dogs that are able to fight a little bit better" or "We will have to produce better bones". There is no use in talking along that line. We assert that is exactly what is wrong with the system. So all we say is, "That should be easily remedied; throw in an extra bone so that there are six bones for six dogs". But no; that is not the government policy.

Mr. Knowles: One dog might get the six bones. You still have the problem.

Mr. Hansell: Then you can put in a few more bones and let the other five dogs get six bones each. That is the thing. I only use that as an illustration. That which is basically wrong, according to our view, is that there is never enough money coming out of the process of this production to buy back your total production. That being so, you must go into debt, as the people have done today to the tune of consumer credit to something like $2¾ billion and then they find, of course, that there is a claim on their future wages so that they cannot buy future production. The result is that you have surpluses. The result is that you have starvation in the midst of plenty. Depression comes, with goods piled high and nobody working. That is the thing. How are we going to beat that situation?

I see that it is one o'clock, Mr. Chairman, and I will not go any further. I think that eventually it will be a case of either adopt Social Credit policies or go under. Of course eventually Social Credit policies will be adopted because eventually we are going to take over here some time or other. Then we will prove that you can have enough bones for enough dogs.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Hollingworth: I should like to say a few words this afternoon about part of the estimates that come under the minister concerning education. Some time earlier in the session I had the pleasure of introducing a resolution dealing with aid for needy university students, and I should like to take this opportunity of thanking all those in the different parts of the house who supported me that day. Today I want to speak more specifically about technical and scientific assistance.

I am not unmindful of the assistance that the federal government has already given in this sphere. For example, we all know that this year, 1955-56, the federal government has decided to give some $7·8 millions in unconditional grants to the universities in Canada. We also know that vocational training assistance in 1954 by the federal government amounted to $1,350,000. As I mentioned previously on another occasion, the house is also aware of the fact that student aid has been granted to students who wish to attend universities and who would not otherwise be able to attend because they have not the financial means.

I might say, Mr. Chairman, that a very good example of the lack of assistance was brought home to me once when I was coming to Ottawa one Sunday afternoon on the train. At that time there were some students from the collegiate institute at Oshawa who wanted to attend university next year. But upon questioning them I found that they did not have the means. Presumably they were both above average from an academic standpoint or they would not have been chosen to represent their schools at the Rotary convocation here in Ottawa. Neither one of these students knew where they were going to get the money. Apparently they had not heard about student aid. I think possibly that has not been publicized sufficiently, and I say that with respect. I think the government, in co-operation with the provincial departments of education, is doing an excellent job.

In dealing with this matter of education, of course, it is necessary to reiterate time and time again that education generally comes under the jurisdiction of, and within, the ambit of the different provincial governments. In other words, the British North America Act gives general education exclusively to the provinces and it is most important that the federal government do not impinge upon this general constitutional right. But, Mr. Chairman, there are certain specific fields in which the federal government can give assistance without impinging upon this jurisdiction, and that is one thing I should like to talk about this afternoon, namely vocational, technical and scientific aid. I would hope that the federal department of labour would endeavour to assist in this field to a greater extent. I think we all in this house appreciate the sympathetic consideration and the very great administrative ability the Minister of Labour has brought forward in this field. I for one, and I think most members of the house would agree, feel that once the fiscal arrangements have been developed between the provinces and the federal government this aid could be greatly extended. I think we would all welcome that time.

It is rather interesting that in this house today the question of the need for scientific personnel was brought up. In an editorial in last night's Toronto Star there was one paragraph that I should like to quote to the house. The Star was discussing the conscription issue raised by a Canadian general. I am not going to discuss that, Mr. Chairman, but I do want to quote this one paragraph, which I think is relevant. The Star said:

> What Canada desperately needs is more engineers, technicians, doctors, school teachers and other qualified professional people. The federal funds which General Simonds would spend on compulsory military service would be better employed helping Canadian educational institutions turn out graduates required for the development of this country—and the health and progress of its people.

I am quoting that because I think that that is the general opinion in this country, that we do need more trained personnel. I think it is important to trace the historical background of the development of our country if this basic premise is correct, and I submit it is. Canada has changed in the last 50 years from a predominantly agricultural economy to one which is concerned with the processing of raw materials and the development of products of the mines and the forests. In other words, it has been changing from an agricultural economy to a manufacturing economy with the tertiary industry of service. We have been changing our whole economy in this country, and of course agriculture in itself is becoming more specialized. It follows from that, Mr. Chairman, that we will be needing an increasing number of specialists in Canada. I am informed that in 1931 there were 420 engineering and science graduates; in 1952 there were 1,770; and in 1958, it is estimated, there will be 2,250. I am interested in the observation of my hon. friend from Brandon-Souris in which he claimed that 1,500 more engineers could receive positions if they were graduated this year. This seems to me to be reasonable and I would think that that conclusion would be correct, although I have no statistics to back it up.

It is interesting to compare those figures with the figures for the United States. In the 20 years from 1930 to 1950 there was an increase in United States engineers from 260,000 to 850,000, a growth rate of 227 per cent, whereas in the same period the population in the United States increased only 23 per cent. It is estimated that in Canada in 1975 there will be 16 million people over 14 years of age, and the non-farm labour force will be 7,500,000 as compared with the 4,600,000 now. We can, therefore, expect our requirements for professional workers to increase by more than 60 per cent over the next 20 years. Another reason for the increase in technical and scientific personnel will be seen in the growth of the country, the gross national output it might be called. In 1949 the gross national expenditure was about $16 billion; in 1955 it is estimated the gross national expenditure will exceed $21 billion. If one were to project this to 1975 it is estimated it would be $48 billion.

Again, we have the matter of technological changes. We all know what a tremendous impact on our country's growth the introduction of atomic energy has made. We are all aware of the vast and far-reaching effects of automation. New professions have come into being, such as town planning. For example, in my constituency of York Centre, where there is a tremendous housing and industrial development, town planning is very important, as is traffic control. Indeed when one picks up the Sunday edition of the New York Times one can see the demand for such specialized activities as designers of business machines; instrument engineers, semi-conductor engineers, telephone engineers, guided missile engineers, nuclear engineers, structures engineers, transistor applications specialists, and so on.

It is a very bewildering world, Mr. Chairman, and I submit it is going to become increasingly so the more science is advanced and the more technical knowledge is ascertained. Now, of course, the government does help out in this field. I have already mentioned vocational training. I think hon. members are aware of the scholarships of the national research council and the defence research board.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, a very important reason why we should train more technical men, more engineers and more scientists can be found in the struggle, shall I say, between the soviet orbit and the western world. The influential and authoritative British weekly, New Statesman and Nation, pointed out on Saturday, January 21, that there will be 4 million technical graduates turned out by the Soviet union in the next five years. As a matter of fact, Dr. Solandt, formerly chairman of the defence research board, now vice-president of the Canadian National Railways, put it this way in the fall of 1955:

> The present relative stability of the world depends upon a balance of defensive and offensive capabilities between east and west. This balance in turn depends upon the productivity of scientists and engineers in the two halves of the world. Since 1950 it has become increasingly obvious that, at least in certain selected lines of development, the Russians were actually overtaking the west. Recent attempts to find the explanation for this phenomenon suggest that it lies in the field of education. Because of this the output of scientists and engineers in the U.S.S.R. has overtaken and passed that of the U.S. and may soon exceed that of the major nations of the free world combined. The best evidence we have suggests that this increase in numbers has been achieved without any sacrifice in quality.

And now, Mr. Chairman, this statement shows more conclusively than anything else that unless we have an increase in the number of scientists and technicians in Canada and in the western world we may well lose the battle to totalitarianism in this field. Of course, I have not said anything about the humanities. It is interesting to note that the president of Du Pont of Canada Limited, I believe, was reported in the Montreal Gazette of yesterday morning as saying that it was a mistake to emphasize the engineering aspect too much; that we should also emphasize the humanities. I hope that nothing I have said today will be construed as implying that I wish to weigh the balance against the humanities. Probably it is desirable to stress the fact that in this world at the present time we need more engineers and more technicians, but we must not neglect the humanities, we must not neglect the arts. My plea would be for increased assistance both to scientists and to engineers and to those who are pursuing the humanities.

Just before one o'clock I heard one of my friends state that engineers might well be a glut on the market if a depression were to occur. Mr. Chairman, I think we on this side of the house and in this country have indicated that we certainly do not expect any return to the 1930's. The fact that more and more economists are being trained who are making specific studies into business cycles and the fluctuations in world economic conditions is one of the best reasons why we should continue to turn out more trained men. Actually, education is not a burden to anyone. The more university graduates that are turned out in the sciences, in the humanities, in the social sciences and in economics, the more opportunity we in the nation will have to prevent cyclical depressions, cyclical recessions, and so on. Therefore, that is one good reason why we should turn out more engineer graduates, more university graduates all the time.

Mr. Trainor: Is the import of what the hon. member is saying the advocacy of increased federal aid to universities? If so, I would be glad to support him wholeheartedly.

Mr. Hollingworth: Certainly. I think I made that statement at the beginning of my speech. Perhaps my hon. friend was not in the chamber at that time, but as I pointed out, I am making a plea for increased aid to universities and to technical personnel. I am not asking for increased aid for education generally. I think we must draw the line there, and I think my hon. friend will appreciate the distinction.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, more than five years ago, in response to considerable public pressure for a rehabilitation program to meet the needs of disabled persons across the country, this government set up an advisory committee known as the national advisory committee on rehabilitation to study the whole question and bring in recommendations on which the government might hope to base a program. That was five years ago, Mr. Chairman. We have heard nothing, literally nothing, of any plans the government now has, after those five years, of introducing a rehabilitation program aimed at meeting the rehabilitation needs of disabled civilians in this country. It makes you believe that this was just another government committee, like the manpower committee and so many other committees that this government sets up when it is faced with a problem with which it has no intention of grappling. They simply make a big hurrah, set up a committee, and then completely forget about the whole issue. I would like to see some indication from the minister, if what I am saying is not correct, but there is no indication to the contrary so far, and it appears that the government intends simply to let the matter of rehabilitation die.

We have an order in council, known as the co-ordination of rehabilitation agreements order, under which the federal government is willing to share with the provinces in the co-ordination of rehabilitation services, provided that those services do not cost more than $15,000. Mr. Chairman, you cannot go very far in a program of this kind with $15,000. Therefore, that order in council will not get us very far.

Then, we have schedule R of the Canadian Vocational Training Co-ordination Act, which is administered by the Minister of Labour, and under which the federal government is willing to share equally with the provinces in a vocational training program. Useful though that is, it is only one small part of a rehabilitation program. So far there is no provision whatsoever for the federal government sharing with the provinces in the cost, first of all, of medical and surgical rehabilitation; second, the provision of artificial limbs; third, vocational guidance; and fourth, social services. Those are all very important components of a rehabilitation program.

One of the great weaknesses in this whole matter is that rehabilitation falls between two ministers, the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Minister of Labour, with all the resultant confusion and lack of co-ordination that one would expect from such a dual responsibility. I do not think we will get anywhere in connection with rehabilitation until this matter is placed under one minister or the other, and until the government spells out what services are to be provided for, or purchased on behalf of, disabled persons and for which the federal government is willing to share the cost with the province. Until that is done, the provinces will simply not be able to know where they stand in regard to the division of cost with the federal government, and quite frankly, they are not prepared to go ahead on their own until they do find out.

There is no reason why rehabilitation services should not be provided in this country for disabled persons in exactly the same way as rehabilitation services have been provided for our veterans and as they have been provided in certain provinces for civilians who fall into certain definite categories. For instance, in the province of Ontario, excellent rehabilitation services are provided by the Ontario compensation board for accident victims, and the rehabilitation program provided by the Canadian National Institute for the Blind for blind people right across this country is well known to all.

What is the attitude of the United States government toward rehabilitation? It is both enthusiastic and progressive, and is at complete variance with the lackadaisical attitude which this government adopts toward this important problem. The United States government is engaged in a program to increase the number of disabled civilians who will be rehabilitated each year, from 60,000 last year to 200,000 in 1959. This is an imaginative, progressive and comprehensive program, which is at great variance wtih the attitude of this government toward this problem.

The United States government has found that rehabilitation pays off in dollars and cents. In addition to the greatly improved health, morale and usefulness of the disabled person, the United States government has calculated that during the lifetime of a rehabilitated person, $10 is returned to the federal treasury in income taxes for every $1 which the government pays out for rehabilitation services.

What is the situation in Canada today? So far rehabilitation services are provided only for special categories such as disabled veterans, industrial accident victims in certain provinces, the blind and paraplegics. A great majority of the disabled civilians in this country cannot obtain rehabilitation services.

In order to establish a comprehensive rehabilitation program for which all disabled civilians would be eligible as of right, financial participation by the federal and provincial governments and voluntary agencies would be required. Money properly administered for the purposes of rehabilitation is the one thing needed to initiate such a program.

I am advised by those who have studied this problem closely that what is needed is the introduction of a Canadian disabled persons rehabilitation act, which would provide money for the provincial governments and voluntary agencies on a shareable, grant-in-aid basis, for the purpose of establishing adequate rehabilitation programs in the provinces and subject only to necessary administrative safeguards. I believe all hon. members of this house would gladly join in approving such legislation because I believe everyone is convinced of the rightness of the principle that all disabled persons should have the opportunity to lead normal and useful lives, and that this right should be regarded as a fundamental right of citizenship. For that reason I urge strongly once again that this government bring forward such legislation at the earliest possible opportunity.

Mr. Philpott: Mr. Chairman, I have a rather sad but proud duty to perform on behalf of our late colleague, Dr. Jack MacDougall, the late member for Vancouver-Burrard. As many hon. members know, for some months before his death he was very much concerned with one problem and I had been in consultation with Dr. MacDougall, and with Mr. Tip O'Neill, the former member of parliament for Kamloops, about the matter which I am now going to raise. Jack MacDougall had told me that he intended to raise it at this time and I had promised to support him in his submission. The matter concerns a rather considerable number of superannuated employees of the Canadian Pacific Railway whose pensions have amounted to less than $60 per month. They are, of course, a minority of such superannuated employees.

I am sorry that I cannot give the exact number of such pensioners, but there is a goodly number all across Canada and their organizations, especially the Pacific coast C.P.R. pension association of 1953, had specifically requested the late Dr. MacDougall to raise this matter on the floor of the house at this time because they thought that by his so doing it would focus the attention of the Canadian public on this matter.

The crux of their grievance, which was embodied in a brief originally submitted in the year 1953, is that in January, 1953 the basis of the C.P.R. pension system was changed in two important respects; first, to increase the pensions the deductions from wages were raised from 1 per cent to 1½ per cent and, secondly, future pensions are to be calculated either on the last five years of service or the last ten years of service, whichever gives the best results to the pensioner. The basis of the complaint was that those who had retired before 1953 had no way to benefit on a par with those who retired later although their living expenses had gone up the same as those of everybody else. Therefore the Pacific coast C.P.R. pension association made the following three specific requests:

1. That the basic pension be not less than $75 per month to those under 70 years of age, and not less than $60 per month to those over 70.
2. That the so-called single life plan be made applicable to all—to apply to wives of men who retired prior to January 1, 1953, where their husbands at that time elected to take the single life plan; and
3. That all employees who had retired to January 1, 1953, be given the benefit of the 1½ per cent computed on their present pension.

After considering the matter and hearing the representations of the men the management of the Canadian Pacific granted quite substantial increases as from February 1 of the present year. While expressing deep satisfaction at these increases the Canadian Pacific pioneers' pension committee made the following submission in a letter to the management of the company dated April 12, 1956:

Dear Sirs:

The pension committee, on behalf of those pensioners who retired prior to January 1, 1953, wish to express our appreciation and thanks for the revised changes in the pension rule, effective February 1, 1956.

These new rules will bring some relief to those specifically affected up to 70 years of age.

We find, according to statistics of ages of pensioners from the auditors' report, that the increase to $60 per month for those below 70 years of age, while of great benefit to those below that age, apply to few in number, which number is steadily decreasing, and would not seriously affect the solvency of the pension fund if continued after the age of 70 years.

Later in the letter, which is signed by Mr. A. S. Emms, chairman of the Canadian Pacific pioneers' pension committee, it is pointed out that the cost of living is still increasing and that many of the pensioners find it difficult to eke out a respectable existence.

I know that a narrow interpretation of our rules might hold that such matters should not be raised in this house on this vote. However, I would submit that the C.P.R. is an institution of which the whole of Canada is deservedly proud, and also, because of the existence of its great competitor, the C.N.R.—which is owned by the people of Canada—that any question concerning the equity of the pension fund of either or both railways is a matter of legitimate concern to every member of this house.

In any event, I feel it is a great honour to have the privilege of raising on the floor of this house a matter about which our late colleague, Dr. Jack MacDougall, had had so much correspondence with the railway pensioners.

On earlier occasions, I have had the privilege of supporting the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in his exhortations for justice for some of the C.N.R. pensioners—especially those former war veterans who are really in a pitiable condition, some of them drawing as little as $25 per month.

In this case I want to pay tribute to the C.P.R. for having made the limited improvements which they have made, but to urge with all my strength that they comply with the reasonable request of the C.P.R. Pioneer Pensioners' Association.

Mr. Blair: This matter of aid to university students has come before the house in the labour estimates today. However, during the last two or three months important organizations and institutions have been talking in the press about the need of training more students, especially in science, and the need for more engineers. I was rather surprised this morning when the hon. member for Cape Breton South said he felt that the universities were in the business of training scientific students for the sake of training them and that there was a profit motive in this matter. I was also surprised that the hon. member for Macleod spoke about depressions and the fact that it was not certain that we needed students trained in this country. When the hon. member for Hamilton West spoke about the matter of training university students, I am sure that she was talking about the shortage of these students in connection with planning for the future.

In so far as students are concerned, I have had some correspondence regarding the difficulties of science students in earning their own way through college. I am perfectly aware that the income tax as such must have some rigid lines and must apply, but in the case of students over 21 years of age I am going to submit part of the letter written to me by a boy concerning this matter. It is true that there is a $1,000 deductible clause. In one case the boy is over 21, and that is the time when they are in the third or fourth year of science, and he is putting himself through college. They are usually healthy young people at that time. He has no other deductions, such as for sickness; he is not making any charitable donations; and so it all rests on that $1,000 deduction. I know this boy's people. They are a very fine family and they have already educated three sons. They are contributing a great deal to this country. This boy puts it in this way:

Dad paid $70 income tax for me on that summer's earnings, which was equivalent to the government taking away 70 per cent of the $100 scholarship I received that year.

That boy won a $100 prize for efficiency in some of the scientific subjects in that year, which was his third year. He goes on:

The average year at Queen's (engineering) costs $1,200; therefore, in order to put himself through a student would have to earn $1,800 in the summer; of which $400 would go for board and lodging for the five summer months away from home; income tax would take $160; leaving him $1,240 for his university year.

I hope that the Minister of Labour will talk to the Minister of Finance about this matter and that something will be done. If these boys are going to try to put themselves through university, there should be some relief in so far as income tax is concerned. It seems rather hard that they should try to educate themselves and at the same time pay income tax when it would be only a small matter, in so far as the government is concerned, for a student earning his own way through college, particularly in the engineering subjects, to be relieved of the necessity of paying income tax. It seems rather hard that they should pay income tax and then not have enough money for their university year.

This has been recognized before, and I am going to quote from a speech of one of the Liberal members in the provincial legislature concerning this matter. This was Mr. J. J. Wintermeyer, newly-elected Liberal member for Waterloo North. He considered this of such importance that he made it the subject of his maiden speech in the Ontario legislature. He said that Ontario and Canada are lagging far behind other countries in producing university graduates and that this loss would soon seriously cripple the provincial and national economy unless immediate steps were taken to remedy it. He said that the problem was difficult, but the rewards to be gained by having more skilled university students would give Canada a wealth that would not be estimated in dollars. He went on to point out that in England 70 per cent of all university students were receiving government financial aid of some type.

Further to the question of the criticism that was made this morning of the universities, I want to bring before the house the position of these students. Many of the universities a few months ago announced increases in the costs of the university course. I am referring to the costs of the course of the University of Toronto. These increases are the third that have been announced since the end of the 1950-51 academic year. The annual fee for a general arts course was then $242; it will now be $335. That is in the faculty of arts, but one must agree that the course in science is much more expensive, and that is what we are particularly dealing with today. Applied science and engineering fees have risen from $347 in 1951 to the new level of $500—at a time when the shortage of engineers is impairing our development in this country. It is hindering not only our development at home but also the Colombo plan projects abroad.

With regard to what the hon. member for Cape Breton South said concerning this subject, let me point out that, despite these increases, tuition fees have been providing an ever smaller proportion of total university expenses. In the current year, they make up only 26·7 per cent cent of the University of Toronto's revenue. Thus, scholarships, which merely cover tuition fees, are costing the university more and more all the time.

With your permission, sir, I wish to read into the record on this subject statements made by Mr. James S. Duncan, C.M.G. We all remember that series of articles that Mr. Duncan wrote when he came back from Russia. My repeating some of the statements of Mr. Duncan's does not mean that I approve of the present form of government in Russia in any way, but we are in competition, both in peace and in war, with that country—or in cold war—and Mr. Duncan says something in his report that deserves recognition. This is the twelfth article in the series and these articles were carried in newspapers throughout the country. I am certain that Mr. Duncan is a well known man who knows what he is talking about, and that the review he made of educational conditions in Russia, especially with regard to training scientists, can be accepted in this house by any person. In this article he points out:

> There are over 30 universities in Russia, and many hundreds of colleges and institutions of higher training, including technical and polytechnic institutes. Although it is difficult to obtain reliable figures, I am informed that Russia turned out nearly twice as many graduate engineers last year as the United States did, and that their engineering training is not only as good as ours, but when they have completed their five and a half year university course, they have put in 50 per cent more study hours than our students.

I shall go on and read some other extracts from this article regarding the aid that is given in that country to train students in science. Some of this is rather amazing. Mr. Duncan says:

> Each student receives a monthly allowance from the government which, when the merit bonus is added to it, is sufficient to cover his fees and living expenses. In the first year the student's allowance is 290 rubles ($72) per month and is just about enough to exist on. In the senior courses the allowance is increased to 500 rubles ($125) monthly.

I am only reading parts of Mr. Duncan's report. He says that all reading and textbooks are supplied free. Then he has this to say:

> Out of their allowance, the students pay 400 rubles ($100) per annum for their tuition, 30 rubles ($7.50) per month for their rooms—

Then he goes on to point out that they are served meals in the canteens at a very low rate. But this is the important thing so far as we are concerned. Mr. Duncan says:

> There is also a concerted drive in Russia to produce mathematicians, chemists, physicists and other scientists, and these are being turned out in rapidly increasing numbers.

I started by making an appeal for help to university students. Having in mind the small amount that it would cost the government, I ask the consideration of the Minister of Finance, and to the Minister of Labour may I say that he could use his good offices in bringing this matter before the Minister of Finance, so that university students who are trying to earn their own way will not be penalized by having to pay income tax and having to borrow money or have somebody help them to pay their income tax in order that they can proceed with their university courses.

I leave this matter before the minister. I think there is something wrong when such a condition exists. Certainly we need more students in this country, and in spite of what has been said by the hon. member for Macleod with regard to the possibility of a depression, I still have faith in Canada, whatever the political complexion of the country may be. I think of a statement I made in the house two or three years ago when something like this came up. Political considerations might enter into this question but I think of a statement by an American, quite a philosopher, who, in dealing with the question whether a democratic or a republican government would do more for the United States, said, "This country is too big to be destroyed by any political party".

Canada will grow. We have natural resources and we do need engineers for the development of our country. Therefore I think every possible assistance should be given to these people in order that they may qualify and aid in the building of our country. That is all I wish to say on this matter. I again make the appeal that every assistance be offered to university students and that in cases where they are earning their own living it would be a small matter to relieve them of income tax.

There is one further question I want to bring before the Minister of Labour. It has to do with my own riding where a large industry moved away and left a lot of people unemployed. As a result skilled tradesmen, toolmakers, people of that type, men who had been employed in the industry for years, find it difficult to obtain another job. The situation has reached the point, and I think the Minister of Labour should take notice of it, that if a man is 40 years old or more it is practically impossible for him to get a job. Industries nowadays are looking for people who will fit into their pension plans. When a man who has been employed as a crane man applies for a similar job in another industry he is politely shuffled aside if he is 40 years old or more and is told that there is no place for him. If that were the situation, then there are many of us in the House of Commons who should not be here.

I maintain there is a place in industry for men from 40 to 65 years of age. From the point of view of experience alone they have a great deal to contribute. Put yourself in the position of a man 40, 45, 50, 55 or 60 going out and trying to obtain another job and being told very politely and nicely by the employment officer, "We have got nothing for you today." What is at the bottom of the whole problem is that industry does not want to employ men 40 years of age or more because they do not fit in with their pension plans or the so-called routine of the particular industry.

I think the Minister of Labour might well look into the matter, especially with regard to the industry to which I referred which was in a town in my own riding. There are a lot of very fine people there. Their unemployment insurance payments ran out on the first of May. They are qualified craftsmen but when they go to look for another position there is no place for them. Many of them are excellent citizens who own their own homes. If they sell their homes it is going to be the beginning of a drop in real estate prices. If they move to another area, an area where employment is easier to obtain, a booming area, they are going to pay a great deal more for their homes.

There they are in that position. Their unemployment insurance ran out on the first of May. The minister may say that other jobs are open. If a man 40 years or over is unemployed does it simply mean, so far as the unemployment insurance people are concerned, that he has to go and take a job as a road labourer or something like that? Other industries will not take him on, and so he is in a most difficult position. I feel sorry for these people. They are the best people in the world and yet they are in that position. Nothing is coming in. I repeat once more that their unemployment insurance ran out on the first of May and when they go to get another job they are too old because they are 40 or over.

I bring these two matters before the minister today, the question of consideration for university students and the matter of looking into the situation of people who are 40 years old or over. It may seem ridiculous when I say 40 years old but firms are not hiring them in spite of the fact that they are skilled tradesmen. In the situation they are in they need income at the present time and in view of the fact that they are unemployable and cannot get a job because of their age something should be done for them and every consideration should be given to their position.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, first of all I should like to indicate my unqualified support of the plea made a few minutes ago by the member for Vancouver South. In doing so, I am registering the support which the late member for Vancouver-Burrard knew would be registered by a number of us when the time came that he would have made the plea that has been made in his stead today by the hon. member for Vancouver South. Indeed, I am satisfied that there are other members, members in all parties in the house, who will support the plea that has been made in the hope that even yet the Canadian Pacific Railway will give favourable consideration to the points that have been drawn to the attention of that company by organizations representing their retired employees.

Since the member for Vancouver South has put most of the details on the record, it is not necessary for any of the rest of us to repeat those details, but may I just say that it seems to me that the most serious aspect of the matter, the point over which there is the deepest feeling of grievance, has to do with the cut-off date of January 1, 1953. As the hon. member for Vancouver South has already pointed out, both in his own remarks and by reading some of the correspondence, the new pension rules of the Canadian Pacific Railway came into effect on February 1, 1956. In so far as any greater contributions that have to be paid by those still working for the Canadian Pacific Railway are concerned, those greater contributions are effective only from that date, namely February 1, 1956. Yet it is a fact that any who were in the employ of the company after January 1, 1953, even though they may have retired prior to February 1, 1956, or if they retire now, get the benefit of the new rules. Those benefits are in the main two in number: on the one hand an increased pension for the worker himself, and on the other hand a greater pension for his widow if the retired worker dies first. The other side of the picture therefore is that with respect to employees whose retirement date was earlier than January 1, 1953, they do not get either of these benefits. They do not get a greater pension as of right nor is there the greater protection for the widow when the employee dies first.

My contacts with these people, like the contacts of my hon. friend across the way and the many contacts that the late Jack MacDougall had, I think will bear out this statement, namely that although these men are naturally concerned and disappointed in that they do not get the greater amount of pension to which they feel they are entitled, what worries them most is the realization that if they die first the position of their widows will be an extremely difficult one.

It has to be recognized that this is not a matter concerning which the parliament of Canada normally legislates and I suppose in a sense it might be said that it is not a matter upon which parliament would be expected to legislate. But it is true that there are relationhips between the government of Canada and a great corporation like the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I would feel that it is part of the responsibility of the government, in view of its desire to maintain good labour relations, to offer some good advice to the Canadian Pacific Railway in a matter of this kind. I also believe that if views on this subject are expressed by a number of members representing all parties in the house, the Canadian Pacific Railway might take our views into consideration.

To argue—as the railway does on an occasion such as this—that the matter is one of a contractual relationship, it seems to me does not meet the point; for the fact is that there are employees most of whose contributions were made previous to the change in the rules—in other words, when the contributions were at a lower rate—who nevertheless get the benefit of the higher pension both for the employee and for the widow. As I say, that applies to those who retired after January 1, 1953. There are instances of men retiring in December 1952 and in January 1953. The difference in the total amount of money paid into the pension fund by employees retiring in those two different months is practically nothing. Yet the difference in the pension earned by the employee can be $50 or $60 a month and the difference in the pension that would be paid to the widow can be of the order of $25 or $30 a month or more. As the hon. member for Vancouver South has indicated, there is a considerable file of correspondence, documents and memoranda on this subject. A number of us in the house have copies of it. From my study of it I feel that the C.P.R. has been most unfair towards employees who happened to retire just before January 1, 1953, and I hope that the company will reconsider that matter.

I say again that there are other jurisdictions that have increased the pensions of those already retired. I regret that is not true of the federal government with respect to its superannuated civil servants. I regret that it is not true with respect to the Canadian National Railways. But it is true in the case of at least three provincial governments in this country; it is true on the part of the government of the United Kingdom, on the part of the government of the United States and on the part of the governments of a number of states. I also know that there are some private corporations in Canada that have increased the pension not only of those still working for them who retire in the current period but of those who retired even in years gone by. I repeat another instance of which I have personal knowledge, namely that of the International Typographical Union to which I happen to belong which has been increasing its pension across the years.

In fact, the pension that is now paid to retired members of the union is twice what it was 10 years ago. May I emphasize the fact that persons who retired 10 or even 20 years ago, or at any time in the past, whose contributions into the fund were on the former lower rates, get the benefit of the increase in pension without having to pay any more into the fund. I regard a plan of that kind as human, fair and just and I see no reason why other jurisdictions or a company like the C.P.R. should not also be human, fair and just in its dealings with its former employees.

It is obvious that this is a matter on which any of us who are briefed could speak at some length; but perhaps it would be better if, instead of two or three speaking at length, a number expressed their support of the position that was to have been taken by the late hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard but which was expressed by the hon. member for Vancouver South, so that the Canadian Pacific Railway will know that as human beings, interested in decent human relations, we think the C.P.R. should take another look at this issue.

Mr. Chairman, I should now like to say a few words more directly to the Minister of Labour with regard to what I would consider to be the tremendous opportunity he has to play an important role in the future of this country. Because it is part of his task to listen to briefs and to peruse documents that are presented to him by labour organizations and because it is part of his task to keep in touch with what is going on in labour circles, he knows that in the main the requests which labour makes to parliament and to the government fall into two categories. On the one hand labour is constantly seeking legislation for the benefit of the community as a whole. In this category there are requests for national health insurance and for social security legislation such as adequate old age pensions, improvements in family allowances, improvements in unemployment insurance and so on. There are as well many other types of things that labour requests for the good of the community as a whole. In addition to that category, labour also requests of the government and of parliament legislation concerning procedures governing the relationships between management and labour. It is in this field that labour asks for revision of the national labour code. It is in this field that labour today is still asking for consideration to be given to any amendments that might be necessary to be made to the British North America Act in order to make possible uniform labour and social legislation across Canada. It is in this field that labour asks for such things as legislation governing hours of work per week, legislation governing minimum wages, vacations with pay, statutory holidays, equal pay for equal work for women and so on.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I said a moment ago that I would like to press upon the minister, if I could, the key position that I think he holds with respect to the future of this country. If he will consider for a while the philosophy that underlies these requests that labour makes, and also if he will consider the new era into which imperceptibly but in a very real sense society is moving, I think he will realize the key position he holds. The philosophy that underlies these requests is, I am sure, well known to the minister and to the house. It is that labour feels that the wealth that a nation like Canada produces, whether it be the more modest volume of wealth that was produced a generation or two ago; whether it be the $27 billion or $28 billion per year that is being produced now or whether it be the much greater volume that may be produced a decade or two hence, that wealth is made possible to a very large extent by the contribution made by the working people in this country in whatever calling, whatever category, their work may fall. It is the philosophy or the approach of labour, the workers in this country, that those who make possible the production of these great volumes of wealth, should enjoy its benefits.

It has indeed been the struggle of labour across the years to get the kind of legislation, the kind of relationships between management and labour, between both of those entities and the government, that will so order our economy that as great wealth is produced it will come, not just to the few, but to all of those who participate in its production. Hence, when labour asks for national health insurance on an all inclusive basis; when labour asks for old age pensions of $60 or $65 a month at age 65 without a means test; when labour asks for the 40-hour week or for a guaranteed minimum wage of a dollar an hour; when labour asks for vacations with pay or for statutory holidays with pay; when labour asks for unemployment insurance across the board rather than unemployment insurance part way and a form of relief for the rest, labour is asking not for some handout, not for a form of charity, not for the government to play the role of Santa Claus, but labour is asking rather for what it believes to be its right. It is asking for what it has earned and is asking for its share of the wealth that labour itself has produced. That is the basic philosophy which has been underneath the requests and the demands of labour from the earliest days when labour organized in this country or in other lands.

I suggest to the minister it is becoming a philosophy and an approach that is very important in the new era into which we are moving. Living as we are in the midst of days when automation is becoming a fact, living as we are at the beginning of an era which may see a tremendous increase in the available sources of energy because of the development of atomic power, we must realize how imperceptibly but nevertheless in what a real way we are moving into a new era.

I suggest that if in the past in order to hold society together, in order to make progress, in order to make it a human society, in order to make Canada a country that was important for human beings, it was desirable for labour to make these demands and win them step by step even through a process of struggle, that it becomes even more important in the years that lie ahead that this philosophy be accepted. The government boasts of the $27 billion or $28 billion of production which may be the result in Canada this year. If we move on into the era of automation, if we move on into an era in which atomic energy is added to the other sources of power we have with the result that we have greatly increased sources of power and energy, this $28 billion we are now capable of producing may some day look like a very low figure. What is going to happen if we do double or treble the amount we are producing at the present time unless we get established this basic principle that labour has fought for, namely that all this wealth that is produced should benefit, not just a few, not just those who control it, but everybody? We could find that the progress we are making could be our undoing.

Many of the things that are implied in what I am bringing to the attention of the Minister of Labour call for legislation that falls under the direction of other ministers than the Minister of Labour. But it seems to me he is the man who should be giving to the cabinet, to the government and to parliament, a vision of what could be done because of the new era into which we are moving. I call upon the Minister of Labour not to be the tool of the government in resisting those things that labour demands, a revision of the national labour code, amendments to the British North America Act to make possible uniform legislation regarding hours of work, minimum wages, and so on. I ask him not to be the tool of resistance against vacations with pay and to give us the usual line about it being a matter for collective bargaining, or to resist statutory holidays with pay or to resist other improvements affecting equal status of women and so on. Instead of resisting that kind of thing, I call upon him to recognize that right in this type of legislation may be the key as to whether or not these great resources that we are tapping, this great volume of production that is going to be ours in the years that lie ahead, will hang around our neck like a millstone or whether it will be the basis for an enlarged life for all the people in this country.

In the same vein I suggest it is part of the minister's job as Minister of Labour and as minister for labour, the man who should be speaking in the cabinet for the working people of this country whether they work in the factories, on the farms, in the offices, the fisheries, the mines or what have you, he should be speaking on their behalf to the other members of the cabinet and saying that this great wealth which this country is now capable of producing should result, not 35 or 50 years from now but right now, in improvements in our old age pension, in other social legislation and in the early enactment of national health insurance and other things of that kind to get back to the millions of Canadian people who produce this wealth, not a handout, not charity but that which is their right because it is labour, the working people on the farms, in the factories and offices of this country who make possible the production of this great wealth.

I say to the minister that it is not only an administrative job that he has in this important department. As others have said, he does a good job in administering the department. I suggest to him that his job is much more than that of an efficient administrator. His job should be that of a visionary, indeed I might even say a prophet. He should see what there is ahead. He should see what tremendous progress we can make if we will parallel with this era into which we are moving, the era of automation and atomic energy, the kind of legislation that will get the wealth that our people produce back to them in the form of a higher standard of living, social security, protection against ill health, old age and all these other things over which we have no control. I call upon the Minister of Labour to match the administrative job he is doing with the job of a visionary; I call upon him to urge the government to take some real, progressive steps in the direction of the kind of social legislation for which labour has been asking across the years, which labour has presented to the government very strongly, very forcibly, in the platform of principles, and the other resolutions and pronouncements that were made at the recent founding convention of the Canadian Labour Congress.

I think it is significant that just at this time, just at the beginning of this new era, when

I feel sure we are moving forward, we have this significant event of the founding of this new congress. It was a pleasure to see the minister there at least one day and the Prime Minister on another day. I hope they will read again the resolutions that were passed at that convention; that they will read the powerful speech that was made by president Claude Jodoin when the convention reached the point where the new congress had actually come into being. I call upon the government to pay more serious attention to the suggestions that have been made by that new congress which, I suggest, have underneath them a philosophy that is good for Canada, a philosophy which, if acted upon, can hold the promise of a much better day for all the people of this land.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I wish to deal briefly with three specific points that have been discussed here in other years, and have actually been mentioned during the discussion that has already taken place since these estimates came before us. First of all is the fact that we have been urging now for several years that the government take the necessary steps to conduct the kind of inquiry that would result in a labour code for Canada that would be a source of pride to every one of us.

It is now more than 13 years since a general examination of our labour legislation took place. Those of us who had occasion to have some contact with the results of that inquiry will recall the very satisfactory results which flowed from the report of the commission headed by the Hon. C. P. McTague which reported in 1943. At that time we were in the midst of perhaps the most severe days of the second world war, and the results of that finding were brought into effect by an order in council which did in fact provide Canada with something in the nature of a labour code covering a very wide part of our labour legislation in this country.

I strongly urge the government to take the steps without delay which will start the work either of a commission or of a committee on which there will be representation of the government itself, of the organized workers of this country, of management and of all other interested parties. We have urged this continuously since 1950. I mention 1950 because it was in 1950 that we were all called back here, those of us who were members, to deal with the situation which had resulted from the strike affecting the railways at that time. We said then that what had occurred was an illustration of the inadequacy of our conciliation methods, and that the situation with which the workers of Canada and the people of Canada generally had been confronted emphasized the need for a full and complete inquiry which would give to us in Canada labour legislation of the most modern and most sensible type and which would be of advantage to the workers, to management and to the people of Canada generally. The things that have happened since that time have emphasized the need for such an inquiry. Only in the past few weeks have we been relieved of the concern which was shared by all Canadians, and certainly shared by the workers employed by the railways themselves just as much as anyone else, over the possibility of a repetition of the situation with which we were confronted in 1950.

As has already been pointed out by the hon. member for Hamilton West, it is not to be suggested that people who show the very highest degree of responsibility in their daily work, such as is shown by employees of the railways, would be any less responsible in dealing with the problems of labour relations, conciliation and the general activities of organized labour.

In the interests of our workers in all activities in Canada, in the interests of management and above all in the interest of Canadians generally, I urge the minister to recognize there are many reasons now why it will be more suitable than ever before that such an inquiry take place. All of us have expressed our admiration of the way in which the Canadian Labour Congress started on its new course under the guidance of a man who commands the confidence and respect of all Canadians, whatever their occupation may be. The speech of Mr. Claude Jodoin at the time that the new congress was formed was a model of responsibility and vision in regard to the part that organized labour plays in the life of our whole country.

Now, there is the great advantage of one large responsible body speaking on behalf of the greater part of organized labour. Part of the difficulties that might have been presented by the existence of two large congresses—and in fact, I should say three large congresses—is removed in some measure by the organization which has now taken form.

The minister has on different occasions suggested that we might expect some review of this kind. I think the time is now past for speculative suggestions as to when this may be done. I think we should have an unqualified assurance from the minister that he will seek the co-operation of the appropriate representatives of organized labour, of management and of other bodies who might be brought into this inquiry, and that either a commission or a committee with full powers to inquire and report be set up for the purpose of considering the labour legislation of this country and recommending a labour code which will bring to organized labour, to management and to Canadians generally the advantage of the most up-to-date labour code in the world. We should not be satisfied with anything else in this country which is progressing so rapidly in every field of human endeavour.

I think one reason that we should hope this would take place is that we see the advantageous results which flowed from the last inquiry. At that time I had some measure of personal responsibility in regard to labour legislation in the province of Ontario as premier of that province. Just as soon as the new legislation, which was based upon the report of that inquiry, became law we adopted that same code and made it applicable in the province of Ontario. Later other provincial governments followed the same course and as a result we have uniform labour legislation in this country affecting a large percentage of the workers of Canada. I think if we had an inquiry which commanded the confidence of the workers, of management and of the people of Canada generally we might be well on the way toward a very extensive measure of uniform labour legislation in this country. Therefore I repeat my request to the minister that he give us assurance at this time, which we have now been seeking for so many years, that an inquiry of this nature will take place.

May I speak of another subject. This has been mentioned over and over again but it needs to be mentioned until something is done about it. This government set up a manpower committee to which it appointed representatives of various activities in this country. That committee should proceed with its work so that we may know exactly what is the situation across the whole of Canada in regard to the employment situation generally and to the need of various parts of Canada. This is not just a matter of knowing how we can use manpower, it is a case of knowing exactly where the manpower is and exactly what the situation is in regard to manpower in every part of Canada. For instance, we know that in spite of the demand for workers in many parts of Canada there are other parts of the country where there is a substantial measure of very severe unemployment.

This is the sort of thing which should be examined. With a thorough examination of that situation the government would be in a better position to exercise such influence as it is called upon to exercise from time to time in encouraging the growth of new industries in those areas where there is need of new opportunities for work and employment. I do not need to mention several places in this country where at this time it would be of great humane value and of great advantage to the Canadian economy generally if encouragement were given to the growth of certain types of industrial and other employment which would take up the slack which has resulted from the changing nature of some of our activities in this country. Therefore, I urge the Minister of Labour to revise the activities of this important committee and to permit and encourage it to carry out the duties which were assigned to it when it was set up a few years ago.

I want to deal with one other subject which has been mentioned in this house on different occasions, the subject of vacations with pay. I would hope that the government would take advantage of this opportunity to introduce legislation as a government measure just as it has done in other cases where the leadership has been given by the opposition. We now have before us legislation in regard to equal pay for women for equal work which is before us as a government measure directly as a result of the repeated efforts of the hon. member for Hamilton West. I would hope that we might also have for the same reason legislation brought before us as government legislation to provide vacations with pay for all those affected by the federal labour law.

Here again perhaps I may be forgiven if I speak from personal experience. It was under the government which I had the honour to head at that time in the province of Ontario that the first legislation in Canada was passed to provide statutory holidays with pay. I know how satisfactory it proved to be and I know from my own experience that not only was it of great advantage to the workers but that management also regarded the legislation as having very real and substantial advantages. Since it became a statutory obligation upon all employers to give a certain minimum number of holidays with pay there was no chance that one employer would find himself in a position of disadvantage because he followed the proper, just and humane course in providing holidays with pay on his own initiative. By the statutory provision all employers were encouraged to extend this very desirable provision, which is to the advantage of all Canadians.

The fact that workers get holidays with pay and in that way have the opportunity for recreation and the restoration of their health in itself is not only of great advantage to them and to their families, as is their just right, but it has proved to be of great advantage to the general morale of our industrial workers who have benefited from the legislation. Therefore in view of the experience which has shown the beneficial results of legislation of this kind, and in view of the fact that we shall be sitting here for some considerable time, I hope the government will take advantage of the opportunity that is presented to introduce legislation of this nature during the present session and make applicable to the workers of Canada, at least during the latter part of the summer months of this year, the proper benefits that would flow from legislation of this nature.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Chairman, I am sure that all hon. members have found the remarks which have been made today not only interesting but, I should think, instructive. I ask for but a few minutes of your time to deal with one subject which relates to the province of Quebec, one constituency of which I have the honour to represent. I was particularly interested in the remarks made this afternoon by the hon. member for York Centre in respect to university grants, and inasmuch as the constituency of St. Lawrence-St. George has within its boundaries one of the great universities of Canada I feel this is a matter which particularly concerns my riding and myself.

Constituting as we do a minority race or group in the province of Quebec, it is sometimes said that that province leans more to the classical side and the field of the humanities rather than to the technical or scientific sides of education. This afternoon I should like to say that at least in recent years that has not been quite the fact. I believe that in the province of Quebec we will be able now to find in the field which is perhaps incorrectly called labour—because we have moved in the last 40 or 50 years a long way from the time when the man who went out with a dinner pail was just a labouring man and we are all in some degree members of the labour group—men can now be found in the trades who are as skilled as in any other part of the Dominion of Canada, though it is true that they have retained to a very large degree the basic urge for study in the field of the humanities and classical education.

Therefore when the minister is prepared to answer questions, I would like him to corroborate the information, which I believe is true, that in the last 10 or 15 years the federal parliament has granted to the province of Quebec, as it has to other provinces in Canada, substantial sums of money in capital and bursary amounts in the field of technical and scientific training. I should like him, if he has the information handy, to tell us what those amounts were, say over the past 10 years, in what particular places in the province of Quebec they were allocated, and what use, so far as his department knows, has been made of those grants.

After all, the one person who must be served, whether we as members act in the federal field or in the provincial field or in the municipal arena, is essentially that same person, Mr. Taxpayer. When grants are made of this or that sum of money to this or that area of life, Mr. Taxpayer in the final analysis is the person who must pay the shot. I have been given to understand that substantial grants have been made to the province of Quebec and that use has been made of those grants over the past decade in this field of scientific and technical training. Therefore, when the minister replies, I should like him to put that information upon the record.

Mr. McLeod: I was indeed glad to hear the hon. member for Vancouver South mention the problem which had been the concern of the late member for Vancouver-Burrard. I have been one of those associated with this gentleman in discussing the problems of a small group of pensioners affected in the manner mentioned by the hon. member. I am going to say nothing more than that I am pleased the matter was mentioned and will lend my support to the hon. member at any future time he wishes to bring this before the house.

In speaking on the estimates before us, I wish to say that I was a member of the committee on estimates, and when the figures for this department were before us I was impressed by the sincerity of the minister and the various officials who appeared before us and with their deep conviction that something more than was being done at the present time would have to be done in training our labour force for the future.

First I should like to refer, as has already been done in this house this afternoon, to the provisions made for rehabilitation. This is one of the newer endeavours of the department. I understand it was inaugurated in 1953. Naturally progress is going to be slow, but I understand now that all the provinces of Canada are sharing in this scheme, contributing on a 50-50 basis toward the cost of educating and rehabilitating the handicapped and the aged. We all know that many employees affected by changes brought about by machines and the automation about which we hear so much have lost their jobs and have reached the years when it is difficult to find new employment. It is for these people that there is a growing demand for training at the present time. As regards the handicapped, we are beginning to find that men and women who a few short years ago we thought could not be used in any manner in our labour force are now being trained so they can assume a fitting place in the circles of labour, provide a livelihood for themselves and contribute to the economy of Canada.

This has a twofold benefit. Many of these people, if it were not for this special training, would possibly be a charge against the welfare contributions of this country. So, by making them self-supporting, we are probably just taking a rather selfish view that it is cheaper and of more benefit to Canada to give them this training at the expense of the taxpayers than to have them continue on the welfare rolls.

Now we have this commission set up under our Department of Labour to provide this training. Each province that agrees to co-operate with the department must set up a committee, I believe, of three members to administer the affairs in that particular province. This committee consists of a co-ordinator, a representative of the department which provides the training, and a federal representative. In my own province of British Columbia this is handled by the Department of National Health and Welfare, and I know it is performing a wonderful service for those who need this special type of training.

All applications are referred to this committee, and they are carefully screened. The aim of the committee is to find the type of training which it thinks would be best suited to the applicant, depending of course on his degree or type of disability. As I say, it is proving very effective and producing very good results, but I sometimes think possibly the people of Canada and the people of various communities are not aware of just what is available to them under this branch of our service to the people. Possibly it would be of benefit if we were to give some publicity to it.

We have heard a great deal today about professional training. The hon. member for Lanark made a very good plea and put it before the house in a very plain and straightforward manner. I am in accord with what he said. I should just like to place on the record what is being done under the plans of our Department of Labour for assisting students to get this type of training. The province of British Columbia is also taking full advantage of the scheme, which was started some ten years ago and is steadily expanding. The last complete figures are for the year 1954, and in that year the following were assisted financially in British Columbia under the joint plan of financial assistance carried on by the province and the federal Department of Labour. There were 74 students in medicine, 14 in veterinary medicine, 58 in dentistry, 32 in pharmacy, 86 in applied science and engineering, 11 in arts and science, 174 in arts, 15 in law, 22 in teacher training, 9 in home economics, 8 in agriculture, 19 in commerce, 6 in forestry, 22 in nursing and 28 miscellaneous. This is a grand total of 517 who took advantage of the plan which is available in Canada for university training.

Looking over the total for Canada it is rather interesting to note that this is 25 per cent of the total who received training in that year. I think you will agree that the province of British Columbia and the people of British Columbia are taking full advantage of what is being offered to them. In addition to this professional training, there is much being done in promoting technical training, again under joint provincial and federal financing. Under this plan each province is given an outright grant of $10,000 for administrative expenses. During the last year for which figures are available $2,070,000 was allotted to the provinces on a per capita basis, and this per capita basis involves only the teen-agers from 15 to 19 years of age. A further sum of $10,304,950 was granted toward the cost of erecting technical schools and purchasing equipment.

So we see that the department has started along these lines; and while I would certainly agree with every member who has spoken today that there is room for much improvement and that much larger grants of money are necessary in order to give the people of Canada who wish to avail themselves of this training which is so necessary today the opportunity to do so, I believe that not even yet have we reached the point where we are taking full advantage of what is being offered. Of course until we reach that stage the government has the excuse, though it may be a poor one, that there is no use providing any more money until people are prepared to make use of it. In addition to the technical training there are also correspondence courses available, and there is also the scheme of apprenticeship training.

Today, as we approach the era of complete automation, we are certainly going to find that everyone who has not a skilled trade or profession of some kind will be absolutely at a loss in finding employment. Even today the old fashioned ditch digger has been replaced by the machine, and the idea of hand labour and unskilled labour is pretty much a thing of the past.

As has been said, we cannot force our young men and women to take advantage of these courses. However, I believe that we as members of parliament can do a lot if we will just have the problem before us at all times and, as we visit the various parts of our ridings, give greater publicity to what is being done and what is available. At different times we may have the privilege of speaking to school classes or even service clubs, boards of trade and so on, and I am quite sure they would be glad to hear about what is available through the provincial and federal plans for better education for the people of Canada.

We know there are shortcomings in our training system, but these are being ironed out. I say with all sincerity that whenever any constructive criticism was put forward in the committee by any member I found that it got a good hearing, and we got a promise from the minister or the appropriate official that some action would be taken to rectify whatever was considered amiss. But I think if we co-operated a little more with the authorities, promoted publicity for all these schemes, and reached the stage where there were possibly more applicants than could be taken care of, we would then be in a strong position to come back to the government and say this has been started, it has proved satisfactory, but we must have more money.

I listened with interest to the hon. member for Broadview, and was rather pleased to hear his outline of what has been done in the United States. What has been done there is, of course, a target at which we may shoot. Finally, I say that the way to move any government to further action is by popular demand, and I am sure if our people make use of all the facilities offered and demand expansion, we can then get that expansion.

Mr. Leduc (Gatineau): Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer my congratulations and sincere thanks to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) on behalf of the bushworkers of the province of Quebec, for his humane and fair attitude with regard to unemployment insurance for those people.

On February 13, 1956, the Canadian International Paper advertised for bushworkers in every employment office in the province, offering $5.00 to $6.00 per 100 cu. ft. cord of pulpwood cut in its camps. These men, who were at that time receiving unemployment insurance benefits were advised of this offer made by the C.I.P., but the vast majority of them refused on the grounds that the amount offered per cord was inadequate. They declined to go and cut wood for $5.00 or $6.00 a cord. As a result, unemployment insurance officials suspended payment of benefits to these men. Those who were members of the U.C.C. then protested against this unfair decision. They asked their federal members to have this injustice corrected by the unemployment insurance commission. An impressive group of federal members from Quebec therefore met with the Minister of Labour to explain the situation and ask that this injustice be redressed.

After a thorough inquiry into the matter by senior officials of the unemployment insurance commission, the minister made a statement in the house on March 15, 1956, but I shall not take the time of the house to read that statement.

Following this statement the vast majority of bushworkers received their unemployment insurance benefits, and the C.I.P. remained without the extra hands needed to cut its wood. In order therefore to secure the necessary manpower on April 3, 1956 the company offered through the employment offices in the province of Quebec, $7.50 to $8.50 per 100 cu. ft. cord, i.e. an increase of $2.50 a cord.

Without the intervention of the bushworkers and of the federal members, the Quebec bushworkers would have had to cut wood at $5.00 and $6.00 a cord. It is obvious that the Canadian International Paper has once more attempted to take advantage of the bushworker by offering $5.00 and $6.00 a cord, knowing perfectly well that these prices were below the average price paid by other Quebec lumbering companies.

It is fortunate that there is a professional organization representing the farmers of Quebec and known as the Union Catholique des Cultivateurs, whose directors are men of intelligence and insight, imbued with a spirit of social justice. These are the true defenders of the rights and interests of the farmer and bushworker.

It is obvious that the Canadian International Paper is capable of paying and should pay higher wages to these bushworkers, as well as the highest prices for the pulpwood it buys from farmers or settlers, since according to the financial reports for recent years, its net profit is increasing yearly by approximately ten million dollars.

Unfortunately the Union Nationale government failed to show the same willingness or eagerness to meet the request of the members of the U.C.C. who, in their brief submitted to the hon. minister of lands and forests, on January 15 last, requested that the government set a floor price of at least $20 a cord for pulpwood bought from settlers and farmers.

In February 1955, Mr. Goulet, Liberal member for Témiscamingue in the Quebec legislature, urged the Union Nationale government to set a floor price of $20 per cord for pulpwood bought from settlers and farmers by lumber companies, but the Hon. Maurice Duplessis replied that his government could do nothing to improve the situation.

It is therefore obvious that the Union Nationale government not only fails to protect the interest of settlers and farmers but does join hands with some powerful corporations in taking advantage of workers and farmers.

Fortunately farmers today are better acquainted with such matters and they are determined to elect in Quebec a Liberal government which will know how to protect and defend their interests.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, this group believes in an appropriate scientific division of labour. Consequently I am not going to deal with a number of questions that will be dealt with by other members of this group. But before proceeding to the main purpose of my few remarks I want to express my support of the hon. member for Vancouver South and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in their plea on behalf of a certain group of C.P.R. pensioners. I know that the late Dr. MacDougall intended to deal with this question quite fully. I wholeheartedly support the plea they made on behalf of this group of people this afternoon.

I have had the opportunity to discuss this matter at length on several occasions with Mr. "Tip" O'Neill and I must say that the pensioners are extremely fortunate in having a man as active and as capable on their behalf as is Mr. O'Neill. I have seen him riding a locomotive between Kamloops and Field for a good many years, and I know him quite well. I think he has done his very best on their behalf. I also had the opportunity to discuss the problem with a group of pensioners in Nelson and a group of pensioners in Revelstoke. I have also had the opportunity to read the brief and the correspondence supplied to me by Mr. O'Neill.

I think this group of pensioners have a very sound case. I hope that Mr. O'Neill's pleas, the pleas of others and the comments of members during this debate will move the company to the action that I think the case of these worthy people warrants.

When I was dealing in another debate with the question of the recruitment of labour in Europe to work in the mines in Canada, in reply to certain questions I had raised with respect to Mr. Ramsay's trip to Europe, the minister, as reported at page 4993 of Hansard, said this:

> The purpose of his trip was primarily to secure workers for the base metal mines.

I am quite sure the minister gave the house the information he had at the time, but I am under the impression that the minister has been misinformed. I should like to direct his attention to an article that appeared on the financial page of the Toronto Daily Star of March 5, 6 or 7 last. I am not quite sure of the exact date owing to a certain amount of disorganization in my office caused by the pipe-line debate. Anyway, in that article I found that the president of the Canadian metal mining association stated that these people were being recruited in Europe primarily for the gold mines, and that representations were being made to recruit these people in Europe to work in those mines particularly. I just draw that statement to the minister's attention because I am quite confident that he has not been correctly informed up to date.

In the few minutes in which I wish to deal with this question I want to place a few figures on record. I want to give a few figures with respect to wage rates in base metal mines and in gold mines. As to base metal mines, I know that in the Kootenay area our base metal miners get something over $2 an hour. In Sudbury they get $1.96. In Steep Rock—that is iron ore—they get $2.20 an hour. In Cobalt they get $1.51. As to the gold mines, I find as follows. I have figures for only Timmins and Kirkland Lake. At Timmins they get $1.32 an hour. At Kirkland Lake mines, I am informed, the miners get $1.29 an hour. These are the wage rates in the base metal mines and in the gold mines.

I should now like to direct the minister's attention to a news item that appeared in the Ottawa Journal of June 14. It is a Canadian Press dispatch from London. The heading is "Canada Recruits Miners Overseas" and it reads as follows:

> William Ramsay, personnel manager of the Canadian metal mining association, left today on a 10-day tour of Denmark, Sweden and Finland to recruit hard-rock miners for Canada.
> He has been holding meetings in Britain in recent weeks, interviewing applicants who want to emigrate to Canada to work underground mining gold, silver, uranium and copper in most Canadian provinces from Ontario to the west coast.
> "Altogether, 1,206 men have expressed interest in the idea", said Ramsay. "They still have to pass a medical examination, and some, I expect, will drop out."
> Most of the meetings were arranged through the Canadian immigration service in Britain.

Ramsay, on loan to the mining association from his national employment service job at Kirkland Lake, Ontario, wants husky men between 19 and 35 years of age. He has had pamphlets printed in several languages offering wages—

This is in the mining industry, as miners.

—from a minimum of $1.05 to $1.53 an hour. Some jobs offer an additional production bonus.

"Wages are the same as paid in the locality in which you are working", the pamphlet says.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if that statement is correct and the men are being recruited for work in the mines of Canada at $1.05 per hour, they are being brought to this country under false pretences. They are being offered wages below even the lowest wages paid in the gold mines at the present time. I find that in the Kirkland Lake area out of eight mines, indicating the situation in gold mines as against base metal mines, only one mine is organized in a really effective fashion. There are two that have some form of association which the miners' unions term company unions and three have a recognized union but it is in a very weak condition. There are two that have no union organizations of any kind. I understand that situation prevails in the gold mining industry because many workers are apparently of the opinion that owing to present conditions in that industry they will have little opportunity of improving their working conditions or their wages by supporting a union.

In addition to that, the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, when answering a question I had asked during the debate on emergency gold mining assistance, stated that over a period of 10 years there were only 2,889 persons who had been recruited from abroad to work in the mining industry in Canada. I am quite sure the minister gave me what are technically the correct figures. However, the minister's figures do not tell the whole story. I know from personal experience and from complaints raised by miners in my own constituency that many of these people come to Canada under some other pretext. I know that some come to Canada who are supposed to work on a farm for two years, but it is very natural and very human that when they find the high rate of wages being paid in the mining industry they leave the poor farmer in the lurch. You find them in the mines within six months. We have had a good many cases of that sort. A good many of the people who have come over from Europe, supposedly to work at other employment, have entered the mining industry in the period mentioned by the minister. I do not think his figures represent a true picture in any sense of the word.

I am told by leaders of unions in the mining industry, that is types of leaders who are recognized by labour as qualified and proper trade unionists, that there is no shortage of miners in the base metal mining industry. I have had that statement made very definitely. They all admit a shortage of miners in the gold mining industry, which I can well understand. It is the result of the basic wage rate as compared to base metal mining, and the result of the working conditions and so on. I have received a good number of complaints from the miners working in my constituency who say that these immigrants who are brought to Canada, as they will be possibly under false pretences in many cases and without a firm knowledge of the mining industry, are a hazard to the miners concerned for two reasons. I have had them tell me that men should not be in the mine who cannot speak the English language sufficiently to be understood by other men.

The second reason is their lack of experience. I know of one case in my own district where miners who have been working in the industry for a good many years had some trouble with the management and refused to go into the mine until some men were removed from the labour force. It was not that they had anything against those men personally. I do not blame these people for trying to improve their conditions. In this case the men did not speak the language and were not able to understand instructions with regard to explosives. They certainly lacked experience as far as hard-rock mining was concerned.

If I remember correctly the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys also said that five gold mines closed last year. I wonder if the Minister of Labour could assure the house that those men who lost employment because of the closing of those mines will find employment in other mines. I am particularly thinking of those who are over age and are not normally employed because of pension plans and things of that sort.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have briefly dealt with this question again because I think it is one that demands a thorough investigation by the minister to get the facts. While we in this group believe that Canada requires immigrants, we believe in planned immigration. We do not believe in immigration that displaces long-time Canadian workers and Canadian citizens. Let the immigration that is carried on be conducted on a different basis from that on which, according to the news item, information is given to these people who are being recruited in Europe. I do hope the minister gives this matter very close consideration and makes certain the conditions complained of by the miners do not continue to exist.

Mr. Gregg: I wonder if any other hon. member who is thinking of speaking this afternoon would forgive me if I took advantage of the time between now and five o'clock to answer some of the questions, because it may be some few days before my estimates are considered again. I should like to make some comments on some of the things that have been said today.

First of all the hon. member for Hamilton West, as well as other members, gave wholehearted support to our research plans so that we may be in a position to have more knowledge of our professional and technical working force. She referred to the United Kingdom plan with which I had made myself familiar and which I admire very much. Of course she would be the first to agree that you can do things under a unitary system such as the United Kingdom has in this field of education that we cannot do here. I do hate to hark back, but I must say that this whole field of training and education is within the provincial jurisdiction. Having pointed that out, however, I do agree with practically all that has been said, that it is the duty of the government and the duty of the Minister of Labour and his agencies to do everything in their power to forward the effort.

The hon. member for Hamilton West stressed the importance of the decentralization of authority in those agencies coming under the Minister of Labour in order that they may be prepared for an emergency.

Mrs. Fairclough: But only in time of emergency.

Mr. Gregg: I agree with her up to a certain point. I do agree that a maximum of advance planning for emergency should be done and that it should encompass those agencies. It should, of course, be co-ordinated with all the other departments of government concerned. This is being done and will continue to be done and kept up to date. On the other hand, I cannot agree with her that agencies such as the unemployment insurance commission and the national employment service, in a time of peace such as we now have, should be on a semi-mobilized basis, whereby a Canadian worker who takes advantage of that service may have the feeling that he may be subject to certain compulsions—

Mrs. Fairclough: If the minister will permit, I had no such thought in mind. It was merely a matter of making the facilities of the office and its officers available in an emergency, without having regard for the authority which they might not be able to contact. It had nothing to do with any time except a period of emergency.

Mr. Gregg: If these officials were to be available in such emergencies it would have to be after the appropriate legislation for that emergency had been passed by parliament. I can assure my hon. friend that, so far as the planning stage is concerned, that has received attention.

The Leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for Hamilton West and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre referred to the importance of the revision of the labour code. I have a notion, however, that the revision or the plan leading toward a revision suggested by the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Hamilton West might be somewhat different from that envisaged by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

I believe it is important for us to keep the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act up to date. I do not believe it has all the disadvantages that have been suggested to us today. In saying that I do not want to appear smug or to indicate that we are not giving it a great deal of thought and study. We have been doing that, and I stated in this house last year, when the railway unions were considering the matter of what should be done in their field, that we would be glad to co-operate with them in studying plans for the future. As we stand now, we shall continue to keep this matter under consideration and, when the appropriate time comes, to take action on it.

I agree with the hon. member for Hamilton West that we cannot take approximately 1⅓ million union members lightly. In these postwar years they have displayed evidences of responsibility in their attitude toward conciliation procedure, toward disputes and toward the whole community, which is something that augurs well for the future of labour unionism in Canada in the new larger combined congress.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South said some good things about winter employment and trying to level off the ups and downs of seasonal variation. We did make some good progress last winter. I am not saying that all the improvement was due to the plans that were carried out by a great many people to improve seasonal employment. A good deal of it was due to the fact that there was more work available; but the high peak of unemployment that cropped up in the middle of last winter was not nearly as high as it has been in previous years. As far as my department and the unemployment insurance commission are concerned, they are going to co-operate even more aggressively against unemployment next winter.

My hon. friend said—I took down his words —"that the shortage of scientists was greatly overworked". Some other hon. members took exception to that. He may be interested to learn that yesterday or the day before the president of the Du Pont Company of Canada, speaking in Montreal, said almost the same thing. He said, "Grossly overemphasized". That may be so in his particular industry. However, I do not think we can overlook the fact that we do need more professional and skilled personnel, because it is not only the requirements of the industries that are well established and well on the way that we have to think of. We ought to have more of that kind of people to help initiate new industries and new efforts.

On the subject of the movement of workers, the hon. member for Cape Breton South said we were discriminating; that there was a difference, for instance, between the treatment those workers from Cape Breton who are going out to help in the woods industry in British Columbia and the workers who are coming in under the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. There is not as much difference as he indicated. The arrangement with those going west was that we, the Department of Labour, should pay their expenses out or issue them with warrants and in due course the company should refund all the money to the government. The arrangement with the Department of Citizenship and Immigration is much the same, in that they pay the expenses and the new Canadian repays the money.

He spoke of the controversy between those who sponsor the trade school and those who favour the vocational high school. I think we could discuss that for quite a long time, probably with a good deal of usefulness. Certainly in his opinion the mature worker going to a trade school with nothing else on his or her mind than learning a skill is more effective than a teen-ager high school student between grades 10 and 11 who takes a course at the high school and goes down to the basement and learns some manual skills on the machines and on the lathes. The theory there is, of course, that these young people, having obtained a smattering of some skill, when they go out to work and do not go on to university, are better able to enter into the production force of the country. I want to thank him for his kind words regarding the women's bureau and its director. As a matter of fact she happened to be in the gallery at the time he spoke, and I was glad she was able to hear him.

The hon. member for Macleod referred to teamwork in industry and the importance of encouraging it. I thoroughly agree with him, but I was rather surprised at his pessimism this morning. A member coming from that very rich province of Alberta, he used the word "depression" many times and he used such expressions as "dog eat dog" in industry. In my short period as Minister of Labour since 1950 I have not observed very much of dog eating dog. I believe that during the years since the war there has developed a very high level of responsibility on the part of those who are bargaining and arranging the settlement of disputes, and it is a responsibility not only to those whom they directly represent but to the community as a whole.

The hon. member for York Centre also referred to student aid and the importance of money for training. He said that he was more in favour of providing money for the training of young people in industrial skills than for military training of the old-fashioned type. In that I heartily agree with him.

The hon. member for Broadview criticized the rehabilitation program under the co-ordination arrangements with the provinces, with various departments of government and with the voluntary agencies. He referred to the fact that in the United States last year, through their program which is a great one —I will grant that—they had been able to place some 200,000 handicapped persons in employment. That is a great achievement. In Canada last year we were able to place some 19,773 handicapped persons in industry. We usually multiply our population by 10 and get something approaching the population of the United States. We have had those who were unable to work and could not be placed. Last year over 1,000 were rehabilitated. The first 472 cases originated in the provinces of Alberta, Manitoba, New Brunswick, Newfoundland and Nova Scotia. These 472 cases and the 228 dependents had been maintained by their families in institutions or by public assistance at an annual cost of some $203,000. In their first year of employment they earned collectively almost $1 million. I admit immediately that the plan under way is a co-operative one that must move reasonably slowly; but in conjunction with my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare I can report to the committee that good progress is being made.

The hon. member for Vancouver South, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Kootenay West referred to the unfilled mission of our late friend Jack MacDougall. Jack MacDougall, along with Mr. O'Neill who was here some weeks ago representing the superannuated C.P.R. employees, was constant in his efforts to have something done for these men, as were we all. I think most hon. members know that at that time it was possible for Mr. O'Neill to go to Montreal to see the top echelon of the Canadian Pacific management. I know he made a great impression upon them but unfortunately the success he hoped for was not achieved. I pledge to those who have spoken any assistance I can give to achieve the objectives they have in mind.

The hon. member for Lanark again brought forward the matter of taxation on scholarships. I agree with what he said and I shall discuss this matter with my colleague the Minister of Finance. He spoke also on behalf of older workers between 45 and 65 years of age. We are doing something there. It is not perfect or spectacular, but good solid progress is being made.

I was inspired by the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who made me feel the importance of my role. As he pointed out, it is a great thing to be Minister of Labour for Canada, and I agree heartily that it is a great privilege to serve Canada in this capacity even for a short time. While the speed may not be as fast as he would want it to be, in the past we have made some real progress in carrying out the desires of organized labour and the thoughtful recommendations which they have made at their conventions. I listened to what was said in Toronto and at the C.L.C. convention and I read carefully the speeches and the resolutions. Then each year the government meets with the executive bodies of the labour organizations—this year it will be three instead of four—when we are given details of the projects which they consider to be of utmost importance. In recent years quite a large proportion of those that have been stressed have been carried into effect. I have noted the other points made by the hon. member.

The Leader of the Opposition referred to the importance of reviewing the labour code. I dealt with this when I was replying to the hon. member for Hamilton West. Reference was made also to the national advisory council on manpower. That body was appointed in 1950 at the approach of the emergency in Korea, and it did most useful work in the years following. I outlined that work in the statement I made earlier. The council is still in being and it is my intention to utilize it when we are in possession of more statistics and facts.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Did the council suggest at any time that there should be a national registration in order to have available the necessary information to ensure that manpower would be available in whatever requirements were necessary?

Mr. Gregg: No.

Mrs. Fairclough: Can the minister tell us when the council last met?

Mr. Gregg: It was about a year and a half ago. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George asked for details with regard to grants and whether any had been made in the province of Quebec under the vocational training plan. The answer is yes. The hon. member asked for the amounts, and I may tell him that the cumulative amount to date spent in Quebec under the vocational training plan is $12,433,000. Included in that amount is $1,041,000 for students' aid to universities, and included also is $3,139,400 for capital expenditures for buildings and equipment. There is quite a large item included in that last figure made necessary by the rebuilding of the technical school in Rimouski. I might say also that in the administration of these moneys there has always been the most cordial relations between my officials and those of the province of Quebec.

The hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke suggested that the aid to students provided by the department should be made better known. I think all provinces know about it. I believe I should state here that in the main those who administer the fund in the various provinces are inclined to look upon it as assistance for students after they have entered university rather than as assistance for high school students in order to permit them to enter university. In other words, they administer it prudently for worthy and capable students, normally after their first year, in order that they may complete their courses.

I was glad to hear from the hon. member for Gatineau about the improvement in the condition of the bush workers in his riding.

The hon. member for Kootenay West referred to the statement I made with regard to Mr. Ramsay's mission to England. I gave him what information I had received about that situation when he raised the matter the other day. I am now informed that Mr. Ramsay was turned over to the mining association for no specific kind of recruiting. There was no stipulation as to the kind of recruitment that was to be made or the wages that were to be offered. Consequently the hon. member is correct in stating that I was in error the other day in that portion of my statement. May I say to him that I shall be glad to confer with the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys along the lines he has suggested, because I feel that when an industry is being subsidized by the people of Canada consideration should be given to see to it that workers are not asked to work for depressed wages, particularly when they are brought into the country for that purpose.

Progress reported.

PRIVATE BILLS

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): There are a number of private bills on the order paper for consideration in committee of the whole. Is it agreed that they be all referred to the committee of the whole, under standing order 54 (1), in one motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING

Bill No. 353, to incorporate the Albion Insurance Company of Canada.—Mr. Macnaughton.

DIVORCE BILLS

The Deputy Chairman: There are a number of divorce bills for the committee. Is it agreed that they be considered as one?

Mr. Knowles: I wonder whether you would exclude the first one, as one of my colleagues wishes to say something about it. As far as I know, the others can be dealt with in a group after the first one has been considered.

JEAN BENOIT MAILLE

The house in committee on Bill No. 217, for the relief of Jean Benoit Maille—Mr. Henderson—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Herridge: I wish to bring to the attention of the house something, according to information given to me, of a very unusual nature that occurred during the sitting of the committee on miscellaneous private bills last Tuesday evening. I am reliably informed that a Mr. J. J. Penverne, Q.C., of Montreal, who appeared for the respondent, admitted to the committee obtaining in an irregular manner four blank forms that would normally be sent out under the signature of the Speaker of the Senate to obtain the attendance of witnesses.

I am informed that in sending out these forms this queen's counsel changed the documents, which were headed "Senate of Canada", to read "House of Commons", and then admitted to the members of the committee present to forging the signature of Mr. Rufin Arsenault, chief clerk of committees of the House of Commons.

I am informed that the explanation given by the learned counsel to the committee on miscellaneous private bills, on being questioned, was that this was the only way to obtain the attendance of witnesses before the house, because the house had no provision, unlike the Senate, to compel the attendance of witnesses.

I think that is a very serious situation when a queen's counsel admits to forging the signature of the chief committee clerk of the House of Commons on documents calling for witnesses.

Mr. Simmons: May I interrupt the hon. member? I was on that committee and I do not remember seeing that the signature of Mr. Arsenault was forged. It was typewritten on the document.

Mr. Herridge: I am just dealing with the information given to me.

Some hon. Members: The information is wrong. Check your sources.

Mr. Herridge: I have raised this question because, if that is correct, it is in my opinion a very serious matter indeed. I think this bill should be referred back to the committee for an explanation by the chairman of the committee as to what actually happened before the committee.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted to say so, the chairman of the committee concerned is not present. Whilst I know there are hon. members here who were present at the hearings, and who could probably clear up the difficulty that may exist at the moment, I doubt whether the result would be anything more than perhaps to convince my hon. friend that his information is not wholly right. I think it would be better if we left the bill until the chairman of the committee could discuss it with the hon. member, and therefore I think hon. members would agree with me that we ought to adjourn the debate.

Mr. Herridge: Yes, Mr. Chairman, but before the debate is adjourned could I ask the minister one question? The hon. member for Yukon said the signature was typed. If the gentleman in question admitted typing the signature of the chief clerk of committees of this house and sending out a form that should come from him, I think that is an admission of a most irregular procedure. I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Harris: I quite agree.

Mr. Wylie: Before the adjournment is considered, may I say that I happen to be a member of that committee, and the hon. member for Yukon is another member; the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) was there and perhaps two or three others. This question was dealt with by our committee. Despite the fact that our chairman is not here today, I think what has been said throws rather a reflection on our committee. I think it should be dealt with today. I must admit that the name of Mr. Arsenault was not written, it was typed by this lawyer's secretary, and I think we should dispose of this now. It was given a good deal of consideration by the committee. As a matter of fact we had two sittings, and we sat until ten o'clock one evening. I feel it has been given all the consideration that should be given.

Mr. Harris: May I speak a second time?

Mr. Knowles: We are in committee; speak as often as you like.

Mr. Harris: I realize that, but I had forgotten for the moment. As a matter of fact the chairman of the committee spoke to me yesterday, though not about this particular point. He said that as far as he knew this bill would not be contested when it came into the committee of the whole but that if it were would I ask for an adjournment on any point contested, because he would like to speak to it. I do not know whether he had this in mind, but I hope members will allow the matter to be adjourned now so we may proceed to the other bills.

Mr. Knowles: I think the proper motion is for further consideration to be postponed, as was moved by the Minister of Trade and Commerce on another occasion.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I disagree.

The Deputy Chairman: May I submit that if it is the wish of the committee of the whole, the chairman should be instructed to report progress on this bill and ask for leave to sit again.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

PROVISION OF ANNUAL HOLIDAYS WITH PAY FOR EMPLOYEES

The house resumed, from Friday, May 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. Knowles for the second reading of Bill No. 211, to provide for annual holidays with pay for employees.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I think the sponsor of the bill would like to move it forward, and on May 11, when this bill was last discussed in the house, I had just about completed my remarks at six o'clock. However, I find that just before I stopped talking I made a statement which was wrong and which I should like to correct now. At that time I was making a summary of the various provincial laws related to vacations with pay. I had said that two weeks' vacation with pay after one year of employment is a standard at the present time in effect in only one province. When I said that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked, "Which one", and in reply I said in error, "British Columbia."

The fact is that such a law has been in force in Saskatchewan for several years. In British Columbia a similar law had been passed but had not been proclaimed at that time, and I believe it will not be proclaimed until two weeks from now, on the 1st of July.

In my remarks at that time I made the point that I felt that within the highly organized industries which come under federal jurisdiction this matter should be left, as my hon. friend said this afternoon in that namby-pamby fashion, to collective bargaining procedures.

Mr. Knowles: I said I did not like to see the minister used as a tool of resistance against progressive legislation.

Mr. Gregg: I think there is something to be said in this respect. Because of the influence which does attach to federal legislation extending across the country, if we accept two weeks as the proper minimum standard our action may be regarded as pressure on some provinces to provide the same standard whether or not this is a standard which, in the light of their own experience and circumstances, is warranted. The Leader of the Opposition indicated this afternoon that when the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act was passed by parliament it was immediately copied or followed in the province of Ontario.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite).]

If, on the other hand, we were to decide that one week after one year of employment is the proper minimum standard, this might be regarded as placing a brake on an upward revision in provinces which may consider it expedient to provide for some increase over one week. We have been influenced in our own thinking up to this point by the fact that without legislation in the federal field, more favourable vacation with pay plans are being adopted year by year, by the fact that the trend toward annual paid vacations has developed in the United States without either state or federal legislation, and by the experience in the United Kingdom where legislation providing for paid vacations is confined to certain industries subject to the wages councils act which are, generally speaking, the industries in which the workers are to a large extent unorganized and which have no counterpart in our federal field.

I should like to call to the attention of hon. members the schedules which you, sir, permitted me to include in my remarks on May 11. Those figures indicate that workers in the federal field are making pretty rapid progress in getting vacations with pay, which is the object of the bill.

In view of the considerations I have mentioned, I am not prepared to support the bill at this time.

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have been looking at the debate that occurred on May 11 on this subject. I find that on that occasion the sponsor of the bill introduced it, the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) spoke, and the debate has not been resumed until now. The general principle of the bill is one that I should like to support, as was done by the member for Hamilton West. If we get, as we should, into the committee stage on this bill we can examine the details carefully and see what changes might be considered necessary, but at this stage of the debate the actual sections of the bill have to be left to one side.

I noticed that in his speech on this subject on May 11 the minister dealt with the problem of legislation and collective bargaining. In other words, he suggested and repeated today that matters such as vacations with pay might better be left to collective bargaining than be introduced by way of legislation. That is a standard argument when measures such as this are brought forward, and there is room for disagreement as to how much should be left to collective bargaining and how much should be enacted by parliament.

However, in this particular instance the idea of vacations with pay has become an accepted condition of life fairly well across Canada. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the sponsor of the bill, pointed out that British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec all have legislation on this subject, and that New Brunswick has legislation on vacations with pay with a limited application. Hence when you look at the broad picture of Canada you find that 90 per cent, if not more, of the population has accepted the idea of legislation with regard to vacations with pay. I think that fact must be taken into account as an indication that public opinion is in favour —to the extent of 90 per cent of the population—of legislation rather than, as the minister suggests, leaving the matter to collective bargaining.

Then the hon. member for Hamilton West pointed out on May 11—and these are her words as reported in Hansard at page 3834—as follows:

> . . . the virtue in the legislation is that it covers all workers, whether or not they are members of unions or negotiating groups. The main argument against leaving arrangements of this sort to negotiating bodies is that those workers who are not unionized are left out and do not enjoy the privileges which may be extended to those who belong to unions.

The minister has indicated that the 400,000 persons who come under federal jurisdiction in labour matters are highly unionized and to that extent, in his opinion, they are looked after in this regard. But I think there is great weight to the argument of the hon. member for Hamilton West when she says that those who are not in the unions and have not the advantage of collective bargaining should receive some consideration, and that this can be done through legislation.

I examined carefully the table which the minister filed on May 11. I checked that table with his statement as he was relating the facts in the table to the course of the argument. As his argument is set out in Hansard, the impression tends to be left that between 6 per cent and 7 per cent of the people under federal jurisdiction are not looked after in so far as vacations with pay are concerned. That happens to be set out in a paragraph by itself and naturally stands out, but it is a bit misleading when you look carefully at the table, because the table shows that over 50 per cent of the employees under federal jurisdiction do not get vacations with pay in the period of one or two years. They must wait for three years, five years or more than five years or else they do not get it at all.

Just recently the minister said that these workers were making—and these were his words—pretty rapid progress in achieving this desirable result of vacations with pay. I think they are not making progress at all, or at least it is very slow progress when you look at that table and see that some of them must wait for five years before they become eligible for a vacation with pay.

Another argument advanced by the minister was that legislation authorizing, for example, one week's vacation with pay after a year's service might tend to put a brake on legislation in the various provinces or collective bargaining looking toward a greater period of vacation than now applies, and that federal legislation authorizing one week's vacation with pay after one year's service might tend to slow down some of these other proposals that are coming forward.

That argument deserves consideration, but I wonder whether it really is a brake on progress. Maybe on the other hand you could say—and I think you can say it with justification—that the general approval given by legislation is helpful to those who are wondering about what they should do with regard to vacations with pay; and if it is established by legislation that it is an accepted, normal practice, then those who are negotiating for better conditions with regard to this problem receive assistance. I therefore do not attach too much weight to the minister's argument with regard to the brake being applied by reason of legislation in this field.

I think this bill should be given second reading and be subjected to the scrutiny of the committee rather than be thrown out at this stage. It is the first time that a bill, in the detailed form required, has been brought before parliament. In other years the subject has been discussed by way of resolution, but on this occasion it has been formalized and the bill is now available for members to look at very closely. Consequently I think it should advance beyond this stage so it can be examined with great care in committee, where there is more opportunity for questions and answers to be exchanged and, of course, for amendments to be brought forward.

I think the general principle is sound, namely that there should be vacations with pay. That principle has been developed over a great many years. As the minister pointed out this afternoon, in the United States of America and in the United Kingdom the idea has been adopted. It is immaterial, for the purpose of what I am saying at the moment, whether it has been done by collective bargaining or by legislation. In these modern industrial states such as ours and the two I have mentioned it has become almost universal practice to provide vacations with pay.

The purpose behind that practice is sound. It is basically for health reasons. If the health of the population is sustained, the industrial strength of the nation is greater. In view of the fact that this practice has become accepted in this way over such a large area of Canada and in other progressive states, I think the time has come for parliament to consider this matter and, as the Leader of the Opposition suggested this afternoon, to accept the suggestion from the opposition side of the house. There is no harm in the government accepting good suggestions that come with such frequency from this side of the chamber, and this happens to be one of them.

I think the federal government should not be lagging in progressive matters. Sometimes the federal government, in moving forward ahead of some of the provinces, shows the way and gives the provinces a lead as to what might be done. In this particular instance I think federal legislation would be helpful to the provinces which perhaps have not yet seriously considered this question of vacations with pay. I see no objection to the parliament of Canada giving a lead to the provinces generally. It is done in other matters and I do not see why it cannot be done in this field. For these and other reasons that I might bring forward, I am prepared to support this bill.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): I for one, in rising to support the bill that is before the house, would like to see a bill of this nature go before the industrial relations committee. I am quite sure, though I cannot recall him mentioning it, that the mover of the bill would have no objection to that course being followed. The hon. member informs me he so stated when he opened the discussion on second reading.

When this matter was discussed on May 11 the Minister of Labour set out in some detail the position he intended to take, which position he again summarized for the house this afternoon. I must say that I regret he was not sufficiently moved by the exhortation made earlier this afternoon by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that he might act a little more in the role of a visionary or a prophet by putting forward to his colleagues advances in labour and social legislation. Perhaps he does more of that behind the scenes than he does on the floor of the house. He may have noticed that we on this side were encouraged by his fairly forthright statement in respect to wages that are paid in the gold mining industry.

I would say that had he seen fit this afternoon to rise and state that he would be prepared to support the principle of this bill and have it go to the industrial relations committee for study, he would have received an even more vociferous round of applause from some of us over on this side of the house.

[Mr. Churchill.]

I must say that having looked over some of the remarks made on May 11 I find it difficult to call the line of reasoning which he sets forth there as "liberal". Rather it is much more the line of argument that has already been described, that this is a matter that should be left to be decided by the process of collective bargaining. I am going to read briefly from the minister's remarks, just to refresh the minds of hon. members. This is found on page 3838 of Hansard for May 11, 1956:

> Where working conditions for a large proportion of employees in any jurisdiction are already established by collective bargaining, it could very well be that standardization through legislation is not desirable. When working conditions are left to collective bargaining there is the ability to inject into them a flexibility in determining standards which is lacking when any government introduces minimum standards. In some instances an increase in wages or salaries or an improvement in some one or more fringe benefits may be more acceptable to the employees than a longer paid vacation leave.

I may say, Mr. Speaker, that in relation to the subject matter of this bill, I found the latter part of the minister's argument to be rather specious. In the first instance the statistics he gave us on that occasion indicate that only 46·7 per cent of the employees who come under the jurisdiction of federal legislation in the field of labour now enjoy, through the collective bargaining process, the proposal that this bill makes. In my opinion he entirely disregards the fact that the people who do not enjoy that position, by and large, are those who certainly have not the bargaining power to secure the other fringe benefit to which he referred in the latter part of his statement.

I think the truth of what I am suggesting is demonstrated by the fact that the organized labour congress and the strongly organized unions, who have holiday provisions as good as or better than those the bill would provide, are the strongest advocates of the adoption of suitable minimum legislation in the field of annual holidays, as they are in other fields of labour legislation. They do not need it, but they recognize that there are large elements of the working force of this country who are not in a position to organize as effectively as they have organized and to win the conditions which they enjoy through collective bargaining.

Certainly I have never, at the large number of trade union conventions of various kinds which I have attended, heard the complaint that the provision of minimum standards by legislation reduced the flexibility of the trade union movement in its bargaining position. I do not know from what source I have heard that argument except from the conservative-minded Minister of Labour, or should I say a Minister of Labour expressing a rather conservative attitude on behalf of the government. I feel that even now, in spite of what the Minister of Labour has already stated, he might consider the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre that this bill be allowed to proceed past second reading and go to the standing committee on industrial relations for detailed study.

At this point I should like to appeal to some of my colleagues on the other side of the house who come from British Columbia to express their personal views on this subject matter. I remember being rather delighted on one occasion, I am not sure whether it was last session or the session before, when a bill affecting the rights of labour was introduced by my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and all the British Columbia members on the other side of the house rose in support of that bill. I am quite sure they could have a great leavening effect upon the conservative position which the minister has taken if they would get up and extol the virtues of the legislative provisions for annual holidays which we have enjoyed in British Columbia for a good many years. I am sure if they got up they would say this legislation was introduced by a government in which the Liberal party comprised certainly the largest element.

I am sure they would confirm what I have been saying. This matter is so generally accepted in British Columbia at the present time that the provision which was put through the legislature at the last session in Victoria created very little stir. In my opinion it was thrown in at the tag end of the session in Victoria as something of a sop to the labour movement of British Columbia because of the fact that every other demand that organized labour had been making in British Columbia had met a flat refusal by the administration there. Nevertheless I will say that, as far as I am aware, from no political quarter in British Columbia was any objection whatsoever raised to the fact that next year our holidays with pay act will include this provision of two weeks instead of one week of annual holidays with pay.

I do not think there is a great deal more that I can usefully add to the discussion that has taken place, Mr. Speaker, except perhaps to say in closing that to my mind this is one of the subjects which is almost self-evident as a suitable field for legislation in this era in which we live. Because of the pace of our modern industrial society it is becoming almost universally recognized in the minds of all people with any liberality in their minds at all that an annual holiday from the hectic pace of the society in which we live is as essential to the maintenance of a decent standard of living as food and clothing.

Apart from anything else, if we are going to take corrective measures to reduce the number of cases of people who break down under the strain of our society and who have to find protection, at heavy public expense in some instances, in various sorts of institutions which society provides, we have a responsibility to the people of Canada to reduce the incidence of that sort of thing by providing by legislation that every working person in this country will have the opportunity of at least one period of annual respite from his labours.

Mr. Elmore Philpott (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, in response to the eloquent appeal of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni that some of us on this side express our opinions on this matter, perhaps I shall do some thinking out loud for a change and just say that sometimes some of us on this side find ourselves on the spot. I for one would certainly not speak or vote against any subject on which the government had taken a firm and final position, and certainly not on any matter of want of confidence. But, as the hon. member has pointed out, on these private bills we do enjoy a very wide measure of discretion.

I think there has been every encouragement from all ministers on this side, from the Prime Minister down, to private members to express their personal opinions. I believe hon. members know that on some occasions, even when the hon. member for Hamilton West was introducing a bill which I did not think was a particularly good bill, we have followed that line. I thought the hon. member for Hamilton West was trying to do what was the right thing, but I did not think her bill was a particularly good one; yet I both spoke for it and voted for it because I thought it was a step in the right direction.

