Mr. Knowles: Explain.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister explain the explanation?

Mr. Abbott: The explanation is very clear and concise.

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, agreements to lease or purchase, leases, contracts, specifications and other documents exchanged between the government of Canada and Westmount Realties Limited, Montreal, relative to the income tax building, Dundas street (civic numbers 388, 390, 392, 394), London, Ontario. Also a copy of all correspondence relative to this building exchanged between the government of Canada and the municipality of the city of London, or any official thereof, between the period November 12, 1948, and April 10, 1951.

BUTTER

FLOOR PRICE—INQUIRY AS TO PROPOSAL OF CREAM PRODUCERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Charlton (Brant-Wentworth): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Is the government prepared to accept the proposal of the cream producers of Canada to establish a floor price of sixty-two cents a pound for butter as a means of ensuring a reasonable supply for next winter?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): The matter is under consideration, and when the government is prepared to make an announcement, it will be made.

Mr. Fraser: When will that be?

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

QUESTION OF ASSISTANCE TO BRITISH COLUMBIA FRUIT GROWERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I should like to direct a question to the appropriate minister. On March 19 this house passed a motion of mine for the production of papers with respect to the correspondence between British Columbia and the federal government in connection with compensation for fruit trees destroyed by frost in British Columbia. Has the government received the permission of the government of British Columbia with respect to the correspondence, and when will the return be tabled?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): The government has had two or three different proposals from the government of British Columbia, and on each occasion the same decision has been reached as was reported to the house some days ago, namely, that the amount involved is not considered to be beyond the capacity of the province to take care of, and that it is one of these matters which is generally considered to be a provincial responsibility, if it is the responsibility of anyone to assist.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask another question dealing with the same matter? Has the government reached any decision, and if so, what decision, on the later representations which I understand were made during the course of the past week or so on the same subject by the fruit growers of British Columbia?

Mr. Gardiner: This is one of the matters, and it is the matter which was considered last. It was considered not earlier than today, and the same decision was reached on it as had been reached on the other.

Mr. Herridge: The Minister of Agriculture did not answer my question. I finally asked: Is the government going to table the correspondence and documents mentioned in the motion for the production of papers?

Mr. Gardiner: There is no objection to that, Mr. Speaker. The documents, I think, were tabled up to a certain date; there has been other correspondence since, and that can be tabled as well.

LONG-TERM LOANS FOR REHABILITATION OF ORCHARDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. O. L. Jones (Yale): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture a question which may be regarded as supplementary to the one which has just been asked. Was consideration given to the request of the fruit growers for long-term loans at low interest rates to rehabilitate their orchards?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Yes; that was a question which was up for consideration today, and the same decision was reached with regard to it as had been reached previously on the other question.

STEEL

DEFENCE PRODUCTION—QUESTION AS TO SUPPLY IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): May I have an answer to the question I asked the Minister of Defence Production on Friday, concerning correspondence with the Sheet Metal Association of British Columbia? Has the minister the information for me?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): I regret that I have not the material to answer the question. I sent for it this morning. I was asking my secretary a few minutes ago whether it had arrived, but it has not. I assure the hon. member that the matter is in hand and he will get the answer tomorrow.

SUPPLY FOR MANUFACTURE OF HOT WATER TANKS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Defence Production. When he is getting the information for the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) regarding steel, will he take note to see if it is possible to obtain more steel for hot water tanks? There is a definite shortage of them for replacement purposes.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): I am afraid I cannot offer my hon. friend any prospect of increasing supplies of steel for hot water tanks.

Mr. Fraser: There is a definite shortage.

Mr. Howe: I know.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON SUPPLY SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Harris (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate what has been done with regard to steel and iron, but I had hoped that within the next three or four days—and I am in no hurry at all—the Minister of Defence Production, who has charge of matters connected with steel, and who perhaps is not too much worried about it, as, indeed, none of the rest of us are, might feel disposed to make a statement to the house as to how we are getting along in connection with steel. There are so many projects contemplated that a word from the minister may encourage the spending of some of that surplus money, about which the Minister of Finance is worried, on certain construction projects. The minister might give some thought to the question of restrictions which are not yet in the books, and, in doing so, he might give us some idea of how we may be permitted to spend some of the money on projects which are still under way.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has suggested that the minister is not too much worried about steel. I should like to correct that impression.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): I know he is worried all the time.

Mr. Howe: The minister is very much worried, and about steel in particular.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Steel supply is getting better all the time.