I frankly confess I am not sure whether it is a good thing to try to do by legislation what all hon. members opposite have pointed out is being pretty well done already by the ordinary processes of collective bargaining. The hon. member who has just taken his seat has pointed out that in British Columbia, where we come from, this has no practical bearing at all for, as he has said, we have had for a good many years not only legislation but action as the result of collective bargaining which goes a good deal further than this proposed legislation goes.

Mr. Knowles: Only with respect to employees under the jurisdiction of the provincial legislature.

Mr. Philpott: Of course, only with respect to employees under provincial legislation. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre knows that they are the overwhelming majority and this would apply simply to a small minority. As the hon. member for Comox-Alberni pointed out, the great labour organizations of Canada, the new amalgamated labour organization which is so powerful and of which we all have such great hopes, and which we think will contribute much to this country, even though their members will not benefit in any great way from the legislation proposed, they have given it their moral support.

Contrary to what my hon. friend has just suggested, I think some of the speeches which were made on May 11 had some pretty good points on the opposite side. It seems to me that some of the speeches at least tended to show that one of the weaknesses of this legislation might be this. We all know that when you pass legislation that legislation tends to set the floor, tends to become the standard. If one effect of the passage of the legislation is to minimize rights which it is said unorganized workers or unprotected workers have already won, then it seems to me that it is a bad thing to have the law.

It might be said that I am thinking out loud. I frankly confess that I would be better pleased if our ministers and our government took a slightly different attitude on some of these welfare proposals that come up from time to time. I will frankly mention things like the check-off, and holidays with pay, and I could mention two or three others. I know very well the general argument is that these things are already being looked after by the collective bargaining process, or by provincial legislation, and therefore there is no particular need for us to have federal action along that line. But the federal government has a responsibility to help to set the pace in these things from time to time, and even its moral effect can be important in that regard.

As the hon. member for Comox-Alberni pointed out, during the long life of the Liberal regime in British Columbia, in which we had a very enlightened minister of labour even in the days when it became a coalition government, the attitude we took was quite different from the attitude that is sometimes expressed in this house. Our attitude was this. We felt that harmonious relations between employers and employees were in the interest of the whole country. We know that in most cases disputes between the two branches of industry centre on wages and hours. We know there is another category of dispute which concerns what we might call fringe benefits. I think this is one of the things that would be included in that category. We also know that there is one other great category of labour disputes. In fact some of the most damaging labour disputes we have ever had in Canada were in a different category altogether; that is the category of whether unions have the right to organize and be recognized legally after they have signed up 51 per cent of the workers.

I know there are many hon. members who have been in this house a lot longer than I, but I do not think there are many who remember more of the history of the improvement in general labour laws and labour relations in this country than I. I am sometimes amazed and greatly encouraged by the great improvement which has occurred even in my lifetime. I remember that when I first went to British Columbia about 20 years ago I went to a town, the name of which I shall not mention, to make a speech before the Canadian Club. An organizer for the mine union arrived in the town the same day I did, and within half an hour the brakes had been taken off his car and the car was allowed to run down a hill to be smashed to bits and pieces. At that time the whole atmosphere of labour relations in this country was in a most primitive and backward state compared to what it is now.

We know that chiefly as the result of an improved outlook on the part of the public, certainly in British Columbia, a great improvement has taken place. One of the reasons for improvement in that province was the enlightened legislation placed on the statute books by the minister of labour, who believed it was a good thing to take these matters out of the category of what were termed fringe benefits, certainly to take out of the category of controversy the right of a union to organize peaceably and be recognized by the employer and by the law if it could get 51 per cent of the workers.

We know that as a result of legislation introduced in British Columbia by a Liberal minister of labour that province set the pace for the entire Dominion of Canada. The labour laws which went into effect officially right across the country and which gave to the unions of this country the right to organize in peace and be recognized under the law dated from that enlightened legislation passed in British Columbia.

It seems to me that the attitude adopted by the British Columbia minister of labour has some slight bearing on this particular case today. He thought it was better to grant these things by law than to have them fought over in the ordinary process of collective bargaining. He thought it was better to take these things entirely out of the realm of annual dispute and annual negotiation which would take place between the employer and the employee.

There is one other consideration that appeals to me in connection with this particular bill. Even though it does not do anything to protect those who are protected already, that is those who have the protection of a powerful trade union, it seems to me that the proposal would go a long way toward granting justice to the classes in the community which need protection the most, that is the young girl, the young man or perhaps the new immigrant who has come to this country and knows nothing about the way we operate, knows nothing about our trade unions and so on. This would give a certain protection by law to those people who do not have the support of powerful trade unions.

There is a negative side to this bill, in that it would tend to lower the general level of holidays to be granted, just as a floor price under butter tends to fix the price at that level. If a floor under holidays were set by the government, that would tend to become the general level. I think that has been true in connection with minimum wages covering the lower classes of workers. My thinking at this time is that on balance I do not see how I could vote against this legislation. I would certainly be in favour of voting for the legislation at least to the extent of sending it to the committee on industrial relations, where it could be examined.

On motion of Mr. Philpott the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: On Monday we shall take second reading of the amendment to the Navigable Waters Protection Act; second reading of the bill standing in my name to amend the Veterans Business and Professional Loans Act; then the resolution with respect to the Indian Act; then the house in committee on the Farm Improvement Loans Act, and then second reading of the Income Tax Act.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, June 18, 1956

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

CONCURRENCE IN REPORT OF CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance) moved:

That the report of the civil service commission respecting the position of reference librarian 3, library of parliament, laid upon the table of the house June 13, 1956, be now approved.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the minister if this does anything other than correct a typographical error?

Mr. Harris: No, Mr. Speaker.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL PARKS ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING BOUNDARIES OF CAPE BRETON HIGHLANDS NATIONAL PARK

Hon. W. E. Harris (for the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources) moved the first reading of Bill No. 433 (from the Senate), to amend the National Parks Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

MOTION FOR PAPERS

MONTREAL—HOUSING REDEVELOPMENT PROJECT

Motion No. 85—Mr. Richardson:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Minister of Public Works and the premier of Quebec, the mayor or any other officials of the city of Montreal, regarding the proposed housing redevelopment project in Montreal, since January 1, 1956.

Mr. Winters: Subject to the usual reservation, Mr. Speaker, about first communicating with the government of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ATOMIC ENERGY

STATEMENT REGARDING EXCHANGE OF INFORMATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, is the Minister of Trade and Commerce in a position today to give the house any further information with respect to the question I asked him on Friday which had to do with whether Canada is to get all the atomic information that is being exchanged between the United States and Great Britain?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have the information requested. An announcement was made last Friday of amendments to the United States-United Kingdom bilateral agreement to provide for the following:

(a) An exchange of information on the development, design, construction, operation and use of certain package power reactors and reactors for the propulsion of naval vessels, aircraft and land vehicles; and

(b) The transfer as between the United States and the United Kingdom of certain fissionable materials. Specifically, the amendment will permit the United Kingdom atomic energy authority to purchase U-235 from the United States atomic energy commission. It will also permit the United Kingdom atomic energy authority to sell to the United States atomic energy commission certain quantities of depleted uranium.

The United States atomic energy commission has proposed that our bilateral be amended as per (a) above. It should be noted that in our existing bilateral there is a provision covering the exchange of information on package reactors. The amendment will provide for the inclusion of information on submarine, ship and aircraft reactors.

With respect to (b) above, our existing bilateral does provide for the transfer of fissionable materials as between the two countries. We are now selling natural uranium, plutonium and depleted uranium to the United States atomic energy commission and we have the right to purchase U-235 up to an enrichment of 20 per cent. In other words, the present United States-Canada bilateral does not require amendment in so far as it affects the transfer of fissionable materials as between the two countries.

Mr. Green: In effect, Canada will be put in the same position as the United Kingdom.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes. It is almost in the same position today. The only addition will be an amendment which will provide that we will receive information on propulsion of naval vessels, aircraft and land vehicles.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Green: Has the government in mind any program in connection with the development of engines for aircraft or naval vessels?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No.

HOUSING

MORTGAGE MONEY—GOVERNMENT POLICY RESPECTING INTEREST RATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Is it government policy not to reduce the interest rate on mortgage money for home building unless the United States takes such action first, as reported by the Canadian Press today? Is the government not going to give attention to the serious need for increasing the amount of mortgage money available for home building?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the central part of what my hon. friend said with respect to today.

Mr. Knowles: The first part of my question was based on a Canadian Press dispatch. I asked whether it is government policy—

An hon. Member: The Winnipeg Free Press?

Mr. Knowles: No; I am reading from the Montreal Gazette. I asked whether it is government policy not to reduce the interest rate on mortgage money for home building unless the United States takes such action first.

Mr. Harris: No, Mr. Speaker. We judge the requirements of the Canadian economy according to our best judgment. It is true that outside influences may affect our decisions from time to time, but any such statement would be incorrect.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the minister a supplementary question. Does he not realize that the requirements of the Canadian situation call for mortgage money for homes at a lower interest rate now?

EGGS

ALLEGED IMPORTS FROM IRON CURTAIN COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Boisvert (Nicolet-Yamaska): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. On May 28 last, in reply to a question by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), the Minister of Trade and Commerce said that in 1951, 195,000 cases of eggs were exported from Canada and 95,000 cases were imported into Canada. Is it true, as it has been alleged in the publicity of the Union Nationale party in Quebec—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Boisvert: —that these 95,000 cases of eggs, or any part of them, were imported from behind the iron curtain?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was good enough to give me notice of his question and I have been able to look up the statistics. I find that the statement referred to is completely false. There were no importations of eggs to Canada from countries behind the iron curtain in 1951. The 95,000 cases of eggs were imported from the following countries: United States of America, Holland and Eire. The reason for importation in 1951 was the short supply of eggs in Canada at that time.

The average price of eggs to producers in Canada in 1951 was the highest average price in Canada for the years 1950-1955 inclusive.

The recent shipment of 10,000 cases of eggs from Poland was the first shipment into Canada from Poland. Egg prices have gone up in Canada since that shipment was received.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

INQUIRY AS TO SETTING UP OF CANADA COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister advise the house what it is that is holding up the establishment of the Canada Council for so long?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): This matter has been under consideration and it has very many implications that have been carefully studied. There is, I understand, a large body of public opinion in favour of doing that, and there is another body of public opinion that fears that would be an intrusion into the domain of education that is properly of provincial jurisdiction. Those are some of the considerations that have been studied.

There is also the consideration that is being given to the possibility of creating a body composed of the kind of Canadian personalities that would make it a really influential body that would command the respect of the whole community. Of course, there are many such persons in Canada but they are all very busy and it has not yet been possible to devise the kind of scheme I should like to recommend to parliament.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

QUEBEC PROVINCIAL ELECTION—REFERENCE TO STATEMENT BY MR. HOUDE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. Wilfrid Dufresne (Quebec West): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister any comment to make on Mr. Camillien Houde's statement last Thursday night in Montreal, to the effect that the main publicity agent for the Liberal party in the province of Quebec, Jean-Louis Gagnon, founded in Quebec city on October 10, 1936, a communist politburo?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): No, I do not care to make any comment on what Mr. Houde may have said. I think Mr. Jean-Louis Gagnon is well known to the Canadian people and he requires no defence from me.

Mr. Dufresne: I should like to direct a supplementary question. Is it the intention of the Prime Minister, as the Canadian leader of the Liberal party, to repudiate the following statement written by the said Jean-Louis Gagnon, who calls himself a Liberal, after the foundation of the communist politburo when he declared:

(Translation):

The bourgeois are like pigs; I am beginning to understand Lenin. Ça ira—(we'll manage it)

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Dufresne:

—all the priests—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Dufresne:

—we will kill them.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member realizes when he asks his question at this moment that it should be a question relating to the administration of the affairs of this country. The question he is now proceeding to ask is directed to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) as the leader of the Liberal party. The Prime Minister is here as the prime minister in charge of the affairs of the government.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

TABLING OF WHITE PAPER, "CANADA'S DEFENCE PROGRAM 1956-57"

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I should like to advise hon. members that the defence white paper, "Canada's Defence Program 1956-57", was tabled today and is being distributed in the usual way.

INQUIRY AS TO REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES TO COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): With reference to the white paper to which the Minister of National Defence has just referred, may I ask the Minister of Finance if he has given the consideration he said on Friday he would give to my question as to whether or not the defence estimates could be referred to the committee on estimates.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): I have given some consideration to it, but I have not completed the consideration.

NAVIGABLE WATERS PROTECTION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING APPROVAL BY MINISTER, ETC.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works) moved the second reading of Bill No. 388, to amend the Navigable Waters Protection Act.

He said: This bill seeks to amend part I of the Navigable Waters Protection Act, which is that part of the statute administered by the Department of Public Works.

This part of the act, as it presently stands, provides that no work shall be built in a navigable water unless the governor in council has first approved of the plan and site of the work. Persons proposing to construct works in navigable waters are required to submit a plan of the work and a description of the site to the Minister of Public Works. Public notice of the proposal is also required. To this end applicants must deposit a copy of the plan and description in the local land registry office and insert an advertisement in the Canada Gazette as well as in two local newspapers. One month must elapse after the advertising is thus inserted before the application can be submitted to the governor in council.

Our navigable waters have played a vital part in Canada's development and they continue to do so even though others forms of communication have rapidly developed over the years. One of nature's greatest gifts to Canada is a plentiful supply of rivers and lakes. The pioneer era of Canada was dominated by our rivers. The country was explored and opened up along their channels because they then were the only routes through a land of impenetrable forests. Exploration, settlement, trade and national development all have made use of them. At the time of confederation, by far the greatest part of what is now Canada was still dependent upon them.

It is not too much to say, in fact, that in the first half of the 19th century Canada was dependent upon her waterways. In the second half, railways provided a new impetus and we have gone on from there to build up a transportation system which relies not on any one but on a number of methods of communication. I think hon. members will agree, however, that our navigable waters continue to be a crucial part of our entire transportation picture and nothing could more graphically illustrate this than that immense project which is now under way, namely, the St. Lawrence seaway.

This act we are seeking now to amend has been interwoven with a great deal of our economic history because it is the instrument the government has used for generations to protect the public interest in seeing that our navigable streams are protected for the use of navigation.

In the year 1886, the then minister of marine and fisheries, Hon. George Foster, moved for leave to introduce a bill respecting the protection of navigable waters, a piece of legislation which he said was mainly an adaptation of the law as it then existed, with some changes in the verbiage and two or three sections added. In other words, in one form or another, this law goes a long way back. The economic pulse of young Canada of 1886 can be sensed in reading the speeches made at that time because they largely revolve around the question of disposal in navigable streams of the immense quantities of sawdust arising from the great industry of the era, lumbering.

One can also catch in that debate of 1886 the voices of the rivalries between shipping interests and the lumbering firms whose enormous quantities of logs sometimes tended to choke our rivers from bank to bank.

A reading of that debate of 1886 leaves no doubt that our parliamentary predecessors felt it important that our navigable waters should be protected and that every reasonable precaution should be taken before authority was granted to permit structures to be built in them. I think it is agreed that this need is as important today as it was then.

However, it has been found that the procedures required by the present statute involve long delays in obtaining the approval of the governor in council. These delays are particularly onerous in these days of rapid development; and the statute is specific in requiring that the approval of the governor in council be obtained before construction of the work is commenced. Moreover, if a structure is started without the necessary approval there is no authority whatever under the statute for giving it subsequent approval.

[Mr. Winters.]

Even having regard to the essential character of our navigable waters and the importance of protecting them, the present statute seems too rigid for present-day application. The number of applications received is quite high and it is on the increase. Last year, for example, approximately 300 applications were processed. It is desirable, therefore, that procedures be developed which will allow applications to be processed expeditiously. This bill seeks to simplify the procedures without sacrificing the element of protection. It provides that the Minister of Public Works may approve the plan and site, thereby reducing the delays involved in referring to the governor in council the multitude of applications, many of them minor in importance and involving only small amounts of money. Further provision is made to enable the Minister of Public Works to approve the plan and site after construction has been commenced if, before commencing construction, the applicant has obtained in writing the consent of the Minister of Public Works.

Under the statute as it now stands, there are certain exemptions, namely, small wharves, groynes, bank and beach protection works or boathouses that do not interfere with navigation and do not cost more than $1,000. These the minister is authorized to approve without the application having to pass through all the stages required by the statute for larger projects.

This bill enlarges this scope and makes exemptions applicable to all works other than certain specific types which, no matter how inexpensive, will interfere with navigation. The works which will not be exempted are bridges, dams, booms, aboiteaux or causeways. The limitation of $1,000 which was enacted many years ago is now considered unrealistic and the bill raises this to $5,000.

At present a lawful work may be rebuilt or repaired if in the opinion of the minister such rebuilding or repairing does not increase the interference with navigation. Many persons desire to change a work in such a way that it will not increase substantially the interference with navigation, but because the change cannot be called rebuilding or repairing they are required to conform to all the formal steps required by the statute. The bill simplifies this procedure in the case of any alteration which would not substantially increase the interference with navigation.

The statute now provides that if a work was built or was in the process of construction on the first day of June, 1938, without the approval of the governor in council subsequent approval may be sought.

Nothing built since that time can be approved unless the provisions of the statute have been fully complied with.

Since June 1, 1938 some works have been constructed without approval. As I have indicated, as the statute now stands, they are not capable of being approved. It is considered that if an unapproved work merits approval and has been in existence for a reasonable period of time without creating navigational difficulties there should be authority to approve it. The bill establishes this period as five years.

It is considered that the changes will simplify the act and facilitate its administration without reducing the protection which the government considers should be exercised over our navigable waters.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, the minister in opening the debate on this bill dealt at some length with the importance of the Navigable Waters Protection Act and if I heard him correctly he used words to this effect, that navigable waters should continue to be a crucial part of our transportation system. That, of course, is very true but I am afraid at least some of the terms of this bill are removing the restrictions to a greater extent than is necessary to meet modern conditions. After all, once a work of this kind is placed in a navigable water it is there for many, many years and it is very difficult to do anything about it. If navigation happens to be impeded by that work then there is no way of meeting that situation, that is in ordinary practice, and the particular lake, river, bay or harbour is impeded to the extent that work has been erected.

The act, of course, was designed as a means of helping transport by water, of insuring that there would not be unreasonable interference with that type of transportation. As the minister has said, the act has always been considered one of the most important acts on the statute books of Canada. It deals with a subject that is primarily the responsibility of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) and not the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) at all. I suggest the Minister of Public Works is in this picture only as a supernumerary. If one refers to the report of the Department of Transport he will find that part 2 of the Navigable Waters Protection Act is administered by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler), whereas part 1, which is the general overriding provision, has up to this time been the responsibility of the cabinet as a whole; as the minister will admit, the governor in council has been responsible for the proper carrying out of the first part of the Navigable Waters Protection Act.

My first objection to this bill is that, should it become law, the cabinet will go right out of the picture and one minister alone, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters), will become the dictator, shall I say, under the Navigable Waters Protection Act. He is not responsible at all for water transport, which is the responsibility of the Minister of Transport, and yet the Minister of Public Works is to be given complete jurisdiction over obstructions placed in navigable waters.

I am concerned primarily with the position of the Minister of Transport, who is responsible for our national harbours, and also for seven harbour commissions which I believe have been incorporated under dominion statutes. There is a provision written into this bill which provides that the Minister of Transport must be consulted in certain cases, but he is not given the same power as that to be given to the Minister of Public Works even with regard to works erected in one of our great national harbours.

The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage) has jurisdiction under the act passed last year over international rivers. If there were to be a work erected, say, on the Columbia or on the Saint John river, then the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources would have to issue a permit. Where is he to be in this picture? Under this bill the Minister of Public Works could authorize the erection of a dam, a pier or other obstruction on the Columbia, the Saint John or the Yukon river and the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources would have no authority whatever to interfere.

The Department of Fisheries should be concerned with obstructions placed in navigable waters, and it might be vital to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney) as to whether an obstruction should be permitted in waters where naval vessels are plying. There are many reasons why the decision as to what works should be erected in navigable waters should be placed before the cabinet as a whole rather than being left in the office of the Department of Public Works.

The Minister of Public Works, for whom I have great respect, is the minister from Nova Scotia, but under this bill he would be permitted to authorize works anywhere on the British Columbia coast and the ministers from British Columbia need not know anything about them. They would have no opportunity to deal with the application for a work of that kind. On the other hand, under the present act they would at least have the opportunity to know because the application would have to be passed by the cabinet as a whole.

I suggest to the minister with great earnestness that it is much wiser to keep the decision in the hands of the cabinet with regard certainly to the major works that are going to be erected in navigable waters rather than to leave it to an individual minister. See what it places in the hands of one minister. The time may come when a minister of public works will be able to use this power for patronage purposes or for favouritism to this group or that group or this company or the other company. It is placing the minister's own department in an invidious position. Power of that type should not be given to one minister.

I am afraid this is just a case of the departmental officials thinking that they could get along a lot faster and with far less trouble if they did not have to present these applications to the cabinet, if they could just decide themselves that such and such a work would go in such and such a spot and then give the minister a memorandum and have approval of the scheme without all the fuss and bother of going to the cabinet. We have a cabinet in Canada which is for the very purpose of dealing with situations of this kind, of being there so that you get the judgment of the whole group, men who come from all parts of the country, rather than leaving decisions of this kind in the hands of one minister.

Under the act now in effect the key section is section 4. The first subsection of that section reads as follows:

> No work shall be built or placed in, upon, over, under, through or across any navigable water unless the site thereof has been approved by the governor in council, nor unless such work is built, placed and maintained in accordance with plans and regulations approved or made by the governor in council.

That is the key section of the first part of the present act. In the next section, section 5, we find that any unauthorized works can only be removed by the authority of the governor in council. It is true that the cabinet can tell the Minister of Public Works to have that done but the authority rests with the governor in council. Furthermore, under the present law any regulations under the act have to be passed by the governor in council. Yet in the new bill the whole power to make regulations is taken away from the governor in council and placed in the hands of the Minister of Public Works alone. That, I suggest, is going too far and, frankly, I am hoping that the minister and the other members of the cabinet will be willing to have a further look at the bill rather than try to force it through in the form in which it is presented to the house today.

Then, under the bill we are discussing there is this further power. The Minister of Public Works will be able simply to give a letter saying to a firm: You can go ahead and build that work. He can give that letter without even seeing a plan of the work in question. It is true that eventually the work will have to get approval and plans will have to be filed, but surely it is going too far to allow the minister simply to write a letter to the firm and that is all they require to construct the work. No work in Canada that is going to interfere with navigable waters is of that urgency.

For one thing, the people who are affected should be given time to file complaints. Suppose a logging company comes to the minister and gets a letter permitting it to put a boom at a certain spot which interferes with property abutting on the water. The owner of the land should have the right to make a complaint before consent is given to the placing of the boom. Yet under the bill as presented to the house the minister can authorize such a boom to be placed in those waters and there is no requirement whatever that anybody shall be given notice.

Perhaps with a boom it would be simpler. Possibly I have used a poor illustration because a boom can be moved. But suppose a pier or a dam or something of a permanent nature is installed. Then the owner of the abutting property is very seriously prejudiced. I suggest that the provisions in the original law calling for the filing of plans, advertising and giving people affected time to appear were very sound. They were put there for a very good reason and they should not be overridden at this time simply in order to get faster action in installing a pier or other work.

Furthermore, the minister spoke very favourably of the provision whereby if a work has been in place for five years it can then be authorized. Surely that undermines the whole working of the act. People should not be putting bridges, dams or obstructions of any kind in navigable waters without getting permission first. Yet here we are writing in a section which says to Mr. A or John Jones and Company Limited: If you put in a dam five years ago and have been able to get away with it, that is all right now and we will give you approval. I think that provision should be changed. I do not see any fairness in writing a provision of that type into the law.

The present act also includes a very wide definition of work as found in section 2 (b) which reads as follows:

"Work" includes any bridge, boom, dam, aboiteau, wharf, dock, pier or other structure, tunnel or pipe—

Of course, the word "pipe" is important now that pipe lines are being put under navigable waters.

—or telegraph or power cable or wire and the approaches or other works necessary or appurtenant thereto, or any work, structure or device, whether similar in character to the foregoing or not, which may interfere with navigation.

That definition is very wide. It covers everything. But there is a provision written into the law at the present time for taking out certain specific works if they are of a value of $1,000 or less. That is contained in subsection 2 of section 4 which reads as follows:

The provisions of this section do not apply to small wharves or groynes or other bank or beach protection works, or boathouses, if in the opinion of the Minister of Public Works—

Here he was given discretion in the original act, and I think properly so.

—(a) they do not interfere with navigation, and

—(b) do not cost more than one thousand dollars.

That meant that the minister could exempt these small wharves or groynes or bank or beach protection works or boathouses from the act if they did not interfere with navigation and if they did not cost more than $1,000. But now in the new bill the minister goes at it the other way. He says that a bridge, boom, dam, aboiteau or causeway are in the first class and everything else, all these other things, wharves, docks, piers, tunnels, pipes, telegraph or power cables or wires and so on are in another class. They are all put in the category: "if, in his opinion, he thinks they do not substantially interfere with navigation"—the word "substantially" appears for the first time in this bill; it was not in the original act at all—and then in addition, "if the value of the work does not exceed $5,000" instead of $1,000. In other words, the minister will be able to exempt every work up to $5,000 in value if he thinks it does not substantially interfere wtih navigation, except in the case of a bridge, boom, dam, aboiteau or causeway. I think that is going rather far. I think it would be far better perhaps to extend the exemptions as contained in the present act rather than taking everything out except bridge, boom, dam, aboiteau and causeway.

I should like to comment on the effect of this bill on the harbours of Canada. I refer particularly to the national harbours and to those harbours which have harbour commissions. Of course, both types of harbours come under the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler). The latter harbours are Belleville, Hamilton, New Westminster, north Fraser, Port Alberni, Toronto, Winnipeg and St. Boniface. Under this bill, as it stands, the Minister of Public Works can authorize any work in any one of those harbours that have their independent commissions such as New Westminster, Hamilton and the others to which I have referred. He has the absolute authority to authorize that work in each one of those harbours. With regard to the national harbours, the bill provides that consent must be obtained from the Minister of Transport, with two exceptions; and they are extremely important exceptions. Of course, this particular feature is very important to me as a member from Vancouver because our harbour is the lifeblood of our whole city. The exception is that the minister can give a letter authorizing a work in the Vancouver harbour without any reference whatever to the national harbours board or to the Minister of Transport. Furthermore, the minister can make regulations of all kinds—apparently even dealing with national harbours—without referring to the Minister of Transport.

I suggest to the minister that he should be unwilling to have himself placed in that position. We do not want him authorizing on his own works for the Vancouver harbour. Certainly they should have the approval of the national harbours board and of the Minister of Transport. But once the Minister of Public Works gives such-and-such a company a letter saying that they can build a pier, and once they go ahead on that letter and start building the pier, it is going to be fairly hard to get them stopped. It is just breaking down the whole chain of authority in that harbour. I hope the minister will agree to make some change in that provision.

I repeat that this appears to be a case where the minister's department is asking for more power than is necessary and, in so doing, is running the risk of breaking down an act which is one of the foundation stones for our water transport in Canada.

This nation will always be much concerned with water transport. The minister himself pointed out what a great difference the St. Lawrence seaway is going to make. Of course, that is true. We have new harbours opening up. I think it was he who just a few weeks ago told us about the possibility of a new harbour up on Ungava bay. We are trying to get harbours in the Alaskan panhandle; we are trying to persuade the Americans that they should let us have harbours in the panhandle on the west coast. I am afraid it is quite a tall order. However, there are going to be these great harbour developments and great developments in the other waters of Canada, not only on the great lakes and the inland lakes, but also on the seacoast.

Rather than rush this bill through today in the form in which it now stands, I suggest that the minister agree to have another look at it and just see if he cannot propose amendments which will remove these objectionable features of the bill as it now stands.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, as the minister said, while on the surface this is not an extremely important bill, actually it is a very important bill because, as he said, our navigable waters are a crucial part of our transportation system.

I listened with close attention and considerable interest to what the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) had to say. While I am not certain of all aspects that related to his argument, I think he was on sound ground in urging the minister to give further consideration to certain clauses in this bill.

As I understand it, we have made considerable progress in this matter. We are doing things—or the minister will be doing them if this bill is passed—that actually required a special act of parliament many years ago. I have read the bill over and I must say that I am not clear as to what some of the sections actually mean; and I am not any more informed after listening very carefully to the minister's statement. I am not reflecting on the minister. It is possibly because of my own stupidity. As I see it, however, in this bill there are certain changes made that will have a major effect on administration. According to this act, in order to meet an emergency situation for any corporation or person, the minister may not require them to submit plans, advertise in local papers, advertise in the Gazette and so on before making application. Then I understand that the minister may approve the plans, the site and the structure in the normal way and he may also approve the site and the building of something that has been commenced prior to any application. Personally, I think that procedure is most unsound. I have seen some of it in my personal experience in the past, Mr. Speaker. Then his limitation is raised from $1,000 to $5,000 in certain projects, provided they do not substantially affect navigation. That word "substantially" is a difficult one to define, from my understanding of the word. Then again, to me an interesting section of the bill is the one that provides that if the five years have elapsed since some structures were erected or since completion, the minister can make them legal structures according to this bill.

An hon. Member: May.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. Herridge: Yes; may. I wonder why? A good many piles, dolphins and other things that are a hazard to navigation have been driven without any reference to the minister's officials at all in the past. Our country is full of structures that were erected without authorization and without any submitting of plans, sites and things of that sort. I am not talking about large structures. I am talking about dolphins for tying booms, isolated piling in different sections of the lakes and things of that sort. As I read this bill now the minister has power to make these structures legal structures.

I do not quite see the necessity for the argument with regard to urgency. These companies are mostly lumber companies, shipping companies and warehouse people, and why are they not required to exercise the normal foresight and go through the procedures through which other people have to go in connection with things of this sort? I cannot see why this one group of people should be exempted from exercising the normal foresight on occasions when that is necessary.

I, like the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), think the major objection to the bill is that it places in the hands of the minister powers that were formerly in the hands of the governor in council. I base my objections on the same reasons. I can see some conflict of interests, and I think nowadays there is more necessity than ever before for co-operation between departments. What happens if the minister gives authority to build a structure under the Navigable Waters Protection Act and then later it is found that it conflicts with something under the international rivers act? I know that one has to get a licence under that act if the water level is substantially raised at the international border. The minister may give a permit to erect a structure of a certain type without knowledge of the fact that another department is considering raising the level of the water for power purposes or damming a lake or a river. I think, therefore, it would be a protection to all the parties concerned, not only to the government but to the persons who are making applications.

Some mention was made of fisheries. I think the situation as it is today, especially following the introduction of the international rivers bill at the last session and the unusual interest and concern about fisheries, more than ever requires that these applications should be granted as a result of a cabinet decision and not as the result of the decision of one minister.

Now, Mr. Speaker, those are the few brief remarks and suggestions I have to offer. In my opinion the minister would be wise to have this bill referred to the committee on railways, canals, and telegraph lines, where we could have the officials before the committee as well as other interested persons, and find out what is what. It is a very difficult procedure to understand. I think if the bill were sent to the committee I mentioned we could ask questions and ascertain to better advantage from the officials and the minister the purpose and effect of this legislation on navigable waters in Canada.

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I too, listened with a great deal of interest to what the minister said when he moved second reading of the bill and to the observations of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) and the C.C.F. member who has just taken his seat. I also wonder if we are not reaching a point today where we are trying to allocate too much power to a particular minister. I do not propose to take this opportunity to castigate this particular minister who is introducing the bill, but on an examination of the legislation I find that earlier this session we gave the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) certain authority with respect to increased allowances under P.F.R.A. Here, we have a second instance of more and more authority passing from the governor in council into the hands of a minister in charge of a particular department.

I understand that some years ago works of this type were covered by bills which were ratified by parliament before being undertaken. Today we find that more and more, under the guise of urgency, these powers are being transferred to ministers. I believe it is time we had a second look at a lot of these things. The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) suggested the bill be referred to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines for particular study, after which we could come back with further recommendations.

I would be prepared to support the proposal. However, I think possibly, as was suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, this covers specifically some of the things that come directly under the Department of Transport. I wonder, therefore, if it would not be possible to have a committee composed, let us say, of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters), the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) and the member of the cabinet who comes from the province in which the work itself is to take place. If the minister is going to have to take authority in order to get business done in this house, then it might be desirable to break it down to the point where at least the province in which the work is to be done has some representation on the committee. It may be that the minister from the province in which the work is to be done may not be particularly interested in that department, but it might give him an opportunity of expressing the point of view of the province on the matter. I believe there is another committee set up known as the east slope of the Rockies committee, and I believe that it is composed of certain cabinet ministers as well as delegates from the provinces. I understand they have worked quite amicably in solving their problems.

Now, the great danger as I see it is not only the bypassing of parliament—that was done some years ago when parliament gave authority to the governor in council to authorize this work—but now we are also bypassing the governor in council and giving the minister the right to authorize certain work. I can see a certain danger in this by reason of the fact that the minister may be unfamiliar with the project being undertaken. While on the surface it might seem like a sound piece of work, in the long run it may prove to be quite the opposite. I noticed that in the bill there is the word "substantial" which gave me some concern. On examining the dictionary I found that the definition is, of a considerable amount.

I would say that if the danger to navigation must be of a considerable amount we should know what that amount is. I have in mind, for instance, speaking of bridges, booms, dams, aboiteaux and so on, that there is a certain amount of diking going to waste on the Fraser river, which is a navigable stream. We have reason to believe that the booms in the Fraser river are affecting the dikes, and there is cause for alarm there. Whether or not it is sufficient in amount to have the minister suggest that booms should be done away with, I do not know. I am not satisfied that he has indicated to us what control we would have over the setting up of further booms or dams or any other of these works that are suggested in the bill itself.

In so far as the question of urgency is concerned, I feel very much as did the hon. member for Kootenay West. Certainly, as he suggested, any lumberman or anyone who is thinking of undertaking such a work should have given his plan sufficient thought to be able to give the minister an opportunity of discussing the matter with the governor in council. But I am certainly alarmed at a proposal—and I believe I indicated this earlier—under which we are even doing away with the co-operation through the governor in council that I called for, for instance, in the building of certain works in my own area, where I suggested that one department was not aware of what the other department was doing, with the result that they were interfering with each other's work.

The fact that the Minister of Public Works should be given this authority is not important in itself, inasmuch as we have a great deal of confidence in him, and share it with others. The important question is whether any minister should continue to have more and more authority delegated to him under the guise of urgency or emergency.

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, one cannot help the feeling that this bill would come much better from the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe). It really is his type of bill. It takes authority which has previously been in the hands of the cabinet as a whole, tears it away from them, and transfers it to the jurisdiction of a single individual. Now, admittedly the minister to whom I have referred quite often does not bother with a bill to accomplish that and to that extent at least it is decent of the Minister of Public Works to come before the house and tell us what he proposes to do.

I do not know what it is, Mr. Speaker, that makes those engineers feel that they are so omniscient. Other members of the cabinet are—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): What makes your type of man so important?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Well, perhaps because we have a certain amount of common sense; perhaps because we have not sat—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That is a great claim.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): —on the treasury benches for 20 years and become so overconfident in ourselves and so completely convinced we know all the answers that we are prepared to listen to the general public once in a while and come here—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I am not prepared to listen to you, but I get paid to do it.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I beg your pardon?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I am not prepared to listen to you but I get paid to do it and so I will.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Sometimes, Mr. Speaker, I feel the same way but perhaps it is harder—

Mr. Knowles: You don't get paid as much.

[Mr. Hahn.]

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Perhaps it is harder for the Minister of Trade and Commerce to listen to the opposition because he gets paid 2½ times as much as we do. But, Mr. Speaker, just picking up the interjection of the minister, I must say that, having listened to some of the things that we had to listen to in the last few weeks from the government benches, I do not feel that I have been paid a cent too much. If they paid us 10 times as much it still would not have been worth while. However, I do not know what it is that makes these engineers feel that they are so omniscient that any one of them can make decisions that may affect the whole future course of a major transportation system in this country, because that is essentially what it is proposed to do in this bill.

I have no intention of repeating the excellent arguments which have been made against the bill today. However, there are one or two points which have not been touched on to my knowledge. One, for example, is that when anything is done by the governor in council an order in council is required and it becomes a matter of public record—at least it usually becomes a matter of public record, for there have been certain of them which the government in its wisdom has seen fit to keep secret. However, the great majority of them do become a matter of public record.

I see the Minister of Trade and Commerce leaving. Has he decided he is not going to earn his money this afternoon?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I have earned it already.

Mr. Knowles: Not in the pipe-line debate.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): These orders in council become a matter of public record and we can turn to them at any time and find out what decisions have been made by the cabinet in a given set of circumstances. Those of us who are interested can check back and find out almost immediately what course of action is being followed in connection with some major undertaking affecting a navigable river; but, to the best of my knowledge, under the provisions of this bill and from reading it quite carefully, there is no provision for the minister to let anybody know publicly in this house, or as a matter of government record, what he is doing, what he has done and what he proposes to do. The result is, if this is transferred to the jurisdiction of the minister himself, he can engage in whatever type of shenanigans he wants to, he can make whatever arrangements he wishes with a local group or with a particular company, and while certain reference will be made to it in the local press in the immediate area, we as members of this house who must bear at least some of the responsibility and take an interest in the minister's activities, will know nothing whatsoever of his actions. I think that is one of the greatest weaknesses in transferring responsibility of this sort progressively from the house itself, where we automatically become apprised of it, to the governor in council where it presents some difficulty but where we still can become apprised of it, eventually to a minister where it then becomes his private prerogative and, if we are going to pry it out of him at all, we have to do it by means of special motions in this house which the minister sometimes in his wisdom allows to go through and at other times in his wisdom does not allow to go through.

Mr. Knowles: Wisdom?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Well, "wisdom" is a debatable point but unfortunately I must keep very close to the bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: These remarks are a reflection on the house.

Mr. Hodgson: There is a pronouncement for you.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): If they should be construed by anyone except the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration as a reflection on the house, Mr. Speaker, I am sure you would have taken adequate action before now. However, as we know, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration regularly takes the attitude—

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Careful; he is second in command.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): He regularly takes that attitude about a number of things. He will always be second in command, Mr. Speaker, no matter where he sits.

Mr. Lennard: Don't mumble over there; stand up and be counted.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): We saw an example of what can happen, Mr. Speaker, under legislation of this kind in England just a few weeks ago. In that particular case a small government body had been given jurisdiction in a particular field. The individual of whom I speak had bought a piece of property which she proposed to farm. She bought and paid for it. She farmed it for two years, and at the end of that time, without any reference to any courts in the land, without any reference to parliament, without any reference to anybody, she was completely dispossessed of her property and it was taken over by the state purely and simply because under legislation similar in intent to this the control of how a person should farm had been given to a particular individual. Here we are transferring to a particular individual, the minister in this case, complete control of what type of structure shall be built on our navigable rivers, whether they shall be torn down, and all the ancillary matters connected with such steps.

In the city of Montreal in connection with the national harbours board operation, for example, we find it is quite conceivable to have in and around that area construction work going on which might prove to be a serious handicap and detriment to our harbour. This work could be undertaken without any knowledge whatsoever of the national harbours board or the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler). Frankly, I do not think we want to see one man having this immense amount of authority. I certainly subscribe heartily to the opinions expressed by the speakers who have preceded me and particularly the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). I have just risen at this time to accept their general argument and to support it with a few additional facts which may be of some interest to the minister.

I would counsel the minister through you, Mr. Speaker, to think carefully over the past history of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and to turn over in his mind the course of action followed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce which has led to the present dislike for that course of action which exists right across this country amongst the people of Canada. I would not want to see the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters), who at times shows promise of being a pretty decent and a rather nice sort of minister and hon. member of this house—

An hon. Member: Ten dollars please.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): —following that most unfortunate path which leads eventually to a dictatorial attitude and an attempt to gain complete control over matters which he has no right to control.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, a few minutes ago when remarks were being passed around concerning who was being paid for what, I must say I was wondering whether the Minister of Public Works should not have attempted to have a clause included in this bill which would increase his salary in view of the extra work and responsibility that will be placed on his shoulders if this bill goes through.

Let me say at the outset that as far as I am concerned I can appreciate the desire of the minister to streamline and perhaps increase the efficiency of processing the applications that are made under the Navigable Waters Protection Act.

I happen to have with me a copy of the June 16 issue of part I of the Canada Gazette and I notice in this particular issue there are notices of 12 applications under the Navigable Waters Protection Act and while that may be somewhat unusual there are nevertheless a good many applications appearing in the Canada Gazette from time to time, certainly since I have been a member of this house.

As I say, I can appreciate that there may be some need for an overhaul of the methods that are being used in processing these applications; however, it does strike me that the range of the types of proposed structures which come within the purview of the Navigable Waters Protection Act is of such vast magnitude, it is a rather difficult question on which to generalize particularly with reference to the matters which have been raised by other hon. members who have spoken on this side of the house concerning what discretion the minister himself should have. I must say that, as I read through the act, that was the question which immediately arose in my mind concerning just how advisable it is to make the transfer which is proposed from the governor in council to the minister.

I can see there are certain types of applications which will be made under this act which may be considerably over the $5,000 that is provided in one place and that could very well be decided directly by the minister without any great danger of anyone being hurt; but at the same time applications are being made under this act from time to time for proposed structures that can have an extremely significant effect upon the area in which they are proposed to be built. I think there is a real question as to whether or not it is advisable under those circumstances to have complete discretion rest with any one minister of the cabinet in a situation of that kind. One of the thoughts that occurred to me is that if this proposal of transfer to the minister is put through there should be coupled with it some provision in the act for an appeal to the governor in council under certain circumstances. As far as I can make out, this bill does not propose that; it leaves complete discretion with the Minister of Public Works, and the only form of redress which any group of citizens would have would be to exert sufficient pressure to force the resignation of the particular minister which would require his replacement by someone who might be disposed to reconsider the decision that has been made. I think those questions do arise and I am therefore very much in agreement with the suggestion made by my friend the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) that this bill could very well be studied by the appropriate standing committee of the house.

I might say, Mr. Speaker, that when this act is being brought up for amendment there might very well be other matters which could be considered in committee as possible further amendments to the act that are not covered in the present proposed amendments.

I know, for example, that not so long ago a temporary obstruction to navigation was being created near the mouth of a certain river, and while the technical forms with regard to it, concerning notice of the closing of this stream to navigation and so on, were applied, the practical effect was that this stream was closed to navigation without any real notice having been given to those most concerned, those people who were going to be using it. That particular situation comes under another part of the act which is under the direction of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler), but if that sort of situation is being repeated in other parts of the country there might very well be room for a discussion in committee of an appropriate amendment to the act to cover that type of situation. This is one of those cases where notice was given in a paper nominally circulated in the district and, because it happened to be handier to put it in a paper that had very little circulation, that was where the notice appeared and as a consequence of that the people knew nothing about it until the obstruction was actually in place.

Coming back to the bill, at the moment I am interested in the part which suggests that approval may be given to structures which have been in place for five years. I am wondering if that provision will not give approval to a practice which exists already. I can remember seeing a structure put across a navigable stream and after it had been up a couple of months a notice appeared that so-and-so was applying for permission to construct such and such a work. This is another matter which might profitably receive a careful review by a committee of the house.

I think a study might also be made as to whether or not some division could be made in the types and categories of works to be approved by the Minister of Public Works alone and those which would require to go before the governor in council for consideration by the cabinet as a whole.

These appear to me to be some of the considerations involved in the amending bill which would warrant its being sent to a committee for thorough study when we could have before us the technical witnesses who could deal with the matters involved.

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): Mr. Speaker, earlier in the session this matter was brought up by me in connection with a project which we had under way and I understood the minister to say at that time that an amending bill would be brought before the house at this session. I am going to discuss the bill only as it concerns my own area as beyond that I could only speak generally.

I think the bill may be criticized justifiably for giving power to one minister, but on the other hand where small amounts are involved I do not think enough discretion is given to the minister. I would refer again to the case I referred to earlier in this session. No matter what part of the house we sit in we are all interested in the economic development of Canada and if there is legislation that retards that development then it should be changed or more discretion given to the minister in order to take care of isolated cases. Perhaps "isolated" is not the correct word to use.

I am going to refer now to something which occurred in my own riding. Within 40 or 60 rods of my home there is a creek which is as wide as most rivers. It drains a great deal of farm land and where the creek empties into lake Huron it is probably 85 to 100 feet wide. After the spring rush of water is over the mouth of this creek fills up to a height of five or six feet with sand with the result that during the summer farm lands are flooded. We grow sugar beets in that particular area.

As I have mentioned on numerous occasions, the sugar beet growers are obligated to ship their sugar beets by train instead of truck in order to prevent the spread of nematode, which has been the curse of the sugar beet industry in some parts of the United States, particularly in Utah. This involves additional expense.

We had a project under way to keep open the mouth of the creek by building a jetty on each side with an "L" at one end which would permit boats to come in and at the same time prevent the sand from filling up the creek and stopping the natural flow into the lake. As a matter of fact the former Minister of Public Works had his engineer in London examine this project and he was favourably impressed, particularly with respect to the agricultural aspect.

In fact this project has been started but it is now at a standstill because they cannot get permission to continue, either under this act or under the previous act. I understand that other projects have been undertaken and completed on lake Erie and no doubt in other areas without the approval of the minister. In a case like this where a project has been undertaken to build a jetty to keep open the mouth of a creek and where permission was not obtained the minister should be empowered under the act to grant a permit in order that such a project might be completed. In this particular case they cannot get a grant from the provincial government until the project is legalized by the federal authorities, and apparently the project cannot be completed without a provincial grant.

There is another aspect to this project, that concerning our tourist industry. For some time the minister was in charge of our tourist industry and he knows how important it is for us to obtain United States dollars by that means. Facilities would be provided in this particular creek for probably 100 fair-sized boats to lie at anchor in the area provided by the jetty or further up the river where docking facilities would be available. I say without hesitation that that project would mean probably $100,000 a year to that particular area, and when I say that it would mean that to that particular area I mean that it would mean that to Canada as a whole. We should not scoff at $100,000 or more a year.

There is nothing in the act which would enable this project to be completed. It was started a year ago by the township and by the people of the area but they did not obtain a permit. They went as far as they could building the walls going out into the lake but when it came to obtaining a permit it was found that they should have obtained it before the work was undertaken.

This is one of many reasons why this bill should go to a committee in order that the act may be revised to take care of injustices such as this. Correction would mean, as I say, probably hundreds of thousands or even millions of dollars to the economy of this country. The bill is important. In my area I cannot reconcile myself to this situation. The Ontario government has leased a great deal of water area in lake Huron from Sarnia up to Grand Bend and in lake St. Clair and lake Erie. That is all navigable water. If the bill is not referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, then perhaps we can have some explanation of that when we are in committee of the whole because there are hazards so far as navigation is concerned.

I repeat that when people want to undertake a project and it is possible to obtain a provincial grant to complete the project there should be authority under this act or some other act whereby the minister would be empowered to grant a permit in order that the job can be completed and so that they can get the necessary funds. Private individuals cannot go to the township council or to the provincial government for additional grants because no permit can be granted under the act.

I say emphatically that the act should take care of such cases in order that projects of that sort can be undertaken and completed. We have there one of the greatest areas for the tourist industry in the Dominion of Canada. If we can increase our tourist revenue there and elsewhere in ridings all across the country it will mean that revenue will add up to a billion dollars instead of remaining static at a little over $300 million as it has now for several years, and it really means only about half that amount when we consider that the dollar is only worth 50 cents.

We must be realistic and undertake to develop the tourist industry. If through policies adopted by parliament the government can stimulate the tourist industry throughout Canada it will benefit the whole economy. We will then achieve our objective, but we are not going to do so if we sit back and ignore cases such as this which could be remedied by simply changing the wording of an act. Under the act a permit must be obtained in order to undertake work and yet at the same time I notice, as I emphasized a few moments ago, that even if a work has been constructed illegally approval can be obtained if it has been completed for five years. If you can grant a permit for a work constructed illegally which has been completed for five years, why not grant a permit for work begun last year? This is not a political matter. It is a matter of common sense, and I think we must apply common sense if we are going to get the best out of any legislation.

I hope that the bill can be referred to a committee. I dare say that it affects most of the ridings in the dominion. The standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines is one of the largest committees of the house, having 50 or 60 members, and I think we could get some very constructive ideas from those who would in the meantime give this bill further consideration. Even if we are unfortunate enough not to have the bill sent to the committee, I hope that in the meantime the minister together with his advisers will take upon himself the job of revising the particular section of the legislation which would empower him to grant a permit where work has been undertaken by a township or by responsible bodies and probably only requires two or three months to complete the job. In this one instance, as I say, it will probably mean $100,000 a year or perhaps a great deal more to that particular area and the same change in the act may mean millions of dollars per year to the economy of the dominion.

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Victoria, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, in saying a word on the bill may I say that it brings to my mind the Newfoundland waters. What effect will the bill have on the Newfoundland waters which were controlled by the province until a couple of years ago? I ask the minister to make a statement on that situation. Other hon. members have talked about large bodies of water and large streams. I think this bill or one like it should determine what are navigable waters in the minds of the government because up until now they do not know. The Department of Transport will not classify a stream of water as navigable water unless it will take a motorboat or a tourist or commercial boat. I have gone to them about different streams in an effort to get a little work done and they have told me that they were not navigable waters and they would not have anything to do with them.

But when you go to the Department of Public Works they will call them navigable waters if they have enough water to fill a 4-inch pipe. I have a case in my own riding where there is no water for six months of the year. There would be no water at any time except that some 50 years ago a dam was erected to back up the water. But now one of these fellows who wears an iron ring, an engineer, comes and looks at it and classifies it as navigable water. Nothing has ever gone up there except possibly a canoe 50 or 60 years ago. No boat of any kind has been able to go up it since and no boat can do so now except at high water when there is water behind the dam. A boat cannot go there unless they drag it on the ground.

These engineers are clannish, and I give the minister credit. He depends on his engineers and he backs them up when they make wrong statements and form wrong judgments. However, I am probably like the engineers too. I like a fellow who will stay behind me when I am wrong, and that is the way the minister is so far as some of his engineers are concerned. He stands behind them when they are wrong.

Nevertheless, I think you should have some legislation to say what is navigable water and what is not because up until now the minister's department does not know and the Department of Transport does not know. Get your heads together and put something in the bill that will tell us what is navigable water and what is not. The bill should go to a committee because there are several important things involved. I may say to the minister that I had some correspondence with him about the stream to which I have referred. He wrote and told me that it was navigable water. A child two years old could walk up there in his bare feet in the summertime. There is not one drop of water but still it is classed as navigable water.

The municipality and the provincial engineers put some tiles there to take care of the rise in the water when they put the logs in the dam. The water backs up into a slough. It never was navigable. It was a swamp. The timber was cut off 50 years ago and not a log was ever floated down the stream. An Indian might have gone up there at high water. Nevertheless, your engineer classifies it as navigable water. I wish the minister had the time to go and look at these things himself. He would see how stupid some of his engineers are. That place never was navigable water and is not now. The municipality put tiles there. The minister knows about it. I wrote a letter to him and he still claims it is navigable water.

The municipality will not take the tiles out. You will have to take them out, and part of the act provides for you to take them out. You had probably better send the army up there when you send an engineer to take them out because there is plenty of deep water there even if there is none in the creek.

I like one thing in this bill. It might give the minister a chance to use the telephone. The explanatory note states that the purposes of the amendments are to provide for approval by the minister, and to extend the exemptions. Subsection 2 states that this section does not apply to any work other than a bridge, boom, dam, aboiteau or causeway—I suppose that takes in creek—if, in the opinion of the minister, the work does not interfere substantially with navigation and if the value of the work does not exceed $5,000. This work I am talking about does not exceed $300 and it never was a navigable water and it is not now a navigable water. I would invite the minister up there. I will take him fishing or do anything he wants to do, if he will come up and have a look at it himself.

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): You cannot fish in that stream, can you?

Mr. Hodgson: No; not for crabs. There is not enough water there for crabs or crayfish. There may be a few bugs.

Mr. Winters: I do not understand all this, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member will have to speak louder if he wishes me to hear him.

Mr. Hodgson: I like that part of the bill where, among the exemptions, it provides if the work does not interfere substantially with navigation. That is another reason why this bill should go to a committee. Then farther down, in section 4 we find these words:

> (a) if, prior to commencement of construction, the minister, having been satisfied that the work was urgently required, consented in writing to commencement of construction; or
> (b) if five years have elapsed since completion of construction of the work;
> and such approval has the same effect as is given prior to commencement of construction of the work.

That should be changed to two years. Why do you want five years in it? I know these engineers are fairly slow, but I do not think it will take them five years to look at a thing like that. They could do it in two years or less than two years. Let us make it two years. A great many changes must be made in this bill. It needs a greater opportunity for examination than we are going to be able to give it here in the House of Commons. I would therefore ask the minister to send this bill to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Mr. G. S. White (Hastings-Frontenac): I just want to ask the minister a question before he replies. I shall be brief. Following up what was said by the hon. member for Victoria, Ont. (Mr. Hodgson) with respect to the definition of a navigable stream, and after reading what is said in the act, may I ask the minister to say whether there are some waters or streams which are regarded as navigable streams controlled by the province, or are all navigable waters controlled by the federal government? If all navigable waters are controlled by the federal government, how do you go about getting from the minister a decision as to whether a certain body of water is or is not a navigable stream? As the minister is no doubt aware, at least in the province of Ontario the question of whether or not a certain body of water is a navigable stream entails certain rights with regard to traffic and fishing. I for one would be greatly interested if the minister, in his reply, would tell us as plainly and frankly as he can just what is a navigable stream.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank all hon. members who have taken part in this debate because I think they have shown the two sides of the question as they exist here. Some hon. members thought that the provisions of the bill now before us go too far whilst others feel that they do not go far enough. Those have been the reasons why the government felt it necessary to ask for amendments to this old statute at this time. The applications are being received at the rate of about 300 a year and that number is on the increase. Most of these applications are in respect of works of a minor character. One hon. member suggested that it might be wise to form some sort of committee with provincial representation on it. In that regard I would remind hon. members that the majority of applications received are made either by or on behalf of some provincial government. It seems to me that the category that comes before us most frequently is that of applications having to do with transmission lines passing over some navigable water.

I gather that there is no serious criticism of the powers being sought in this amending bill. The question which occurred in the mind of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) and in the minds of others is whether the powers being sought should be administered by the governor in council or by the minister. I can tell hon. members that it is a comfortable position for any minister to be in to be able to refer matters to the governor in council. But that is not always the best way or the most expeditious way in which to discharge the responsibility which is simply, in this case, the administration of the provisons of the act. The governor in council is a committee of the cabinet and not the full cabinet, as some hon. members seemed to think. Another question raised was the matter of urgency.

Mr. Knowles: How many are members of that committee?

Mr. Winters: Four constitute a quorum.

Mr. Knowles: To talk about a quorum is a different thing than to refer to a committee of the cabinet.

Mr. Winters: Is my hon. friend asking a question or making an assertion? I do not care which it is. It is all right with me. The question of urgency was raised and hon. members rightly queried whether any urgency was great enough to warrant the authority being given without the necessary approval under this statute. We have had some cases where the question of urgency arose. For instance, in the constituency of my good friend the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor),—

Mr. McIvor: That is right.

Mr. Winters: —last year a main broke under the Kaministikwia river. It was necessary to obtain authority under the Navigable Waters Protection Act to develop an alternative structure to carry the main under that river. With winter coming on it was absolutely essential that that work be put in at the earliest possible moment. There are other such cases. It is true that they are rare. It is also true, what the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has said, namely that we should think very carefully before sacrificing any of the rights on navigable waters.

As to whether or not the federal government has jurisdiction over all navigable waters, I understand that under the British North America Act that is the case. As to what constitutes a navigable water, it is often difficult to decide. There are various means of navigation, and what is navigation in the eyes of the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan) and in mine might be quite different from what constitutes navigation on a stream remote from the sea and farther inland. All these rights must be protected. We have places where there are small streams and where people are in the habit of travelling on them from time to time by canoe. We have had instances where farmers have built a fence across a stream, thereby denying other local residents a chance to pass along the stream by canoe. To a seafaring man, that might not seem to be very important navigation but to those people who use it for their ordinary day-to-day activities, it is important. All these things must be considered.

As to consideration by a committee, I know hon. members are aware of the fact that this bill has already been before the other place, that it was considered carefully there in a committee and that it has been referred to us in this house with one minor amendment. We are now about to go into committee of the whole and I am quite prepared to have hon. members ask any questions they see fit to ask. I think they can be assured of the same diligent consideration here by all members as is customary in committee of the whole house.

Mr. Green: But witnesses cannot be called.

Mr. Winters: I would therefore simply conclude by thanking hon. members for the part they have taken in this debate and to tell them that, in my opinion, this bill is the best compromise with regard to a situation that obviously necessitated a change in the face of conditions as they exist in Canada at the present time.

Mr. Green: May I ask the minister a question? Do I take it he is unwilling to have this bill go to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines?

Mr. Winters: I am of the opinion that the necessary consideration can be given to this bill in the committee of the whole house.

Mr. White (Hastings-Frontenac): Would the minister answer a question? How does his department ascertain whether or not a small stream or inland lake, whatever it may be, is a navigable stream?

Mr. Winters: So far as we are concerned in this department, Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of the use that is made of the particular stream and also, of course, the size of it and the potential use that may be made of it. There are a variety of factors, but I would rather err on the side of saying it is navigable than saying it is not navigable if there is any doubt.

Mr. White (Hastings-Frontenac): Take my own district, in which there are hundreds of lakes, some of them perhaps a couple of hundred miles around, but which are only used as tourist resorts. There is no lumbering there. Would the minister say, offhand, if those would be navigable waters which would come under this act?

Mr. Winters: Yes, I would think so, without examining a particular case. If the lake or river is capable of navigation, then it would come under this statute.

Mr. White (Hastings-Frontenac): Then, what is navigable?

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Winters) which was agreed to on the following division:

Bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Minister.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, I was somewhat amazed when the minister in charge of this bill who is at the same time the minister who will be given these very drastic powers, refused to agree to have this bill referred to a standing committee of this house for consideration. One excuse he gave for taking that stand was that the bill had been considered in the other place. I have here the Senate Hansard containing the discussion on the bill, and it occupies about two pages. We have had—

Mr. Knowles: That is a full discussion for them.

Mr. Green: As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre says, that is a full discussion in the other house.

Mr. Winters: A committee studied this bill.

Mr. Green: I presume it went to a committee in the other house, as all their bills do, but I do not believe we have any transcript of the evidence that was taken in that committee of the other house, if any was taken. I very much doubt whether there was a very full examination of the measure, and it is going pretty far when a minister in this house says that one of the standing committees of the commons, and a good committee—I call the hon. member for Fort William as a witness to that statement—

Mr. McIvor: I agree with the hon. member on that.

Mr. Green: —a good committee should not be given the opportunity to consider this bill. If it had been sent to a committee, then we could have had the Minister of Transport, the Minister of Public Works and some of the other ministers who are concerned; we could have had the deputy ministers; we could have found out just what are the difficulties. But oh, no; this Minister of Public Works, acting in the same dictatorial manner that we are witnessing so often from this government this year, acting in just that same way, brushed aside the request made from every party in the opposition that the bill at least be sent to a committee. He brushed that aside and said "No, we will give it second reading now and then you will have a chance to ask me some questions when it goes into committee of the whole." It is just about time the Canadian people realized what is going on in this house. Here we have a bill which has been on the statute books of Canada for many years, one of the most important bills on our statute books, yet the government is prepared to have the heart torn out of the statute without even having it considered by a committee. I submit that the minister is absolutely unreasonable in his refusal to let a committee of this house consider this bill. Even yet it is not too late for him to change his mind and do that, give the committee a chance to deal with the bill as it should be dealt with. Just to have it rammed down our throats in the way that has been done this afternoon is not good enough.

There are other members who can deal with different aspects of the bill, but I point out to the minister again the situation with respect to the harbours of Canada. It is all right to try to justify this on the basis that some little stream requires a ruling under this act because a canoe is going to go up that stream. It is all right for the minister to put that forward as his excuse for having control of all the operations under the act, but the matters that are really vital under this statute are the multi-million dollar piers and works of that type that will be erected in different parts of Canada. That is where the real issue lies, and the decision on those important works should be left in the hands of the cabinet.

It may be that there should be amendments made so the minor works could be handled by the minister without having them submitted to the cabinet, but there is no excuse whatever for giving the Minister of Public Works or any other single minister sole power to decide whether or not a million dollar pier is going to be placed in one of our harbours.

That condition may arise in Vancouver, and the Minister of Transport, who has charge of the national harbours board, should be in on that picture, and so should the ministers representing British Columbia in the cabinet. Those questions are too important to be decided by one minister and certainly by a minister from another part of the country who really has very little knowledge of what conditions are to be met, and who cannot be in a position to understand what is reasonable in a port in another part of Canada. This applies not only to the national harbours but also to the other harbours to which I referred.

I have here the annual report of the Department of Transport for the year ending March 31, 1955, and we find the following at page 71:

> Harbours Administered by Harbour Commissioners.
> There are seven harbour commissions as follows: Belleville, Hamilton and Toronto in Ontario; Winnipeg-St. Boniface, Manitoba; New Westminster, North Fraser and Port Alberni in British Columbia.

And then we find this report:

> General supervision is exercised over the affairs of the commissioners and all by-laws are submitted for approval of the department before submission to the governor in council for confirmation. The commissioners make by-laws concerning navigation, rates, tolls, penalties, etc. They also administer water lot transactions affecting federal property within the harbours, the accruing rental forming part of the harbour revenue.

They do all that under the Minister of Transport, yet once this bill has been passed the sole jurisdiction will be with the Minister of Public Works. The Minister of Transport will not have the slightest authority to say anything about this. There is no responsibility to give him any information; there is nothing in the bill to require that, and because it does not go to the cabinet there is no way by which he can know, unless the Minister of Public Works places it before him. Even then the Minister of Transport has absolutely no responsibility, because under the bill all the responsibility is given to the Minister of Public Works.

For the life of me I cannot understand why the government wants to place the full authority in respect of these works—which are really big works, and which may affect the economy of large segments of Canada—in the hands of one minister. I submit that is contrary to our whole parliamentary belief. It is contrary to the way in which the government of Canada has been run. In my judgment it is just another example of the fact that this government has been in power so long and has such an overwhelming majority, that the members of the cabinet simply have a contempt for parliament, a contempt for the opposition and in effect a contempt for the wishes of the Canadian people.

Once more I urge the minister to withdraw his dictatorial and unfair action in refusing even to have this bill sent to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. It is still not too late for him to do that. That is the proper way in which this bill should be considered, and it is the proper way to have it amended. The bill as it stands today is not right, and I believe there are ministers in the cabinet sitting opposite right now who realize this bill is not right in its present form. The only way it will be adequately amended is if it can be referred to the standing committee.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, like the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra I was quite disappointed at the action of the minister in refusing to allow this bill to go before a standing committee of the house because, as I attempted to point out in the few remarks I made on second reading, it struck me as being the type of bill which could very profitably receive the kind of consideration that is possible only in a standing committee, where it is the practice to have such people as deputy ministers appear to answer our questions and give us detailed information concerning the administrative problems the proposed bill is presumably designed to correct.

I think everyone realizes it is difficult for members like myself, who are interested because we live in areas where there are substantial quantities of navigable water, to consider in committee of the whole house amendments to a bill of this type if we are not satisfied that it is entirely as it should be, but in the standing committee we have an opportunity of obtaining more detailed information on the basis of which we can judge whether or not any objections we may have are well founded. For that reason I must say I share the views of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra in this connection.

I do not think there is much more I can add concerning clause 1 of the bill because it simply designates that "minister" means the Minister of Public Works. As I understand it, that designation of the Minister of Public Works applies only to the part of the Navigable Waters Protection Act which heretofore has come under his general jurisdiction.

I hope that as we proceed, inasmuch as apparently we are not going to have the bill sent to the committee, the minister will be prepared to give us some detailed explanation of the various changes that are proposed.

Mr. MacInnis: I just want to add my protest to those of hon. members who have already spoken concerning the fact that this bill is not going to be sent to the appropriate committee.

I think it is one of those little things which, if it were done, would help to remove the frictions that almost inevitably occur in a place like this.

As I read the bill, the main change is the transfer of the authority which previously was in the governor in council to the minister. I do not know whether that is a good or bad thing. Possibly with the present minister in charge of the department it might be all right and there would be no need to worry, but ministers come and ministers go. While we might all be quite happy to leave these regulations under the control of the present minister there might come a time when there was a minister in charge of the department about whom we would not be so pleased. Is the Minister of Finance raising an objection?

Mr. Harris: None whatever.

Mr. MacInnis: Referring the bill to a committee would not unduly delay it. If anything it would facilitate the other business of the house, because while this bill was being considered in committee the house could be dealing with other business. When the bill came back to committee of the whole it would probably go through with little discussion. I am sorry the minister did not see his way clear to refer it to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. Since he has not done that I imagine the best thing to do is for hon. members to attempt to bring out all the relevant facts while we are considering the bill clause by clause.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Chairman, the question in my mind at the moment with regard to the bill and the clauses thereof is whether the Prime Minister has so far renounced his control over his cabinet and the affairs of this country that he leaves it to individual ministers to bring in measures of this kind which would redivide or reallocate authority within the cabinet which had previously been held by the cabinet as a whole. As the hon. member who has just resumed his seat pointed out, one of the cardinal features of this bill is the transfer of authority from the governor in council to a specific minister. The sponsor of the bill is the minister to whom authority is being transferred.

It is a most peculiar and unusual situation to find that the man who has the primary responsibility for the present government and for the present cabinet is not even interested enough in the various responsibilities of his ministers to sponsor or comment upon a radical change of authority within the group which he controls. At the present time we are fortunate in that the right hon. Prime Minister is in the house. To say the least I think it would be appropriate and helpful if he would signify that he also approves of this transfer of authority within his cabinet. Are we going to have from time to time other bills of this nature sponsored by individual cabinet ministers which break down the authority of the Prime Minister, which parcel out among themselves responsibilities which ministers are to have, which grant to ministers authority previously vested either in parliament or in the cabinet? I should like to know whether the Prime Minister approves of this transfer of authority from the cabinet as a whole to this individual minister.

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): Mr. Chairman, perhaps this will be the only opportunity I will have to refer to a matter I referred to earlier. When I suggested that the minister should be given more latitude and power I did not mean that to apply to projects such as have been mentioned this afternoon. But as I said, with minor things there should be latitude, especially when the project has already been started. In the particular case I referred to they will not be able to get any assistance from the municipal or provincial governments until a permit is granted. Discretion should be with the minister in order that this project may be undertaken.

I am going to ask the minister if in cases like this he will undertake that a permit will be granted. I am not going to repeat the argument I made earlier, because time is valuable; but I mentioned that the completion of this project might bring $100,000 or perhaps several times that amount each year from the tourist industry.

A point which I did not make a while ago is that there will be no cost to the federal treasury. It will run about $10,000 or $12,000 to complete the project, but they did not apply for a permit and they cannot go ahead. They are stymied, the tourist industry is stymied, and the sugar beet growers still have to ship their sugar beets by train instead of by truck, which means additional cost. We do not want to do anything to handicap the agricultural industry in Ontario. This could be taken care of by a simple rewording of a particular section of the act.

I do hope the minister will see his way clear, not only in the case of this particular project, which is important to this area, but in all such projects that there is some latitude in interpreting the act, or that an amendment is made to make the granting of a permit possible. If this additional revenue came into that particular area it would be of great assistance and would also assist our agricultural economy.

Let me repeat that it is not going to cost the federal government anything. We do want a permit to be granted so the township council can go ahead and complete this project. It may involve $10,000 or $12,000 but it will not cost the federal treasury anything and the return will be perhaps 10, or 15 or 20 times the amount spent. These people are most anxious to have the work undertaken and they are sorry, as I am, that there is no provision under which they may obtain this permit. I do hope before the bill is finalized the minister will consult with his officers and in some way see that authority is granted so projects like this can be finished.

There is one other aspect to this matter which I did not think of when I was on my feet before. As I said, the mouth of this creek fills up to a height of 5, 6 or 7 feet. The Department of Agriculture has some pictures which were taken some years ago when we endeavoured to prevail upon the Minister of Agriculture to do something to prevent the spread of this nematode disease, which is the curse of the sugar beet industry and which is brought about by the flooding of hundreds of acres of farm land.

This is the point I have in mind. Of course I was referring to lake Huron as navigable water, and there has been reference to other navigable streams which are apparently a great deal smaller than the one I have in mind. What is the responsibility of the federal government for damage to property because of the closing of the mouth of this creek? It closed up long before the present project was started, so the fault does not lie in what has been done. However, because there is no protection to prevent the sand from coming in and closing up the mouth of the stream, which is about 75 to 100 feet wide, the farmers are losing thousands and thousands of dollars on account of the flooding of their land. I am wondering who is responsible. Is it the federal government because they are not doing what can be done?

The difficulty can be overcome. All you need do is see that they get a permit to complete the job. This is only one of these instances. It is something that may happen in my riding today and in your riding tomorrow, but I say in all seriousness that I sincerely hope the act can be amended, because there may be many other such incidents. No expense whatever is involved so far as the federal government is concerned. All we want to get from the federal government is the authority to do the job.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, like other members who have spoken I regret that the minister has not agreed to send the bill to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines; and I am not taking that position just to be awkward. There are federal and provincial jurisdictions that are related to the bill. I know that in my own district lumber companies that want water lots for booming grounds have to approach the lands branch of the department of lands and forests of the government of British Columbia, advertise, and go through certain procedures. When they have the booming ground they have to drive dolphins and piles to hold their boom chains so they can contain the logs.

There is a lot of misunderstanding as to what is legally necessary in securing these properties, what is under the jurisdiction of the provincial government and what is under the jurisdiction of the federal government. Therefore I think if the bill had gone to the standing committee we would have had the opportunity to listen to the minister's officials and to the legal advisers. There would have been clarification of the relationship, shall I say, between the federal and provincial jurisdictions, and that would have been of advantage to many who are interested in building structures and other things that will come under the terms of this legislation.

Seeing that the bill is not going to the standing committee, I wish the minister would give an exposition to the committee of the procedure necessary under the circumstances I have outlined.

Mr. Winters: The procedure necessary to obtain approval under this statute for a work in a navigable water? Is that what my hon. friend has in mind?

Mr. Herridge: A work in a navigable water or lake. Here is a company which wants to establish a mill and a booming ground. It gets its water lot from the provincial government. Then it has to drive piles and dolphins and erect other structures to contain the logs for the mill. In some cases the companies, after having obtained the required licence for the water lot from the provincial government, go ahead and drive piles and put in dolphins without any reference to the federal government. In other cases other companies follow the procedure necessary under the terms of the act. Would the minister tell the committee what procedure should be followed by a company—I have some knowledge of what I am talking about—which intends to establish a booming ground and has obtained a licence from the provincial government with respect to a water lot in the area concerned?

Mr. Winters: They must make application under this statute and submit plans and a description of the site to the Minister of Public Works. Then they must publish notice in the Canada Gazette and in two local papers; and the notice has to be given for a period of a month. Then the Minister of Public Works considers granting the application. That is a simple procedure. There are exceptions provided by this statute in cases of urgency, but generally speaking the procedure is the one I have outlined.

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): Before the clause carries, would the minister answer my question?

Mr. Knowles: Would the minister not have saved time by sending this to the committee?

Mr. Harkness: I was particularly interested in the question raised by the hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac with regard to what constitutes navigable water, and I must say the explanation the minister gave still left me in some considerable doubt as to what is navigable water. I am particularly interested in this matter as far as streams are concerned, especially where a stream flows through a man's farm or ranch.

I should like to know from the minister whether there is any definition in the Navigable Waters Protection Act or elsewhere in the Transport Act as to what constitutes a navigable stream. Is there a minimum width or anything along that line? In other words, is a small stream 5, 10 or 15 feet wide, which happens to run through a man's fields, interpreted as being a navigable stream because you can push a canoe or a small rowboat up it or even a small boat with an outboard motor? As a result is the farmer in the position that before he can put a bridge across the stream or do anything else along that line in order to enable him to carry on his work, he has to apply to the minister in order to get permission to do it?

So far as I know, this sort of thing has been done on these small streams more or less from the beginning in Canada, but as I read the act it would seem to me that with respect to such a stream the man would have to ask permission of the minister. He would have to get his consent, file plans and so forth before he even put a fence across the stream, let alone anything else. Would the minister comment on that?

Mr. Winters: Size is not much of a criterion in determining whether or not a stream is navigable, and I do not know of any specific definition which delineates the navigability of any water. It is generally held that water is navigable if it is capable of being navigated for the trade and commerce of the area. Beyond that, it is a matter of judgment as to whether that is the case. That is the situation.

Mr. Nesbitt: In view of the minister's last remarks as to the interpretation of "navigable", may I say that I know of areas in western Ontario where numbers of rafts have been put in streams in order to move cement and other things to the other side, and I presume the minister would consider those streams navigable. Before the bill goes through this stage would the minister consider having some of his assistants or possibly someone from the Department of Transport draw up a definition of what a navigable water is, even if the definition is broad, to be included in the interpretation section; because I think more and more this matter will become a subject of public interest and attention. I cannot see any reason why some definition cannot be put in the interpretation clause.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Chairman, I think we could tell the hon. member for Calgary North that the old swimming hole is going to disappear under this legislation. I would think the minister probably will be making decisions with respect to whether boys can build the necessary dams or whether or not they can be given the authority.

Mr. Nesbitt: How about beaver dams?

Mr. Hamilton (York West): It seems to me that the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, who said he was surprised at this action being taken by the minister, really was not stating his true feelings about it. I do not think any one should be particularly surprised that this type of legislation is being brought forward by this government. As I see it, this is just further evidence of adherence to the cult of "get things done".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Don't applaud too soon over there. As I say, this is just further evidence of adherence to the cult of "get things done", regardless of what happens in the process. What happens to the ordinary course of parliamentary government does not seem to make much difference to the members opposite.

Mrs. Shipley: Nonsense.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): At least the committee is perking up, anyway. I heard somebody over there make reference to the fact that we were in committee now, and that is the first sign that we are. Prior to that you were sitting mildly by and you would let any of these sections go by without a word.

In any case, this is just a further indication of the trend that we had last year in the defence production debate. As will be recalled, it was not a case of handing over powers to the governor in council in connection with that legislation, it was a case of handing them over to the minister himself. Here is a further step along the way.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the members to your right have not learned any particular lesson from what happened last year or given any indication that there is some sign left of cabinet responsibility in connection with legislation of this type. I think that is the important thing. If we continue this trend we are going to have a great many individual cabinet members who, it may be said, are responsible to the Prime Minister but who in fact are no longer going to be responsible to this house. If it is the type of government in existence in the United States that you want here, I say we are certainly going a long way down that line; but it is far removed from the principles of British parliamentary institutions that heretofore have been the guiding light for this institution.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that it would not have been too tough for the minister to have differentiated, to a certain extent, between the various types of activities that he is going to carry on here. I note that in one case he has been able to set a limit of $5,000 on the construction to take place and has said that in that case it will be done in a certain way, and that over and above that amount it will be done in some other way. If he intends to acquire these powers himself, surely he could have gone one step further. If it is necessary to remove it from the intricate, day to day handling of things in this house, he could have put some other type of ceiling on the activity where he could have handled it himself, and we could have had some indication then that over and above that figure we would be back in the position of having cabinet responsibility.

After all, that is the way we expect things are going to be done. We cannot examine every individual item which comes along. But I think we sitting over here in the opposition have the right to expect that the responsibility is being taken by all the gentlemen on the treasury benches, and that it is not being carried on by one man alone. Hence I say that here is a piece of legislation that could have been submitted to the committee.

I might say this. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, when he said he was surprised, may have been surprised because it was this particular minister who was doing this to us. But certainly here is a piece of legislation that could easily have been submitted to the committee. As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, I might say that it would have received there some careful examination from the members on the government side as well. I have found that in committee they have just as many questions to ask as anyone else. It would be a good thing for this legislation to go there to be considered and then receive the stamp of approval of the whole house. But let us not go down this road to which I have referred, step by step. Here again is a place where a check can be put on this type of government. Let us think very seriously about it.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I think one of the things this bill shows most clearly is that you get far better legislation when it is drawn up by a Conservative government than you get when it is drawn up by a Liberal government. The original act stood for 70 years and it evidently pleased everybody. This act that is just being introduced pleases nobody. I think it is obvious that this bill should have been brought before the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines in order to allow it to be examined, in order to bring before that committee the deputy ministers and the ministers themselves, and to let the committee give the bill—one as important as the minister has said this is—a thorough examination.

What this bill does is concentrate power in the hands of one minister. We have become accustomed to this government ignoring parliament. Now the government even wants to ignore itself. It does not even want to examine measures. It wants to have one minister do the whole job. Obviously in matters pertaining to the protection of navigable waters there is one minister who certainly should be brought in on those discussions, and that is the Minister of Transport. He is the one who is primarily responsible for preserving the navigability of these navigable waters.

As a member from Toronto I object particularly to the fact that this legislation gives the Minister of Public Works the right to say what works can and cannot be built in Toronto harbour. That is now an important harbour and it will be more important in the future. I think it is completely wrong that the Minister of Public Works has the complete say, without consultation even with the Minister of Transport, in an important harbour such as that and in other important harbours across the country, as to what works can and cannot be built.

I think it is obvious that this legislation should be brought before the committee. I am surprised that the minister, who is usually reasonable, has been so unreasonable in this case. It makes one wonder, Mr. Chairman, what is the matter with this committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. It is a perfectly good committee. It is supposed to examine legislation of this kind. But all this government seems to do with respect to this committee is ignore it.

We had an example of that in the last few weeks. The pipe-line bill should have been brought before this committee and examined. The committee was ignored in that case. Here we have a bill which the Minister of Public Works says is one of the most important pieces of legislation we have. Once again an important piece of legislation is not brought before that committee for examination. What is the matter with the chairman of the committee? Have the government no faith or no confidence in him? Do they not think he could do a proper job?

I should like to hear from the Minister of Public Works what his objection is to having this measure properly considered, and why he thinks that an examination by the committee would not be beneficial in this case.

Mr. Winters: Perhaps I could answer that question by asking the hon. member what he has against the committee of the whole? What makes one committee better than another committee? I know the answer he will give—

The Chairman: Order. In any event, the decision of the house has been that we deal with it in committee of the whole. I really think we are somewhat out of order in discussing the matter of referring the bill to a committee at this stage. After all, we are dealing with clause 1 of the bill.

Mr. Harkness: The committee can always change its mind.

Mr. Winters: I simply wish to remind hon. members that this bill has already been before a committee of the other house, where witnesses where heard. This is the second time that the bill is before a committee, and in my opinion a very good committee. Any questions that are raised can be answered here; so I think it is quite wrong to give the impression that this bill is not receiving adequate consideration by committees of parliament.

Mr. Hees: The minister has asked what objection I have to the committee of the whole house. It is simply that we cannot call witnesses before this committee. We cannot have the deputy minister or other witnesses whom we would like to call before the committee for examination.

Mr. Winters: The Senate committee had that privilege.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, you do not really consider that committees of that rest home down the hall give any kind of consideration to any measure?

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member well knows the rule with reference to the other place, and I think he would wish to reconsider those words.

Mr. Hees: Perhaps I could adopt the suggestion of the hon. member near me and call it a quiet haven.

Mr. Nesbitt: Apparently in this committee we are discussing a bill to amend the Navigable Waters Protection Act. It seems to me that nobody, including the minister, knows what navigable waters are or can define them. I certainly do not think it unreasonable that the minister be asked to insert a definition or interpretation, whatever he likes to call it, of navigable waters in this bill, so we will know what we are talking about. Apparently that is the situation now; we are talking about something and none of us knows what it is.

Mr. Charlton: As the hon. member for Oxford has just stated, it is certainly essential that we know what this bill means. In order to know what the bill means, we must know what a navigable stream is. It has been said that the C.C.F. party to our left are Liberals in a hurry. I believe the Prime Minister made that statement. I do not think they could be in any greater hurry than this government is now. The time the measure would take in committee would be very small in comparison to the amount of time that would be saved after it had been considered in committee.

The disease of power seems to be very infectious. We thought the Minister of Trade and Commerce was the only one who was so desirous of having these powers, but apparently now other ministers are coming along—probably it is the result of jealousy—and asking for these powers. The disease seems to be very infectious. Other ministers are desirous of getting this particular power. I might say to the minister that under the terms of this bill he will have complete power over the St. Lawrence seaway.

Mr. McIvor: No, no.

Mr. Charlton: The reference in the bill is to any rebuilding, repairing or altering. After the seaway is built I presume some day it will have to be repaired, rebuilt or altered. The terms of this bill would give the minister charge of that part of the seaway.

I have the honour of representing a riding which includes the most of the Grand river, or a far greater percentage of it than any other riding. I presume the Grand river is a navigable water, so it seems that the minister could rip out any dam or tear down any of the things that are there now and would not have to ask permission to do so.

The hon. member for Calgary North mentioned a small stream running through a person's farm. I have a small stream running through my farm. I would not consider it navigable, but there are parts of it in which a canoe could be floated. There are other streams that I am sure could be considered navigable which run through farms, and does that mean a man could not put a line fence across the stream without getting the minister's permission? It would also mean that the minister could come along and tear down that fence if it were put up without his permission. A neighbour could complain that the fence had been constructed without permission and have it torn down.

There are many farms on which it is necessary to put a bridge over a stream in order to get to the farm buildings. Does this mean such people would have to go to the minister to get permission to build a bridge? It seems ridiculous. If the minister would give us a logical reason why he wants all these powers it might be different, but he has not given us that logical reason.

Mr. Nesbitt: I do not like to keep pressing this point, but I think we are entitled to an explanation from the minister as to why he will not put in the bill some definition of what the word "navigable" means. If all these extra powers are to be given to the minister, it certainly seems sensible to me that some definition or explanation should be inserted in the bill as to what the word "navigable" means.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I did not intend to get into this debate at all, but a question now arises in my mind as to the river Thames. I have always understood that it was navigable as far as Chatham, but I am wondering whether you are going to include London, and if so if you are going beyond London to the Fanshawe dam. What effect is that going to have on the water resources committee of the province of Ontario? I think this is rather hasty legislation and we should know a little more about it before we are asked to pass it.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I wonder if the minister could tell us if he knows of any court judgment that may have been rendered with regard to waters being navigable within the meaning of the act. I have in mind this. I was wondering what the proceeding would be, for instance, if some person on a stream erected some work and another resident of the district objected to it on the ground it was being erected in navigable waters. Presumably if that were the case, after having appealed to the department to give some ruling, if the minister gave the same answer that we did not know what navigable waters were, then presumably that person would have recourse to the courts to prevent these people from doing that. If that were the case, would the department play any part in that litigation? Would they have representatives there? Is there a case in which the department has had to get a court judgment with regard to whether or not a stretch of water comes under this act?

Mr. Winters: In my relatively short experience with this statute I know of no case in which we have actually been in court. I understand there is one pending now in western Canada, in which the department ruled that a certain structure could not be built over a stream because it was navigable. This is being contested, and I would imagine the officials of the department would appear if the case is taken to court. It has not yet been taken to court, but I understand that is being given serious consideration.

Mr. McIvor: I do not want to say very much, but I do know that if we had had to wait for a cabinet meeting in Fort William it would have cost Fort William many dollars. Money is just as valuable up there as it is in Ottawa. I was going to ask the minister how many cases he had dealt with in the past year. I think he said there were 300, all under $5,000.

Mr. Winters: No, I would not say that. There have been over 300 applications, and a number of these exceeded that amount. But most of them were for small projects.

Mr. McIvor: I do not think it necessary, no matter what the opposition says, to call a cabinet meeting to spend $300 or $400 on a small project. The government would not do very much else if they had to call a cabinet meeting for each of these applications.

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): I think the hon. member for Fort William is under a misapprehension as to what we are saying. We are asking that this bill be referred to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. I suggest to the minister that during the dinner hour he might look up an old case of which I have a faint recollection, because we must have a definition of navigable water before we can pass this bill. There is an old case. As I recall it—the river Thames was mentioned a few minutes ago—one of the litigants was Williams, and it concerned the river Thames and its navigability above Chatham. It concerned the taking of gravel two or three miles above Chatham at a place called Kent Bridge. That was supposed to be the end of the stream's navigability. Whether that case would help I do not know. It certainly sounds like common sense to me.

When the bill was discussed in the house the hon. member for Victoria (Ont.) expressly stated that in his riding there was a little stream the water of which is now being carried down by two tiles; yet the minister's department calls it a navigable stream. It may be navigable for muskrats to run races in. How can we accept that as a navigable stream? It is beyond my comprehension and I am sure it must be beyond the comprehension of all hon. members in this house.

We must know what is a navigable stream. Is it a stream going through a farm? As has been said here, it is going to be necessary for the farmer to get permission from the department to build a bridge or to build a line fence. The thing is ludicrous until we know what the definition is. Surely the Department of Justice, or the legal advisers in the minister's department, can tell him what a navigable water is so we shall have it on the record. We are dealing with a very important subject, and until we know what the definition is we should not be asked to pass this bill in its present form. Before this bill passes the minister should give me an answer to the problem that is being faced in my particular riding.

Mr. Winters: I have already said that to the best of my knowledge the definition of whether a water is navigable is if it is capable of supporting navigation in the interests of the trade and commerce of the area. There are many local factors that enter into that. Surely hon. members do not think there is a hard and fast definition that has to do with a cross-sectional area of the stream, the speed of the current or any of these other matters. I am told by the legal people that that is the generally accepted definition in law, whether or not a stream or a water is capable of supporting navigation in the interests of the local commerce of the area.

As to the other question raised by the hon. member for Lambton West, the situation there is that the structure has been started. It was started without an application under the Navigable Waters Protection Act, and there simply is no authority under the statute to grant a permit. It is a matter for judgment on the part of the local officials as to whether they wish to finish the structure they have already started without seeking approval, but there is no authority in the statute to grant approval until the period of five years now being sought elapses.

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): Mr. Chairman, just on that point, I am very glad the minister has gone that far and said that the authorities can proceed with the project. The unfortunate part of it is that they have gone into it without getting any help from the provincial government. It is definitely understood that they can go ahead and get private subscriptions and even grants from the municipal council to complete the project?

Mr. Winters: It is a matter for the exercise of local judgment in that respect, sir.

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): Judgment of the council, I assume?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, in view of what the minister has just said as to his interpretation of what a navigable water or navigable stream is, how is any farmer, or any other person, in that situation to know whether he is at liberty to put a fence, a bridge, or any other structure across a stream which flows through his place? It seems to me that still leaves the thing in a very unsatisfactory state. With these thousands of small streams which exist in this country and which flow through people's farms, and so forth, it seems to me those people should be in a position to know whether they can carry on their normal operations which require bridges, fences, and so forth, or whether before they do anything they have to go to the expense of preparing plans and sending them in to the minister and then perhaps waiting a long time to get a decision and never knowing really where they are. Can the minister say that the provisions of this act generally speaking do not apply to those thousands of small streams which run through farmers' fields, and so on?

Mr. Winters: I cannot give any blanket statement such as that. The hon. member for Broadview said this was good legislation and that it stood the test of time for 70-odd years because it was prepared by a Conservative government. I imagine the tests of navigability over the 70 years have been very much the same as they are now.

Mr. Harkness: There never has been any attention paid to this before.

Mr. Winters: Yes, there was, to the extent of 300 applications a year.

Mr. Charlton: Another matter has come to my attention. What position would a person be in who was about to use water from a stream for irrigation purposes? It could interfere with navigation because it could lower the stream, as it has lowered streams in many instances around my own district. There has been considerable controversy about the use of this tremendous amount of water for irrigation in instances where people put in small dams to make pools on a small stream. I believe there is a case in court now having to do with whether or not it is right for a person to put a dam on a small stream. What is the position of a farmer if he takes water out of a stream, and some of these large irrigation trunks take a lot of water from streams? They lower the stream quite considerably with a 4-inch or a 6-inch line. What position is he going to be in? Is he going to have to go to the courts to find out first and prove to his own satisfaction whether a stream is navigable before he can stick an irrigation pump in it?

Mr. Winters: Under this part of the act the Minister of Public Works is concerned with structures. The bleeding off of water which changes the level of the stream, perhaps, is not related to the structures at all, and the Minister of Public Works would normally have no jurisdiction in that connection.

Mr. Charlton: Well, the work does not interfere substantially with navigation.

Mr. Winters: Is it a work, though; is it a structure?

Mr. Hodgson: Mr. Chairman, I am glad the minister has left the definition of water in small streams in a way which satisfies me. He said he was willing to leave it to the judgment of the municipality in which the stream is located to say whether or not the stream is navigable. I think that is fair. I think that is a good idea.

Mr. Winters: I do not think anything I said can be construed in such a way as to give it that interpretation. If the municipality decides that a stream is not navigable and wishes to put a structure on it without first obtaining approval, then it is up to it to take the gaff if at any subsequent time the local citizens decide that their rights of navigation are impaired. It is a matter for local interpretation.

Mr. Hodgson: In the case of the structure, if it did not affect anyone from the common sense point of view, was not an obstruction but was helping 10 or 15 people, would you not take the municipality's judgment in that case?

Mr. Winters: It is a question of whose ox is gored. There are courts to decide that problem.

Mr. Hodgson: Nobody's ox is being gored. The obstruction is on what you call navigable water, but the municipality says it is not navigable water and the province says it is not navigable water. Your department says it is. It may be a stream only 2 feet wide, and no boat ever went up there larger than an Indian canoe which may have gone up there 50 years ago. Nothing has gone up since. There has never been a log floated down the stream. In a case of that kind would you say that your engineer was right and that it is navigable water even though the municipality and the province say it is not? There is no obstruction to anybody, but it is giving benefit to a whole group of tourists who want a road in there, and who put a 16-inch tile in the creek. What is your decision on that?

Mr. Winters: What is my decision? I do not think it is before me for decision, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Hodgson: If you cannot make a decision now it will have to be made by a judge in Toronto, because the municipality will never lift that tile.

Mr. Churchill: It is obvious the minister has approached this problem in a rather lighthearted manner, and he is now finding out that this is a serious proposal which he is putting before us. He should have accepted advice and had this matter discussed in a standing committee of the House of Commons where officials could have been called in and questioned. He proposed to do it in this manner, however, and he is not gaining any time by so doing.

The minister obviously has launched on a course of empire building. He wants his own little empire now. It has become the standard practice of the members of the cabinet, particularly those who are looking ahead. The minister must establish a position so he may rank on a level with other members of the cabinet who are inspired by similar thoughts.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): He has not the highway to link it up yet.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Churchill: Perhaps the difficulty with the trans-Canada highway has caused him to divert his attention to something else which he thought he might slip through the House of Commons on Monday afternoon without any attention, but we are going to examine this empire and see just how solidly based it is.

It seems to me incorrect for someone to come along here, as is done from time to time, and say, "Now, for ease of administration it is better to make just a slight change, and here you have section 1 which is merely a modification of the interpretation section of the act; let it go through". When you look at it closely you discover that the modification of the interpretation section of the present act makes a major change in the existing act.

Now, why is that change necessary? Has the minister informed us? Has there been something wrong with the administration of the act over the last 70 years, or is there some other reason? No change should be made in the statutes of this country unless there is some good reason for that change. Has the minister put forward any good reason on this occasion? Not that I have heard yet, except the somewhat plausible excuse that for ease of administration it is better to have these matters under the Minister of Public Works.

If you examine the act closely you will discover that is not a good reason to advance. This act affects more than one minister. As has already been pointed out, the Minister of Transport is affected by part II of this act. When two ministers are concerned it is reasonable that the cabinet as a whole should take matters into consideration. Someone else has already pointed out that works done under this act affect provincial jurisdictions. There again I think it would be very important that the cabinet as a whole, which gives representation by area, should be apprised of any major works that are going to be undertaken under this particular act.

It is for these reasons, in my opinion, that the act was originally drawn up in its present form, so the cabinet as a whole could examine the proposals brought forward. All the ministers of the crown were given an opportunity to give their advice with regard to the proposals rather than having it rest with just one minister. I see no reason to make a change at this time. In matters of the magnitude of those covered under the present act I think the governor in council is the proper body to deal with it.

The Minister of Public Works, if given the authority he desires here, might engage in construction over navigable waters that would interfere with plans of the Minister of Transport, who is responsible for keeping channels of communication open. You would have a conflict of interest there that would be difficult to resolve. That would not necessarily arise if in the future, as in the past, all projects were examined by the cabinet as a whole.

When you look at section 4 of the present act you find the minister has a certain limited responsibility. The framers of the act in the past had enough common sense to see there were minor construction projects, minor alterations and so on, that should not come before the cabinet as a whole, and the Minister of Public Works has that power already. While I think that is a fairly satisfactory arrangement, it could be modified at the present time to make allowance for the change in the value of money.

Those who framed this act had a fairly good idea of what was required in dealing with navigable waters. I am sure they must have examined the whole situation not only as it relates to the small stream, but the large river and the great lake as well. They must have said, "These are matters which should be the concern of the cabinet as a whole," and they must surely have considered that when great and expensive bridges were being built or large canals were being constructed or altered, the cabinet as a whole should give consideration to the matter. Millions of dollars might be involved in these projects. Why should the responsibility be given to just one minister?

When other ministers and jurisdictions are concerned the obvious place for the authority to rest is with the cabinet as a whole. Consequently the minister is making a mistake in coming before us with a bill of this nature, slipping in a little phrase to the effect that in section 1 "minister" means the Minister of Public Works, and asking us to put that into the interpretation section and then proceed. It is not going to be done quite so easily.

The minister is under obligation to inform this house why this change is necessary. Why is he doing this? Why does he want this power? In the future what will be the difference that will result from this proposed change? If the proposed change is incorporated I think trouble may arise in the future as the result of giving so much power to the Minister of Public Works.

The minister has given no adequate explanation of his reasons for wanting this change. He has not looked far enough ahead, and the house obviously is not convinced. Has the minister considered the implications of placing in his hands the construction of million dollar enterprises, giving him the job of deciding whether or not they are adequate for the purpose for which they were constructed? Is he the one to determine alterations in connection with the St. Lawrence seaway in the future or in connection with any of the great projects across Canada? Is he the one to decide where and what bridges shall be built in the future? Is he the one to decide what shall be done concerning the navigable waters of the northern reaches of Canada as civilization progresses further north? Why just this one minister?

Of course, if the minister lives forever and continues in office forever—

Mr. Nowlan: Heaven forbid the latter.

Mr. Churchill: —there may be some people who would say this is the man who could make a sensible decision; but people on this side of the house living so closely in companionship with the Minister of Public Works are not so sure he is either going to live forever or stay in office forever, or that he is necessarily equipped with the capacity to make decisions of this magnitude.

I suggest also to the minister that he change clause 1 and strike out the small alteration he is trying to slip into this act, and leave the direction of the Navigable Waters Protection Act to the governor in council. The cabinet as a whole should decide on these vast projects. The Minister of Public Works should be given authority over the smaller ones which come within the ambit of this act so the cabinet would not be overburdened with decisions. With the cabinet dealing with these matters the Minister of Transport would be protected with regard to his responsibilities and other jurisdictions would receive adequate protection. As it stands the bill is unsatisfactory.

Mr. Hees: I should like to ask the minister if he does not honestly think that the member of the cabinet who would be in the best position to know what would or would not impede navigation is the Minister of Transport. Does he not honestly think the Minister of Transport should have charge of this act?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, on that point I would again refer to the long-entrenched position which the hon. member cited earlier.

Mr. Hees: Even Conservatives can make mistakes.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, I hope you heard that. That has been the situation since the dawn of time so far as this act is concerned. These applications have always been processed through the Minister of Public Works because the Department of Public Works was one of the first departments established, in fact it was in existence before confederation. Whether that practice should be altered, I do not think I am the one to say. I am simply saying that has been the practice for years, and to the best of my knowledge it has worked satisfactorily. We are seeking no change in that procedure now.

Mr. Hees: As I say, even after 70 years perhaps this Conservative act could have some changes made in it. If the government is going to make changes in this act, I am asking the minister if in his opinion it does not seem logical, because it does seem logical to me, that if you are going to have to make decisions 300 times or more a year as to whether certain buildings, docks and things of that kind will impede transportation, is not the Minister of Transport in the best position to do it because he understands what are the navigational requirements of certain streams and rivers. What we are trying to do is make a good, sensible job of this act, and I am asking the minister, in all seriousness if in his own mind he does not think that is so.

Mr. Winters: As hon. members know, the Minister of Public Works is responsible for the construction of all wharves, breakwaters, skidways, groynes and thousands of other protection works, with certain exceptions. A great many of these applications have only local importance, being of interest to fishermen who navigate in the area and so on, and in that field I think the Department of Public Works has acquired more experience than perhaps any other department of government. I am not trying to convince hon. members that the Department of Public Works is the only department which can properly do things, because I do not believe that is true, but in this instance I consider it is appropriate that the Minister of Public Works should decide whether these structures will or will not impede navigation.

Mr. Hees: The original act has stood the test of time for 70 years, and under the original act the Minister of Public Works had to bring these measures before the whole cabinet. In the cabinet there would be discussion in which the Minister of Transport and all other ministers whose areas might be concerned would participate. That provided a definite safeguard.

Does the minister not think that rather than these decisions being made by him and his department, certainly in connection with the larger projects the decisions should be made in co-operation with the Minister of Transport, who would have a greater knowledge of what should or should not be allowed in the way of obstructions? There should be a requirement that the Minister of Public Works should obtain approval from the Minister of Transport in connection with projects costing over a certain amount.

I quite agree that the smaller projects could be handled by the minister and his department, but I think the Minister of Transport should be brought in on these discussions. For instance Toronto, in which I am particularly interested, will be a most important harbour once the St. Lawrence seaway is developed, and I certainly would like to feel that the Minister of Transport was looking over all projects having to do with wharves, buildings and things of that kind before they were given the O.K.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Hees: At six o'clock, Mr. Chairman, I was asking the minister, since the act is being changed by the bill so there is no requirement to bring these measures before the whole cabinet and they can be decided by the one minister alone, whether he did not consider that it would be better to have these decisions at least made by the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Transport, because the Minister of Transport should know more about the requirements of navigability than the Minister of Public Works. I would appreciate it if the minister would give me his opinion and tell the committee if he does not think the two ministers together should be in consultation on at least the major projects, rather than the minister alone.

Mr. Winters: I am sure the hon. member is aware that there is cabinet solidarity here—

Mr. Green: Since when?

Mr. Winters: —and that every minister who acts on his own responsibility is not apt to do anything that is inconsistent with the responsibilities of any other minister. I think he can take it that the minister, in the exercise of his judgment, is certain to canvass all other ministers who have an interest in the particular subject or who are in a position to help. I can assure him that would follow automatically.

Mr. Green: There are one or two other matters concerning which I should like to ask the minister for an answer. First of all, how is this control going to be exercised in so far as rivers are concerned which come under the International River Improvements Act passed last year? Those rivers are primarily the Columbia river, the rivers running through the panhandle of Alaska, and the Saint John river.

As I understand it, that act is under the administration of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. I have a copy of that act here, and I believe there is no mention of the minister of that department in the act itself. Powers are given to the governor in council in the same way they were given to the governor in council under the existing Navigable Waters Protection Act. Regulations under the International River Improvements Act are to be made by the governor in council, just as they are at present under the Navigable Waters Protection Act.

The bill before us now will make a difference between the two types of work. The International River Improvements Act will be under the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources for administration but the regulations will be made by the governor in council, which I think is the way it should be. However, under the Navigable Waters Protection Act the Minister of Public Works will have all the power and in addition he will have the power to make regulations. Incidentally, I notice that the act reads that he will have power to make regulations for navigation purposes, which just shows how ridiculous it is to have the Minister of Public Works in charge of the Navigable Waters Protection Act, the main purpose of which is to protect navigation. I think the act should be administered by the Minister of Transport.

Will the minister explain what will happen on these international rivers? Suppose a company wants to build a dam or a pier on the Arrow lakes to cost say a million dollars. I think the Kaiser dam was to cost $2 million. Under the proposed amendments to the Navigable Waters Protection Act the Minister of Public Works can say whether or not the dam is to be built. I presume they would then have to go to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources under the other act. Will the minister explain just how this is going to be worked out?

I give this illustration to show that it would seem to me to be much wiser to have the authority given to the governor in council. Then the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources and the Minister of Transport could be sitting in with the Minister of Public Works and all the ministers affected could make the decision.

[Mr. Green.]

My second point has to do with harbours, first of all national harbours and, second, harbours where there are independent commissions. Will the minister explain how works to be erected in these harbours will be permitted and just where the Minister of Transport fits into that picture?

Mr. Winters: These are all matters of co-operation among the various ministers concerned, and just because a statute does not specifically say that an application has to be referred to a committee of the cabinet does not mean that the members of the government concerned do not consider it and consider it very fully. Generally, as this statute points out, the jurisdiction of the Minister of Public Works is limited to the navigational aspects of structures in navigable waters, and when the Minister of Public Works has authority by this bill to make regulations for navigation there is the limitation that he can only make regulations for navigation purposes respecting any work to which this part applies.

With respect to international rivers, this statute will apply as it has applied heretofore in the case of structures that are being built and are likely to have any bearing on navigation, just as on any river that flows entirely within our national boundaries. There is no problem there. We have been discussing with the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources the general application of our various jurisdictions, and those talks are still going forward because we want to have it clearly understood in both departments just what our responsibilities are.

With respect to harbours administered by the national harbours board, if there is a structure to be built an application is made under the terms of part I of the Navigable Waters Protection Act, and it is processed through the Minister of Public Works just as the act presently provides.

Mr. Green: But then submitted to the governor in council.

Mr. Winters: Heretofore it has been submitted to the governor in council. The change here is that the minister will have the authority now, but the procedure is still the same apart from that.

Mr. Green: The procedure is the same apart from the power to make the real decision, which at the present time is held by the governor in council. By this bill that power of deciding is being taken away and placed with the Minister of Public Works. Is that not a fact?

Mr. Winters: To this extent, that heretofore the decision was submitted to the governor in council on the recommendation of the minister and now the decision is to be made at the ministerial level. The reason for that is the multitudinous number of these applications deal largely with very small projects. They are usually matters of transmission lines over streams and the like. It seemed to the government that a more reasonable and expeditious way to handle them was for the minister to assume the responsibility and have the authority that goes with it.

Mr. Green: Why not divide these applications? The minister has said several times today that there are quite a large number of applications. It would be very helpful if he could break down the number and tell the committee how many there are in each category. In the last annual report of his department for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1955, there is the following at page 13:

> The number of applications made for approval of the plans and sites of works in navigable waters pursuant to the Navigable Waters Protection Act, the Railway Act, the Pipe Lines Act and special statutes continued to increase with 225 applications being processed during the fiscal year. Two licences for the operation of international ferries were issued.

That refers to four different types of operations, one under the Navigable Waters Protection Act, a second under the Railway Act, a third under the Pipe Lines Act and a fourth under special statutes. The bill we are considering today only deals with the first group. Can the minister give us a breakdown of what those numbers are and then a further breakdown giving the types that have been made under the Navigable Waters Protection Act?

I think nobody objects to the minister himself dealing with minor applications. There is no controversy about them. What we are worried about are the big applications which really matter, where there is a large amount of money involved or where a structure is of great importance from a navigational point of view. For that latter group we think it is wiser to retain the control in the governor in council. Can the minister give us a breakdown showing how many are in each category?

Mr. Winters: Speaking from memory, I would think that much less than 10 per cent of the total number of applications made are of any significant size. The rest of them are rather matters of routine processing of applications which have to do with small structures; largely they are in connection with the spanning of streams by transmission wires. That is what constitutes the general run of applications.

Mr. Green: Why not leave the power in the governor in council to deal with this 10 per cent which are really important and vital, and let the minister take the power to deal with the smaller ones? Would not that be the reasonable way to do it, rather than to give him complete jurisdiction over all these applications, no matter how large the scheme may be?

Mr. Winters: It is very difficult to try to break them down on a dollar basis. Sometimes a smaller structure such as a bridge which might cost only $200 or $300 might have a most important effect on navigation whereas, conversely, a very expensive structure might have a relatively small effect on navigation. I might say that we have considered some such delineation, but it just did not seem to be practical because there is no way of breaking down on dollar value and saying that just because something costs a great deal of money, its effect on navigation is important.

Mr. Green: But in the bill the minister himself has made a division. In the new section 4 he has differentiated between a bridge, boom, dam, aboiteau or causeway and the other works. Why could there not be a breaking down on that same basis of the powers exercised by the governor in council and by the minister?

Mr. Winters: On that point, may I say that is a matter of policy, Mr. Chairman; and the government felt that the responsibility for making the determination should be vested in the minister.

Mr. Herridge: Just in order to get clear in my own mind how this act will be worked, I have a question to ask. For instance, the minister knows that we hope there will be some extensive developments on the Columbia river within a few years. In the meantime, suppose some company or some person comes along and wants approval for a certain work. Then later suppose the raising of waters or something of that sort covers this work or floods it. Does the minister give consideration to a situation like that as a result of consultation with the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, so this person or corporation would not get approval to build a certain work now and then have a claim say in four or five years against the crown or the authority building a dam or raising the waters, or against even a private company doing the same thing? Are these matters investigated?

Mr. Winters: Very much so; yes.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Chairman, I think some of the answers we have just received from the minister in reply to some of the questions he has been asked further substantiate the argument we have been making, namely that this legislation should have been sent to the committee. I want to continue on that line for just a moment. It seems to me that almost every clause in this bill contains some type of technical wording. I would think the only place where we can possibly get the answer from the experts—that is, the experts over and above the minister—would be in a committee.

I know I am not supposed to refer specifically to the items that are contained in the legislation, but I might say that, in connection with the clauses, I see wording like this: We have added the word "altering," making the phrase "rebuilding, repairing or altering". It would be interesting to know why this type of wording is required as an addition in a section of this kind. Perhaps we shall get the answer from the minister, but I say that in all likelihood it is something that should be explained by those experts in the department who have had something to do with drafting the legislation itself.

Further, I notice that we use the term "substantially" in the phrase "the work does not interfere substantially." Here again we are placing in the hands of the minister some very great power. He alone is going to be the person who will make the decision.

Farther down in clause 4 we find the words "that the work was urgently required". Here is another term that I defy almost anyone to define, certainly from the legal standpoint. These words, Mr. Chairman, are all in addition to the words "navigable waters" which I notice have been referred to in legal cases but have been shoved aside very quickly when it came to giving judgment, so that little attention has been paid to the actual definition of the words themselves.

Then later on we have the words "if in the opinion of the minister, the interference with navigation..." That is another very technical term in connection with this legislation; I refer to the term "interference," and the fact that the minister is going to take upon himself the whole power to determine whether something constitutes "interference".

And last, there is a technical point I think in the last clause of the bill dealing with the question of the minister making orders or regulations for navigation purposes in connection with this act; and then the fact that the governor in council may make orders and regulations for purposes affecting navigation if it emanates from any other act of the parliament of Canada. The question there is as to which would be the superseding authority.

All these words remind me of a case during the period of the wartime prices and trade board regulations in which the term used in the legislation was "prices reasonable and just". I know the supreme court of Ontario in that case said that they just were not subject to definition. Yet here in this type of legislation we find at least five or six examples of terms which have wide ramifications, and in which we are allowing one man to make the decision as to what they actually mean. Mr. Chairman, I would respectfully request that even now it is not too late for this legislation to be referred to a committee where we can really get down to it and find out what it means.

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): Before the dinner recess we were trying to get from the minister a definition of what is a navigable stream or a navigable water, and I had referred to a case that I thought was in 1910 or 1911. As a matter of fact it was in 1908, and it happened to be in the area in which I was living at that time and it concerned the river Thames. I think it is important for us to have a proper interpretation of what is navigable and what is not navigable on the record so there will not be any doubt in our minds, and we are the ones who are passing the bill. I certainly do not know what is navigable, and I doubt whether any member of this house knows what is navigable.

This was a case on the point. I just want to read two or three sentences from the evidence in this particular case, which concerned a dispute between two farmers about taking gravel from the bed of the river, and apparently there was also the question of a crown grant in the centre of the river or to the bank. What I am concerned about here are two or three references. This is in the case of Williams v. Pickard, found in 17 Ontario Law Reports, 1908-09. This was a judgment reversing the decision of the divisional court.

> Held, reversing the decision of the divisional court . . . that the northerly boundary went to the centre of the stream.

I mention that, and continue:

> The main question is whether this description gives the grantee to the middle of the stream, or only to the bank.

Then this struck me in a casual glance at this case:

> Then, coming to the question, why should the crown reserve the bed of this river—all the land beyond the post?

That is one of the descriptive points.

> History, as well as the evidence in this case, gives a very sufficient reason. The navigability of the river Thames up to the forks—now the city of London—has always been in contemplation, and it has always been known that to make navigation, at all seasons of the year, reasonably practicable, the construction of weirs and locks, dredging and embanking, would be necessary;

Then I come to the next to the last paragraph:

> On the question of the navigability of the river Thames, I desire to guard against being considered in agreement with the trial judge in his finding. That that river is navigable for some distance, and to some extent, is too well known to require any sort of proof. It is not needful, in this case, to consider whether it is navigable at the place in question;

That is the point at which the lawsuit involving the gravel arose.

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that this house should know and have on record a definition of a navigable stream. We have heard about streams going through farms and all that sort of thing, and none of it has been refuted. I would contend, as an ordinary human being with some understanding of the problems we face, that such streams could not be considered navigable. This is important legislation and I think it is very important that the members of this house, as well as the people of this country, know what is navigable.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Murphy (Lambton West): No, I should like an answer to that question. I think the house is entitled to it. You have had during the recess to consider it.

Mr. Winters: I have already put on the record three times the best definition I am able to give of that.

Mr. Trainor: I do not profess to have any qualifications on the technical aspects of this legislation. However, there are one or two observations I should like to make. It seems to me that one of the outstanding observations one could make of this debate is that members of all three opposition parties have raised questions they considered of interest and importance to their constituents. The conspiracy of silence on the government side has been equally apparent. Surely all the interests of the constituents of this country do not rest on this side of the house. One would expect that some evidence of this would exist on the government side. Still we have not heard one word from any member on the government side except the hon. member for Fort William, who was mainly concerned with justifying—I am sorry; did the hon. member for Kootenay East speak? At any rate there have been very few who have contributed anything on this important piece of legislation.

It may be, of course, that the government subscribes to the dictum of the poet in this respect that—

Mr. Dickey: Order.

Mr. Lennard: That is right; call your members to order.

Mr. Dickey: I am calling your member to order.

Mr. Lennard: The hon. member for Kootenay East is the one you should call to order. He starts everything and finishes nothing. You know that.

Mr. Dickey: You know the member who is speaking is out of order.

Mr. Trainor: It may be that the government subscribes to the words of the poet in this respect, that we do not like anything except what the government elects on this particular point. I do not believe the government necessarily has all the wisdom in the world in this respect, and they should call to a certain extent upon the judgment of individual members. It may be that individual members are not always correct in their assumptions, but at the same time I do not think the government are always correct, either, in their particular assumptions. One notices, for example, that there is a tendency to submit to the government's view on all these questions.

Now, I believe there should be some room for individuals who express their own ideas, because those ideas are likely to more closely approximate the ideas of their constituents. We have seen a total absence of this particular element in this debate. Apparently the government has set out the idea of what shall be true. As somebody has said, it is the idea of the engineer. Engineers, and I noted this was received with applause from the opposite side of the house, are supposed to represent efficiency. Do they always represent efficiency?

Let us take a look at that. They do not. Individual corporations employ engineers at times, and if they do not like what the engineers tell them they fire the engineers. Perhaps we should fire some of the engineers who tell us what we should do in this house. As a matter of fact I believe that the common sense of the Canadian people will come into play in this respect. It may be, of course, that the government is thinking along the lines of that idea in Gray's Elegy "Full many a Liberal is born to blush unseen and waste his sweetness in the desert air"—that is if a Liberal can blush, which one would be in some doubt about after the performance in the last few sessions in this house.

However, be that as it may, I think the minister would be justified, indeed wise if I may say so, in paying some attention to the representations that have been made from this side of the house on behalf of Canadian citizens. It will not profit the minister very much to force things through on the basis of the majority he possesses. He knows he can do it, and of course that is admitted. The ultimate effect upon the Canadian public is not going to be good if he chooses to do so. I would advise the minister very sincerely to take cognizance of the representations that have been made to him from the opposition groups, which indicate that the people of Canada actually have some interest in this particular legislation, and he had better listen to them.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Chairman, coming as I do from one of the constituencies that is within the boundaries of the great port and city of Montreal, I have some interest in this bill. The second half of my lifetime I have lived in that great inland city. The first half of my life, though, I lived on the Atlantic ocean, and I myself, if you will allow a personal reference, have been a member of the bar for some 33 years, in the civil law and in the common law. I have read this bill twice over, myself. I understand it. With whatever due modesty I can command, as a member of the legal profession, I understand the bill.

My hon. friend who just spoke referred twice to some poetry, and had a little difficulty quoting it. After having what I believe to be a complete comprehension of this bill I say to all:

A little learning is a dangerous thing;
Drink deep, or taste not the Pierian spring;

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Green: The minister has said, and I think quite correctly, that there is no definition of navigable water. Surely his department must have some method of deciding what waters are navigable and what are not. Are there not some rules by which his department acts? How do they decide whether a water is navigable? Do they send out an engineer in each case to decide whether a particular river or lake is navigable, or is there any rule as to what type of vessels must be used on the water? Are there any rules at all?

Mr. Winters: It depends on the local situation, Mr. Chairman, and each particular case is examined on its own individual merits.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Application.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Would the minister explain the need for the addition of words "or altering".

Mr. Winters: This is the result of what was an obvious defect in the act as it stood. Under the old statute we had authority to deal with repairs and rebuilding, but we had no authority whatever to deal with alterations. With respect to many of those structures already existing in navigable waters there was need for alteration. It became a matter of legal definition as to what was a repair, what was a renewal and what was an alteration. We were caught in the middle, and what we are doing here is correcting what was, or what seemed to us, an obvious defect.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I understand from the minister, then, that this contemplates an addition to an existing structure?

Mr. Winters: My own concept of it is that it would almost always be in the nature of an addition to an existing structure.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 3—Construction of works in navigable waters subject to approval of minister.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, why is this distinction made in clause 3 between a bridge, boom, dam, aboiteau and causeway and the other works which are defined in the definition clause of the original act? They include wharf, dock, pier or other structure, tunnel or pipe, or telegraph or power cable or wire and the approaches or other works necessary or appurtenant thereto, or any work, structure or device, whether similar in character to the foregoing or not, which may interfere with navigation. On what basis did the department pick out these works—bridge, boom, dam, aboiteau or causeway—and leave out at least some of the others which would seem to be just as important and just as likely to impede navigation?

Mr. Winters: It was considered from our experience, Mr. Chairman, that these were the sort of structures that have been most apt to interfere with navigation. We endeavour here to broaden the exceptions. Under the old statute certain exceptions were specifically stated. Now we are saying that unless the work in question is a bridge, a boom, a dam, aboiteau or causeway, then the minister may deal with it without going through the formal procedure that is prescribed in the statute.

Mr. Green: Does that not have the effect of making it unnecessary, for example, for a pipe-line company to comply with the terms of the act in putting a pipe-line across a river?

Mr. Winters: No. I am quite sure it does not make it unnecessary, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Green: That is not included in the definition of bridge, boom, dam, aboiteau or causeway. It would seem to make it very easy for them to get by without following the act.

Mr. Harris: The minister consents in the previous subsection.

Mr. Winters: The pipe line would have to get the authority of this statute. For one thing, it is almost certain to cost more than the $5,000. That was looked into, and I am quite certain that the position of the pipe line is protected and that it must receive authority under this statute.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the minister would be interested in a question that is of vital importance to the maritimes particularly. Has he heard the last report from New Brunswick and is he able to give an answer. Conservatives elected, 14; leading, 25; Liberals leading, 13; elected, none.

Mr. Barnett: I have a couple of questions that I should like to ask in connection with this clause. First of all, to satisfy my curiosity I should like to know what an "aboiteau" is; I do not know.

Mr. Winters: An aboiteau is one of those structures that are frequently found in Nova Scotia. It is a development from the old Acadian days when the marshes were drained. It is a structure provided in a dike to allow the tidal waters to run off the marshes; then the gate closes automatically to keep the sea water out.

Mr. Barnett: We have similar structures in British Columbia but not under that name. My next question relates to the question that was asked by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra in connection with pipe lines. What is the situation with respect to an aqueduct? I can see some point in the minister's argument that a power cable or a submarine pipe line might not ordinarily be considered as likely to interfere with navigation as a bridge or boom would. But suppose somebody wants to suspend a pipe line across a stream or an inlet; would it be covered under the terms of a bridge?

Mr. Winters: Yes; a bridge.

Mr. Barnett: Personally I do not quarrel at all with the proposal in this section to increase the value of the exempted work from $1,000 to $5,000, because I think that probably is simply bringing the act in line with present valuations of the works that were contemplated when the original act was drawn; but it does seem to me that clause 3 of this bill is really the essence of the proposal to change the act, because this is the clause which in effect changes the power which has been in the governor in council to the minister in regard to the approval of sites and plans. I think that is probably the most important question that we are discussing in connection with this bill, although there are some others, of course.

Although, as I indicated on second reading, I feel there may very well be many instances when routine approval by the minister would be quite satisfactory, nevertheless I can foresee situations arising where it might be desirable that the minister not be the court of last resort in connection with this matter. I think we should give some serious consideration to this clause before we pass it in its present form.

For this reason, Mr. Chairman, and in order to indicate what I feel would be one alternative way of dealing with this, I would like to propose that this clause be amended in such a way as to perhaps compromise with some of the views expressed by hon. members and the views the minister put forward in the bill itself.

My amendment would provide a situation wherein the ordinary routine applications to which the minister has been referring and which have been increasing in number could be proceeded with in the usual manner with advertising, and at the end of the required period receive the approval of the minister; but I feel there should be some method by which these applications in the last resort could at least come before the governor in council. Therefore I would like to propose that clause 3 of Bill No. 388 be amended. I move:

That clause 3 of Bill No. 388 be amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

(3) Decisions of the minister under this section shall be subject to an appeal to the governor in council under such terms and conditions as the governor in council may by regulations provide.

Mr. Winters: I think perhaps I can dispose of this in just a moment. The decisions under this section are not normally the kind that are considered for appeal in any event. Notice of the application is given in the Canada Gazette and two local newspapers. That is for the purpose of giving the public themselves the chance to protest if they care to do so; if they feel their individual rights are being infringed in any way. By the time this comes before the minister there has either been an appeal lodged by somebody who feels that his rights are being injured, or there is no objection at all and then the request is granted.

It seems to me that provision for an appeal in this instance is unnecessary and, Mr. Chairman, I therefore must say I would feel obliged to vote against the amendment.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, the minister forgets that in quite a few of these applications under this new bill there will not be any advertisements at all. The minister is taking the power here to make the decisions himself without any advertising being required whatever in all cases where he believes the work will not interfere substantially with navigation. The word "substantially", by the way, is an entirely new provision in the bill. Formerly the act read "interfere with navigation" and now the word "substantially" is put in. That was obviously put in as a protection for the people who are going to erect these obstructions.

The bill also refers to instances where, in the minister's opinion, the value of the work does not exceed $5,000. In those cases there is no need for advertising at all. If the minister decides in favour of allowing the obstruction the man who is affected by that obstruction has absolutely no rights whatever. He may not know a thing about it until permission has been granted.

I do suggest that this amendment improves the bill, giving the opportunity to appeal to the governor in council. I do not believe the power of decision should ever have been taken away from the governor in council as is being done in this bill, but if it is to be taken away from the governor in council and put in the hands of the minister alone surely there should be an appeal to the governor in council. After all, there are still a few rights left in this country, and surely there is no reason why the person affected by these decisions should not have the right to appeal.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, in reply to that I simply say we are making no change from the provisions of the present statute which says, in section 4, subsection 2:

> The provisions of this section do not apply to small wharves or groynes or other bank or beach protection works, or boathouses, if in the opinion of the Minister of Public Works
> (a) they do not interfere with navigation, and
> (b) do not cost more than one thousand dollars.

That $1,000 is being raised to $5,000 but the principle is the same. There was no appeal there and I submit no appeal is necessary here.

Mr. Green: But the minister is again overlooking the fact that on all the other applications where the minister does not exempt them from advertising the governor in council has nothing to do with it and there is no right of appeal whatever. This amendment will give the right of appeal in both cases; in the first place, in cases where there has been advertising and the minister has decided against the person who wishes to appeal, and in the second place in this other group of applications which is now much larger than it could have been under the original act.

The exemptions under the original act were very limited. They applied only to small wharves, groynes or other bank or beach protection works, or boathouses, if in the opinion of the Minister of Public Works they did not interfere with navigation. The minister has now slipped in the word "substantially", which of course gives him that much wider power to rule in favour of an applicant. The other provision concerned the $1,000. There is a very big difference, because under the new bill all sorts of obstacles come under subclause 2 with the exception of bridges, booms, dams, aboiteaux or causeways.

I do suggest again the amendment improves the act. In all fairness to the people who are going to be affected by the decisions made by the minister alone there should be the right of appeal to the governor in council.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I would like to support the amendment moved by my colleague the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, and like the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra I feel it does improve the section I, too, feel the change that is being made by the section—without this amendment, at any rate—should not be made.

I am a little amazed at the Minister of Public Works standing up and saying that no real change is being made by what clause 3 of this bill does to section 4 of the act. He admits, of course, that the change from $1,000 to $5,000 is being made but he tries to create the impression that that is the only change. Surely this is clear, Mr. Chairman. Under the act as it now stands any work that exceeds $1,000 in value has to be approved by the governor in council; under the new act anything above $5,000 in value would have to be approved only by the Minister of Public Works; anything below $5,000 in value has only to be declared by the Minister of Public Works as something which he does not even have to approve.

That may be putting it a bit strangely, but is that not what the section as amended will provide, namely that everything will be in the hands of the Minister of Public Works? If it is worth $5,000 or more, he has to approve it; if it is worth less than $5,000, he so indicates, and then having given that indication he does not even have to approve it. Surely that is quite a change from the situation under which the governor in council came into the picture where any work was of a value in excess of $1,000.

I think there has been a bit of carelessness in the drafting of this clause. It looks to me as though those who drafted it tried to recast what is already in section 4 of the act. Apparently they felt that some of the wording had to be carried over. Section 4 of the act as it now is reads:

4. (1) No work shall be built or placed in, upon, over, under, through or across any navigable water unless the site thereof has been approved by the governor in council, nor unless such work is built, placed and maintained in accordance with plans and regulations approved or made by the governor in council.

The point I am making is that in the old section there is a definition of regulations; regulations are spelled out as being regulations approved or made by the governor in council. But the amended clause will read:

4. (1) No work shall be built or placed in, upon over, under, through or across any navigable water unless

(a) the site and plans thereof have been approved by the minister; and

(b) the work is built, placed and maintained in accordance with the plans and the regulations.

I ask the minister to tell us what is the meaning of the last two words in subclause 1 of the new clause 4; I refer to the words "the regulations".

Mr. Winters: I would refer the hon. member to clause 6 which reads:

The minister may make such orders or regulations as he deems expedient—

Mr. Knowles: Does the minister suggest that the general power of regulation under the act covers the reference in what would be section 4 to "the regulations"? It seems to me that those words are just left hanging in thin air. Actually the stipulation set out in the amended clause 4 does not hang together; it does not have any meaning or any reference. I feel that what happened is that at the request of the minister somebody has redrafted the old section 4 and tried to take out the requirement of reference to the governor in council, and in so doing has emasculated the clause until it does not mean anything at all.

All it now says is that the minister is the boss; if it is above $5,000 he has to approve; if it is below $5,000 he just has to say, "It is below $5,000 and it does not interfere substantially with navigation," and therefore he does not even have to approve.

Mr. Nowlan: Unless it is a bridge, boom, dam, aboiteau or causeway.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings says, "Unless it is a bridge, boom, dam, aboiteau or causeway." The only conclusion one can draw from that exception in subclause 2 is that if it is a bridge, boom, dam, aboiteau or causeway it does come under the exception and is therefore one of the works the minister has to approve. We are given just two choices. Either the minister approves it or the minister tells us that he does not have to approve it.

Mr. Winters: That is not right.

Mr. Knowles: The minister says that that is not right, but I would be glad to have him explain it. Perhaps I had better put the rest of section 4 on the record so it will be there:

(2) This section does not apply to any work, other than a bridge, boom, dam, aboiteau or causeway, if in the opinion of the minister

(a) the work does not interfere substantially with navigation, and

(b) the value of the work does not exceed five thousand dollars.

My contention is that this clause means that if the value is in excess of $5,000 or if it is a bridge, boom, dam, aboiteau or causeway, the minister has to give his approval. If it is anything else the minister simply indicates that he does not have to give his approval. In either case it is in the hands of the minister. It seems to me that it is a bad clause in the first place, but it would be improved to some extent by the amendment which has been proposed by my colleague.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I should like to deal with the question of how the amendment applies. The minister has given an explanation in connection with this clause, but it strikes me that under some circumstances there might be quite an advantage to the minister if there were some form of appeal from his decision. What the minister says about notice having to be given and there being an opportunity for anyone concerned to raise objection is perfectly true; nevertheless if the minister has made his decision, even though there might be some objection, as far as I can see it that is it.

As I suggested earlier, the only redress open to anyone would be to get rid of the Minister of Public Works who was holding office at that particular time, but that might not necessarily be the most desirable thing to have happen for the person who was involved. He might think that otherwise the minister was a fairly good Minister of Public Works, but if he refused to hear the objection raised in a particular situation or, on the other hand, if he listened to the objection that was raised and turned it down, then where are we left? I presume the matter could be raised on the floor of the house by a member of parliament, but parliament might not be sitting for a period of months and then there would be no court of appeal.

One reason in the back of my mind for proposing this amendment is the experience we had in British Columbia in connection with appeals from decisions of ministers, or there not being any such appeal. I am thinking of the situation which arose in connection with the issuance of forest management licences. I do not recall all the details of that situation, and if I did I would not take the time of the committee to relate them. I do know there was a great deal of heat generated in British Columbia over this question with respect to whether or not the minister should have the right to turn thumbs down on a particular application for a forest management licence, and if proper machinery had been set up in the first instance for an appeal from the minister to the governor in council the matter probably could have been settled with a good deal less heat and to the better satisfaction of all concerned.

I still feel that some such provision in this legislation would mean a greater degree of flexibility in its application to some situations. A situation requiring an appeal might arise only once in five or ten years, but the very fact that there was provision for some appeal from the decision of the minister might in itself work toward a satisfactory solution without the necessity of anyone having to resort to an appeal. I really wish the minister could see his way clear to accept a proposal along the lines I have suggested.

Amendment (Mr. Barnett) negatived: Yeas, 27; nays, 59.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment lost. Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Kootenay East was good enough to send me over a dictionary to help me out, but it really does not help too much in defining the word "substantially". The minister is going to have some dandies to deal with when this goes through. I wonder how he is going to define the word "substantially".

Mr. Winters: I have not the benefit of a dictionary before me, but I would think there would have to be real interference with navigation before the word "substantially" would apply. It could not be just some imagined interference. It would have to be demonstrated that there was real interference, and that is why the word "substantially" was inserted.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Is there any particular definition of real interference?

Mr. Winters: I have no definition of that, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Barnett: There is one other matter I should like to bring to the minister's attention in connection with clause 3. Subclause 2 exempts certain works from having to have formal approval. Am I correct in understanding that not only under this bill but also under the old act those works which are exempt from being required to have formal approval do not have to be advertised before they are built? If that is so, I raise the question whether it might not be desirable to have some provision whereby some form of public notice would be given of the intention to construct such works.

The works which have to be advertised are published in the Canada Gazette. Everyone interested enough to peruse the columns of the Canada Gazette is aware of the fact that applications are being made, and those who read their newspapers also know. Inasmuch as the act has been opened, I wonder whether it might not be desirable to have some provision, perhaps not as formal as that required for larger projects, for giving public notice of the intention to construct such works so that if anyone had any objection to their erection or was of the opinion that they would interfere substantially with navigation they would have the opportunity of expressing their views to the minister before the works actually came into being. Would the minister give consideration to that suggestion?

Mr. Winters: I think that is quite a good suggestion. I have been discussing that very point with our officials and the law officers, and while we have not worked out the means of doing it we do intend to inform the public of the granting of approvals in all these instances.

Mr. Trainor: I should like to make an appeal on behalf of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. There appears to be a conflict of dictatorship here. This bill mentions—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Trainor: —pipe lines, and I suggest that is a matter that is reserved for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The Minister of Public Works has no business butting into pipe lines.

Mr. Winters: The hon. doctor, who has become a gem of purest ray serene tonight, has uttered words of wisdom which I shall be glad to keep in mind.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 4—Removal of unauthorized works.

Mr. Green: Clause 4 writes a new section 5 into the act, and subsection 2 of that section 5 seems to be an entirely new principle in the Navigable Waters Protection Act. It reads:

The minister may, subject to deposit and advertisement as in the case of a proposed work, approve of the plans and site of a work after construction thereof has commenced

(a) if, prior to commencement of construction, the minister, having been satisfied that the work was urgently required, consented in writing to commencement of construction; or

(b) if five years have elapsed since completion of construction of the work; and such approval has the same effect as if given prior to commencement of construction of the work.

A great many of these works will not even require the formal approval of the minister because they will be exempt under subsection 2 of section 4 of the act once this bill has been passed. What number of cases are there which require this urgent action? As I read this provision, it is not even necessary for the applicant to file a plan. It certainly is not necessary for him to do any advertising before the minister gives a letter authorizing that the work be commenced.

What are the types of works for which this great speed is required? Where quick action of that type is taken, where a short cut of that nature is used, surely the Minister of Transport should be brought into the picture, because the effect of the work is to interfere with navigation. Why is provision not made there that these things should be done with the consent and approval of the Minister of Transport? It is bad enough to provide for the minister to write these letters and thereby permit the construction of the work without the time taken to advertise and without the people who are going to be affected knowing anything about it. As I say, that is bad enough. But surely it is just as bad to keep the Minister of Transport out of the picture. If there are to be these emergency cases, then the Minister of Transport should be brought into the picture.

Actually, under the new section 9 he must be appealed to; he must give his consent in the case of a work in a national harbour, except under this very subsection 2 of section 5. I cannot understand why he should not be brought into the picture not only on a work in a national harbour but also in connection with any other works where this short cut is being taken.

Mr. Winters: I can assure the hon. member that where the interests of the Minister of Transport are concerned he will certainly be brought into the picture.

Mr. Green: Why not say so in the act?

Mr. Winters: There are not many cases where this will apply, but where it does it is generally a matter of urgency. I think this is one section that badly needs to be inserted in the act in order to give it a measure of workability which it now sadly lacks. There are structures pending now that cannot be approved because they did not get prior approval, yet they were matters of great urgency. I can think of one that came to us through the channels of the Railway Act which, of course, is administered by my colleague the Minister of Transport. There is another one pending in Vancouver itself.

Mr. Green: What is it?

Mr. Winters: I am not sure of the details now, but there was a structure started there without prior approval. No matter how meritorious that structure might be, we have no authority whatever to give it approval. I know my hon. friend recognizes what that can mean to financing and other development in the area. The fact of the matter is that it cannot now be an approved structure. Under the old section there was no provision whatever for approving an unauthorized structure unless it was built or in course of construction on the 1st day of June, 1938.

The government does not believe any structure should be started without prior approval; but there are extenuating circumstances sometimes, where it becomes necessary because of the urgency of the situation. This legislation does provide for approval subject to the applicant conforming to all the provisions of the statute. By publishing notice in the Canada Gazette and two other papers and going through all the procedure he can then qualify. But in the meantime approval can be given him to proceed with the work.

Mr. Green: That is only after the work has begun.

Mr. Winters: If he cannot qualify, however, the work will have to be undone.

Mr. Casselman: Has there ever been a work taken down after it has started?

Mr. Winters: Yes.

Mr. Casselman: Where?

Mr. Winters: I can think of one in the province of Quebec in my time, and I have no doubt there were others before my time. The hon. member for Broadview pointed out how far this statute goes back. I think he should be checked on that point too. But if a structure now goes forward for some reason or other without authority, then five years later the owners of that structure can come to us and say, "Will you consider this for approval?" This section in the statute gives us the authority to do that. In five years its merit or otherwise should be demonstrated. I think this is one section that badly needs to be inserted in the act.

Mr. Green: There are two types of works. I should like to deal first with the latter group, the group the minister has just dealt with. Does he mean to say that a company can put in an unauthorized work, then use that work for five years with nothing to be done about stopping them or removing it, and that at the end of five years they get approval? That is the line of the argument he is making.

Mr. Winters: Not exactly.

Mr. Green: What is the sense of that? The applicant can put in this pier and use it for five years.

Mr. Winters: Not if it is a structure that interferes with navigation.

Mr. Green: He can use it for five years anyway, apparently. Then as long as he gets approval after five years, he is all right.

Mr. Winters: In the meantime, if it interferes with navigation it falls under another section of the act and he can be required to remove it.

Mr. Green: Then the other branch is the case where he has not commenced the construction but where he comes and gets a letter from the minister before starting construction. For the life of me I cannot see why there should be such great urgency in that case. They cannot build a pier or they cannot build a bridge without getting their plans made. Under the act the only delay is that they must give one month's notice of the deposit of the plan and they must advertise in two papers.

Mr. Winters: But I am sure my hon. friend will recognize that there may be a case where a water main breaks. That has happened.

Mr. McIvor: That is right.

Mr. Winters: And in replacing the water main it was necessary to have regard to the navigational aspects of the river under which this water main was carried. It was simply impractical to wait one month to replace the water main. Some prior approval had to be given. It happened in the area of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Perhaps I can give my hon. friend a case in point. He is familiar with Vancouver harbour. The Alberta pool wanted to put an extension on their grain elevator there.

Mr. Green: On what?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): On their grain elevator on Burrard inlet. My hon. friend knows the locality. The extension could not possibly interfere with navigation. It is back parallel to the shore line. The dock lies out there 200 feet in front of it. Nevertheless, that structure was built on a navigable water and they had to get a permit under the Navigable Waters Protection Act. Under the old machinery it takes something like two months to get a permit. The fact that the work had to be delayed until the permit was obtained has prevented us from using the elevator probably for the last month. Obviously a case such as that could be dealt with by the minister under this act, whereas it could not be dealt with in that way under the old one.

Mr. Green: That may have been a case in which this provision would have come in handy, but that is just the way in which you make bad laws, namely by passing them in order to fit particular cases. The delay under this act is only a matter of 30 days; one month's notice in the Canada Gazette and two publications in the local paper.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes; but you must send the plans down from Vancouver.

Mr. Green: Surely anybody who might be affected is entitled to at least that much notice.

Mr. Winters: What about the case of a water main?

Mr. Green: As far as the water main is concerned, under the new subsection 2 of section 4 they are not obliged to get approval at all because they can be exempted under the powers the minister is given there to exempt them.

Mr. Winters: No. The cost will exceed $5,000 in every case.

Mr. Green: The trouble is that in order to meet one or two cases the minister is putting through a bill which takes away the rights of other people to protest and to have a hearing in respect of these applications.

Mr. Winters: Not at all.

Mr. Green: That is bad draftsmanship and it is bad practice.

Mr. Winters: That is not the case.

Mr. Green: I suggest that this business of the minister simply writing a letter to the effect that they can go ahead and start to build their elevator or build their water main without first having complied with the law again is showing a disrespect for parliament and for the statutes of this country. It is belittling parliament, and is just in line with the course this government has been following right throughout the present session.

Mr. Winters: I do not see how you can come to that conclusion.

Mr. Green: There is no use trying to convince the government. I have seen what has been happening here all during this session. Some day the Canadian people are going to catch up with the government and stop this kind of thing.

Mr. Winters: If the Canadian people have catching up to do on a section such as this, I certainly will welcome it.

Mr. Green: The Canadian people who are affected by these works, and whose rights may be affected, are entitled to be given notice and to have an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. Winters: They have.

Mr. Green: Here the minister is writing into the law a statute under which a work can actually be commenced without anybody being given notice, and actually without the minister himself having seen the plans. I submit that is entirely wrong. It is a case of just helping out some friends or somebody who wants to get on in a hurry, and let the other people who may be affected take their chance or lose out entirely. It is the wrong type of legislation, but I am not surprised that the government, in its present state of thinking, is bringing in amendments of this type.

Mr. Herridge: I just want to refer to clause 4, subclause 2, paragraph (b) which reads as follows:

> If five years have elapsed since completion of construction of the work—

I know in my own district there are quite a number of small structures, dolphins, piles and so on, that have been driven throughout the years without any authority whatever. I suppose that has happened on other rivers in Canada. It is understandable in view of the circumstances that existed years ago. Now, what does the minister do, shall we say, to legalize all these works when this bill is passed? Are the minister's officials instructed to investigate in the district and ask these people to make application to regularize them, or is it just left as it is? Do they have to bring this matter to the attention of the minister or the department? What is the procedure to regularize these illegal structures?

Mr. Winters: The onus is on them if they wish to have their structures made legal structures. It is up to them to take action, otherwise they run the risk of having to remove them.

Mr. Herridge: There are penalties under the act for illegal structures?

Mr. Winters: Yes.

Mr. Barnett: I am a little puzzled about this subclause 2 (b). What is the purpose in having this five-year period after the completion of construction? Why should an application not be made immediately, or as soon as the department is aware that certain construction is under way? Why should they not be required to apply immediately and publish notice in the usual way?

Mr. Winters: I do not believe the other sections of the statute would have any effect if people were allowed to go ahead and build structures without getting approval, and then subsequently upon application, receive approval. If anybody does build a structure without proper authority, then he must be prepared to wait five years. That is part of the penalty he must pay for building an unauthorized structure on a navigable water. Under the old act, if he built it subsequent to June, 1938, he could not get approval in any event.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 5—Deposit of plans with minister and registrar of deeds.

Mr. Green: Clause 5 covers the new sections 7, 8 and 9. The new section 9 reads as follows:

> In the case of a work in any navigable water under the jurisdiction of the national harbours board, a reference in this part, except in paragraph (a) of subsection 2 of section 5 and in section 10, to the minister shall be construed as including also a reference to the minister having the administration of the National Harbours Board Act.

Why should the Minister of Transport not be consulted and his consent required before one of these urgently needed jobs is undertaken? For example, I am thinking of the extension of the Alberta pool elevator in Vancouver harbour. The Minister of Transport is responsible for the administration of the national harbours board. All these great harbours of Canada are directly under his jurisdiction. This section is admitting, in effect, that in so far as national harbours are concerned the Minister of Transport should be consulted and his consent should be obtained. Why should it not be obtained in the case where the rules are to be thrown aside and the consent given by letter? Why should the Minister of Public Works be authorized to give a letter in respect of a work in one of the national harbours without getting the consent of the Minister of Transport?

Mr. Winters: I think it is idle to assume that the assent of the Minister of Transport would not be obtained. The hon. member seems to think this is a balkanized government, whereas there is great cohesion in it as he, I am sure, knows. Before this section was drafted in this form there were long discussions among the officials of the Department of Transport, the officials of public works and the officials of the Department of Justice. I myself had discussions on this very point with my colleague the Minister of Transport. I can assure my hon. friend on something about which he seems to have doubt, that there is the very closest liaison between members of this government. I can assure him of this, too; that in any matter in which the Minister of Transport is interested his prior approval will be obtained before approval of any structure is granted under this statute.

Mr. Green: The Minister of Public Works is writing into this section that the approval of the Minister of Transport must be obtained for any work in a national harbour, which is quite correct. But then, he puts in the exception that such consent is not necessary where it is one of these urgently required works. I suggest it would be more necessary in a case like that than in the construction of ordinary works under the other provisions of the act.

Here an exception is being made and permission is going to be given to start construction of a work without advertisement or without notice to anybody, and the Minister of Transport is not asked about it. He is not required to give his consent. I suggest to the minister that those words should be taken out, "except in paragraph (a) of subsection 2 of section 5 and in section 10." Why is it that the Minister of Transport has to be consulted in every other case where there is a work going into a national harbour except where it is being done under the urgent provisions?

Mr. Winters: I am not clear on the import of the last part of the hon. gentleman's question. I think we have protected the situation here. We do not go beyond what the provisions are now. These matters are considered very carefully. We have the greatest regard for the interests of navigation. As I said this afternoon we intend to see that they are protected. There is no giving away. It is not easy to get a permit under the Navigable Waters Protection Act. All the steps must be taken and all the interested parties must be consulted. I can assure my hon. friend that will continue to be the case.

Mr. Green: The minister, for some reason or other, has written into this new section now that the Minister of Transport must be consulted with respect to all works to be put into a national harbour, with the exception of a work which is put in under the urgent provision. Let us go back to the case of the extension of the Alberta pool elevator in Vancouver harbour. Why should the Minister of Transport not give his consent to that short cut being taken? He has to give his consent if it is done in the regular way; that is, the plans are filed and advertisements are published. Because of the way the section reads now he does not have to give his consent if the minister simply writes a letter and says, "You may start construction". Why should his consent not be required?

Mr. Winters: It is simply to give initial approval, Mr. Chairman, to start construction, subject to his being able to qualify through the regular channels once that initial approval has been given.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, just before the clause carries, I call the minister's attention to subsection 2 of section 7 at the bottom of the preceding page. I am wondering about the draftsmanship of this subsection. I am not now discussing the merits of the bill. The subsection reads:

> Where there is no registrar of deeds for the area . . .

I think the registrar of deeds is an individual rather than an office. This refers to a person, but when you look at the explanatory note you see that it refers to an office, to the office of the registrar of deeds. This subsection says:

> Where there is no registrar of deeds . . .

Frankly I think this is draftsmanship the minister should scrutinize pretty carefully. The explanation is obvious. It says that this applies to the Northwest Territories, and that the plans shall be filed at Ottawa. But when you read the section you find that it is general and I suggest ambiguous. It says:

> Where there is no registrar of deeds for the area in which the work is proposed to be constructed—

I think it would have been better to say "Northwest Territories" and be done with it. I continue:

> —the duplicate of the plan thereof and the description of the proposed site shall be deposited in the nearest land titles office established under the Land Titles Act.

The explanation says that means it is going to be filed in Ottawa. I would suggest to the minister that there are numerous land titles acts in effect in various parts of Canada, and that there is considerable ambiguity in the drafting of this subsection. Perhaps the minister should give it pretty careful consideration before it finally goes through, because when you read the explanation it is very plain and very obvious. If the explanation had been made in the subsection there would be no trouble about it at all. As it reads at the moment I do suggest that some day there could be a great deal of trouble with the land titles act of Alberta, or of Saskatchewan, for instance. I presume it refers to a federal act. I think it should be scrutinized and possibly amended before it finally passes.

Mr. Winters: I shall be glad to do that. I am not an expert on legal draftsmanship. I will have it scrutinized and if a change is required it will be made when the bill receives third reading.

Mr. White (Hastings-Frontenac): I should like to point out to the minister that in subsection 1 he uses the words "may deposit", and in subsection 2 he uses the words "shall be deposited". I understand it is compulsory that the plans be deposited, but apparently the wording—

Mr. Winters: It is the same wording as the old statute. It has been taken out of the original act.

Mr. White (Hastings-Frontenac): I know it is the same wording of the old statute. Certainly the words "may deposit" leave in my mind some doubt as to the interpretation being compulsory.

Mr. Winters: I shall look into that.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 6—Regulations.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, clause 6 requires some explanation. Under the act as it stands at present all regulations must be passed by the governor in council. This new section 10 provides that the minister alone can pass regulations under part 1 of the act, but it leaves power to the governor in council to pass regulations with respect to all plans and sites which are approved under any other act of the parliament of Canada. Will the minister explain the basis for that division?

Mr. Winters: Well, Mr. Chairman, there are regulations required under some other statutes such as the Railway Act, and there are one or two others where the establishment of regulations by the governor in council is required. We are simply stating in this section that those provisions stand as they are, but that for the purpose of part I of the Navigable Waters Protection Act the regulation may be established by the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. Green: That seems to be going very far. The minister is given the power to make the decisions under this act. Surely it would be only reasonable to require him to submit the regulations to the governor in council for approval. Instead of that, because of the way this amendment is worded the minister himself not only makes the decisions but he also makes the rules.

I submit to the Prime Minister that that is not right. If there are to be regulations under this act and the minister is to be given all these very wide powers, surely the regulations should not be made by the minister; they should at least be made by the governor in council. I do suggest this section should be amended accordingly.

Mr. Winters: I am quite prepared to accept that suggestion, Mr. Chairman, and I would ask one of my colleagues to move that this particular section be dropped and that the section stand as it is in the old statute.

The Deputy Chairman: If I understood the minister correctly, one of his colleagues will now move that section 6 of the bill be deleted.

Mr. Pickersgill: I so move.

Motion agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Clause 6 is deleted.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

The Deputy Chairman: When shall the bill be read a third time? Next sitting of the house.

VETERANS BUSINESS AND PROFESSIONAL LOANS ACT

AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO GUARANTEED LOANS

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 253, to amend the Veterans Business and Professional Loans Act.

Mr. White (Hastings-Frontenac): Is the minister going to make a statement?

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any point in my making a statement. At the resolution stage I explained fully the purpose of the amendment and certain observations were made by hon. members opposite. I gathered from those that they were in complete agreement with the purpose of the bill.

Mr. G. S. White (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, despite what the minister has said, if he looks back in Hansard he will find that at the resolution stage he said that of the many questions asked some would be dealt with on second reading. I had hoped that when the minister spoke on second reading he would answer many of the questions that were asked by various members at the resolution stage.

As the minister will recall, when we were at the resolution stage members from all parties in the house generally expressed their approval of this amendment and spoke strongly in favour of the benefits that had been conferred on veterans under this act. Various requests were made to the minister that instead of bringing in the amendment that he is now making the whole act should be extended for a period of 5, 8 or 10 years. On that occasion the minister stated, as reported at page 3295 of Hansard:

> It would not be our intention to extend the time unless there are very good reasons for it.

The minister recalls the debate at the resolution stage. Many reasons were advanced why the act should be extended. The minister was questioned as to whether or not it would be necessary to have any further staff and whether there would be any further expense if the act were extended, and he said no. He also agreed that the act would be in force—or at least the administrative sections would be in force—for a long time to come in order to collect the loans that had been made and to take care of the applications that had been made by veterans of the Korean war and by other veterans who are now serving in the armed forces.

It would perhaps be interesting if the minister would tell the house how many veterans would be affected by this amendment. By that I mean the number of veterans apart from Korean veterans who are not really affected by the amendment because their 10-year period has not run out.

According to the report in Hansard the minister gave the impression there had been only one application not dealt with because the 10-year period had expired between the date the application was made and the date the loan was granted. I think the minister will find there have been many other applications, because in the report of the Department of Veterans Affairs he will see there have been well over 7,000 applications. I believe in the last year reported there were somewhere between two and three hundred applications.

As one hon. member pointed out at the resolution stage, applications for assistance are still being received under the Veterans' Land Act. In view of that it seems only reasonable that this act should be extended for a further period of time.

There were other points raised. One was the question, which I thought surely the minister would answer, concerning a veteran of the Korean war who stayed in the army. Let us suppose the Korean veteran was to be discharged in 1958. Does that mean he will have 10 years from the date of his discharge in which to apply for assistance under this act? I ask this question because the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs said he may be entitled to it. I do not know whether he used the word "may" intentionally, but at page 3297 of Hansard the parliamentary assistant is reported as saying:

> . . . he may become entitled to the benefits of this act because this act says "ten years after the date of discharge".

He then goes on to state the matter is now under discussion.

There is the other case, Mr. Speaker, of a Korean veteran who is discharged, later re-enlists and serves for a further period and is then again discharged. From what date would his 10-year period operate? Would it be from the date of his first discharge or from the date of his second discharge?

I have several questions here which I wish to ask the minister and I hope he will be able to give us the information. The first question concerns the total number of applications made to date under this act.

Second, the total number of applications that have been refused by the bank, and the number of applications that have been refused by the minister or his officials.

Third, the total amount loaned to date, the total amount that has been repaid, and the total amount that is in arrears at the present time.

Fourth, what is the amount paid by the department to the banks to date to cover losses, and what is the total amount written off as bad debts as of this date?

Fifth, would the minister tell us if there have been any prosecutions under section 10 of the act? If there have been any prosecutions, what is the total amount of the fines paid by veterans? I would also be rather interested in knowing the amount of the largest fine paid by any veteran.

Sixth, under section 11 of the act, whereby the minister may take over the loan from the bank, how many such loans has the minister taken over? What recovery, if any, has the minister been able to make?

Seventh, would the minister be able to tell us approximately how long it takes to process a loan of this nature? Could he also tell us if all the chartered banks share fairly equally in the distribution of these loans, or are there only two or three of the chartered banks which handle the majority of these loans?

In conclusion, I would again appeal to the minister to very seriously consider the extension of the administrative section of this act.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): If the Minister of Finance speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, there is just one point I should like to place before the government, arising out of the fact that this Veterans Business and Professional Loans Act is in effect the joint responsibility of the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Veterans Affairs. The Minister of Finance, of course, deals with the guarantees to the banks, but the Minister of Veterans Affairs is responsible for deciding whether or not a veteran is qualified. For example, section 4 subsection 1(i) provides that:

> The application for the loan was concurred in before the loan was made, by the Minister of Veterans Affairs or his authorized representative as defined by the regulations.

And then section 8 provides:

> The governor in council may on the recommendation of the minister—

That is the Minister of Finance.

> —and the Minister of Veterans Affairs make regulations for any purpose for which regulations are contemplated by this act—

And so on. Section 12 of the act provides:

> The minister may pay any amount payable to a bank under this act out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund and the minister and the Minister of Veterans Affairs may pay any amount necessary to meet the expenses incurred in the administration of this act out of moneys appropriated by parliament for the purpose.

Just how they decide who is to pay which I do not know; but in effect this is a joint act.

I believe I must protest again tonight, as I did in speaking in the throne speech debate on January 23, 1956, that Canada still has a Minister of Veterans Affairs who is holding two portfolios. I think that means adequate justice is not being done to the veterans of Canada. The Minister of Veterans Affairs was asked about this at the Canadian Legion convention in Vancouver a week ago today; at least the report from which I am reading was published a week ago today. I am reading from the Vancouver Province of June 11, 1956:

> Asked from convention floor if the government was going to restore Mr. Lapointe to a single portfolio in the cabinet, the minister—who recently became Postmaster General—assured the convention that the additional duties have in no way interfered with his responsibility to the veteran.

Now, I am not criticizing—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Order. I hesitated to interrupt the hon. member but I think perhaps I should. The hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac who preceded him placed a lot of very general questions on the record in connection with this one-section bill which we have before us. I have in my hand from the Journals of 1949 the ruling of Mr. Speaker in which he is discussing what is and what is not relevant when an amending bill is before the house. I shall read just a part of it from page 237, as follows:

> On the second reading of an amending bill—

Hon. members will notice that this is an amending bill.

> —it is the principle of the amending bill, and not the principle of the act to be amended, which is the "business under consideration". The discussion must therefore relate exclusively to the principle of the amending bill.

If I may paraphrase, that principle is that certain loans shall be made if application has been made within the time limit, even though the loan was not made at the expiration of the time limit. I think I must ask hon. members not to broaden this discussion to the administration of the Veterans Business and Professional Loans Act, and certainly not to the administration of the Department of Veterans Affairs, which criticism and discussion I think would be much more appropriate under the departmental estimates.

Mr. Green: I submit that this amending bill has to do with applications for loans, and part of the process of getting through an application for a loan is to get the approval of the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I submit that I am in order in dealing with the fact that the Minister of Veterans Affairs is only a half-time minister so far as this department is concerned. That is one reason there has been so little veterans' legislation come before us this session. I think this bill and perhaps one other—I am not sure whether there was one other—represent the only veterans' legislation brought before this 1956 session of the house.

I place the blame for the failure to appoint a full-time Minister of Veterans Affairs directly at the door of the Prime Minister. It is his responsibility to see that these portfolios are properly manned. If he were giving leadership to this country as he should be doing he would have had a full-time Minister of Veterans Affairs appointed a long time ago, or he could perhaps have relieved the present Minister of Veterans Affairs of the necessity of looking after the portfolio of Postmaster General. I repeat that this situation is unfair to the veterans of Canada, and it shows a lack of leadership on the part of the Prime Minister.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I am not going to be any more in order than was the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. I cannot imagine any statement that would receive less support in the house than the one he has just made.

Mr. Green: On the Liberal side.

Mr. Harris: And on the opposition side, because there is not a single member of the opposition who has dealt with veterans' affairs in the past who does not know that the heart and soul of the minister are in his work concerning veterans, and that work has resulted in great benefit to the veterans. If my hon. friends opposite are not aware of that, those on this side of the house are. The minister is quite competent and capable to handle both jobs without either one suffering.

An hon. Member: Superman.

Mr. Harris: We do not claim to be supermen on this side, though that is something which occasionally breaks out on the opposition side. I have been waiting for someone to object to the remarks I have just made, and it is quite evident that no member of the opposition is going to do so.

Mr. Knowles: We believe in obeying the rules.

Mr. Harris: When a government member is speaking, but when you choose to be out of order you think we ought to be indulgent, and that the Speaker ought to be indulgent as well.

Mr. Knowles: Will the hon. minister please address the Chair?

Mr. Harris: A good many questions were asked in connection with this particular bill, and naturally I cannot answer them on second reading, though I am prepared to do so in committee of the whole. I must repeat that I have listened twice now to what the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has said about my colleague the Minister of Veterans Affairs, and I am quite prepared to say again that I doubt if there is a veteran in this country who feels that his rights are being neglected.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1.

Mr. Harris: The hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac read out so many questions that it was impossible for me to make notes in order to answer them, but I think I should answer generally the points he raised and then perhaps he can ask other questions or he may accept some advice from me about them. The purpose of this bill is to provide a beneficial amendment which will permit persons who have applied for the benefits of this act but whose applications were not dealt with by the time the 10-year period elapsed to obtain the benefits of this act.

When I spoke at the resolution stage I said that I knew of one case only to which this amendment would apply, but I assumed that there would be others in future because of the fact that the 10-year period had not elapsed in every case. Since April 26, when we discussed this last, there have been three more cases come to my attention, so that at the moment the amendment will apply to four veterans. Presumably there will be others.

A general discussion about the act itself, how many applications have been made under it, how much has been advanced, how much has been received and so on, seems to me to be somewhat out of order. Even if it were in order I would point out to my hon. friend that just recently I tabled in the house a report on the operations of this act for the year ending March 31, 1956. That report which is made annually contains full information about the loans made in each year. That report is before the house and would be available to the hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac.

I doubt if I could give any more information than would be contained in the report, but if there is a particular case or particular matter not covered by the annual report I shall be glad to look for that information.

Clause stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Tomorrow we shall continue with this and then take up the farm improvement loans amendment, then the resolution in the name of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, then the resolution in my name with respect to the Public Service Superannuation Act.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE—HOSPITAL DESIGN DIVISION

Question No. 519—Mr. Forgie:

Question

What is the nature of the services made available by the hospital design division of the Department of National Health and Welfare?

Answer by: Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare):

The hospital design division of the Department of National Health and Welfare provides a consulting service to all agencies interested in the design and operation of hospitals, and co-operates with the provinces in promoting sound planning of health institutions of all types.

A constant research program in the field of hospital construction is maintained by this division. The information is compiled and made available to those interested in that field when requested.

All plans submitted by hospitals on behalf of which the provinces request assistance under the national health program are reviewed by the hospital design division to ensure that such plans conform to the general standards of hospital construction as prepared by this division, and to determine the amount of federal assistance. These minimum standards have done much to ensure reasonably good accommodation for patients throughout Canada.

MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS

Twelfth report of standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. Henderson.

HOUSING

MORTGAGE MONEY—PRESS REPORT OF REMOVAL OF CREDIT RESTRICTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. What is the minister's comment on the press report from Edmonton that Senator Croll had declared that credit restrictions on mortgage money for the building of homes will probably be relaxed some time about August 1? Is this prediction correct?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I am called upon to comment on speeches made outside the house, but I shall just add that I presume the senator was expressing his own opinion. I am sure he had no knowledge from me as to when the credit restrictions might be changed.

ATOMIC ENERGY

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REPORTED RADIOACTIVE RAINFALL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether he is now in a position to answer my question of June 15 when I asked:

> Under whose authority were Canadian citizens in British Columbia recently subjected to radioactive rainfall, and what measures is the government proposing to take to ensure that Canadians will never again be subjected to that sort of thing?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, after the hon. gentleman asked me this question the other day I approached him privately because I wanted to have a clear understanding as to precisely what he had in mind. I understand that what he had in mind was that he wanted to know whether or not the government of Canada shared in decisions as to whether experimental atomic detonations would take place. The answer is no.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

NEWFOUNDLAND—OVERTIME AND WAGE RATES ON FEDERAL WORKS AT LA SCIE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Will the minister investigate a report that construction companies engaged on federal work at La Scie, Newfoundland, are working men 60 hours per week with no overtime rates except for hours in excess of 60 hours per week, and that local men are being paid less than men from the mainland for the same work; and will the minister take steps to ensure that proper employment practices are followed ir this area?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was kind enough to send me notice of his question. Two contractors are engaged at La Scie, Newfoundland. Gulf Maritime Construction Limited is working on a harbour development project under a contract with the Department of Public Works. This is part of a federal-provincial joint project for the improvement of the harbour and the construction of a fish plant. Terminal Construction Company Limited is working on a project for the United States army corps of engineers.

Wage rates and hours of labour for workers employed on both contracts are governed by the federal Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act. The statutory hours of labour under this act are 8 per day and 44 per week. These statutory hours can be extended by the Minister of Labour in emergency circumstances.

On the urgent representations of the parties concerned that emergency conditions existed justifying an extension of the hours worked, both contractors were given authority to extend hours to a maximum of 10 per day and 60 per week. The overtime authority issued to these contractors included the following conditions:

(a) That no employee be required to work in excess of such maximum hours;

(b) that penalty overtime rates may be invoked in connection with the provisions of section 2 of the labour conditions forming part of the contract;

(c) that payroll records be maintained showing all hours worked by each employee in excess of the statutory hours, and

(d) that all subcontractors be informed of these conditions and be required to give effect thereto.

Our Newfoundland officer located at St. John's has been instructed to investigate the complaint that the companies concerned are working their employees in excess of the authorized hours and paying local workers less than mainland workers for the same work. He has also been instructed to investigate and determine whether the companies should be required to pay penalty overtime rates for hours worked in excess of the statutory hours.

BUTTER

INQUIRY AS TO SALE TO DISTRIBUTORS IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Dufferin-Simcoe): In the absence of the Minister of Agriculture I should like to ask the Prime Minister if a large quantity of 1955 surplus butter has been sold to large distributors in Canada at much less than the cost price to the government.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I shall have to take the hon. gentleman's question as notice and inquire from the proper officials who are handling the butter situation. I shall make a reply as soon as I get the information.

VETERANS BUSINESS AND PROFESSIONAL LOANS ACT

AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO GUARANTEED LOANS

The house resumed, from Monday, June 18, consideration in committee of Bill No. 253, to amend the Veterans Business and Professional Loans Act—Mr. Harris—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1.

Mr. Gillis: I wonder if the parliamentary assistant might give us an explanation of the changes in this bill, and who is affected by them.

Mr. Harris: If I may do this, I might say that I went into it last evening and made it clear that the persons who would be affected by the amendment would be persons who were entitled to the benefit of the original act and who had applied for that benefit but had the 10-year period elapse before the application was completed. It is a relieving amendment which will help those who, for one reason or another, had left off applying until too late to get the processing done in time.

Mr. Hansell: The minister mentioned last night that only four cases had been brought to his attention. I should like to know, for personal reasons, whether the case I brought before him not so long ago is one of those cases, and if he thinks this case comes within the purview of the amended act?

Mr. Harris: I must apologize for not having the particular case in mind. I know the name of the gentleman concerned, but I am not familiar enough with the facts to say that it does. I think I can say this. If the veteran my hon. friend has in mind had applied within the 10-year period this will undoubtedly aid him. If he had not applied within the 10-year period, it would not.

FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

AMENDMENTS TO PROVIDE FOR NEW THREE-YEAR POOL, MAXIMUM GUARANTEE OF LOANS, ETC.

The house resumed, from Tuesday, May 1, consideration in committee of Bill No. 208, to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act—Mr. Harris—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

The Chairman: When the committee rose previously we were considering clause 5. Shall this clause carry?

On clause 5—False statement in application for loan or misuse of loan.

Mr. Nowlan: There was an amendment moved in the committee at the last sitting that was before us when the committee rose. I presumed the minister would have some comment to make.

The Chairman: Order. Perhaps I should read the amendment to refresh the memories of hon. members. It was moved by Mr. Fulton that clause 5 be amended by striking out subsection 2 thereof.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, on the occasion of our previous discussion we had a good deal of explanation of this particular clause, and I stated at the time that I was under the impression this was a necessary provision having in mind the fact that these loans are spread over a good many years and that normally an offence against the act is not known until default may have occurred in the repayment of the amount concerned, and that is why we have the provision in the penalty clause.

I should like to point out to hon. members that this follows the same wording, with only one minor necessary change, contained in section 111 of the Unemployment Insurance

Act. We felt that the circumstances here justified a certificate being granted by the minister under the conditions set out here, or by someone on his behalf, which would act as conclusive proof of the date on which the minister became aware of the offence.

Mr. Nowlan: May I ask a question here? Is the minister referring to a statement which has to be in writing, following the same language as in the Unemployment Insurance Act, or is he referring to the unlimited period in which a prosecution can be instituted?

Mr. Harris: Both. Section 111 has the two subsections, the first one being No. 3 in the bill we are now discussing and the second one being No. 4.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, the minister has told us that there is a similar provision in the Unemployment Insurance Act. I am rather surprised that provision is there but, of course, there is a great deal of difference between the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act and an act to provide for loans to farmers. There may or may not be justification for that section in the Unemployment Insurance Act. I do suggest, as was urged on May 1 when this was last before us, that there is no justification for this section in the present bill. The amendment which was moved by the hon. member for Kamloops should commend itself to the committee and also, I would say, especially to the house leader and to all hon. members.

I can tell the minister, for instance, that we have a similar act to this which was passed last year, namely the Canadian Fisherman's Loan Act, and it does not contain any such provision. Yet the situation is parallel, or certainly analogous. In one case loans are made to fishermen, and in the other to farmers. The department and this house did not see fit to include such a provision last year. We have the Canadian Farm Loan Act, which I have gone over rather carefully. There is no provision similar to this or in any way comparable to it in the Canadian Farm Loan Act, although there the loan may run for a period of 25 years, as the minister knows; yet such a provision is not contained therein.

I presume the minister's research staff has given considerable attention to this, and apparently the only matter the minister has been able to turn up which is comparable in wording at least—though I do not think it is comparable as far as the principle of the legislation is concerned—is the provision in the Unemployment Insurance Act, which I have not had an opportunity to read since he mentioned it. I presume in that case if a man has made false statements and misled the unemployment insurance commission and thus obtained unemployment insurance when he should not have obtained it, there might be some possible reason for such a provision.

Just to recapitulate for a moment, and without unduly taking the time of the committee, I want to emphasize, Mr. Chairman, that we are considering clause 5 of the bill which re-enacts section 8 of the original act. I shall read the clause which is being re-enacted:

> Any person who makes a statement in an application for a guaranteed farm improvement loan that is false in any material respect or who uses the proceeds of such loan for a purpose other than that stated in his application, is guilty of an offence—

These are the critical words to which I would draw the attention of the committee.

> —and liable on summary conviction to a fine of not more than $500.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, as you very well appreciate and as those of us who are lawyers appreciate, this invokes the provisions of the summary convictions act, the federal act which is a part of our Criminal Code and therefore we would have the time limits of that act invoked were it not for the succeeding section which goes on to say:

> Proceedings for an offence under this section may be commenced at any time—

I repeat:

> —at any time, within 12 months from the day on which evidence, sufficient in the opinion of the minister to justify prosecution for the offence, comes to his knowledge.

That is the particular point to which I wanted to draw the attention of the committee. As was said the other night, subsection 4 provides for a certificate signed by the minister or by someone authorized by the minister. I think that is going rather far afield, but at the moment I am not quarrelling with that wording. I do realize it is standard practice today, and it is obviously a wise practice. Instead of bringing witnesses before a court and proving certain things you can simply accept the signature. As far as I am concerned I would not quarrel with the signature of the minister or someone authorized on his behalf. What I am quarrelling with and suggesting is wrong and improper is the provision in this bill which permits the prosecution to be brought on at any indefinite time in the future provided it is within 12 months after it has been brought to the minister's attention.

As the hon. member for Kamloops pointed out the other night, and I think I did as well, the Criminal Code has a period of limitation. There are various offences under the summary convictions act, and most of those can be prosecuted only within a period of six months after the commission of the offence. As the hon. member for Kamloops pointed out even in treason, which is a capital offence—or was under the old code and I suspect it still is although I have not checked it; in any case it is one of the most serious offences with which a man can be charged—the information must be laid and the prosecution instituted within three years from the date of the commission of the offence. Here you have a section which says a man may be prosecuted within 12 months after it has come to the attention of the minister and it may not come to the minister's attention until 10 or 15 years after the alleged offence has been committed. The minister said it would not be advisable to have this extended, but I do not accept that for a moment.

I would point out that as I see it there is nothing in this section which ties in with the time limit even after the expiration of the loan. In other words a farmer may have repaid a loan, we will say within eighteen months, and then forgotten about it; yet under this bill it would be theoretically possible to bring a prosecution eight years afterwards. I am not saying, and the minister knows this very well, that a responsible minister of this government is likely to do such a thing. We realize that practical common sense will probably be applied to the application of this legislation, but I am asking if that is a satisfactory answer to this committee.

We are establishing a precedent here. I admit that there may have possibly been an unfortunate precedent established in connection with the Unemployment Insurance Act, but if so two wrongs do not make a right. The mere fact that we happened to have made a mistake, if we did make one, is no reason why we should make another.

The Minister of Finance, the house leader, has been a practising lawyer. He has been brought up in the school of our law and has carried on a country practice. He knows the general background of this whole problem. I suggest to him as a man with that background and with that training—I know he cannot answer personally, but I am putting it to him that he knows the answer—that a provision such as this is not in keeping with our concept of the law and would establish a most unfortunate precedent. If we have a period of limitation for the most serious offences which are prescribed by our law, then I suggest that certainly there should be one for this.

One could speak on this indefinitely, but I do not propose to do so. I am not trying to delay the committee, but I do submit that the amendment which is before this committee is one which should commend itself to all hon. members. It is not striking anything pertinent out of the bill, it is simply striking out this provision. I would even be willing to have the amendment amended by having some provision inserted whereby a report in writing could be made rather than actual evidence being submitted. It would be acceptable to me to have a document signed by the minister, or by someone authorized to sign on his behalf, taken as evidence. I would go that far, but I am completely opposed, and I trust this committee is opposed, to a provision being inserted in this particular legislation dealing with farmers, who I think are as honest as most classes in our community, whereby they shall be put in a special category.

It would be theoretically—I emphasize that —possible for an agent of the Department of Finance or the Department of Justice to institute proceedings against a man when he had forgotten completely the particulars of the transaction. I say that is wrong. Just a few days ago we had before this house a bill to amend the Income Tax Act to cut down still further the period allowed under that act. There the Department of Finance has fixed a period of six years except in cases where fraud can be established. Why should we depart from all accepted principles on this occasion, particularly when we are bringing this bill within the provisions of the summary convictions act, when the Criminal Code provides certain limitations? Having done that, why should we in this particular instance provide for prosecution being taken at any time, not only in the lifetime of the present minister. The minister is not an individual; he is the head of the department.

It is possible that a prosecution could be conducted 20 years after the loan had been made and after it had been repaid. I suggest that is not right. We should not be departing so far from principles which have always guided and governed this country in connection with prosecutions.

This is a quasi-criminal offence. Once we have begun breaking down the precedents that have been established, although, as I have said, probably no injustice would follow from it directly, then some other government of some other party may be in control of Canada and it can say, "Here is a precedent that has been established." The statute of limitations would have been wiped out, and the precedent would have been established by this government; therefore people would say it must be good because it was established by a party which had been in control here, and so on and so forth.

I suggest to the minister again that he give this further consideration and try to amend that clause so as to take out that particularly obnoxious part.

Mr. Harris: I have no objection to removing the words to which my hon. friend referred a while ago. They occur in the nineteenth and twentieth lines on page 2, beginning after the word "minister":

—or by any person purporting to be acting on his behalf.

In my opinion there is no reason why the minister should not make this certificate, since he would be the one that would have peculiar knowledge of the facts contained in it. If it is the wish of the hon. member who is speaking on behalf of the gentleman who moved the amendment to put that in that form, I should be agreeable to it.

Mr. Nesbitt: For my colleague, in reply to the minister, there is something in this same paragraph to which I should like to direct the minister's attention. The wording under subclause 1 is:

Any person who makes a statement in an application for a guaranteed farm improvement loan that is false in any material respect . . .

I would gather from that, Mr. Chairman, that there is no question at all of intent here. It is merely a simple statement of fact that is false in any respect. In other words it could be a simple innocent statement in which a person might give some false information on the application. In view of what has been said by my colleague from Digby-Annapolis-Kings it would seem bad enough to have no time limit for the starting of a prosecution even if there were guilty intent, but here there is no time limit under which prosecution can be begun even in the case of an innocent mistake.

I should like to suggest to the minister with respect that in the second line, after it says, "Any person who makes a statement in an application for a guaranteed farm improvement loan",—the words "with intent to defraud" be added. Then it would carry on, "that is false in any material respect."

The addition of those words, "with intent to defraud", would improve the clause very much. As it is at present, a farmer making an innocent mistake in an application could be prosecuted 20 years afterwards and be fined or, if he did not meet the fine, could be sent to jail. I know it is not very likely, but with the wording of the clause at the moment that is what could happen. It does not seem proper that a person should be punished for the quasi-criminal offence of a simple statement of fact and a statement of incrimination. I feel that could easily be cleared up by adding the words "with intent to defraud." As the minister well knows, being in the profession, evidence could be given to prove intent, and I think the clause would be materially improved by making that suggested addition.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): It would be difficult to add very much to what the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings has said in connection with the shortcomings of this clause. As a matter of fact I welcomed the indication by the Minister of Finance that he feels there is some defect in this clause and is prepared to do something about it. Coming on the heels of what the Prime Minister did last night in dealing with clause 6 of the Navigable Waters Protection Act, that gives us some assurance of an indication of a desire to take care of some of these very important small points in connection with legislation of this type.

I for one welcome the indication that these sections are being studied in that manner. I do not think, however, that merely by deleting this one sentence we are going to have the solution of the problem this particular section raises. Although it has been mentioned that a similar section is contained in the Unemployment Insurance Act I cannot help but feel that apparently in the various acts of a similar nature such as the Canadian Farm Loan Act there has been no thought of including such a penalty section.

I have looked at the Canadian Farm Loan Act and I find that, under section 7, (i) and again under section 20, subsection 7, when people use the money improperly the act says that under certain circumstances they must give it back. In coming forward as the minister has to deal with the question of the certificate, he is only doing in that case what I notice is provided for in the Financial Administration Act, chapter 116, section 89, subsection 2, where it says that where money has been improperly used the minister himself gives a certificate to that effect in connection with the improper use of the same. This seems to be going one step further than has been done in similar legislation.

The suggestion made by the hon. member for Oxford was the subject matter for an amendment, as I recall it, previously voted down by the committee. But certainly if this section giving the right to prosecute after several years is going to be retained, I think we might give a second thought to the provision dealing with intent to defraud. Our other penal statutes ordinarily permit us to go back a great length of time if there is proof of intent to defraud. I think the Minister of National Revenue knows that provision is contained in his legislation. There is a place where you stop under one set of circumstances, but if there is intent to defraud there is permission to continue to go back in order to obtain the evidence and prosecute. So I would say it is a step in the right direction here, the one that has been suggested, but it still does not solve the crucial problem in connection with this legislation.

I might point out one other thing to the Prime Minister. I find that section 6 of this legislation indicates that if this act is passed after March 31 it is to be considered as having come into effect on April 1 of this year. I say we are then making this retroactive legislation.

Mr. Harris: On the contrary. The act ran out on March 31 and we are trying to continue the benefits for the farmers from that date.

Mr. Nowlan: The section did not run out.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Let me say this to the minister. What you are doing is taking us back to April 1 and including the additional penal section you have put into this legislation.

Mr. Harris: Yes; but I am quite prepared to drop the penalty section if you will drop all the guarantees we have made to the banks in the meantime.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): That is a rather facetious remark—

Mr. Harris: Not at all.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): —in view of the argument I am making. I say this to the Prime Minister as well as to the Minister of Finance, because I recognize what the Prime Minister did last night. Here is an indication that we are making a particular additional section effective as from April 1; and to anyone having any knowledge of this type of act it is obvious that this is a quasi-criminal section. As such it should not be part of a retroactive piece of legislation.

Perhaps in finally arriving at a satisfactory solution to this difficulty, if the legislation is going to include the words dealing with the intent to defraud, and if it is finally going to end up with the deletion of the provision that anyone can certify for the minister, then it may be possible that section 6 as well should be amended in some way to ensure that this particular section is not effective from April 1.

Here is what is happening. It may be that the circumstances upon which a prosecution may later be based may have taken place between April 1 and June 19, when a person has made his application, whatever it is. There may be circumstances which, under this legislation, 20 years from now will result in a prosecution. I say that under those circumstances this very definitely is bringing into effect in a retroactive manner a quasi-criminal type of legislation.

I therefore say, Mr. Chairman, that there is a great deal of merit in the amendment that is before the committee at the present time. If that amendment should not be carried, then I commend again to the Minister of Finance the words of the hon. member for Oxford and, prior to that, the amendment which was proposed by the hon. member for Peel. You can still rectify this situation by including the wording "with intent to defraud"; by deleting the words you have suggested should be deleted, and by subsequently amending paragraph 6. Those are things I think any prudent man would take into serious consideration.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, there is just a brief word I should like to say. It seems to me that if the minister insists—as I hope he will not—on the retention of subclause 2 in clause 8, the very least he can do—in fact he should not even have to be asked to do it—is to remove the words he has offered to remove from lines nineteen and twenty on page 2. But I do not see how the minister can think that by making that offer he meets the basic objection which has been made from this side of the chamber to subclause 2 of clause 8. After all, the real evil in this clause is in lines thirteen and fourteen where authority is given to commence an action at any time within 12 months from the day on which evidence comes to the knowledge of the minister. All I am suggesting at this moment, Mr. Chairman, is that these things must be looked at separately.

I can hardly conceive that the minister is trying to make a trade, that he is suggesting to the opposition that the amendment moved by the hon. member from Kamloops be dropped in return for the minister's offer to drop these words from lines nineteen and twenty. They are two totally different things. What the minister has offered to drop out is the least objectionable part of this subclause. He has not yet met the argument regarding the most objectionable part of it, namely the authority to enter proceedings for an offence literally at any time provided it is within 12 months after the day on which the evidence comes to the minister's knowledge, no matter when he obtains that evidence. Perhaps we can debate that point under some other heading or in some other relationship, but I believe the two points should be kept separate.

Mr. Harris: In what I said, Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to have any reference to subparagraph 3. I was referring to subparagraph 4, because it was at that point that the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings completed the statement he was making. I was not intending to suggest that my amendment would meet the objections he had to the preceding subparagraph.

Mr. Quelch: Mr. Chairman, I think the various members who have spoken have made a good case for the passage of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Kamloops. When we had this bill before the committee we were told by the deputy minister that the record under this act was exceptionally good in so far as the question of repayment was concerned. Repayments had been good.

In the light of that fact it is hard to understand why the government at this time should see fit to introduce an amendment of this kind. Are they anticipating that conditions are going to be so tough that the farmers in order to get loans are going to be driven to methods that are wrong, and then will that action be hanging over the farmers' heads indefinitely? The farmer will never know whether, 20 years from now, the government may come along and say that he signed the document wrongly, and the minister will then be in a position to take action of any kind within 12 months from that date. It does not seem a very satisfactory condition so far as the farmer is concerned. I cannot understand why the minister should now consider it necessary to introduce this amendment when the act has operated so satisfactorily in the past.

Mr. Harris: I do not want anyone to misunderstand the reason for this, and there seems to be some misunderstanding. When an application has been granted and a loan made, you must remember that this is a guarantee of the government of Canada. It is not a loan by the government of Canada. There is nothing here comparable to the Canadian farm loan board, in which case the government of Canada makes the loan. In this case the bank makes the loan and all we do is guarantee it under the conditions set down in the Farm Improvement Loans Act. Now, if everything goes well, the money is paid and that is the end of it. We never hear anything more about it.

But when something goes wrong, when default occurs and the bank then asks us to repay the loan or pay the amount of money we guaranteed, that is the first time the government of Canada can have any information about it and can ascertain whether there has been some kind of misrepresentation such as we describe here. That is the reason it has been thought necessary to ask that the power to prosecute should start from that date and not from the date of the making of the loan by the bank, because we have nothing to do with the original making of the loan.

Under those circumstances I suggest to hon. members that if we are to be responsible for these bank guarantees, surely we ought to be in the position of having the right to prosecute within a very short time, namely 12 months, after the first time the offence comes to our attention.

It would be the reverse if we were dealing directly with the borrower. I quite agree with my hon. friend from York West when he speaks of the Canadian farm loan board. In that case we have the original opportunity to decide whether any fraud has in fact occurred, or any misrepresentation of a material nature. That is the reason for this. There is no suggestion, and I am sorry to say this, that there has not been difficulty in the past. There have been many cases in which we have found that there has been an effort made to conceal the true facts from the bank in the first instance. I do not know why anyone considers that the government of Canada should not be in the position of having some power to act, both in the punitive sense as well as in the sense of, shall I say, avoiding trouble, in the provisions of a statute of this kind.