Mr. Howe: I can say the situation is such that if anyone has any doubts about starting a project I would urge him not to start it; and even if he is pretty firm about starting, I would urge him to reconsider.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): But what about some of those projects which are half-finished?

Mr. Howe: We will try to finish them.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Thank you; that is the answer I wanted.

[Mr. Fraser.]

Mr. Howe: I will try to give a more complete report later on.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): There is no hurry.

CIVIL SERVICE

INQUIRY AS TO ORDER IN COUNCIL WITH RESPECT TO OUTSIDE WORK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance, based on a Canadian Press dispatch in a recent issue of the Toronto Globe and Mail. Has an order in council been passed permitting civil servants to take outside jobs so as to supplement their government earnings?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Speaking from memory, Mr. Speaker, I think there is an order in council outlining the position of civil servants in that regard, but I would not be prepared to say what its terms are. I imagine it has been tabled with other orders in council. Anyway, I shall make inquiries and give my hon. friend an answer in a day or two.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MINISTER'S SPEECH IN TORONTO—REFERENCE TO REPORT IN MONTREAL "GAZETTE"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has his attention been drawn to a Canadian Press dispatch which appeared in this morning's Montreal Gazette, and I believe in other papers, which places an interpretation on the minister's speech delivered recently in Toronto? If so, I should like to know whether it is an official interpretation of his speech.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fulton: Whether it is a correct interpretation.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I read my Gazette this morning, and I found nothing in that newspaper which was an official interpretation of anything that I have ever said.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask whether it was the correct interpretation?

Mr. Sinnott: Put it on the order paper.

Mr. Pearson: It was a speculative interpretation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs, having regard to his answer to the hon. member for Kamloops in which he referred to speculative matters, whether, when he made his speech in Toronto, he was aware of the fact that General MacArthur was going to be dismissed?

Mr. Pearson: I can answer that question very quickly—and I am glad to have the opportunity to answer it, because of reports which have appeared in the press. I had no knowledge whatever of General MacArthur's dismissal before that dismissal was announced in the newspapers.

CHINA

REPORTED ARREST OF FIVE MISSIONARY SISTERS BY CHINESE COMMUNISTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lomer Brisson (Saguenay): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I have given him notice of my question. Has the government taken any action with regard to the imprisonment of five Canadian sisters in Canton?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The hon. gentleman was good enough to give me notice of this question, which deals with a matter on which other hon. members have already expressed considerable interest, notably the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Maltais) and the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton). When they brought the matter to my attention last week I told them that I was not at that time in a position to comment, but I am able to make a short statement concerning it now, and I shall be glad to do so. That statement will also, Mr. Speaker, in part at least, cover the question on today's order paper in the name of the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Gagnon).

The Canadian government has learned with grave concern that five Canadian nuns of the Order of the Immaculate Conception, who have been operating with selfless devotion an orphanage in Canton, have been detained and that their orphanage has been taken over by communist Chinese authorities. The most atrocious and fantastic crimes have been attributed to the five sisters by press reports and radio broadcasts emanating from China. The Canadian government deeply regrets that irresponsible accusations which, it is sure, are unfounded have been given so much publicity.

In the absence of a Canadian diplomatic mission in China the Canadian government has availed itself of the good offices of the United Kingdom chargé d'affaires in Peking. This officer has been informed of the great concern of the Canadian government for the five sisters and has assured us that he will lose no opportunity to do anything he can to help them.

There is no evidence that formal charges have so far been laid by the Chinese authorities. The agitation against the five sisters at the present time seems to be chiefly local. As I have already said, it is inconceivable that they could be considered guilty of the crimes which they are alleged to have committed, and the local communist officials must surely know this. I hope, therefore, that the central people's government will allow the sisters to return freely to Canada.

It may take considerable time before the case of these sisters can be cleared up, and the Canadian government is anxious that nothing should be done or said at this time which could conceivably worsen their position.

I should like once again to assure the house that the government is doing everything it can to watch over the interests of these five unjustly accused sisters, and to assure the house further that everything is being done and will be done which will help them without increasing the danger to them.

FISHERIES

QUOTA ON SHIPMENTS OF LOBSTERS TO THE UNITED KINGDOM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) or, in his absence, his parliamentary assistant. Perhaps the parliamentary assistant would take my question as a notice and give an answer tomorrow. What is the quota to the United Kingdom on the shipment of lobsters for the year 1951? Is the quota based on cases or on dollar value?