If I may answer some of the questions already put, no one supposes that if an applicant described a farm lot number incorrectly, any magistrate would, in any sense of the word, convict. But the point is that if there is a deliberate misrepresentation of assets or if there is a deliberate statement that the money will be spent for the payment of certain liabilities and later it is found the money has been diverted for other purposes, it seems to us there ought to be a penalty for that because this is a beneficial statute in favour of farmers, just as there are beneficial statutes in favour of other people. There ought to be a proper method of showing that the taxpayers' money is not to be used lightly in this way.

Mr. Nesbitt: In view of what the minister has just said, unless I have misunderstood him he has clearly indicated that the whole intent of this section is to deal with intent to defraud and not with an innocent mistake. The way the section is worded, however, it appears clear that any farmer who makes some mistake, albeit an innocent one, in his application could be prosecuted some time afterward. In view of what the minister has said I think it should be made clear that the section is aimed at the intent to defraud, and I cannot see anything objectionable in making that request.

Mr. Pallett: I think the Minister of Finance has made a very good case for taking the section right out altogether. He has said that the government guarantees the loan to the bank. Then what do the banks do for the government? Do they not accept any responsibility themselves when making these loans? They are the people who interview the applicants and they should be the people who have the responsibility for certifying to the government that these loans are proper loans. The government is trying to go right through the person who is receiving the profit from the loan to the farmer who is obliged to borrow the money in the first instance. When you suggest that you cannot find out what is wrong with the application until default has occurred, that indicates to me that the people whom you have authorized to make these loans are not properly carrying out their duties.

If that has been the history, then I suggest there should be some penal provision against the people making the profit and not the people who seek to get the loans. Obviously the breakdown is in the people who are receiving the applications not taking the care before the loans are made that they would take with a loan that was not guaranteed. Of course it is possible that the recent position in which the minister has been placed has caused him to think like a banker rather than like a member of the government.

Mr. Harris: Never.

Mr. Pallett: As has already been so well said, you would not permit a penalty provision of this type in the Criminal Code which was reviewed in this house and by a committee of people who are handling the affairs of justice in this country. At the same time you say here is one small section of the community that you are going to discriminate against. You say you have already discriminated against another section, but that does not excuse this action. Are we not going to look to the people in whom we have placed confidence to carry out their duties?

I say seriously to the minister that you are allowing something to continue, as has already been said, that is strange and foreign to our method of administering the law. You are making retroactive legislation with a penalty provision. You are putting a provision in this act that you would not permit in the Criminal Code and you are not taking any concrete steps to say to the banks, "If you make bad loans we will not guarantee them; before we will guarantee your loans you have to certify that these loans are made on a proper basis". The applicant's responsibility is to the banks.

Mr. Harris: May I just clear the question of retroactivity. I think every hon. member who has read clause 6 will realize the purpose of the retroactive provision. The Farm Improvement Loans Act ran out on March 31. This bill was introduced before that date for the purpose of continuing the benefit of these loans to the farm community. I have no doubt there have been loans made since that date, and the purpose of the legislation is to validate the guarantees that would be made for those particular loans.

Mr. Charlton: Mr. Chairman, the minister now suggests it is because of the guarantee angle of this loan that he wants the penalty clause. I suggest to him that the fisherman's loan is a guaranteed loan but there is no penalty clause in that act at all. Although I realize the Canadian Farm Loan Act is not a guaranteed loan act there is no penalty clause in that act either. The minister is saying that this legislation is similar to the Unemployment Insurance Act. Is he suggesting that it is comparable with the Unemployment Insurance Act?

The minister appears to think he is giving the farmers something under this act. He is not giving them anything; he is only guaranteeing the loan at the bank. Out of loans amounting to $582 million the loss to date has been $285,000. Is the minister suggesting that all the farmers who take those loans are to be subjected to this clause just because $285,000 has been lost out of $582 million? Must all the farmers who take loans under this act have this on their shoulders for the rest of their lives? I ask that question advisedly, because it could be for the rest of their lives. They could have this hanging over their heads, with the fear that they could be brought into court.

As the hon. member for Oxford said, it might be purely a mistake, yet under this clause it could be proven that it was a false statement, and whether it was a mistake or intentional they could be subject to a fine of $500 or imprisonment if they could not pay. It is ridiculous. Not only is it ridiculous, it is the most terrible thing I have seen in this house for some time. Especially is that true when there is no penalty at all in the Canadian Fisherman's Loan Act or the Canadian Farm Loan Act.

The minister is suggesting that this is similar to the Unemployment Insurance Act, which I suggest is an insurance act and not a loan act. It is something given to people. They pay their premiums, naturally, but it is something given to them in lieu of employment. It is not comparable at all.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is not a gift; it is insurance.

Mr. Charlton: The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate would do well to sit quietly in his seat for just a few moments.

Mr. Pickersgill: I take up less time in the house than the hon. gentleman does.

Mr. Charlton: Sitting in the house is not everything. Sometimes we like to see people sit quietly, too.

Mr. Pickersgill: So do we.

Mr. Charlton: I suggest this legislation is different from the Unemployment Insurance Act. It is something that is unknown in this house; it is foreign legislation to this house. I am not a lawyer but I have heard it discussed enough to know—and I think all members will agree with me—that it is a foreign type of legislation. The minister has not given us enough justification to allow it to go through.

Mr. Harris: May I just answer my hon. friend briefly. There is a penalty clause in the Canadian Fisherman's Loan Act, though it is not the same as this. My hon. friend should be aware of the fact that there are penalty clauses in all the borrowing and guaranteeing statutes that we have, so far as I know.

I do not think I agree with him that we are not giving the farmer anything. I think the farming community are appreciative of the benefits of the guarantee at the bank under these circumstances; at least a great many of them have used it. It is quite true that we have not had to pay very much in the way of losses; and that only establishes the fact that it is unlikely that the farming community have had too much trouble in making their payments, and they will go on using the advantages of borrowing under the Farm Improvement Loans Act. I certainly think this is of advantage to the farmer. We are increasing the amount of the loan he can have from the bank. I am a little surprised that the hon. member would say that we are not doing anything for the farmer.

Mr. Charlton: I did not say we are doing nothing for the farmer; I said you are not giving anything to the farmer, and you are not giving him a thing. He is borrowing money under a guaranteed loan. He has paid it all back with the exception of $285,000, and you suggest you are giving him something. You are giving him a service, that is all.

Mr. Nesbitt: I wish I could get some sort of answer out of the minister which would clear up some misunderstanding that seems to be in the minds of hon. members. Is it the intention of the minister under this section to punish applicants for an innocent mistake, or is it not?

Mr. Harris: Of course not.

Mr. Nesbitt: Why does it say so?

Mr. Harris: It does not say so.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Nesbitt: The minister has just told us that it is not the intention of the government to punish people for innocent misrepresentation. I am glad to hear that statement. The minister is a lawyer and well knows that the courts must take the specific wording of the act. The section says:

> Any person who makes a statement in an application for a guaranteed farm improvement loan that is false in any material respect . . .

And so on. It does not say "false statement of intent"; it says "is false in any material respect". It refers to something that is false regardless of the intent behind it. The remarks the minister has just made certainly have little relationship or little relevancy to what it says in the section. I am afraid I cannot understand it. The minister also said a few moments ago that the farmers would probably take advantage of the act. No doubt they will. If they were familiar with the language of this legislation I doubt whether they would be so anxious to take advantage of the provisions of this act, because some of these amendments put the guarantor of those loans in almost a worse position than the well-known character in "The Merchant of Venice".

Mr. Pallett: Will the minister indicate whether he would be willing to insert the words "with intent to defraud"? As you know, no court can go behind the act and read Hansard to find out what the members of the committee meant when the words were inserted in the legislation.

In reply to questions this afternoon the minister has said that it is not the intention, where there is innocent misrepresentation, to charge anybody under this section. I suggest that for clarification the words "with intent to defraud" should be inserted. Nothing would be lost by inserting those words. It is a very simple thing.

Mr. Harris: We have already disposed of that in the committee on a former occasion, Mr. Chairman. But, in any event, may I point out to my hon. friend that the wording is pretty clear. It says, "false in any material respect". No magistrate nor any county court judge dealing with this section is going to fine a person who made an innocent mistake about a particular matter that is not material, guilty under the act.

Mr. Pallett: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Finance by this very act takes the magistrate's discretion completely away from him.

Mr. Harris: No.

Mr. Pallett: Yes, he does. That is the effect of the wording of this legislation. The hon. member for York Centre has just inserted a comment. I am quite prepared to sit down and listen to what he has to say.

Mr. Hollingworth: As a matter of fact, any county court judge will determine what is material. Absolute authority is vested in him to say whether it is true or false. The county court judge may determine whether or not it is a material fact. Consequently I think the hon. member's argument is quite redundant.

Mr. Pallett: If the hon. member reads the legislation he will find that the case first comes before a magistrate, who is not a county court judge. I think it is generally accepted that the people who are appointed to these positions are not all legally trained. If you mean to say that the innocent misrepresentation is not to be charged it is of no consequence to add the four words, "with intent to defraud". It seems to me if that is what you mean but you are not prepared to put it in writing, it is not what you mean by the words you have just used.

Mr. Stanton: On more than one occasion I have heard magistrates say, "I have all sympathy but the act says so and so". They go entirely by the act. I do not see why the minister should be antagonistic and refuse to add these words, "with intent to defraud". They will take nothing from the bill; they will add to it. They will protect the individual. Some person may get a loan processed and, through no fault of his, make a mistake. The magistrate can say, "I must go by the act". I believe there is much merit in the amendment suggested by the hon. member for Kamloops, and its acceptance would go a long way toward alleviating the present difficulties.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question on the amendment?

Mr. Pallett: No. I think we should deal with this at greater length. There have been charges that the opposition obstructs, and it is events like this which cause us to obstruct. It is our intention to do so in situations such as this. I for one intend to speak as many times as I possibly can until ten o'clock tonight in an effort to make this act one that will protect the people of this country and not oppress them. This is a clause that is oppressing a certain segment of the population of this country. The minister does not know what is in a magistrate's mind, nor does he know what is in the mind of the minister sitting next to him or of anyone working for him. As one hon. member suggests, perhaps the minister does not even know what is in his own mind; I do not know.

I think what we propose is a very simple matter. The bill certainly would pass this house very readily if it were inserted. I think the complete deletion of this part of the section would be preferable to anything that has been proposed, but failing that I would simply point out it seems to me the minister has established a little mental block over there. Perhaps he feels he is going to lose face or something. The government has lost a great deal of face in the past few weeks and a little more is not going to hurt it that much. Personally, however, I do not think it would lose face, in fact it would gain a bit, if it were to accede to a proper request.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, I always try to be reasonable, and if I make a mistake or get the wrong interpretation I am always willing to change my mind. I have listened carefully to the minister this afternoon and the remarks he has made on the clause. He made a statement a few minutes ago which I believe was supported by the hon. member for York Centre, that it was up to the magistrate, the judge or the officer trying the matter, to determine whether or not a thing was material.

I have had a reasonable amount of experience in practising law before magistrates and in county courts, and I would like to point out to the minister there are two blades to the scissors, so to speak, which the magistrate would have to consider with respect to the statement made in the application. The first one is whether in fact the statement that was made was material. In other words, did it or did it not affect the granting of the loan in the first place; and second, was it false? The magistrate or the officer trying the case might very well decide it was material and the next question that would arise would be whether or not the statement was false. There is no information in this section, and the minister certainly offers us no explanation regarding that. There is no intimation that the falseness of the statement must contain an element of intent in order to be punishable. The way it is set out here the falseness of a statement, even if it is made in innocence, is subject to punishment.

As the minister well knows, this comes under the summary convictions act, and if the fine cannot be paid the person is sent to jail. As far as I can see the minister has certainly offered us no explanation.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I do not think the minister need worry about losing face, because last night we had a shining example of what can be accomplished by an argument being put forth and received in a reasonable manner.

I have had a little argument on the side here with one hon. member who suggests this amendment is protecting the one dishonest man in a hundred, but there is nothing remarkable about that in connection with what is known as British justice. It has been said over and over again that it is better that a hundred guilty people should go free than to convict one innocent person.

It may seem a little remarkable that this large house is spending half an hour on this particular point, but this is certainly the place where we can get down to fundamentals so far as our laws are concerned. I do not think anyone is going to object to this type of legislation or to the fact that there may be 20 years in which to prosecute if the words "with intent to defraud" are included.

I hope the minister will seriously consider what is put forward here in the form of an amendment as an alternative to the present wording, along with the deletion of the words he has suggested further down in the section. Let us not worry about losing face. As a matter of fact, I think it will make the government look a great deal more substantial if it agrees to suggestions which are worth while.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment (Mr. Fulton) negatived: Yeas, 27; nays, 67.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment lost. Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Nowlan: Before the question is put I would like to place one point before the minister. We have disposed of the amendment striking out all of clause 2, which is an amendment I think the government should have accepted. I return again to the thesis I proposed a few moments ago, to the effect that it is absolutely wrong to have a criminal act with no limitation in it whatever. The committee has decided we cannot accept the striking out of clause 2. The minister has also pointed out, and I can follow this, that it may be some considerable time after the loan is made before it comes to the attention of the minister that there has been misrepresentation or fraud.

There is nothing in the section which says that. The section is an open end transaction in so far as prosecution is concerned. As I say again, I am not suggesting that this would be done but I do think it is so contrary to the principles of law that we should not permit something which may or may not be twisted by individuals.

The minister knows by looking at the clause that it would be possible for a prosecution to be started long after the maturity of the loan, long after the loan had been paid. There is nothing to tie it in with the loan. The minister said a moment ago that perhaps this would not come to his attention until the loan had been paid off. I cannot conceive that it would, because ordinarily these loans are payable by instalments.

I do not intend to move a formal amendment now because I realize that if it does not commend itself to the minister it will not be accepted by the committee, but we do feel strongly about this thing. I do not propose this simply for the purpose of delaying matters, but may I read the section:

> (3) Proceedings for an offence under this section may be commenced at any time within twelve months from the day on which evidence—

That again leaves it wide open as to what may or may not be evidence or what may or may not be information. They are two different things, as the minister well knows. When the minister has decided that he has evidence that might be, shall we say, six months, a year or two years from the time he first got a letter from the bank manager saying there was a little trouble over this thing. Let me read the clause again:

> Proceedings for an offence under this section may be commenced at any time within twelve months from the day on which evidence, sufficient in the opinion of the minister to justify prosecution for the offence, comes to his knowledge.

I suggest to the minister that at least we close that in, that we do not have it wide open. I would suggest that he put a proviso at the end providing that such prosecution shall be instituted within twelve months from the due date or maturity date of the said loan. In other words the prosecution would have to be commenced within a definite period.

I understand that there are two classes of loans. Where a loan is made for the purchase of land it might run for as long as 10 years. If you accept the principle of a limitation period, then I would agree that that would be an improvement and we would not be perpetuating a completely wrong principle.

In view of everything the minister has said, surely if there were a limitation period of twelve months from the maturity date of the loan or from when the loan was due, and if he had no evidence of wrongdoing before that time, then certainly he should not be able to prosecute afterwards because the evidence would be so flimsy that it would not warrant prosecution.

Mr. Harris: I think perhaps my hon. friend is labouring under a minor misapprehension. We never hear about these loans when they are paid. It is when they are not paid that we hear about them. We are not concerned with the farmer who pays off his loan, and I do not suppose the bank is either. At any rate they never come within our ken. It is only when we are called upon to pay the guarantee that we become interested.

Mr. Nowlan: Would not twelve months from the maturity date take care of that?

Mr. Harris: I have been waiting for a long time to move an amendment which fits in with the act here. This would add a further subclause 5 which would read:

(5) Proceedings in respect of an offence under this section may not be instituted later than three years from the time when the subject matter of the proceedings arose.

There would then be two limitations; there is the limitation in subclause 3 that proceedings must be taken within twelve months, and then in any event there would be a limitation of three years beyond which prosecution could not be taken.

Mr. Nowlan: If the minister had said that earlier instead of sitting on it like a hen on an egg it might have been better.

Mr. Harris: I am afraid that my obedience to the rules of the house make it impossible for me to move an amendment until we reach the point at which it can be moved.

Mr. Charlton: The minister has stated that the government knows nothing about these loans unless they are not paid. I do not think that is quite true. Surely the department would have some idea of the number of applications. Are not copies sent to the board?

Mr. Harris: Of course we get notice of the amount of money involved in our guarantees from month to month, but we have no knowledge of a particular loan.

Mr. Charlton: Have you not a copy of the application form that goes in?

Mr. Harris: They are kept in the bank, and we are only notified of the person who has the guaranteed loan.

Mr. Charlton: Just the name of the person?

[Mr. Nowlan.]

Mr. Harris: The name, the address and the amount.

Mr. Charlton: You do not have a copy of the application for loan?

Mr. Harris: The application is not made to the government, it is made to the bank. Apparently my hon. friend forgets the origin of the legislation.

Mr. Nesbitt: The minister is not sitting on another egg in connection with offences of fraud?

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Do I understand that the minister proposes to introduce an amendment deleting the words "or by any person purporting to be acting in his behalf"?

Mr. Harris: I said that I would do that.

The Chairman: Have I that amendment in writing?

Mr. Harris: I am sorry; I will write it out.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): In view of the two amendments that are to be made, any remarks that I made about the effect of clause 6, which is to follow, being retroactive and being detrimental could be withdrawn. There would be no necessity for dealing with it.

Mr. McCann: I move:

That clause 5 be amended by striking out of lines 19 and 20 the words "or by any person purporting to be acting on his behalf".

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I wonder if there would be any confusion in connection with line 24, which reads:

—without proof of the signature or of the official character of the person appearing to have signed the document—

Would that still be in order now that it deals only with the minister himself?

Mr. Harris: Yes.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. McCann: I move:

That clause 5 be further amended by adding thereto the following subsection:

"(5) Proceedings in respect of an offence under this section may not be instituted later than three years from the time when the subject matter of the proceedings arose."

Mr. Knowles: I am certainly not going to quarrel over one year in view of the fact that the minister has agreed to a principle that has been argued from this side of the house. But I should like to point out that before he got to his feet with this amendment I was going to ask him to take a look at Bill No. 82, which we passed earlier this session, having to do with guaranteed bank loans to farmers with respect to grain stored on farms. The reason I was going to ask him to look at that was to draw his attention to the section having to do with offences and penalties, which is section 9. If he is looking at the bill he will find that it had three subsections when it was presented, but he will recall that the Minister of Trade and Commerce had a colleague move the deletion of subsection 3. However, the relevant subsection, subsection 2, reads:

> A prosecution under subsection (1) may be instituted at any time within two years from the time when the subject matter of the complaint arose.

It was my purpose to suggest that that language was a little better than the language about information coming to the knowledge of the minister. The minister seems to have picked it up here, but why has he put in three years instead of two? If two years were sufficient in the case of the guaranteed bank loan on grain stored on farms, why would not two years be sufficient in this case?

Mr. Harris: Even my hon. friend can find the answer, if he just goes on for two more sentences in what he is reading, and that is that he is dealing with a nine months' loan in the one case and in the other with perhaps a ten-year loan.

Mr. Nowlan: Since the minister has been reasonable in dealing with this matter and has offered an amendment which at least recognizes the principle we were urging, I wonder whether he would not on his own accord consider the matter urged by the hon. member for Peel a few moments ago about the intent to defraud. I realize that technically it was voted on the other night and therefore the discussion of it might be out of order, but there is even more than the hon. member for Peel pointed out. If the person makes a statement that is false in any material respect, that is bad enough. It may or may not be a mistake. But it says:

> . . . or who uses the proceeds of such loan for a purpose other than that stated in his application . . .

It is all very well to say that a magistrate would use common sense; he probably would. But I can imagine a man getting a loan for a tractor, shall we say, coming into town, paying for the tractor, perhaps having $5.05 left over and making a purchase with that $5.05 to take home. I am sure he would not set that forth in his application. Of course if he were a prohibitionist he might use the $5.05 to buy his wife a birthday present that certainly would not be set forth in the application, yet he would be technically guilty of an offence.

The minister says there is no intention of prosecuting a man unless he has deliberately defrauded. We know very well that this minister would not authorize that, but why have it wide open that way if that is the intention? Why should we not insert "with intent to defraud"? Then we would have maintained a principle of law which, although it has been remedied to a substantial extent this afternoon, yet I think is wide open in that one particular sense. I should hope the minister would give consideration to inserting those words, and then I think the bill would be satisfactory in every respect.

Mr. Knowles: On the same point, may I again ask the minister to look at the wording of clause 9 of Bill No. 82, the very first part of which reads:

> Every person who, after the coming into force of this act, in respect of a guaranteed loan
> (a) knowingly makes any misrepresentation in any application . . .

It seems to me that if the government earlier this session brought in a bill having to do with guaranteed bank loans and put in the word "knowingly", it might consider putting the same word or words having the same meaning in this comparable piece of legislation.

Mr. Pallett: I wonder whether the minister really read this bill before it was put before us. I refer to a statement made on May 1, as recorded on page 3467 of Hansard, in which he said:

> I was not a member of the banking and commerce committee, as I believe my friend was, but my recollection is that there have been no convictions although I would not be sure as to that.

If the minister recalls, this bill did not go before the banking and commerce committee; it was referred to the committee on agriculture. The statement by the minister at that time perhaps indicated that he was not following the course of this bill or the preparation of it as closely as he might have been. With that in mind, giving him the benefit of the doubt that perhaps this particular aspect of this clause did not occur to him, there is nothing wrong with that, if that is the situation. We appreciate that with his vast duties he perhaps cannot examine every detail, and sometimes things might escape his attention; but, as the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre have pointed out, other acts have "knowingly" in them, and it seems such a small point.

Mr. Harris: I thank my hon. friend for his generosity. All money bills that are referred to committees go to the banking and commerce committee. I said in the house that this would go to the banking and commerce committee but, on the urging of hon. members opposite, I changed that to agriculture and forgot temporarily that I had done so.

Amendment agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall the clause as amended carry?

Mr. Pallett: I think we have to explore the other aspects of this a little further. Is there any particular reason the government advances at this time why one section of the community, the agricultural section, should be set apart and why we should say that we are applying the principles of the Criminal Code and various acts against all sections of the community but we are applying them differently against farmers, that we are required to prove certain things against other persons but a farmer is automatically guilty until he proves himself innocent?

Under this bill you say we are going to let the banks lend more money, that loans up to $5,000 will be guaranteed, but we shall be taking away a right from the farmers. It does not matter how much money is given them; rights are more important than money in the building of any society. You cannot buy a right. You have no proper authority to take a right away from them. This is a small but important group of the community, and it is entitled to the protection to which any other groups of the community are entitled.

It may be said that there are two other acts which contain the provision, and it is hoped to put it in a third one. That argument falls because you are repeating a wrong, which is never a correct thing to do. It seems that we would lose nothing and gain much by recognizing that here is a principle which should apply to the agricultural group in this country as well as to any other.

Mr. Nesbitt: There has been a good deal of discussion on this matter this afternoon. My hon. friend from Peel has just mentioned that in this case the burden of proof has been shifted. Actually there is no burden of proof here at all. It is a simple statement of fact. The burden of proof has been shifted to the accused. Even if a provision were put in that, if he could present evidence that he was not making the statement with any intent to defraud, he could be exonerated, that would be something; but it does not even go that far. It just says "if the statement is in fact false." It is like the provisions of some provincial statutes I can think of that give no discretion to the court.

There are only two things that have to be shown; that the statement is (a) material and (b) false. There is nothing about intent. If it is merely a false statement, regardless of intention, the person must be punished and can be sent to jail. The minister has already told us on several occasions that it is not the intention of the government to do that, but that is what the bill says.

I suppose there is no use labouring the point. The minister has evidently made up his mind that he is not going to do anything about the wording. I cannot understand why he would take that attitude.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Hamilton (York West): No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Harris: I wanted to say this. My friend the hon. member for Oxford seems to be under the impression, or at any rate his words so indicated, that we are amending the act by putting in these words. May I point out to my hon. friend that the words he has spoken about, "in any material respect", are in the act now. We are not putting them in now. We are not asking the farming community at this time to have another restriction put upon them. Those words have been in the law since the Farm Improvement Loans Act was passed.

Mr. Pallett: That is like saying, "I held up a bank once. Now I am holding it up a second time, so I am all right". Would the minister consider putting the word "knowingly" before the word "makes", as in the act already passed this year?

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, if one had to do this originally I do not know what one would do. But this is the act and this has been the act, as I said, since it was passed in 1946 or 1947; I have forgotten the exact date. I doubt very much whether it would be desirable to change the basis of the penalty now with respect to those who borrow from now on from that applicable to those who borrowed in the past.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): It is much more severe in the subsequent sections you have put in. That is one reason for considering changing the old wording of the section.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Nesbitt: The minister pointed out—and I quite realize it to be the fact—that this wording has been in before. As the hon. member for Peel pointed out, to continue a wrong does not make it any better. To reply to the minister's remark, in view of the fact that this extension of time for prosecution has been made—though now there is to be a restriction, which is a very welcome change at this time—which is an amendment to this act, it might be appropriate at this time to do as was suggested by the hon. member for Peel and insert the word "knowingly". I feel that the minister might give consideration to that suggestion.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Clause as amended agreed to.

On clause 6—Coming into force.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, this is just a suggestion as to form. Clause 6 reads as follows:

If this act is assented to after the 31st day of March, 1956, it shall be deemed to have come into force on the 1st day of April, 1956.

It seems to me that this wording of this clause would have been appropriate had the bill been passed before the 31st day of March and not received royal assent until after the 31st day of March. There is no "if" about it now. Would it not be better to change the wording of the clause and have it read simply:

This act shall be deemed to have come into force on the 1st day of April, 1956.

Mr. Harris: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Knowles: Then I move that clause 6 be amended by deleting all the words thereof previous to the word "shall" and by substituting therefor the words "This act".

An hon. Member: A triumph.

Mr. Harris: Either way it does not make any difference at all.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall this bill be read a third time now?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Knowles: By leave.

Mr. Harris moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

INDIAN ACT

AMENDMENTS TO PROVIDE FOR CHANGES IN ADMINISTRATION, AMOUNT OF LOANS, ETC.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Indian Act to provide for a number of changes in connection with the administration of the act; and to provide further that the Minister of Finance may from time to time advance to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration out of the consolidated revenue fund such sums of money as the minister may require for the loans to Indians under section 69 of the act;

The total amount of outstanding advances under the said section not to exceed at any one time one million dollars in lieu of three hundred and fifty thousand dollars as at present.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that for most of this afternoon there has been a vast expenditure of words to help out a few potential deadbeats and to save a few words in an act. I am going to try to stay strictly within the rules and deal only with the resolution that is now before the committee.

Mr. Knowles: The minister is out of order in talking about something that has already been disposed of.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am quite aware of that.

Mr. Knowles: And the minister broke the rules to do it.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman could not resist the temptation to point that out.

The purpose of this resolution is to authorize the introduction of a bill that has only one section which has any financial implications. In what I say today I am going to deal solely with the section that has financial implications because it seems to me it would be simply a waste of the time of the committee and of the house to deal with a hypothetical bill before anyone has the right to look at it.

The revolving fund that is referred to in this resolution is a fund which, under the act, amounted to $350,000. Last year, when the estimates of my department were before the committee of supply, I asked to have this amount increased to $650,000. I believe the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will remember this proceeding because he took some exception not to the substance but to the form of what was done at that time. I point that out because, from the resolution, it appears that the amount of the fund is being increased to $1 million from $350,000 whereas, in fact, it is being increased from $650,000 to $1 million. But the $650,000 is not in the Indian Act; it is in the appropriation act of last year.

These loans which are made out of this revolving fund are advanced to Indians to assist them in establishing themselves in agriculture, forestry, fishing, in setting up business in handicrafts, for getting equipment and facilities for guiding, trapping and a good many other miscellaneous pursuits. The purpose of the loans is to make it possible for Indians—who, because of the protection they are given under the Indian Act, are also under a disability about borrowing in the ordinary way—to get money on reasonable terms in order to supplement their traditional mode of livelihood.

I would remind the committee that the Indian population of this country, without any addition by immigration and indeed with a steady diminution because of enfranchisement, is growing faster than the rest of the population, whereas their additional means of livelihood are actually being diminished as settlement moves farther north or because of defence installations in some cases or for other reasons. In view of this development, I think one of the most important internal problems we have in this country, and certainly morally there is no more important internal problem for the rest of us, is to do our utmost in every practical way we can to see that the Indians have every opportunity we can give them of developing new ways of supporting themselves and living in a self-respecting manner as ordinary members of the community.

I do think this revolving fund has done a great deal to make it possible for the more enterprising Indians, those with a bit more initiative, to do that. I have a great deal of material here about the number of loans, the record of repayment and other material of that sort. The record of repayment is remarkably good and the number of bad loans is very small. I do not really think it would serve any particularly useful purpose for me to attempt to put it all on the record, but I would be glad to answer any questions any member of the committee may wish to ask.

Mr. Harkness: So far as the latter part of the resolution is concerned, the only part with which the minister dealt, I think all of us are very pleased to see that there is to be an increase from the present statutory provision of $350,000 to $1 million for this revolving fund, out of which loans can be made to bands or to individual Indians. I fully agree with what the minister said, that much more needs to be done along this line than has been done in the past so far as enabling Indians to better themselves is concerned. The provisions of section 69, under which this money is lent, read as follows:

> (a) to make loans to bands, groups of Indians or individual Indians for the purchase of farm implements, machinery, livestock, motor vehicles, fishing equipment, seed grain, fencing materials, materials to be used in native handicrafts, any other equipment, and gasoline and other petroleum products, or for the making of repairs or the payment of wages, or
> (b) to expend or to lend money for the carrying out of co-operative projects on behalf of Indians.

The minister said he would be glad to answer questions, and I think it would be of some interest to the committee if, before we have finished with the resolution, he could let us know how many loans had been made under this act. How many are in effect at the present time or the latest period for which he has figures? In other words, to what extent has use been made of this fund of $350,000? I should also be very interested in knowing the maximum amounts which have been made available to any particular Indian. As a matter of fact, I think one of the weaknesses in this provision of the Indian Act is that the amount which any particular Indian and even band of Indians could get, particularly for the purchase of livestock or farm implements in the west was too small.

I do not know much about the situation so far as the east is concerned. I know that a considerable number of Indians on the reserves with which I am familiar have been definitely handicapped in making any economic or material progress as a result of the fact that they were unable to secure a sufficient number of farm implements or a sufficient amount of livestock to what I might call set up economic farming on the portion of the reserve which was allotted to them. In other words, I do not think there is any doubt that up to date not nearly enough has been done along the lines which this particular section of the act envisages.

The Indians have not been assisted nearly to the extent they might have been or, in many cases, to the extent they wanted to be. So far as my information goes, this probably has not been the result, at least up until recently, of the fact that there was not a sufficient amount of money in the revolving fund. The difficulty has been that the regulations under which these loans have been made were too stringent, or the total amount which could or would be given to a particular Indian was too small. I would hope that the regulations as well as the legislation itself would be changed and that an increase would be made in the amount of loan which would be available to an Indian.

I think that is particularly necessary in view of the fact we have had a constant process of inflation going on in this country. This has been recognized in the amendments to the farm loan act which we have had this session and in the amendments to the various other acts such as the Veterans' Land Act, which have been before the house recently. In all these cases the total amount of the loan has been increased in recognition of the fact that inflation has taken place. Whereas even seven or eight years ago a loan of $5,000 may have been sufficient for the purpose of the legislation, at the present time it is not sufficient. I believe the same principle should be applied to the Indian Act and the regulations amended accordingly, so that a greater amount will be available.

In addition to that I would hope that the fact that the total amount available is being increased to $1 million means that the department itself has decided on a much more vigorous policy so far as making use of this provision is concerned, and will give perhaps a more vigorous leadership than has been the case in the past in encouraging Indians to make use of this provision and get into various activities in which they can make a living for themselves.

In so far as the first part of the resolution is concerned, it reads merely:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Indian Act to provide for a number of changes in connection with the administration of the act—

One would think from this wording that probably the changes are not of very much importance. In introducing this resolution the minister did not say anything about those changes. In fact I think he said they would not be of much interest to the house.

Mr. Pickersgill: I know the hon. gentleman would not want to misrepresent what I said. I said that I did not think there would be much advantage to the committee in my talking about a hypothetical bill, and I would prefer to speak about the rest of the bill when I would be in order in speaking about it, on second reading. Some of the clauses are quite important, but they have no financial implications and are therefore not part of the resolution.

Mr. Harkness: I was going to say that my understanding is those changes are quite substantial.

Mr. Pickersgill: But they have nothing to do with the resolution.

Mr. Harkness: The statement in the resolution concerning certain administrative changes is a very poor description of what is involved in these various changes. My information may not be correct, but I understand that copies of the proposed changes were shown to a meeting of Indians which was held in Ottawa last winter. I was very glad to hear that this meeting had been held, and that the proposed changes had been shown to the Indians. I think it is essential, in dealing with our Indians, that their co-operation be secured, and that when changes in the act are contemplated they should be consulted and their advice should be taken in regard to any changes which may be proposed.

However, what I understand or what I have heard as a result of these delegates coming back and circulating their experiences among their comrades and others, is that the general purpose of many of the changes proposed is to shift authority and power to make decisions from the governor in council, where it resides under the Indian Act as it is at the present time, to the minister himself. As far as I can gather, the Indians look on such a change with very considerable trepidation. They consider their interests would be much better protected if the power of decision in regard to these matters were to remain with the governor in council rather than be shifted into the hands of one man, the minister. These changes, if they are as I understand them, represent an increase in the arbitrary power of the minister and his agents—

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether I might raise a point of order. The hon. gentleman is surely anticipating something that is not before the committee. If this resolution is adopted I understand it will give the minister authority to introduce a bill, and when that bill is introduced the hon. gentleman will know whether or not these things are being done and the minister will be in a position to state what is involved in these changes, and every hon. member will have an equal opportunity to debate it. It does seem to me, sir, it is quite out of order to be anticipating a future debate. No other change in the proposed bill has any financial implications except the one that I have spoken about. The whole bill could have been introduced, if there had been no amendment to section 69, without a resolution at all. I submit, sir, we should stick to what is before the committee at this time.

The Deputy Chairman: I am afraid the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration would have to go farther than he has gone to persuade me that his point of order has been well taken. I am not responsible for the drafting of the resolution the committee is considering, but it does start out in this way:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Indian Act to provide for a number of changes in connection with the administration of the act; . . .

And so forth. That is part of the resolution before this committee. I think in my not too long experience here that in resolutions of this kind it has been the regular practice for members of the house to indicate matters which they think should be included in the bill which the minister is asking leave to introduce. It may be that the first sentences in this resolution are not essential to be submitted to the committee of the whole, but I find myself in the position that they have been submitted to the committee of the whole, and therefore I would hesitate to rule a discussion on them out of order.

Mr. Harkness: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I did not think it was worth while bringing the matter up as a point of order, but actually I did consider asking the minister to outline in more detail what these changes are, other than the financial ones, which are included in the first part of the resolution. And I think properly he should have done that, and possibly he will do it before we have finished considering this measure at the resolution stage.

Now, to continue from where I was at the time the interruption took place; as I say, these proposed changes, if they are the ones which were submitted to the Indian delegates who came here, mean an increase in arbitrary power on the part of the minister and his agents, and in practice that means on the part of the agents or the superintendents on the reserves, and the other officials of the department. In other words, in most cases the arbitrary power which may be given is not exercised by the minister himself; it is exercised by his agents, and I think this is the sort of thing we should be attempting to get away from as far as the conduct of our Indian affairs is concerned.

One of the things in the minds of the committee on Indian affairs which met here for three years, I think in 1946, 1947 and 1948, was to try and, we will say, place more responsibility in the hands of the Indians themselves, to put the Indians in a position where there would be less and less arbitrary power exercised by the minister or his agents on the reserves. The aim was to put into the Indian's own hands the ability to carry on his own transactions instead of, as had been the case since the establishment of the reserves in western Canada, putting all transactions through the Indian agent. The Indian himself could not buy anything, sell anything or do anything else. To some extent that condition still prevails in western Canada.

It seems to me that these proposed amendments, if they are as they were represented to the Indians, are a backward step. They place more power, or are likely to put more arbitrary power, into the hands of the minister's agents. Therefore I would hope that a pretty close look will be taken at them and any tendency along that line will be curbed.

[The Deputy Chairman.]

We have heard here today and yesterday in connection with two other bills a large number of arguments concerning the undesirability of placing certain arbitrary powers in the hands of the minister rather than leaving them in the hands of the governor in council, where we at least have a number of ministers concerned and where we are therefore perhaps likely to have fewer arbitrary acts committed than would be the case when the power is in the hands of one minister. That argument was in connection with rather limited subjects and matters which really were economic matters. When we come to Indian affairs we are dealing with human beings, we are dealing with quite a considerable segment of our population and it is very much more undesirable, in my opinion, to have arbitrary power placed in the hands of a minister and his agents which can be exercised over other people, no matter what may be the colour of their skins, than it is to have arbitrary power in the hands of a minister to be exercised in economic matters.

The status of Indians is that of a group of inferior citizens under the law in Canada. They are a people without many of the rights of ordinary citizens in regard to recourse to the courts and naturally in regard to the right to vote and so forth. This inferior status of our Indians has been the cause of increasing disquiet and feelings of discomfort on the part of quite a large number of people in the white population. In other words, the consciousness has been steadily growing that we have a group of people in this country who have not been treated as the rest of the citizens of the country have been treated, who are inferior under the law, and that it is a situation in which we can take no pride and one which really should be corrected.

The Indian's lack of the right to appeal to the courts against decisions of the minister, particularly, has been the subject of many letters I have received during this session and previous to it. I would just like to read one of these letters to indicate the sort of representations I have been receiving, and I am sure other members have been receiving, and they represent the thinking of a large number of people. This particular letter is from the farmers' union of Alberta, which has many thousands of members. It is dated March 2, 1956, and reads:

> The farmers' union of Alberta board of directors at a recent meeting endorsed the following amendment to the Indian Act which is proposed by the Indian association of Alberta.
> Resolved that a new section be added to the Indian Act, Chapter 149, revised statutes of Canada, 1952:
> 1. In any case where the minister's discretion or that of the governor in council is exercised in a manner which the band of Indians concerned feels is inequitable, there shall be an appeal to a supreme court judge of the province where the band is located.

2. That decision to appeal must be made by a recorded vote of the electors of the band at a meeting properly called for that purpose.

3. The cost of the court action must be paid by the band, and the decision of the court shall be binding on all parties concerned.

Yours very truly,

Farmers' Union of Alberta,
(Mrs.) Pansy Molen, Secretary.

I received letters like that from dozens of non-profit organizations including the Lions Club and the missionary societies of various churches and others, particularly organizations devoted to charitable works. As I say, there has been a considerable increase in interest not only in the general welfare of the Indians but in the idea that they must be given a better deal than they have been given before so they may be placed on a basis of complete equality with other citizens in this country and no longer kept in an inferior state. I think this is a matter that needs to be corrected. In many cases under the act the Indians have no appeal whatever from the decision of the minister which as I said previously, really means the decision of one of his agents frequently. In other words there is an arbitrary power which any other person who felt himself aggrieved in like circumstances could take to the courts but the Indians cannot do so. When the Indian Act is under revision I hope the minister will accept an amendment in terms such as those I have just read out. I would hope we could put it in the act at this time and to that extent we will have improved what I might call the general civic rights of Indians and placed them in a better position under the law than they occupy at the present time.

Another matter of grave concern, which has caused more uneasiness, trouble and disquiet among the Indians than anything else since the passage of the present act, is the provisions under that act by which Indians may be expelled from band membership and therefore deprived of the right to live on the reserve and to share in the ordinary care which Indians receive on reserves, including schools and medical facilities and so forth.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sure the hon. gentleman is under a misapprehension. There is no provision in the act for expelling any Indian from band membership.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I am under no misapprehension whatever. There definitely is a provision of that sort and it has been acted on.

Mr. Pickersgill: What section of the act?

Mr. Harkness: As a matter of fact, a considerable number of Indians have been expelled from reserves and I believe a certain number of cases are pending at the present time. This business has lain like a heavy threat over quite a number of Indians for a number of years. As I say, it has caused more concern in the reserves in Alberta than any other single thing. More than any other matter it has caused what you might call a general suspicion of what the Department of Indian Affairs and the government might do.

I do not know why the minister rose and spoke the way he did because he knows quite well that in the Indian Act there are provisions affecting a person who does not meet the definition of the word "Indian" which was written into the act when it was last revised. Such a person may be expelled from the reserve. As I say, there are a number of cases pending and some people have been expelled. They are expelled for extremely flimsy reasons, particularly on the basis that their grandfathers took scrip back in the 1870's or 1880's. They are expelled because allegations are made by some other persons to the effect that their fathers or grandfathers were white men, and for reasons like that, which in most cases the person affected cannot disprove.

Of course there is a provision in the act that if any ten members of the particular reserve object to the membership of a particular Indian on the basis that his grandfather took scrip, or for some other reason, they may make a complaint and the case comes up and is presented to the department. The department may then order the Indian expelled from the reserve. The natural result of this of course has been to create a great deal of conflict. A few disgruntled people who dislike any member who lives on the reserve are encouraged by this provision to make a complaint against the individual. A great deal of ill will has developed and the reserves have split into factions, and things of that sort.

I think this is a bad provision and one which should be done away with. The position of these people on the reserves should be assured, as it were. It is unreasonable to allege that a man's grandfather took scrip. As a matter of fact, even if he did take it, in most cases he did not know what he was doing. He could not speak English nor could he read or write. Most of the scrip that was issued to Indians, as a matter of fact, was issued at the instigation of white men who promptly turned around and bought the scrip in order to purchase land. They probably paid the Indian $10 or $15 or gave him a bottle of whisky or something like that and in most cases the Indian did not know what he had done. He received the $10 or the bottle of whisky, as the case may be, and went back to his reserve and forgot all about it. Those Indians were all accepted back on the reserves. As a matter of fact, there was never any question about it. It is only in recent years that the department has apparently launched a general policy of cutting down, if possible, the number of Indians living on the reserves and has been attempting to expel these people. I think it would greatly improve the feeling of mutual respect and confidence between the Indians, the department and this house if this provision were to be abolished.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? I would like to know what section of the act he is referring to. I have gone through the act since he started to speak and I can find nothing anywhere that suggests any Indian may be expelled by anybody.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I cannot take time here to start looking up the section of the act. I would ask the minister if it is not a fact that proceedings have been taken against a considerable number of Indians at the instigation of ten members of the tribe in order to have an individual Indian expelled. Is that not a fact? Are there not cases now pending?

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the hon. gentleman wish me to answer his question now?

Mr. Harkness: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is a provision in the act—and I am sure everyone who has any familiarity with the act knows it; although it was changed when the last revision was made, in which I did not take part, as hon. members know—whereby, under a certain procedure, an Indian or a group of them on the reserve may protest that someone else living on that reserve is not an Indian. If it can be proven that person is not an Indian and has no right to be there he has, of course, no right to be there. There is provision also for recourse to the courts and for settlement by a judge in such cases. There is however, no provision in the act to the effect that anyone who is an Indian can be expelled from a reserve by anyone whatsoever.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, what the minister is trying to do is to say these people who are expelled are not Indians.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not trying to say that anybody is not Indian.

Mr. Harkness: In other words, the minister is trying to make a play on words which does not amount to anything. There is a considerable number of cases, as the minister well knows. As a matter of fact this was being carried on by the department before the new act came into effect. Quite a number of people at the Driftpile reserve, which I happen to know about particularly, were expelled by the officers of the department before the new act came into effect, before there was this provision concerning the ten people making a complaint. They were expelled on the instigation of the department itself. For the minister to say that there is no provision for the expelling of Indians and then to say that anybody who is expelled is not an Indian is I think just playing on words. There are all kinds of people living on these reserves, and some of these probably have a certain amount of white blood, but to say that they are not Indians because of that is the same as saying the minister is not a Canadian because he may have a little Irish blood in him or something else along that line.

This is a matter of great concern. The Indian association of Alberta, which I believe represents all the tribes in Alberta, have made this their chief complaint with the department for several years past. Therefore I do not think the minister can claim that this sort of thing does not go on. In addition to the representations which I received from the farmers' union I have had others in regard to this matter. Here is one from the Women's Missionary Society of the United Church of Canada, Alberta conference branch. It is dated April 18, 1956 and reads:

> At our recent annual meeting, the Alberta conference branch of the Women's Missionary Society of the United Church of Canada (representing 5,990 women throughout the province) passed the following resolutions concerning our Canadian Indians.

The first is the same as the one I received from the farmers' union, so I go on to the next:

> 2. That all Indians who at the time of coming into force of the last Indian Act were either treaty Indians or the descendants of treaty Indians, be henceforth regarded as treaty Indians (and no Indian who was signed in treaty previous to the act be forced or bribed or coerced by the government against his will off the reserve).

That is the very matter I am talking about.

> 3. That the federal government undertake a comprehensive plan of trades and professional training to equip young Indians for any type of employment within or outside of the reserve.
> We ask that you give the above your careful consideration, and bring the above to the attention of other members of parliament—

Instead of trying to do this sort of thing I think the minister would be much better advised to look into the matter and bring in an amendment to the act to ensure that this will not take place in future. Such an amendment should translate into law the recommendation made by the Women's Missionary Society of the United Church of Canada, Alberta conference branch. They are just one among many organizations who have made this type of representation.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired and I have made allowance for the interruptions.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Chairman, at the outset I should like to take advantage of this opportunity to congratulate the minister upon introducing this important resolution to amend the Indian Act to provide for a number of changes in connection with the administration thereof. I wish also to pay a special tribute to the efficient direction given at the executive level in recent years in the Indian affairs branch. I refer particularly to the late Major D. M. McKay and to Colonel H. M. Jones, his successor as branch director. Colonel Jones, like Major McKay, has established a fine reputation for leadership and has shown a rare understanding of the Indian problem. The unselfish service and willing co-operation of these two directors have helped greatly all those who have tried and are trying to make a constructive contribution to the solution of this present problem.

I think all hon. members must admit that it is not an easy problem to solve. Various steps have been taken and measures have been proposed by the federal government from time to time. We all know that, no matter how well intended they were, those measures have fallen substantially short of perfection. Somehow it seems difficult to rid official thinking and legislation of the wrong idea that we are dealing with an inferior and subordinate people. At any rate that is the impression left with the Indian himself. I am satisfied that the fault in this direction does not rest with officials of the Indian affairs branch in Ottawa, but rather that in the past many of our difficulties with the Indian population have stemmed from actions of local Indian agents. Indians in a sense have been wards of the federal government. There is a definite responsibility on the administration at Ottawa to make certain that Indians do not become destitute. More than that, the aim should be to see that our Indian population advances steadily from a state of wardship to a status of equal citizenship with non-Indian Canadians.

To this end they should receive adequate education and training if the conception of equality is to have any real meaning of significance. I have always been deeply interested in the Indian people of Canada and particularly those residing in my own constituency. They number about 1,700 in all. Ever since I entered parliament I have been urging the adoption of a new and better deal for the Canadian Indian. I intend to continue to press for those laws and services which I believe necessary to the improvement of their lot and to their value as people residing in this country.

I know that it is unrealistic to expect that legislation can be designed to cover fairly and within the strict letter of the law every possible individual case or set of circumstances. That is where sensible interpretation comes into play and where the Indian agent on the spot can exercise a most helpful discretion. But I have found in my many years' residence in the north that there is a need for Indian agents who are not tied to their desks, but who will get out and give personal instruction, guidance and supervision to the Indians in their charge. I wish to reiterate that in my view the agents should spend considerably more time in visiting the Indians in their camps and settlements to discuss their grievances and problems personally with them, rather than the Indians being obliged to travel many miles to bring their troubles and grievances to the agents at local headquarters.

In the selection of Indian agents by the civil service commission, I cannot say that good judgment has been used at all times, especially in the past. Academic qualifications are too often given too much weight, whereas those men who have a practical knowledge of Indians, their habits and way of life, and who know local conditions, are not given the consideration they deserve. Some of the best Indian agents I have known are men with practical experience among the Indians and who have not always had the benefits of higher education. These men were highly respected and liked by the Indians themselves. Just because a man with a higher education can sit down and write a good examination does not necessarily mean that he has sufficient practical experience and qualifications to fill such positions. In many instances they do not possess tact or good judgment in the sympathetic understanding of Indian problems.

Instead of this being so, we find too often a tendency toward evasiveness, indecision and buck-passing as between various departments of government, as well as an inclination on the part of local officials to hide behind a tangle of rules and regulations.

On the other hand, I realize that Indians are often not readily understandable or easy to work with. In some instances they fail to assume personal responsibility and accountability in the way that non-Indians more naturally do. They frequently need careful and constant supervision to attain the best results.

I grant you that older Indians, accustomed to gaining a livelihood by hunting, fishing and trapping, cannot readily adapt themselves to the modern methods of earning a living. But it should be the responsibility of the Indian affairs branch to teach the young generations of Indians useful trades and occupations.

In this connection, I believe too much emphasis is being placed on purely academic schooling rather than on vocational training. I feel that departmental policy on this subject should have been changed years ago. Some Indians I have met are very good mechanics. Many Indians make useful, thrifty citizens and good Canadians in every sense.

Just last week we saw here in Ottawa a splendid example of Canadian citizenship in the person of Dr. Peter Kelly of Vancouver island. He is a full-blooded Haida Indian and a full-time church minister. Dr. Kelly has always been a great fighter for Indian rights and has a son in the welfare section of the Indian affairs branch.

There are some arable areas of land in the north which Indians could cultivate with good results if given the necessary instruction and supervision. They could, I believe, become self-supporting to a large extent, so far as food supplies are concerned, to supplement their meagre means of obtaining a livelihood.

In regard to the older Indians who have always relied upon hunting, fishing and trapping for their livelihood, I believe that the federal departments concerned should extend every possible effort to preserve and develop the forest and game reserves in the north. I was most alarmed to read an article entitled "A Problem in Conservation" by Dr. A. W. F. Banfield, chief mammalogist, Canadian Wildlife Service, reprinted in the Indian School Bulletin, education division of Indian affairs branch, of March 1956. This article states:

> Many writers have scored the wastage of caribou by Eskimos and Indians throughout the years. Instances of this have been observed during the recent investigations. Orgies of killing still take place at several crossing points where caribou are speared from canoes or kyaks as they cross lakes in crowded ranks. Each year thousands of caribou carcasses are abandoned—their bloated bodies crowding the shores of northern lakes whose waters flowed red a few days before. At other points men, women, and children pepper the passing columns with small-calibre rifle slugs. Little effort is made to salvage the carcasses of those that escape from the scene of shooting and die of their wounds. During the summer months, caribou meat is often abandoned after the hides have been stripped from the carcasses for clothing. During the autumn hunts, a few sods or stones tossed on the carcasses are often dignified by the term "cache". In some areas of Keewatin the head is merely twisted so the antlers will stick up through the snow. These caches are easily plundered by scavengers such as wolves, foxes and wolverines. Often they are not revisited when the trapper travels in a different direction.
> This is a practice which northern people must take the lead in curbing. Government legislation cannot effectively prevent wastage in the remote areas of northern Canada. Restoration of the caribou can only be accomplished through an enlightened and aggressive program of conservation education, which will bring home to each hunter his own responsibility to conserve the resources of the land. Such a program should emphasize long term conservation and it must reach not only the children but the present day hunters or we may have few caribou for the children to hunt.

This comment by an authority goes to prove that our conservation responsibilities will increase rather than diminish unless the Indians of the north are trained, along the lines suggested, and integrated into the new economic development. I have always thought that Indians are conservationists by nature; however, after reading the article by Dr. Banfield it rather dispels that theory to a certain extent. I believe, however, that the answer to this problem of adaptation to our ways and our standards of living lies in the patient and persistent education of the Indian.

In this regard I am not unmindful of the brave and devoted efforts of missionaries and public servants in the north. Much also has been done to improve the health of the northern Indians. The Charles Camsell hospital in Edmonton has established a wonderful reputation in fighting disease among Indians and Eskimos.

In addition, during the past ten years very real progress has been made in the education of Indian people. The number of Indians attending schools in Canada has reached a total in 1955 of over 32,000. Not only are more Indian children attending school than ever before, but Indians are taking advantage of opportunities to attend high schools and universities and to take special training in the trades and professions. In the Yukon the Indian school population has increased from about 181 to 471 during the ten-year period from 1945 to 1955. About one-quarter of last year's Indian students attended non-Indian schools in the Yukon, and in line with the policy of the department towards greater integration.

It is my view that Indian education, at least at this stage in his development, should mainly emphasize vocational training. The Indian boy should be given some trade which will fit him for the sort of employment he can hope to get in his area.

Mr. Chairman, may I call it five o'clock?

The Deputy Chairman: It being five o'clock, the house will proceed to the consideration of private and public bills.

Progress reported.

PRIVATE BILLS

JEAN BENOIT MAILLE

The house resumed, from Friday, June 15, consideration in committee of Bill No. 217, for the relief of Jean Benoit Maille—Mr. Henderson—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Henderson: In consideration of clause 1, I should like to say a few words on the matter of the discussion of this bill before the committee of the whole when it came up on Friday last and an incident which was raised by the hon. member for Kootenay West and spoken to by the hon. member for Yukon and the hon. member for Medicine Hat.

The hon. member for Kootenay West raised the point that he had received some information of a proceeding of a very unusual nature and he spoke about a document being in the name of the chief clerk of committees of the House of Commons which had been filed as an exhibit before the committee. I might say that I regret that this matter came up in the house for discussion prior to the next meeting of the committee, which was this morning, to deal with this particular item. Last week, on June 12 and 13 there were two consecutive days of hearings, by this committee of which I have the honour to be chairman, of contested divorce actions, and the two contested divorce actions were disposed of. This morning the committee met on other business, namely 14 other divorce bills and an item of business which was raised by the hon. member for Kootenay West on Friday last. In order that hon. members may thoroughly understand the incident which was raised before the committee, I think I should give some of the background and detail, so that there will be no misunderstanding and in order that there will be no feeling that any irregular procedure has been followed by the committee on miscellaneous private bills in dealing with the matter.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Just before the hon. member proceeds, I wonder whether I should not just point out to the committee of the whole that actually this committee has before it a bill, that it is at the present time considering clause 1 of that bill, and that the powers of the committee are entirely those of acceptance, rejection or possibly amendment of that clause. However, the committee as a whole recalls the trend that this debate took last Friday and the undertaking—if one might use the word—which the leader of the house gave that the incident brought up last Friday should be or could be discussed today. My purpose in rising and interrupting the hon. member for Kingston is just to point out to the committee that this is an unusual situation and should not be regarded as a precedent; in other words, in a discussion on a clause of one particular bill, extraneous matters dealing with a previous hearing of the bill and some action which may be taken outside this committee would not normally be a subject for debate. I am not interfering with the discussion this afternoon. I am just launching that caveat because I do not think it would be a good precedent to establish.

Mr. Henderson: Mr. Chairman, in dealing with the matter in committee this morning, may I say that it was recognized by all members of the committee that we were not dealing with the bill but that we were dealing with the incident about which I am now speaking, in order that no precedent would be created by dealing with the bill after it had left the committee and had been referred to the committee of this house as a whole.

On Tuesday last, June 12, there were on the orders of the day several others of the bills before this committee, and particularly this contested divorce bill being No. 217, Letter J-7 of the Senate, entitled an act for the relief of Jean Benoit Maille. There appeared as counsel on behalf of the petitioner Mr. Godbout, counsel from Montreal, and for the respondent, Mr. Penverne, counsel from Montreal. That was during the morning sitting. During the afternoon sitting and the review of the witnesses by the committee, a witness appeared on behalf of the respondent by the name of Mr. Ian Peacock. He was called and he was sworn, examined and cross-examined. During his cross-examination the counsel for the petitioner asked him if he were here pursuant to a subpoena or words to that effect. He produced a document which was alleged to be a subpoena. It had certain amendments typed on it. It had formerly been Form 15, a subpoena form of the Senate. As we well know, there can be no such document as far as this committee is concerned. It was issued over the typed name of R. Arsenault, presumably the clerk of the miscellaneous private bills committee. At that point, when this document which was produced—which for the purposes of the record was marked exhibit "P"—at 5.45 o'clock the division bells rang in the house here and the committee was adjourned until eight o'clock. For the benefit of those who were there and those who were not there I might say, with regard to any reflection that has been made or might be inferred as to the conduct of this committee, that there were present in the afternoon sitting the following: Messrs. Anderson, Batten, Brown (Brantford), Cameron (High Park), Carter, Eyre, Fairey, Hansell, Henderson, Houck, Macnaughton, Matheson, Pommer, Regier, Simmons, Weaver, White (Waterloo South), and Wylie.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock. The first matter of business to be dealt with was this alleged subpoena. The witness, Mr. Peacock, was asked where he got this document. If my memory serves me correctly he said he got it from the respondent herself. Counsel for the respondent then stood up and stated that the document had originated from his office.

Another witness who was to give evidence on behalf of the respondent, a man by the name of Mr. David De Castro, produced a similar subpoena which was marked exhibit "Q" in the proceedings of the committee on that day. It was in the same form as exhibit "P", being the exhibit produced by Mr. Peacock. I might say that it is worth noting that when these witnesses were being examined, members of the committee appropriately asked each one of these witnesses who was there and had produced this form of subpoena if he would have come if he had not received the subpoena. The answer in every case was in the affirmative. Might I suggest at this point that we might come to the conclusion that these documents were merely superfluous and base our conclusion upon the evidence as given by the witnesses so sworn.

In dealing with these subpoenas, we discussed the matter in the committee. I might say that the members present at that time—this is the evening sitting—were as follows: Messrs. Anderson, Batten, Brown (Brantford), Cameron (High Park), Carter, Eyre, Fairey, Hansell, Henderson, Houck, Macnaughton, Matheson, McCubbin, Pommer, Simmons, Weaver and Wylie.

In discussing this matter of the subpoena I think some members were of the opinion that we should not in any way, because of a document of this nature being produced as an exhibit, allow it to interfere or prejudice in any way the case of either the petitioner or the respondent. However, it could not interfere with the case of the petitioner because these witnesses had clearly admitted under oath that they would have been present anyway whether or not they had ever received these subpoenas; and in dealing with the respondent, to be fair to her, if there had arisen any prejudice against her counsel for having produced these documents in a conclusion reached by members of the committee, she would have been prejudiced by something outside of her knowledge and control. Therefore it was decided to proceed with the evidence and to dispose of this incident of these irregular subpoenas on another occasion. The evidence was put in for the respondent's case. I might say that there was a recorded vote on the granting of this particular petition. The petition was granted by a vote of: Yeas, 12, and nays, 2. The yeas were: Messrs. Batten, Brown (Brantford), Cameron (High Park), Carter, Eyre, Fairey, Hansell, Macnaughton, Matheson, McCubbin, Pommer and Weaver. The nays were: Messrs. Simmons and Wylie.

This was ten minutes after ten on the evening of June 12 and the committee adjourned until three o'clock in the afternoon of Wednesday June 13 to deal with the next contested matter before the committee which was a petition already disposed of by a bill of this honourable house on Friday. I might say that there were witnesses and counsel waiting for the presentation of that petition over the two days. It was thought advisable to dispose of that.

This matter was dealt with this morning, as I say, as a separate incident and not in connection with the bill because the bill was not before the committee. We had the experts on law and procedure in this house before the committee, and it was decided unanimously that I be instructed to report the incident to Mr. Speaker. This decision was based upon standing orders 117 and 118. As we know, briefly, standing order 117 makes provision whereby a parliamentary agent, and the counsel in this matter was one, becomes a parliamentary agent with the sanction and authority of Mr. Speaker. He is therefore personally responsible to the house and to Mr. Speaker.

Standing order No. 118 is the one under which we have authority, and it reads as follows—I am reading it into the record for the purpose of clarifying this matter:

> Any parliamentary agent who wilfully acts in violation of the standing orders and practice of parliament, or of any rules to be prescribed by Mr. Speaker, or who wilfully misconducts himself in prosecuting any proceedings before parliament, shall be liable to an absolute or temporary prohibition to practice as a parliamentary agent, at the pleasure of Mr. Speaker; provided, that upon the application of such agent, Mr. Speaker shall state in writing the ground for such prohibition.

In consequence of that standing order, Mr. Chairman, and as I say again with the unanimous consent of the members of the committee, this morning I so reported the incident to Mr. Speaker. I would ask hon. members to consider this bill which is now before us separate and apart from this incident. I hope the explanation which I have given clarifies the matter in the minds of the members of this committee.

Mr. Herridge: I listened with interest to the explanation of this unfortunate incident given by the chairman of the committee on private bills. I appreciate the trouble to which he went to explain the matter to the members of this committee. I raised this matter on Friday last and at that time I said, as reported at page 5102 of Hansard for that date:

> I have raised this question because, if that is correct, it is in my opinion a very serious matter indeed. I think this bill should be referred back to the committee for an explanation by the chairman of the committee as to what actually happened before the committee.

After that the Minister of Finance spoke briefly, and then noting the absence of the chairman of the committee from the house I was only too glad, in fairness to the chairman, to adjourn the debate. However, at that time the hon. member for Medicine Hat, who is a member of the committee, apparently did not agree with me or with the suggestion made by the Minister of Finance because, as reported at page 5102 and 5103 of Hansard, he said:

> Before the adjournment is considered, may I say that I happen to be a member of that committee, and the hon. member for Yukon is another member; the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) was there and perhaps two or three others. This question was dealt with by our committee. Despite the fact that our chairman is not here today, I think what has been said throws rather a reflection on our committee. I think it should be dealt with today. I must admit that the name of Mr. Arsenault was not written, it was typed by this lawyer's secretary, and I think we should dispose of this now. It was given a good deal of consideration by the committee. As a matter of fact we had two sittings, and we sat until ten o'clock one evening. I feel it has been given all the consideration that should be given.

I am very glad, in view of the remarks made by the member of the committee, the hon. member for Medicine Hat, that the chairman has seen fit to give this explanation he has given this afternoon.

I want to explain that after I had been informed of the incident I raised the matter in the house entirely on my own initiative and without consulting any other person, as one on which I considered the house was entitled to be informed by the chairman of the committee. I want to emphasize that there was no political or party interest in this matter whatever. I raised it because I considered it my duty to raise it and because of my jealousy of the rights and privileges of this House of Commons. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that in doing so I did not intend in any way whatever to cast any reflection on the committee or any member thereof.

Now, from the report just given to the house by the chairman of the committee, it is obvious that my action was fully justified. I am confident all members of this committee will appreciate the frank and full statement just made by the chairman of the committee on private bills, and particularly the committee's recommendation with respect to this lawyer's action. When speaking on Friday last I said I was informed that this lawyer admitted to members of the committee present to forging the signature of Mr. Rufin Arsenault, chief clerk of the committees of the House of Commons. From the report which has been given, apparently this lawyer is not guilty of forgery in the legal sense. The dictionary gives the meaning of forgery as to counterfeit, to falsify or to fake. In that sense, the lawyer in question certainly is guilty of forgery and a very serious breach of his privileges as a parliamentary agent.

However, according to the report made by the chairman to the house this afternoon I think it is quite safe to say he is guilty of uttering a false document, which is a very serious act indeed on the part of a parliamentary agent. I might say that I discussed this question with one or two members of the other place and I found that the same lawyer attempted a similar scheme on a committee of the other place some two or three years ago. I am very pleased that the action of the committee has brought this breach of his privileges to the attention of the Speaker.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in these difficult and lurid times, when standards that have stood for centuries are being threatened, I think it is the duty of every member in this house to protect the integrity of this house, its forms, procedures and practices. I am pleased to note the committee has recognized this in the report it has given by the hon. member who preceded me. The question of the rights, responsibilities and rules governing parliamentary agents was originally laid down by the Speaker by authority of the British House of Commons in Great Britain in 1837. So far as I can read, these rules have been revised a number of times since. In April, 1938 a new set of rules was approved and issued by the chairman of committees in the Lords and the Speaker in the Commons. I have done some reading on this subject since last Friday, but I must not aspire to be an expert on parliamentary procedure. I can only plead extenuating circumstances because possibly it is an infectious disease.

This question has been given considerable attention, and in May's fifteenth edition there are four pages dealing with the rules relating to parliamentary agents. I wish to draw particular attention to rules 20 and 21 on page 878 of this edition. Altogether, there are 24 rules governing the rights, responsibilities and privileges of parliamentary agents, and some three pages of this book are taken up with these rules and regulations. I find that rule 20 reads as follows:

> Every parliamentary agent and solicitor conducting proceedings in parliament before the House of Commons shall be personally responsible to the house, and to the Speaker, for the observance of the rules, orders, and practice of parliament, as well as of any rules which may from time to time be prescribed by the Speaker, and also for the payment of the fees and charges due and payable under the standing orders.

Rule 21 reads:

> Any person registered as a parliamentary agent who shall act in violation of the orders and practice of the House of Commons or who shall be guilty of professional misconduct of any kind as a parliamentary agent shall be liable to an absolute or temporary prohibition to practice as a parliamentary agent at the discretion of the Speaker.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is no question about it, this lawyer has committed a breach of his privileges. The matter has been brought to the attention of the Speaker. He has the right to deal with the matter according to our rules.

Apparently, we in this house in general have followed the British practice in the writing of rules 117 and 118 that deal with parliamentary agents and to which the hon. member for Kingston referred when he was making his report. It is fortunate in this, as in a good many other parliamentary matters, that members of this house in days past in their wisdom saw fit to be guided by the experience and traditions of the mother of parliaments. It is not very frequent that an incident of this kind happens in this House of Commons. We have based our practice on the established practice of the mother of parliaments in Great Britain, where I understand this matter has been given a great deal of consideration throughout the years since 1837, because over there the right to act as a parliamentary agent is guarded jealously and I presume by adopting similar language in rules 117 and 118 we have followed the British practice and we expect the same traditions to be maintained.

When we are dealing with questions like the one at present under discussion we must all realize, I am sure, it is fortunate there exists an inseparable umbilical cord of tradition, of procedure, of parliamentary practice and precedent with the mother of parliaments from which we can draw the procedural nourishment on occasions like these necessary to cure the parliamentary anemia that threatens our times.

In conclusion, again I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, I thank the chairman of the committee for his report. The committee has done its duty in reporting to this house and reporting the incident to the Speaker according to the traditions, procedures and practices recognized in this house and in the mother of parliaments upon which they are based.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, on Friday last the hon. member for Kootenay West raised the possibility of this case being referred back to the committee. I was very pleased to know that this house did not follow through with that suggestion and that the bill was not referred back to the committee because I feel that would have served no useful purpose.

It is now several years since I first raised the question of the contempt of parliament that I was noticing taking place in these divorce cases, and I think the hon. member for Kootenay West is to be congratulated on raising his voice in an effort to avoid further contempt of this institution and of its committees. I am not for one moment going to condone the actions of the attorney in question, the attorney for the respondent. I believe his actions show, although possibly in desperation, though they none the less show it, a clear contempt for the rules by which this parliament and its committees operate. This is possibly, if my information is correct, one of the last times, or the last time, that this subject will be brought up for discussion in this house at this current session. Therefore, I would like to express at this time my compliments to both the members of the committee this year and our very helpful and amiable chairman of the committee this year. When we sat through this Maille case—despite the fact that I was absent from the evening session, I was there for the whole hearing of the case and missed only the summary of the various attorneys at the end—I noticed on innumerable occasions the chairman lending a helping hand to the petitioner and his attorney and the respondent and her attorney. It is a bit of a different arrangement that we have there. We are a court and yet we are not a court, and nobody seems to know exactly what the line of procedure is or ought to be. The committee likes to consider itself as a court. Some like to consider themselves as a court of appeal from the similar committee that is in existence in the other place. On occasion, the Prime Minister has denied that assertion. His claim is that we are not acting as a court but that the petitioner is exercising only his rights as a private citizen in petitioning at the foot of the throne, which is the parliament of Canada.

Members of the House of Commons are asked to sit in the capacity of judges. Some of us have the legal training for that; others of us have not. I do not apologize for one minute for missing out on the vote on this Maille case, because after a full morning and afternoon session I simply did not know who was the more or less honest, the petitioner or the respondent, and I felt myself wholly unable to cast an honest vote and to reach any conclusion. This was caused especially by the lack of established procedure before our committee. The committee of the other house has well-established and laid-down lines of procedure for calling witnesses, for hearing witnesses, for rights of petitioner and respondent, and for the whole procedure. I am sure the members of the committee will agree with me when I express the wish that something might possibly be done whereby we can arrive at a recognized established method of proceeding.

In this case the petitioner applied to the other place over a year ago for relief from his marriage vows and was denied the relief. This year he made another effort and succeeded before the committee of the other place, using a new incident by which he attempted to prove adultery and calling a completely new set of witnesses.

His argument had some weaknesses in it. A number of discussions took place concerning the reasons he should be seeking relief. He claimed he had no intention of remarrying. "Once was enough," were his words. We could therefore only come to the conclusion that his reasons for seeking relief chiefly concerned the fact that since his wife had a legal separation from him she was costing him a lot of money and was also causing him considerable embarrassment. He is admittedly a fairly well-to-do manufacturer. He has to pay his wife $30 a week and of course he has to maintain the three children involved. Whether that should be a cause for seeking relief, I do not know. He added further that his wife had quite frequently taken him into court and when such events took place he always had to pay both her expenses and his own.

I noted that he had severely injured his wife's hand just a few days before we heard the case and she had him before a court because of that assault. No doubt he had to pay the costs in this case, too.

His main contention was that his wife was costing him too much money and he thought we should relieve him of the responsibility. There was some doubt in some of our minds, despite his assertion to the contrary, whether he might wish to remarry within a short time if his case was successful. He had spent a fair amount of time in the company of another lady even in such far-away places as Europe. It was a vacation in her case and a business trip in his.

To my way of thinking the respondent's case calls for a good deal of sympathy. I do not wish to pass judgment at this time as to whether or not I thought she was guilty of adultery. However, where responsible members sit on a committee I think they must take many other factors into consideration. The woman was obviously in a poor state of health. The husband admitted that on one occasion at least he had her committed to a mental institution. The respondent claimed she was interested in protesting the divorce, because she did not want to lose the possibility of obtaining custody of her three children. I believe she also admitted, if my memory serves me correctly, her health did not permit her to work. That may have been before the committee of the other place. She also stated she did not want to lose the $30 a week separation allowance which she was receiving.

I did note both before the committee of the other place and before our committee the woman's severe handicap in that she was not able to defend herself. She did not have the means—and perhaps I should really say she did not have the tools—with which to defend herself as I thought she should. Several times when we asked whether or not she had certain witnesses with her, her attorney replied that he had asked some witnesses to appear and they had flatly refused to do so. This again brings out the handicap under which we operate because of a lack of established machinery to permit both the petitioner and the respondent to bring whatever witnesses are necessary to support their cases.

I feel this case has once again very forcibly called our attention to our handicap. We are ruling over the destiny of human lives. We are separating families. This is a very dangerous task and an extremely onerous responsibility. I sometimes doubt the wisdom of the state legislating in matters such as morals and marriage as they affect human beings. I believe that as the House of Commons we must either begin to assume our responsibility or we must establish some competent body which will relieve us of the responsibility that now rests with us. I hope before another session of this parliament meets the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) will have received enough advice from at least the Protestant members on his side of the house that will inform him in no uncertain terms that they no longer want to be held responsible for the separation of Catholic married people in Canada.

Clause 2 agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Henderson moved that the bill be read a third time.

Mr. Regier: On division.

Motion agreed to on division and bill read the third time and passed.

The Chairman: The business under private and public bills having been exhausted, the house will resume consideration of the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

INDIAN ACT

AMENDMENTS TO PROVIDE FOR CHANGES IN ADMINISTRATION, AMOUNT OF LOANS, ETC.

The house resumed consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Pickersgill—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Indian Act to provide for a number of changes in connection with the administration of the act; and to provide further that the Minister of Finance may from time to time advance to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration out of the consolidated revenue fund such sums of money as the minister may require for loans to Indians under section 69 of the act;

The total amount of outstanding advances under the said section not to exceed at any one time one million dollars in lieu of three hundred and fifty thousand dollars as at present.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Chairman, I am thinking of such lines as carpentry, diesel and motor mechanics, welding, logging, lumbering, sawmill operation, prospecting etc. For Indian girls a course could be given in elementary household science, nursing, teacher training and other useful occupations. Employment conditions in recent years have been changing in the north. Construction companies are offering opportunities for those who are able and willing to work. This new development is critically important because the traditional livelihood of Indians by hunting and trapping has drastically declined in some areas. A new era is dawning in the north. Large areas are being opened up to development and existing industrial and economic activity is being speeded up. Let us see that the Indians, native to the north, also benefit from all this progress.

The time has come, and rightly so, when racial discrimination should be set aside and all our citizens who obey the laws and who help to build up a better country may be treated with equality. I was glad to hear the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys state in the house the other day that in his recent visit to mining districts of northern Ontario he found numbers of Indians employed in the mines and doing a good job. There are other projects as well that could be carried out in the north to give useful constructive employment to Indians. Many of these settlements could be improved by the provision of graded roads, ditches, sidewalks, better water supplies and sanitary arrangements: in other words, a general and complete overhauling. This would be an opportune time to supply this employment and these facilities so that the natives could improve their communities. At the same time they would be working for wages to supplement their other income.

I wish particularly in this connection to congratulate the Department of National Health and Welfare on the establishment of two rehabilitation homes in Edmonton for Indians discharged from the Charles Camsell hospital. I understand that in these rehabilitation homes Indians who have recovered their health are given an opportunity to fit themselves for useful employment when they return to their own homes. They are given vocational instruction or on the job training. This project is of special interest to me because the Indian hospital at Edmonton accommodates patients from the Yukon Territory, as well as from the north country generally.

Of course it is true that no matter how rapidly new avenues of employment are found for Indians many of them will continue to depend upon trapping for all or most of their cash income, as well as on game and fish for most of their food supplies. Here again federal, provincial and territorial governments can do much to protect and conserve game and fur bearing animals in our northern areas.

The problem of the application of liquor laws to the Indian population is a persistent and vexatious one. Opinions over what policy is best to follow continue to differ widely among non-Indians who have given this problem much study and anxious thought. On the basis of many years' experience in the north, and as a result of close association with Indians and their problems, I am convinced that Indians should not be dealt with differently from non-Indian citizens of Canada so far as liquor laws are concerned. I pressed this point of view strongly on the special committee on the Indian Act during its sittings in 1951. As I pointed out at that time, the existing system affords the widest opportunity to the bootlegger to ply his trade. I feel that it is far better to appeal to the pride of Indians in this matter. Let us deal with them as adults, not as children.

In January of this year a brief submitted to the Gordon royal commission by the Yellowknife District Miners' Union touched on this matter of the Indian and the liquor problem. Although no definite recommendation was made in this connection, it is interesting to note that this portion of their brief draws attention to the significant profits made by bootleggers under the present system. Last year the International Catholic League against Alcoholism distributed a questionnaire among Roman Catholic and Protestant missionaries in northern Canada. The questionnaire asked for views and suggestions on laws governing the sale of alcoholic beverages to Indians. Answers were received from at least ten points in the Yukon, and it is interesting to note that the majority of those replying felt that Indians should have the same rights as non-Indians in this regard. Taking the survey as a whole, however, the majority opinion was adverse to any change in this connection.

I feel that Indians, in principle, should not be restricted in this matter but that in practice the problem should be handled by means of the local option privilege. It is felt by many that the approach toward any solution should be a cautious one, and conducted on an experimental basis.

If the Indians of Canada are to take their proper place in the Canadian community, and to play their rightful part in the upbuilding of this nation, they should be encouraged to accept as much responsibility as they are able to carry. The closer we and they can come to realizing this ideal, the happier they will be, and the stronger Canada will become.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I should like to say a few words on this resolution we now have before us on Indian affairs. I have always had a great interest in the Indians in my own province of British Columbia, particularly on the coast, and I have had some fairly intimate friendships with many of them.

The hon. member for Yukon this afternoon mentioned one of my most distinguished constituents, who was here a few days ago, the Reverend Dr. Peter Kelly. I think that the existence of a person like Dr. Kelly illustrates the complexity of this problem of the Indian population of Canada. Dr. Kelly is, of course, a doctor of divinity and a very eminent minister in the United Church ministry, and he is also a member of a chief's family of the Haida Indians. I have a peculiar interest in him because his son at one time taught my children in the public schools on Vancouver island, and I realize that in Dr. Kelly, and in his whole family for that matter, we have not only outstanding representatives of the Indian population but outstanding citizens of Canada. It is not easy perhaps to devise a formula that will apply equally to such people as Dr. Kelly and his family and the less advanced members of the native population of Canada.

Every year before I come to Ottawa I always have great satisfaction in being summoned to attend a meeting of the council of the Indians in part of my constituency who call me down to tell me their troubles and what they want me to try to do for them. I think that perhaps is a demonstration that they have come of age in their own minds, even if we do not admit it here in this House of Commons, and that they consider a member of this house as their representative as well as the representative of those who have the privilege of voting for him. I sometimes think that we should have one or two members of that Indian tribe attend here in this chamber and then perhaps we would hear oratory that has not been heard here for a generation, because these people on the coast of British Columbia are for some reason or another natural born orators. What many of the Indians in my constituency can do with the English language should be the envy of some of us to whom it is the native tongue.

We have an enormous responsibility with regard to the Indians because, owing principally, I think, to ignorance, and partly also to greed and selfishness, we completely shattered their very complex social structure when the white people came to this country. I know this is particularly true among the bands and nations of the coast Indians. The regulations that were put into effect in the early days prohibiting many of their traditional customs simply shattered the fabric of their whole society. When I hear people speaking in a contemptuous manner of the behaviour of Indians, I often wonder how we would behave if some conquering race came in and forbade us to carry on with the traditional social institutions to which we had been accustomed for generations, as these people had been.

In recent years on the coast of British Columbia the Indians have been beginning to assume their rightful place in our society and, with the aid of better economic conditions and better educational opportunities, are now beginning to match the white man on his own ground. In the constituency of my friend from Comox-Alberni there is a very remarkable old gentleman whom I should hope some day the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration might have a chance to meet. He is a chief of a tribe of one of the islands off Vancouver island, and now very nearly 90 years of age. He became chief of that tribe at the age of 18 and decided that the condition of his people in the face of new invasion of white people, with their new culture, was such that he had to take very drastic steps to preserve any sort of life for his people and he proceeded almost to force them to adapt themselves to the white man's way of life. He made them tear down their long communal houses and build individual dwellings. He encouraged and aided them and got provincial government help for them to start in the logging business and the fishing business in a commercial way. At the present time the village in which this old chief lives with his people is one of the best kept settlements on the coast of British Columbia, with its own electric light plant and water system and with its own well kept, well painted and well furnished houses. I mention this because this is a sample of what the native people of the coast of British Columbia are capable of doing when given the right encouragement and the right help.

Among Indians now in my part of the country there is a growing demand for decent educational opportunities. They feel—and, I think, quite rightly—that former governments in Canada rather sold them down the river in the easy way in which they allotted the various Indian tribes to the various religious denominations and told these churches to go ahead and educate them in their own way and the best way they could—and it was a very bad way in which they did it. The Indians now are beginning to revolt against that idea. I was particularly pleased two years ago when I heard the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration announce the policy of his department to encourage native Indian children to go to existing public schools wherever possible and, where not possible, to build for them secular schools under the Indian affairs branch.

I take a certain pride in the fact that for a number of years I was a member of the school board on Vancouver island which was one of the first school boards, if not the first, in British Columbia to admit Indian children to the schools without any question whatever. The results of that policy were completely evident in a few years because from that school have gone several young Indians, not only through high school but on to the University of British Columbia. So that is one of our first matters, to ensure that they have proper educational facilities.

I am always very impatient when I hear people say, "You cannot educate Indians" or "You can educate them to about the age of ten, and that's all." Such people reveal complete and total ignorance of the capacity of these people. I believe that we should regard this problem of assimilating the Indian population into our own society, not only from their point of view but from our own point of view too, because I am convinced that these people have a great deal to contribute to the culture of Canada. Anyone who has seen the paintings of George Klutesi and Judith Phyllis Morgan, both of them native coast Indians, will realize that these people have a tremendous talent and gift for the visual arts.

Recently, of course, they also won considerable fame on Vancouver island by the production of an Indian opera which was based on their old folklore and on their old dances. I have often regretted that they were not able to raise the funds that they had hoped to raise to send that company on tour throughout Canada. I think it would have been very helpful to other Indians in other parts of Canada to have seen what it is possible for the native population to accomplish.

This afternoon the hon. member for Yukon spoke of the liquor question in connection with the Indian population. I want to endorse what he said in that regard. We have a great many strange myths and folklores that hang over our minds. One of these myths is that Indians, as soon as they have a drink of beer, become wild, unmanageable savages who will slit every white person's throat. Admittedly there are many Indians who become quite unruly when they are drinking,—and I have seen them—just as unruly as Scotsmen, Irishmen, Swedes, French-Canadians or any other ethnic group you like to mention, and no more so. On the other hand, there are plenty of Indians who take it in moderation. There are even some of them who are not particularly interested in it at all. But certainly, if we are going to hope to have these people assume their rightful position in our society, they must be allowed to run the risks of modern civilization as well as to have the privileges and the advantages. One of the risks of modern civilization is the problem of learning how to handle alocholic beverages. I therefore hope that, among other things, the government will take steps towards changing the status of Indians in that regard.

A few days ago when I was speaking to my constituent of whom mention has been made several times here today—I refer to Dr. Kelly —he remarked to me that in his opinion the single, most important thing that requires to be done for his people is to enfranchise them and to do so without depriving them of those, shall we say, relics of privileges to which they are surely entitled as the rightful owners of this land. As Dr. Kelly pointed out, we cannot expect people really to assume the responsibilities of citizenship unless we are going to give them the voice of citizens. To me he expressed the hope that, before many years had gone by, the fears and doubts that exist among some Indians that if they are enfranchised they will lose their rights will have been dissipated by government action and government statements, and that we then may hope to call on these people to assume their proper place in our communities.

The hon. member for Calgary North this afternoon was speaking about the expulsion of Indians from reservations. I think the minister may have been technically correct when he answered the hon. member; but, as a matter of fact, while there may not be actual expulsions, there are cases which have come to my knowledge—and which I have brought to the attention of the department—of Indians whose claims to be members of a certain band and therefore part owners of the reservation property have not been allowed by the department. In one case that I recall, this is because the man's right of inheritance came through his mother which is the traditional Indian way of tracing inheritance. Unfortunately the lady did not go through the formal motions of getting married to which we are accustomed but she was considered to be married in the eyes of her Indian relations. This young man—he is not young now; he is a man well on in the forties—has been denied his position as a member of that band. The department takes the view that he should be considered as a member of his father's band of Indians which is away up the coast on a small island. The Indians feel that this is an interference with their traditional methods of calculating inheritance. Hence while he is not expelled from this reservation, he is not permitted to get control of a piece of property in order to build a house for himself. He is obliged to live with other relatives there rather as a sort of hanger-on.

This whole question of band membership is at present acute among some of the Indians. I hope it is not going to be acute for very long because I hope that their insistence on their rights within reservations will tend to diminish in importance in their own eyes as their liberties expand. However, I think the department might well institute some investigations into the disputes, to which the hon. member for Calgary North referred today, which occur between Indians of certain bands on the reservations as to who has the right to own some of the reservation and who has not. They finally come down on the department to decide the matter because, as I said earlier, we have destroyed completely their old, traditional social structure which settled these questions under their own terms at that time.

I hope that some of these matters that I have mentioned will be given attention in the legislation that we are going to see. I also hope that legislation has been drafted in consultation with responsible members of the Indian peoples themselves. There is not merely Dr. Peter Kelly but among the Indians there are many competent, well-educated, upright men with good judgment who could give valuable advice to the minister as to how to solve some of the problems of their people. I hope this legislation has been the result of such consultation and that, in consequence, it will meet with the approval of the Indian people.

Mr. Hardie: Mr. Chairman, I rise at this time to bring to the attention of the committee some of the problems facing the Indians who do not live on reservations, particularly those in the Northwest Territories in my constituency. At the outset I should like to concur in the remarks made by the hon. member for Yukon concerning the co-operation and services given by the late Major D. M. McKay and also the present director of Indian affairs, Colonel Jones. Also, when speaking of Indians, I think a tribute should be paid to the missions—both the Anglican and Roman Catholic missions—for the great job they did in the early years in educating and looking after the native Indians. For instance, in my own constituency the first school was built in Fort Providence by the Roman Catholic mission in 1867. Other schools were built by the Anglican and Roman Catholic missions after that time. But from 1867 to 1902 the government paid no attention, and did not put up one nickel for education or health of the native Indians. In 1902 they gave a big grant to these missions, namely 3 cents per day to educate, clothe and feed Indian children. In 1912 they raised that grant to 12 cents; and in 1921, I think it was, they raised it to 50 cents and they have come along with large grants since then. But now in the Northwest Territories the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources have taken over the education of native Indians. A great deal of money has been spent on schools, both vocational and academic. As I have said, a great deal of time is being spent particularly on vocational training, and I agree with this. But, Mr. Chairman, when we speak of vocational training—training these native Indians to become welders, diesel mechanics, carpenters and all the rest of it—there is something we must remember and it is this. We are educating these people in the Northwest Territories to follow professions of this sort. I want to suggest to the minister now that it is all right to educate these people along these lines, but he should remember one thing. Once they become diesel mechanics, they have to be supplied with work. Once they become welders, they have to be supplied with work or an opportunity to do something along that line. Development in the Northwest Territories is slow. I am afraid that we are going to have students coming out of these schools and work is not going to be available in the Northwest Territories. Then, what do we do?

As a matter of fact, a few years ago an Indian from Fort Simpson was sent to the technical school in Calgary to take a course in welding. What happened to him? He is back in Fort Simpson. They sent him back to Fort Simpson to weld. There is not enough welding in Fort Simpson to keep this fellow in tea. He does not have to be a welder to go out and trap beaver or muskrat. I just want to impress upon the minister the fact that it is all right to educate these people along vocational lines but there has to be a long-term viewpoint to ensure these people of work once they are educated.

I was rather amused when I looked through three of the reports of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration for the years 1953, 1954, and 1955. Generalizing on conditions in the Northwest Territories, this report had this to say:

> Fur catches were poor and prices very low. As a result, in some localities where caribou and other game was plentiful the Indians did not attempt to catch their fur quotas.

Then the report says how many schools there are in the area and that Indian health was better than average. No serious epidemic occurred during the year and tuberculosis was well under control in the far north and all known cases were hospitalized. They do not say what the department was doing to help the Indians. They do not say what the department was doing to help the Indian make a living.

Then, the 1954 report says:

> The economic condition of the Indians in this area continued to decline owing to the scarcity and low prices of furs. The relief problem was greatly eased, however, by the fact that caribou were available at nearly all points with the exception of Providence, Hay river and Fort Liard. The installation of freezer storage plants at various points in this area contributed in large measure to the reduction of relief costs.
> The fishing activities of the Indians increased over most of the territories and helped considerably to supplement the available food supply. Several attempts were made to interest Indians in commercial fishing, with varying degrees of success.

I will come back to that in a minute. That is about all they said. The general health of the Indian was good, and no serious epidemic occurred in the year. Then, they set out how many schools there were. That is all for 1954.

Then, the report for 1955 had this to say:

> A moderate increase in the price of fur brought some improvement in the economic position of the Indians in the Northwest Territories and many of the Indians took advantage of opportunities to improve their diet through domestic fishing in the numerous lakes in the Mackenzie area.

Mr. Chairman, they have been doing that since the beginning of time, fishing the lakes. Is this new? Is it new to the department of Indian affairs, that they were fishing the lakes.

> A supervised caribou hunt was conducted for the first time in the Yellowknife and Rae areas, in an effort to encourage the Indians to provide food for the summer months and, at the same time, conserve big game by storing in cold storage lockers provided by the branch. The experiment was moderately successful.
> No serious epidemics occurred during the year and thorough chest X-ray coverage was conducted in conjunction with the paying of annuities during the summer months.
> An increasing number of Indians turned from hunting and trapping to other industries, taking seasonal employment in commercial fishing and lumbering industries and in the transportation service.

Commercial fishing, lumbering and transportation service, that is all summer employment. Hunting is for the winter time, but they do that anyhow.

These reports tell what had been going on up there for three years, and except for the fact that the department built freezer or storage plants in various points, that is all that is said about what the department is doing for the native in the Northwest Territories. The department is telling the rest of the country what the native is doing. Everybody knows he is fishing. Everybody knows he is trapping. But they do not know how much money he is getting out of fishing and trapping. I find from the files of the department of northern affairs that the average Indian trapper in the Northwest Territories earns $450 per year. The cost of sugar, for instance in Aklavik or Tuktoyaktuk or any place along the Arctic coast, is $25 per hundred. Flour costs $20 per hundred and tea $1.85 per pound. How far would $450 go? Do not ever get it into your head that these people want relief. I have heard people say oh, when the native gets relief he is not going to work as long as he can get relief. I am telling you that the relief he gets from the department of Indian affairs is not worth the powder to blow it to Hades. I am telling you that if these people thought for one minute they could live on the relief that is handed out to them or if the people down here think that is what they think, then they have another thought coming. These people are interested in working and making a living if they are provided with the work. There is no work in that part of the country.

I hear the people in this part of the country talking about the Indian on the reservation. Those people are living in seventh heaven compared with the Indians in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. The people here talk about the poor Indian on the reserve. The poor Indian on the reserve is what Rockefeller is compared to me in so far as the Indians in the Northwest Territory are concerned. The Indians on the reserves get equipment from the government for agriculture. They get trucks and all sorts of things. In the Northwest Territories, what do they get? There is no provision for work there. If you are destitute or starving we will hand you out 10 pounds of navy beans and a few other little things. Of course, there is no salt to put in the navy beans, and nothing else to put in them, but the department expects the Indian to eat these beans.

It is the responsibility of this government to provide work for the Indians in the Northwest Territories, something like what is being done on the Indian reservations in this country. A few minutes ago I read something about commercial fishing:

> Several attempts were made to interest Indians in commercial fishing with varying degrees of success.

Do you know what the facts are? They take a native out and say, "Now, you are going to go fishing out on the lake through the ice." They move out a little two by four cabin, give him a few nets, and he starts fishing. Then, they leave him there. Mr. Chairman, the Indian has to have leadership. He has to have guidance. They leave him out on the lake to fish, and what happens? After the fellow has perhaps 300 or perhaps 400 pounds of fish out on the ice, a fish buyer comes along with a bottle of rye and $5 and says, "Here is the bottle and I will take the fish." After a couple of days of this the Indian finds there is nothing to eat, so he says, to heck with this, I am going home. He takes off and goes home. What can you expect? What these people need is some guidance, some leadership. If the Indian affairs department is going to help these Indians to set up commercial fishing what it has to do is to hire a man in the country, or from the country, who knows something about Indians, and send him out with them and see that they get a square deal from the fish buyer and that they fish their nets. These people need leadership. Naturally, they need leadership. They are uneducated, Mr. Chairman.

I agree with the hon. member for Yukon who has talked about Indian agents. Instead of the department hiring Indian agents with Ph.D.'s or something else, who would not know a rabbit track from a snowshoe track, let us hire Indian agents who know something about the native Indian, who know something about the bush and who know something about the conditions under which the Indian is living, and let them give those people some leadership. All the trouble cannot be borne by the Indian agent because the department has so many statistics for these fellows to fill in that if they did know the difference between a rabbit track and a snowshoe track they could not get out into the bush to see it. All their time is taken up filling out statistics on births, deaths, family allowances and all the rest of it.

In the Northwest Territories there are two Indian agencies, one at Yellowknife and the other at Fort Norman. These two Indian agencies look after 4,500 Indians. It takes an Indian agent at least six weeks in the summertime just to cover these places, one day at each, to pay treaty money. The agent has not a chance to get out and see the people. But in the same area the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources has game wardens, chief game wardens, mammologists and all the rest of it, looking after game. There is something wrong with the salesmanship in the department of Indian affairs when northern affairs can sell treasury board on a staff of 23 to look after game in the same area in which the department of Indian affairs can sell treasury board on a staff of four to look after human beings, the natives. I am going to make a suggestion to the minister. I suggest to the minister that he go to the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources and have every game warden in the Northern Territories act as Indian agent in the communities they are stationed. These people are living with the Indians. As a matter of fact, some of the game wardens have told me that during the winter time there is not too much for them to do, anyway, and they would gladly go out to Slave Lake to organize the Indians and help them in commercial fishing. They would stay with them; they would gladly do it. I sincerely suggest to the minister that something be done. I do not say that they should build up an empire and have Indian agents all over the place. Why can they not use game wardens who are doing nothing for half the time in the winter. If they did something for the department of Indian affairs it would be a great help.

Of course, I realize that here in Ottawa some of the department heads may not agree with their personnel doing Indian affairs work, but I think they could stand it. I do not think there is anything wrong in it. There are a few other things they could do.

I want to tell a story about a fellow named Slim Semmler up north of Aklavik. A few years ago big Slim decided he was going to ranch mink. He brought in 20 ranch mink and said to the department of northern affairs who, of course, were the bureaucrats in the country, "Now, this is what I propose to do. In the area surrounding me there are native Eskimos", and I am using the word "Eskimos" as an example, but the same can be said of Indians. "If these people were taught how to ranch mink I am sure it would be profitable to them, much more profitable than trapping muskrats."

At the white whale station we have whales. Whale meat can be used to feed the mink and whale oil and muskrats from the trap lines can be used in the spring to strengthen the animals". Well, he received a nice letter from Ottawa. They said, "Well, it sounds like a wonderful idea but we do not think it will work". That is the answer you get every time. Oh, no, they do not think it will work. So, he decided he was going ahead anyway. He purchased two freezers from Norman Wells and shipped them all the way in. He intended to take the whales, crush the bones and all the rest of it and sell to the natives for mink feed and for dog feed. There are 30 tons to 40 tons of dog feed shipped in from Edmonton every year. This fellow was going to make dog feed right there and mink feed and sell it. What did the department of northern affairs say? They said, "Oh, no, you cannot make a profit off the Eskimos". They sent the R.C.M.P. in who said, "Take these freezers out of here". Out went the freezers.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Why?

Mr. Hardie: That is the sort of co-operation that people get when they make suggestions as to what could be done. They do not say it is going to benefit anybody; they say, "Let us try it". But this department is not willing to try any of these ideas. Although I have heard that the department of northern affairs is working on eiderdown up in the eastern Arctic some place.

What about sawmills? I have read reports and I have heard members speaking in this house. I have read speeches made in 1951 or 1952. People have been speaking about sawmills on different Indian reservations. We have not one sawmill in the country. Aklavik is being moved. There is need for millions and millions of feet of lumber. There is going to be need for more lumber than we ever knew of or considered before, but there is not one sawmill in the Northwest Territories owned by the Indians. I sincerely ask the minister to do something about this. Let us spend a few dollars on some equipment, whether it is a sawmill, a whaling industry, a mink ranch, or whatever it is. Let us spend some money and organize these people. Let us do it as on the reserves on a co-operative basis. Let us do something to provide them with work, with a means to make some money to supplement what they receive out of trapping, $450 a year.

There were a lot of things I wanted to say when I rose to my feet. Take the case of natives who are handicapped with deformities. Take the case of a man who cannot get out on a trap line because he is walking around on two crutches. Why can we not do something about that? Why can we not hire these people and use them as interpreters? There is a fellow at Fort Resolution whose name is Louis Tinqui. In my judgment Louis Tinqui is the best Indian interpreter of the Slave, the Dog Ribs or any one of these bands. Louis Tinqui is running around on a pair of crutches. They have supplied him with a canoe, but what good is a canoe if he cannot go through the bush on his crutches? I think people like that should be given some sort of a job with the department. They want to earn their way. They do not want to go to the Indian agent every couple of weeks and ask for the destitute ration. They are not interested in that. They want to earn a living. If we can give them the opportunity to earn a living we will not have to worry about the native Indian being integrated into our so-called civilization.

An hon. Member: "So-called" is good.

Mr. Hardie: It is so-called.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hardie: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for the Yukon and the hon. member for Nanaimo mentioned they were in favour of giving the Indian liquor. Well, I think possibly they should have liquor, but they need a lot more than liquor and the most important thing of all, as I have pointed out a hundred times already, is to provide them with the means of earning a living.

The Tories who run against me in every election in which I have been involved have rushed around the country promising the Indian liquor in return for his vote. "Get his vote and give him the liquor permit, boys". Well, I have never promised them a liquor permit although I am not against their having these permits. I am telling you, however, and I have told these people, the first thing I would fight for was an opportunity for them to make a living.

Mr. Nowlan: Have you succeeded?

Mr. Hardie: I am trying right now and I hope you support me.

An hon. Member: You are doing all right.

Mr. Gillis: You are keeping your promise.

Mr. Hardie: Mr. Chairman, there is another problem that bothers the Indian in the country. When they do get employment with the government, whether it is with the Department of Northern Affairs or the Department of Citizenship and Immigration or some other department, they are not paid in the same manner as civilians who are sent into the country from the outside. For instance, we have Indians who are hired as patrolmen. A patrolman is a very necessary person because usually the government sends in game wardens from Ottawa, Vancouver or Edmonton and they do not know where the Indians are living and they have to have someone to take them around. Therefore we have patrolmen.

The patrolmen are paid $175 a month—perhaps it runs from $150 to $175 or $185 a month—and they are given a cost of living bonus of $60 a month. Now, that sounds pretty good. The game wardens, however, are paid $3,250 per year and $1,500 a year cost of living bonus or $125 a month. The Indian is just as human as the white man and needs as much to eat. The patrolman should have the same amenities as the game warden. Why are they paying the Indian patrolman $60 a month as against the white man's $125? I cannot understand it at all. These people live in the same village and it costs them the same amount to live. As a matter of fact, it costs the Indian more to live than the white man because the white man who is sent in from Ottawa to act as game warden receives $3,250 a year plus $1,500 cost of living bonus, plus a $25,000 house, plus maple furniture, plus fuel oil, plus lights and all the rest of it. What do you think he pays for that? He pays about $28 a month for it. The patrolman, however, is perhaps living in a house with his wife and six kids. The oldest one is perhaps married and has not a home of his own and he may be living in the same house with his wife and all his kids. There are perhaps 12 people or more living in one or two rooms.

This brings me around to the subject of housing. I have heard it said the department of Indian affairs are improving housing conditions for native Indians in the northwest territories. They have improved about two houses in each of these communities. I had a man come to me last fall, a man who had just been released from the hospital after being confined there with tuberculosis for four years. When I was home last year he came to me and told me he was living at Trout Rock, about 40 miles away, where he had a house with a leaking roof. He told me he had asked the Indian agent to give him some roofing for the house but he was refused. I believe the Indian agent told him to come to me about it—yes, I believe he said, "Go over and see your pal Hardie". Apparently I am the Indian agent now. Well, if they want me to be the Indian agent I want to be paid for it. At any rate the fellow was sent to see me.

An hon. Member: Do you want the bonus too?

Mr. Hardie: I went to see the agent. I explained that this man had come out of a sanatorium after three or four years, and found that the roof of his house was leaking. His wife could not repair the house while he was away. The roof had to be fixed and he wanted some roofing, but it is like pulling teeth to get two rolls of roofing out of the Indian agent. Not only is the Indian pulling teeth but I am also trying to pull teeth.

The Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I am obliged to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Thatcher: Mr. Chairman, I want to preface my remarks on this Indian bill by saying that there is not a single Indian in my constituency; nevertheless, I am not too enthusiastic about the legislation which is before us tonight.

As hon. members know, the main purpose of this bill is to increase credit facilities for Indians. I am sure every hon. member in this house will sympathize with the principle of that legislation. I can readily understand, with the Indian population increasing and prices going up, that better credit facilities for Indians are needed. Frankly, however, I am not convinced the legislation which is before us tonight is the best way to give Indians better credit facilities.

I cannot help wondering, Mr. Chairman, if the government is not setting up too many different branches of government for the purpose of loaning money. Earlier today we had a bill which was passed for the purpose of loaning money to farmers. If one wishes to build a house in Canada today the government will loan money under the National Housing Act. It may loan under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, under the Industrial Development Bank Act, under the Veterans' Land Act and so on.

Personally, I think there is a very real danger that with all these government loaning agencies in operation there could be a duplication of effort, and wasted effort. I see no reason whatever why loans made to Indians could not be made under the same facilities we have for making loans to other people in Canada.

During the past year the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration has made many speeches throughout the country, and has spoken about government policy in connection with Indians. If I understood him correctly, the main purpose of government policy is to integrate the Indian into our Canadian way of life.

I am going to suggest tonight that this government policy is a step in the opposite direction, because it continues to keep the Indian in a class apart. It sets up or extends at the expense of the taxpayer, a large administrative machine for the specific purpose of providing credit for Indians which duplicates facilities already in existence for other Canadians. I suggest that this problem could be met much more adequately if instead of bringing forward this legislation, the government took steps to bring the Indian under the provisions of other existing federal acts.

To give one example; why should an Indian wanting to build a home not be able to do so, by taking advantage of the provisions of the National Housing Act. Or if an Indian wishes to purchase a farm, why should he not be able to purchase it under the provisions of the Canadian Farm Loan Act. If an Indian wants to purchase a boat for fishing, why should he not make a loan under the Canadian Fisherman's Loan Act? And so on. Even more important, I think this government should take steps to allow and encourage Indians to take advantage of the benefits offered by our banks, mortgage companies and so on. It may be that the government would have to guarantee the loans, but they have done that in many other cases in the past, and I do not see why they should not do it for Indians.

I repeat that I am in sympathy with the objectives of this legislation, but I feel that the machinery proposed is completely wrong. I submit that the sooner encouragement is given to our Indians to use existing credit facilities when they require loans, the sooner they will join with other Canadians in making a maximum contribution to this nation. I think it is possible for the government to get into the lending business too extensively and therefore I am opposed to this legislation.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, it seems to be that in dealing with the Indian problem it might be considered to be more of a white problem than an Indian problem. That is what I would conclude from some of the comments we have just heard. It is so seldom that we have a chance in this house to deal with matters relating to Indian affairs that there is apt to be a sad misunderstanding of the nature of the problem.

I would assume that the resolution before us will have much wider implications than the extending of credit facilities to the first citizens of Canada. In introducing the resolution this afternoon the minister dealt almost exclusively with that particular part, but he hinted, very vaguely perhaps, that there were to be substantial amendments to the Indian Act. Later on the hon. member for Calgary North dealt with some of the amendments which are proposed, basing his information on the trial run which had been given to the legislation before the conference of representative Indians which was held recently in Ottawa.

I hope that tonight we are to be allowed to speak on the broader aspects of the resolution, namely the contemplated changes or amendments to the Indian Act, or as the resolution puts it, changes in connection with the administration of the act. It was in 1951 that substantial amendments were made to the Indian Act. At that time the department took on a new look. There was a new attitude adopted toward the problem and since that time the minister and officials of the department have been endeavouring to interpret the new approach to the problem in public statements across the country.

They recognize that the essence of the difficulty is the reserve system. Speaker after speaker from the minister down has indicated that if we are going to integrate the Indian population, if we are going to eventually assimilate these first Canadians into the general life of Canada, we must break down the system of segregation which has been growing up since the arrival of the white man in this country. It is generally suggested that the best way to carry out this desegregation program, if I may use that term, the best way to break down the reserve system is by a stepping up of the educational program.

I trust that in the amendments which will be brought in as a result of this resolution, especially those having to do with changes in administration, will permit the minister to give some attention to the difficulties which have arisen in administering the new look and in the educational approach to a solution of the Indian problem. Formerly the emphasis in the department was on residential schools. It seems that both the English and later the Americans when first approaching this difficulty of dealing with the native population already resident on the North American continent, when the white man first arrived, automatically adopted isolation and segregation as a solution. When it became a matter of providing educational facilities the isolationist and segregationist approach was adopted and the emphasis was placed on residential schools.

In carrying out this program the children are removed from the reserve and from parental influence for a few months annually while they attend a residential school. In the summer they return to their homes on the reserves. It was demonstrated by the residential school system that the Indian child was quite capable of adapting himself to the white man's educational program.

However, emphasis on the residential school has aggravated the isolation and has made it quite impossible for the Indian to adapt himself gradually to the wider culture of the white man. It meant that a child having completed the prescribed educational program in a residential school returned to the reserve and was eventually absorbed into the cultural pattern of the reserve. This system was doomed to failure from the beginning because in any society the authority descends from the adult rather than ascends from the child, and there was no hope whatsoever that the child would have any influence upon the cultural pattern of the parents.

Now the department is gradually moving away from the emphasis on residential schools. The new look today is on the establishment of day schools on the reserves. That seems to me to be the beginning of the breakdown in the isolation of the reserve system that has worked against any possible movement towards integration.

The Americans adopted this method as far back as 1926 and have been experimenting with it with a fair degree of success since that time in handling their own native population. The Indians in my constituency have very close blood relations across the border, and it is obvious that the relations living in the United States have made a much more successful and rapid adjustment to the white man's society than their cousins living across the Canadian border.

In our Canadian program, although it has been in effect for only a few years, we are already running into some administrative difficulties. In the day school system on the United States reserves the emphasis is on the educational role. The educational program is comprehensive. It embraces more than the children. In fact, the schools serve more as community centres, rather than performing the basic functions of providing the rudiments of education. There is a very comprehensive adult education program. It is realized that, if you are going to raise the whole level of life on the reserve, you must work with the adult population as well as with the rising generation.

They avoided too the difficulty which is a carry-over from the emphasis on the residential schools. The residential schools had to provide comprehensive religious education for the children, who were removed from parental influences, and religious instruction dependent on the denominational emphasis of the particular school was an integral part of the life of the residential school.

Coming back to the day schools on the reserve, however, the fact that the members of the various reserves are divided in their religious affiliation has caused certain difficulties. There are two reserves in my riding—the Oak river reserve and the Oak lake reserve—and on both these reservations this problem has emerged in connection with the day school programs. If the majority of the population are of the Roman Catholic faith, they want the Roman Catholic religious emphasis in the schools. If, on the other hand, the majority are of the Protestant persuasion, they want the guarantee of a Protestant religious emphasis in the schools.

The situation is precipitating a type of segregation that is perhaps even worse than the former isolation and segregation of the reserves, in that each group wants its own school on the reserve. This produces the unhappy state where you not only have the basic problems of reserve segregation from the normal community but you have the reserve itself divided down the middle on religious grounds. I do not know what the solution is but I hope that in reconsidering some of the problems that have emerged under this new day-school emphasis the minister will find a solution whereby we can break down this most awkward type of segregation.

I have had letters on the problem from the chiefs of both the Oak River reserve and the Oak Lake reserve. I noticed that in the issue of the Brandon Sun of June 8 there is an announcement of the construction of a new school on the Oak River reserve which will supplement the school already in existence in that place. I visited that reserve last summer and I was quite impressed with the type of educational program they had there. It would seem that the appearance of the new school is going to split the reserve on denominational lines. The chief of that particular reserve admits, in a letter I have before me, to the need for religious instruction in the curriculum of the residential schools because of the separation of the children from their parents, but he feels that a closer family integration would be achieved if in the new emphasis in the reserves religious instruction were made the responsibility of the churches and the chapels on the reserve, and also if the responsibility were placed upon the parents of the Indian children.

From statements of the minister that I have been able to gather together, I know that he is aware of this difficulty that any beneficial effect that might be obtained from establishing day schools is going to be negatived if it is going to split the reserves on denominational lines. In a speech before the Young Men's Canadian Club in Toronto on February 1 of this year the minister said he hoped the day will come when Indian schools are abolished completely in favour of the system where all children will sit in the same classrooms. That is an objective that is to be devoutly wished for but, of course, it is a long way off as yet.

An experiment has been going on, on an increasing scale and on a successful basis, I feel, of allowing the children on the reserves to attend the ordinary high schools in the community and mingle with the rest of the population. That is the beginning of the program that the minister announced in his speech before the Young Men's Canadian Club. Education is the solution for decades of segregation; if integration and the breakdown of isolation are going to be eventually achieved, it is going to be through education, and we must avoid the pitfalls that were in the residential school approach to the education of Canada's first citizens.

There is another query I should like to raise at this time arising from the new emphasis in the department. I refer to the attempt to give the Indian wider responsibility in the conduct of his own personal affairs in the community life of the reserve by means of elected councils. This again is an excellent idea. But here the reserves are running into difficulty because the Indians themselves are not quite capable of handling the electoral system. They get the idea that, under the new system, they are to have the absolute say as to what should take place on the reserves. On the other hand, the superintendent or the agent tends to feel that the Indian is not yet capable of looking after his own destiny. Hence, a conflict of interests arises.

This matter, of course, is connected with the question of enfranchisement of the Indian.

I agree wtih the hon. member for Nanaimo that the Indian should be given the vote just as soon as possible. In many cases the Indian in Canada is ready for the vote. It would provide an incentive for his personal development. It would provide a new sense of responsibility that would help to break down the feeling of inferiority that is part of the Indian's personality as a result of long years of discrimination and segregation on the part of the conquering white man.

In dealing with this problem, an educational program must be carried out. The Indian councillor, the Indian chief or the Indian mayor must have closer supervision if he is to handle his own affairs successfully without getting into the difficulties that have already occurred on the reserves in my own area; and I would imagine the same situation obtains on other reserves operating under a similar scheme. I have also run into another difficulty. The Indian chief and his councillors are coming in contact with some of the less savoury aspects of the white man's public affairs. He is encountering petty patronage and such things as preferred lists and so forth. I am constantly receiving complaints that the Indian is being forced to take relief vouchers and to deal with a particular business because it is on the preferred list or because some petty patronage is involved. That is education of the negative kind and I am sure it will not assist our Indians in understanding the true purpose of the democratic process.

Another difficulty that has come to my attention under this new policy of the department is the responsibility for health services. Mr. Chairman, I am getting a signal from the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I suppose this comes under his jurisdiction more than it does that of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, I believe.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is therefore entirely out of order.

Mr. Harkness: You tried that once and it did not work.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, it is hopeless to get anyone to obey the rules.

Mrs. Fairclough: Listen to who is talking.

Mr. Dinsdale: The Indian is being encouraged to leave the reserve and to take on the full rights of citizenship. That is all to the good. On the other hand, he is finding that as soon as he leaves the reserve and incurs any medical expenses he is faced with medical bills of $200 or $300; and any incentive to emancipate himself from the reserve is lost once he is confronted with financial obligations of that kind.

I have negotiated with the department—the department of Indian affairs, as a matter of fact—and I believe they are trying to cope with this difficulty which has arisen unexpectedly under the new policy of the department. In the course of this discussion I should like to know whether any rule has been laid down as to when the Indian becomes responsible for his own medical expenses or when he operates under the system that covered him when he was living on the reserve.

We must realize that there must be a weaning process. You cannot project the Indian into the white man's civilization overnight. He has been living in a world apart for 100 years or so. Suddenly to thrust him into the cold competitive world of the white man is not in the best interests of the emancipation program. The weaning process must be gradual. The Indian, when he gets out into the wider world beyond the reserve, does not have the community supports that the new Canadian has, for example; because there is towards our Indian population a discriminatory attitude that has grown up mainly owing to lack of understanding, mainly owing to stereotypes that have evolved largely because of the fact that the Indian has not been in touch with the white man but has lived apart on the reserve, and the white man has seen him only at such times as he has emerged from the seclusion of the reserve and made a brief contact with the white man's world. It is because of this misunderstanding, Mr. Chairman, that I sometimes feel the problem is more the problem of the white man than that of the Indian.

Speaking just for a moment on this matter of the extension of credit facilities, I should like to say that it would be a fine thing if the Indian could take advantage of the credit facilities that are afforded the ordinary Canadian citizen in connection with farm loans, farm improvement loans and so on. The difficulty is that the Indian does not understand the white man's pecuniary civilization. He has lived in a world apart and he is going to have to be nurtured gradually towards a full position of responsibility as a Canadian citizen. I would certainly support the broadening of credit facilities as announced in the resolution. To repeat once again the broader approach to the problem, I trust that when the legislation is before us, the minister will do something to make amendments in the act and changes in the administration of the act that will deal with some of these difficulties that I have outlined.

Mr. Brown (Brantford): I should like to say a word or two, Mr. Chairman, in support of the resolution before the committee. I am pleased to note that, in particular, the minister in his resolution has moved that the act which will be brought before us will provide, amongst other things, that the Minister of Finance may from time to time advance to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration out of the consolidated revenue fund such sums of money as the minister may require for loans to Indians under section 69 of the act.

Then it goes on to say:

> The total amount of outstanding advances under the said section not to exceed at any one time one million dollars in lieu of three hundred and fifty thousand dollars as at present.

I think the minister is to be congratulated upon bringing forward this resolution at the present time. I am sure also that whatever changes are made in the Indian Act at this time, they will be changes which will be of lasting benefit to the Indian people.

I am very much interested in this subject because adjoining my constituency is one of the largest Indian reservations in this dominion, if not the largest. I refer to the Six Nations reservation. I cannot emphasize too much, Mr. Chairman, the contribution that the Indian people have made to the development of Canada across the years, a contribution that is written in the pages of Canadian history from the beginning of time so far as this country is concerned. I do not think that we can have enough legislation brought forward to give the Indian people the chance to continue to play that part that they have played in our history over the years. Anything that is brought forward that allows the Indian more privileges, that allows the Indian an opportunity to play his part in our national life, is something I would support with all my heart.

I just want to go back a little bit for a few moments to outline what the Indian people have contributed to the culture and history of Canada. In 1783, as you know, Mr. Chairman, the Indian population in the Mohawk valley of the United States, known as the Six Nation Indians, fought on the side of the British crown. They grew to cherish and love British traditions, which we all love, and as a result these people fought on the side of the British crown at that time. When the American revolution was over, and after a promise from Sir Guy Carleton, governor general of Canada, they came in great numbers to settle on the banks of the Grand river in the province of Ontario, where they have resided ever since. A large strip of land along the Grand river from its source to its mouth was deeded to the Indian people of the Six Nations. Most of that land has been sold, but that large reservation still stands and is the balance of the land that is still held by these great and valiant people who settled there following the American revolution.

Following the war of American independence came the war of 1812. I should like to remind the house that during that war there was only a thin line of settlers all the way from Amherstburg to Soulanges. It is true that these settlers stayed loyal to the British crown at that time of stress, but had it not been for the Indian population I am quite certain that our province of Upper Canada would have fallen to the invader. At the time England was involved in European wars and all she had here to protect this part of Ontario, the part in which I reside, was the militia. It was not adequate to meet the invader but the Indians stood to the last man and as a result we were able to hold Upper Canada. We have today, therefore, the province of Ontario, but had it not been for that contribution the Indians made I have my doubts whether that large part of Canada would be on the map of Canada today. What we owe to these Indians who stood under the leadership of Joseph Brant loyally by the crown of England is incalculable. As a result, today we have our Dominion of Canada, of which we are all so proud.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in mentioning that contribution of the Indians, I have to mention my own city of Brantford, named after Captain Joseph Brant, the leader of the Mohawks, the leader of the Six Nations confederacy about which I have spoken. This noble and valiant figure will go down in history as one of the greatest of all Canadians. The point where he settled on the Grand river, and where he crossed the Grand river, was known as Brant's ford, and hence came the name of Brantford. Had it not been for Joseph Brant, there would not be a Brantford on the map of Canada today or a county of Brant.

I know it is sentimental, but as the member for Brantford, I cannot help recalling those acts in those days in dealing with the legislation which we have in front of us today. In the centre of Brantford is a large park called Victoria park and in the centre of that park is a magnificent monument to Joseph Brant. As long as I have lived there and practised law I have passed that monument every day coming to and going from home. Every time I passed that monument I used to think of the contribution that that stalwart figure made to our nation and country.

Various hon. members have spoken of the many contributions of the Indian people. Something has been said of their oratory. I wish we could hear some of that oratory in this house. I have heard some of it in the English language. They are orators in the English tongue as well as in their own tongue. I feel that the contribution they have made to Canada has not come to fruition by any means. I am certain the day will come when they will play the part that they played of old in the history of Canada. Back in the history of the Six Nations confederacy is the figure of Deganawida. He united the six warlike tribes of the Mohawk valley, who had spent all their time at war with each other. He conceived the idea that they could sit down and discuss their problems, smoke the pipe of peace and arrive at a solution of some of these problems and live in mutual peace instead of destroying each other. Out of that concept today we have the United Nations. There have been several authors who have drawn a comparison between what Deganawida said in his day and what has been done during the last few years under the United Nations. That comparison has been made many times and it cannot be made too often. Something also has been said about the vote being given to Indians. I remember last year I put a motion on the order paper to the effect that the federal vote be extended to Indians. I still feel that the day is coming when that vote will be given with no strings attached, Mr. Chairman. I would like to see the Indians be allowed to preserve all the rights they have under treaties and otherwise of the past and at the same time be accorded the vote if they wished to exercise it so that they could have some say in the affairs of our country.

I know the day will come when there will be Indians sitting in this House of Commons and in the Senate of Canada. I look forward to that day and I know it will come. I know it cannot be brought in under this bill but I think it will come.

May I also speak just for a moment about the contribution that Indians make to our national life in the line of athletics? They are supple, active and fleet. I know that over the years they are going to play a larger part in that field and make Canada proud of the contribution of her first citizens to our national life.

In speaking of the Indians, again I should like to remind the committee of the contribution the Indian people have made since 1812. It did not end there. In the war of 1914-18 and in world war II the Indians of the Six Nations confederacy gave their all for what our country stood for and to what we were committed in those two great wars. Everyone knows that. As a result of all those things, certainly I should like to see them get the federal vote some day, and I am sure they will. I am glad to see that at least in this bill a considerable amount of money, more money than has been available heretofore, will be made available to Indians.

Everybody in Canada needs credit. We are all living on credit. I do not know what a great many members in this house, including myself, would do if we were not able to have credit facilities. In order for the Indian people to play their part they need credit facilities. I am delighted that at least this item is to be included in the bill. I am sure the other provisions will be matters which will enable Indians to play a more important part in the life of this country than they have ever played before. Whatever their rights are, I should like to see them have the same rights as other Canadians.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I have spoken of the contribution of the Indian people in wars, but I should like to see that contribution given in time of peace and it will be given under the enlightened legislation that is beginning to come forward. The present minister has shown a great understanding of the questions involving Indians, particularly in my part of the country, and, as a result of that, I am sure that from time to time we shall have more changes in the Indian Act which will enable the Indian people to continue to play the part which they have played and which I outlined at the beginning. I long for the day when we can sit together with our brothers, the Indian people, and discuss our mutual problems under their great tree of peace.

Mr. Campbell: Mr. Chairman, there is a significant difference in the debate that takes place in this house regarding the Indian problem and many other debates. It is significant because probably all of the hon. members who have spoken on this problem are really trying to do something to help the Indians of this country. I have said that this is the greatest human problem that we have in Canada. That problem is intensified in some districts more than in others. In almost every area of Canada the problem is different.

I listened with interest to the hon. member for Brantford, who has just taken his seat. I am quite sure in my own mind that when he speaks on Indian affairs he does so from his heart. I spent a couple of days on the Six Nations reserve a few years ago and I had a very hearty welcome. I found that the Indians in that particular area were very much advanced over the Indians in my constituency. There are 10 Indian reserves in my constituency and I make it a point to visit them periodically. I think that before anybody speaks in this house on Indian affairs he should spend a little time and acquaint himself with some of the problems before he rises in the House of Commons and opposes legislation brought in with the idea of helping the Indians.

I have said that the problems are different in different areas. This afternoon and tonight we heard from several members from different sections of the country where the problems are different. In my constituency I am interested in three things. I am interested in this legislation because it is going to give some help to the Indians to provide themselves with homes, with farm machinery and with necessities. At least, that is my hope. I would like to see something further done when loans are made. I am not one who wants to see money thrown down the ditch. When loans are made to Indians for farm machinery some provision should be made to give those Indians some understanding of how to take care of those machines. Machinery costs money today. It is a mistake to give an Indian or anybody else a $3,000 or $4,000 tractor if he does not know how to take care of it.

Last year I made two suggestions. My first suggestion was that something should be done along those lines to give our Indians on reserves an opportunity to learn how to take care of farm machinery, trucks, and so on. My second suggestion was that something should be done to teach them how to build houses. I sometimes think that if a man like John Fisher, that great Canadian, could travel through Canada for a couple of months visiting our Indian reserves, or some other newspapermen who were good story tellers, and tell the people of Canada just what the problem is on the Indian reserves, it would help build up public opinion so that we would not hear carping criticism of expenditures made for the purpose of helping our Indians. I would like to take the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre through my constituency and show him some of the houses or hovels in which our Indians live. A lot of people would not keep their dogs in there, and I am sure a lot of race horse men would not keep their race horses in the kind of buildings our Indians are living in. I think it is a disgrace. Every time I go to my reserves I come back feeling sad, and when I come down here I want to try to get the minister and the department to move more rapidly. The more I see of life on the reserves the more I realize that it is not an easy problem. He would be a wise man who would suggest for a minute that he could solve all the problems.

I offered last year to co-operate to the fullest extent with the minister in trying to get some things done. I know there are opportunities being lost on many of the reserves because advantage of those opportunities has not been taken. I know there are some reserves that have a lot of good agricultural land which is not being used. Other reserves have good timber on them and the timber could be sawed up and made into lumber to help provide homes. I think the Indians should be encouraged to do for themselves. I have perhaps made some enemies amongst the Indians because when I have gone up to see them I have said, "You cannot expect the government to do everything. You people have to do your own share and accept some of the responsibility. You have to develop an interest in bettering your own condition and if you will do that you will receive assistance from the government. If the government gives you a few cattle and you let them starve to death you will not receive any more help. You have to do your share." I think all of us should be talking to the Indians in that manner and not just going amongst them trying to stir up trouble for the department.

As I said before, the houses in my constituency are in such a bad condition most people would not keep their dogs in them. I think it is a shame in a great country like this that we cannot move forward a little faster than we are. I know it is a serious problem and the problem is not always helped by the Indians themselves. When the bill comes down I will have more to say.

When the amendments to the act come down I hope we will find that something is being done for the younger generation. I think a lot of the older Indians are fixed in their ways and there is not much hope of getting them out of the rut they are in. I feel sorry when I see dozens of young men and women coming to our towns and villages looking for work. When the white men ask them what they can do, the work they can mention is limited. Some of them are learning to drive trucks but frequently they cannot handle a combine. Some of them are slowly beginning to learn how to do various jobs. I think something must be done to teach the young people how to earn a living. That is one of the biggest jobs confronting the minister. I have assured him before and I will assure him now that he will have my full co-operation in any measures he undertakes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I want to take only about two minutes. On the one subject that is specifically mentioned in the resolution I think I can say that every member of the committee who has spoken so far has been in agreement with it except the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre who felt it was unnecessary to have these credit facilities because there are all sorts of credit facilities available to other Canadians. On that point I would like to say, as I am sure most members of the committee are aware, it is not possible for Indians to hypothecate their property and it is not possible to seize the property of Indians in payment of debts, as is the case with other people. That is the reason and the only reason why some arrangement for credit to Indians has to be made as long as they have this special status.

I want to mention just one other thing. While I do not want to do anything that suggests cutting off any hon. member who wishes to speak, I wonder if it would be possible for those members of the committee who still wish to speak to make their speeches fairly short because we will have lots of time on second reading. There will be no—

Mr. Knowles: Closure?

Mr. Pickersgill: There will be no closure on second reading or in the committee when the whole bill will be before us. At that time it will be possible for hon. members to address their speeches more directly to the bill. I want to set that example at this time. I have listened to everything that has been said. I will confine my remarks to this statement and try to reply to the other points when second reading comes up.

Mr. Charlton: Mr. Chairman, judging from what the minister has said one would assume there is not to be any closure on this bill. If he had given that assurance earlier we might not have taken so much time on the resolution but we were fearful that closure might be brought forward and we wanted to say what we could at the resolution stage.

Mr. Knowles: The minister has a reputation.

Mr. Charlton: Mr. Chairman, I want first of all to commend the hon. member for Brantford on his excellent speech with regard to the Six Nations Indians. I agree with most of what he said. I made similar statements in the House of Commons before regarding the place the Indians have held in the history of this great nation. This is a thing very few people realize unless they are living in close contact with an Indian reservation and have an opportunity of hearing some of the talks that are given by Indian historians. We have some very good ones around Brantford and I have listened to them on many occasions.

I want to add one comment to what the hon. member for Brantford has said. I heard a comment recently which was very impressive. It came to my attention that the school system on the Indian reservation at Brantford is one of the best in any township across the Dominion of Canada. It would put many townships to shame. In addition to that, the percentage of children attending secondary schools in Tuscarora township is higher than any surrounding township in the district. That is a matter which I think should be known. I understand that is the case although I have no definite proof that it is.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in relation to what is contained in this resolution I think it should have been done long ago. After listening to the hon. member for Brantford it was brought forcibly to mind that we have treated the Indians in this country in a disgraceful way, particularly when one considers what they have done for us. I think most people in Canada will agree with that. Whether or not this government is finally going to do more for the Indians still remains to be seen. Certainly nothing was done under the last revision of the Indian Act. We cannot speak about the measures coming forward in this act because we do not know what they will accomplish, but judging from some of the things we have heard I assume the minister himself is seeking more control.

As I said yesterday with regard to another bill, this disease seems to be highly infectious. One minister after another comes before parliament and asks for greater control and power in his own department, taking the power away from the governor in council and placing it in the hands of the minister himself. It is not a laughing matter, Mr. Chairman.

An hon. Member: The minister thinks so.

Mr. Charlton: I see the minister is laughing; he thinks it is a big joke, but for those who have to tolerate that sort of legislation I can assure him they do not appreciate it.

There has been a veil of secrecy concerning the number of meetings held with regard to the proposed changes in this act. I would like to ask the minister several questions at this time. At how many meetings were delegates from the Six Nations reservation in attendance? Did they know of all the meetings that were held? If not, why not? I understand there were two meetings held about which the Six Nations group did not know anything, and that, of course, did not increase their feeling of good will toward the government. Instead, it only increased their suspicion toward what is being done by this government.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. member like an answer to that question now?

Mr. Charlton: Yes, of course.

Mr. Pickersgill: There was only one meeting held. It was held with representatives of Indians from all over Canada in the month of December. That was the only meeting at which the proposed amendments to the act were discussed with the Indians.

Mr. Charlton: That is the only meeting at which these proposed changes were brought forward. Have there been any other meetings regarding the Indian Act or Indian administration?

Mr. Pickersgill: There are meetings all the time all over the country.

Mr. Charlton: Have the Six Nations Indians always been represented?

Mr. Pickersgill: Not at the ones in British Columbia.

Mr. Charlton: There are no Six Nations Indians in British Columbia.

Mr. Pickersgill: There has been only one national meeting.

Mr. Charlton: The Six Nations were or were not represented?

Mr. Pickersgill: They were represented and very ably represented.

Mr. Charlton: If they were represented I would say that they would be very ably represented. Did they agree to the changes in the act that are being brought forward?

Mr. Pickersgill: I think that is something about which the Indians should be allowed to speak for themselves, but I had the impression that they agreed. However, I do not like to speak for other people.

Mr. Charlton: That is not the story I got. We will let that go for the moment. The minister made a speech before the Canadian Club here in Ottawa on March 28, and in the last paragraph on page 4 he is reported to have said:

> Under the present Indian Act it is possible for an Indian to retain his status as an Indian and to secure the vote in federal elections.

That is all the minister said about it. The minister did not go on to explain what they had to do, he just said that under this act it was possible. Yes, it is possible if they give up their rights to income tax exemption. That is the string attached to it. Surely we are not so small that we will not give the Indian, after hearing what the hon. member for Brantford had to say, a vote in federal elections. They have to pay all the taxes which other people pay except on land in the reservation and income tax on earnings made on the reservation. They pay every tax that anyone else pays, and yet they do not vote. Then on page 20 the minister is reported as having said:

> The status of these Indians who do not live on the reserve and who are not yet enfranchised is, in many ways, similar to the status of immigrants who have not yet become citizens, and we are doing all we can, all the time, to encourage these Indians to accept the full responsibilities of citizenship whenever they seem able to do so.

In another place the minister referred to the Indians as being citizens with a difference. Yes, I would say there was a difference. In some cases a person may come to this country and in five years have the vote, and it may be only one year for others if they apply for citizenship, but for the Indians it has been many, many years and they still have not the vote. The minister calls them citizens with a difference. Yes, there is a difference all right.

These first citizens of this land have fought consistently for Canada. They fought for the British crown through two world wars, or through three wars if we count the war of 1812. Still the minister refers to them as citizens with a difference.

As I understand it, the government has a trust fund of over $1 million in connection with the Indian reservation at Brantford. Can those Indians get any of that money? It is almost impossible for them to get any. The matter has to go before the band council and be approved unanimously by the council; it has to be sanctioned by the Indian agent and then the minister must sanction it before they can get any money. Yet it is their own money.

It has been said on various occasions that it is the desire to give Indians more responsibility. The Six Nations Indians at Brantford have accepted a great deal of responsibility. They would be prepared to accept a great deal more. However, if the government expects them to become ordinary citizens and takes away all the rights they have now, takes away their reserves which they have now, then they do not want to become citizens. As the hon. member for Brantford mentioned, this reserve once extended from the mouth of the Grand river to its source, six miles on either side. I live in that district. Thousands and thousands of acres of that land were given away practically for a mere song and the reservation is now down to its present size. They have the largest reservation in Canada with the greatest population, and that reservation is dear to them. It is a haven for them.

I hope that this government or any other government will never say to the Indians of Brantford that they cannot retain that reserve. Some mention was made of splitting it up and making it possible for whites to go in and buy land. The minister shakes his head but that has been mentioned several times.

Mr. Pickersgill: It has never been mentioned by me.

Mr. Charlton: Maybe not by the minister, but he is not the only one in the government who mentions things about Indians. As I say, it has been mentioned.

Mr. Philpott: By your colleague, the hon. member for Brandon-Souris.

Mr. Charlton: I did not hear him. If he did mention that I did not hear him.

Mr. Philpott: He was in favour of breaking up the reservation system.

Mr. Charlton: I did not understand him that way. They are entitled to break up their reservations if they want to according to the provisions of the new act. If they want to do away with their reservations and become enfranchised as a body, that is their right, but certainly it should not be forced upon them in any way.

Progress reported.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

INCLUSION OF SPEECHES MADE AT THE REOPENING OF THE LIBRARY IN PROCEEDINGS OF TODAY

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the house I should like to revert to motions and to ask the hon. Leader of the Opposition if he would second a motion that the speeches made at the reopening of the library be printed as an appendix to the Hansard report.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I shall be very happy to agree.

Mr. Speaker: Has the right hon. gentleman leave to revert to motions at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I beg to move, seconded by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew):

> That the address of His Excellency the Governor General, delivered this day upon the occasion of the reopening of the library of parliament, together with the related speeches of the hon. the Speakers of both houses of parliament and the hon. the Minister of Public Works, be included in the House of Commons debates of this day, and form part of the permanent records of this parliament.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Tomorrow we will take up defence estimates.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

APPENDIX

The UNVEILING OF THE MEMORIAL PLAQUES at the
REOPENING OF THE LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT on
Tuesday, June 19, 1956

Address of His Excellency the Governor General and speeches of the Honourable Wishart McL. Robertson, Speaker of the Senate, the Honourable L. René Beaudoin, Speaker of the House of Commons, and the Honourable Robert H. Winters, Minister of Public Works.

Hon. Wishart McL. Robertson (Speaker of the Senate): Your Excellency, Mr. Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker of the House of Commons, ladies and gentlemen: The object of this gathering is to be present at and participate in the official reopening of the library of parliament. His Excellency the Governor General has graciously consented to officiate at the reopening of the library and the unveiling of the plaques. The English version of the plaque is as follows:—

Library of Parliament

This building, begun in 1860 and completed in 1876 was opened in February 28, 1876, by the Earl of Dufferin, Governor General of Canada. It survived the great fire which destroyed the parliament buildings in February 1916, but was severely damaged by fire in August 1952. After restoration it was reopened on June 19, 1956, by the Right Honourable Vincent Massey, Governor General of Canada.

(Translation):

Hon. L. René Beaudoin (Speaker of the House of Commons): Your Excellency, Mr. Speaker of the Senate, Mr. Prime Minister, ladies and gentlemen: We are gathered here today to witness the reopening of our library.

To preside over such an important ceremony, it was fitting that we should invite that personage who symbolizes parliamentary authority. On your behalf and on behalf of the members of the joint library committee, I am happy to thank His Excellency for having so graciously accepted our invitation.

Certain historical notes concerning our library have been transcribed on a plaque commemorating today's solemn event. The inscription reads as follows:

Library of Parliament

This building, begun in 1860 and completed in 1876 was opened in February 28, 1876, by the Earl of Dufferin, Governor General of Canada. It survived the great fire which destroyed the parliament buildings in February 1916, but was severely damaged by fire in August 1952. After restoration it was reopened on June 19, 1956, by the Right Honourable Vincent Massey, Governor General of Canada.

From August 1952 until today our librarians and their assistants, in spite of the difficulties and inconveniences of temporary quarters, have managed to provide us with the valuable help to which we had for so long become accustomed on their part.

I am happy, on your behalf, to pay tribute to their devotion and to thank them for their loyal services.

While restoration work was in progress, the library was entrusted to the care of the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) who is now pleased to let us resume its use and possession. I congratulate him and thank him for a magnificent achievement on behalf of parliament, and now invite him to address us.

(Text):

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Your Excellency, Mr. Prime Minister, honourable Speakers, ladies and gentlemen: The interest of the Department of Public Works in the library of parliament goes back as far as 1859, when the erection of the parliament buildings was approved. Thanks to the foresight of the architects and the contractor, several steel fire doors were installed in the library when it was built. It was prompt closure of one of these doors that saved the historic building from serious damage, if not total loss, during the disastrous fire of February 3, 1916, which destroyed the centre block.

The second fire, which occurred on August 4, 1952, dealt this historic structure a heavier blow. You know the story of that day—how many thousands of books had to be moved quickly and dried to minimize the damage by water and smoke. Following the immediate investigation into the cause and extent of the fire, the Department of Public Works undertook the removal of everything inside the building and immediately started planning rehabilitation.

This, it subsequently turned out, involved a great deal more than replacement of charred timbers and redecoration of smoke-fumed walls and ceilings. It was discovered that in order to ensure greater protection against further disasters, the entire interior of the building would have to be rebuilt using fire protection methods and materials. One thing led to another and what was first estimated to be a $1 million project came to involve an expenditure of approximately $2½ million. This is usually the case when large-scale renovations of old buildings are undertaken. But today we see the worth-while results of that expenditure. I am grateful to those members of the press who have conducted their own investigations and reported so favourably upon the quality of the work that has been done. This is one of the rewards for painstaking efforts to rehabilitate the library of parliament, to maintain the integrity of design and the ideas which were in the minds of the original architects and builders.

Canadians today are deeply aware of the value of our historic relics, and I am pleased that the Department of Public Works was able to play a role in restoring this fine old structure to the point where you can see it here today, faithfully reproduced, true and unaltered, but strengthened to endure the ravages of accident and time.

Of course it is not yet fully finished. In due course, for example, you will see better and more appropriate furniture in its main reading room. Other finishing touches need to be added, but in the meantime it gives me great pleasure, on behalf of the Department of Public Works, the architects and builders, the prime contractors, the subcontractors and all who have laboured so carefully and efficiently, to turn over to your care again, Messrs. Speakers, this beautiful and beloved old library of parliament so that it may render further service to the people of Canada.

Hon. L. René Beaudoin (Speaker of the House of Commons): Ladies and gentlemen, His Excellency the Governor General of Canada.

Right Hon. Vincent Massey (Governor General of Canada): Mr. Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker of the Senate, Mr. Speaker of the House of Commons, Mr. Winters, ladies and gentlemen:

I greatly appreciate the privilege you have given me this afternoon. This is a very important event for all of us, the restoration and reopening of this historic building. It is easy to build a new structure, but it takes faith and courage and a true feeling for the past to treasure and restore an old one such as this. It is not what the architects of today would design for a modern library. It is not streamlined. It is not functional. It has no new look, but it has a very good old look. It is the kind of library that our founding fathers were proud to set on this hill, which was to be the scene of a nation's deliberations.

(Translation):

The library of parliament is but one of that large number of institutions which illustrate so well the bilingual character of this country. Among these innumerable works, covering such a wide variety of subjects, there are many which relate, in both our official languages, the history of our nation.

This library, used by representatives of French and English Canada, constitutes, as it were, an official link between Canadians of differing languages. Within its walls, it assembles works which bear upon every aspect of our Canadian life.

We are happy to note that it has been perfectly restored and that it is once more capable of performing, on behalf of our country, the important service expected of it.

(Text):

This library is a Victorian building. Old Ottawa, what is left of it, is a Victorian city. Its architecture expresses many of the qualities of that great era, and reflects a romantic feeling for the past. Such buildings should not, of course, be reproduced or imitated, but when surviving examples are preserved, they give us precious links with our beginnings.

This institution has had a chequered history; legislative libraries in Canada seem often to have had troubled careers. Two were burned, one at York in 1813 as a result of invasion, and the other at Montreal in the riots of 1849. As we have been reminded, this building was menaced dangerously by the great fire of 1916, but it was saved, as we have been told, by a prompt decision on the part of one of the staff when he closed the steel doors without a moment's warning, and as several members of parliament were at the time in the library, they found themselves, to their surprise, locked in with the books. All were equally safe.

This library was opened in 1876 by one of my predecessors, Lord Dufferin. In the intervening eighty years its services have been of immeasurable importance, and we owe much to the men who have directed its work. Many of these have not been only the custodians of books, but the lovers of books. Some indeed, by their own effort, have contributed ably to our national literature.

I hope that this day will mark the reinvigoration of a great national institution. To those who have been concerned in its restoration, and to the staff who will again carry on in these precincts their invaluable but onerous work, I offer my warmest congratulations and best wishes.

I now have much pleasure in declaring the library of parliament officially reopened.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, June 20, 1956

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TUNISIA AND MOROCCO—RECOGNITION BY CANADA

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform the house that after careful consideration the government came to the conclusion that we should recognize the emergence to independent status of Tunisia and Morocco. I dispatched last night messages of felicitations and good wishes to the prime ministers of these two new independent states. I should like to lay on the table copies of those messages.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask if that indicates that the government contemplates the exchange of diplomatic representatives?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): No, Mr. Speaker, not at this time. It was merely a recognition of the fact that these two new states have now independent status.

MOTION FOR PAPERS

C.B.C.—T.V. AND RADIO NEWS PROGRAMS

Motion No. 83—Mr. Reinke:

For a written copy of all C.B.C. news telecasts and radio news broadcasts, referring to the proceedings in the House of Commons and the Senate, during the period from May 8, 1956 to June 8, 1956.

COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE

REQUEST FOR MEETING IN OTTAWA LATER THIS YEAR

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister extend an invitation to the other commonwealth prime ministers meeting in London to attend a conference in Ottawa later this year to discuss trade and economic relationships within the commonwealth?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I understand there is apt to be a discussion of the question as to whether the prime ministers' conference should continue always to be held in London or whether there should be a change made in that respect. No consideration has been given to the calling of a special conference of commonwealth representatives to discuss economic problems. It may be a question that will arise in the course of our discussions and if it does I shall be glad to report to the house when I return.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact the statement has been made that this conference is not to cover trade and economic questions, may I ask the Prime Minister whether he will raise this question and seek the concurrence of the prime ministers of the other commonwealth countries in a conference to discuss these vitally important questions?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): The questions are certainly important, but very serious consideration will have to be given to the suggestion made by the Leader of the Opposition.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

BRITISH COLUMBIA—INQUIRY AS TO ROUTE BETWEEN MOUNT EISENHOWER AND REVELSTOKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. In view of the general public interest in British Columbia in the route to be followed by the trans-Canada highway between Mount Eisenhower and Revelstoke, can the minister inform the house whether he has received word of a final decision in this respect from the minister of highways for British Columbia?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, in a letter dated June 12 the minister of highways of British Columbia submitted a new schedule A which defined that part of the route as proceeding from the west boundary of Yoho park, approximately 17 miles east of Golden, then northwesterly following the Columbia river basin to Beaver river, thence in a southwesterly direction to the east boundary of Glacier national park, thence southwesterly through the said park to the east boundary thereof—that I understand to be the west boundary, but the letter says "east boundary" —thence continuing westerly to the east boundary of Revelstoke park, thence either through the park or south of the park to Revelstoke. That, I understand, Mr. Speaker, is the Rogers pass.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

EXTENSION TO CANADIANS WORKING ON UNITED STATES BASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. Fraser (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour, of which I have given him notice. In view of a recent item in the St. John's Daily News which indicates a possibility of the extension of unemployment insurance coverage to Canadian, including, of course, Newfoundland, workers directly employed by the United States government on the United States bases in Newfoundland, can the minister now give the house any further information on this subject?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): For quite a long time members from Newfoundland have brought to my attention the importance of this matter. That also applies to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. We have spent a long time trying to get something done about it, and I am glad to be able to report that something has been done, which is as follows: Arrangements have now been concluded with the United States government for the insuring of all Canadian civilian personnel employed in Canada by the United States armed forces commencing July 1, 1956. Under the agreement, the expression "Canadian employees" of the United States armed forces includes all residents of Canada whether or not they are Canadian citizens, provided they are not insured under any unemployment insurance law of the United States in respect of the same employment. We are already in touch with the appropriate officers of the United States armed forces and have supplied them with full information and instructions with regard to registration and payment of contributions.

I should point out, as is indicated in my statement, that this applies to all parts of Canada as well as to Newfoundland and I should like to acknowledge the good cooperation of the department of the Secretary of State for External Affairs in helping to bring this about.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

KAMLOOPS, B.C.—FIRE-FIGHTING PERSONNEL AT ORDNANCE DEPOT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence if he can tell me whether it has been decided to discontinue the services of fire-fighting personnel at No. 37 ordnance ammunition depot at Kamloops? If so, can the minister give the assurance that implementation of this decision will be held up so that the whole matter can be reviewed while representations that have been made and the safety of the residents of the area concerned are further considered?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for mentioning this matter to me a day or two ago. I have looked into the situation and according to the advice I have received there is a permanent staff of five civilian watchmen at No. 37 ammunition depot at Kamloops. They are all well trained in fire prevention methods as laid down by the Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps regulations. In addition, of course, the navy has a fire-fighting detachment on the other side of Kamloops which is on duty in three shifts 24 hours a day and is therefore always available.

I think probably what the hon. member refers to is that recently there was a fairly large amount of ammunition supplies being transferred to the depot at Rayleigh. A number of civilians were engaged on a temporary basis to assist in this movement and to ensure safe handling. They were classified as watchmen or firefighters. When the transfer was complete they were released. An on the spot survey was made by the army establishment committee who were satisfied that the permanent staff of five civilian watchmen at No. 37 depot is adequate.

Mr. Fulton: I would like to ask the Minister of National Defence a supplementary question. Can the minister tell me whether the magazines of the former No. 37 depot are to be left empty and whether all the ammunition has been transferred to Rayleigh, or am I right in my understanding now that large quantities of ammunition are to remain in storage in the magazines at the former depot? It is on that basis that the information came to me and my question was asked. I understand that the residents of the area are concerned because it appears that the ammunition will be left in storage with a very skeleton, and what is regarded as a most inadequate, fire guard.

Mr. Campney: Well, Mr. Speaker, as I said in answering the first question asked by the hon. member, the situation has already been reviewed. As it is now, it is my understanding that some ammunition will remain in No. 37 depot. It is also my understanding that after reviewing all the circumstances the establishment committee felt that five trained watchmen in charge of No. 37 depot were adequate.

BUTTER

INQUIRY AS TO SALE TO DISTRIBUTORS IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert McCubbin (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe asked a question of the Prime Minister. The question is as follows:

. . . I should like to ask the Prime Minister if a large quantity of 1955 surplus butter has been sold to large distributors in Canada at much less than the cost price to the government.

The Prime Minister at that time said a reply would be forthcoming and I would like to make a short statement on this subject.

The agricultural prices support board has followed their usual procedure of replacing part of their butter inventory at May 1 with butter of current make. This has been done annually for several years and although the amount sold is an average amount, it is somewhat larger than that sold last year.

All purchasers of government-owned butter during the past winter were given an opportunity to purchase 1955 butter and over 40 creameries and distributors across Canada did so.

A reduction of 2 cents per pound from the purchase price was necessary to cover costs of making this butter available to the retail trade in consumer-sized packages.

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture how many pounds of butter were sold at 2 cents less per pound?

Mr. McCubbin: Mr. Speaker, in the neighbourhood of 25 million pounds.

Mr. Rowe: Will the benefit of the 2 cents per pound less than the original cost price be passed on to the consumer, to say nothing of the storage charges? Have you any assurance of that?

Mr. McCubbin: I hope so.

Mr. Rowe: You hope so but you cannot give any assurance of that.

INQUIRY AS TO REGULATIONS RESPECTING SALE TO DISTRIBUTORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Roland Michener (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, referring to the sale of 25 million pounds of 1955 butter from storage, can the parliamentary assistant say whether there is any requirement upon the retail trade, in selling that butter, to indicate that it is 1955 butter? Is there any difference in quality between 1955 butter and fresh butter?

Mr. Robert McCubbin (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, there certainly is a difference, as fresh butter is always a little better than butter which has been made for a year. We have followed this policy for several years of changing old butter for new. It costs money to take a 56-pound box of butter and remake it into pound prints, and the cost will be over 58 cents before it is ready to sell to the trade.

Mr. Michener: My question was whether there was any requirement upon the trade to indicate that this butter is 1955 storage butter and not fresh butter?

Mr. McCubbin: I understand there is, yes.

Mr. Michener: Must the packages be marked as such?

Mr. McCubbin: It is rather difficult for me to go into that. I do not wish to enter into a discussion of what are the trade practices of different stores, but there is no doubt that a reputable store is not going to sell fresh butter for older butter.

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: You had "butter" restate that.

Mr. Michener: I am sure they will do the opposite. Perhaps the parliamentary assistant should take this as notice and let us know tomorrow how it is being sold.

GRAIN

WHEAT—INQUIRY AS TO POSITION WITH RESPECT TO QUOTAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is the minister now in a position to say what proportion of grain delivery points will be on a 6-bushel quota by the end of this month, which is now only 10 days away? Further, what maximum quota will be in effect during the month of July?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I would want notice of that question. A forecast for 10 days from now is quite a forecast. A move is being made to open up the 8-bushel quota. One railroad is well ahead of the other in grain movement; the Canadian National have moved a greater proportion of grain from its lines than has the Canadian Pacific. In order to keep both railroads busy and to equalize delivery opportunities some opening up of delivery points is going to be made; that is, points on the Canadian National will be made available to producers on the Canadian Pacific where less favourable delivery opportunities exist. The 8-bushel quota is to be opened up at certain points. Deliveries as a whole are well ahead of last year as of this date. I would assume that by August 1 there will be an average delivery of around 8 bushels but whether all points can be brought up to the 8-bushel quota is questionable.

HEALTH INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO PARTICIPATION BY PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has the minister anything further to report in the matter of replies from the provinces with respect to the federal government's proposals for hospital insurance? Has he heard from any other province than British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott) asked me a similar question the other day and I indicated the provinces that had already accepted the proposal made by the federal government. I indicated also that I had hopes that the other provinces would be able to give an expression of their views as quickly as possible. I am glad my hon. friend shares the view of the government that there should be no unnecessary delay in this matter.

Mr. Knowles: But you have been delaying for 37 years.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, in view of what the Minister of National Health and Welfare has just said, that three provinces have accepted the proposals, may I point out that in answering a similar question two days ago he said that they had accepted in principle. Are we to infer from that that there has been some further communication?

Mr. Martin: No, there has been no further communication and there is no need for my explaining what I said because the three provinces in question have accepted the proposal put forward by the federal government for a scheme of hospital insurance in Canada.

Mr. Fleming: In full detail? Is that the meaning of what the minister said?

Mr. Martin: If there is anything my hon. friend can do to hasten action by the other provinces I hope he will do it.

Mr. Fleming: What does "acceptance in principle" mean?

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Defence services—

235. To provide for the Canadian forces, the defence research board and other expenditures relating to defence, including contributions toward the military costs of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization; to authorize expenditures in the current year out of the amount hereby provided, not exceeding $143,000,000, under the provisions of section 3 of the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, and to provide that, notwithstanding subsection (3) of that section, where equipment or supplies are transferred, the estimated present value thereof shall be credited to this vote instead of being paid into the special account mentioned in the said subsection (3), and when so credited may be expended for the purposes of the Canadian forces; and notwithstanding section 30 of the Financial Administration Act to authorize total commitments for the foregoing purposes of $3,470,423,461 regardless of the year in which such commitments will come in course of payment (of which it is estimated that $1,675,484,744 will come due for payment in future years), $1,722,797,717.

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): In this committee each year it is our serious responsibility to concern ourselves with the proper level and disposition of Canada's defence program, but before proceeding with that task this afternoon I feel we might pause a few moments to remember that our defence depends in the final analysis on the Canadian serviceman individually and on his resolution and courage. In this one-hundredth year since the Victoria Cross was instituted, I know that the thoughts of Canadians everywhere will be with the holders of the coveted decoration and their immediate relatives as they now journey from Canada to England to take part in the centennial celebrations.

We are proud that two distinguished members of this house, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) and the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Pearkes), are numbered among this valiant company. They leave, I believe, tomorrow morning for England to attend the Victoria Cross centenary, and I am sure that every member of this committee will join me in wishing godspeed to them and to all other Canadian holders of the Victoria Cross who are journeying to England upon this important occasion.

A year ago, when I opened my remarks on the defence estimates, I did so by referring to the profound effect that nuclear weapons and fast, far-ranging jet bombers to carry them were having on all our thinking about defence. This, again, must be my opening thought today.

It is now 11 years since the first atomic explosion marked a new departure in warfare—more startling perhaps than any other since gunpowder first came into use some 700 years ago. And then, almost before we could begin fully to comprehend the terrifying possibilities of atomic weapons, the H-bomb added a vastly more far-reaching formidable dimension of terror and destruction —so comprehensive indeed that we cannot yet begin to assess its full magnitude.

No simple, clear-cut, complete answer to the defence problem thus poised has yet been found; and, frankly, as far as I can see, none is yet in sight. Is it any wonder, then, that throughout the free world there is dispute and controversy as to how this problem can be resolved? Is it any wonder that protagonists of this view or that, of this service or that service, of this defence element or that defence element, are so eagerly and at times vociferously projecting their particular views on a confused and worried public?

This active preoccupation with finding answers to the new weapons may ultimately bring us to the point where defence catches up with the offensive, which is now so far out in front in the race. I suppose that, if this balance is redressed, as it has been from time to time over the years in the past, war must then become an even less attractive adventure to aggressively-minded nations than it is today.

No nation ever wants to risk defeat; and that revulsion is made so much the stronger by awareness of how terrible defeat in thermonuclear war could be. And yet the threat of war continues. As long as this is true, our best hope is, undoubtedly, in the maintenance of a strong compelling deterrent. Primarily, of course, this deterrent at present is based on the strategic air force of the United States, now being augmented by that of Great Britain. But, to be effective, such strategic air forces must be supplemented by warning lines to enable their retaliatory planes to get off the ground immediately an attack is launched on the free world anywhere. They must also be supplemented by fighter air power to blunt the edge of the thermonuclear attack. They must also be again supplemented by well trained, efficient ground forces to form a shield to prevent Europe being suddenly overrun by ground forces of an aggressor. All these factors are just as much part of the deterrent as the thermonuclear retaliatory forces themselves.

To maintain the deterrent power of the free nations will not be an easy task, essential though it is to our survival. Paradoxically, as the existence of the deterrent continues to protect the peace, the continuance of that peace itself may tend to soften up the very deterrent force on which it depends, for it tends to give credibility to smiling assurances and friendly, folksy visits, all propagating the view that the day of world brotherhood has dawned at last, and suggesting that we can now safely set aside our defence programs, with their heavy costs, and concentrate on the much more pleasant task of raising our material standard of life.

To thus relax our defence effort might be an inviting policy for the free nations, but it would be a very dangerous policy. We would be foolish indeed to neglect those defensive measures that have created the deterrent that has so far kept us all safe from a major war. Rather, we should, I think, make sure that those defensive measures are kept bright and strong.

Our opponents have a very keen understanding and appreciation of the importance of strength. This we have reason to know. They also have perhaps a better understanding than we of the subtle, insinuating effects of persuasive propaganda. If we must sup with the Kremlin, we should always be careful to use a very long spoon.

Today I should like briefly to touch on a few of the more notable ways in which Canada is building and maintaining a defence effort that is really out of all proportion to our status as a middle power. Hon. members have in their hands the white paper in which Canada's defence program is spelled out in greater detail than I could hope to do in the time at my disposal today. My main purpose today, therefore, is to supplement what is in the white paper by drawing attention to some of its highlights, and by telling hon. members something of the changes taking place in our own defence system. In the discussions to follow, hon. members' questions will, I hope, enable me to give a more complete picture of that program, and their suggestions will as always, I can assure them, receive not only my own consideration but that of my service advisers.

Change has been operative in many fields of defence activity in Canada, but particularly so in our air defence arrangements. Arising from continuing reassessment of Canada's part in the joint United States-Canada air defence program, I can today announce two major developments: the reorganization of our auxiliary air force and an increase in the number of our regular interceptor squadrons.

Last year I drew the attention of hon. members to the studies being undertaken by the Royal Canadian Air Force to determine whether it was practicable to expect the part time air crew of the Royal Canadian Air Force auxiliary, however skilled and devoted, to operate all-weather jet interceptors of the complexity of the CF-100 in the role of air defence. This important question, in relation to the over-all problem of air defence generally, has continued to receive thorough reassessment by the Royal Canadian Air Force in the light of the thermonuclear air threat to this country.

This threat is such that defending forces must be able to operate in all conditions of weather by day or by night, must be on immediate alert status, and be trained to a very high standard of proficiency; and must, in peacetime, be deployed at their war stations. Our experience now forces us to the conclusion that these conditions are far too exacting to impose on auxiliary forces who are engaged on their civilian duties throughout the week and whose flying therefore is limited mainly to week ends. Consequently, the ten auxiliary squadrons that were to have been re-equipped with CF-100 all-weather fighters will no longer comprise part of the first line forces in the North American air defence system.

Other highly important duties will be assigned to these auxiliary squadrons, the personnel of which have constituted such a useful and active reserve force to the Royal Canadian Air Force. Six of these squadrons will be re-equipped with Sabre day fighter aircraft and T-33 jet trainers, and their personnel will progress from the T-33 to mastery of the Sabre jet. These six squadrons will continue to operate in pairs on the established Royal Canadian Air Force bases at Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver, and will constitute an effective and economical means of providing a reserve of fighter air crew, ground crew and aircraft, at a minimum of overhead cost.

The squadron at Calgary will become a light transport auxiliary squadron, while the flying squadron at Winnipeg, backed by facilities of the regular force navigation school located there, will undertake the task of providing a reserve of trained air navigators. The auxiliary squadron at London will become an aircraft control and warning squadron and thus provide an important augmentation to the trained reserve manpower required for the air defence control system. Finally, at Hamilton, already the home of a very good aircraft control and warning squadron as well as other auxiliary air force units, the auxiliary flying squadron will not be continued, and personnel will be able to concentrate on these other important auxiliary roles. This decision, made with some reluctance, has been influenced by the fact that to support this flying squadron a costly air force base has had to be maintained.

The conditions that have brought about the withdrawal of these auxiliary flying squadrons from the first line air defence force necessitates increases in the regular force units assigned to this role in Canada. Accordingly, I can now announce that steps will be taken to establish, over a period of time, three new all-weather interceptor squadrons equipped with CF-100 aircraft. This increase, with the 12 squadrons in Europe, will bring to 24 the number of regular force fighter squadrons. The size and composition of Canada's contribution to the continental air defence system continues, of course, to be under review.

Towards the end of this year we will replace one of our Sabre squadrons in Europe with a squadron equipped with CF-100 all-weather interceptor aircraft. And at intervals thereafter, during 1957, three more Sabre squadrons will be thus replaced. This will fulfil our undertaking to NATO to provide four squadrons of all-weather interceptors. Throughout, our commitment in Europe remains at 12 squadrons.

As for new equipment, the air force, working in conjunction with the defence research board, is making good progress with its new supersonic delta wing all-weather fighter interceptor, the CF-105, being developed by A. V. Roe, Limited which, with the very advanced and powerful PS-13 engine being designed for it, is expected to constitute a very fast and formidable fighting plane.

The development and preproduction work at Canadair Limited on the CL-28, the new maritime anti-submarine aircraft developed from the Britannia aircraft, is also proceeding very well, and the prototype is expected to fly next spring. By the production of successively improved marks, both the Sabre and the CF-100 are still, and will continue for some time to be, of their sort and for their purpose, first class and effective fighter planes.

The job of the Royal Canadian Air Force is certainly now a widely diversified one, including the interception of enemy bombers, the transport of troops and supplies, the support of anti-submarine activities and defence of shipping operations. Worthy, I think, of special note is the fine work of the Royal Canadian Air Force air-sea rescue organization which, with the assistance of the navy and the public spirited co-operation of civilian aircraft, ship operators and others, has added another very successful year to its proud record of life saving.

The Royal Canadian Air Force is also responsible for the building of the mid-Canada line, one of the greatest construction projects ever undertaken in Canada and one that, apart altogether from its defence implications, is dramatically contributing to the opening of the great Canadian north.

The mid-Canada line and the D.E.W. line, as the committee know, will form part of a warning system anchored on the "Pinetree" stations already in operation, all linked together by a vast complex of communications. The "Pinetree" system itself is being strengthened by additional stations. On both the D.E.W. line, being built largely by Canadian contractors working for the United States air force, and the mid-Canada line, being built by Canada, admirable progress is being made. These are projects of great difficulty and magnitude—costly, but we believe worth the cost. For they will buy us time—time to get the big United States deterrent force of bombers with their nuclear weapons winging away on their missions should the need arise, time to get our defences activated, time to prepare our people for impending attack.

Another purpose of this system is to alert our sister NATO nations if the Canadian north should be chosen as the first point of any attack. It is hoped that in the near future the early warning system of North America will be linked with an early warning system in Europe, to which NATO is giving high priority, thus forming an integrated comprehensive early warning system covering the whole of the NATO area. These warning lines cannot—I want to be very frank about this—buy us absolute protection. Their searching beams are not steel barriers. In a determined attack some enemy planes would run the gamut of the defending fighters and many lives would undoubtedly be lost. But these lines will nevertheless contribute very materially to NATO air defence plans generally and to Canada—United States effectiveness in particular. In defence terms any enemy invasion of our northland is of immediate concern to every Canadian, but—and this we should not forget—I think it is of equal concern to the citizens of the United States. Realistic policy for continental air defence requires the closest co-operation between our two countries.

Let me assure the committee, there is the closest co-operation. Our defence plans are closely integrated. Our relationship is a friendly one, founded on mutual respect and full understanding of each other's particular rights and interests, and dedicated to the defence of our common continental home against present, indisputable and continuing grave dangers.

Both of the new northern lines are rapidly approaching completion. The United States is now recruiting civilian technicians, for the most part Canadians incidentally, to assist in manning the D.E.W. line for the initial period. Recruiting and training of civilian technicians will shortly begin to assist the Royal Canadian Air Force service men, already trained, in manning the mid-Canada line.

May I turn now to the Canadian army. I can advise the committee that the note of change that is evident in air force plans applies with equal force to the army. Indeed, for all the services, the changing shape of our defence problem requires constant re-examination of our defence plans and organizations.

For many months a number of the most senior officers in the Canadian army have been examining the organization of field formations that would best meet Canada's needs in the light of our commitments, both present and possible, and under conditions of either so-called conventional or nuclear warfare.

The army has also been closely following recent reviews of army organization in the United States, the United Kingdom, France and other countries which are intended to take account of new weapons and conditions of war, and the army has had observers at large-scale NATO divisional tests in Europe.

It is generally accepted that, in the use of ground forces, we must work toward a greater degree of flexibility and increased mobility. In particular, practical assessments are being made by the Royal Canadian Air Force and the Canadian army of those types of aircraft that would be most suitable for rapid deployment, supply, and support of Canada's ground forces.

As the committee knows, Canada for some time has had a mobile striking force of three battalions of infantry with supporting arms and services, largely trained as parachutists and transportable in C-119 aircraft, known as flying box cars. The established role of this force has been to deal with possible small diversionary raids in the Canadian north.

Experience gained in exercises indicates that parachuting in the Canadian north is not an entirely satisfactory way of getting troops on the ground. Accordingly, we are giving more attention to the development of new types of aircraft with short take-off and landing capabilities, with a view to reducing the parachute element of the mobile striking force and at the same time increasing its air-portable capacity.

This subject is still under intensive study, but it is possible that Canada's field force may be organized and trained so that any part of it may be assigned to the role which is now exclusive to the mobile striking force. In other words, the long-term aim will be to train and equip the army more and more as an air-portable force with parachute elements continued in some units.

This significant new development, which is incidentally in line with views expressed by some hon. members last year in the discussion of our estimates, is a subject of such import and involves so many subsidiary problems that the present chief of the general staff is giving—as his predecessor had done—personal direction to a careful study of the problem and all its ramifications. However—and I want to be quite frank about this—I do not want to give rise to anticipations that are impossible of fulfilment. The problems attendant on large-scale air transport and air support of army units are very great indeed.

For example, if aircraft such as the C-119 were used, apart altogether from the cost of ground facilities and air crew, but allowing for reserve aircraft, it would require 148 planes, at a cost of about $150 million, to provide a one-up lift for an army brigade without its heavy equipment.

Some hon. members may recall what General Twining, chief of the United States air forces, told the senate armed forces committee a few months ago, that, with aircraft diverted from the military air transport services, the United States air force could manage to lift one airborne division, but without its heavy equipment.

It may also have been noted that in the United Kingdom the air ministry has agreed to provide air support for the army for one specially selected and trained infantry brigade, which would be immediately ready to move to any part of the world, again without heavy equipment. So it will be seen that even in respect of armies larger than ours haste is being made cautiously and slowly.

Here in Canada we have not so far attempted to provide air transport on any one lift for more than a portion of the mobile striking force, and then only within our own country. This force has provided a good background of experience on which we can now go forward, applying lessons learned to air transport for the army generally. Certainly, the task of designing and developing equipment suitable for air-portability is a long-term program. It requires and is getting joint consideration by our army and our air force planning groups.

For some time some hon. members have urged that increased attention be given to armour in the Canadian army. As I pointed out last year, in matters of army organization there are many factors to consider—not the least of them the emerging patterns of allied armies so that we keep in phase with them—that long and careful study must precede any change.

However, I am glad to be able now to announce to the committee that it is intended to form or activate a third armoured regiment. This, with the two regular armoured regiments now in being, will enable us to field the first Canadian infantry division with three brigade groups, each consisting of three battalions of infantry, one regiment of artillery, and one regiment of armour, with signals, engineers, and other supporting services. This conforms with the new type British infantry division and will make for flexibility of movement and provide a division, the components of which will be capable, on occasion, of independent action.

Another important new development on which the army is working is an armoured amphibious 9-ton tracked carrier. This will be an all-purpose tracked chassis adaptable to mounting field guns as well as lighter weapons, and also capable of moving 10 or 12 men across rough terrain at 20 or 30 miles an hour. It will be resistant to small arms fire and splinter, and suitable in design and weight for air transport. Interest in the development of this most useful type of multiple-purpose vehicle is being shown by our NATO allies.

In addition to the carrier, development on over-snow vehicles and Arctic clothing, and the testing and modification of vehicles and equipment for use in severe cold weather conditions, has been carried on at Fort Churchill with very considerable success.

The FN rifle, which takes the standard NATO round of ammunition, has been modified for Canadian use as a result of Canadian troop trials. The new rifle will be known as the FN-C1. Initial deliveries of this rifle from Canadian Arsenals plants are expected this year and will gradually replace the Lee Enfield ·303 now in use.

The program for replacement of second world war types of wheeled vehicles by modern and standardized military pattern types has been largely completed. It may be useful to remind hon. members that the wartime Sherman tank has been replaced by the Centurion; the 2-inch mortar has been replaced by the 60-millimetre; the 3-inch mortar has been replaced by the 81-millimetre; the 25-pounder field gun has been replaced by the 105-millimetre howitzer; and the 5·5 medium gun by the 155-millimetre gun and gun howitzer.

Personnel of the army have been trained and are continuing to take courses on rockets and guided missiles and, although we are withholding expenditures on acquiring these types of weapons until development and trials have been carried further—and I say that advisedly—we are keeping in close touch with the method of handling, the tactical use, and the employment of weapons in this field.

Indicative of armed forces' interest in the new conditions of war, the army's radiation detection unit, with navy and air force participation, has been in operation for several years. Over the past year, this unit has taken part in exercises, both in the United States and in the United Kingdom, where practical experience has been gained in detecting, marking and decontaminating areas where atomic explosions have taken place. The work of this unit will greatly enhance the ability of the Canadian armed forces to operate under conditions of nuclear warfare.

The changing emphasis in defence planning necessitated by the advent of nuclear war lays a heavy responsibility on all the armed forces, and in particular the regular army and the militia, to back up the civil defence organization in the early days of a thermonuclear war with all military forces not urgently required for their priority military roles.

To this end, a greater understanding of civil defence and civilian disaster techniques is being developed throughout the regular and reserve forces, working in even closer co-operation with the civil defence authorities.

Turning next to the Royal Canadian Navy, there is less by way of change to report this year since the navy has so recently reviewed its place in modern war, with sweeping changes in ship design, equipment and tactics. But there is every evidence that this arm of our forces will continue to have an important place in our defence planning.

We are all well aware of the tremendous size, modern design, and readiness of the Russian submarine fleet, which could be used not only to destroy shipping but also perhaps to make long-range missile attacks, using nuclear weapons, on the coastal areas of this continent. Remembering, of course, that the submarine is primarily an offensive weapon, we are continuing to improve as rapidly as possible the anti-submarine capabilities of our fleet. To this end, we can look forward this year to the addition of about nine new operational ships to the fleet, and several supporting craft as well.

The most noteworthy of the additions to the fleet will be the commissioning of H.M.C.S. Bonaventure, a light fleet aircraft carrier of the latest design, which will replace H.M.C.S. Magnificent. The Bonaventure will be armed with the Banshee jet-fighter aircraft, which have begun to come forward, and the Canadian-made CS-2F anti-submarine aircraft. These fine modern aircraft will replace the Sea Furies and Avengers formerly in the naval service.

Other additions to the fleet will be three and possibly four destroyer escorts of the St. Laurent class, specially designed to meet the conditions of nuclear war. You will recall that the first of these ships, H.M.C.S. St. Laurent, was commissioned last autumn. Earlier this year she went down to the United States and carried out successfully a very comprehensive series of performance trials and exercises. I am pleased to say I have seen fine reports on this.

Subsequently, the St. Laurent visited the United Kingdom for the same purpose, and during this visit participated in escorting Her Majesty the Queen on her visit to Sweden. This Canadian destroyer-escort is probably the finest and most modern anti-submarine vessel in the world today.

In summary, I would emphasize that we are vigorously pursuing our policy of enhancing the anti-submarine capabilities of the Canadian navy, which is its specialized NATO role.

As I have said, Canada's defence program throughout is a changing one as each service, realistically facing up to the changed conditions of war re-evaluates its organization, training and weapons systems. This process of re-evaluation centres, of course, on the research and development program of the defence research board and of the three services. This program is designed to bring to bear on Canada's defence arrangements the latest thinking of our allies, the best intelligence of what potential enemies are doing, and the results of our own research.

Of necessity, I cannot give much detail with respect to this matter, as hon. members will I am sure realize, except to say that without duplicating what is being done elsewhere Canadian defence scientists are keeping abreast of new developments in such vital fields as guided missiles, plane and jet engine design, nuclear explosions, fall-out and anti-submarine measures.

I have noted the valuable work being done by the board on the CF-105 for the air force.

Also notable is the development by the board in Canada of an air-to-air missile know-how and handling capability.

These guided missiles, as I am sure every one realizes, are very complex devices which require a variety of special skills and techniques in a number of engineering and production fields. These did not exist in Canada up to five years ago when the missile program began. There are now, however, some hundreds of trained experts available so that Canada is in a position to carry out a selected guided missile through any or all its stages from development to production.

The pioneer work was done on the "Velvet Glove", which so far has fully come up to its original specifications. However, because a somewhat similar United States missile is of more advanced design, it has been decided not to adopt "Velvet Glove" for operational use, but to modify the "Velvet Glove" program and go into production of one of the Sparrow series for use with the CF-100 and the CF-105.

In the anti-submarine field, the board is completing the final stages of development of new submarine detection equipment for naval destroyer escorts, which will greatly increase their effectiveness. Research into other promising anti-submarine devices is also under way.

From time to time we hear suggestions that we should not push ahead with some part of our defence program but should wait a few years for something better.

In our long-term defence planning there always has to be some reasonable balance between waiting for the ideal and getting a weapon with which to fight, if called upon, immediately. World war II would possibly have been lost by the allies if the United Kingdom had waited for the jet plane and not made shift, magnificently, with Hurricanes and Spitfires. Canada must not be left undefended while waiting for weapons that might not be available for ten years.

Within the limits set by considerations of cost and time, there will always be a healthy tug-of-war between the enthusiastic designer, who looks far ahead, the practical military man who needs his weapons now and not tomorrow and the financial official who must provide the money for both. And there is, of course, no finality in matters of this kind. We must therefore proceed with imagination, but with a sense of practicability dictated by the state of world affairs and our own financial capacity.

May I now say a word or two concerning what Canada has done to support her NATO allies.

[Mr. Campney.]

The Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I am obliged to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Drew: It is agreed there is no time limit.

The Chairman: Has the hon. minister unanimous consent to proceed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Campney: Thank you. I might here announce that after training more than 3,800 aircrew, at a cost of $328 million to date, Canada's NATO air training program is being reviewed and probably will be adjusted downward starting in 1958.

The original plan was to provide trained pilots and navigators to build up the front-line strength of aircrew in the NATO countries. This has now been achieved and the training of aircrew for replacement purposes can now be taken over by most of the NATO nations themselves.

Besides what has been done to train NATO aircrew under Canada's mutual aid program, this program since its inception in 1950 has done much to strengthen the defences of our allies in Europe. As their own capability increases, our program of aid is being scaled downward. More and more the equipment we are supplying is from current production rather than from existing stock.

The value of mutual aid to our NATO partners now totals more than $1,274 million. This includes, as an example, the provision of more than 600 modern fighter planes and more than 1,000 aircraft engines.

I should like now, returning to the Canadian scene, to say something about manpower in which, as in some other fields of military action, Canada's role, within limits imposed by our size and productivity, has been a pioneering one; pioneering, that is, in the emphasis placed on having highly trained professional services. Until recent years, we have never in our history had standing forces in peace time in anything like the numbers we have today.

While we must always have regard to the need, we must never lose sight of what this country can afford. A balanced program in the three services and the defence research board now costs us about one and three-quarter billions of dollars a year. Few countries spend a higher percentage of their national income on defence.

In any event it is not the size or the cost of our defence forces that is the main requirement. It is the quality. I should like here to pay tribute to the evident quality of our services, of their equipment, of their morale, and to the calibre of young Canadians who are coming to us to be moulded and trained.

We should not lose sight, either, of the important and often neglected part played by 55,000 civilian men and women in the defence effort—the civilians who perform essential tasks in support of their uniformed co-members of the defence department. In the dockyards, in the magazines, in the repair depots, in the supply depots—in many varied and yet important tasks—as well as in their more routine administrative and office duties, they are doing their best to strengthen Canada's defence. They are in a very real sense part of Canada's defence force.

They are, I must say in all honesty, sometimes ignored by critics in assessments of Canada's defence effort, although they are, I am sure we all realize, essential to its success. And, incidentally, because they have no need for military training and do not qualify for military benefits, they can do many jobs just as well but at less cost than men or women in uniform.

If in our defence program we have achieved some successes—and these are evident to military experts who have seen our men in action in Korea or who admire their competence in NATO's war exercises—it is because of our emphasis on quality, on education, on training. It is because Canadian industry has brought ingenuity and tremendous competence to the job of making the guns and ships and planes we have asked of it. But it is, I am confident, above all because of our professional approach to our service responsibilities.

It was, I believe, Clemenceau who said that war was too serious a matter to be left to the generals. The fact is, today, that it is far too complex and too technical a matter to be left to the amateurs—only professionally trained and experienced servicemen can cope quickly with the weapons and tactics of modern war.

To meet our commitments, both in creating the deterrent and in being able to react immediately if the deterrent fails, we must provide forces in being, completely trained, equipped and immediately ready.

That is why Canada today has nearly 15 times as many forces in being as in March, 1939, while the number of our reserves has not changed substantially. In other words, our forces in being, which numbered 8,000 before world war II, now total 116,350; our reserves, at 55,000, are 1,000 more than in 1939.

I might remind the committee that NATO places great emphasis on forces in being. This has been asserted again and again by NATO leaders.

In 1939 we were quite unready for war. Today we have in full fighting trim an army brigade and an air division in Europe and at home a mobile striking force and three infantry brigade groups in the army; an effective air defence system and other supporting units with more than 3,000 planes in the air force; and a navy with 40 fighting ships at sea and a still greater number under construction or conversion or in reserve.

Our services are well trained, well equipped, well disciplined. In character, in training and in resolution we have I believe as high a quality of serviceman as any country in the world.

As more and more the requirements of modern war tend to become interrelated, the Department of National Defence, through the co-ordinating efforts of the chairman, chiefs of staff and the joint staff organization, has brought the three services into ever closer working relationship. More than 900 officer cadets are in training at our three tri-service colleges.

It is certain that this trend towards a more unified approach to the defence problem must continue if all the services are to make their maximum contribution to the defence effort and most efficiently manage the defence systems that they are best fitted for. As we move into the use of guided missiles it is more important than ever to have the navy, army and air force in close co-operation, agreeing on their particular fields of endeavour.

As I have said, Canada on occasion pioneers in defence planning, as, for example, in manpower policy. The United Kingdom "Statement of Defence 1956" has these words:

> For the highly technical armed forces of the future, we require a substantial proportion of men of long service and experience.

General Maxwell D. Taylor, chief of staff of the United States army, in an interview a few months ago, also emphasized the need for a professional army when he said:

> I much prefer a good army, an army in which I'm sure of every officer and man, to a bigger one of less reliability.

The U.S.S.R., by shifting emphasis from quantity to quality, also seems to be working towards more streamlined and professional forces.

For some time now Canada's armed forces, I believe, have had a higher percentage of fully trained personnel than those of most other countries. In recent years, without undue difficulty, and without lowering our selectively high standards of recruiting, we have been able to maintain our forces at about planned size, and we have been able to persuade a relatively high percentage of our recruits to make the services their career—a most important factor in the build-up of first class regular forces.

I would not want my references to forces in being to suggest there is not an important and valuable role for the reserve forces to play. Hon. members of this committee are well aware of the value attached to service in the reserve forces—in the naval reserve, the army militia and the air force auxiliary.

It is an inspiring evidence of good citizenship that 55,000 Canadians keep abreast of military affairs by membership in the reserve forces of the three services and a quarter of a million more serve in the ground observer corps, in civil defence or as cadets.

All of these perform a significant part in providing security for Canada. All can begin to make their contribution felt within a few hours or days should war break out—a contribution that, because of their training and experience, can increase rapidly in the time following the first impact of war.

I might refer first to the militia and to the fresh start it has made since the reorganization of two years ago. Last year I said it was too early to weigh the success of the "new look" in the militia. At the present time it is abundantly evident that the militia, under its new dispensation, is operating at new levels of efficiency and of interest.

Best evidence of this is seen in the figures of attendance at summer camp. In 1954 the camp attendance of officers and men was 16,593. Last year it was 20,568—a record high. This year it is anticipated that almost 23,000 will participate—another record high.

The militia today is better trained and better equipped than ever before in the history of Canada. The armoured units now have Sherman tanks but these in due course will be replaced by a sufficient number of tanks of later design to support their training requirements. In the artillery, the 25-pounders are being replaced with 105-mm howitzers, as used by the regular force. Similarly, it is intended to replace the weapons and equipment of the other corps of the militia with the latest types as they become available but, of course, the equipping of the regular army must take priority.

I should like to reiterate that the militia is an important part of our defence organization and deserves the wholehearted support of every citizen. Now, in addition to training in their customary roles, the militia has been given the responsibility for training in civil defence work and a close liaison is being built up between regular army, militia and local civil defence authorities.

With regard to the other services, this summer the naval reserve also has a full training program, in which the emphasis will be on training aboard ships of the regular force on the east and west coasts or smaller craft on lake Ontario operated from the headquarters of the Royal Canadian Navy (Reserve) at Hamilton, Ontario. I have already spoken about the Royal Canadian Air Force Auxiliary, which will go on with its usual training programs, except for those squadrons that will begin their change-over to new and challenging roles.

In the difficult time since world war II, it has not been easy for the free nations to keep their freedoms intact. It has not been by chance, certainly, that this has been achieved. It has, indeed, been only because of the resolute determination of the free peoples working together toward a common end. As a partner in two great organizations looking to the maintenance of peace, the United Nations and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, Canada has given abundant proof of her sincere desire to avoid war and of her active concern for the correction of conditions which might lead to war.

Despite its failure to measure up to the first high ideals it set itself, the United Nations has still helped to prevent and, at the least, to limit war. There is the historic example of Korea, where, incidentally, a small group of Canadians still serve on, the rear guard of that valiant force that fought, successfully, in the Korean war. Canadian officers also, under United Nations auspices, are today serving the cause of peace in Indo-China, in Kashmir and in Israel.