Mr. Speaker: As the hon. member does not expect an answer today, I suggest that the question be placed on the order paper. May I also say at this time that a number of the questions that are being asked on the orders of the day are quite long. Questions on the orders of the day should be urgent; they should be brief and should require only short answers. I would ask hon. members to try to observe the rules in this matter.

Mr. McLure: My question was short, and I supposed it would have been answered if the Minister of Fisheries had been here.

Mr. Speaker: Probably the hon. member's question was no more out of order than some of the others. In his case the parliamentary assistant, who is here, might take the question as a notice and answer it tomorrow.

Mr. J. Watson MacNaught (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Fisheries): I shall be very glad to do so.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Tuesday, April 10, consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, we are living at a time so critical in the history of our country and of civilization that no one with any proper sense of responsibility should allow himself to be critical just for the sake of trying to score an advantage. Whether or not we are fortunate enough to come through this period without war, I suppose it is quite likely that history will look back to the spring of 1951 as a time of critical significance.

Everywhere we turn, in the Far East to Korea, in the Near East to Iran, and on this continent toward Washington, dangerous events are crowding one on another.

And yet this very fact means that we must deal faithfully with the situation before us. Everyone will sympathize with the burden carried by the minister, but its very heaviness means that the decisions which he makes are specially charged with possibilities of good or evil for the citizens of Canada.

There were great problems in wartime, but there was also an awareness in men's minds of the tremendous events that they were living through, and an acceptance of the challenge in terms of effort, of sacrifice, of courage and forbearance. Today we have almost the same danger, but not the same spirit. We are facing big events, but it is doubtful if we have the largeness of mind which is necessary. Somehow we must find the proper spirit, but, look as we will, it is hard to discern it now.

Hackneyed words come to the mind—hackneyed but true: "Where there is no vision the people perish"; and surely we are entitled to ask that the vision which we need should come from those who have been chosen to guide the people.

True, the minister has many of the words of admonition—"save", "work", "restraint". But the voice of authority and inspiration is not present in the government, and so we grope along in the dark.

[Mr. Speaker.]

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) said one thing we can all agree with in the little homily at the end of his speech:

> Tonight is the annual occasion when we count up the cost of our policies in terms of money. That cost is high.

We can agree with those words of the minister. I would say that the cost is high. It would have been high in any event, even if everything had been done. But it is higher than it should have been. Also I would seek to satisfy the house and the people of Canada that, as things are going now, we are not going to get what we are paying for. I shall try to explain that later.

Two great issues face us, as the minister said: "the pursuit of peace and the control of inflation". The ministers of national defence and defence production, we may say, are charged with the pursuit of peace, or, in other words, with our program of defence production. The Minister of Finance is charged with the other great problem, the control of inflation.

Stalin was fond of quoting Lenin to the effect that the way to overthrow a capitalist state is to debauch the currency. We have no doubt that Moscow will be quick to appreciate the difficulties which come to a free economy when a large defence program is imposed on a situation of full employment where factors of inflation are already evident. When we recall that from January to September 1950 the living index rose about eight points it is clear that the factors of inflation were present at the time when this new burden was imposed on us.

It is clear that inflation is especially dangerous to free countries where economic results are produced by the decision of free agents working in competition with each other. On the other hand, the police state regiments everyone and its logical outcome is slave labour; therefore it is not by any means so vulnerable to inflation.

There are indeed two alternative dangers which we face. If inflation should get out of control, then the communist predictions and the communist textbooks will be proved true and our system will be vastly weakened. If on the other hand the dangers should scare us into permanent rigid and universal controls, we would be in great danger of slowing down our effort.

The next couple of years might well be critical and even decisive. We will need capacity, resourcefulness, patience and forbearance. The pressures will be great and as the defence program gets into greater swing they will be greater. The situation we face now is easy enough to describe; it has often been described as being a case of "too much money chasing too few goods". It is easy enough to describe the cure as being "more production and less consumption". The other day I quoted briefly, as reported at page 1784 of Hansard, a well-known economist who says:

> If when I get a larger income in dollars for myself I produce at the same time correspondingly more than I produced before, this will not raise my neighbour's cost of living.
> But as often as I get a larger income without at the same time producing correspondingly more than I produced before, my success in getting more income for myself must raise my neighbour's cost of living.
> And in parallel with this, whenever my neighbour gets a larger income in dollars for himself and at the same time enlarges his own output correspondingly, he will not raise my cost of living.
> But as often as he gets a larger income without at the same time producing correspondingly more than he produced before, his own success in getting more income for himself must raise my cost of living.