The North Atlantic Treaty Organization is founded on the truth that in union there is strength. In Canada we subscribe to that truth. In stationing Canadian servicemen in France and Germany, in training aircrew from nine NATO countries here in Canada, and in welcoming United States troops to stand beside our own in defence of our common continental home, we give evidence of our conviction that, in the NATO family, a "stay at home" policy and a "visiting forces not wanted" policy have no place and, indeed, if given effect to, could endanger us all.

The great defensive system that we have built in NATO with so much labour must not be allowed to fall into disrepair. Honest assessment of the world situation tells us that we cannot safely rest on what we have done. We must go on working together for the common good with undiminished zeal and equal determination.

Despite our considerable defence expenditures, and despite our best defence endeavours, there can be, for Canadians, no such thing as absolute safety. That must be sought, not by standing alone in our defence preparations, but in the collective strength and evident capacity of the free nations to survive attack and to strike back with desperate, devastating force. For, paradoxically, it is in the awareness and abhorrence of nuclear war that we must probably look for our best defence against its breaking out. As Sir Winston Churchill said last year, if I might repeat his oft-quoted words in that connection:

> It may well be that we shall, by a process of sublime irony, have reached a stage in this story where safety will be the sturdy child of terror, and survival the twin brother of annihilation.

The story of civilization is spelled out in the painful, plodding accumulation of knowledge and understanding. In time it will, we trust, be evident to everyone that, in this nuclear age, world war has become too hot to handle. For in such war there could be no victory—victor and vanquished would alike be levelled in the radioactive dust.

Surely no one could look forward, with equanimity, to year after year of uneasy expectation of that dread day when the first H-bombs might fall. However futile our best attempts may have proved so far, we must keep on trying for disarmament. And we must come to grips with some of those central problems that have led to war: ignorance and hate, disease, privation and poverty.

For it is clearly evident—and it is on this note, and not a defence statistic, that I want to end my opening remarks to this committee—it is clearly evident that, for us and for the generations that will follow us into the wonders and hazards of this thermonuclear age, there must be some surer guarantee of peace, some less uncertain protection against disaster, than military might can hope to provide.

Man's inventive genius, which has sought out and set free the power of the atom, can surely make it serve and not destroy us.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, first of all may I be privileged to thank the minister for his very kind reference to myself and the Minister of Labour, who are having the opportunity to attend the centenary celebrations to be held next week in London. On behalf of all the holders of the Victoria Cross, I am quite certain that they all appreciate the facilities which the government has made available to enable them to travel to the United Kingdom.

Regarding the remarks that have been made by the minister this afternoon and the white paper that was issued to members of this house last Monday, after studying the white paper during the last few days I certainly gained the impression that it had been prepared a good many months ago. Possibly it had been drawn up as the original draft of the report of the Department of National Defence for the fiscal year ending in 1956. From the remarks made by the minister this afternoon it is quite obvious that large sections of that white paper were out of date before it was printed, because the minister has told us of several important developments which have not been included in the white paper and hardly even forecast.

I cannot help recalling the fact that year after year the members of this party have supported the government in its endeavours to create an adequate defence force for this country. If we have supported the general policy, we have of course pointed out the way in which that policy should be further developed. It is interesting to note that in this afternoon's remarks the minister has obviously taken heed of what members of the opposition have told him in the past and is making some halting steps in the direction that we have suggested.

It was several years ago when we urged that more attention should be devoted to the continental defence of this country, and repeatedly we have urged the modernization of the Canadian army and the provision of adequate transport for the forces that are in being. I remember urging very strongly about four years ago that the forces of our Canadian army must be forces in being and that they must be readily transportable by air, if not actually airborne.

The white paper hardly reflects the changes which have taken place in the world situation. I think it might be well to refresh members' minds with some of the statements that have been made recently indicating the changes which are now taking place. I should like to call attention to the words of General Gruenther published in the last NATO letter we received dated May 1. After referring to the state of the NATO defences when he first took over command a year ago, he went on to say:

> . . . we now have a strong superiority in long-range offensive air power, in the form of the American B-47 plane, and also because of the V-bombers which are now being produced in the United Kingdom. At this stage in the technological development of defence against offensive aircraft, the offence has a tremendous advantage over the defence. In other words, the B-47 airplane and the V-bombers can fly so fast and so high that there is, as of now, no defensive answer to this type of attack. This means that if certain parts of Europe should be overrun our retaliatory attacks would ensure the defeat of the Soviet bloc.

Following along the same line, the British white paper on defence published this year refers to the increased power of the deterrent and says that the nuclear weapon and the means of delivering it have made global war more frightening and less likely. Again, when the Secretary of State for External Affairs reported to the external affairs committee a few months ago on his experiences in Russia and the changed opinion of the Russian statesmen he had this to say:

> . . . and this is a conclusion that can be drawn from the communist congress, to reinforce the conclusion we have already drawn from the Geneva meetings—the implications of thermonuclear warfare are now recognized by the Soviet leaders. And as a consequence the inevitability of war between the communist and the non-communist world is rejected because of the supposed deterrent effect of Soviet thermonuclear warfare capabilities and Soviet economic strength.

Then he goes on to say this with respect to Russia:

> In a sense they have turned against us our own doctrine of atomic deterrents. However, while they reject the inevitability of war, and insist on the desirability of coexistence between states of different social systems, they are quite emphatic in stating that there can be no coexistence between ideologies.

That would really indicate that it would seem that both the west and the east are of the opinion that at the present time the chances of a third world war breaking out are more remote than they have been and that both sides are counting upon massive retaliation if either side starts a war. Thus I think we can say that it is hoped that if both sides have and are known to have the power of instant and overwhelming retaliation this may be the means of preventing a war until some more satisfactory solution can be found and, of course, naturally every country in the world hopes for the discovery of some more satisfactory solution.

It must be in the light of that that we must examine the statements made in the white paper and the statements made this afternoon by the Minister of National Defence. In the white paper the minister, and he repeated the statement again today, declares that Canada's armed forces are now more effective than ever before in our peacetime history. In that respect I feel I must call the minister's attention to the fact that never before in Canada's peacetime history has the government of Canada spent over a period of years $2 billion each year for those forces. Never before in the peacetime history of Canada has there been anything like 100,000 men in the regular services. Never before in Canada's history has a foreign country, whether or not an ally, stationed troops here in Canada and also spent millions of dollars on Canadian and American defences. So there is every reason to demand that our Canadian forces should be more efficient today than they have been in the past.

But we must not judge that efficiency by the standard of efficiency which was required 10, 20 or 40 years ago. The standard of efficiency has got to be tested by the role that these forces will have to carry out. Putting it very briefly, it would seem to me that there are four roles that the Canadian forces are required to carry out. The first one is to join with the other powers in providing this known deterrent so that it will act as a preventive against the possibility of war breaking out. That seems to me to be by far the most important role of the Canadian forces. We have got to join with the other powers. We have got to make it very clear to any would-be enemy that it is not worth that would-be enemy's time to consider the possibility of launching a war.

I come to the second role. Because it is not possible at the present time for east and west to live in a period of coexistence and because there is still a clash of ideals between their policies and ours, a cold war exists, and that cold war is the immediate problem facing the countries of the west at the present time. The minister indicated this afternoon that we have a few officers here and there scattered throughout the world, but our Canadian forces can and should carry out a definite part in that cold war.

I am rather surprised, in view of the immediate importance of our part in the cold war, that there will be a reduction in the mutual aid, as the minister mentioned this afternoon, of some $34 million, and also a reduction in the air crew training scheme. These are two means by which the armed forces at least can help in this cold war which must carry on for a good many months to come.

Third, the forces must be capable of playing their part in what is sometimes referred to as bush fire wars, wars of limited scope which may break out anywhere in the world and in which Canadian forces, as forces of a United Nations power, might be called upon to take a part. The minister in his remarks a year ago, at page 4862 of Hansard for June 16, 1955, made some reference to the role a Canadian force would have to play in such an operation. He said:

> While no special arrangements exist for provision of forces to meet commitments which may be made from time to time in support of the activities of the United Nations, we have, I think, demonstrated in the support given in the Korean war that we can, when the opportunity and necessity arises, carry out our proper part promptly and effectively.

I would refer the minister to the ad hoc formations which were created when the Korean war broke out, and the very expansive steps which were taken to hurriedly raise the forces which were sent over in the early months of that war. I hope, with that example in his mind, something more will be done in the way of having forces in being, ready to take part promptly should we be called upon as a member of the United Nations to make any contribution.

I do not think the minister's reference to the early days of Korea was a very happy one, although as operations proceeded and there was time—time having been gained by these hastily raised troops, time having been gained by the forces of our allies—Canadian troops acquitted themselves most admirably in that Korean war. The lesson which should be drawn is the fact we had nothing at that time and apparently, according to the minister's statement I have quoted, we had not very much ready a year ago and no reference has been made to that.

In connection with the cold war and in connection with the possibility of having to send forces to aid the United Nations, I would call attention to the words of President Eisenhower as reported in this NATO letter. The president said:

> Arms alone, the President said, can give no permanent peace, no confident security. If we are to preserve freedom in our own land; "it must likewise thrive in other important areas of the earth". For the welfare of ourselves and others, we must, therefore, help the rest of the free world achieve its aspirations. For our mutual benefit we must join in building for greater future prosperity, for more human liberty and for lasting peace.

This would indicate that if we are to play our part as a member of the United Nations, and as at least a middle power, we must be prepared to take part in that third class of war to which I referred, the bush fire war. Finally, we have to be prepared for the war of survival if all our efforts to deter the enemy should fail.

I should like for the rest of my time to examine our forces today. Are they in that state of efficiency which is indicated in order to be able to carry out these various tasks to which I have referred? In order to give some indication as to the problem in so far as the spread of Soviet imperialism, may I say that in this same NATO letter to which I was referring, on page 10 Mr. Dulles points out that the Soviet type of communism which in 1945 ruled some 200 million people of the world has now extended its rule to cover nearly 700 million people belonging to no less than 13 independent nations. It is, therefore, no surprise that the Secretary of State for External Affairs should have said a few weeks ago that NATO is at the crossroads.

Now, we cannot, and no opposition has the right to, accept a statement to the effect that our forces are more effective than they have ever been without examining whether the expenditure of $1,775 million this year on national defence is being spent to the best advantage from the point of view of the Canadian taxpayer. On page 4 of the white paper we are told:

> In the current phase of collective security, Canada's principal support of the west's retaliatory striking power is our contribution towards early warning and air defence on this continent.

The minister has referred to the early warning systems which are now being developed. He has referred to the fact that the United States is paying for the early warning chain, known usually as the D.E.W. line, which extends across the Arctic. Reference has been made to what Canada is doing in the way of building the mid-Canada line and what has been done in building the "Pinetree" line, as well as how that "Pinetree" line, which is to a very large extent a fire control system, is being developed. The minister indicated that the main purpose of the D.E.W. line was to warn the United States strategic bomber force of an approaching striking force so they could get off the ground and start on their mission of massive retaliation. I do not think anybody could find any fault in that. I am quite certain—at least I would hope—that if there were a force of hostile bombers crossing the D.E.W. line within the next year or two, sufficient warning would be given for the United States bombing force to get off the ground and start on its mission.

It is possible, as has been indicated outside this house, that as the power of the offensive increases and we are entering into the era of the intercontinental missile, the equipment of the D.E.W. line may not be able to pick up that form of attack. That is something we have to accept, and I think we should hold the minister guilty if he did not take such measures as he considered right to provide the best early warning system that he can devise at the present time, and hope that not only will the means of offence increase but also that the means of detection through advances in electronics will keep pace with the event.

Therefore I have no criticism to offer on the principle of the development of the D.E.W. line. It is an expensive operation. We do not know exactly what it will cost, and as it is being paid for by the United States as a joint United States-Canadian effort we have little comment to make. One does question the wisdom of having United States contractors manning and operating this D.E.W. line for the next three years. Naturally, having some pride in our own Canadian sovereignty, we would have preferred to see Canadian personnel doing that work.

Then I come to the question of the mid-Canada line. I think there is some ground there for questioning as to whether it is desirable to have this second line of early warning stations as well as the D.E.W. line. I believe that originally the mid-Canada line was started as a sort of stop-gap to give additional warning to the "Pinetree" stations, until such time as the D.E.W. line was fully developed.

We are told in the estimates that Canada is spending $100 million this year on the mid-Canada line, and spent somewhere in the neighbourhood of $50 million last year. That is a great deal of money, and one is forced to ask whether it is essential to have these two early warning lines. True, you may say you are giving warning in depth. One can understand the advantages of that, but the time element comes in and it is not a matter of hours now; it would be really a matter of minutes from the time a hostile force might be picked up by the mid-Canada line and reported to the control elements, wherever they may be, to the time you could expect to get intercepters off, or to get the remainder of the strategic bombing force away with a warning which can only be a matter of a few minutes, since the mid-Canada line is so much closer in than the D.E.W. line in the north. Therefore I hope the minister, when he replies, will be able to point out to the committee the necessity for that particular line.

Of course no warning line is of any value unless it can be backed up by intercepters, and while the white paper would indicate that there are some 21 squadrons available for the defence of Canada, the minister painted a more realistic picture of that force this afternoon when he pointed out that at the present time there are only nine regular squadrons which are equipped with a plane which is efficient for its role at the present time, namely the CF-100. I presume they are equipped now with the mark V, or are soon to be equipped with the mark V, but that the auxiliary squadrons have not been able to carry out the role.

If my interpretation of the minister's words this afternoon is correct it would seem that the majority of the auxiliary squadrons are not to be equipped with operational aircraft but are to be equipped with the T-33 jet training planes, and it appears to me, from what I could gather from the minister's words that their role is to be more that of providing reserve pilots rather than as operational units. If that is not a clear interpretation of the minister's remarks I hope he will clear up that point. Therefore it would seem to me that of the 21 squadrons referred to in the white paper we have to rely at the present moment solely on the nine squadrons of the regular air force equipped with operational planes, and we have another three squadrons being developed.

One must also query the wisdom of, perhaps I might almost use the word, "stockpiling" of the CF-100. The Montreal Gazette today carried the statement that 510 mark IV CF-100's had already been produced and that there were another 115 mark V's. Well, for nine squadrons quite obviously 510 CF-100 planes, which it is said cost somewhere in the neighbourhood of $500,000 each, seems to be, as I say, stockpiling a large number of these planes. Quite obviously when the original order was placed it was the government's intention to equip the auxiliary squadrons with these CF-100's, and for that reason a larger number of aircraft were ordered than would appear to be necessary now.

I am not in favour of discontinuing the airplane production industry here. I think it is something we have to develop and maintain. In those periods of changeover from one type of equipment to a more modern type there is always the danger of equipment being turned out which before it leaves the assembly line is obsolescent, and I am afraid that is the case at the present time with the CF-100's which will be turned out. No doubt the CF-100 mark V, with its greater power, would be of value to combat any enemy bombers coming to this country in the near future, but its period of usefulness must be rapidly passing. The CF-105 will no doubt bridge that period until the time the guided missile is ready and available.

I have frequently wondered whether we have not rather limited the airplane production industry in asking them to develop a limited number of a type of plane. As has been indicated, there is a great shortage and there is a great need for more transport planes. I believe that the A. V. Roe Company, which has been making the CF-100's, did start a jet transport plane industry which was cancelled at the time of the Korean war.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but it is my duty to tell him that he has exceeded his time, unless the committee is willing to give unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member may continue with unanimous consent.

Mr. Pearkes: Thank you. I was wondering whether it might not have been possible to encourage a transport industry at the same time we were encouraging the construction of interceptors and CF-100's. Whether or not it is possible for Canada to dispose of any of these 100's which must be surplus now I do not know, but it would seem desirable to do so.

Regarding Sabre fighters, are we rapidly approaching the same situation? Is the F-86 sufficiently modern to be the fighter of the future? I would like to have heard the minister indicate that something is being done to develop a more modern short-range fighter, something which would serve until we entered the guided missile era and even then, when we first enter the guided missile era, I am quite certain short-range fighters will be required as well.

The minister made reference to the manpower situation. I concur most heartily with him when he says it is quality rather than quantity which is required. From what I have seen of the three services in the last year I too think we have a very fine type of young man in all our regular forces. I do think, however, there is some cause for anxiety regarding the rate of enlistment in all the services, because there appears to be a trend toward a downward curve as a result of which the forces are gradually declining in strength.

The white paper gives the number of men in the three services. I notice that in June, 1955, there were 117,014. In December of 1955 that number had dropped to 116,715. Today the minister gave the figure as 116,250. There is a slight downward curve in the enlistment in the regular forces which is not encouraging, and while I believe it is far more important to have the right type of men in the forces, and to have small and efficient forces rather than large and incompetent forces, I would like to have some indication concerning what steps the minister is taking to correct that situation.

I notice in the white paper the minister refers to the shortage in air crews and has this to say:

> Nevertheless, additional proposals designed to improve the attractiveness of the service to suitable individuals—and hence to improve manning in those categories for which it is difficult to recruit—are presently under consideration.

I had hoped the minister would have given some indication in his remarks today as to what are the matters he has under consideration.

The minister made reference to the considerable number of civilians who are employed in the armed forces. One of course readily recognizes the fact that there are large numbers of civilians employed in the various ordnance depots and the dockyards on both coasts. The minister said 55,000 civilians are employed. That is nearly one civilian for every two men in the services. I do not quarrel with the need for personnel in the dockyards and the ordnance depots and so forth, but one does query the number of civilians employed at national defence headquarters. In the white paper we observe that 4,330 civilians are employed at national defence headquarters. That seems to me a very large number of civilian personnel, especially when one observes there are 3,282 women also employed, many of whom no doubt do clerical work.

I come now to the question of national defence headquarters. From time to time over a great many years we have questioned the size of the staff at national defence headquarters. We have wondered if it is excessively large. Time and time again we have called attention to the number of officers and men and the number of civilians who are employed there. It is rather disquieting, to say the least, for one to read in Maclean's magazine comments such as those made by the former chief of staff, in which he referred to the fact that national defence headquarters is cumbersome. He had some rather severe criticism to make.

Being a retired general myself I can perhaps discount the comments of retired generals to a greater degree than most people, but when a man has held that position and comments on his own organization it certainly gives one cause for wonder, particularly when one sees the actual figures disclosed in the estimates.

I wonder still more because I feel that with the modern trend of military development the time factor becomes increasingly important. Any headquarters has to act extremely fast in a national emergency. It would seem essential that there should be some single authority with the power to render instant decisions.

In the article to which I have referred reference is also made to interservice rivalries, competition for money and men as between the services, and friction between the services and the civilians. This matter of control is one of importance, and in that article the former chief of the general staff refers to the chiefs of staff committee. He certainly gives the impression that chiefs of staff have not been able to present their views to the minister, and that their views have been watered down by the rulings of the majority. My understanding of the chiefs of staff committee is that you have a chairman of the chiefs of staff, you have a deputy minister, you have a director of research as well as the three chiefs of staff. I realize that on a great many matters they must be able to speak with a united voice because we have to consider the three services as working more and more as one.

I should like to ask the minister whether he has received any memoranda from any of the chiefs of staff indicating that he has had difficulty in approaching the minister and presenting his point of view. If there is any substance in what was said by Lieutenant General Simonds it would seem that there is a very definite weakness in the headquarters organization. Surely the chief of staff of a service should have the right at any time convenient to the minister to make representations in the interests of his service. If that condition exists it seems to me it is the responsibility of the chief of staff concerned to put his representations in writing to the minister, and I would ask the minister whether he has received any such complaints in the past.

Another serious charge is made in that article in connection with the permanent joint board, in which it is claimed that it acts as a barrier to the free exchange of ideas between the chiefs of staff of Canada and the chiefs of staff of the United States. That board was established before the United States came into world war II, and it had a very definite purpose in those days. I am not certain that that purpose still remains. I feel that if there is any difficulty in way of the free exchange of views between Canadian and United States chiefs of staff any such obstruction should be removed immediately, because we have to play as a team and both sides must be able to make the fullest representations to the other parties.

These are the main points I wish to bring to the attention of the committee at this time. I am pleased to hear that the number of militia going to camp will be increased, but 20,000 out of some 50,000 is not an impressive figure. I should like the minister to explain whether those are going as individuals to receive training in schools of instructions, or whether they are going to be trained as units. Unless a militia unit is trained under its own commanders from the brigade and regiment down it cannot be considered as an efficient unit.

It seemed to be indicated in the white paper that there might be a change contemplated in the role of the militia. Emphasis is placed on the fact that they are to supplement the regular forces. Two years ago the regular army reserve was introduced, and we were told last year that it was to provide first-line reinforcements for the regular Canadian units. Unfortunately that scheme failed, and failed badly. I believe they could not get any more than 100 to go to camp. Obviously there must be some means by which the regular units can be brought up to strength before they go on to an operation, and provision must be made to supply first-line reinforcements, either for regular units being employed in this country or on any other mission they may be required to carry out.

The militia are not well equipped. Reference was made to the fact that they are still hoping to have the 25-pounders replaced by the 105-mm and to replace the old Sherman tanks with more modern equipment. I wonder whether any attention is being given to the possibility of developing some form of armoured vehicle which could be used in our north country. The Centurion tank with which the regular armoured units are now equipped I would not think would be of much value in the north. It does seem to me that if we are to have an airborne force to operate in this country in the case of possible raids they should be supported by some armour. It might be a good line of research work to see whether a special light tank might not be developed for operation in our heavy and deep snow and under the cold weather conditions of the north.

The minister referred to the fact that another unit was going to be activated, but he did not mention which unit it was. I am sure it would be interesting to the committee to know what unit he has in mind if he is going to have a third regular armoured unit.

In closing I should like to call attention to the fact that apparently the minister has paid attention to what the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre has been saying for a number of years, and some steps have been taken to provide some form of armoured carrier.

I appreciate the extra time which has been granted to me to make these remarks. There will be many questions which will have to be asked on the various items as they come up, but I shall close my remarks now.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Chairman, I was particularly interested this afternoon to hear the Minister of National Defence—I think I have his words correctly—refer to the profound effect of nuclear weapons and far-ranging bombers on our defence thinking. I was struck by that, because when I glanced through the white paper I could find little or no sign whatever of that profound effect upon the thinking of the defence department. It may be that the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich was correct when he said that this white paper had been drafted many months ago, perhaps before this profound effect had taken place.

Then I come to some of the remarks which were made by the minister, and I am again forced to wonder whether his speech of this afternoon was also drafted some time ago, shall we say before the Montreal Gazette of this morning was published. In discussing the role of the jet interceptor in connection with the D.E.W. line the minister made an interesting statement. He said the CF-100's, of their sort and of their type, are and will remain for a long time yet effective fighter planes. Now I turn to the Montreal Gazette of this morning and find there a quotation from some senior R.C.A.F. air crew officers who say they have doubts whether the CF-100 jet interceptor, Canada's chief defence weapon, could fly high enough to get at the latest Russian bombers if they attacked North America. Then the news story goes on to say:

> The government itself has made it pretty plain that it's worried, too, about this main aspect of defence.

Then it refers to the white paper, in which the government remarks on the urgent requirement for the supersonic CF-105 jet interceptor, now being developed at Malton.

That also seems to leave us one or two steps behind the thinking of other military forces in the world, because on Monday of this week the Ottawa Journal published a news report from Washington in which two United States air force generals, Generals Earle Partridge and Curtis Lemay, have raised questions about the effectiveness of the costly radar warning lines in Canada and even of the United States air force fighters, ranging up to 1,600 miles per hour in speed, or as fast as or faster than the CF-105 Canada will put in the air in a year or two. I am given to understand that the CF-105 is expected to have a speed range of up to about 1,500 miles per hour. It is not coming out for a year or possibly two years. Yet Generals Partridge and Lemay have grave doubts as to whether it is not already obsolete.

I can readily understand the difficulties of any defence department introducing arms and equipment before they become obsolete or obsolescent, but I think it is time we were facing some realities. When I heard the minister speaking this afternoon of the profound effects on our defence thinking of these new developments I was reminded of the statements made by an even more eminent authority, if I may say so with all deference, than the Minister of National Defence of this government. I refer to an article published in June of this year, written by Earl Attlee, former prime minister of the United Kingdom and minister of defence of the United Kingdom from 1945 to 1946. I presume when Earl Attlee made his statement he did so after having had the opportunity to discuss the matter with the leading military experts of the United Kingdom. He had this to say:

> We must accept the logic of events, and in the light of them consider afresh our defences. The situation has wholly changed since Labour was in power and introduced national service. We can reasonably hope, despite the frustrations of the disarmament conference, that no state will embark on a major war because of its inevitable consequences to victor and vanquished alike. The conceptions of armies of millions of men fighting land battles is out of date, and therefore the basis of national service—which was the provision of large reserves of trained men for land warfare—has gone. I gather also that the best opinion is that the long-distance guided missile cannot be dealt with by piloted planes, and this entails a review of our air forces. A navy operating from ports within range of the guided missile seems to be equally impossible . . .
> I am certain that at the present time much of the enormous cost of armaments could be cut down. I am sure that there are masses of weapons now obsolete which are still maintained or even being produced. There will inevitably be great opposition to the kind of drastic reorganization which is required. It will require a government with a strong will to undertake it for inevitably most of the experts will be thinking of the last war.

I think, sir, we are perhaps in somewhat the same position today in Canada. We have heard this afternoon from the Minister of National Defence, dealing with the radar lines and the joint use of those lines with jet interceptors. I have quoted the opinions of the two leading air force experts of the United States, who cast grave doubts on that concept and on its value in any way at all in light of the long-range high-speed bombers which it is known the Soviet union has now developed.

It is true enough that the D.E.W. line may still be of value in providing sufficient warning for the United States strategic air command to get those bombers into the air to proceed with massive retaliation. In that regard it is of inestimable value to the western world, but I would point out that it has nothing whatever to do with Canada's part in the protection of North America. Apparently we are relying on equipment that is now considered, by those who should know, to be quite out of date.

That, of course, does not even consider the problem of the intercontinental ballistic missile which is now known to be well on its way in development, both in the Soviet union and in the United States. In this morning's Globe and Mail there was a news story from Washington that Lieutenant General Donald L. Putt, United States air force development chief, said that the United States is keeping up to its timetable for creation of an intercontinental ballistic missile. It goes on to say:

> Putt said at one point that Russia possibly could surpass the United States in air strength and weapons within a decade. Later he said he preferred not to discuss the possibility in terms of specific time.
> Putt, answering questions, said the United States has to date "met the milestones" in what he called a rather realistic schedule for producing an ICBM. He said the development is proceeding as a real firm program.

We hear of no moves made on the part of the Canadian government—and I should not expect to hear of any moves made on their part—to embark on the development of an intercontinental guided missile. But I would point out that in the United Kingdom defence white paper produced this year it is noted that the United Kingdom government has offered to its allies assistance in research and development of these intercontinental guided missiles. We have had no word from the minister as to whether Canada took any notice of that offer, or whether we are prepared perhaps to integrate our development and research facilities with those of the United Kingdom. We are told, on the other hand, we are going to rely in the first place on CF-100's, which are definitely obsolete today and which we are still producing, and later we hope to graduate to the CF-105's, which the United States air force considers now to be of very dubious value.

It has been said that our goals for defence in Canada are in the first place the defence of North America, in conjunction with our United States allies, from attack. What have we with which to do it? As I point out in regard to the D.E.W. line and the air force, we have equipment of very dubious value. Our army, which we are told is at the highest state of development that it has been at practically any time in our history, seems again to be somewhat out of step with the developments that have taken place in other parts of the world, and particularly in the United States.

We have from the United States reports of new tactical nuclear weapons with which all the forces of the United States are to be equipped as soon as possible:

> Atomic weapons whose employment was simulated (and this means solely the fission weapons of so-called "limited" powers of destruction; the appalling thermonuclear-fusion weapons—the so-called "H-bombs"—were not simulated) have a shattering effect not only on and about the point of impact as expected, but on a great many long-respected techniques of warfare. Certain world war II standards are standard no longer and it is a grave question whether many of the counter-measures thus far developed could cope adequately with a series of atomic strikes.

We are not given any information of any importance in the white paper or in last year's departmental report of any steps that have been taken by the Canadian Department of National Defence to secure, either from our allies or through development by ourselves, those nuclear tactical weapons with which the United States military authorities consider their armed forces must be equipped.

We have been told this afternoon of the way the Canadian navy has been brought up to date. That again seems to fall rather short of some of the developments that are taking place in other parts of the world, particularly in the United States of America. When the minister was speaking this afternoon of sweeping changes in naval design, no mention was made of the sort of developments that are now taking place in the United States. Admiral Arleigh Burke, chief of United States naval operations, when asked whether anti-submarine warfare was keeping pace with the potentialities of the nuclear submarine, declared:

> The struggle between the submarine and the anti-submarine capability is a continuing struggle. . . . Not too long ago we felt we were ahead of the game. Now nuclear propulsion seems to be putting submarines ahead again.

I see the Minister of National Defence is laughing. It may be, of course, that the Minister of National Defence for Canada is more an expert on naval warfare than the chief of United States naval operations. He may perhaps be a little more competent than the United States secretary for the navy who had this to say, as recorded in Time magazine of May 21 this year.

> The navy is presently going through the most tremendous change it has ever undergone, from steam to nuclear power, from guns to guided missiles and in the air from propeller type planes to supersonic planes, all at the same time.

But we of course are making sweeping changes in design. I saw some of these sweeping changes. I worked in a shipyard when they were taking place and, believe me, it was a very slow sweep. There is no mention at all in the white paper or in the minister's report to parliament this afternoon that the Canadian navy is keeping abreast of the developments in the navies of other great powers. I suggest to you, sir, that the situation revealed to us is a very serious one, when this document is all the Minister of National Defence can present to us and the Canadian people as justification for the spending of $1¾ billion. I would suggest this could hardly be described as anything more than a piece of impudence when you compare it with the United Kingdom defence white paper or with the proceedings that take place before the Senate of the United States on matters of defence.

I would suggest, sir, that the very first thing we in this parliament should do is find out just where we are in defence spending and just what we are getting for our money. We are not going to get it merely by having the minister read a prepared speech to us today, a speech in extremely broad and general terms which tells us nothing. We are only going to get the information that the people of Canada deserve to have and have a perfect right to have if a committee of the house is established to go into the matter with full power to hear from responsible officers of the armed forces. The same procedure that is adopted in Washington could be adopted in Ottawa. You will note that in all these reports from Washington there is reference to the reports of this committee. Many of the meetings are held in camera, but the representatives of the American people are informed as to what the United States taxpayers are getting for their money in the way of defence. But here we get not a word.

If this is all, then I suggest the minister will have to do a very much better selling job to the Canadian people in the future than he has done in the past. There is nothing here to indicate that in Canada we have anything in the way of modern, up to date weapons of defence. There is nothing whatever to indicate that our Canadian defence authorities are even taking into consideration the developments which are taking place in other parts of the world. It may be that our government has decided that it is beyond our means to get into this particular type of struggle and competition. That may very well be true, but I would suggest again that when one of our allies—and more than an ally, I suggest; the United Kingdom—has suggested that it is willing to co-operate with the other members of NATO and the western world in research and development on modern weapons, then the Minister of National Defence would be on better ground if he came to parliament with a request for appropriations to enable the Canadian government to take advantage of that offer, rather than to come before us seeking appropriations for weapons which I am quite sure he would not dare deny are obsolete before they ever reach the armed forces. If the minister feels that is wrong, I hope he will try to justify these expenditures we are making. He has not done so yet.

We are told that we not only have the defence of North America to consider but also our commitments under NATO. I would suggest that the developments of the last few months have demonstrated pretty clearly that NATO as a military organization has almost passed out of the picture. In fact that is the obvious reason the three wise men or the three blind mice have been set to work to discover a more effective role for the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. I think we can take it for granted that since the United States strategic bomber command succeeded in establishing bases on the perimeter of the North Atlantic area, the value of NATO from a military point of view has declined almost to the vanishing point.

I see the minister is shaking his head. He will shake his head until next year, when he will tell us that we all know NATO is no longer of any particular importance. Now we are told that it is one of our most important commitments.

We also have our commitment under the United Nations charter. It seems to me that this commitment must primarily be a commitment to take part in a United Nations police force to put down or deter outbreaks of war on a minor scale in different parts of the world. I think most people will agree that the United Nations is quite obviously not the organization that is going to stop a major global war, because members of the United Nations in that case will be the opposing forces. But it is of value yet in the prevention and discouragement of outbreaks of war on a small scale in different parts of the world, and for that Canada must maintain what the minister has described this afternoon as a mobile striking force.

But again I suggest that striking force must be equipped with modern weapons and must not be equipped with the weapons of world war II, even the more developed and streamlined versions of those weapons, because they would be quite incapable of meeting the situation we would face in playing our part in that particular commitment.

I think also that before we embark on any more military experiments we should make up our minds about one thing, and that is the western world's position vis-à-vis the U.S.S.R. This afternoon the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich voiced the view that in his opinion, and the opinion of many others he quoted, the danger of a global war is perhaps more remote now than it has been for many years past. I think most of us can perhaps agree with that position, that on an objective view of it there is very little to encourage the Soviet union to embark on a full-scale global war because of the disastrous and inevitable consequences to both sides in such a conflict.

Therefore I think we have to decide just what our position is with regard to the Soviet union. I have been somewhat uneasy of late in noting the lag in thinking in the western world with regard to the real dangers from the communist world; our preoccupation with the development of military means rather than paying attention to some of the other problems that are creeping in through the back door.

In that connection I want to quote from an article written by Dr. Thomas Balogh, of Oxford University, one of Britain's leading economists, in which he says:

> No longer can we think of the Soviet threat as a vast horde of (slightly comical) mujiks, poised to be driven forward by a ruthless dictatorship. No longer can the Americans derive solace from the fact that only through subversion and treason can the U.S.S.R. obtain the know-how on which survival in war and victory in peace depends. The attraction to non-committed areas radiating from the Soviet technical achievement, based on their own effort alone, begins to be apprehended.
>
> The fact is that in a period of unexampled prosperity and full employment, the west—except for Germany—has not proved capable of matching Soviet technical and economic progress. Each year the Soviet over-all growth—including the weak spot of agriculture—has been showing an increase of from 6 to 10 per cent over that of the previous year. Their industrial expansion seems to have been even faster, perhaps as high as 11 to 12 per cent or more. In other words, Russian national output can be expected to double every 12 years or so.
> This pace compares with an increase of United States manufacturing capacity of roughly 5 to 6 per cent annually since the war (except for the dip in 1949) and with a similar increase in Britain (interrupted in 1952-53 and about to slow down again). Over-all production in the west has increased much less—between 2½ to 4 per cent.

I think that reveals the real nature of the problem we are facing. I believe it is the explanation of the unilateral decision of the Soviet union to disband some 1,200,000 men. I believe that decision was based on two assumptions. The first was that the day of the conventional army is over and that the next war is going to be fought with these fearful thermonuclear weapons; and second, the men now in the armed forces of the Soviet union—at least that number of them they propose to disband—are badly needed in the Soviet industrial machine to increase this astonishing rate of progress quoted by Dr. Balogh. I think in Canada perhaps we had better make up our minds as to whether or not we can go on playing in the military world to the very expensive tune to which we have been playing over the last few years with absolutely no discernible results in effective defence, or whether or not we should turn our attention to the Soviet industrial development.

In this connection we should remember that the peoples of Asia and Africa are watching us, and they are not particularly impressed with the development of military weapons. They are more impressed with evidence in terms of human life within the rival areas of the world. If we could develop our area as one with terms that would constitute a model to be emulated, then it seems to me we should have gone a long way toward saving parts of Asia and Africa from falling within the scope of Soviet communist influence.

However, that is a problem and a question for the government of the day to decide, as to where we are going to devote our energies and our resources. But I will say this. If we propose to continue with the production of military equipment; if we propose to take a real and effective part in the defence of North America, which we are not doing today in any sense at all; if we propose to take an effective part in the policing service of the United Nations, then we shall have to do so on a realistic basis and not on the basis we have today.

We have to face the fact that at the present time we have not developed, and the minister this afternoon has been unable to give us any evidence that we have developed, the sort of military weapons that are of any consequence at this particular stage in the world's history. At the present time what we are being asked to endorse in this house is nothing more nor less than wanton waste of public funds and the resources of this country. I suggest to you, sir, that the people of Canada are going to want to have rather more conclusive evidence from the minister that he is spending their money wisely, and in the process of spending it is actually developing some military defence for this continent, than he has exhibited.

It may be, of course, that the government is not really proposing to spend this 1¾ billion they are asking from parliament this year. It may be they are merely asking for it in order to be able to ask for far less next year, when it will be more convenient to ask for less. I do think, sir, the time has come when the people of Canada and the government of Canada have to take a long look at this whole military situation and make up their minds once and for all whether a nation of the stature of Canada, great as our industrial resources are and great as our wealth in skilled manpower is, can actually in this day and age play a significant role in the military world.

I myself am dubious that we can do so. I am convinced at least that we can only do so as auxiliary to the efforts of our allies, in particular the United States and Great Britain, and that we can give limited aid in the provision of research work or possibly some minor future developments. Certainly we cannot hope to take part in the sort of game that is now being played by the United States and the Soviet union, a game of astronomical costs.

I noted the other day that Sir Anthony Eden, in replying to criticisms about his government's policy of continuing with the hydrogen bomb experiments on the Monte Bello islands, placed as the first of his government's considerations in that regard the consideration of national prestige. One can readily understand why Sir Anthony Eden and his government feel that way, because after all it is only a matter of a few years since Britain was one of the great leading powers of the world. It must be a bitter pill for the British people to feel that today there are, in effect, only two great powers in the world. One can forgive, I think, and understand the desire to maintain national prestige, even though quite obviously very little military advantage is to be gained from that procedure.

But Canada is in a totally different position. We have never been a great power. We have no long tradition of military superiority to maintain. We have, I think, the opportunity to achieve distinction and honour in the world by being one of the first nations in the world to turn our backs on the follies of military competition and to develop here in Canada, a society which will be a model worth emulating, so worth emulating that those who are uncommitted in the world will by force of example become committed to our side in the ideological struggle that lies behind these military considerations.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to speak over long, but I should like the indulgence of the house if I take it just a bit slowly and attempt to deal with some of the things which I believe have been, and could be, called serious omissions in the government's program. We are setting out today, Mr. Chairman, on what could be and what I hope will be the most important debate of the present session of parliament. We are living in—and I think most of us realize it—the most dangerous time in the history of the world. There are two camps divided by a broad and almost uncrossable stream, and those two camps in the world are set against each other. It appears that every basis of trust between them has been destroyed and there is no possibility, as far as I can see, of any lengthy peaceful coexistence between them.

I think these are facts we pretty well have to face up to. The whole world lives in fear that some incident might come to catapult us into what could be called a third world war. If such a war should come, then there is a very large body of expert opinion that believes it will be a total war involving the use of nuclear weapons of tremendous destructive power. To me, to think of such wholesale destruction is sickening, and it points up the necessity of doing everything we possibly can to prevent a major war of any kind breaking out.

Consequently I think it is understandable—it is to me—that emphasis on the part of the Canadian government should be placed on what is called the world's major deterrent, namely the long-range bombers of the United States strategic air command, armed with nuclear weapons, supplemented by our own.

I say it is understandable that emphasis should be placed by our government upon that strategic air command. This, of course, involves very close co-operation between Canada and the United States and the provision by Canada of our most efficient weapons, our most efficient mobile ground forces. I say the "most efficient" because I believe it would have to be the most efficient ground mobile force which our country is capable of raising.

We must do all we can, as other speakers have said, to ensure the adequacy of our defences in all three theatres, the air, the sea, and on the land. We in Canada cannot sit back and leave the defence of our country to our neighbours, the United States. There seems to be a growing opinion that this can be done, but to me it is unthinkable; to any red-blooded Canadian it would be. But we have to face the fact that defence costs are growing by leaps and bounds, and as the development of nuclear weapons goes forward our defences have to depend more and more upon very complex and costly apparatus.

We appear to have reached the point where the most penetrating consideration must be given to the problem of what should be Canada's role in the defence of North America and of the free world, facing up, as I said, to these facts about the tremendous costs that have to be met. Our population in Canada is small compared with the vastness of the territory that we have to defend, and there is a limit to the amount of money we can raise to spend on this costly equipment. How far can we go? I suppose the better way of asking that is, how far must we go, because to me it is unthinkable that we would not go as far as we must and as far as our strength and our resources would make it possible for us to go in any exigency that faced us.

During the past year there have been many outspoken criticisms of the government's defence policy by men eminently qualified by training and experience to be critics. These criticisms have caused commendable concern on the part of Canadians generally about the effectiveness of our defences. Many of us are wondering, however, if these criticisms are well-founded. It seems to me that is the question that is being asked by millions of Canadian people today. They feel, I am sure, as I do, that the only way we can get the answer is to have the whole matter of our national defence debated most thoroughly here in this house and at as great length as might be required to bring out the whole truth so that our future course will be crystal clear, if it is possible to make it so.

For these reasons we in this group sincerely hope that in the debate that is now launched there will be an honest determination to get quickly to the very core of the very grave defence problems that we do face. So as far as we in this corner are concerned we intend to forget manoeuvring for political advantage and to apply our minds to an attempt to find out what is the right thing to do. My colleagues and I will be critical, as we go from day to day in this debate, of some phases of our defence program; but, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me there never was a time in the memory of man when it was so necessary to be right. Therefore our criticisms will be directed toward trying to find what is right; and we can get at truth and find out our right course of action only by a prayerful and completely honest approach to the problems we face.

It seems to me it would have been better for all concerned—it would have been wise, at any rate—to have had these estimates sent to the estimates committee. I think it would have given many people a chance to discuss the technical details of the various components of the defence program and the contents of the white paper. It would have given us a far better chance to find out whether the moneys that are being spent are being spent effectively, and if we are really using those moneys to make ourselves ready to meet what we may have to meet. I wonder, and I am sure many people wonder with me, whether the dollars we are spending are truly girding us about with the things we need in order to be strong and effective if we have to meet an enemy in combat. Well, it seems to me we could have had a far better opportunity in the committee to bring out many of these things. However, I am not going to waste time moaning about it. The fact is that the estimates are now before the committee of supply and, as I said, I do hope there will be a sincere desire to get down to the very core of our program as quickly as we can and find out for ourselves whether these moneys are being effectively spent.

There are many questions one could deal with, but I am not going to spend too much time now on those questions. My colleagues who will follow me will deal with many of them. Concerning ground forces, about which there has been so much debate and contention in periodicals in this country of late, the minister says he intends to add a third brigade group. Well, we in this corner are with him in his desire to strengthen the fast, mobile ground forces. We think that is a very important part of our defence of this country. The addition of a third brigade is very important, particularly, as other speakers have emphasized, if it and its other two components are equipped with the latest equipment, the best that can be obtained; otherwise it is going to be useless if it is to face any attempt at invasion. And so we go along with the minister on that.

It is reported that Russia now has 400 submarines, many of them of the very latest type. Well, the natural question is, what are we doing in the way of counter-measures to meet the threat from those submarines? The minister said today that he and his department, and I think he mentioned the department of defence planning, are giving great consideration to the subject of effective submarine detector equipment as well as anti-submarine defence in general. We should know the fullest details concerning this and other things that are being done to render Russia's submarine fleet ineffective. One never knows just how effective that fleet may be in launching long-range missiles that could go into the very hearts of our cities. We would like to know more about the anti-submarine defence program, and we hope in the course of the debate it will be possible for the minister to give us more facts concerning it.

I would like to say just a few words concerning the reserve army. As one goes about the country one hears a great deal of criticism about the way the government is handling the reserve army. One hears that there are piles of good equipment in the armouries that could be used by these men in training, but use of it is denied to them. I do not know if that is a well-founded criticism, but I have heard it. It seems to me that sort of thing ought to be brought out in the open and freely discussed here so the people of Canada may know what the situation is and have their fears and anxieties set at rest.

I am not going to go into any further technical details with respect to the defence program, although I might say much time could be spent by any speaker re-emphasizing many of the things that have been brought up by other opposition speakers concerning the flaws in our defence program. I think there are some exceedingly important omissions on the part of the government which reveal to me a serious inconsistency and lack of balance. I refer to the fact that while the government is prepared to spend $1,750 million on defence against possible outward attacks by the enemies of the western world, yet there is very little attempt on the part of the government to defend our people against the insidious subversive internal attacks that are being made by these same enemies in their unceasing attempts to overthrow us from within.

I want to talk about that for a few minutes, because to my way of thinking it is a serious omission in our defence program. I would not be fair to the people I represent if I did not bring this matter well to the fore and expose the fact that we as a people —and I suppose all of us have to take some blame; we cannot lay it all on the doorstep of the government—are failing to progress in thought in keeping with the dangers that beset Her Majesty's loyal people everywhere. The government is antiquated in its thought if it continues to think only in terms of its arms program as the front line of defence. The front line, Mr. Chairman, has now been transferred into the western lands which are still fortunate enough to have escaped the fate of those who are languishing behind the iron curtains of the world.

Let me mention some of these failures on the part of this government and perhaps also on the part of this parliament, failures that I call serious omissions. The first of these is that we have failed to adequately educate the people of Canada as to the true enemy we face. Our people do not know; they are not adequately informed about who the enemy is and what he is doing and how to identify him. Too often government policy has made it appear as if we are the friend of the enemy, the friend of communist Russia and of the communists themselves. In such circumstances how can we hope to combat the aversion one finds on the part of our young people toward fighting against friends? That is what they say when we attempt to induce them to take up their duties in the armed forces. They say, "Why should we fight our friends? We are told these people are our friends and that we must make them our friends."

We are in a very difficult position, it seems to me, if we ever hope to convince our young people that strong action has to be taken against the enemy. We cannot at the same time tell them that this enemy is our friend. We have to tell our young people the truth and let them know that unless they are adequately prepared against the enemy their throats could easily be cut by these people who pose as friends and who are sometimes called our friends.

We have allowed red spies to freely come and go through our land. I was very glad to note the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration showed some concern about this matter in a general way by taking action in the case of Paul Robeson and the millionaire communist Lamonte. I support him and commend him for that action. I would suggest to the government this is a most important part of our front line defence. Keep it up and we will support you.

There is no reason in the world why communist spies should be allowed to come and go freely and spread their insidious propaganda and help to organize subversive activities throughout our country. The funny part of it is that frequently our press takes up the statements these people make, plays them up and uses terms that are evidently designed to sink into the minds of people, to be remembered by them. Too often members of the government have made unwise statements which have helped the enemy's cause. Though I do so in no caustically critical way, I refer to a statement made by the Prime Minister when he was in the Orient on his long journey. The Canadian Press reported him as saying:

> The government of Formosa—

That is the nationalist government.

> —does not represent the great mass of the Chinese people. I believe that one day it will be necessary to be realistic and admit that the present government of communist China is the government desired by the people.

I emphasize those last three words; how unwise they were. Statements containing words like those cannot help to keep the western world united and strong and prepared to do the job that must be done. It may be that the Prime Minister did not make such a statement and I must say I am not sure about it. The Canadian Press, however, did report it in that manner.

I have spoken briefly about our failure to adequately educate the people of Canada to the dangers of internal communist infiltration. Last year it fell to my lot to point out the communist infiltration of thought into Current Affairs, the magazine circulated to the Canadian forces. I brought to the ministers' attention a number of flagrant statements designed for no other purpose than to propagandize the virtues of the enemy and to soften the determination of our young people to take strong action in defence of the western world. The minister paid attention, and I must commend him for so doing. For some months after that I saw some improvement, though I must say to the minister through his parliamentary assistant, who is now present, that though he promised to send me copies of the Current Affairs magazine as it came off the press in succeeding months after I made my comments here, I am sorry to say I did not get them from that source. The ones I have seen I had to get in some other way, but I must say that those I have examined have shown considerable improvement.

I am thinking now how useful a defence measure could be made of that improved Current Affairs magazine if it were sent out to the colleges and universities of this country filled with vital information which our young people should know. Send it out with inspirational and factual stories of the great achievements of the commonwealth and let them see that we have a cause worth fighting for. I say to you that would be of tremendous advantage to the western world in general, and certainly a useful defence measure could be made of it.

While we are talking about getting information out to our people and the failure of the government adequately to inform the people of Canada, why should it not be possible to put on a drive to popularize Hansard, to get the people in every community to take Hansard into their homes, to subscribe to it and read this debate. If that were done there would be an awareness of our needs. I think we are missing the boat in not doing that.

This government needs to give attention to ideological warfare as a front line defence at the present time. They are not doing it. The communists are paying the greatest attention to ideological warfare and have done so for quite a number of years. I have on my desk an outstanding example of the kind of things the communists are doing. This bundle of papers and magazines and periodicals came to me, just one person in this country, in the mail from the Russian embassy in this city. Much of it is beautifully got up, much of it is cleverly worded, and all of it is intended to mislead. This kind of thing is going out through the mails to thousands of Canadians. What effect is it having on them? What are we doing to combat this sort of thing?

Let me point out that this is the literature which last year was extolling the virtues of the great regime of the famous Stalin. This year it is equally emphatic in crucifying the now infamous Stalin and building up Khrushchev. What are we doing to tell the people of Canada what Khrushchev was doing during the time the infamous Stalin was carrying on his depredations? We are doing nothing. We are falling down on the ideological front. We are a complete failure. Where is our spirit? As I said, much of this is cleverly worded and attractively got up.

Mr. Blackmore: And illustrated.

[Mr. Low.]

Mr Low: And illustrated. If anyone would like to see it I have it here.

An hon. Member: We all get it.

Mr. Low: We all get it; it comes to thousands of homes. I wonder if we have investigated how it gets through the mails. Is it given any priority by virtue of the fact that it comes from an embassy? I am not charging that it does get priority, but it would be interesting to know, and I hope in the course of the debate we will find out something about it.

I should like to speak briefly about another thing, the failure of the government to present a true and attractive democracy to our young people. One can be excused for saying something about this, because today many of our young people are finding it difficult to build up that spirit which says, "Go and take your responsibilities of citizenship along wth the great privileges that are yours; stand ready for strong action if it becomes necessary." All too often you hear them say, "Well, we have a lot of faults." I wonder what we are doing about that.

Some will argue, of course, that this is not a defence matter, but it is indeed an important part of our front line defence in my judgment that a positive approach to democracy should be presented to the youth of our land, to make them aware of the great privileges and corresponding responsibilities of citizenship in Canada under a free democracy. One can be excused for wondering sometimes if this government has lost its pride in the freedoms which were won for us by our forefathers who understood and appreciated the value of the great things that we have.

To this end why should we not have far more inspiring programs sent out over the great government-owned television and radio networks, far more inspiring than we see now? Why should we not have more inspiring things on the theatre screens throughout our country, perhaps paid for out of the general treasury, in order to instil in our people a will and desire to come to the defence of our great country whenever the need arises. In my judgment this would not be a waste but would be a great forward movement in an effective front line defence.

I admit that the government at present would have to be prepared to present some unsavoury things in regard to our democracy if they would be honest and truthful in facing the youth of our land with a real challenge against communist ideologies. But it is not too late to have a change of heart and transform these unsavoury things into effective facets of an inspired democracy.

We can do that; we must do that, otherwise we cannot hope to arouse our young people to the need to give everything that is in them when the need arises.

If $1\frac{3}{4}$ billion are needed to develop our military defences, then surely we have a case which must be put before the nation, a case which must show the critical situation in which democracy finds itself. The youth of our nation would respond to the appeal of truth and changed heart. I submit to you that if no such call is given, if no such challenge is thrown out, then in my judgment there is no justification whatsoever for the huge expenditures on defence that we are contemplating today. The two things must go hand in hand. It seems to me that if we are going to spend the money then we have to tell the people why. This government it seems to me leaves far too many things unsaid. I do hope that they will come to see the great gains that are involved in the things I have mentioned.

The purpose of highlighting this serious inconsistency and lack of balance on the part of the government and the reasons for the failure of the government to do certain important things is not by any means to expose or to carp, but rather to induce the government to give that kind of serious attention which this matter deserves. The west has been losing the cold war. We need not be in that very serious position, because we have the greatest and the most effective way of life ever devised to sell to the people of the world if we would just clear away some of the abuses and make our democracy that vital thing it can be. Then we should sell it to the world.

I believe that if the government would enlarge its defence program by adding a great ideological offensive we might be able to forestall the awful possibility that the great arms race might lead to another terrible conflict. At the same time let me say that we in this corner urge the government to keep on trying to find a way to a safe and honourable peace and disarmament. Do not go about disarming in any foolish way. Do not consider disarming until we have an effective guarantee that the others who are our enemies are going to disarm, and effectively.

At the same time, too, we urge that the government carry on an unceasing effort to find and remove the causes of war. It is our hope that the "three wise men" who are meeting on this very day, as they discuss the problem that is common to us all, the problem of the defence of the western world, will be successful and will not prove to be, as Canada's representative himself has said, three blind mice.

Mr. Nesbitt: There are always certain difficulties in dealing with the estimates of this department because, of necessity, so much of the information that should be given to us has to be kept confidential, in the public interest. Further, I suppose that the only member of this house who really can be considered an able strategist is the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich. The rest of us might well be described as armchair strategists, although from the facts presented in the white paper and in the minister's estimates certain logical conclusions can be drawn, and I think we are entitled to draw them.

I thoroughly agree with the statement made earlier this afternoon by the minister that we must be constantly on our guard and we must not be lulled into a stupor by Russian propaganda that is dished out with a smiling face. Most of us can remember only too well what happened at Pearl Harbor, when the Japanese diplomats were in Washington bearing the "cherry" branch, and I think it is certainly well for us to remember that.

As my time is somewhat limited, my remarks will be directed chiefly to the role of the navy. In the minister's white paper it is stated at page 4:

> Canada's naval role is the defence of our coastal areas, as always, and co-operation with our NATO allies in the defence of vital sea lines of communication . . .

I note that the first priority is the defence of our coastal areas, and the second is co-operation in NATO with respect to the defence of the sea lanes. There has been another suggestion, though it is not made in the minister's white paper. It has not been announced by the government, though I would be delighted to hear any comment in this regard, but it has been suggested that at the forthcoming commonwealth conference the question might be raised that some of the commonwealth countries might take over the duties the United Kingdom navy is at present carrying out with respect to certain areas. It has been suggested on the editorial page of the Toronto Telegram that possibly Canada might look after certain areas of the southern Atlantic and the West Indies, but I do not wish to deal with these questions because they are problematical; they do not deal with policy, but are only suggestions in the press.

My remarks will have three aspects with respect to naval policy. First of all, what do we have to do? Second, what do we have to do it with? Third, is what we have to do it with adequate for what we have to do?

First of all, what do we have to do? As the minister has pointed out in the white paper, the first consideration is the defence of our coastal areas; the warding off of attacks on our shipping, the laying of mines and possibly attacks by guided missiles. The minister mentioned that this afternoon, and I was particularly interested in view of the fact that it is a subject with which I dealt on the estimates last year. I do not think there is very much likelihood of attacks on this coast by surface ships of the Soviet navy, particularly in view of the large number of cruisers and larger ships that are presently used by the United States and the United Kingdom.

However, I should like to point out that the defence of coastal areas is necessary. Even a war involving hydrogen bombs would not necessarily terminate very quickly. The role of the navy must be emphasized again. I think it is quite clear that our sea lanes must be kept open, and in this regard I should like to refer to a few remarks—I do not intend to read them, but hon. members interested may refer them—by Mr. George Ward, parliamentary and financial secretary to the admiralty. These remarks appear on page 2331 of the United Kingdom Hansard No. 346, of March 8 of this year. Mr. Ward says:

> Clearly Russia recognizes that massive land and air forces and the thermonuclear bomb are not enough, and that she must also be able to dispute command of the seas.

He goes on further to point out that it will not be the western powers that will have the opportunity of starting a war. He says:

> But since we shall not decide when a war is to start, the power that does so will presumably have the wit to see that its submarines and, indeed, its entire navy, are at sea first . . .

In the defence of our coastal areas there are certain areas that are obvious, such as the approaches to our Atlantic provinces and to the Pacific coast, but there is another area which I think does not have the attention it should have, so far as the public is concerned at any rate, though possibly it has from the department. There is one very important area of Canada that has not received very much attention, and that is the Arctic and the Hudson bay area. I have brought this subject up in the house before. We have had plenty of indication that the Soviet union has been setting up air bases on the Arctic ice islands that float around in the polar waters. Apparently they are still outside Canadian waters, but there is nothing to prevent the Soviet union from setting up air and submarine bases on these Arctic islands in polar waters. I understand they could be set up in a week or ten days.

I also understand that the Soviet union has submarines which are investigating the floors of the ocean in the Arctic area, travelling underneath the ice. I think they are a great menace to this country. The Soviet union in the event of trouble starting, could secretly set up bases on these Arctic ice islands. It is something that should be considered, and I hope it is being taken into consideration by the government.

Regarding the defence of the sea lanes, of course, it is largely a matter of co-operation with our NATO allies. Apparently our role is that of an anti-submarine navy, which I think is quite proper. However, I note that on page 13 of the white paper it is stated:

> The Royal Canadian Navy has 40 warships currently earmarked as this country's contribution for the defence of coastal waters in the Canada-United States region and for the NATO naval forces under the control of the supreme allied commander, Atlantic . . .

There are a number of questions I should like to ask the minister. I should like to know what types of ships are included in those 40 ships. Are they destroyer escorts, minesweepers or frigates, or what are they? I hope the minister will give us an answer when the remarks on the first item are concluded.

The next question I should like to deal with is, what do we have to do it with? In other words, what naval equipment do we have to carry out the duties outlined by the minister? In this respect I should like to refer to page 6 of the white paper and see what ships we have available. First of all we have a light fleet carrier; there is one in commission and one under construction. I think hon. members are generally familiar with what type of ship that is. Next there are two light cruisers. I should like to know one or two things about these light cruisers, the Ontario and the Quebec. Have they been remodelled since the last war or have they had any conversion? How long is it intended to keep them in service, and what are they used for, apart from taking training cruises around the globe?

Next are the destroyer escorts. We see that there are 12 in commission and 13 under construction. As most hon. members know, the destroyer escorts of the Canadian navy are of several classes. There is the new St. Laurent class which, from what I have been able to gather, is an exceedingly fine ship. Then there are the Tribal class ships which have been remodelled and reconverted, and then there is the Crescent class, of which I believe there are two.

There are a number of questions I should like to ask the minister in this respect. I understand that all the destroyers under construction are of the St. Laurent class, but with respect to the destroyers in commission, of which there are 12, I believe I am correct that one is of the St. Laurent class, two are of the Crescent class, and I presume the rest are Tribal class. If I am mistaken I hope the minister will correct me.

There are a number of questions I should like to ask the minister with respect to these destroyers. First of all, when these Tribal class destroyers were converted and altered to suit modern conditions, what was the individual cost of converting these ships? More than that, I should like to know what is the life expectancy of these converted ships. Will they be good for three, five, ten years or what? I should also like to know what is the life expectancy of the new St. Laurent class. Are they expected to last five years, ten years, or what? I think these are things we should know.

Then I come to frigates; they are next on the list. I see that we have ten frigates in commission, and I gather that there are three on loan to the Royal Norwegian Navy. Then there are six in reserve and five being converted. The term "frigate" is to me, at least, a very confusing one. I should like to know a number of things about these frigates and I hope the minister will be able to give us the answers. In view of the very wide knowledge and information given members of the British House of Commons I cannot see that I would be asking improper questions when I put these questions to the minister.

First of all, are any of these frigates now in commission converted destroyers? Second, when were the frigates built that are in commission, in reserve or undergoing conversion? Third, what did the modernization of these frigates cost? Are they fast enough and capable enough to overtake and destroy or capture a modern Russian submarine? I think these are things we should know. The minister can tell us without disclosing their speed or anything of that nature. What is the life expectancy of these frigates? Are they expected to last three years, five years or how long? Do these frigates still have reciprocating engines or have turbines been supplied?

These are very pertinent questions. Are these frigates similar to the frigates that were in use at the end of world war II and have they just been altered and converted, or are they similar to the new frigates in the British navy which cost £2¾ million each and are really very much more like a destroyer? I believe these new British frigates are known as the Daring class. I should like to find that out, and I do not think it is proper for members on this side of the house to be expected to make remarks on the estimates of the department without knowing these facts.

Next I refer to the coastal escorts. I should like to know what kind of ships these are. Do they include former Algerine class minesweepers? Then I should like to refer to the use of helicopters. At the top of page 38 of the white paper for this year I find the following:

> An experimental anti-submarine helicopter unit has been formed to carry out trials with new underwater detection equipment and to perfect techniques for the use of this equipment.

I believe last year's white paper referred to the fact that there were going to be six helicopters used on an experimental basis.

The last thing I should like to deal with is whether sufficient provision is being made to look after our defence adequately, to take care of what we have to do. It would take me about five minutes to complete my remarks, Mr. Chairman. I see it is two minutes to six, and I wonder whether I might have permission to continue.

The Chairman: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nesbitt: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. It is very hard to say whether or not we have sufficient to take care of these matters until the minister answers some of the questions I have asked. However, there are some observations I think any member can draw from the white paper and from the estimates themselves without having yet received the answers I have asked of the minister. First of all, let me take cruisers. Why do we have these cruisers at all? If our navy is to be an anti-submarine navy, what is the purpose of these cruisers? They have a large complement, presumably 800 or 900 men, are very expensive to maintain and I cannot see that they perform any useful purpose except perhaps for training. As far as training is concerned, I am quite sure that could be carried out better in some respects with destroyer escorts, because that is the type of ship which our navy is using as its backbone, and I think properly so.

By way of a second observation and recommendation, may I say that I hope the government does everything it can to hurry up the completion of construction of the remaining 13 destroyer escorts. As I said before, from what I have been able to gather these are a very fine class of ship and our navy can well use them, particularly in defence against submarines, especially in Arctic waters where weather is a factor. We need these ships to defend ourselves.

The next point I should like to refer to is the use of helicopters for anti-submarine work, and in that connection I should like to quote an extract from the debate on the naval estimates in the United Kingdom. I refer again to the remarks of Mr. Ward who had this to say, as found at page 2335 of the weekly Hansard of the British House of Commons:

> The next point I want to deal with is the use of the helicopter for underwater warfare. It is proving very efficient at operating an asdic set from the air, free from ship noises and practically free from effective retaliation by the submarine.

Apparently the United Kingdom navy is already using helicopters for this purpose, and I would hope the minister would take into consideration the hurrying up of their use here. Helicopters are relatively cheap compared with expensive destroyers. They are not vulnerable to any attack and they are free from ship noises at sea so far as the detection of submarines is concerned. They can also be operated from the shore. Their only limitation is, of course, the weather.

The next matter I should like to deal with briefly is the fact that we must realize the danger from the Arctic. As I have already mentioned, if trouble arises there is great probability of the Soviet setting up bases in the Arctic. It has always been said that we cannot be attacked from there, that it is too difficult to use equipment. That is the same type of thinking some admirals and generals had with regard to Singapore. They said that any attack must come from the sea, that it could not come down the Malay peninsula. All hon. members know what happened. I re-emphasize that there are dangers of attack from the north. I should like to know whether our present ships can operate adequately in Arctic waters both in winter and summer months. I know that the atmospheric conditions, the fact that it is dark in the winter months and also that the water freezes would certainly limit the operations of the ships we have at present, and also the operations of aircraft.

If by some chance the Russians were able to set up bases on Arctic islands or on ice islands we would have to have some way of dealing with them. As the minister pointed out in his remarks this afternoon, it is very difficult and apparently not always too satisfactory to drop troops from aircraft in Arctic areas. There are limitations. I am also informed by people who should know that there would be certain difficulties in operating aircraft in severe winter and stormy conditions. It might be necessary to use naval ships of a special design in order to land troops in those areas to deal with any temporary Soviet bases that might be set up there. I would like to suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the government take into consideration the forming of a small, compact marine force in conjunction with the Royal Canadian Navy to be used for this purpose.

In this same regard, Mr. Chairman, it would be very unrealistic to expect our ships to operate in the Arctic without bases. I think it very important that some type of naval base, not large but adequate to deal with destroyers, be set up in the Hudson bay area. I think it is important that we have a naval base in the Hudson bay area and possibly one or two farther north. These would have to be selected very carefully. From these bases helicopters could be operated, as well as destroyers and this small marine corps I have suggested. If bases were set up in time of emergency by an enemy such as the Soviet, then we could deal with them even if our air force were hampered by weather conditions.

I have only one or two more remarks to make in connection with this question of using helicopters. Helicopters do not need to operate from an aircraft carrier. They can operate from small, cheaply constructed ships. I think the minister should consider the advisability of constructing quite a number of small ships that could carry three or four helicopters, whatever number is considered necessary, and these ships could be used in defence of our Atlantic coast, on Hudson bay and in other waters. They could be anchored in inlets and used as permanent bases, and when necessary could be used at sea to check up on submarines. The helicopter has a great advantage, and is far less costly when compared to a destroyer. These small ships could be cheaply constructed and would not be anything like the expense of an aircraft carrier.

I think that is something that should be considered. I know it is an unorthodox idea, but when you have certain specific conditions with which to deal, as we have in this country, some unorthodox ideas should be considered. It may be that they will not work, but they should be considered.

The other question concerns these 25 destroyer escorts that we will ultimately have. No doubt the government considers that they should be added but in my opinion the day of the convoy, as we knew it in the last war, is gone. Any large concentration of ships would be a prize target for any kind of thermonuclear bomb. Any convoy work would have to be done on the dispersal principle. I have no doubt that has been considered. In view of the great expense of these new destroyers, I understand nearly $18 million each, some other method may have to be used to help protect the sea lanes. As I have already suggested here helicopters, based on small, cheaply constructed ships, might be considered.

In closing, Mr. Chairman—I want to say that I appreciate the indulgence of the committee for these extra few minutes—I come to this question of manpower. The navy, of all the services, has come closest to reaching its objective. In the white paper there is some reference to the fact that they have had to kick out some members of the naval service as they have not been suitable. I think it may be possible to get more suitable men in our navy by the use of a better method of selling the navy to the public. People should be proud to join the navy. In my opinion it is the finest of the three services. The other two come close, mind you, but of all the services I think the navy is the finest. It should be pointed out to our young people that the navy offers a fine opportunity. I think possibly there should be a better method of selling the navy to these young people.

I do not wish to make any remarks about morale or conditions of service. I do not think any hon. member has a right to do this unless he has had an opportunity of going through the naval establishments or spending some time at sea. I am not prepared to do so because I have not had that chance. However, in closing I would say to the minister that possibly next year some hon. members on this side of the house might be given an opportunity of visiting naval ships or perhaps taking a few days' cruise on one of them so they can see exactly how the navy is operated. I hope to be able to do so myself, and I am looking forward to it.

With these suggestions I close my remarks, and I shall be waiting with interest to hear the answers the minister may give to some of the questions I have put to him.

Item stands.

PRIVILEGE

MR. LOW—REFERENCE TO REMARKS IN DEBATE THIS DAY

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I would crave the indulgence of the house for just one or two minutes in order to raise a question of privilege. In the course of my remarks this afternoon I quoted a statement reported to have been made by the Prime Minister as he toured the east in 1954. My attention has been drawn since to a correction which the Prime Minister made in this house on March 25, 1954, and carried at page 3332 of Hansard for that date.

I think it is only right, in view of the fact that the Prime Minister did make a correction and I had either forgotten about it or it had not been drawn to my attention, to put it on the record. I would not wish to wilfully do an injustice to the Prime Minister or any man and for that reason, if you will allow me, I should like to read these two or three paragraphs. The Prime Minister said:

> There is one thing, however, about which I do feel quite sure that there was an inaccuracy. There was one report that I had said that I was sure we would have to recognize the present government of China as the government the people of China wanted. I feel quite sure I never would use those words intentionally because I never had that feeling about the present government of China. But I must have used some words almost like them since so many of these reporters have come out with that as their version of what they heard and understood, that I felt we would have to be realistic and recognize the government of China "as the government the people wanted".
> I should not have said "the government the people wanted". What I had in mind was that, in spite of our dislike of any form of communist or totalitarian government, we could not expect to have to deal with the kind of government, representing the people on the other side, we would like them to have, the kind of government we would want them to have, but that we would have to deal with the government they had as a matter of fact, the government that was in control of the forces that were participating in the happenings that were causing such tension and such anxiety in the international field. That is what I meant. That is what I should have said in words that could not be mistaken or interpreted in any other way because I think that with such a statement there would have been little or no concern and little, if any, controversy about it in this country or anywhere else.

If I did any injustice to the Prime Minister this afternoon, I apologize for so doing and I hope this will correct it.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: We shall continue with this tomorrow.

It being ten minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

INVALIDS' PENSIONS

Question No. 459—Mr. Van Horne:

What action, if any, has been taken by the government to make invalids' pensions available to persons who, because of invalidity, are prevented from being employed in their normal or usual occupation?

Answer by: Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare):

The Disabled Persons Act provides for the payment of allowances to persons who are totally and permanently disabled, as prescribed by the regulations under the act.

The purpose of the act has never been to provide pensions to persons who because of invalidity are prevented from being employed in their normal or usual occupations. The scope of the legislation was determined, prior to its introduction in parliament, in joint conference and consultation with the provinces who did not at the time and do not now generally favour the establishment of eligibility for pension on the grounds of unemployability. The scope of coverage provided under this legislation is generally comparable to that provided under the two provincial laws (Ontario and Alberta) which preceded it.

Any future changes and modifications in coverage will depend on conference and consultations with the provinces.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE—AUTOMOBILE TRAVELLING EXPENSES

Question No. 468—Mr. Pallett:

What is the average per mile expense paid to employees of the Department of Agriculture for automobile travel while travelling on departmental business?

Answer by: Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture):

9·59 cents per mile, based on expenditures for fiscal year 1955-56.

NAVAL MAGAZINE, ROCKY POINT, B.C.—CIVIL SERVICE STATISTICS

Question No. 523—Mr. Pearkes:

1. How many civil servants are at present employed at the Royal Canadian naval magazine at Rocky Point, British Columbia?
2. What are the classifications held by these persons, and how many persons are employed in each classification?
3. What salaries are paid in the various classifications?

Answer by: Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence):

1. 74.

2 and 3:

Classifications	No. of Employees	Salary Ranges
Technical officer 5 ..	1	$5670-6120
Technical officer 3 ..	1	4710-5310
Technician 3	3	4410-4860
Technician 2	4	4050-4500

ILO CONFERENCES—CANADIAN REPRESENTATION BY U.S. CITIZENS

Question No. 525—Mr. Herridge:

1. Did any United States citizens represent Canada at conferences of the international labour organization, or any agency thereof, since January 1, 1950 to date?
2. If so, what are their names?
3. Were their expenses paid by the federal government? If so, what was the total amount in each case for this period?

Answer by: Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour):

1. Employer and labour delegates and their advisers attending conferences of the international labour organization or other meetings held under its auspices are nominated by the representative national organizations of employers and labour. It has been the policy of the Department of Labour to approve nominations so made. The department is informed that two persons nominated by their respective organizations since 1950 were, at the time of their nomination, citizens of the United States.

2. These were Mr. Clyde E. Shumaker, nominated by the Canadian Manufacturers Association to attend the thirty-sixth ILO conference in 1953 and the thirty-ninth ILO conference in 1956; and Mr. H. C. Banks nominated by the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada to attend the meeting of the ILO industrial committee on inland transport, held in Geneva, February, 1954.

3. Clyde E. Shumaker
   1953-54—$1,496.13, paid by the Department of Labour.
   Hal. C. Banks
   1953-54—paid by the international labour organization.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, June 21, 1956

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

APPROVAL OF REPORT OF CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance) moved:

That the report of the civil service commission respecting the position of librarian 5, library of parliament, laid upon the table of the house June 18, 1956, be now approved.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSING

MORTGAGE MONEY—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF POLICY ON ALLEGED SHORTAGE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in view of an article appearing in this morning's Globe and Mail to the effect that the supply of mortgage money from chartered banks and insurance companies for National Housing Act financing of new houses has almost vanished across Canada, with millions of dollars' worth of applications being returned unapproved in recent weeks, that the worst hit are Ontario and Quebec, and that the builders describe the situation as bad and rapidly getting worse and that building may be at a standstill in Windsor and in the Toronto district, I would like to ask the Minister of Finance whether this tight-money policy announced by Mr. Coyne of the Bank of Canada is the considered policy of this government?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think I answered on a previous occasion that I was informed of the increase in the discount rate which took place on, I think, April 4. The other features involved in the article referred to have to do with banking practice of the chartered banks.

Mr. Rowe: I should like to ask a supplementary question. In view of the fact that this increase was ordered by the Bank of Canada, have the Minister of Finance and the government abdicated their fiscal responsibilities to the governor of the Bank of Canada?

Mr. Harris: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, arising out of the last answer may I ask the minister whether or not there is any foundation for the press release of two days ago to the effect that within the next three or four weeks, or possibly in about six weeks, there will be a reduction in interest rates in the Bank of Canada? In order to relieve the situation to which reference was made by the hon. member who asked the question, what consideration is being given to meet this situation by bringing about a reduction in interest rates?

Mr. Harris: Well, Mr. Speaker, first of all there is no basis for the newspaper speculation that a reduction might occur; that is not to say that it would not, however. These matters are never forecast; they are only announced when they occur.

As to what the government is doing, since this question arose—I think it was brought to our attention about ten days or two weeks ago—my colleague the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) has been carefully considering the housing situation in Canada and we have been consulting with him and with the banks with respect to it. I understand, in addition to that, the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Hunter) has asked me to meet a delegation of the builders' association next Tuesday and we are looking forward to doing that for the purpose of finding out from their viewpoint how serious the situation may be in the city of Toronto. I presume there will also be representations from other parts of Canada.

I might also add, however, that I will be seeing the bankers' association tomorrow but nothing is to be read into that other than the statement that I am going to see them.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, on the same matter, in view of the fact that there is a policy of restriction of credit involved here as well as a policy of increased interest rates, is the government attempting any consultation through the Bank of Canada in this regard with a view to alleviating some of the undue restriction of credit which seems destined now to curtail house building so seriously?

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, we are, of course, keeping a very careful watch on the results of the policy and how it may be affecting particular groups of people and we shall continue to do so.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If I may carry on, Mr. Speaker, in view of the answer given by the Minister of Finance, I would ask him whether or not he has received representations from Regina and Saskatoon respecting the serious situation created for housing by the rise in interest rates and whether, in view of the latter words in his answer given a few minutes ago to the effect that he is going to meet with the builders' association and the bankers' association, he can hold out a little hope that there will be a reduction?

Mr. Harris: I said before that I merely made the bald statement I was going to meet with them. In answer to the previous question, I did not receive any representations from either Regina or Saskatoon. The only representations I received were from the city of Toronto and those the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) sent me.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the seriousness of this situation, will he consider arranging for an early discussion of the matter here in the House of Commons so that the views of hon. members may be communicated to the government?

May I also ask him if when he meets with the bankers' association and others he will give consideration to the changing of the government's policy from one of general credit control to one of selective credit control in order that such credit as is available might be made available for the building of homes?

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) reminds me that he and the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Brown) did forward to me representations with respect to the city of Windsor.

In answer to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), may I say that we would of course consider other questions that might affect the economy. Whether or not a general or a particular form of credit control would be desirable will be considered from day to day. I do not think I should go further than that except to say that I shall consult with my colleague the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) with respect to the debate my hon. friend wishes to have.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask a further supplementary question. Is the Minister of Finance aware that under the general credit control policy of the government money is available for speculative investment but not for the building of homes?

[Mr. Harris.]

Mr. Harris: I would not want to admit that at the moment.

Mr. Knowles: It is true nevertheless.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether he would care to clarify what he said a few moments ago, that he had become aware of this shortage or apparent shortage only a few weeks ago. On January 19 the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) in replying to a question said that there was no indication by prospective borrowers that there was going to be a shortage. Was it only a few weeks ago that the minister became aware of a shortage?

Mr. Harris: I think I can correctly say it was only about two weeks ago that I personally was informed of the difficulties.

Mr. Knowles: Where has the minister been?

GRAIN

WHEAT—INQUIRY AS TO ALLOCATION, MOVEMENT AND SHORTAGES OF BOX CARS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is the minister aware that a considerable number of box cars loaded with grain are sitting on prairie sidings? Why are they not being moved forward to ports or terminal storage? When will they be moved?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I was not aware that there were loaded grain cars sitting on sidings. I am aware that deliveries to terminals are running at a record rate and I am aware that movements for the past two months and for the current month are assuming record proportions. I can only assume that if the cars are sitting on sidings they are waiting for motive power to pick them up or they are waiting for their position in a schedule which corresponds with the capacity to unload at the terminals.

Mr. Harkness: I think perhaps I should ask the minister to look into this matter because I saw a considerable number of cars which I was told had been sitting there for quite a long time.

An hon. Member: Idle rumour.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should also like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce in connection with the shortage of freight cars, particularly on Canadian Pacific lines. Without prefacing my remarks by saying what is the situation I would ask the minister what is being done—I read his statement yesterday—to correct what is almost a blight as against Canadian Pacific lines and the farmers on those lines. What is being done to assure at least a reasonably fair distribution of cars in those areas served by the Canadian Pacific? I saw it myself during the past few days and I know what is the situation.

Mr. Sinclair: The Canadian National are doing a good job.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I announced earlier in the session that it would be impossible to follow the policy of last year in maintaining uniform deliveries at all country elevator points. I pointed out that this is an exceptional year in the movement of grain out of Canada and the only way to take full advantage of it is to move to terminals the type of grain for which there is a ready sale. That policy has been followed and at the moment a very definite effort is being made to bring points which now have a low quota up to the average quota for the three prairie provinces.

I am aware, as I said yesterday, that the Canadian National have moved a considerably greater proportion of the grain on their lines to terminals than has the Canadian Pacific. In the light of that fact, arrangements are being made so that the farmer who formerly delivered to a Canadian Pacific point and who is within trucking distance of a Canadian National point will have the option of delivering to alternate delivery points. In other words, if there is a low quota on the Canadian Pacific point and a high quota on the Canadian National point within trucking distance, the farmer may deliver to the high quota point.

This is one step that is being taken. As far as Canadian Pacific lines are concerned, every effort is being made to favour the low quota points. I am hopeful that there will be a definite improvement before the end of the crop year.

It is touch and go to keep the right kind of grain at ocean terminals. Boats are arriving in great numbers and they are arriving out of order. We may plan on loading No. 2 northern the following week, and perhaps No. 5 northern boats that had been expected earlier will suddenly arrive and we must have that grade of grain as well. It is a tremendous job, and I should mention the fine work of the transport controller in that connection. To date, whilst there has been some small amount of demurrage paid, he has succeeded very well indeed in having the kind of grain in hand that the boats require. But we have a situation on the lower St. Lawrence today that there is not enough grain in the elevators to take care of one week's loadings. In other words, we are unloading canalers to provide grain needed to load waiting ocean boats. Whilst we have not the same situation on the west coast, there it is quite a problem of having adequate stocks of the grades required to fill the ocean boats.

I think my hon. friend would agree with me that in a year like this the principal objective must be to deliver grain to our overseas customers in the largest possible quantities. If we are not able to even out the deliveries at every country elevator, we can compensate after August 1, for this abnormal movement promises to continue. We shall try to see that in the long run every producer gets an even break.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That suggestion that farmers on C.P.R. lines will be able to market at C.N.R. marketing agencies or local elevators will be helpful. I ask the minister also whether there is any available storage space at Churchill today. What is the situation there? If there is available space, has consideration been given to allowing wheat to be stored, at the moment not to be marketable —the grades that are not desired at the moment—at Churchill, particularly from C.P.R. lines which up to the present have been closed?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Churchill is filled to capacity. It was filled to capacity last fall. The season there will open about the middle of July, and that additional movement will be helpful, and at that time we can favour C.P.R. delivery points to some extent.

PIPE LINES

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES—INQUIRY AS TO AMOUNTS ADVANCED TO DATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Is the Minister of Trade and Commerce able to inform the house what amount has been advanced to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines up to this date by Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The amount of money advanced by the crown?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): The amount of money advanced by the crown corporation up to this date.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I cannot give that information. I shall be glad to look into the matter and give it to my hon. friend tomorrow, if any money has been paid.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Is the minister able to tell us how much money has been advanced to the crown corporation by the crown?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No, I cannot say that. I do not remember the figure, but I shall look into it and give the answer tomorrow.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Defence services—

235. To provide for the Canadian forces, the defence research board and other expenditures relating to defence, including contributions toward the military costs of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization; to authorize expenditures in the current year out of the amount hereby provided, not exceeding $143,000,000, under the provisions of section 3 of the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, and to provide that, notwithstanding subsection (3) of that section, where equipment or supplies are transferred, the estimated present value thereof shall be credited to this vote instead of being paid into the special account mentioned in the said subsection (3), and when so credited may be expended for the purposes of the Canadian forces; and notwithstanding section 30 of the Financial Administration Act to authorize total commitments for the foregoing purposes of $3,470,423,461 regardless of the year in which such commitments will come in course of payment (of which it is estimated that $1,675,484,744 will come due for payment in future years), $1,722,797,717.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, I am sure that every member of the house who has read the white paper and realizes the importance of this debate wants to say something in the debate, and I am no exception. So far as information is concerned, the white paper leaves much to be desired. Practically all members of the house are in the position of having very little personal knowledge of defence matters or whether the money is being spent judiciously or otherwise. Of course, the Minister of National Defence, who presides over the three defence branches, is also in the position where he must accept the information given to him by the heads of the different branches. He is not in a very much better position than we are when it comes to analysing the expenditures that are made and the value we are receiving for the money spent.

I know that the minister has three very efficient deputy ministers. I have done business with all three and they are very courteous, fast in their work, and will give you any information you are looking for within reason. But at the same time I have always been of the opinion that one of the main needs of the defence department and one of the greatest assets that the Minister of National Defence could have is a continuing defence committee of the House of Commons. They have one in Britain and they also have one in the United States. In my opinion, whoever opposes the idea is doing the Minister of National Defence a disservice. In this house there are approximately 100 members who are ex-servicemen, army, navy and air force, and they could be very helpful to the minister if we had a continuing committee before which the heads of the departments could be called, in camera, if necessary, in order that we might get all the information they could give with respect to defence spending, obsolescence of equipment, progress in the future and so forth. I think even the fact that such a committee existed would be a deterrent to those in the different branches of the department who might be inclined to spend recklessly. In my opinion the fact that there was a committee before which they could be called would act as a very useful brake, and I think the opinions of members of the house with experience in the services would be valuable to the Minister of National Defence.

I do not visualize the committee as a committee to get information for propaganda purposes or to make political capital. I visualize the committee as a responsible committee, one that would realize the implications of the international situation and whose members would use whatever knowledge they had for the purpose of assisting the defence department in the best interests of the country. I believe the cabinet should give serious consideration to the matter.

Of course, in 30 minutes one cannot go over the whole white paper, but in reading it it seems to me that the greatest difficulty facing the defence department today is manpower. I think that is pretty well pointed up on page 19 of the white paper, and I should like to refer to paragraphs 59, 60 and 61 where I find the following:

59. During 1955 the R.C.N. enrolled 3,088 officers and other ranks and wastage totalled 2,671. . . .

60. The army's total enrolments last year were 5,937; and net wastage, 8,222. . . .

61. During 1955 the R.C.A.F. enrolled 8,153 officers and other ranks and wastage totalled 6,573.

I am sure the minister will agree with me that a system of enlistment or induction where the total enrolment for the year is fairly well offset by the wastage leaves much to be desired. To me it indicates that there is something wrong with the examinations and the aptitude tests that are given when these people are taken into the services. In the three services—army, navy and air force—your total enlistment was almost offset by your wastage or people that are going out. I therefore believe that the government is going to be obliged to take a straight look at this question of manpower.

Comparisons are made all the time with respect to the progress made in the Soviet union, and it is closely related to this question of manpower. Of course, being a dictatorial set-up, the Soviet union call people in, set the courses and the period of enlistment, and I will wager that there is not much wastage in their forces. If we are going to take the Soviet union as the yardstick on the question of manpower and on other questions, we must rethink this whole question through as to how we are to be able to meet the efficiency of a country where two or three men make the decisions from which there is no appeal, where you do what you are told and where decisions can be made fast. That is the question we must face in the future and there must be a great deal of rethinking on the whole subject. As indicated by the white paper, I think this question of manpower is a fairly serious one. Of course, we must not forget the recommendations being made by General Simonds right across the country to the Legion and so on. Maybe he has something. However, I just want to leave with the minister the thought that he has on his hands a fairly acute manpower problem with respect to keeping the services up.

On the other hand there is a great deal of thinking we must do with respect to this whole international situation. We send visitors from Canada over to the Soviet union, including Mr. Duncan and others. They come back here and they write pamphlets and deliver lectures in which they point up the efficiency of the Soviet system, the progress they are making in the air, with respect to guided missiles, up-to-date planes and all that kind of thing. As I said before, if the Soviet union is to be taken as the yardstick in these things and if we are to be expected to compete, these people who are making these speeches and writing these pamphlets must go all the way with it. The apparatus of the Soviet union controls everything in the country. All of the profits of industry, agriculture and everything else in that country go to the state. Three or four men can blueprint what is going to be done and make the decisions, and they have the money to spend. The thing that Mr. Duncan and these other people are not telling us is that in the Soviet union the profits that go to industry in this country are available for distribution in the field of the development of armaments, social services, and all of these things. If we are going to take the Soviet union as a yardstick and are going to try to keep up with them in the field of efficiency, then much of the profits that go into the coffers of industry in this country must be used for the purposes for which the Soviet union is using them. That is the thing they are not telling us, and that is the difference.

With respect to this question of war, may I say this. For the last three years I have been personally convinced that there is not much danger with respect to a global war. First, I am sure the United States will never start it and I am reasonably sure we will not and Britain will not, but we have to keep our guard. My belief is that the Soviet union is more afraid of war today than the western world, and she is afraid of it for this reason. The Soviet union has extended far and has taken over many countries. She has taken over the whole of Europe right into East Germany and she is tangled up with the Orient; she is mixing in with the Middle East. Today, the Soviet union is like the fly that captured the flypaper; she is there and she is stuck on it. She has to police and maintain armies in all of those satellite countries. I am reasonably sure—and I am sure she is sure—that if an over-all shooting war started tomorrow the same machinery would be underground in those captive countries that was there when Hitler subjugated them. A shooting war tomorrow would cause a revolution right from East Germany back into the Ukraine. I am sure she realizes that and she does not want a shooting war.

I believe the new look in Russia is a new policy. I do not believe it is a tactic this time. I believe we should recognize the fact that an over-all global war would mean a counter revolution as far as Russia is concerned, which might spread right through the whole of that country. That is the reason for the change from the cult of the individual to the collective administration that Bulganin and Khrushchev are setting up today. I am reasonably sure of that but, on the other hand, there is a new war and it is a trade war.

The Soviet union realizes that if she is to survive there can be no shooting war. She is doing her best to offset that at the present time. I believe her efforts for peace are legitimate and she means it. I believe she thinks—and I think she is on sound ground —that if she can put over this program of peaceful coexistence and go into a trade war with the west and use the weapons of economic development, mutual aid and social change, in time she is going to be able to beat us in that field unless we recognize the fact that we have to get into that field and match wits with her.

I do not believe in this business of giving away the resources of the country to other countries on a relief basis. I do not believe you can buy friends in that way. I do not believe that aid to any of the countries, including countries under the Colombo plan, if we are giving it away, is going to do us any good. I think the main question in the countries to whom we are giving aid is one of self-determination. I think that is the one disturbing factor in the world today. The whole continent of Africa is uprooted. Do not forget, it is not a new thing. The prejudice is there and it goes back for hundreds of years. They want to run their own show. The same thing is true in Algeria. That question is 125 years old and it is not going to be settled with guns. That is another point of unrest. It is true in Israel and in the Arab countries. That is another see-saw thing that will have to be settled. The giving of stuff to these people, in my judgment, is not going to buy the settlement; it is not going to buy them any more than it bought Tito. Today he has gone back to his blood brothers. I am not objecting to it. He has the right to make that decision. The fact that the west made loans to him and was good to him during his period of trial did not make any difference.

I believe the question of self-determination has to be settled. On the question of mutual aid, if those people want aid from us or from the United States, let them make application for it and it should be given on a basis of either a loan or an investment, and they should be allowed to run their own show in their own countries.

Of course, we have to continue our defence spending. One of the reasons why I should like to see a defence committee established is that we might be able to iron out those difficulties in that committee and send the collective judgment of a large group from this house back to the heads of the defence department. It would do the heads of the defence department good to talk to the members; it would do us good to talk to them. We would get much valuable information and when the minister's estimates came before the house next time perhaps that information would place us in the position where we in this house would be helping the minister to put over a program that we knew something about.

I am not going to speak at length on this particular problem, Mr. Chairman. I merely wanted to express these three or four points that I have made. Before I sit down I urge the minister to give consideration to the setting up of a parliamentary defence committee on a permanent basis with liberal terms of reference and with powers to compel the attendance of responsible officials. At this very moment a United States senate committee has powers to compel responsible officials to testify and it is conducting a comprehensive investigation into certain aspects of the United States defence program. The Canadian parliament has always been denied this right despite the billions that have been spent for defence purposes. I know for at least four years on end previous to the minister's taking over, the Leader of the Opposition and I were two members of the house who hammered on this question of a continuing defence committee, and I think it would be one of the most valuable assets of the minister's department.

I am not going to go into the question of weapons. I do not think any of us knows too much about it, but I will say this. A plane on the assembly line today is obsolescent before it is off the line. That has been the history of development in the air.

Another point I should like to make is that Canada has not the kind of money needed to match an arms race with the United States and the Soviet union. We just do not have that kind of money, and that arms race is going to go on and on. The Soviet union does not have to tax its people for it. It takes over wealth-producing industry in the country and applies whatever comes out of it to whatever it needs in the country. The United States is a huge, rich country. It has a lot of money but it is finding it difficult today to keep up with the expenditures made in the Soviet union in keeping equipment up to date. Perhaps we wasted a lot of money in building the D.E.W. line and the other apparatus that is supposed to warn us when planes come over. If you believe what you read in the press—and the white paper commented on it—it will be a push-button war. Planes will not come over. They will push a button and a guided missile will come across and land wherever they want it to land. Therefore, we may be wasting a lot of money in the development of interceptors, and so forth, because you are not going to intercept those missiles. They go above the stratosphere and appear from nowhere; you hear a bang and that is it. However, I think the white paper itself indicates, in so far as this country is in a position to do so, that the defence department is aware of what is going on. They set out all of the new techniques and all of the new equipment, and we are attempting to match it as best we can. But, as I said before, we do not have the kind of money needed to match an arms race with the United States and with the Soviet union.

I know we cannot change what is in the book. The money has been spent. We are going to spend so much next year. The government is going to do it with certain techniques and on certain strategic projects and that kind of thing. This house has not enough information to be able to argue about it or make recommendations concerning it but there are two things I would like the minister to think about arising out of this debate.

First of all there is the question of manpower and wastage in the methods employed in bringing people into the services. That wastage clearly indicates there is something wrong with the examinations; maybe it is a rush to get people but we must not forget we are getting our people on a voluntary basis. In the United States there is a draft board and when your number is up you simply go. There is no exemption for baseball players, boxers or hockey players. You simply go in and do your bit in the defence of the country. In the Soviet union they do not even draft their men, they simply shovel them in and then select them and when you are selected for a position it is a case of doing it or else. There is no wastage there. The defence department in this country is faced with the problem of having to send teams out to travel across the country recruiting people on a voluntary basis. By and large the people we are getting in the services are those who are unemployed. There are not many who are vacating attractive jobs and going into the services.

Mr. Byrne: Oh no?

Mr. Gillis: The hon. member for Kootenay East says, "Oh no". How many are leaving the mines out in your riding to go into the services?

Mr. Byrne: Lots of them.

Mr. Gillis: Not too many. We are getting our young officers from the universities and I might say to the minister that the officers' training course is an excellent way for young men to get university training. These boys are going through university and are being paid for it and at the same time they are receiving military training. They either stay in the regular forces or are potential material for the regular forces if and when they are needed. I am talking about the rank and file of the army, navy and air force. I think the air force does a splendid job. There is an excellent and efficient set-up at the main induction centre down at St. Johns, Quebec, and there is an excellent weeding out process. As the minister knows, young men go in there and take the basic training and write their aptitude tests. I think they have to write about 12 different tests during the two months they are there, and when the tests are completed it is possible to decide where the young men should go, whether it be to the air crew, maintenance or the electronics field. In other words, no square pegs are being put in round holes; a very good job is being done there.

There was a considerable wastage last year however, as the minister knows, and I think it is due to the fact that when they go in most of the boys have never done much work. They are just not physically able to take the kind of training they are required to take during the first couple of months of their basic training, which is pretty tough.

I would like to see the minister make some pronouncement about a continuing defence committee. I think that is something that must be done. We should take advantage of the large number of ex-servicemen in this house and establish the kind of machinery that can scrutinize not only the expenditures that are being made but also the methods employed in building up the services. As I frequently pointed out to the Hon. Brooke Claxton when he was here, I think he made a big mistake when he did not enlist the support, aid and advice of the hon. members of this house who are available for a committee of that kind. I think it would be one of the biggest assets of the Minister of National Defence.

That is all I have to say at the present time of a general nature. We may have some more picking on the minister to do when his estimates are before us.

Mr. McIvor: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Gillis: Yes.

Mr. McIvor: Does this manpower question lead up to conscription and are you in favour of it?

Mr. Gillis: Well, Mr. Chairman, in reply to the hon. member for Fort William I would say, first of all, I do not make the laws and it would not make any difference what I thought about it. I mentioned the wastage of manpower and the difficulties encountered in building the services up and the fact that General Simonds was selling the idea of a selective service across the country to the legion branches. Now, whether or not I am in favour of it is not pertinent to the discussion at the present time, but if that question ever comes before this house I will state emphatically where I stand on it.

Mr. Blair: Attaboy.

Mr. Brooks: Very good.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, this is the first opportunity we have had during the present session to discuss the most important subject that will come before the house both from the point of view of the amount of money involved and also from the point of view of the purpose for which the money is being raised.

The statement made by the minister yesterday added very little to the white paper. The white paper has been very correctly described editorially as a paper which says nothing. It says it in good English and in good French, depending on which of the two publications one reads, but the fact remains that as for stating a policy for Canada at this time the white paper might just as well have been brought out of the records of several years ago.

It is difficult to believe we are now called upon to discuss national defence in the atmosphere in which it has been presented by the minister. Just in these past few months sweeping reorganizations have been announced in Britain and in the United States as well as in Russia. In fact, there have been two stages of substantial reorganization mentioned in Britain in the last six months. First came the white paper on December 21 last when a very frank appraisal of the situation was made and a general reassessment of the role of certain branches of the services was presented to the House of Commons and the people of Britain. Then came sweeping changes in the United States to be followed by still further adjustments based upon the extended inquiries that have taken place there. The Soviet union reduced the number of divisions and streamlined its force generally with a recognition of the modern concept of war which has emerged from the thermonuclear age.

There is little here to suggest that we are preparing ourselves for the kind of war with which we would be confronted if that war should come. God forbid that it should ever come. No one is under any misapprehension as to the horror that would accompany a large-scale war under present conditions. The dreadful fact remains, however, that these preparations are made with a realization and recognition that there could be war. It is, of course, correct to say that what is being done here, as in other free nations, is to seek to build military strength in a way that will prevent a general outbreak. That, however, does not get away from the fact that military preparation recognizes the possibility of war.

The estimates now before us call for an expenditure of $1,775 million. Further amounts probably will be added by the supplementary estimates which will be presented later. What have we before us to really tell us whether this money is being properly spent or otherwise? We really have nothing but bland assurances which were not substantiated by the detailed facts which would make it possible for us to pass judgment on this vitally important question. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney) warned us against a possible tendency to give credence to the smiling assurances which we are receiving. I should like to read his words. They express the view of the government in regard to the present situation, and I quote from page 5209 of yesterday's Hansard as follows:

> To maintain the deterrent power of the free nations will not be an easy task, essential though it is to our survival. Paradoxically, as the existence of the deterrent continues to protect the peace, the continuance of that peace itself may tend to soften up the very deterrent force on which it depends, for it tends to give credibility to smiling assurances and friendly, folksy visits, all propagating the view that the day of world brotherhood has dawned at last, and suggesting that we can now safely set aside our defence programs, with their heavy costs, and concentrate on the much more pleasant task of raising our material standard of life.

Doubtless the statement that was made about the suggestion that we now disarm referred to a letter sent to the Canadian government by Premier Bulganin. I wonder if that was sent as a jest? I wonder what was the Canadian reply to the suggestion that we should disarm in the face of the massive forces possessed at this time by Russia. For a moment I was not certain what the minister was intending to imply when he spoke about giving credence to smiling assurances. What I think we should be on guard against is not only the smiling assurances from outside Canada but the smiling assurances from this government that all is well in our national defence preparations.

Let us examine what really are the facts. The only change of any significance that was mentioned yesterday was that the ten auxiliary squadrons of the Royal Canadian Air Force will no longer be part of our first line of defence. That probably is not very encouraging to units which had contemplated a role as part of the first line of defence. The reason for this decision is not made very clear, although the minister does say that the decision was reached reluctantly.

Let us see what has actually happened. Instead of ten auxiliary fighting squadrons which were intended to be part of the first line of defence in Canada and were intended, according to the statements made over and over again, to be equipped and trained for that purpose, we are now to have only six. One of the remaining four will undertake light transport duties. Another is to be used for the training of navigators. Another is to be grounded and used for ground duties. The fourth is to be disbanded.

Instead of an increase in our air establishment this in fact means a decrease of four squadrons if the original intention of those auxiliary squadrons had actually been carried out. If special organizations were needed for the training purposes to which three of these four squadrons are now to be devoted those training units should have been organized for that purpose. It is true that the remaining six squadrons will be better equipped than they have been, but they are to be supplied with F-86s which are being withdrawn from first line use.

Why is this being done? This very question was dealt with on earlier occasions. The suggestion was made in earlier years that these auxiliary squadrons should be equipped with F-86s. I should like to read what the Minister of National Defence at that time said on April 15, 1953, as reported at page 3922 of Hansard. The Hon. Brooke Claxton, who was minister of national defence at that time, had the following to say by way of explanation as to why F-86s should not be supplied to these auxiliary squadrons:

> The CF-100 was designed for the defence of Canada, and the F-86E was not. While the F-86E is unquestionably the leading aircraft of its type in the world today, it by no means follows that that is the ideal type of aircraft for the kind of operation we envisage as being necessary to defend Canada in the next few years. The range of this aircraft is not great, it has not full instrumentation and does not carry a navigator. Consequently anyone familiar with flying conditions in our north country would recognize that, while the F-86E would give a good account of itself, the losses would be high due to the fact that it might not be able to get back to its base again.

The subject came up for discussion the following year and at that time the Minister of National Defence, as reported on page 4991 of Hansard of May 21, 1954, had this to say:

> There is another reason, and that is that these Sabre fighters are really not well suited for the air defence of Canada. They have a relatively short range, they have only one pilot; they have not a complete set of navigational instruments, and if they went into the air and got into a dogfight in Canada they might have great difficulty in getting back to their airfield. If we had our fighter defence in Canada staffed by Sabre fighters it would mean that we would have to have our airfields for fighter defence at least twice and probably three times as numerous as they are today because of the very much shorter range of the aircraft. Along with double or triple the number of airfields at present in existence we would have to have an increase in their attendant facilities, such as runways, oil tanks, hangars, married quarters, and everything else. An airfield costs about $30 million, and we would also have to double or triple the number of emergency landing fields.

If the Sabre fighters were not well suited for the air defence of Canada in 1954, what has changed the picture today? If the F-86 was not suitable for the service referred to, why should that be the aircraft supplied to the squadrons which are to receive it according to the statement handed out yesterday by the minister? In an informative statement given to the press covering the statement made here in the house the minister said:

> The Sabre aircraft which will be provided to 401 and 438 squadrons at Montreal, 400 and 411 squadrons at Toronto, and 442 and 443 squadrons at Vancouver will be the Mark 5. This aircraft is produced by Canadair Limited of Montreal, and has the Orenda jet engine. It is a high performance day fighter in the 600 m.p.h. class. It is expected that provision of the Sabres to the six auxiliary squadrons will begin late this year, and will extend through until next spring. The Sabres for the auxiliary will be flown back from the air division, where they are being replaced by the newer Mk 6s. All aircraft will be completely overhauled before being assigned to the auxiliary. In addition to the Sabres, these squadrons will receive an increase to the two T-33 jet trainers which they now have.

That statement by the Minister of National Defence indicates that aircraft which this house was informed in 1953 and 1954 were unsuitable for the service squadrons in Canada are now to be supplied under this new reorganization plan. Surely this present announcement indicates something of the confusion behind the announcements which have been made from time to time here in this House of Commons. In effect the minister says that squadrons which are not ready to take the air the moment an attack comes are going to be given aircraft which the Minister of National Defence who preceded him said were not suitable for the purpose for which they are to be employed. Then the minister said something else. The minister said that squadrons which are not ready to take the air the moment an attack comes will not get into active service. That in effect is what he said. In fact, his statement leaves the impression that those auxiliary squadrons are simply to supply the necessary replacement for the first line squadrons.

If that is so, then here is something that should be examined with the utmost care and in the utmost detail, and we should know what really lies behind this remarkable decision. Surely the Minister of National Defence is not making any suggestion that our over-all defence pattern is one that is ready for a full-scale war. He did say in his remarks yesterday that we were in a state of considerable readiness. These were his words, as recorded yesterday at page 5214 of Hansard:

> Until recent years, we have never in our history had standing forces in peace time in anything like the numbers we have today.

Then at another point in his remarks he said this, as recorded at page 5215 of Hansard:

> Our services are well trained, well equipped, well disciplined. In character, in training and in resolution we have I believe as high a quality of serviceman as any country in the world.

I do not think that any hon. member of this house is going to raise any question about the accuracy of those statements, as far as the morale and as far as the standard of the men in our armed forces are concerned. I have had the privilege, as have other hon. members, of visiting our air division in Europe. I have had the privilege of visiting our brigade in Germany. I have seen some of our naval units that visit other lands. Certainly we have every reason for pride in the young men and young women who are taking their part in those armed services. Our pride in their character, in their training, in their morale, should not, however, be used as an argument in any way to divert our attention from the basic considerations of organization, equipment and adequacy for the task in hand.

So far as the minister's statements are concerned, there is no evidence whatever of a truly Canadian concept of national defence related to the needs of defending this huge country of ours, the third largest country in the world, and at the same time accepting our share of the responsibilities under the United Nations and NATO.

There has been much public argument recently in regard to our defence forces. We have urged over and over again that the members of this house, through the proper channel of a committee of this House of Commons, be empowered to examine fully into this whole subject. I urged within a few days of the beginning of the present session that the whole question of national defence be referred to a committee of this house which would have power to call witnesses and to call for the production of documents and obtain other essential information. That request was flatly turned down. No explanation was given beyond the fact that the government had referred other matters to a committee on estimates.

Before I raised the question in this house, I had written to the Prime Minister, making that proposal. His answer simply was to the effect that the government had already decided upon the four departments that were to be referred to the committee on estimates. I made it clear then that the reference of the problems of national defence to the kind of muzzled committee on estimates with which this house has been provided would not in any way meet the situation. I pointed out that in Britain and in the United States, the two countries with which we are most closely associated in problems of national defence, they are able to call senior staff officers and others before committees of the House of Commons and of the houses of congress, which obtain the facts upon which the members can then form judgments which are related to reliable information.

On the one hand we are told that we, of necessity, must follow in large measure the course that is followed in the United States as well as in Britain. We on the one hand retain organizational structures closely related to the British organization, and on the other hand are swinging substantially to equipment of the United States pattern. But one thing that is remarkable about this government and about the Department of National Defence is the measure of secrecy which they seem to think is necessary for the department of defence, which admits, quite frankly in this case, that its role is relatively much smaller than that of the corresponding departments in the United States and in Britain.

If it is possible in Britain to call senior staff officers before a committee there, and if it is possible in the United States to call senior officers before a committee of congress in Washington and have the most searching examination of the facts, then surely it should be possible for us to have a similar inquiry here which would give the members information to which they are entitled and which they have the right to demand.

Why all this secrecy? It is not to prevent the enemy from obtaining information. It is to prevent the members of this house from having the information that they should have. I should hope that the members on the other side of the house would exercise a belated measure of individual freedom and make some demand that they have the right to this information, because we recognize that it would be extremely helpful to have some indication from members opposite that they supported a demand that all of us have the kind of information we should have.

Do not let anyone suggest that information is not fully obtained there. I have in my hands the recent reports of the subcommittee on the air force of the committee on armed services of the United States Senate. I am not going to read from these reports, but just so that there will be no doubt as to the standing of the officers who are brought before committees for the purpose of inquiry let me read the list of officers who appeared before the inquiry as reported in part I between April 16 and April 20 of this year. Those officers were General Omar N. Bradley, Admiral Robert B. Carney, General Walter Bedell Smith, General Carl A. Spaatz. Then, in part II, covering April 25 to May 2, we find that the following officer appeared: General Curtis E. LeMay, commander in chief, strategic air command. He was accompanied by all his senior staff officers. In part III we find that General Earle E. Partridge, commander in chief, air defence command and continental air defence command, appeared. He was accompanied by his senior staff officers. In part IV we have the following officers who appeared: Lieutenant General Emmett O'Donnell, deputy chief of staff, personnel department of the air force. In part V for May 10, we find that Major General Lee B. Washbourne, assistant chief of staff, installations, appeared on that occasion. In part VI we find that Lieutenant General C. S. Irvine, deputy chief of staff, materiel, department of the air force, appeared, accompanied by his senior staff officers. In part VII we find that General Otto P. Weyland, commander, tactical air command, appeared, and he was accompanied by his senior staff officers.

These inquiries covered the period from April 10 to May 10, and in that time the most searching questions were asked these officers. In fact, there was hardly a single occasion when the plea of secrecy was raised in regard to the discussions as to the comparative strength of the United States air organization and the air organization of Russia. Not only that, but they discussed in the most exact detail the quality of aircraft, the development of guided missiles and other details of that kind. Similar hearings have been held with respect to the army and the navy.

There we have complete frankness, complete disclosure. The members of congress in Washington are going to make their decisions based upon knowledge and advice of senior officers fully equipped to express their opinions and to state the facts. All this has a direct relationship to the change that has come about as a result of the threat of thermonuclear war, to which reference has already been made by the Minister of National Defence. I want to quote two or three paragraphs from an article which appeared in Fortune magazine written by Charles J. V. Murphy with regard to the effect of this threat of thermonuclear war and the balance of terror created by the increased strength of Russia in this field. I do so because Mr. Murphy has been recognized ever since the early days of the second world war as one of the most competent military observers in the free nations. This is what he says in Fortune magazine for March of this year:

> The 1953 decision to concentrate U.S. military resources behind the nuclear deterrent has automatically decreed a new order of military priorities, the full effects of which are only now being felt. Overriding all others are the priorities attaching to the development of massive delivery systems capable of decisive retaliation and an air defence system capable of effectively checking the Soviet capacity for counter-retaliation. Because these two tasks by themselves make heavy demands upon the national pool of technical talent, not to mention the budget, all other military tasks are being progressively subordinated to them.
> How far that subordination has already progressed may be judged by the comparative budgetary allocations for the three services in fiscal 1957, which begins in July: for the air force $16·5 billion, for the navy $9·6 billion, for the army $8·6 billion. Thus the air force, as the all-but-exclusive deterrent agent, now costs almost as much as the other two services together. Thus the old 1:1:1 ratio of military budgeting, which gave rise to so much controversy in the late 1940's has been shattered beyond recognition.

That statement, Mr. Chairman, discloses a position in the United States similar on a proportionate basis in some substantial measure to what has been taking place here in Canada. Then Mr. Murphy, in a later article on the same subject that appeared in the May issue of the same magazine, had this to say:

> Now the big question is not merely whether still more money should be poured into the air force; rather it is whether, in light of the increasingly clear logic of the new weapons, the traditional roles and missions of the army and navy should not be radically redefined and the investment in them still further reduced. With the expanding deterrent sucking more and more technical manpower and money into its support, the question of how much can be spared for the traditional functions of the army and navy becomes increasingly urgent. For their separate dilemmas are caused in no small degree by the shift in emphasis from a strategy anticipating a long-drawn-out struggle across the face of the earth to one mustering resources for an overawing deterrent, which, should it fail to deter, would presumably win the first and decisive air phase.
> This is not to say that the Eisenhower administration has accepted the "30 to 90 day war" theory associated with the most extreme air force elements. While conceding that the opening air battle, if it should come, will rapidly determine eventual ascendancy, United States military policy also assumes that the course of battle thereafter is unpredictable and that extensive, if not decisive, ground and sea operations may well ensue. Nevertheless, the main United States bet already clearly rests on the first phase deterrent.

I have read this, Mr. Chairman, because there also emerges from this concept of the overwhelming importance of the air force the recognition of the fact that we must not minimize the importance of the navy and, above all, of the army, which in the end, even in a thermonuclear war, would be called upon to occupy and hold territory no matter how devastated that territory might be. As Mr. Murphy says in this article, the course of battle thereafter is unpredictable and it may be that ground and sea operations may well ensue. He leaves the very clear inference that we must not be forgetful of the vital role played by the ground and sea forces in anything that may be done.

The minister has placed much emphasis upon the deterrent effect of a thermonuclear war. I think there is now general agreement in every country that the likelihood of the use of thermonuclear weapons decreases as the menace grows. Certainly only a madman would let loose thermonuclear weapons when the terror of retaliation is recognized. Today it is realized that if Russia started a thermonuclear war the retaliation would be so terrible that Russia itself would be devastated to an extent that, with whatever desires for aggression they may have, they would not lightly contemplate that prospect. The very scale of destruction which both sides now recognize as a possibility and reality will unquestionably exercise a substantial restraining influence. But, Mr. Chairman, that does not mean that there might not be war and serious war which did not involve thermonuclear weapons.

I think it is well for us to remind ourselves that during the second world war both sides possessed the most terrible poison gas, far more terrible than any which had ever been used at any time in warfare. Both sides could also have waged bacteriological war. Both had that dreadful equipment. God knows the war was terrible enough but both sides accepted the reality that gas and bacteria would not only destroy human beings but would completely disorganize ordinary domestic society on both sides to an extent that would be mutually destructive for generations to come. It is granted that the terror of poison gas and bacteria does not compare, in extent or horror, with the terror of thermonuclear war. Nevertheless there was a balance of terror in those fields.

We have actually seen the result of a balance of terror of that kind. The fear of retaliation kept those terrible weapons on the shelf. It did not prevent the most bloody, the most terrible and the most brutal war in all history waged as it was with conventional weapons. Is it not true that, under the dark clouds of a mutual fear of the hydrogen bomb, some nations might attempt ordinary wars with very serious consequences? In fact, we do not need to ask the question. Already some of them have done so. Russia did not hesitate to launch the attack in North Korea at a time when the United States had an enormous advantage in atomic weapons. Other local wars have been fought since that distant day in August 11 years ago when a new and dreadful era of warfare began.

Just as it was necesary for the members of the United Nations to make their contribution to a joint force to halt aggression in Korea, it could be necessary for conventional forces to be required at some other point under similar circumstances. We hope that situation will not occur. What happened in Korea and the promptness of the action there undoubtedly has been a very effective deterrent in many areas. The threat remains, however.

Only yesterday western observers were startled when they saw the great military parade in Egypt when the full extent of Russia's supply of weapons was disclosed to the western world. From what was seen there it is estimated that over a quarter of a billion dollars in weapons have been supplied by Russia to Egypt just in this past year. The observers on that occasion saw heavy tanks, the most modern aircraft and other equipment which indicates what is happening in Egypt as in some other areas where Russian equipment is being supplied. Who can possibly say what dangerous possibilities will arise from that continuing supply?

We know what the communists can do. We know what they have done. They have developed a new type of warfare. Surely it is recognized that nationalism alone is not behind the trouble in Africa and Asia which has reached such explosive proportions at different times during these past few years. Undoubtedly national aspirations in Algeria have much to do with the bloody fighting that is taking place there and that is occupying the attention of so many thousands of well-trained French forces which could be used very well elsewhere. But certain it is that, just as in Kenya and elsewhere, communist agents have been fanning the flames of nationalism and stirring up hatred and discontent. That is part of their military program. Nationalist forces in different countries, stimulated by communist propaganda and supplied with Russian weapons, may well become fifth columns such as those which destroyed freedom in the early days of the second world war. I am not now suggesting that there may not be a great deal of merit behind many of the arguments for the recognition of the nationalist aspirations of many of the peoples in those countries where nationalism has come to such a boiling point. But I do say—without any thought that the statement can be challenged—that communist agents in every one of those countries have been fanning the flames of discontent in every way they can. It is therefore a matter of concern to us when we see great supplies of arms going to any country where there is a known cause of possible disturbance, as there is in the Middle East today.

Mr. Chairman, all this involves a broad concept of defence which goes far beyond weapons and which goes far beyond the ordinary functions of armed forces but which unites in a great co-ordinated effort all the activities of our military, diplomatic and other forces to combat this planned assault on freedom which is being carried out in this way by Russia at this time. The point I wish to make, however, is that in these areas conventional weapons are being supplied. If discontent were stimulated to a sufficient degree, there could be a repetition of what happened in Korea. Then the free nations might be confronted not with the immediate threat of a thermonuclear war but with the threat of a conventional war waged under the umbrella of thermonuclear danger.

We have urged that great effort be devoted to our air force. Over and over again we have urged that there be an organization of mobile hard-hitting forces available for service anywhere in Canada or throughout the world that they might be needed. But those mobile forces, no matter how new in form they might be, would require conventional arms. It is to be hoped that we shall not forget that just as we need a navy to defend us against the threat of the tremendous Russian submarine fleet, so we also need an efficient, well-organized army to meet the continuing danger of what may be regarded as a conventional war in which today Russia has the enormous advantage of by far the largest number of trained and equipped troops.

Mr. Chairman, we have been called upon to examine these estimates. The fact is that we have not been permitted to learn what really lies behind the figures. What are described as the details do not give us the real details. Above all, they do not give us what lies behind the details.

It is certain that if a major disturbance came suddenly upon us, it would be necessary to turn again, as we have in the past, to our militia forces. The statements made by the Minister of National Defence in regard to their state of readiness are simply without relation to reality at this time.

I have had the privilege of visiting many units across Canada, as have other hon. members in this house. I have been associated for a very long time with the activities of the militia in Canada. The work being done by volunteer officers, N.C.O.'s and men is splendid, but it would be dangerous folly to pretend that they are equipped either for quick mobilization or even as training centres for large numbers of men if a dreadful emergency arose. The fact is that, in spite of the billions of dollars we have spent in the six years since the Korean war, there is not a single militia unit in Canada fully equipped, even under the limited establishment laid down for these militia units. The infantry does not possess modern infantry weapons; the armoured forces do not possess modern armour; the artillery does not possess up to date military equipment. To deal just with the artillery to which I have referred, the Minister of National Defence yesterday spoke about the replacement of the 25-pounder by the 105 millimetre and of the 5·5 inch by the 155 millimetre. Mr. Chairman, that reference of the minister yesterday simply underlines the seriousness of the situation with which we are confronted. Large numbers of 25-pounders, with their equipment, have been withdrawn from our artillery units and they have not been replaced by the 105 millimetre. The same is true of the replacement of the 5·5. Our artillery units are not ready for mobilization; our artillery units are not ready to carry out effective training of the larger forces, as they should be, to fulfil their role. This is a situation which is merely a repetition of what occurred on earlier occasions, but on those earlier occasions we had not spent billions of dollars on national defence. We have been spending money on the scale of modern warfare and yet we have not even the basic equipment required for our militia units in this country at this time for their ordinary needs.

I mentioned before that at the beginning of this session I urged that there be a reference of the subject to a committee on national defence. At a later time I urgently requested the reference of the whole problem of national defence to a select committee on national defence. I explained at that time that a standing committee would automatically have the right to call witnesses, to obtain information, and to call for the production of documents, just as do the committees in London and in Washington. Surely, if one thing is clear above all else at this time it is that such a standing committee should be operating at this time so that we could actually get the facts lying behind these bald figures which are presented to us. After all, if it is justifiable to take nearly half of all the money collected in taxes from our people for national defence it should be their right, and it should be the right of their representatives, to know what the facts really are.

Yesterday, the Minister of National Defence quoted Clemenceau's famous words. I quote from what he said at page 5215 of Hansard as follows:

> It was, I believe, Clemenceau who said that war was too serious a matter to be left to the generals. The fact is, today, that it is far too complex and too technical a matter to be left to the amateurs—only professionally trained and experienced servicemen can cope quickly with the weapons and tactics of modern war.

To meet our commitments, both in creating the deterrent and in being able to react immediately if the deterrent fails, we must provide forces in being, completely trained, equipped and immediately ready.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that is a perfectly proper statement of the requirement, but that statement and that requirement are not met by the situation in this country today. The Minister of National Defence suggests that we need to rely on the experts on this occasion, but it appears that we are not in a position where the experts get a chance. Are the experts really being able to express their opinion? Well, it is a very interesting thing that one by one senior officers of the Canadian defence forces who have retired, and in their retirement have become free to speak, have spoken of the need for a complete reorganization of our defence forces, have spoken about the inadequacy of the present system and have spoken in the most urgent terms of the need for a re-examination of this whole subject. Only a short time ago General Macklin, until recently the adjutant general of Canada, had very strong statements to make. It is true that he is an officer who retired some time ago, but he has kept closely in touch with military affairs. General H. D. G. Crerar has also spoken of the needs of our armed forces and now, in the current issue of Maclean's magazine, there is an article by Lieutenant General Guy Simonds in regard to national defence. I want to read what is not merely a statement of opinion but is a cold statement of fact by a man who until recently was chief of the general staff. I quote from an article which is headed, "Canada's Defence Blunders":

What seems wholly inconsistent and anomalous is that the same Canadians who argue that Canadian military considerations are of negligible importance, seem perfectly willing and happy to maintain an expensive and disproportionately weighty overhead control, paralleling that of the great powers.

Because of this cumbersome system of direction, the responsible military chiefs of the three armed services are denied an opportunity to confront those responsible for political decisions with objective military advice and alternatives upon which decision must be made. Senior civil servants can, by deliberate and unwarranted stalling defeat the recommendations of the armed forces even though those recommendations have been approved by the cabinet. The organization of the defence department as a whole is cumbersome and lacks flexibility. To operate effectively in a major crisis it would have to undergo radical changes which would paralyze efficient operation at a time when it should develop its highest efficiency. The permanent joint board on defence acts as a barrier to direct contact between the Canadian and the United States chiefs of staff except on a person-to-person basis within individual services. The predilection of Canadian members of this joint board to experiment in the field of gadgetry has engineered decisions of doubtful military value, but very expensive in money.

That is the most serious indictment that could possibly be directed against this or any department of government, Mr. Chairman. What it really means is that the action of the government is not even being communicated to the proper officials under the system that has been set up. In other words, it is a case of the blind leading the blind.

Mr. Campney: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. gentleman a question? I would like to ask him if he agrees with and approves of the quotation he has just read and of the views that have been so often expressed by General Simonds in regard to manpower and other elements of our defence?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I am not giving blanket approval to this article; I disagree with many opinions expressed by General Simonds. That does not get away from the fact that it is not an expression of opinion; it is a statement of fact by a former chief of the general staff who was proclaimed as one of our leading soldiers by the present Minister of National Defence. When the minister asks me whether I approve I might well ask him whether he approves, in view of the almost blanket approval he gave publicly to the chief of the general staff at the time of his retirement. This, however, is a statement of fact with regard to administration. Now, I do not know whether or not it is a correct statement, but when the chief of the general staff—until quite recently a man who has been accepted by this government and others as an outstanding field officer—says in the June 23 issue of Maclean's magazine there is in effect a complete breakdown at the administrative level, I say we should have the opportunity to call General Simonds before a standing committee on defence and find out what the facts really are. I am not in a position to know whether that statement is correct. It is a statement of fact by the officer who held the senior position in the defence forces of Canada until comparatively recently. It is a statement of fact which I submit should be examined by the hon. members of this house in the only way it can be examined. I make more than a request, I make a demand on the Prime Minister, in the light of the importance of this subject, that now at this stage a standing committee on national defence be set up so that General Simonds and other senior officers can be called before that committee, and we might find out what the facts really are behind the veil of secrecy which surrounds the activities of the Department of National Defence at this time.

It was not only General Simonds who left the impression that all was not well. Surely we cannot without some knowledge of what the facts are behind it pass over the statement of a man who was in the best position to know what the facts were, that senior civil servants can by deliberate and unwarranted stalling defeat the recommendations of the armed forces even though those recommendations have been approved by the cabinet.

Mr. Chairman, I think the Prime Minister should want a standing committee on national defence to inquire into that. I think the Prime Minister should want to know whether decisions of the cabinet are being stalled in the manner suggested by General Simonds in this recent article. I also think, in view of the very close relationship between the defence organization of Canada and the United States which has brought on to Canadian soil so many United States personnel in the air force and technical services and otherwise, we should be given the opportunity to learn what the facts really are in the only way we can do so, and that is by questions and answers from the man who made the statement. I think we should have the right to know if a paralysing barrier has been set up by the permanent joint board on defence. Who are the members of that joint board on defence? Who are the men who are, according to General Simonds, acting as a barrier to direct contact between the United States and the Canadian chiefs of staff? With all the interlocking relationships, there would be one of the most damning indictments that could be levelled against any official in Canada if it were true. I most certainly place a qualification on this. I say that with this statement before us we have the right to know what the facts are, and I repeat I should think the Prime Minister himself, without any prompting, would insist upon a standing committee on national defence being set up immediately to find out if the decisions of the cabinet of which he is the head are being disregarded and prevented in this way.

Nor was it only General Simonds who made these statements; other senior officers have made similar statements. General Macklin, speaking on March 27, made this statement:

> Canada needs a first-class army capable of competing with any potential enemy. We haven't got it. Our army in Europe, right under the guns, is ill-organized and ill-equipped, much like it was before world war II. Our army in Canada is likewise.

Those are the words of General Macklin, until recently the adjutant general of Canada, which he spoke publicly. There again is the kind of statement that calls for inquiry. Do not ask me if I support that statement. I am reading a statement made by one of those experts to whom the minister says he must look for his information and to whom he was looking until a short time ago. I want to know whether or not that is a correct statement. I should think the Prime Minister would also want to know. I believe the Prime Minister has a compelling duty to find out through the channels of a committee, and I believe we have a compelling duty to demand the right to know, and the only way we can is through an inquiry before a standing committee that will have full power to call witnesses and produce documents.

General Macklin, of course, went further and spoke about our Chinese-wall concept. He said we were building up a static defence concept that was entirely contrary to the real needs of our defence organization. That may be right or it may be wrong, but by the ordinary processes of inquiry such as have been taking place in London and Washington we have a right to demand that the procedure be adopted which will make it possible for us to know. Do not ask, "Do you accept those statements?" What I say is, these statements are made by the experts upon whom this minister and his predecessor were called upon to rely. They are made by experts who are now free to speak. They did not just form these opinions upon their resignation, I feel sure of that.

Then we also have the statement of General H. D. G. Crerar, the wartime commander of the Canadian army, who on March 16 described Canada's present army as an attractive show-window with nothing on the shelves or in the storerooms. Mr. Chairman, that is not the opinion of an untrained individual. That is the statement of a man with wide experience who has kept himself closely in touch with what is taking place.

Why are these things being done? Why, for the sake of argument, is this manpower situation being dealt with in the way it is? Do not ask me what the manpower need is. The government has it in its power to find out. It appointed a manpower committee years ago which has not been permitted to carry out the duties assigned to it. What is more, the government has just recently made a completely new appointment. At page 305 of the defence estimates will be found the appointment of a civilian superintendent of manpower. Mr. Chairman, in the name of all reason, why does the department of national defence need a civilian superintendent of manpower? If the minister is relying on the experts he has spoken about, why not have the ordinary military relationship between his department and those who are called upon to form their opinions? Do not ask us; we certainly are anxious to express our opinion based upon information but the government is denying us the essential information. The government says that all is well, and will not even bring these officers before a committee to find out what these facts are when the most challenging and damning statements are made by men in whom this government placed every confidence until a short time ago.

In the face of these positive statements by senior Canadian officers, can there be any doubt that those opinions are shared by other senior officers now in the armed forces who are not free to speak? Let us call them in, too. The officers who appeared before the committee in Washington are now in most cases serving with the army, the air force and the navy. Let us have the present chief of staff; let us have staff officers from the air force, navy and the army; let us have senior experts before that committee to find out what they say. Then we will have the kind of discussion in regard to national defence which is in keeping with the importance of this subject at this time.

The minister has said that there is no finality on this subject. There can be no finality. However, we want to be brought up to date; we are not being brought up to date by this white paper or by the bland assurances which we got yesterday. We know perfectly well that everything is not as it should be. We know perfectly well that our militia units have not the equipment they should have. We know perfectly well that we have not the kind of armed forces in being that are needed for the critical situation such as the world faces today.

It would be better by far to reorganize our forces and have every unit a unit in being, whether it be a permanent unit or a militia unit, than to have units partially equipped and in the same position they were in at the beginning of the second world war when in some instances it was necessary to wait for a couple of years before they were able to equip them.

We have had our lesson. Let us be done with smug complacency. We have the statement of the chief of the general staff, of the adjutant general and of other senior officers whose knowledge is very recent and who have made statements which should be examined without delay. We are not confronted with any question of Liberal or Conservative; we are not confronted with any question of government or opposition; we are not confronted with any question of mere debate or military estimates; we are confronted with the very survival of Canada, and nothing else. Uncertainty and half measures are not good enough. It is not good enough just to ask us whether we can make certain statements in regard to requirements when we are not allowed to obtain information.

The government itself should take the initiative in this. The government itself should want information. If the government is really concerned to the extent which the minister has indicated, then there is no course open to them but to appoint a standing committee right now. We are going to be here several weeks and within the time that he will still be here every one of the senior officers could be called. We will call them before the committee and the government can call any experts it wishes to call and we will obtain the truth. We will obtain the facts. We will obtain what is really hidden behind the veil of secrecy at this time. Abstract figures are meaningless; figures and statements have meaning only in relation to the reality with which they must deal.

There is also for our consideration the wider concept of an entirely new type of war. The war which may take place will be, not only a nuclear war or a war of guided missiles but a war waged by conventional weapons just as was the Korean war, although there were atomic weapons always available and ready which could have been used. The day of the conventional weapon has not gone. The day of the infantryman, the artilleryman, the tank man and the other members of the armed forces in the army, the members of the naval units and the members of the air force, has not gone. There may be push-button warfare at some time and again there may not be, just as there was no gas warfare and no bacteriological warfare either in the second world war or in Korea.

We have a new concept of war. We have this new concept of the Russians' use of distant satellites armed in advance, not only from their own armament plants but from the great Skoda plant of Czechoslovakia and the great Teschen plant in Poland where mighty guns have been turned out for generations. The big berthas of the first world war were not made by Krupps, as was the general supposition; they were made by Skoda at Pilsen. So were many of the great guns that were used on the eastern front made in the Teschen plant in Poland. These great productive plants are available to Russia today and they are supplying deadly weapons of war to countries in disturbed areas where trouble may be caused.

Conditions in that kind of world add to the possibility of the new concept of war, and our thinking must be adjusted accordingly. We should have a Canadian concept, not a British or a United States concept. We need a distinctly Canadian concept suited for the real and immediate needs of the third largest country in the world. No mere application of a British pattern or a United States pattern will suit a country of 3,750,000 square miles with only 16,000,000 people living in it. It must be the kind of force which will be suitable for immediate movement to any of the distant areas of this vast land of ours. It must be the kind of force which can move into the Arctic overnight, can move in there in a matter of hours. It must be a mobile, hard-hitting force making the greatest possible use of scientific developments of all kinds. That is the kind of force which would be the most helpful as a Canadian contribution to NATO.

I close these remarks by referring back to what I have said. I refer to the fact that it is not only in Canada that there is this tremendous demand for information. It is not very long ago that Field Marshal Montgomery, who has never felt unduly restrained in expressing his opinions, made this bold statement: Our organization for war is unsuited to modern times. We now have the statement of the chief of the general staff until a very short time ago; we now have the statement of the adjutant general until a short time ago; we now have the statement of the commander of the Canadian army in the last war who has had close and intimate contact with events since then. Their statements are all to the effect that there must be reorganization if our money is to be properly spent and if we are to have the kind of force we should have.

If there is one thing above everything else, in addition to what has already been mentioned, that should call for a committee of inquiry it is the surprising fact that exactly the same figure is used this year as was used a year ago as the requirement for national defence—$1,775 million. It just is not possible. Great Britain, the United States, Russia and other nations have carried out great reorganizations. For some reason they have been able to increase the efficiency of their forces with a decrease in expenditure. Yet we have exactly the same figure. We should not be asked merely to find out what particular items mean, we should be able to ask the staff officers why this situation exists. That would be the kind of debate that would be worthy of the urgency of this subject at this time.

I repeat to the Prime Minister, not a request but an urgent demand based upon the nature of these public statements, that there be a standing committee on national defence set up now. It could start to work immediately and we could have the essential facts in three or four weeks at the outside and then the house would be able to continue a discussion of these estimates with the kind of information it should have. Whatever may have been the thoughts of the government before, when this government is confronted with the statement, by a man who was until recently its chief of staff, that the decisions of the government itself are being stultified by action within the department, then the time has come for this government to act in regard to the setting up of a standing committee which can really conduct an inquiry.

Again, however, let us remember this. It is not our support of a political party, whichever party we belong to; it is not the matter of an ordinary debate; it is not simply the figures that are before us; as the Minister of National Defence said yesterday, it is the survival of Canada that is under consideration, and I urge the Prime Minister to act in keeping with the solemnity of those words.

Mr. McIvor: I am not an expert like the Leader of the Opposition, but there is something that has not been said by those who have been taking part in this debate which I think is more important than the advice of what the former member for Fraser Valley used to call our chiefs of staff, the "brass hats". When I was a boy studying British history I was taught "trust in God and keep your powder dry." What I rose to say today is this. I think nobody has done any more important work, either in the past war or in the present kind of peace, than the chaplains in our forces. I think they are doing a great deal to build up our young manhood.

What was it that beat Germany? It was not that the Germans did not have the greatest army in the world, the best equipment in the world, the greatest air force and the greatest number of submarines. What beat them? It was because they left out the Almighty. They murdered Jews by the thousands. Why? For one reason, the Jews trust in one God. What beat the Germans in world war II? It was just that one thing. When the call came to Canada and the allied nations for a day of prayer, then three things happened rather quickly. First, the Germans at Dunkirk did not follow up and wipe England off the map. It was an outstanding military mistake. Second, Pearl Harbor brought the United States into the war with full forces. Third, the attack on Russia by Germany brought Russia into the war. Then they were beaten.

I ask my hon. friend from Cape Breton South if he considered conscription. I do not think that we dare plan conscription in Canada today. It would divide the country, and you have to have a united country.

Coming back to our chaplains again, they are doing something to help build up the life of young manhood in our nation. We have to admit that there are certain customs in the army that do not tend to build up our young men, but the chaplain service in our army is doing much to build them up. I take off my hat to their unselfish services. They are not a group of sissies; they are perhaps the best manhood in the army. We had one example of that at Dunkirk, where a member of the chaplain service won the Victoria Cross. He did not get it for nothing; he certainly measured up to his job as well as any senior officer who ever won the Victoria Cross.

The Leader of the Opposition says that what we want is a Canadian concept. I know that the word "Canada" is music for many, as it is for me. I was not born in Canada, but I came to Canada because I believed that it was the best country in the world for me. But I believe there is something better than the Canadian concept, and that is a Christian concept for our country. I take hope in this, that our church is as alive today as it ever was, Protestant, Roman Catholic and Jewish alike. That is the hope of our country. When a country like Russia treats God as a myth we know what is going to happen when war comes; what happened to the Midianites when Gideon with his 300 men wiped them out. I come back to this: trust in God and keep your powder dry.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, after the thunderstorm eloquence to which the leader of the official opposition has treated us for the last hour, my few remarks will seem like the whisperings of a gentle zephyr that follows a storm. In view of the constantly changing international, political and technological situation, I fully appreciate the heavy responsibilities the minister has to carry and the complex and difficult nature of the problems he is called upon to face almost from day to day under these circumstances.

Before proceeding, I must express my appreciation of the minister's courtesy and his personal attention to any problem I have brought to his notice. Whether it involved the problems of an individual soldier, of a unit in which I was interested, or of equipment or buildings or other things in general, I have always found the minister willing to discuss them, to investigate things complained of, to report and to do what he could to remedy the situation, and I appreciate that. I must say that I have had occasions when I have had discussions with ministers and quite got the impression that I was conducting a monologue with a totem pole, but I have not found the minister that way.

[Mr. McIvor.]

I read the white paper and listened to the minister's speech carefully and with interest. I was particularly impressed yesterday with his concluding paragraphs, when he said, as recorded on page 5217 of Hansard:

> Surely no one could look forward, with equanimity, to year after year of uneasy expectation of that dread day when the first H-bombs might fall. However futile our best attempts may have proved so far, we must keep on trying for disarmament. And we must come to grips with some of those central problems that have led to war: ignorance and hate, disease, privation and poverty.
>
> For it is clearly evident—and it is on this note, and not a defence statistic, that I want to end my opening remarks to this committee—it is clearly evident that, for us and for the generations that will follow us into the wonders and hazards of this thermonuclear age, there must be some surer guarantee of peace, some less uncertain protection against disaster, than military might can hope to provide.
> Man's inventive genius, which has sought out and set free the power of the atom, can surely make it serve and not destroy us.

I must say that I for one very much appreciate that spirit and that approach to the difficult times in which we live. I might say that the minister, when speaking, made reference to the departure of two members of this house for the centenary in London of the establishment of the Victoria Cross. I suppose he overlooked that another V.C., who has not been in our sense a member of this house but has been a member of the staff of this house for a good many years, I understand, also left with them. I am sure we all wish him, with the others, a very enjoyable and profitable time.

In my opinion the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich, whose opinions on these matters I respect very much, made a most constructive speech, and I intend to refer to a few of his remarks later. I always think the member for Esquimalt-Saanich has a balanced approach, and while I do not always agree with him I think he is usually quite fair when he is dealing with these problems. I also thought my colleague the hon. member for Nanaimo made a most lucid analysis of the situation from our point of view, and I think hon. members would be well advised to read his speech. I also listened with great interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Peace River, particularly when he said, as found at page 5231 of yesterday's Hansard:

> I believe that if the government would enlarge its defence program by adding a great ideological offensive we might be able to forestall the awful possibility that the great arms race might lead to another terrible conflict.

I was rather surprised to hear the hon. member suggest this, as it would mean using the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as a propaganda medium for the government, and I am quite sure that no matter how carefully the government attempted to undertake that, it would very soon be accused of using the C.B.C. as an instrument of government policy. I do not think that is the right way to approach any of the problems to which the hon. member was referring at that point in his speech.

When I heard the hon. member make that proposal I could not help but think of my own father, who was a very strong Liberal. He disagreed with me politically very strongly indeed, but at the same time he was also, as a Liberal should be, a great democrat. He believed in freedom of speech and freedom of ideas, and he believed in the battle of ideas in a democracy. He was convinced that democrats could always win under those circumstances.

I remember one occasion just after the first world war when notices appeared in our village to the effect that a Mr. George Stirling, who later became a C.C.F. member of the provincial legislature, would arrive the next day on the steamer and would give a talk on the coming social revolution. Those words had a rather different connotation in those days than they have now. In any event, the local business people organized all the veterans in the district. They got about 20 veterans from the village and the surrounding country to march down to the wharf to meet the boat. The only means of access was by steamer, and they were going to give this gentleman two options. One was to proceed on his way on the steamer, and the other was to get off the steamer and be thrown into the lake.

My father heard of this incident, and at the time he was some miles out of town. He drove into town in his buggy, picked up another Englishman of a similar type who later became superintendent of marine affairs for the C.P.R. for the interior of British Columbia, and they went down to the boat. My father went after these chaps and the businessmen of the district. He said, "We live in a democracy. This is a country founded on British institutions. A man has a right to talk all the damned nonsense he likes as long as he keeps his remarks within the law. This man has a right to say what he thinks and he is going to speak in the village tonight." Everybody agreed with my father, as often happens in such cases.

The man got off the steamer. My father made arrangements for a hall where he could speak. Quite a crowd turned up, and before the meeting concluded the speaker had quite a time answering the questions that were shot at him. But that is the spirit I think of when I think of how we are going to face the difficulties to which the hon. member for Peace River referred.

Mr. Martin: Was his speech nonsense?

Mr. Herridge: I did not hear the speech myself, but I presume that it had a lot of sound material in it. My father told me what the gist of the speech was and, strangely enough, within 10 or 15 years the then Liberal government of British Columbia had written into the statutes of that province some of the revolutionary ideas the gentleman was advocating at that time.

I, together with my colleagues, agree with the Leader of the Opposition when he suggests that these estimates should go before a committee of the house. In my opinion we cannot deal with them effectively, as we are all in the dark under the present circumstances with respect to the details of the problem we are facing. In my view our ignorance and ineffectiveness can only be overcome by the estimates being referred to a committee, and I agree that there is yet time for that to be done during this session. We would have the opportunity to call witnesses, to examine them and to secure information. I think that would add a great deal to the understanding of the members of the house with regard to these very important estimates.

We are generally agreed, Mr. Chairman, that world tension has lessened considerably in recent months, though we know that this uncertain peace is, generally speaking, only maintained by fear of the destructive power of nuclear weapons. However, in the opinion of the members of this group the present situation does provide us with certain opportunities that we should take advantage of as soon as possible. We think it provides us with the opportunity, as the hon. member for Nanaimo so well stated yesterday, to reassess Canada's role in the defence of democracy. It provides an opportunity to eliminate obsolete methods, equipment and waste, and I know it is very difficult to eliminate waste from any defence force. I see things happening from time to time that irritate me very much indeed, because I was brought up in a very economy-minded home. My father and mother always told me that the two great sins in life were dishonesty and waste.

It also provides us with the opportunity to utilize the savings in manpower and money for constructive expenditures which will make a great contribution to the defence of democracy and to the winning of the battle of ideas. I suggest we could use these savings in public investment in utilities within this country, in increased expenditure on the Colombo plan, and possibly in some forms of economic aid that may be required as the result of the study of article II of the North Atlantic treaty by the three prominent persons who are now giving it consideration.

The former chief of the general staff has been making speeches and has written a most interesting article in a recent issue of Maclean's magazine. However, whenever I listen to a general speaking or read his articles I cannot help recalling remarks made by other generals. For instance, I never fail to remember the remarks made by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich, as reported at page 2810 of Hansard of 1951, when he said:

> I have never known an admiral, a general or an air marshal who did not begin by asking for more than his share of anything.

I always think of that when I hear of generals criticizing public policy. Then I notice that yesterday afternoon the minister said in his remarks, as found at page 5215 of Hansard:

> It was, I believe, Clemenceau who said that war was too serious a matter to be left to the generals.

When the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich referred in his speech yesterday to General Simonds' article in the last issue of Maclean's magazine he said, as found at page 5221 of Hansard:

> Being a retired general myself I can perhaps discount the comments of retired generals to a greater degree than most people . . .

I have a respect for the contribution the generals have made to this country and for their knowledge in certain fields where I have very little knowledge, because my generalship has been mostly over a few cows and pigs; but when I consider the opinions of generals these views do condition my attitude toward the opinions of those who speak on these matters.

Before going on with the few remarks I wish to make in that respect, I should like to make a comment with respect to the present chief of the general staff. I have never met him and I would not know him if I saw him on the street, but I know a good many people in all the services. From talking to them—and some of them are of quite senior rank—I am distinctly under the impression that the present chief of the general staff is doing a good job. I say that for two reasons. From what I can gather, he has a good understanding of the psychology of the Canadian armed forces personnel in peacetime, and he has also a good understanding of the psychology of Canadians generally in peacetime. That is quite an advantage for a general. In the second place, I understand that his administrative and business ability have been of great value in taking the first halting steps toward reorganization that is inevitably necessary owing to changing conditions and circumstances. I gained that impression from discussing these matters with people who have some knowledge of what is going on in the Department of National Defence.

General Simonds has had great experience in wartime but, in my opinion, he is somewhat out of touch with the thinking of the Canadian people when he deals with the question of manpower, and possibly does not quite appreciate the government's position in a situation like this in a democracy. In a democracy any government must pay attention to public opinion and in its policies must to a considerable extent reflect that public opinion. In that connection I should like to quote briefly from an article written by Earl Attlee, who was minister of defence in Great Britain in 1945-46. This article appears in the Socialist Commentary of June, 1956, so it is quite recent. I think everyone will credit Earl Attlee with being a well-balanced and well-informed person. This is what he has to say:

> We must accept the logic of events, and in the light of them consider afresh our defences. The situation has wholly changed since Labour was in power and introduced national service. We can reasonably hope, despite the frustrations of the disarmament conferencee, that no state will embark on a major war because of its inevitable consequences to victor and vanquished alike. The conceptions of armies of millions of men fighting land battles is out of date, and therefore the basis of national service—which was the provision of large reserves of trained men for land warfare—has gone. I gather also that the best opinion is that the long-distance guided missile cannot be dealt with by piloted planes, and this entails a review of our air forces. A navy operating from ports within range of the guided missile seems to be equally impossible.

I just wish to deal briefly, Mr. Chairman, with this article which has been widely read in Canada and which is published in the last issue of Maclean's magazine. While I disagree with many of General Simonds' opinions and cannot accept his recommendations in most respects, we must realize that a great number of Canadians will read this article as one that has been written by someone who has had some considerable experience in military affairs and who, as the ex-chief of the general staff, should know what he is talking about. He makes several pertinent statements. He says:

> There is no co-ordinated effort to evolve a sound and comprehensive defence policy.

Then again he says:

> The Canadian chiefs of staff committee is "packed" to protect the government against the receipt of unpalatable advice.

This is a very serious statement indeed. Then he says:

Senior civil servants can, by deliberate and unwarranted stalling, defeat the recommendations of the armed forces even though those recommendations have been approved by the cabinet.

That is something that we should know something about. Then again he says:

The . . . chiefs of the three armed services are denied an opportunity to confront those responsible for political decisions with objective military advice.

That is another very serious statement. Then again he says:

Certain politicians . . . have raised the bogey of a so-called military "junta"—

I do not know whether he includes me in that too; I do not think so, because I am too small pumpkins.

—attempting to usurp political powers, such fantasies . . . represent one of the most outrageous hoaxes ever inflicted upon an unsuspecting public and Canadian political twisting at its worst and most degrading.

That is a very serious statement. So far as I know, only on a few occasions has the government taken exception to persons in the forces dealing with policy. They have a right to do that, and I hope they will continue to exercise their right in that respect and will maintain the tradition in this respect that is practised in Great Britain. Then in his concluding statement he says:

There is no facet of our national affairs in which the stamp of a colonial mentality remains so deeply imbedded as in that of our national defence.

I cannot agree with that statement at all. In my opinion the general himself, who has been the first advocate of a Canadian regiment of guards, indicated the stamp of a colonial mentality. By bringing over sergeant majors from Great Britain to train those guards there was an implication that there were not Canadians able and fit to do that sort of job. I am not alone in this criticism. I mentioned the matter last session and I received large numbers of letters from across this country, some from retired commissioned ranks and non-commissioned ranks and others from ordinary citizens without military experience. The 1954 convention of the Canadian Legion dealt with this matter and passed a resolution on the subject to this effect:

Whereas the government has announced the formation of a new regiment to be called the regiment of Canadian guards;

And whereas this new untried regiment is announced as taking precedence over all other Canadian infantry regiments whose valour has been proved on the field of battle;

And whereas the placing of this new unit as the foremost regiment in Canada is an affront and disgrace to the famous regiments of this country—

I agree with that.

Therefore be it resolved that this convention in no uncertain terms advise the Minister of National Defence and the government of Canada that the Canadian Legion condemns the degradation of our famous infantry regiments by this act;

And be it further resolved that this convention most forcefully urge that, while seemingly nothing can be done about the formation of this new regiment, it be not designated the premier regiment of Canada, thus ridiculing the very meaning of the word "valour", until such time as it shall have earned its position honourably on the field of battle where, and only where, any regiment can prove its worth.

That resolution shows there was a strong exception to that proposal. I think General Simonds showed a colonial mentality by trying to ape in Canada a tradition of the brave brigade of guards in Great Britain. I do not know whether any further consideration has been given to this question, but if I remember correctly I think the minister made some reference to changing some units. When he does that, I hope he will find it possible to change this regiment of Canadian guards into some unit that will be more suitable and more useful under modern conditions.

Mr. Chairman, this group believes the time is ripe for a reassessment of our present defence policy and the adoption of a defence policy that will involve the scrapping of the present obsolete organization, weapons and training procedures, and their reorganization and reequipment and retraining in line with Canada's United Nations obligations in the specialized defence role Canada must play in co-operation with the United Kingdom, the United States and other nations. Other countries are facing the same problem that we face. We cannot lay all the blame on the government. This has been a most difficult period in which to undertake national defence, particularly during the last 10 years. That is demonstrated by Earl Attlee in June, 1956, when he said this:

I am certain that at the present time most of the enormous cost of armaments could be cut down. I am sure that there are masses of weapons now obsolete which are still maintained or even being produced. There will inevitably be great opposition to the kind of drastic reorganization which is required. It will require a government with a strong will to undertake it for inevitably most of the experts will be thinking of the last war.

That is historically correct.

Labour must prepare itself for this task.

Then the magazine Business Week, in its issue of June 9, 1956, had this to say:

Such developments (new weapons and methods of warfare) have so upset the traditional strategy and tactics of war, that only a drastic upheaval in military organization can bring us up to date.

In the United Kingdom white paper on defence, 1956, we find the following:

> The smaller the size of our forces the more important it is that they should be equipped with the best modern equipment.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I want to emphasize that we in this group suggest that our national defence policy should be based on the recognition of two facts; first, Canada's obligation to contribute her share of armed strength in support of any international police force action taken through the United Nations; second, the fact that the only possible defence against present-day weapons is the threat of instant retaliation with weapons and instruments of war of such a character and cost and on such a scale as to be beyond Canada's means alone.

Once again I do urge the minister to give consideration to the pleas from this side of the house to permit these estimates to go before a committee where some light, we trust, can be shed upon the problems we are called upon to deal with at this time.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, each year I enter this debate, like I believe every other hon. member who takes part in it, with graver feelings than possessed me the year before. As the minister said near the beginning of his remarks yesterday, no answer to the thermonuclear weapon has been devised and none is in sight. That is something by itself which I think must give us great cause to think. The fact that the manned airplanes that we have at the present time cannot guarantee that bombers carrying those missiles will not get over this country and be able to drop them, and the more fearsome threat which hangs over us that within a few years there will be intercontinental ballistic missiles for which there is no answer at all so far, I think combine to present a sort of frightening picture which makes it impossible to come to a discussion of the defence estimates in anything except a mood of some foreboding.

I should like first of all to say something about defence policy, as I did last year. Canada's defence policy is the basis on which our efforts must be, or at least should be, built. I have had, ever since the war, a very strong suspicion that the government was never very sure and definite what the defence policy is or what it should be. This feeling has, I must say, increased considerably in the past two years as a result of the fact that really very few changes have taken place in defence organization, set-up, and so forth; whereas the world has been in a great state of flux and what were valid defence concepts some time ago quite clearly no longer apply. Now, defence policy, in so far as it is stated in any precise terms, is laid down in the annual white paper under "Defence Objectives". Prior to the last two years this statement was reasonably definite and straightforward, put down under headings 1, 2 and 3. The one for 1954 I have in my hand and it reads in this way:

> The objectives of our defence policy remain the same as heretofore;
> (1) The immediate defence of Canada and North America from direct attack;
> (2) Implementation of any undertakings made by Canada under the charter of the United Nations, or under the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, or other agreement for collective security;
> (3) The organization to build up strength in a total war.

As I say, that was a reasonably definite statement. One might complain a great deal of the fact that the means being taken in organization and so forth, as I think was the fact, were not adequate to meet those objectives. It seemed quite apparent that whilst these were the stated objectives, the government really had no definite ideas as to how they were to be carried into execution.

Last year these objectives had become much less definite; they were fuzzier and more ambiguous, perhaps I might say, and I should just like to read them. This is from the white paper for 1955-56. At page 3 we find the following:

> Canada's defence program continues to be planned for the immediate defence of Canada, for co-operation with the United States—

The first one was the same, of course. I continue:

> —in the joint defence of the Canada-United States region—

That was much the same. It goes on:

> —for co-operation within the North Atlantic Treaty Organization looking towards the provision of a collective force capable of deterring aggression, and for carrying out undertakings by Canada as a member of the United Nations Organization.

Well, as I say, these things might mean anything. They were fuzzy; they were indefinite. When we come to this year's white paper the fuzziness is carried considerably further and the amount of writing is very much increased, which I think is symptomatic of this year's white paper. As has been indicated by some other speakers, it is a well-written document. The contents are very good English, but this good English, in many instances, does not convey too much meaning. What we have this year on page 3, which again is really the start of the thing, is:

> 1. The aim of Canada's defence program and planning is to provide for the security of Canada.

That does not mean anything. If we had an army of cross-bow men here their purpose would still be to look after the security of Canada. If you have any defence forces their function naturally is the security of Canada. Therefore that first statement is, as I say, just a statement of the obvious and for any practical purpose it is meaningless and useless. It goes on:

> Under present and foreseeable conditions this can be done most effectively by close co-operation with our allies in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, and especially with the United States in relation to the North American area. Our defence plans must also include a capacity to carry out obligations that may arise out of Canada's membership in the United Nations Organization.

I have no quarrel with all these what you might call ideals, but I do wonder very much what definite plan or definite organization there is to carry them out. It is my contention there is not too much.

When we come to No. 2 of these objectives we have something that is perhaps a bit more definite. I am not going to read it all; but what it means in effect, I think, is that the Canadian government has accepted as its basic policy massive retaliation by the United States in the event of a full-scale war breaking out. I presume as a result of that its chief policy, as far as our own forces are concerned, is to tag them on to the military effort of the United States so they may be assisted in carrying out this policy of massive retaliation.

I agree that the threat of retaliation is a great deterrent to war, and I sincerely hope, as I think all of us do, that that threat, or at least the existence of an air force in the United States at the present time and one in Great Britain of bombers which have supplies of atomic and thermonuclear bombs, will serve the purpose of preventing any war taking place. Of course if the worst comes to the worst, it will mean that we are in a position to cripple the enemy at least as seriously as he has crippled us, and thus prevent the possibility of him overrunning the western world.

The rest of the white paper does not indicate, to my mind, any means by which we are going to be able to carry out this general objective, nor does it indicate what you might call any specific changes in military thinking, organization, and so on, which the complete change in the concept of modern war naturally forces upon us.

One subject in particular about which nothing was said is manpower. I think it is quite clear, from what little is contained in the white paper and from the little the minister has said at this time and previously, that there is no clear-cut plan as to how manpower requirements are going to be met. We have had a statement that there would be a maximum force of 120,000. The government has not explained why the figure was not set at 100,000 or 200,000 or at any other figure. In other words this apparently was just a figure decided upon for the sake of convenience because the government knew there were about that many men a year ago.

We have had no information concerning the allocation of the manpower as among the three services. We do not know whether the present allocation is correct or if it bears any relationship to the real need for manpower. I think the government owes it to the country and to this house to give us more definite and precise information concerning its manpower policy and how the present needs are going to be met.

The next matter concerning which we should have information is what reorganization of our defence forces is necessary to meet the three kinds of war into which we may be forced. The first is an all-out atomic war; the second is a conventional war, such as that fought in Korea; and the third is what the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich referred to yesterday as a bush war, small, punitive expeditions in which we may have to take part.

I must admit that in his speech yesterday the minister did give us more information than is contained in the white paper. As was described in one editorial I read, the white paper might just as well never have come out as far as adding to our information with regard to our defence situation is concerned. The minister gave us some additional information, particularly concerning what changes would take place in the air force, the air crew, and projected changes in the army and so on. We are, however, still very much in the dark with regard to many of the important aspects of national defence.

As I said previously, this is a period of flux and change and it necessitates changes in military thinking and organization. The minister recognized that to some extent in his speech, because he said a committee composed of senior army officers was examining the organization of field formations for the army in order to make them more mobile and flexible. I am extremely glad that inquiry is taking place.

I do not share the view that has frequently been expressed in this house that military officers are always ready to fight the last war. This business of attacking the brass hats is almost a cult in Canada, you might say, the uncrowned king of which for many years was the former member for Temiscouata who has now been translated to the other place. This subject constituted the major part of his stock in trade. I was disappointed that the hon. member for Fort William brought out the subject of brass hats this afternoon and scoffed at them. I was also disappointed about the doubt as to their thinking ability which was expressed by the hon. member for Kootenay East.

Having met a considerable number of generals both during the war and since, I remain convinced that the majority of them are very able men. I would mention only two who I think prove the point very well. General Eisenhower, I think, is now acclaimed throughout the entire free world as one of the greatest men of this age. General Gruenther, I think, more or less commands the complete confidence of all NATO countries with respect to his ability and integrity. I mentioned these two men as examples. I think this matter of speaking contemptuously of brass hats and trying to convey the impression they are always thinking back to the last war and are not really intelligent people, and so on, is a pretty tawdry sort of thing and completely at variance with the facts.

As a matter of fact I think a good many generals and other senior officers in our armed services have been much more forward looking than the government, but they have been prevented from carrying into effect many of the changes they would like to have made. I believe that is indicated by the statements and articles we have heard of today, written by some of the senior officers who have recently retired.

As I said, I am glad to learn that the reorganization of the army is at least being studied now. I think the time is long overdue for us to take a long, hard look at our entire military set-up and organization. I do not believe the present organization is constituted to meet present threats. I do not believe the responsibility for that rests with the officers serving in the forces, but that it rests squarely on the shoulders of the minister and the government. They are the only ones who can make extensive changes.

The Leader of the Opposition has called for the immediate setting up of a committee of this house in order that we might have the actual facts placed before us by senior officers and others concerning our military situation as it exists at the present time. That is something I think should be done in the interests of Canada and in view of the responsibility of the government to this house.

In addition to that, as far as the long range improvements in our defence set-up and organization are concerned, I think something else is necessary. I suggest a committee of inquiry or a royal commission—whatever you want to call it; some similar body at any rate—should be appointed and given some months in which to study the whole question of the organization of the Canadian armed forces, and that it be charged with the responsibility of collecting evidence not only in this country but in other countries in order that there might be some definite body of information on which this government and this house could base their thinking with regard to what our military organization should be.

This is the sort of thing which has been done frequently in the past as far as Great Britain is concerned, and it has been the means by which the whole military organization of that country has been changed from time to time. Perhaps the most famous military commission was the Esher commission as a result of which, I believe, the present general staff set-up in the United Kingdom came into existence.

There have been several other commissions in Great Britain. In every case it was found necessary, sometimes because of opposition on the part of people in the services or the general public, to appoint a commission to study the question thoroughly and for the commission to make its recommendations to parliament before any widespread changes could be put into effect.

We have had the same thing in this country to a limited extent. We had the Otter commission which studied the Canadian defence set-up and made recommendations which were adopted and upon which our military set-up prior to the first world war was really moulded or built. I would earnestly recommend or suggest to the minister that a commission of that sort be set up in order that the whole question of our military organization, in view of the great changes which have taken place in the world, may be studied and something better put in place of what is really a second world war organization which we have at the present time.

I would suggest further to the minister that in setting up that commission there are possibly three men who would make excellent members. I refer to the last three chiefs of staff of the three services, who have been retired. There could be two or three other men, such as Mr. Gordon who is heading the present Gordon commission. In other words there could be two or three civilians who had extensive experience in organization and in what might be called general business administration and things of that kind.

I should like to say something about the general organization, as I see it, of the Canadian defence forces at the present time. To begin with, headquarters is top-heavy, and by that I mean national defence headquarters in Ottawa. We were told in this article by General Simonds that defence headquarters would not work in the event of war. I shall come back to the general matter of the reorganization of national defence headquarters later. Before I do that I should like to say something about the three services themselves.

I do not feel particularly well equipped to deal with the navy, but I have done a considerable amount of reading on this subject. The chief function of our navy is anti-submarine. I think we all agree it should play an anti-submarine role. I have not heard or read of anyone advocating any other role for our navy. I have heard a considerable amount of questioning as to whether the set-up for this anti-submarine role, which is essentially the same as the set-up in the last war with the addition of an aircraft carrier, is adequate to carry out that role.

I think there is universal agreement that the new destroyer escort of the St. Laurent type is an extremely good ship, but it is a very expensive craft to build and therefore production is slow; it takes considerable time to produce these destroyers. This is indicated by the fact that this program was laid down some years ago but the first destroyer was several years late in getting into commission, much later than was projected when the plan was announced. Others will be later still.

I have heard it said quite frequently that while these are extremely good craft and the fact that we have a certain number of them is all to the good, they are not sufficient. It is said that in addition we need a number of smaller, fairly inexpensive craft which could be built rapidly as losses were experienced in the event of war. It is said also that there should be a more extensive use made of helicopters, perhaps both in connection with the smaller ships and the destroyer escorts. Surface craft alone are not going to be able to detect submarines as well or as satisfactorily as helicopters or ships aided by helicopters.

I have heard the fear expressed that with the type of navy we have the loss of a few of these exceptionally good but expensive and slow to build destroyers would cripple our navy to such an extent that it would be unable to carry out its role. It is for that reason particularly that a considerable number of more quickly built ships are necessary. Having had no naval experience I do not feel competent to say whether these criticisms are correct, but they sounded reasonable to me. I think they should receive a considerable amount of study, not only by the minister and his naval advisers but by the commission which I have indicated should be appointed.

I come now to the army organization and the arms of the army. These are almost the same as they were during the last war. The minister made quite a point about the 105 mm. gun replacing the 25-pounder and the 155 replacing the 4·5 and 5·5 guns. However that does not readily improve the artillery of the army in the slightest degree. A number of gunnery officers—I understand some of them in the United States; in fact I was talking to one from the United States—believe that the 25-pounder is a better all-round weapon than the 105 mm. They claim it is a more flexible and handier weapon. The 105 takes a little heavier charge and produces a little more punch at the end, but many gunnery officers consider that it is not likely to be as good a general, all-purpose gun as the 25-pounder. So the substitution of the 105 mm. for the 25-pounder has made no real improvement in the arming of the Canadian army. The only thing it has done has been to make it possible for the Canadian army to ride on the United States supply line rather than on the British, as has been the case heretofore. Whether that will be an advantage or disadvantage only the future will tell.

The Centurion tank is a new and approved weapon. I am glad they were secured and a considerable number are in use in our army. The only other improvement in our arms is the use of some mortars and rockets and the FN rifle. So it can be said that by and large, except for a limited number of improved weapons, the Canadian army in its organization and its armament is essentially the same as the army we had in the last war.

I do not think that is good enough; I do not think the minister thinks it is good enough, as is indicated by his speech. I am surprised that the situation has been allowed to go on as long as it has without any improvement. During the last three or four years we on this side of the house have called repeatedly for the use of more mobile troops, airborne and in armoured vehicles. Apparently there has been some advance in the thinking of the minister and the government, as the minister indicated in his speech that there was a new armoured vehicle of an amphibious nature which was going to be secured. When he comes to reply, or when we are dealing with the army, I should like him to tell us how many of those vehicles it is proposed to secure, how soon they will be in the hands of units, and also if any of them will be given to the reserve army for training purposes.

Many people at one time or another have spoken of the army as being obsolescent, and so on. I do not believe there is any validity whatever in that contention. I do not think the army is obsolescent, or that it will ever be obsolescent as long as wars are going to be fought. As far as our defence thinking in Canada is concerned, we should work on the basis that it is going to be essential to maintain an army. At the same time I believe there is no question but that the old form of division such as we had in the last war and such as we have at the present time is not adapted to modern requirements. I believe that all the troops in an infantry division, or whatever kind of division you call it, should be carried either by air or in armoured vehicles. I think we must work in that direction as far as our army is concerned.

The information I have read in connection with the new German army is that it is all going to be either armoured or carried in tracked vehicles which will have good cross-country performance. Whether you admire the Germans or not, you must admit that they have been extremely good military thinkers and organizers. The fact that they are going into a set-up of that sort should be sufficient to cause us to examine our position very carefully, where we still have our infantry battalions on their flat feet, in the same position they were in during the last war, with a certain number of trucks without cross-country performance to transport them on roads. We must realize that in any future war there probably will not be roads on which to transport them. We must have vehicles with cross-country performance.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry to advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Harkness: I can either go on at the present time or come back to it later; I do not care.

The Deputy Chairman: With the unanimous consent of the committee, of course, the hon. member may continue.

An hon. Member: Go ahead.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Harkness: To return to this matter, Mr. Chairman, I believe it is fairly generally accepted that in the event of an atomic war troops have to be in fairly small formations. I think also it is going to be essential that units, sub-units and even single detachments must be in a position so they can move rapidly about the country and be self-sufficient for, say, at least a week. Even in the last war we got to that, as far as anti-tank gun detachments were concerned. They had a ration box, sufficient petrol, a certain amount of water and all the ammunition they could carry. They could be set down and left for a week, and one did not have to worry about supplying them. It was probably only a small detachment of seven men to which that applied, but I think that will have to apply to other detachments, down to the infantry section and half-section. They will need to be carried in a vehicle which is armoured to some extent to give them protection against small-arms fire, and they will have to be equipped so they can live for a week or more by themselves without being supplied, because it is very doubtful whether the great supply trains of the last war and of previous wars—army service corps columns occupying miles of road, bringing up ammunition, food and all the other supplies—will be possible. As a matter of fact, most of the supplies will probably be air-dropped. Therefore the reorganization of the army, I think, makes it essential, to begin with, that these very small detachments, units, sub-units and so forth, can each operate more or less independently. If most of a unit is wiped out, what is left can still operate without having to be supplied every day or two days.

That type of army organization is essential, I think, for atomic war, but also I believe it is a much better type of organization for any kind of war, whether it is conventional war or whether it is one of these bush fire wars. It is the type of organization which will be more mobile, more flexible and will give a better account of itself than the old type to which we have been accustomed is likely to do. In other words what I think we need, as far as the future is concerned, can be summed up in a few words: mobility, fire power, armoured protection for vehicles, and staying power, the ability to stay for a week or more without having to be resupplied. These things, I think, will be much more important in the wars of the future than numbers, and are what the reorganization of the army should aim at.

Now I turn to the air force. I think it is generally accepted by military thinkers of every country that it is in the last phase of its existence as a bomber-fighter force. In our case, of course, it is purely a fighter force. We have no bomber force. The general thinking is that in five to ten years the guided missile will have taken the place of the manned aircraft and, therefore, as a fighter-bomber force the air force will no longer have a role to follow, though it will have that role for the next five to ten years, or something along those lines. As a result, I think the long-range thinking has to be directed toward the role which the air force is going to be assigned. What is going to happen, as far as it is concerned, when this five to ten year period is over? What has been its primary role no longer exists.

In the United States there is a very unseemly row going on between the air force and the army as to which one is going to look after guided missiles. I can quite understand that. The air force officers there see what the future holds and they want to retain their place in the sun and have control of the guided missiles. The army says they are just a form of artillery and belong to them. So the fight is on. Fortunately we have had no fight, in the open at least, in this country, as far as that is concerned; but it is one of the major matters of defence policy on which a decision needs to be made.

I think this house has the right to be informed as to what may be the thinking of the government, its military experts and others in regard to this very important matter. Whatever it may be, the air force, instead of having its present strategic and tactical role, is going to have quite a different place and a different role than has been the case so far. It is either going to have these guided missiles and thus become in effect the artillery of our armed forces or it is going to become a transport force to move men, supplies and so forth from place to place. Of course a change of that magnitude means that some forward thinking in preparation for it should be under way at the present time.

In any event, whatever is done as far as the air force is concerned—I have no fixed ideas on what should be done in that regard, but I am certain that these changes I have indicated are coming—whatever is done, as the strategic and tactical reasons for the separation of the air force and the army will have ended by that time, I do not think there is much question that there is no good reason to maintain that separation.

That leads me to the numerous suggestions that have been made, particularly by Field Marshal Montgomery but by many others too, in regard to the unification of the armed services. There has been a good deal of thinking about this matter by some eminent military men, many of them in the United States, including the present chief of their air force, who believe there should be complete unification of the three armed services and that there should be one service head. I think a move in that direction is probably inevitable in the course of time in order to secure an efficient and effective defence force and, as I have indicated, I think we should perhaps be taking some steps toward it.

I find, Mr. Chairman, that I have taken about 15 minutes longer than I expected on this portion of my remarks. My remarks are more extended than I thought they would be from my notes, and as I do not wish to trespass on the indulgence of the committee I think I will give place to someone else and come back to this other matter later. It has to do with the reorganization of defence headquarters.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, during the years I have had the privilege of taking part in the discussion of the defence estimates I believe I have always begun with the complaint that we must deal with the important subject of Canada's defence preparations largely in a vacuum so far as detailed information is concerned. That has been true in the past and it is again true with respect to official sources of information. However, as other hon. members have stated during the discussion, considerable information has been placed before the public of Canada in recent years from certain high military sources, even though those sources are not quite official. Some of the information that has appeared in magazines such as Maclean's and Saturday Night, for example, has indeed been rather disconcerting.

I want to spend most of my time dealing with the air force aspect of defence, but before going into the details I should like to suggest to the minister that the stock answer we get from time to time, "not in the public interest", when we ask for specific information on certain aspects of military activity, the progress in recruiting, the new developments that are taking place in the various branches of the armed forces, is in my opinion a little bit overdone. I say so because I feel that if as the House of Commons we took the public of Canada into our confidence our armed forces would be much more efficient and our state of preparedness would be further advanced than at the present time.

To justify the assertion that we are adequately prepared to meet any emergency, we often refer to the continuing high level of expenditure which during the past few years has averaged some $2 billion a year. I am afraid that as a result of sloughing off responsibility in that way the ordinary citizen, when he writes his income tax cheque, which is quite substantial for the average Canadian, feels that he is making all the contribution that is necessary to the defence of Canada. It is the same sort of situation that develops with reference to charity today. People who make contributions in response to various charitable appeals feel that they have discharged their complete responsibility by the financial contributions they make.

In my opinion the state of world politics today is such that the Canadian public should be made completely aware of precisely how inadequately we are prepared as a nation to meet an emergency, and also how inadequately the western powers as a group, particularly those associated with NATO, are prepared. The minister began his remarks yesterday in a rather ominous tone by referring to the threat of nuclear warfare, the threat of total warfare, for that is obviously what nuclear warfare means. If we are faced with any potential situation of total warfare that situation must be met by total preparation. We cannot have total preparation unless the people of the nation are prepared in every respect. We must not only be prepared by having a professional armed force, but the people must also be prepared psychologically, spiritually and from the standpoint of morale and esprit de corps in order to meet any possible emergency.

I think the real reason the answer "not in the public interest" is almost invariably given to questions that penetrate too closely to the heart of defence problems is that as a nation we lack any comprehensive policy. This year, as in previous years, I have searched the white paper in vain for any complete statement of Canadian policy in the face of the continuing world emergency. That is not merely conjecture on my part, because some of the statements that have appeared in articles in magazines have also suggested the same thing, that there is no co-ordinated effort to evolve a sound and comprehensive defence policy. That statement was made by General Simonds in his recent article in Maclean's magazine.

My suspicions in this regard are also aroused by the fact that defence expenditure for this year has continued at precisely the same level as last year, $1¾ billion, exactly the same figure as last year, which more or less suggests that the minister and his officials have made a rough guess as to what our defence expenditure needs might be for the next year and have decided to perpetuate the status quo so far as the estimates for the ensuing year are concerned. The charge of no policy is not new. As a young nation Canada has found itself in the same situation throughout our whole military experience.

I have been reading that very excellent history, "Six Years of War", by Colonel Stacey, the first volume of which was published last fall, I believe. It deals with Canada's effort in world war II, and the point repeatedly emerges in Colonel Stacey's analysis of Canada's participation in the war and the period immediately preceding the war that there was no policy. There was no comprehensive planning. There was a hope and grope approach to the problem of defence. Perhaps that might be excusable in the period before world war II because we were living in a fool's paradise so far as our attitude toward any possible threat of war was concerned, but certainly we have had the harsh realities of the world political situation brought home to us in the years since the end of world war II.

I have here a few interesting observations by Colonel Stacey in this regard. For example, he refers to the minister of national defence during that period, the late Ian Mackenzie, at the imperial conference of 1937 opposing any extraneous commitments so far as defence expenditures were concerned. I came across this interesting tidbit. In 1936 the military chiefs of that day requested $250 million and received $36 million. Hitler was already on the rampage but we had our heads in the sand. In the appropriation in 1939-40, the year world war II broke out, the amount was precisely $60 million and Colonel Stacey in rather quaint language says that this produced a strong protest from the army. Of course, as I have hinted, the explanation was that we were still in the throes of a depression. Unemployment was still widespread. The public accounts still showed a regular deficit.

It is interesting to note that in 1938, on this same matter of defence policy, the then prime minister, the late Mr. Mackenzie King, wrote to all his colleagues in the cabinet reminding them of the recent deficits and emphasizing the importance of achieving a surplus and, if possible, some reduction in taxation before the next appeal to the electorate. I was most interested to find that any attempt by the military advisers of that day to set up an armament industry was turned back by the administration in those immediate pre-world war II days. Requests went forward from the chiefs of staff for the establishment of an armament industry right up to the outbreak of war, and those requests were continually turned back by the government. Of course, had the government accepted the recommendations of their military advisers the Canadian land forces in the second world war could have been armed with modern weapons from the outset. As it was, they made do for many months with the equipment of 1918.

I refer to these interesting extracts from the official history because they point out that we in Canada have never had a comprehensive policy toward military preparation. If it had not been for the quality—which we have heard mentioned in this debate several times —of Canadian young men who have volunteered for service in the two wars and in the Korean period of crisis, we would never have made such a magnificent showing as we actually made in the defence of Canada. It is quite true that Canadians have a strength of character that seems to bring out the best in periods of crisis.

If the world situation is as difficult and as black as the minister outlined in his opening statement, as is referred to in the white paper, and as is mentioned from time to time by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, it is not enough to hope that Canadian citizens will rise to the occasion to meet any potential crisis that might be just around the corner.

Having had the experience of lack of preparedness for world war II and the unhappy state of affairs in the world that emerged following the collapse of the German reich, one would have thought we had learned our lesson. But we find that immediately after the cessation of hostilities the administration tried to revert to the pre-world war II period. We withdrew our forces from Europe and from Germany. We would not participate in the occupation of that country.

According to the official record, on October 1, 1946, the regular forces had been reduced to a figure below 50,000. The defence commitments for the fiscal year 1950-51 were $420 million. That was the year the Korean crisis commenced, and we made a complete somersault in defence plans. Panic ensued, and we embarked upon a period of defence build-up that has been referred to in this house from time to time. It was referred to by the former minister of national defence as "crash planning".

I think that just about describes all the contribution this country has ever made toward military preparedness. We have waited until a crisis was upon us; we have panicked; and we have indulged in crash-planning preparations. That is something which is tremendously expensive and tremendously wasteful; it is the sort of planning that produced the unhappy state of affairs outlined in the Currie report and which placed the armed forces of Canada in considerable bad odour for a long period of time. We are still not quite sure of where we are going, if we are to accept the opinion of the unofficial sources that have been discussing this situation in recent months.

Just before calling it six o'clock, Mr. Chairman, I should like to place on record a summation of the contemporary situation by the retired former chief of the army staff. He says:

> Thus little dodging expediencies grow into vast incubuses and huge sums of money are committed on a "defence policy"—

Those words are in quotation marks.

> —that has never been thought through in all ramifications and consequences, and is no more than a ramshackle expensive patchwork.

If I may call it six o'clock, Mr. Chairman, I shall continue after the dinner recess.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, at six o'clock I was making the point that this question of lack of policy in defence matters is not a new thing in Canada. Actually, as a young nation we have never arrived at the position where we have met in a comprehensive way our defence responsibilities that have been increasing as Canada has assumed a role of increasing importance in world affairs. During the post-war era this particular aspect of public affairs has become a matter of extreme urgency.

The suggestion has been put forward, Mr. Chairman, that one of the reasons for our inability to outline a comprehensive program is the difficulties at the upper echelon of administration. It has been pointed out, for example, in recent statements by those who have occupied important positions in Canada's defence department that there is a bottleneck at the top; there is a break down in communication between the ministerial level and the level of chiefs of staff; there is a lack of liaison between senior civil servants and the other higher levels of command.

I recall that on former occasions during debates on the departmental estimates it was suggested that perhaps we should relieve the minister of some of his responsibilities by appointing a minister for air. That suggestion was made during the critical Korean build-up period. Following the Currie report discussion in the house there was an assistant minister of defence appointed. Now, these matters are in the realm of speculation, and I think the only way we can come to grips with the difficulty is by establishing a committee of the house that could meet from time to time and try to open up channels of communication and endeavour to bring our defence policy, which is a very important thing, into proper perspective at this time.

I do not want to spend all my time on policy; I want to deal specifically with the air force, as I indicated in my opening remarks. In matters pertaining to the air force I am glad to see in the white paper there is an indication that we are moving toward a semblance of a policy. The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich, before his departure from the house yesterday, congratulated the minister in this regard and indicated there is some evidence that the suggestions of the opposition have not been entirely without result; because the new policies, if you can call them that, that are outlined in the white paper are definitely based on suggestions that have come from this side of the house during discussions in former years.

The air force in Canada, because of the very nature of our geographic position, occupies a position of utmost importance in any Canadian defence policy. This is being recognized by the Department of National Defence, it is encouraging to note.

First of all, of course, there is the matter of personnel for the air force. Any branch of the service requires suitable personnel. I am not going to dwell on this problem. It has been mentioned by other speakers, but the white paper does indicate a high level of wastage which is not in the best interests of building up a strong, effective air arm. There appears to be a shortage of air crew. We have been trying to form additional squadrons for a couple of years now, and there seems to be a lack of the necessary trained personnel to equip those squadrons.

In passing, may I say that perhaps one of the reasons for the lack of interest of Canadian youth in the air force might be the relatively low level of incentive pay. This is a matter that has been mentioned in the house before. I believe it remains at the world war II level of $30 a month, regardless of the number of hours flown. Whether you are a chairborne pilot or a full operational pilot, you still qualify only for the additional $1 a day flying pay, which compares with something like $175 a month for the United States equivalent. Even in the R.A.F., where the service rates of pay are lower than the R.C.A.F., the flying incentive pay is at a much higher level. That, of course, is not the only factor, but it could be one of the reasons for the lack of incentive.

The main difficulty so far as personnel is concerned seems to be in the shortage of maintenance personnel. This is indicated by the increasing use of civilians to fill maintenance positions. In the realm of electronics, private industry in Canada is growing by leaps and bounds. There is difficulty in retaining the personnel in the electronics field in the air force. The air force has tended to be a source of supply of qualified technicians in this particular area.

The problem of course, relates itself to the whole problem of personnel in Canada, where we are short of technicians of all kinds, where we are short of scientifically trained personnel. The difficulty comes up in almost all departmental discussions, and it is definitely sufficiently acute to require urgent joint action on the part of educational authorities and on the part of industry in co-operation with the government. If we are to have a comprehensive air policy we must meet the demands of personnel requirements.

Now, there is the matter of weapons. We have been discussing radar development on the North American continent. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, there is considerable misunderstanding concerning the function of our radar screen, which has been compared with the Maginot line complex, and so forth. There has been some criticism that unnecessary expenditure is going into the establishment of our three radar lines. Well, I should like to suggest that we have an excellent example of the function of a weapon of this kind—if you can call it a weapon; it is a defensive weapon—in the experience of the battle of Britain. Had it not been for the foresight of the pioneers in this field—they called it radio location in those days—the first of the few would not have succeeded in practically destroying the power of the Luftwaffe and winning the battle of Britain. They were able to do so only because they worked in close conjunction with the radar network that had been established around the United Kingdom.

Therefore I am one of those who believe that the radar installations are a very necessary and important development in any comprehensive program of air defence at this time. True enough, there are defects that cannot be overcome. We cannot detect high-flying aircraft; we cannot detect low-flying aircraft. These defects were present during world war II, yet they did not offset the overall effectiveness of the screen.

The main criticism in this regard has been brought to bear because of the feeling that we have reached an era when we are faced with the immediate prospects of intercontinental ballistic missiles. But so far as any information I have been able to get is concerned, it would appear that the I.B.M. warfare, as it is called, is some 10 years away. I do not know whether the minister will agree with that figure; but if it is so you have a 10-year interval in which the more orthodox air force defence is going to be required, and particularly the policy emphasis today on massive retaliation.

Massive retaliation seems to be the strategy of the west. If that is so I would agree, Mr. Chairman, that it is essential that Canada make its maximum contribution in fighter aircraft, because in the massive retaliation strategy it is going to be necessary for any potential bomber threat to penetrate deeply into the North American continent. Even a flying time of two or three hours makes it possible for conventional fighter aircraft, if we can call the CF-100 and the CF-105 conventional aircraft—the latter is not off the assembly line but it is more or less a conventional type—to intercept a considerable number of attacking bombers. Perhaps the best argument in support of our radar program is the fact that the D.E.W. line in particular would make it possible for our retaliatory forces, the strategic bombers, to get airborne and attempt to break through the enemy defences and at the same time give us time to get the fighters airborne to meet any onslaught from the enemy. I think we are moving in the right direction so far as our air defence policy is concerned. The CF-100 and the F-86 are admittedly obsolete and the sooner we can get the CF-105, which will be in production shortly, off the assembly line the better will be our defence position air-wise.

This leads me to make just a brief comment on the importance of the air industry to Canada. Canada is a natural country for the development of a strong air industry. We are a young nation and we are on the verge of tremendous development, particularly in the northern regions. In similar manner air power is just in its infancy. We are on the threshold of tremendous achievements in the air.

In the past the advances in aviation have come largely from the impetus that has been provided by military development. We in Canada have been gently ushered into the air age. We have the nucleus of an air industry, but I think there is a fundamental weakness in our approach to the establishment of an air industry in that our emphasis has been largely on the military aspect. Admittedly, as I have already indicated, that is where the initial impetus comes from; but the very nature of the Canadian problem, with its huge distances and with its potential in the north, suggests that we should be developing an air industry which provides a nice balance between military and civilian needs.

As I see the situation we are very deficient in the civilian aspect of this particular development. Even in the air force, as far as I have been able to determine, we are not moving forward too vigorously in developing a strong transport command; in fact we have been marking time in recent years. Perhaps that is because we are waiting for new types of aircraft to emerge; but it seems we are in an ideal position, Mr. Chairman, to combine a military production program and a civilian production program with a modified form of the Bristol Britannia type of aircraft that will be in service in a comparatively short time. This Bristol Britannia is primarily a civilian transport which is being modified for military purposes. I have the specifications here but time will not allow me to discuss them in detail. I would, however, point out that the Britannia has proven itself a very economic and effective interim transport aircraft. As we move toward the jet age, it is a transport aircraft that could serve in various capacities in Canada on the transcontinental route. Its runway requirements are relatively limited as compared with the pure jet transport, and certainly it could play a major role in the opening up of the north, particularly with the establishment of the numerous airfields in connection with the D.E.W. line.

The Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I am obliged to advise him that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

The Chairman: Has the hon. gentleman unanimous consent to proceed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Dinsdale: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for your courtesy.

I believe we were caught short in the D.E.W. line development. My colleague the hon. member for York West will be dealing with this in greater detail later on in the debate; he has a much wider grasp of this problem than I have. If we had planned very carefully, taking into consideration the special needs of Canada, we would have been in a position to have a very strong civilian air industry at this time.

There is another aspect of the necessity of co-ordinating civilian and military needs. The minister spoke of a mobile striking force as one of the objectives of air policy. That is another suggestion that has been put forward repeatedly by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich. He is one of those retired generals with a very flexible attitude toward the changing demands of defence today. Any effective mobile striking force, in addition to being transported across the ocean by means of Bristol Britannias—if that were the type of aircraft adopted—would require air transport facilities to make it possible to deal effectively with any enemy lodgments in isolated areas of this country. That would demand a smaller type of aircraft, and again we have an industry in Canada producing an aircraft very suitable for that purpose. I am referring, of course, to the Beaver and Otter produced by the de Havilland Company. These planes have established fine reputations in the field of small air transports.

As has been said repeatedly, we have to balance the demands of total nuclear warfare with the demands of conventional warfare, and if we are going to have an effective air defence policy—we are moving toward it timidly—we are going to have to think in terms of completely air portable—not airborne but air portable—mobile striking force, as we on the side of the house have continually indicated. That, of course, is going to mean a much more effective and comprehensive transport command operation than we have at the moment.

One further thought on this matter of a Canadian air industry. It is a subject which I bring up regularly. I am not alone in harping on this theme; it is a theme that has been picked up in many areas in Canada. The most recent exponent is another retired general who has been making statements that should be listened to with considerable interest by the government.

I refer, of course, to General Worthington, who is in charge of our civil defence organization and planning. He has been saying repeatedly in recent days that we must avoid the building up of these huge city areas which are flowing over and absorbing the surrounding rural areas like the tentacles of an octopus, swallowing up the fruitful agricultural land as in the Niagara peninsula, for instance. This is occurring at such a rate that according to a C.B.C. program last Sunday evening—"In the Shadow of the City," I think it was called—if it continues to absorb fruitful agricultural land at the present rate there will be none left in that area in 10 years. There are 50,000 acres left now and we are absorbing it at the rate of 2,000 acres annually. That of course is due to the high concentration of industry in certain areas.

Mr. Hellyer: Two times ten is not fifty.

Mr. Dinsdale: I am out somewhere in my statistics, but the increase was large enough to absorb 50,000 acres within a 10-year period. I am told that the aircraft industry in Canada employs between 35,000 and 40,000 people. This industry is concentrated in the urban areas and involves the expenditure of tremendous sums of money. I believe that if we are going to have an intelligent and logical defence policy we must have an air industry which can be defended and protected in the event of hostilities. That can be done only by dispersal across the country.

I have suggested on many occasions that we have lots of room in western Canada for such dispersal, and we also have all the necessary ingredients to make a worth-while contribution to this important aspect of Canada's economic life. The argument is always raised that dispersal is uneconomic, but when survival is at stake—I am quoting from the A. V. Roe brief to the Gordon commission—economics are of secondary consideration. So I raise this matter of dispersal and hope that those responsible will give it urgent attention as we move toward a more comprehensive air policy generally.

I do not want to impose upon the patience of the committee too extensively at this time. I intended to speak on the reserve and auxiliary problems, but that would require a longer time than I think I should take now. Perhaps I can come back to this particular aspect later on in the debate.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, in making my contribution to the discussion of the estimates of the Minister of National Defence I must at the outset plead guilty to a lack of technical knowledge which some hon. members seem to possess. I do not think I have ever seen one of these famous CF-100's, nor would I recognize it if I did. However, the Department of National Defence takes almost half the income of the federal government; therefore I am pleased to see more members taking an active interest in exactly what is happening to this vast expenditure of public money. As an ordinary citizen of Canada I am interested in what will be the effects of government policy in relation to the subject of world peace.

I am often asked back home to give some measure of explanation as to what the government actually uses this almost $2,000 million for, which they supposedly spend for defence. I do my utmost to explain that it is the responsibility of the Minister of National Defence to do everything possible to protect us from whatever hostile action we may be called upon to endure as a result of the activities of another nation.

I was a little disappointed the other day when I read the British United Press dispatch which reported that the people on the west coast of Canada had been subjected to radioactive rainfall. On the orders of the day on June 15 and June 19—I did not put this question to the Minister of National Defence because I thought the matter was so important that it should receive consideration at a higher level of government than the head of one department—I asked by whose authority Canadian citizens were subjected to what might have been a dangerous radioactive rainfall, and I asked also what measures were being taken to assure Canadian citizens that things of this nature would not happen again. We did have the assurance in a news dispatch that the amount of radioactivity in the rain which fell was not harmful, but we have no assurance that on another occasion in the months and years ahead we might not be faced with disaster from other explosions which could be harmful. I say this because of the reports by scientists as to what may happen, and I look to the Minister of National Defence to supply me with an answer to the problem.

I feel it is the primary responsibility of the minister to protect the Canadian people from the actions of another nation. The Minister of National Health and Welfare replied that the Canadian government had not participated in any decision in regard to the thermonuclear explosion which took place about a month ago. If the Canadian government did not take part and was in no way responsible for that incident, then I feel it is up to the Canadian government to make representations to the authorities who were responsible in an effort to avoid what may some day be a serious situation. I am told that the scientists themselves are never sure at the time of one of these explosions how far-reaching the consequences may be.

Before saying anything more about the department I should like once again to place on the record my attitude toward the Department of National Defence. I made the following statement to the house on November 19, 1953, as reported on page 164 of Hansard of that date:

> For the record I should like to make it perfectly clear here that at this stage I do not oppose but rather endorse the use of force which may be necessary for the maintenance of law and order. But such force must be exercised by some authority which is higher than those who are involved in the argument. As long as the United Nations is the United Nations and not the Soviet union or the United States I am in hearty agreement with the use of military force by that body for the maintenance of world peace.

Recently there occurred an incident in connection with which we felt most keenly the lack of a United Nations defence force, and I refer to the severe tension which obtained, and to a great extent exists even today, in the Middle East. At the height of that crisis the leaders of Canada, Great Britain and the United States seemed to be at a complete loss as to what action they should take if the situation became worse. I am sure we are all glad that a conflagration did not take place at that time, but that incident revealed the urgent need for some plan of action on the international level being established before we are in the middle of a crisis.

The minister and the member for Esquimalt-Saanich referred to that incident. However, the member for Esquimalt-Saanich also pointed out that when the Korean incident occurred we were really not prepared, and the United Nations as an international force was really not prepared and not in a position to meet the situation. It was only because we were fortunate enough to be able to engage in some delaying action that the forces of the supporting members were rallied and a long-term defence against aggression was undertaken.

If we are spending almost $2,000 million for our national defence we might as well give some serious consideration to having at least some of that money devoted to an international police force whose responsibility it will be to be ready for any little emergency that may arise; and little emergencies, as we know, can sometimes involve the whole world in armed conflict.

I also realize that Canada as a nation is too weak to have a defence policy of its own. We cannot act unilaterally; it would simply be a complete waste of public funds. If we are ever involved in a major world struggle, Canada alone cannot even defend her own shores. Therefore military organizations may be necessary. I have indicated that I would prefer to see that military co-ordination under the auspices of the United Nations. That may not be entirely realistic in the world in which we live, and we therefore have our NATO organization.

As I observe what is happening in the Department of National Defence, I get the feeling that Canada even today is still pursuing, for the major part, a unilateral defence policy. I will admit that there is some co-operation with our neighbour to the south and some of our NATO allies. However, the basic assumption still seems to be to build up a national defence force. I feel that the major emphasis should rather be on making our fair contribution to a united effort on the part of the western democracies, and making our fair contribution to world effort on behalf of maintaining peace.

Then I think the shift from the military to the economic front in the so-called cold war has particular significance for a country such as ours. I believe that in this shift may well lie not only the salvation of world peace but our own economic salvation. We are producers of many of the basic needs of the world, and some of them we have in excess. We do not know what to do with the surpluses we have. If the cold war were really fought on the economic front, we would find ample markets for all the products that Canada is now producing and also for those we would be able to produce if we made a sincere effort to produce to win, as some years ago we made an all-out effort to produce to win the war.

We have the Colombo plan, to which we make a contribution. We make a contribution to the refugee assistance program, the United Nations technical assistance organization, the world health organization and various other international organizations. However, our sum total of contributions on the economic front thus far has been most insignificant when placed in relationship, first of all, with our ability to donate and, second, with the expenditures on the military side of the battle for men's minds.

We have at the present time a department of national defence which spends over $100 per annum for every man, woman and child in our nation. The ordinary people of Canada have a right to know something of what they are getting for this continuous, heavy expenditure of public funds. We had an explanation given us by the minister the other day in regard to the radar lines, which are among the most expensive of our defence expenditures. As recorded on page 5211 of Hansard, he said:

> These are projects of great difficulty and magnitude—costly, but we believe worth the cost. For they will buy us time—time to get the big United States deterrent force of bombers with their nuclear weapons winging away on their missions should the need arise, time to get our defences activated, time to prepare our people for impending attack.

I must agree with the first reason the minister gave for the existence of radar lines. Anyone knowing the world situation and looking at the globe will have to admit that. However, I must take exception to the last part of his sentence, when he says these radar lines will give us time to get our defences activated, time to prepare our people for impending attack. I believe the minister is not telling the whole story when he says that. I believe that when these radar lines were first initiated that was possibly the greatest reason for initiating them. However, if the minister has, as I am sure he has, read the statistics on the performance of modern aircraft, of the Russian accomplishments and so forth, I think he will have to admit that none of our radar lines—the mid-Canada line, the "Pinetree" line or the distant early warning line, will in any shape or form, for any practical purposes, be able to warn our people to prepare themselves to resist the effects of an attack. That has become outmoded. A sentence like that five years ago might have been acceptable to this house, but in 1956 it is no longer valid.

With many other members of this house I went to the military installations at Fort Churchill; I believe it was a little over a year ago now. There is one recommendation I should like to make in connection with that. Wherever possible I think the efforts of the Department of National Defence should tie in with the national life of Canada, so that more Canadians will know that we actually have a department of national defence and so that as many Canadians as possible will at least receive some of the benefits of this large expenditure of money.

When I refer to Fort Churchill, what I have in mind is this. Here we have the military camp supplied with purified, running water, all the sanitary services you could wish for, hydroelectric energy and so forth. Yet only a very short distance away we have the old Fort Churchill where the ordinary civilians live, and they have no sanitary facilities, no water supplied to them. None of the amenities that are available and supplied to the armed forces there are extended to the civilian population. I feel that with a little bit of extra money the people living there in Canada's north could receive some of the benefits of having the military camp next door.

I heartily endorse the need expressed by my colleagues and also the members of the Conservative party for a committee on national defence. I think the Canadian people and the members of this house in particular are not nearly well enough informed about what is happening, what is being done with the money. I realize there may be need to maintain some of these expenditures on the secret list. However, when you look at what is happening in other democratic countries of the world I doubt very much whether you will find another western nation where the minister in charge of defence is given authority to spend $1,700 million odd and nobody is able to investigate to find what is actually being done with the money.

Furthermore, I maintain that there is great need for more public relations efforts on the part of the minister's department. The ordinary taxpayer back home sees only the advertisements inviting him to don a uniform. He sees very little else of what is being done by the Department of National Defence. I think a percentage of the money could very well be devoted to an explanation to the public, in ways by which other departments of the government well know how to obtain public sympathy and understanding, of what we ought to be doing; and if the public find out we are not doing what ought to be done they will be able to do something. No one wants to be responsible for endangering the safety and welfare of his own nation, yet people are not supplied with the information that is needed. Therefore one can sympathize with people when they begin to raise serious questions.

Finally may I say that my main purpose in rising tonight was to say that I believe that unilateral defence for Canada as a nation is outmoded, useless and a complete waste of money. In my opinion we must collaborate with the other nations of the western world, and especially must we bear in mind that at no time shall we harm the possible collective security that may well be set up some day for the safety of the world by the world-wide organization, the United Nations.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, this evening I should like to deal briefly with three different subjects coming up or not coming up under the estimates of the Department of National Defence. The first is the program of defence research and development. If hon. members will turn to page 339 of the estimate book they will find that the minister is asking for defence research and development in the current fiscal year the sum of $79,032,389. Last year he asked for $52,578,000, so there is an increase in that particular estimate of practically 50 per cent. Of that increase of over $26 million, more than $21 million, according to the estimate book, is for the acquisition and construction of equipment, the total amount required for that purpose, including the increase, being practically $50 million. That is by far the largest part of the defence research and development vote.

Incidentally, it is interesting to recall that in the fiscal year 1954-55, two years ago, the amount asked for research was $50,400,000, and that in each of the two preceding years it was only $42 million. Therefore we are now being asked to vote almost twice as much for research and development as was voted in the years from 1952 to 1954. This amount of $80 million is a very large sum of money. I remember sessions just before the war when $65 million was voted for the whole Department of National Defence, and everyone thought that was a very big expenditure. Now we have $80 million for this one particular portion of the work.

I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that parliament should have some check on this expenditure for research and development. This session we have set up a committee on non-military research, but so far as I know there has never been any committee of the house with the power to inquire into the ways in which the money voted for research was being expended by the Department of National Defence. I realize that some of the work must of necessity be secret, but even in the days of the war there were committees with the power to go into many expenditures of a similar type, and I see no reason why there should not be a committee of the house at the present time. Probably the committee on national defence suggested by my leader this afternoon would be the one to undertake that work. We have the position today that very large sums of money are being sought for defence research without any adequate check whatever on the part of the members of the house.

In connection with the research and development program I ask the minister to tell the committee the cost to Canada of the "Velvet Glove" project. We find it referred to on page 35 of the white paper. It seems to have been at least one of the main projects of the defence research board, and the white paper has this to say:

> Shortly after the inception of the defence research board in 1947, a small group of the board's scientists began studies in the guided missile field. In recognition of future Canadian needs for special air defence weapons, and under arrangements with United States and United Kingdom authorities, the board concentrated on the family of air-to-air missiles.

Apparently that was to be Canada's field, air-to-air missiles.

> In 1950 it was decided to undertake a practical but experimental Canadian project. The prime purpose of the project was to build up within the board's staff and throughout Canadian industry a team of scientists and engineers capable of developing and producing guided missiles in this country, while familiarizing officers of the Canadian services with problems and techniques involved in using such weapons.

Then the report goes on to say this:

> 126. Known as the "Velvet Glove", this project has resulted in the training of some 400 specialized personnel in Canada, and has been accompanied by the development of facilities for research, testing and evaluation of guided missiles. A limited number of missiles are being produced, particularly for testing and training purposes at the R.C.A.F.'s establishment at Cold Lake, Alberta. Canadian industry has made progress towards developing design and manufacturing capability in this complex new field.

By the way, earlier in this particular section of the white paper it is stated that the principal increase in the vote for research and development is directly related to anticipated expenditure in connection with the CF-105 airplane, and the guided missile program. Hence even in this vote that we are considering tonight there is a great deal of money presumably for this guided missile project. Then the white paper goes on to say this:

127. On the basis of this preliminary work Canada is now working out arrangements for the production in this country of a United States type of air-to-air missile, in order to make Canadian interceptor aircraft better able to perform their role in the air defence system.

That white paper does not make it clear that the "Velvet Glove" project has not been successful. The minister did that when he spoke yesterday. As reported at page 5214 of Hansard he said this:

The pioneer work was done on the "Velvet Glove", which so far has fully come up to its original specifications. However—

And this is a very big "however"; this is the part that indicates that the whole project has not been a success.

—because a somewhat similar United States missile is of more advanced design, it has been decided not to adopt "Velvet Glove" for operation use, but to modify the "Velvet Glove" program and go into production of one of the Sparrow series for use with the CF-100 and the CF-105.

It would appear that at least some and probably a great deal of the money that has been spent on the "Velvet Glove" project has gone down the drain. I ask the minister, when he replies, to tell the committee just what amount of money has been spent on this "Velvet Glove" program.

Again, another point in connection with research is this. What consideration is given to long-term defence requirements before any particular research project is authorized? I ask that question because General Simonds raised it in his article in Maclean's magazine. I do not know whether or not General Simonds is right in all his statements in this magazine, but in any event he is one of the most distinguished soldiers this nation has ever produced. Probably we have never produced a finer field commander. He has served as chief of staff and, as we all know, he served with distinction. His statements must carry weight. Even if they do not carry much weight with the government I am sure they do with the Canadian public as a whole. These statements he has made should be answered by the Minister of National Defence in the course of this debate.

General Simonds has this to say. He refers to the navy and the air force. I do not know whether he left the army out because he is an army man, but at any rate in this particular part of the article he says this:

Thus the navy and the air force, which sustain a large sector of the shipbuilding and aircraft industries (the latter existing almost entirely upon defence expenditures for research, development and construction), are encouraged to embark on new projects, without too searching a consideration of whether what is being researched, developed or constructed necessarily represents the most valuable contribution to defence in the longer term.

Then he gives two examples. He says:

Thus, having regard to its timing, the wisdom of embarking upon the development of the CF-105 fighter is open to serious military objections. It should be abundantly clear by now that the ground-to-air missile offers the only prospect of eventually counterbalancing the existing ascendancy of the offensive in terms of aerial warfare. If, as many believe, there may be a dangerous time gap to be covered by some form of defence, after existing fighters are obsolete and before a really reliable ground-to-air guided missile is available in operational quantities, then it would have been both more sensible and economical to have adopted a prototype fighter developed by the U.S. or Britain as a gap-filler rather than to embark on an expensive venture of our own, the product of which at best will have a very short, if any, useful operational life.

I stress these next words:

The combined vested interests of the air force, the aircraft industry and defence research scientists, burning with zeal to participate in a project they could call their own, coupled with the known desire of ministers to maintain a defence effort with a strict manpower ceiling, swept aside any opposition to this venture.

He also has a similar criticism of the mid-Canada line. He says this:

The mid-Canada line with its "McGill fence" equipment could be justified as a stop-gap measure if there should occur an appreciable time lag between its completion and the completion of the D.E.W. line. It is difficult to understand what useful part it can fulfil in a defence system based upon guided missiles, which is a "must" of the not-distant future, if an even adequate defence is to be provided against offensive air power. The United States has pressed the construction of the D.E.W. line with such vigour that it is for serious consideration whether the arguments for construction of the mid-Canada line were not powerfully influenced by a desire to put to use gadgetry—

He uses this word "gadgetry" several times throughout the article, presumably referring to the defence research board.

—evolved in Canada at considerable effort, rather than considerations of what would provide the best defence, most capable of adaptation to new weapons as they evolved.

Those criticisms may or may not be justified, but they should be answered fully by the Minister of National Defence. It just may be the case, Mr. Chairman, that in our defence research effort we are spreading the money over too many projects. It might be better to concentrate and also to be a little more careful about giving directions for the start of any particular project.

The second subject I should like to mention tonight arises also out of the article by General Simonds. I refer to the present status of the permanent joint defence board. The general points out in the article—and correctly, I think—something in connection with the permanent joint board on defence; that is, of course, the Canadian-United States board. He points out as follows:

> The existence of the permanent joint board on defence adds further confusion to the direction of our military affairs.

He seems to think it is a fifth wheel to the coach. He continues:

> This organization came into being during the period of world war II when Canada was a belligerent and the United States was still neutral, and at that time was a useful instrument for obtaining some co-ordination of measures for North American defence. Now it simply acts as a barrier to closer liaison between the Canadian and U.S. chiefs of staff, and is redundant in so far as its military activities are concerned.

That is a very serious charge in view of our association in the defence field with the United States. Then General Simonds goes on:

> But the chairman has a more ready access to senior cabinet ministers than have the chiefs of staff. Whatever the terms of reference may be, many of the expressed views of ministers bear the unmistakable imprint of the influence of an intellect more remarkable for its bias toward pseudoscience and gadgetry, than for its record of sound military judgment.

These are rather harsh words about the Canadian chairman of the joint defence board; but what is the function of this board today? Why is there need for a permanent joint defence board working on its own when we have such close liaison between the two countries in military affairs? Surely that work should be done by the Canadian chiefs of staff rather than left in the hands of any outside board. What useful purpose is this joint defence board serving at the present time?

Then my third and final subject is this, Mr. Chairman. We read in the very first paragraph of the white paper about Canada's defence objectives. These are the broad defence objectives. This is the way the paragraph reads:

> The aim of Canada's defence program and planning is to provide for the security of Canada. Under present foreseeable conditions this can be done most effectively by close co-operation with our allies in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, and especially with the United States in relation to the North American area. Our defence plans must also include a capacity to carry out obligations that may arise out of Canada's membership in the United Nations Organization.

I point out that there is not one word in this paragraph, or in any other paragraph in this whole white paper, about the commonwealth, not one word about co-operation with the commonwealth in defence matters. Surely one of the main objectives of this nation in defence matters should be co-operation with the other nations of the commonwealth. Young men from these commonwealth nations fought side by side in two wars. In the first war we had Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, we had troops from India, beside us time and again in France; and you could have no finer troops beside you, as I think the minister will admit.

Mr. Campney: That was also true in Korea.

Mr. Green: Even Field Marshal Rommel, in the second world war, repeatedly expressed his great admiration for the New Zealand division, and considered them the finest troops facing him in North Africa.

In the second world war our young men fought and died beside young men from the other nations of the commonwealth. I saw, and probably the minister did too, the first young air force recruits under the commonwealth training plan go through Vancouver from Australia. Many thousands of them came that way, trained here in Canada and then flew their machines with our own Canadian pilots and navigators. Young men of the commonwealth saved civilization just a few years ago, and for a year they stood alone to do it. In 1941, with the exception of the short time that Greece was able to stand up against the nazi hordes, the British commonwealth stood alone and saved civilization.

And, by the way, things might have been different if it had not been for the young men who were trained in Canada in the air. It might also have been a great tragedy if the original plan of this government not to allow any British or other commonwealth airmen to come here and train had not been changed, and changed very suddenly.

This was what happened just a few years ago. Just 11 years ago these young men from the different nations of the commonwealth were fighting side by side and saving civilization. A few years ago in Korea we had the commonwealth division; yet today co-operating with the commonwealth is not even mentioned as an objective of the Canadian government in defence matters. I suggest to the minister that the present is a very appropriate time for something to be done about this failure. The Prime Minister is going to London within the next day or two to attend a meeting of the prime ministers of the commonwealth. Let him at that conference raise some of these defence questions.

For example, why should Canada not extend her present air training plan to include young airmen from other parts of the commonwealth, from the nations of the commonwealth that do not belong to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, the Australians, the New Zealanders, the South Africans, the Indians, the Pakistanians and the Ceylonese; any member nations of the commonwealth that wish to participate in this training plan. At page 14 of the white paper I find the following:

> At December 31, 1955, under the NATO air crew training plan carried out at R.C.A.F. establishments in Canada, a total of 1,741 pilots and 2,130 navigators, including observers, had graduated and a further 939 trainees were on course. These trainees have come from Belgium, Denmark, France, Greece, Italy, The Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, Turkey and the United Kingdom.

Why not extend that scheme and allow young men to come from other nations of the commonwealth?

Why not co-operate with the other nations of the commonwealth in the guided missile field? The British have proving grounds for guided missiles in Australia. They have done a great deal of work in that field. Why should not our Prime Minister suggest at the conference that all nations of the commonwealth which wish to do so should participate in a common guided missile project? These are the type of things which will have to be done. If they are not, if we just allow the commonwealth to drift along without facing some of the realities in the world today, I doubt very much whether it will continue in existence for a great deal longer.

Our defence effort and our defence expenditures are designed to prevent world domination by the communists. That is the one reason we are spending all this money in Canada for defence. If war comes, we all know that it will not be only in the North Atlantic treaty area; it will be a global war. It will be just as hot on the Pacific as it is on the Atlantic, and perhaps quite a bit hotter. Some of these commonwealth nations will not co-operate with NATO, but I believe they would be willing to co-operate with the other commonwealth nations in the fields which I have suggested. Co-operation of the commonwealth nations in a third world war might well be the deciding factor.

I urge upon the government, particularly on the Prime Minister and on the Minister of National Defence, that in our own interests we should leave no stone unturned to further co-operation among the commonwealth nations in defence matters at the present time. Some may not be willing to go very far; others might be willing to go the whole way, but let us at least do our part to further that type of co-operation among this group of nations which give allegiance to a common sovereign, our gracious Queen Elizabeth II.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Chairman, this house is fortunate in that its membership includes hon. members with great experience in all branches and at all levels of the armed services. I have personally met among its members those who have held ranks ranging from general down the line to buck private. They probably bring to bear on the problems of national defence as much personal experience and knowledge of these problems as any group of men anywhere in Canada.

Many of the matters which are discussed under the estimates of the Department of National Defence do require a high degree of technical knowledge and practical experience in one field or another of the armed services. Those of us who may not have had such extensive experience in that field are well advised, I think, to leave to the experts commentary and discussion in their field of special knowledge. On the other hand, there are many things which affect the Department of National Defence and many matters which come under its control which are reasonable grounds for discussion, comment and examination by anyone in this country, whether he be a civilian or an armed forces expert. The very extent of the department's budget, the amount of money it spends, would seem to bear out the truth of that statement.

I remember reading not so long ago that it takes the wool from 20 sheep, I think it is, to clothe a soldier; and I thought to myself at the time that to keep that man in the field it also takes the hides of about 30 taxpayers. I do not think, Mr. Chairman, any citizen of Canada objects to the expenditures on national defence where they are justified and properly made, but I do think every citizen of Canada and every hon. member of this house has ample justification for questioning certain of those expenditures and for feeling at many times that these expenditures are made without proper explanation to this house and sometimes, when we do find out how and why they have been made, without sufficient justification.

We must remember it is extremely likely the world will remain in a state of armed preparedness during our generation. There seems to be little likelihood of any major change in international relations in the foreseeable future that would permit us to beat our swords into plowshares. If, then, we are to remain in a state of armed preparedness, and if we are to be asked year in and year out to spend millions of dollars for national defence, we will have to adjust our thinking and approach to the subject of these expenditures to a peacetime concept rather than a wartime concept. By that I mean that a certain attitude of mind toward such expenditures which may be allowable and understandable in time of war should not be carried into peacetime. In brief it is the attitude that says, "Hang the expense. We must do the job at any expense and immediately, even though we are not absolutely sure the job needs to be done immediately".

That is the attitude one expects when one is under the gun, but it is not necessarily an attitude that is justified when the world is in a period of cold war, of planning and preparing for what at any moment may break out into a hot war but a hot war which certainly has not arrived as yet.

Second, in this matter of changing our attitude, Mr. Chairman, it would seem the necessity for the wartime attitude that everything connected with national defence, defence expenditure and all varities of activity in that field should be cloaked in secrecy may have to be altered. I do not think it is quite reasonable to expect the people of this country to continue year after year to willingly vote any amount of money requested by the Department of National Defence unless that department is prepared in peacetime to go further than it has to date in co-operating with this house in laying before it the details of many aspects of its operations.

It has been pointed out, and rightly so, that there are some things which should not be made public; but let me ask, Mr. Chairman, is there some marvellous capacity residing only with the armed services of this country which makes them the safe repositories of restricted information and renders a small committee of this house a doubtful repository for the same information?

Within this field of restricted information it might very well be said that all the details cannot be brought into the house and laid on the table in the full sight of every hon. member of the house and the press gallery. Through those channels, and correctly so, the information becomes the property of every resident of Canada no matter where his national or international sympathies may lie. But surely the type of committee which it has been suggested should be set up on an all-party basis could be taken completely and absolutely into the confidence of the Minister of National Defence and given all the information it required. Surely there are many, many aspects of national defence now kept under this cloak of secrecy which could easily and properly be brought into this house, explained to us and, if necessary, the accompanying expenditures defended before us. The best evidence of the government's unwillingness to do this has been their recurring refusal to refer the estimates of the Department of National Defence to the committee on estimates. Without labouring the point may I say that I hope the government will see fit to change this attitude at the next session of this parliament.

Having made these general remarks I should like to deal for a few minutes with some of the expenditures of the Department of National Defence very much as a taxpayer of this country might see them. Of course I cannot touch on every individual item, but there are a few which seem to require some explanation. In one field, for example, the department seems to be engaging in operations which could be carried on quite successfully by private enterprise. Indeed, I think this is one of the weaknesses of any over-large government department. Eventually they come to the conclusion that as ancillary operations to their main purpose they should carry on a multitude of functions. They are quite sure they can do these better than private enterprise, and they insist on carrying them on without any attempt whatsoever to divest themselves of the responsibility.

As examples selected from the last report of the Department of National Defence we find that they are in the restaurant business in a reasonably sizeable way, in that in the year under consideration they sold over $64,000 worth of meals. Then we find that they are in the photographic business, because they sold over $81,000 worth of photographic supplies. Then we find they are in the laundry business, because they took in over $160,000 for doing laundry. I am quite sure that if I were prepared to dig a little further I could find a list of other items, but I give those as typical examples; the restaurant business, the photographic business and the laundry business.

Let us realize that these three things are by definition not operations which are carried out for the Department of National Defence as such, because had they been these sales would not have been made. What I have just quoted indicates the actual dollar revenue received by the Department of National Defence for sales under these various categories.

This raises two points. First there is the whole question of the propriety of the Department of National Defence carrying on functions which might very well be carried on by private enterprise. In isolated cases there may be some justification for this particular course of action, but I am not at all sure that it exists everywhere it may be pleaded. It is very easy to claim that one must operate a restaurant and serve meals, for example, if one has not gone out and made a series of honest attempts to find somebody to come in to operate that particular restaurant for the Department of National Defence.

Second, and this is perhaps even more basic, there is a difficulty, under this system with the government engaging in operations of this kind and with their cloak of secrecy draped around them, of establishing whether the various activities of the department are really being effectively and efficiently and economically operated. I find amounts coming into the department under the various categories I have mentioned, but nowhere in the departmental estimates can I find any corresponding expenditures. I hope when the minister replies he will give us a little breakdown of what the costs were as opposed to these various sales. If we are going to be in business, if we are going to sell merchandise, if we are going to sell supplies, I think we have every reason in the world to know the details of the business we are operating. I suggest that by no manner or means is this classified information.

When we go on a little further we find that although education is completely a provincial matter the Department of National Defence is very actively engaged in educational activities, presumably at the grade school and high school levels, not only for their own personnel, although they have that too, but I submit specifically for the education of dependents. It may come as a surprise to many people that there are some 17,000 children attending schools operated by the Department of National Defence, and that those schools employ some 668 teachers from coast to coast in this country.

It must be admitted that if we set up a defence post in some completely inaccessible part of this country and ask men to go there with their families and there is no educational system in the area the government has a responsibility to provide educational facilities for those children. That I am quite prepared to admit. But where are these schools? Many of them are in major centres. In Calgary there is a school with 876 pupils; in Edmonton there is one with 303 pupils; in Shilo, Manitoba, not far away from a major centre—there are those from Shilo who would be offended if I did not indicate that Shilo itself was a major centre—there is a school with 648 pupils.

I come on down the list and find that at Petawawa there are many children of non-military personnel who go to the regular schools of Ontario, but the army has set up a school with 34 teachers and 884 pupils. I could go down the list indefinitely, which I shall not do, and point out the major centres in Canada where these schools have been set up.

It may be argued that the department might suddenly develop a base and find that the educational facilities provided by the province are not sufficient, and they then have to move in to meet the demand which they have created. However, I suggest that is exactly the type of mentality to which I have referred before, the mentality which says, "We will do it ourselves under federal government auspices rather than to seek the solution through the normal channels of free enterprise and the governmental system of this country at the provincial and municipal levels." If the government has a school to accommodate 800 pupils, they must have built the building. It seems to me that whether that building was built directly by the federal government or whether the federal government turned over the necessary funds as a municipal grant and had the building built by the school authorities of that area, it would have cost approximately the same amount.

It seems to me that the teachers who are teaching those pupils might just as well have been hired by the educational authorities of the province as by the federal government. It seems to me, and I think to a great many people in this country, that if the second course of action had been followed, the one which fitted this type of operation into the normal structure, the structure that Canadians as a whole would like to have in this country, rather than having the domineering and dominant control of the Department of National Defence we would have had a system that would be more satisfactory and that would better meet the needs and the demands of our Canadian civilization and economy as we know it.

Without going into details, although I have them, I would point out that the Department of National Defence is also in the housing business in a big way. It seems possible for all other areas of Canada, and all other segments of the economy, to build their own houses—very often, admittedly, with government loans—but it also seems that the Department of National Defence for some reason must produce some 15,000 houses across this country rather than letting the free enterprise system, through the normal channels which are available to it, do exactly the same job.

We find the department in a number of other fields, and it shows how this mentality can gradually develop. Without going into the details I could tell the minister, for example, that his department needs many bookkeepers for the Montreal area, I imagine, for stores and so on. Did they think of arranging a contract with a local business college or anything like that in order to train these people? No. I have here the civil service notice advertising for an instructor in bookkeeping to work for the Department of National Defence. His duties are exactly the same as those which would be carried on by an instructor in bookkeeping in any commercial college or business school in this country. I shall just read the first part:

> Under direction to instruct naval personnel in the principles and practices of bookkeeping; to assist in the preparation of training syllabi in the above subject; to draft and mark interim and final examinations . . .

I suggest that this type of thing is much better carried on through the normal processes. There are tens of thousands of bookkeepers in this country who received their education and training without the blessing of the Department of National Defence. If the department wants bookkeepers, it seems to me that the course for it to follow is to arrange with a school already set up to do the job for it.

Then you can go one step further and see again how this mentality expands and develops and moves ahead. I hold in my hand two pamphlets. They are interesting. They are well printed and effective. Inside the cover is the following statement:

> The kind permission of the Royal Canadian Air Force to make the text of this training pamphlet available to the public is gratefully acknowledged.

I presume the pamphlets were previously restricted information. The title of one is "Beginning Hockey", and the title of the other is "How to Play Better Hockey." I am not opposed to the Department of National Defence encouraging its men to play hockey. It is a wonderful sport. It is a very good idea that the men should be encouraged and that they should be properly trained. But I suggest again that without the help or cooperation of the Minister of National Defence, there are tens of thousands of youngsters and young men across this country from coast to coast who have learned to play hockey and learned to play it extremely well. There are possibly thousands of those who also have read about hockey in pamphlets or books which they have bought at the corner bookstore, but here we have the Department of National Defence invading the publishing field and the sports field with their own pamphlets on how to play hockey.

Then we may go one more step, and perhaps this is the most interesting one of all. I hold in my hand a very well taken photograph of some 40 Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps cadets. They are in uniform, and parading in front of them is a man who would make a very good toothpaste advertisement, a very handsome man and well qualified man for his job. The reason he would make a good toothpaste advertisement is that he is smiling broadly. These Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps cadets are attending the Rosita and Deno dance studio in Montreal for dancing lessons. As far as I can find out they are doing so under the aegis and blessing of the Department of National Defence. They certainly are in uniform, and they are certainly there in a body and, according to my information, they are certainly there as a national defence project. I think the minister could very well tell us something about this particular aspect of national defence work—dancing lessons for the cadets—and whether he plans to extend it into other fields and, if so, what those fields may be.

Let me make it very plain that I have no objection to ordnance corps cadets or any other men in the armed services taking dancing lessons. I have no objection to them taking lessons in playing hockey. I have no objection to them having all the amenities open to them, because they have a hard, exhausting and demanding job; but I do object, first of all, to the government getting into so many of these fields itself as part of its defence operations. Second, I object to, in other cases, the government sponsoring certain types of activities—and I think perhaps the dancing school is a very good example—which are hardly a proper part of the work of the Department of National Defence.

I may be criticized across this country. There may be those who feel that we now have a government which must cover all these fields and even extend as far as that. Perhaps I am just a hard-shelled, unregenerate Tory, but I cannot bring myself to believe that there is any point in the Department of National Defence lining up its cadets of a morning and marching them down en bloc in uniform for dancing lessons.

Mr. Knowles: The government could give lessons in fancy skating; it has done a lot of that itself.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I will just touch on one other point in the moment or two that is left to me. There is a feeling on my part, and I think on the part of many Canadians, that this tremendous emphasis on security, necessary as it may be, may eventually find its way, as it has done in some instances already, into an invasion of our personal freedoms in this country as a whole and in this house.

I have already said that, as I see it, we are going to live under the shadow of war for this generation. I say also that the new weapons, the new concepts of warfare, have fundamentally changed the whole problem of security in our time and increased, in certain restricted areas, the necessity for information to be withheld from general consumption. But above all, Mr. Chairman, even though this is so, we must realize that these measures are being taken for one purpose and one purpose only. These measures are being taken to protect our freedom as individuals, not our freedom as a state; because when we begin to argue that the state is superior to the individual we have lost sight of the whole concept of democracy.

These measures are being taken to protect our freedom as individuals, and we must never sacrifice that individual freedom nor must we ever allow that individual freedom to be taken away from us under the pretext that the Department of National Defence, or any other department of government, needs that measure of control over us on a broad, inexplicable and indefensible basis.

Mr. Trainor: Mr. Chairman, in common with the hon. member for Fort William I cannot lay claim to any particular aptitude to discuss the estimates of the Department of National Defence. However, unlike the hon. member, I do not share his distaste for those whom he regards as brass hats, and I would remind the hon. member that he comes perilously close to the crime of lèse-majesté inasmuch as he has nearly criticized a minister, and I am sure he could not possibly tolerate that particular crime.

I think every member of the house would be interested, as I was, in the remarks of the hon. member for Cape Breton South and his admiration and approval of the Soviet economic system. That was extremely interesting to me, because it indicated a tacit recognition of the fact that the system of democratic socialism is bankrupt and that the only way in which it can possibly function is by adopting the principles of communism.

Mr. Gillis: You ought to get a good doctor to look at your ears.

Mr. Trainor: I heard it.

Mr. Gillis: You read it tomorrow.

Mr. Trainor: Mr. Chairman, one particular point that struck me in this debate was the demand made by my leader for a parliamentary committee to examine these estimates, because it becomes very obvious to everybody as the debate proceeds that nobody has the slightest knowledge of what these estimates are all about. Nobody is in a position—I was going to say "including the minister" but possibly I might make an exception in his case—to know what they are all about. Therefore I suggest to the minister and to the Prime Minister particularly that it is difficult to see how this suggestion or demand can possibly be ignored, and I trust that we will have this opportunity. Those members of the House of Commons who have some conception of military and defence affairs generally would have an opportunity to examine these estimates and present a report to the rest of us.

I think this is an extremely reasonable request or demand, and I would certainly urge it on the Prime Minister as almost a necessity; because I do not think the people of this country are going to be satisfied if they know that about half the annual budget is being passed without anybody having a critical look at it, and that is exactly what is happening under present circumstances.

If the government will not accede to this demand, I believe the people of the country will make their wishes known in no uncertain terms. My final word is an appeal—I put it on those grounds—to the Minister of National Defence to use all his influence with his colleagues, particularly with the Prime Minister, to see that this aim is achieved. I am quite certain that in the long run he will be very much the gainer.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Chairman, I think the thing that strikes me most about the position I am in tonight is that again I am the last speaker in this phase of a debate. I do not mean to imply to the minister that he is not going to have any trials or tribulations tomorrow, but for tonight I will be the last speaker to whom he will listen.

I cannot help but remember that only a few short days ago I was the last speaker in the pipe-line debate. At that time the galleries of the house were filled, members of the press were most interested in the activities in the house, and almost every chair in the house was occupied. Yet we were talking about the expenditure of something like $200 million in total, most of which the government contended they were going to get back, if not all. Today we have been talking about the expenditure of $1,775 million, and as far as I am aware the only one who has spoken on behalf of the government, in addition to the minister, has been the hon. member for Fort William, who told us to trust in God and keep our powder dry.

It is a sad state of affairs, Mr. Chairman. Are none of you gentlemen over there interested enough in $1,775 million to have a few questions to ask the minister?

An hon. Member: Give us a chance.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): If you are waking up you will have a chance tomorrow. We on this side of the house certainly hope you will take advantage of it.

Mr. Chairman, I wonder how this white paper is drawn up. Is it drawn up for the purpose of precluding one little peek at the expenditure of this money? I have ten full pages of notes on the minister's statement, but after listening to him I ask, has his statement been designed to preclude, if at all possible, a single question about this blank cheque the government wants?

Oh, Mr. Chairman, let us not make any mistake about it. It is a blank cheque, because it is the identical amount that was signed last year in this very house. When you arrive at the figure, Mr. Minister, I wonder how you do it. To these men who go to work on that budget of yours do you say something like this: "Last year I got through $1,775 million, and if I could get it through last year I think I can do it again, and you will have that much money to play with. Put it together and come back and see me." There is every indication that this was the method used to arrive at this total. Let there be no mistake about it, Mr. Chairman; there is evidence of that kind in this book.

We complained about certain things last year. We brought them up in connection with the examination of these estimates. As an example we say, "How is it that when you are employing more civilians, your travelling costs are higher?" You say that is the reason you employ civilians, because then you do not have the additional expense of moving personnel. There does not seem to have been an explanation for it last year. This year you bring in the book and you make sure that on one page here it is mentioned that travelling costs are down $1 million. But at the same time you make up for the saving because you go on hiring messmen, runners, stenographers and clerks, and you ensure that the total comes out just the same.

When I look at these estimates for further proof of what I am saying, I see in here—and this is to be found at page 337—an item for repairs and upkeep of motors or engines for aircraft. Last year the amount was $119,344,000. This year your experts sit down, Mr. Minister, and they work with their sharpened pencils; and what do they come up with? They come up with $119,292,000.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that is the reason it is not deemed advisable for this house to have a committee to look into these expenditures. Maybe in connection with the work sheets, they work from bottom to top instead of from top to bottom. Maybe they take the total they are sure could pass this house and they work it back until they get to the top of the page. Oh, Mr. Chairman, there is plenty of reason for the committee that my leader has asked for today. Here we have estimates making up almost one-half of the total expenditure in the budget for this year, with not a chance for an itemized statement to be examined by people who are qualified, or to examine people who are qualified to give the answers.

Mr. Chairman, I recall that last year I read an editorial which said that the opposition must break through. I am not exactly sure what we are going to break through. This is the most illusory opponent that any opposition could grapple with. When I say that, Mr. Chairman, I am not referring to the minister personally in any way, but I say I am sure that he is surrounded by the hard crust and the hard core that Lieutenant General Simonds referred to in his article in Maclean's magazine.

Mr. Pickersgill: How can you be surrounded by a hard core?

Mr. Hamilton (York West): You ought to know, because you were fortunate in coming up from that hard core and landing in the seat you have now. You ought to try the other way of getting into this house; then you would find it a little more difficult to make the quips and cracks that you make.

But I say this, Mr. Chairman. I agree with my leader that we do not adopt these charges and say they are true. But when the ex-chief of your army staff makes charges like these we say it is time we had a committee appointed to investigate and find out as to their truth. I might say tonight, Mr. Chairman, that for my own part I would prefer it if perhaps some of the generals said these things before they retired.

Mr. Herridge: Hear, hear. So would I.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I would prefer it if perhaps the principle were great enough for them to say these things; if perhaps the principle were great enough for them even to risk the position they held, because there is no doubt about it that these things need saying. But let there be no doubt about it, Mr. Chairman; the evidence is here which requires an answer in only one way, and that is by a review of these expenditures before a committee of this house.

Mr. Chairman, that is all the time I have tonight. May I call it ten o'clock?

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall take interim supply and then continue with these estimates. On Monday we shall move to go into supply.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, June 22, 1956

The house met at eleven o'clock.

BRITISH COLUMBIA

REQUEST FOR COMMEMORATIVE DOLLAR ON OCCASION OF CENTENARY CELEBRATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Coming as I do from the silver city of Canada, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance if he has decided upon any way of commemorating the centennial of British Columbia. There have been several requests to have the department strike a silver dollar before the celebration in 1958. Has the minister come to any decision on that matter?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member's question may I say the government has decided to issue a coin to commemorate the one hundredth anniversary of the gold rush and the creation of British Columbia as a crown colony in 1858.

In order to do so we have decided to hold a competition of Canadian artists and sculptors for a design for a commemorative silver dollar. A committee under the chairmanship of Mr. A. P. Williams, master of the Royal Canadian Mint, will judge the entries. A prize of $1,000 will be given to the artist who submits the design that is accepted and four additional prizes of $250 each may be given for those receiving honourable mention. The competition will close on December 31, 1956.

Mr. O. C. Trainor (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance a question supplementary to the one he answered just a moment ago. Why strike a silver dollar in order to commemorate a gold rush?

Mr. Harris: As I recall, it was requested by the interested parties.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR SETTING UP OF STANDING COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister inform the house if he is prepared to announce that there will be set up a standing committee on defence in accordance with the proposal made to the government yesterday?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot assure the house that there will be a committee set up on the model of the committee that functions in the United States. Our constitution is quite different and, as all hon. members know, under the express terms of the constitution all proposals for expenditure have to be recommended to the house by His Excellency the Governor General, whereas, I understand, under the United States system the estimates are really made up by the estimates committees of the two houses of congress.

Mr. Drew: Well, Mr. Speaker, will the Prime Minister agree to follow the practice at Westminster and set up a committee with power to call witnesses and to call for the production of papers under a procedure similar to that which brings before a committee of the House of Commons at Westminster senior staff officers and other senior officers in the British service?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I am not sure that the British system goes that far. My own impression is that they can call the civilian personnel and the personnel of the quartermaster general, who operates under a separate statute. While I am in London I shall endeavour to ascertain just what is the practice and how it works out there.

Mr. Drew: One further supplementary question. In view of the statements which have been made by senior staff officers who until recently were relied upon by the government for their statements, would the Prime Minister before he leaves set up some appropriate committee which could call for evidence and the production of papers so that members of this house may have reliable information in regard to the facts relating to defence which is now under discussion?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): No, I cannot undertake to provide for the setting up of that committee before I leave this evening for the conference which is to open on June 27. I am leaving this evening so that I can take some part in the centenary celebration of the establishment of the Victoria Cross before the conference opens.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance supplementary to the exchange between the Leader of the Opposition and the Prime Minister. Would the minister say what has happened to the consideration he told me he was giving to the question I put to him last Friday concerning the reference of the estimates of the Department of National Defence to the committee on estimates?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): I thought the consideration had been ended when it was decided to call the estimates in committee of supply on Wednesday.

Mr. Knowles: As a supplementary question, may I ask if the house leader would now consider referring these estimates to the committee on estimates after the general discussion has taken place but before we reach the point of discussing the details?

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, I am always ready to consider any suggestion, and this one having been made I shall consider it during the day.

GRAIN

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF GRAIN COMMISSIONERS AND WHEAT BOARD BY COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I intended to direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) or his parliamentary assistant, but in the absence of both perhaps the acting minister could answer. Is it the intention to send the report of the board of grain commissioners and the report of the Canadian wheat board to the committee on agriculture and colonization? Perhaps the Minister of Trade and Commerce could answer.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the reports of the board of grain commissioners and of the Canadian wheat board were referred to the committee several weeks ago.

Mr. Low: I was more concerned about when it is intended to call the committee. Time is going on and it seems that no effort has been made to call the committee to study these two reports.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Of course I cannot answer that question because the chairman of the committee decides when it will meet. However, I would point out that the witnesses who are usually brought before the committee, that is the presidents of the several grain co-operatives and the president of the farmers' union, have been in attendance in Geneva for some weeks this spring. We are having the busiest period that we have encountered for some years as far as the movement of wheat is concerned. Some of the usual witnesses have expressed the view that they would be most reluctant to take the time to come before the committee this year. However, it is for the committee to decide whether it is necessary to have a meeting of the committee this year.

SALE OF STORED GRAINS BY RETIRED FARMERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. E. Cardiff (Huron): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is any special consideration being given by this government with respect to grain held by farmers that have retired and are not able to carry on further with farm operations, in other words, retired because of advanced years, without sufficient funds to live on and depending on moneys received from their large quantities of stored grain?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): May I inquire whether my hon. friend has reference to Ontario farmers or farmers in western Canada?

Mr. Cardiff: Western farmers.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That is a matter which has been given a good deal of consideration. I am afraid I cannot give my hon. friend the answer at the moment but I shall have a prepared statement from the wheat boards as to the practice, which I shall be glad to give him next week.

BUTTER

INQUIRY AS TO MAINTENANCE OF FLOOR PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the right hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and his parliamentary assistant I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, which he may prefer to take as notice. In view of the uncertainty left in the minds of both producers and consumers of butter by the answers given the other day by the parliamentary assistant with regard to the sale of 25 million pounds of butter at 2 cents per pound less than the cost to the government, what security has the butter producer that the floor price of 58 cents per pound will be maintained throughout June, July and August, the months during which I understand the delivery of the 25 million pounds is to be made? If the floor price is 58 cents and the government only buys about one-third of what the dairy producer produces, then what assurance has the producer that the 56 cents, which is the price at which the government is selling butter into the trade —a greater amount at 56 cents than they are buying at 58 cents—with no particular quality distinction, and also what assurance has the consumer whether the consumer price is to be based on the 58 cents the government is paying for the butter or the 56 cents at which it is selling a larger amount?

I might also ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce to have the minister or his assistant tell us whether it is a fact that five million pounds of this butter has been sold in western Canada at a further reduction to the trade of 2 cents additional, with no assurance to the consumer or the producer.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Since my hon. friend has directed the question to me, I shall answer it.

Mr. Rowe: I said that it could be taken as notice.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I shall draw it to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture. I expect he will be back in his seat next week.

PUBLIC SERVICE

SAINT-JEAN BAPTISTE DAY—REQUEST FOR HOLIDAY IN QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State and the Minister of Labour, I am not sure who should deal with this question. The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour or any minister from the province of Quebec might have the answer. In view of the fact that Saint-Jean Baptiste day falls on Sunday, is it clear that federal civil servants in the province of Quebec will get Monday as a holiday in the same way as federal civil servants in other provinces get the first Monday in August as a holiday?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I am the Acting Secretary of State and I shall take that question as notice.

Mr. Knowles: As a supplementary question, since the next time we reach orders of the day will be on Monday, June 25, I should hope that the Acting Secretary of State might be able to give an answer later today.

Mr. Pickersgill: I shall try to at 2.30.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I may have leave before you leave the chair to answer the question asked earlier today by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre about Saint-Jean Baptiste day.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the minister leave to revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am informed by the chairman of the civil service commission that it is one of the regulations of the civil service that one day in the year shall be recognized as a holiday for the civil service in any municipality where that day is proclaimed as a civic holiday, that it is the custom in most places in the province of Quebec to proclaim Saint-Jean Baptiste day as a civic holiday, and that that has been done in the case of Montreal and probably in the case of many municipalities for Monday next. Of course in those places where it has been done municipally the civil service will follow the usual practice.

NATURAL RESOURCES

AUGUST FONTANA—PETITION REGARDING LOSS OF MINERAL RIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Could he inform the house when we might expect the documents on the Fontana case, as passed on April 3, I believe? It is a matter of some importance to this individual.

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I had the impression that the documents had been tabled. I shall check on it.

NATIONAL PARKS

GARIBALDI PARK—INQUIRY AS TO FUTURE DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to ask the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources whether at his forthcoming meeting with the appropriate officials of the government of British Columbia he will be prepared to discuss with them the future development of Garibaldi park?

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I shall take the matter under consideration, sir.

PIPE LINES

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES—INQUIRY AS TO AMOUNTS ADVANCED TO DATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Is the Minister of Trade and Commerce now in a position to withdraw from his inside pocket an answer to my question of yesterday?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): It would be much more courteous if my hon. friend would leave out his comment about my inside pocket. However, I can answer the question. Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation has received from the Department of Finance the sum of $20,000 for working capital and the sum of $6,775,000 for advances to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited. The sum of $6,775,000 was advanced to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited on Monday, June 18, and the crown company received in exchange a 5 per cent mortgage bond in the same amount.

COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON AGENDA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, may I preface the question I am about to ask by extending to the Prime Minister every good wish on the occasion of his trip to the commonwealth prime ministers' conference in London. That comes from everyone in the house. My question is this. First, would the Prime Minister be prepared to outline in general some of the views that he intends to express on the agenda to which reference is made in today's papers? Second, what stand does he intend to take with reference to the question of extending the British preference, which apparently is one of the basic considerations to come before the conference, as a means whereby trade within the commonwealth and also among the free nations will be expanded and extended in order to meet the U.S.S.R. world trade offensive?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I wish to thank the hon. member and all hon. members of the house for their good wishes, and I hope that the Secretary of State for External Affairs and I will be able to do our share in producing fruitful results from the conference in London. I do not think it would be proper for me to state what views we will support. They will be subject to the discussions that will take place in respect to each matter that comes before the conference.

With respect to the extension of the British preference, if that is discussed in the plenary meeting my colleague and I will be very interested to hear the views expressed by other members of the commonwealth in that regard. The hon. gentleman may be assured that we are still firmly convinced that dollars earned in the Canadian market through the sale in the Canadian market of exports from commonwealth countries do increase the volume of Canadian commodities that it is possible for us to sell in those markets, and that we are very anxious, as I am sure all hon. members are, to have as much world trade promoted through the efforts of the commonwealth as it is possible to achieve.

The situation is a complex one and one that will, if discussed there, have to be considered in all its aspects. I can assure the house that we will do everything possible that would tend to increase the volume of exchanges between commonwealth countries.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Various members of the British press have reported that the Canadian government, and in particular the Prime Minister, would be opposed to any extension of the British preference. Would the Prime Minister say whether or not that is correct?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): That is not correct as a general statement. The matter will have to be considered in all its aspects and of course in the light of its possible repercussions upon the general tariff and trade arrangements which are still in force and which have proved to be of quite substantial benefit to Canadian trade.

AGRICULTURE

REQUESTS FROM FARM ORGANIZATIONS TO APPEAR BEFORE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): I should like to direct a question to the chairman of the agriculture committee. Has the hon. gentleman received any requests from any of the farm organizations to come before the standing committee on agriculture and colonization?

Mr. Rene N. Jutras (Provencher): I believe, Mr. Speaker, that I have received two requests.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

INTERIM SUPPLY

Mr. Harris moved:

That a sum not exceeding $264,409,639.92 being one-twelfth of the total of the amounts of the items set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1957, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament; and a sum not exceeding $12,168,792.75, being one-twelfth of the total of the amounts of items set forth in the supplementary estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1957, be granted to Her Majesty on account of the fiscal year ending March 31, 1957.

He said: Mr. Chairman, as the resolution indicates, the proposed bill to be founded on the resolution will provide for one-twelfth of all the items to be voted in the main estimates for the fiscal year 1956-57 and one-twelfth of all the items in the supplementary estimates for the same fiscal year. This bill is to provide for all necessary ordinary requirements to the end of July. No additional proportions are being provided for at this time. In no instance is the total amount of any item being requested.

The passing of this bill—if it is passed—will not prejudice the rights and privileges of members to criticize and discuss any item in the estimates which will come up for consideration from time to time through the balance of the session, and the usual undertaking is hereby given that such rights and privileges will be respected and will not be curtailed or restricted in any way as a result of the passing of this measure.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, this motion to provide interim supply for the month of July follows very shortly after a similar motion to cover interim supply for the month of June. I think I should explain the position that we take with regard to interim supply. It is difficult to realize that it was only at the beginning of last week that we were dealing with this subject for the whole of the present month. Interim supply would have a different meaning if we were not sitting continuously to deal with estimates.

I want to make one thing clear. When two weeks ago today I asked the Prime Minister whether it was the intention of the government to adjourn for the summer months or to proceed with a continuous session, I was directing that question to the possibility that the government was asking for only a month's interim supply and might then adjourn, as had been indicated generally in the press, without having provided for the period during which the house would not be sitting. I also had in mind that, if this was done, the only course the government could follow in paying the civil servants, the members of the armed forces and, in fact, all the many people dependent upon payments month by month from the government, would be to resort to governor general's warrants.

From the nature of my questions both on Friday two weeks ago and a week ago Monday I think it must be clear that if there had not been a continuous examination of the estimates and if there had been any attempt to adjourn with only a month's supply voted, we would not have consented to the voting of supply.

However, I want to remind the members of the house that interim supply does not in any way prejudice the consideration of the estimates, as has already been undertaken by the Minister of Finance. We are simply asked to provide for one-twelfth of the total amount that is estimated as the requirement of the government. The granting of this amount permits payment of the necessary monthly payments of every kind, without prejudice to the details of any item in the estimates. We are continuing to discuss those estimates and, therefore, we follow the practice that has been followed on other occasions, without exception, in the past. There has, in fact, been no case in Canadian history where there was a protracted debate in regard to the ordinary voting of one month's supply. There was a case in 1921 when there was objection to the voting of two month's supply. In fact, on that occasion there was vigorous opposition to that procedure.

But it has been the invariable practice to permit the payments that are required to carry out the ordinary business of the people of Canada. It is not the business of the government. It is not the prerogative of the government. It is the rights of the people of Canada who are dealing with the Canadian government, whatever that government may be, to have the payments they expect on time. Under those circumstances, and in view of the fact that we are continuing to deal with the estimates, it is not our purpose to seek to prevent the ordinary payments being made. May I leave no doubt that had we thought it was possible to force an election by delay on the earlier occasion, we would certainly have followed that course. The government, however, had made it quite clear it had no intention at that time of acceding to our proposal. We took the position, and take the position again, that while we have no confidence in the attitude of this government toward parliament, while we believe this government has no moral right to govern in view of its conduct, nevertheless we do not believe the civil servants, members of the armed forces and people doing business with the government should become the victims of any procedure that might be adopted as the result of the actions of the government itself. That is what the result would be.

While it is not our intention to delay the voting of interim supply, nevertheless it is my intention to avail myself of the appropriate opportunity to discuss certain subjects which are related to the broad details of the motion before us. As will be realized by every hon. member in this house, any item included in the estimates can be discussed. I do intend to discuss one or two subjects which could very properly be embraced in the remarks that are made in relation to a motion of this nature. One thing about which I want to speak is the speech made by the Minister of Finance a week ago tonight over the trans-Canada network of the C.B.C. It is a mass of inaccuracies, but those inaccuracies can be dealt with on other occasions.

I am going to deal with one statement that was made by the Minister of Finance and I do so because if there is one minister in this house who should not have made that statement it is the Minister of Finance. I am going to quote from the printed copy of the speech which was issued by the National Liberal Federation of Canada. These are the words contained in that speech which I assume were the words used over the radio:

> I am not going to say very much about the action taken by the Leader of the Opposition, Mr. George Drew, in attacking the Deputy Speaker and in moving in parliament that the house no longer had confidence in its Speaker. No one who understands our British parliamentary system would question the right of the opposition or the duty of the opposition, to oppose the government and to introduce motions to embarrass the government and to express lack of confidence in the government. That is the right of an opposition. Indeed, the opposition has a duty to try to defeat the government. But it is one thing to attack the government and a very different thing to attack the presiding officers who represent the authority of parliament itself.
> The members of the opposition who supported Mr. Drew in attacking the Speaker admitted that before the pipe line debate began, he had been a good Speaker; some of them said the best Speaker the Canadian parliament had ever had. Yet, they felt they were justified in attacking a respected officer of parliament and seeking to destroy his reputation.
>
> I cannot believe the people of Canada will easily forget or easily forgive conduct of that kind, conduct which, if persisted in, would destroy the institution of parliament itself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, the applause which has come from hon. members opposite including the man who has been directing the affairs of the government, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, indicates very clearly why this government has no moral right to govern. The very fact they applaud a statement of this kind indicates how little consciousness there is of what this government has done to destroy the institution of parliament in Canada. The man who accepted the primary responsibility of a course of that kind was the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who has applauded that statement. It was he who, in spite of the statement of the minister that the opposition had the right to oppose the government, denied that normal right by moving closure before there had been a word said in this house by any member of the opposition; and it was the Minister of Finance who was mainly responsible for the circumstances which led to the motions relating to the Deputy Speaker and the Speaker which were presented to this house.

It is the Prime Minister who, as head of the government, must accept the full moral responsibility for the abomination which occurred here during the course of the debate which closed just two weeks ago.

Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Finance has made a statement that for unctuous pretence has not been exceeded at any time in the parliament of Canada. Here is the man who is mainly responsible for making the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker victims of the government's conduct. Here is the man who was sending messages to the Speaker as reported by members of the press who saw those messages being passed. I would point out it was not an attack made on the Speaker by members of the opposition which brought this subject before parliament; it was the way in which the Speaker, the Deputy Speaker and those responsible for the conduct of business in this house were forced into a position of subservience to the will of the government in pushing through a measure which the government had determined to have passed by this house no matter what took place and no matter what rule was broken.

No wonder the Minister of Trade and Commerce in a television interview said, "Yes, we violated the rules—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Chairman, I said no such thing; my hon. friend is now stating a falsehood.

Mr. Drew: I am not stating a falsehood. I heard the words over the television; but what the Minister of Trade and Commerce should also know is that because there was an interruption in power the C.B.C. issued a text of what was said and the text contains those words.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Chairman, I do not believe the text contains those words. If you will send me the text I will believe what you say.

Mr. Rowe: Surely you have seen it.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Trade and Commerce knows perfectly well he used those words.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I did not use those words.

Mr. Drew: And the minister knows perfectly well that the government did violate the rules. He also knows perfectly well the government was a party to the violation of the rules. He knows very well the position we have taken with regard to the Speaker—

Mr. Pickersgill: This speech is a violation of the rules.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I cannot in this case ignore the interruption by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration in which he said that this speech is a violation of the rules. In the mind of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration any statement by the opposition is a violation of the rights of the government. I noticed one statement in the speech of the Minister of Finance that there were two members of the opposition who had spoken 30 times. That total was arrived at by adding up the number of times comments had been made by certain members of the opposition. If the Minister of Finance will examine Hansard and look at the number of times the name of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration appears he will doubtless find by that test that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration spoke more than 100 times during the debate because he was constantly interrupting. I will say this, however; he made those speeches while sitting in his seat and not by taking part in the debate either on the rules or on the subject matter before the house.

Mr. Rowe: One hundred speeches and nothing said.

Mr. Hellyer: That is a pretty faded rose you are wearing.

Mr. Drew: I would be very happy to have the hon. member who just interrupted from a reclining position rise and make the statement in the way that statements are supposed to be made before this house. I would be very happy to give him the opportunity to do so. Does the hon. member care to do so or does he wish to remain in a reclining position?

Mr. Hellyer: I will accept the courtesy and rise and say it is a very faded rose the Leader of the Opposition is wearing this morning.

Mr. Rowe: We still cannot hear you.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I am glad that interruption was put on the record because it indicates the standard of the interruptions which have been made by members supporting this government during the course of the discussion of this whole subject. If the rose I happen to be wearing this morning is faded I would suggest that the hon. member make an appropriate appeal to the correct official of the government because it was cut in my own garden this morning and if it has wilted it is probably only under the impact of remarks such as the hon. member has just made.

Mr. Rowe: He has not even bloomed yet.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I would suggest that the remark that has just been made is indicative of the type of interruption that has been occurring in this house not only now but during the course of the debate to which I refer.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in view of the statement made by the Minister of Finance, who apparently disagrees with the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, because he says the opposition has the right to speak—

Mr. Pickersgill: I never said the contrary either.

Mr. Drew: I just want to recall exactly what did take place because I wish to leave no uncertainty as to the circumstances under which the motion was first presented which directed the attention of the house to the conduct of the Deputy Speaker and later the motion dealing with the conduct of the Speaker. May I recall those events. On Thursday night, May 31, the Speaker permitted the presentation of a motion arising on a question of privilege which was in accordance with the rules. The Speaker himself took the initiative in guiding the framing of that motion. The Speaker himself stated that the question was an important question of privilege and he placed the matter before the house for discussion. At that time I rose to speak in the debate on that motion which was properly before the house.

I had spoken for a short time when the house adjourned at ten o'clock. On Friday morning, June 1, the Speaker had not risen when I rose to continue the debate. I was on my feet and the house was seized with the motion, the motion which had been accepted by the Speaker and in fact framed by the Speaker himself because of the advice he had given as to the form it should take. It was under debate and the right to debate had been fully accepted in the house without challenge.

Nevertheless the Speaker then rose and refused to permit me to continue the debate. He refused further to hear me either on the point of order or on the question of privilege. The rules make it clear that he had no right to deny that opportunity to me. He certainly had no right to deny that opportunity when I had already taken the floor and when I was continuing a debate which under his guidance had been before the house the previous evening. He gave no authority of any kind for his position. He denied the motion and to other members the right to discuss the rules. He placed on the records of this house a dangerous precedent which can be quoted in future as a precedent for the taking of an improper course which could destroy the regular procedure in any debate.

Mr. Tucker: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, I suggest that the Leader of the Opposition is entirely and completely out of order in attempting to review the actions of Mr. Speaker before you and this committee. I cannot conceive of anything more out of order than to do what he is trying to do. If he is to be permitted to make these statements which are not well-founded, as to what happened and which constitute improper criticism of Mr. Speaker before this committee, then of course he should be answered, but anyone answering him would be also out of order. I submit that he should not be permitted to make these improper statements, which he is making and which are not well-founded either on fact or on the rules, before a committee of this house. He should not be permitted to criticize the conduct of Mr. Speaker and I submit that he is absolutely out of order and should be asked to desist.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, every subject which can be dealt with by this parliament can now be properly dealt with on the motion for interim supply. The motion covers one-twelfth of the estimates which embrace every item, including the administration of the Speaker's office. Therefore it is not only appropriate but it is very proper that the discussion should take place at this time in regard to the very inaccurate interpretation given by the Minister of Finance as to what occurred in this house. The remarks which I shall subsequently make will relate themselves very clearly to the position of Speaker and to the estimates of this house.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Rosthern has raised a point of order and perhaps I should deal with it following the remarks of the hon. Leader of the Opposition. I have looked at the motion which was moved by the Leader of the Opposition several weeks ago with regard to Mr. Speaker, and I find also that in the estimates there are items dealing with the allowances to Mr. Speaker, to myself and to other officials. Under those circumstances I am unable to find that a discussion of those offices at this time is out of order. However, I do say that it must be a discussion which would be relevant under the items of legislation at a later time; that is the only type of discussion which could take place on a motion for interim supply at this time.

Mr. Tucker: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to argue your ruling but I do point out to you that this very point that has been raised by the Leader of the Opposition was raised as a reason for censuring Mr. Speaker and was actually decided on by this house, the only place where it could be decided upon. When the house has actually decided upon a question, the question being decided upon being one of the reasons why Mr. Speaker should be censured, when the house decided the question that he should not be censured, I suggest that to permit this to be rehashed before this committee and to ask it to pass judgment on something which has already been decided is out of order entirely.

The Chairman: Perhaps I should read the exact terms of the motion, which are as follows:

> In view of the unprecedented action of Mr. Speaker in (a) improperly reversing his own decision without notice and without giving any opportunity for discussion; (b) repeatedly refusing to allow members to address the house on occasions when the rules provide that they have the right to be heard; (c) subordinating the rights of the house to the will of the government, this house resolves that it no longer has any confidence in its presiding officer.

I quite agree with the hon. member for Rosthern that matters covered by that motion, which was negatived, cannot be discussed at this time, but I do not see how a discussion of the competence of the Speaker, of myself and others, since these items appear in the estimates and as long as we do not deal with questions which have been decided upon by the house, could be ruled out of order.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to seek a review of a motion which in one case has been ruled to be not debatable, and of a motion which in another case has been voted down. I am dealing with a subject which will come before the house under the estimates and, as Your Honour has indicated, therefore something which it is appropriate to discuss at this time. In doing so I am taking particular issue with certain statements made by the Minister of Finance which have a bearing on this subject. It is my intention simply to state the facts of what occurred because of the relationship with appropriations which will subsequently be dealt with as part of the general estimates of which interim supply will constitute one-twelfth.

Therefore, to continue what I was saying at the time the point of order was raised, I would point out that in making the decision he did on that occasion, without giving any authority whatever for his position, the Speaker has created difficulties in the future for any Speaker who may occupy the chair, because of the precedent which has been established in that way by the actions to which reference has been made. I submit that the Speaker disregarded the following rules or authorities.

Standing order 50 provides that, if it is out of order, the Speaker must so rule before he puts it forward for discussion, and also that he must give his authority when he rules that a motion is out of order.

Standing order 7 provides that business under consideration at adjournment the night before will be taken up on the next sitting day, "at the same stage where its progress was interrupted."

Standing order 34 (1) provides that a member who has the floor, as I had on the Thursday evening and again on Friday morning two weeks ago, may be interrupted on a point of order, but that after that point has been stated the member may speak to it. I was denied the opportunity to speak to it, and so was every other member of the house.

Standing order No. 17 provides that a point of privilege may be raised at any time. In this case the Speaker refused to hear me on a point of privilege on Friday morning, after he had followed the course he did and while the subject was still under consideration.

Then I would refer to citation 216 of Beauchesne's third edition, which states that the member who moved adjournment of a debate is by courtesy entitled to speak first if he rises in his place when the order for it is called. I had risen before anything had been said and I was therefore entitled to speak under the terms of that citation. Most certainly, if I was not to be allowed to speak, then the explanation should have been given for it.

On Friday morning, June 1, Mr. Speaker did something else without precedent in the annals of this house or of Westminster. He put forward what he described as a proposition to the house, namely that since he had himself made a serious error the previous evening, the house should revert to the position in which it was at the time when he said he had made the error, namely about 5.15 p.m. on Thursday evening. This was something which had no relationship to any course ever followed before. The rules of debate—rules of long antiquity which we have inherited from Westminster—clearly provide that nothing can be submitted to the house for its decision except by way of a motion. That is without qualification.

Recognizing the impropriety of his course of action, Mr. Speaker carefully tried to avoid calling it a motion, because of course the Speaker cannot under the rules initiate a motion before the house. He described his strange procedure as a proposition or course of action which he was submitting to the house for its determination. That in itself was indicative of some unusual circumstances which this house cannot now ignore, any more than it had a right to ignore them then. He did, in fact, as the record will show, fall into the error on one occasion of calling it a motion when he put the question—an error which he later attempted to correct. However, the brief statement of the position is that nothing can be submitted to the house for its decision by vote unless it is in the form of a motion. Whatever it may be called, therefore, Mr. Speaker actually submitted a motion to the house. In this conduct he was guilty of a breach of the following standing orders or citations:

Standing order 41, which is the general rule providing for 48 hours' notice of a motion before it can be presented to the house for discussion and decision.

Standing order 42, which requires that, generally speaking, if notice is to be waived, unanimous consent for such a course must be obtained.

Standing order 43, which provides that all motions shall be in writing and be seconded before being debated or put from the Chair. This motion was not written or seconded.

Standing order 32 (1) (m), which provides that a motion of this sort, which clearly covers the management of the business of the house, the arrangements of the proceedings of the house, etc., is debatable. The Speaker refused to allow debate.

Citation 135, Beauchesne's third edition, which emphasizes the necessity for strict adherence to the order paper to prevent surprise. A privilege motion was on the order paper and was suddenly removed; the Speaker's proposition was not on the order paper but was suddenly introduced.

Citation 136, Beauchesne's third edition, which provides that all motions referring to the business of the house should be introduced by the leader of the house.

There were specific instances, which have not in any way been wiped from the record by any motion which was dealt with by this house. They have a very direct bearing upon the occupant of the office and the estimates that are provided by that office when the time comes to consider them.

Mr. Tucker: On a point of order again, Mr. Chairman, I think that every member of this house must agree that the action of the Speaker can only be challenged on a specific motion after two days' notice. The Leader of the Opposition is challenging the actions of Mr. Speaker, before a committee of this house, and without any notice. I am not going to refer to the ruling—he can do it—although it has already been decided by the house, but I cite the other ruling. He now is challenging the actions of Mr. Speaker in the house, when the rules lay down both at Westminster and here that the actions of Mr. Speaker can only be challenged by a specific motion of which notice has been given.

I submit that the Leader of the Opposition has no right to violate the rules on the alleged ground that this vote will affect the salary of Mr. Speaker. In a deliberative assembly such as this and Westminster, when an attempt has been made to call the Speaker into question at a time when a question is involved of voting part of his money, it has been laid down over and over again that he cannot be challenged, nor attacks and derogatory statements made about him, unless a motion is made to that effect, of which 48 hours' notice is given. I submit citation 110 of Beauchesne's second edition:

> If a member wishes to challenge the action or conduct of the Speaker on any matter other than an appeal from his decision, he must proceed by giving two days' notice of a motion on the subject and by bringing the matter up as a separate question, except, of course, if it be a question of privilege when it may be taken up as such.

This is one of the well established rules for protecting the position of the Speaker. The hon. member knows just as well as I do that he is out of order in talking before this committee as he is today.

Mr. Rowe: The chairman says you are out of order.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Rosthern raises a question of undoubted difficulty. We have on the one hand a motion which has been negatived by the house. I draw the attention of hon. members to the latter part of standing order 35 which reads:

> No member may reflect upon any vote of the house, except for the purpose of moving that such vote be rescinded.

It seems to me that the Leader of the Opposition in his remarks is prevented by the words of the standing order from reflecting on a motion which has been negatived several weeks ago. At the same time, I do not think I can prevent the Leader of the Opposition from discussing the competence of the Speaker or of myself or of any other official who is mentioned in the items which hon. members will find under legislation. I admit quite frankly that it is exceedingly difficult to draw the line but, as long as the Leader of the Opposition does not reflect on the vote which has previously taken place on his own motion, then I believe he is in order. I would take it that some of the references in the latter part of the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition with regard to the specific instance which was the subject of his previous motion might be deemed so to reflect, but as long as the Leader of the Opposition confines himself to the competence of officials who are mentioned in these estimates I believe he is in order. Otherwise, if he reflects on a vote, he is, of course, not in order. My difficulty, as hon. members will appreciate, is to draw a very difficult line.

Mr. McIvor: On the point of order, I think the Leader of the Opposition is nearly through.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, first of all I would point out that I have already made it clear that the remarks I am making are directed to the offices which are provided for in the estimates themselves. I submit that it is entirely proper and, in fact, the duty of hon. members to discuss subjects of this kind when there can be any possibility that there has been a misinterpretation of what took place in this house and at a time when the subject is bound to come up for further consideration. What I am saying is not and cannot be directed to a motion which has already been dealt with by a vote in one case or to a motion which, in another case, was held not to be immediately debatable. My remarks relate to an office for which provision is made in the estimates, and it is in that light that I am placing these facts before the committee.

I now proceed to deal with the questions arising in connection with the chairman and deputy chairman because the statement to which I refer, which was made by the Minister of Finance, related to the officers of the house whose conduct had been under consideration. I would point out that both the chairman and the deputy chairman repeatedly refused to hear members on points of order or questions of privilege. That is a matter of record in Hansard. It is not going to be erased from Hansard by any suggestion that some motion has been dealt with or another motion not discussed. In fact, so very clear did this become that on one occasion the deputy chairman made it obvious that he was denying the right simply in order to get a vote taken on a motion which was before the committee and before any question as to its impropriety could be raised.

On that occasion, as I think will be recalled by all hon. members who were here at the time, he admitted that the member for Kamloops was correct in stating that the deputy chairman deliberately ignored members who were trying to get the floor and that he ignored them because he intended to put the question without hearing any argument. I refer to Hansard, page 4560, column 2, to indicate the reference I have made. In this course both the chairman and the deputy chairman were in flagrant violation of the following standing orders or citations: Standing order 17, which provides that whenever any matter of privilege arises it shall be taken into consideration immediately; standing order 34 (1), which provides in effect that a member may raise a point of order at any time; citation 110, Beauchesne, third edition, which points out that points of order are questions raised with the view of calling attention to any departure from the standing orders and the customary modes of proceeding in a debate or in the conduct of legislative business, and may be raised at any time by any member. I would repeat, Mr. Chairman, that the citation is emphatic that these questions may be raised at any time by any member. Nevertheless, members were denied on this occasion.

The deputy chairman permitted consideration of clauses of the bill in committee out of their proper order. He did this by giving a strange interpretation, I might say a fantastic interpretation, to the word "consideration" whereby he found himself able to rule that a clause had been considered by the committee although the minister had done nothing more than give a summary of its content and move its postponement. The whole procedure occupied about 15 seconds. As a result of this misinterpretation there was a breach later of the following standing orders: Standing order 78 (1), which provides that every clause must be considered by the committee in its proper order; standing order 33, the closure rule, which provides that closure will apply only to those matters which have already been considered and that the further consideration of them will not be further postponed. The chairman was able to say, by the unusual procedure he followed, that clauses had been considered which had not actually even been before the committee.

I am not going to make the other references I could make, Mr. Chairman, to the application of other rules, citations and standing orders which are affected by what was done on this occasion. I have simply stated what took place as a question of fact. Hansard will support the statements I have made. I have indicated the applicable standing orders and citations to show where, in our opinion, there was a departure from the procedure which should have been followed. We believe that dangerous precedents have been established as the result of that. We believe that the effectiveness of the positions of the Speaker, the chairman and the deputy chairman have been seriously affected by what has taken place. Therefore at the appropriate time it will be proper to consider what did occur.

What should be remembered, however, at this time, because we now have the whole activity of the government before us on a motion to provide interim supply, is that it was the government which succeeded in having these unfortunate incidents carried to their very definite conclusion. The minister has denied certain statements that appeared in the press about his intervention. The minister has not denied that there was a discussion of what took place in this house with the Speaker. The minister cannot deny that members of the government did discuss with the Speaker what would take place in the house. The minister cannot deny that what happened had the result of changing the whole course of the debate in the house. The minister cannot deny that these were not merely questions of mistakes or otherwise. The minister cannot deny that the effect of what took place was to make it possible for the government to meet a deadline which it had set.

I am raising these points now so that there may be no uncertainty that in dealing with the estimates of the government generally and in dealing with the estimates involving the offices of Speaker, chairman and deputy chairman of committees, we have not for one moment withdrawn in any way from the position we took. We made it perfectly clear when we presented first a motion relating to the chairman and then a motion relating to the Speaker that it was the action of the government which we believed had made these men victims of their course of conduct. We believe that as the result of what happened the government should in honour dissolve at the earliest possible date and make it possible for the house to meet again with a new parliament, whatever the government may be, that will be in harmony and in keeping with the wishes of the people themselves.

If this government were re-elected it would at least come forward then with a mandate to take a new course and to take a fresh stand. If the people of the country elected a new government in such a test, and most certainly that is a possibility which the government has every right to recognize, then this whole situation would be changed by the application of the rules in keeping with our ancient traditions.

We believe that when we spoke in this house during the debate we were speaking for the majority of the people of Canada, no matter what number of members there may be opposite us in the house at this time. We believe that we were speaking in a manner that was consistent with the rights of parliament and with the traditions of our free parliamentary system. We believe that it would be proper, honourable and just that, before he leaves for the conference in London, the Prime Minister state that it is his intention to dissolve the house at an appropriate date so that there may be an early election in order to give the people of Canada a right to express their opinion not merely upon the strange procedure by which the government advanced money to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited but—what is more important—in order that the people of Canada may be in a position to express their opinion upon the manner in which this government violated the rules and brought the position of Speaker, Deputy Speaker and chairman of committees and deputy chairman of committees into disrepute by the action they were forced to follow as a result of the conduct of the government. That is what I believe would be in keeping with the great traditions of parliament which have been challenged in this way.

When the Minister of Finance talks about the attack made on the Speaker and the chairman of committees, he should remember that he was the one who introduced the motion for the ejection of the hon. member for Eglinton which precipitated one of the scenes in this house which brought to the attention of the Canadian public what had taken place. Oh, when the hon. members opposite make their contemptible insinuations that this was a planned course of action—

An hon. Member: It was.

Mr. Drew: We hear from the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, still sitting in his seat. We hear from him that it was. Does the minister suggest that we knew that the Minister of Finance was going to introduce this motion? What utter nonsense! He was not taking us into his confidence. We did not know that he was going to make himself a party to action of this kind. What happened was the result of the action of the Minister of Finance himself; and when he makes statements such as those he made in his radio address, it would be well if he remembered that.

The question of interim supply, Mr. Chairman, raises the right to discuss many things. We wish that it were possible on this occasion, by dealing with specific items, to raise an issue that could precipitate the kind of vote that would express the opinion of this house with regard to certain detailed matters. But that is not possible. We cannot deal with individual items on this motion for interim supply. As I have said, the motion for interim supply is one which, by tradition, is accepted in this house; and it is accepted in Westminster in the same way. I recognize that there is control over supply by the house. I recognize that in the house the majority will, of course, decide. But I also recognize that it has been customary, over the years, to grant supply for the purpose of the business of the country. I should like to read a quotation which is perhaps not without some application to this matter. It is to be found in a book entitled "Parliamentary Grants" by Durell. At page 4 he says this:

> The drastic step of refusing supplies is, however, one which has never been applied. A sword of Damocles, of which the blade is eaten away with rust, it remains suspended in the armoury of the constitution—an object of historical and picturesque interest alone.

Nevertheless, Mr. Chairman, while it may be an object of historical and picturesque interest alone, it provides the opportunity to discuss certain subjects which need to be raised. I have made these remarks at this time because I wish to state once again that what occurred in this house has not been changed by any vote that has been taken. What has occurred in this house has damaged the effectiveness of this parliament as long as the present parliament remains. What has happened in this house under the guidance of this government has damaged the rules and placed on record precedents which at some future time could be extremely dangerous indeed. This government may preen itself that its conduct will be safe for the people of Canada. We do not believe that it is correct in making that assumption. But even if that is the opinion of this government, there could be men of such strange and radical views that they would recognize the danger there could be if these men could toss out the rule books and, by a simple majority, force through this house anything they wanted done.

That was what this government did with the unfortunate co-operation of the Speaker, the chairman of committees and the deputy chairman. That is the reason that these facts need to be repeated. That is the reason that this government no longer has any moral right to govern. That is the reason the Prime Minister would be following the honourable course if he assured us that there would be an election which would cleanse this parliament and bring back a parliament in keeping with the wishes of the people of Canada in relation to this great issue which has developed. It is not a matter of the right of members of parliament as individuals; it is a matter of the rights of the people of Canada. We are only their servants; we are only their representatives. Our right to speak is the right of the people of Canada to be heard. That right has been challenged; and imbedded now in our rules—until there is another parliament—are dangerous precedents which could be gravely abused at any time by this or any succeeding government.

Before I sit down I want to speak on one other subject which I believe is of immediate importance as a result of what has taken place. On various occasions in the past we have presented resolutions calling for the setting up of an appropriate committee or commission to consider reform of the Senate. Mr. Chairman, I believe that this is a proper time for the Prime Minister to consider the way in which reform of the Canadian Senate can be effectively brought about. Over many long years members of the party which supports him have expressed their belief that there should be reform. We have expressed our belief that there should be reform. There should therefore be agreement on this subject. We agree that, as long as this government remains in office, it must assume the initiative in dealing with this subject. We believe it is one with regard to which the provincial governments must be consulted. It may well be that a royal commission, which embraces representatives of this government and of the provincial governments as well as members of the two houses, should consider this whole subject. Most certainly if ever there was evidence that the other house needs reform, it is now as a result of the way in which the extremely important bill, which was so extensively discussed publicly and in this house, was dealt with in the Senate. That the measure was put through by a new form of overall closure which provided its acceptance in such a speedy and expeditious manner, in keeping with the desires of the government of this country, emphasizes the need for sweeping reforms which will give to the other house an effective part in our bicameral system. The Prime Minister has it in his power to initiate proceedings which could continue, no matter what happens to this government or to any other government. With the evidence before us of what has occurred, I submit that it would be appropriate that these steps be taken now. I raise this question because, if these steps are to be taken, the Prime Minister could be considering them before his departure from, or most certainly before his return to, this house.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I shall give way to other speakers who may wish to discuss other subjects under interim supply. I repeat that in supporting this motion for interim supply we are simply following precedents and that this does not in any way limit our right to question any item; that it in no way prejudices our right to challenge any department; that it in no way prejudices our right to question the conduct of any minister or official under this government. We accept, on the one hand, the conditions stated by the minister in presenting this motion for a supply of one-twelfth of the total amount which has been asked for in the estimates and we shall permit it to pass after such discussion as may take place on any of the items that are before us.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, the resolution before us at the present time is what might be called a routine motion. I would say that there is coming to the government a certain measure of credit in connection with the introduction of this motion, but there is also a considerable measure of discredit in what it is doing at the present time. On the credit side I would point out that the delay in which the government indulged with respect to the last interim supply motion is not being repeated on this occasion. Hon. members are aware that it was not until June 11 that the government brought in a motion for interim supply to provide for money for the month of June. In other words, civil service salaries and wages and payments to members of the armed forces for June 15 were under a certain question mark as late as June 11. On this occasion, however, we are dealing with the question of supply for the month of July. So far as individuals are concerned the first salary cheques that are involved are the cheques of July 15. This being June 22, it is obvious that no question mark arises so far as those salary and wage payments are concerned.

As hon. members will recall, when we were debating interim supply on June 11 I gave a long list of dates showing that across the years it had been the practice to request interim supply some time in the month previous to the month for which interim supply was needed. I am glad to see the government getting back on the rails so far as that aspect of the matter is concerned, in that it is now only June 22 when supply is being sought for the month of July.

However, Mr. Chairman, the very fact that this routine motion, this routine request, is being made in such a routine way, as if everything were quite normal, as if nothing were wrong, is what in my view is to the discredit of the government. What the government is asking for is not just the money that it needs to pay bills and salaries in the month of July, what the government is asking parliament is for permission to carry on in the routine way just as if there were no question as to its moral authority to continue to govern. In our view, as I stated on behalf of this group on June 11, it is not possible for a free parliament to have done to it some of the things that were done in recent weeks and to carry on in the normal way. It still seems to us that the one honourable way to deal with the situation that has developed in this parliament is for this parliament to be dissolved and an election to be held.

It is not my purpose to rehash the incidents that took place during May and the early part of June. I am sure it will not be necessary for the hon. member for Rosthern or the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration to raise any points of order on what I have to say because I shall talk, not about the past but about the present. It is recognized by yourself, Mr. Chairman, and by all the members of the committee that included in the items one-twelfth of which we are now being asked to vote, are items for the work of parliament. In other words, I have in mind not just the items to which the Leader of the Opposition referred but all the items under legislation which provide for parliament to continue in session. It is my view that the atmosphere in this parliament at this time—true, it is because of things that happened in the past but I am talking about the present—makes it the kind of parliament, the kind of House of Commons in particular, which should be dissolved and replaced by another one.

I feel that we owe this as a duty to the Canadian people. After all we are here not for our own sakes; we are here to be the parliament of the people of Canada. There are certain duties which devolve upon us, and I think one of the duties is to have the kind of atmosphere, the kind of relationships back and forth across this house, in which the business of the country can be properly conducted and our work properly done. I think I can say, without at the moment assessing the blame or indulging in any recriminations, that anyone who looks objectively at the atmosphere in this House of Commons at this time recognizes that it is not the kind of House of Commons to which the Canadian people are entitled. I put it to the Prime Minister and to the government in those terms. I am not going to do as I have done on occasion and bring forth authorities, citations and rules. I put it to the government in plain, human terms. We all know that the atmosphere that now obtains in this House of Commons is not a satisfactory basis for dealing with the work of the country to which it is our duty to attend.

It does seem to me that even the fact that speeches such as the one just made by the Leader of the Opposition can be made, not to mention the points of order that have been raised on the other side, all underline the fact that the moral authority of this parliament has been taken away from it. It is my view it is the government that robbed this parliament of its moral authority.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Apart from that, the fact of the matter is that moral authority no longer obtains in this house. It is quite clear that the best thing the government can do for the good of parliament and out of loyalty to the interests of the Canadian people is to make arrangements just as soon as possible for this parliament to end and for an election to be held. For that reason, Mr. Chairman, I say that the routine way in which this routine motion is being introduced, without any comment being made by the government as to what its plans are for this session or for the holding of an election, is to its discredit.