I suggest that there is common sense in that which we would do well to ponder.

Let me now review the situation upon which our minds are concentrated and which affects us all—the cost of living. Here are the figures for the last sixteen months, the basis of comparison being August, 1939:

April 1	164
July 3 (after the first impact of Korea)	167·5
October 2	170·7
January 1, 1951	172·5
February 1, 1951	175·2
March 1	179·7

It does not need any clairvoyant to know what this means to people with low incomes. The figures speak volumes in themselves. One or two of the letters quoted the other evening by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) point up the situation. The hon. member for Hamilton West can speak with special authority for the Canadian housewife. One letter has this to say—it will be found at page 1770 of Hansard:

> We do not ask for luxuries, but as prices are now, how does the government think an aged person can get even the necessities of life out of $40 per month? Take room rent out, and what is left to live on for a month?

> May I bring to your attention the helplessness of our aged people? There is no union to help them as have the workers; the aged cannot go on strike. You know that $40 will not pay for rent, heat, clothing, food, etc.

I do not need to say more. The widespread distress is a matter of common knowledge, particularly among the aged and many large sections of the white-collar workers, indeed among all people who are not highly enough organized to make their increases in pay keep up with the cost of living.

There seems to be only one person I know of who is ignorant of this situation, and that is the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). The minister said, as reported on page 1762 of Hansard of April 9:

> I am sure that we can get along quite comfortably as consumers and still engage in a substantial defence effort.

And a little later:

> Unless all-out war comes, Canadians can continue to live well.

I find it hard to realize that a man so realistic as the minister is able to shut his eyes to this situation. But we must remember that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has told us that the Minister of Trade and Commerce and he are in a very privilege position. According to the Minister of Agriculture they constitute a kind of triumvirate or big three who are separate, not only from all the rest of us, not only from all the other members of their own party, but from all other members of the cabinet. Here are the words used by the Minister of Agriculture in referring to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), the Minister of Trade and Commerce and himself, as reported on page 1480 of Hansard of March 20:

> As long as the three of us remain where we are, I think it will be fairly generally agreed across the country that we have an exceedingly good government.

That remark was a surprise to me. I have always regarded the Minister of Agriculture as a modest man, and I was surprised that he should single out in this way himself and others and attempt to put themselves above all the rest of us. I was reminded of these lines from Julius Caesar with which we were all made so familiar in school:

> Why, man, he doth bestride the narrow world
> Like a Colossus; and we petty men
> Walk under his huge legs, and peep about
> To find ourselves dishonourable graves.

It is not for me as a humble member of the opposition to discriminate among the great or near great. It is not for me to say whether that is a fair judgment as between this triumvirate and the other members of the cabinet. I suppose the other members of the cabinet just say to themselves, "That is the minister's way, and we just take it."

But there was another much more striking thing said by the Minister of Agriculture. I think this was one of the most interesting and astonishing things ever said in this house. It does appear to be catching, as I shall show later in the afternoon—and it will not be much later, because I do not wish to indicate that I am going to go on speaking for hours. Hon. members will recall that there was a certain, shall we say, difference of opinion; anyway there was a different way of describing certain events; I hardly know how to find the correct words. At any rate, this is the way the Minister of Agriculture summed it up. I told you a moment ago how enthusiastically he spoke about himself and the other two members of the big three, and he then went on to speak of himself and the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I suppose we can still call the minister the Minister of Trade and Commerce, although I suppose we shall also be dealing with him mainly under his new ministerial title.

Referring to himself and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Agriculture said, as reported on page 1448 of Hansard of March 20:

> One of the reasons why we—

The Minister of Trade and Commerce and himself.

> —are satisfied to be where we are is that we both know that we can afford to make statements, knowing that we might be incorrect—

I want to read that again, because that to me is one of the most interesting things I have ever heard in this house or ever hope to hear:

> One of the reasons why we are satisfied to be where we are is that we both know that we can afford to make statements, knowing that we might be incorrect because we have a leader who does not make many mistakes.

I am sure we all join in the feeling of enthusiasm that we have a Prime Minister who never makes mistakes; nevertheless it is a strange doctrine announced by the Minister of Agriculture. As I say, it almost seemed as if it were spreading to the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Defence. I am not suggesting that the Minister of Finance—what shall I say—considers that he enjoys this blessed irresponsibility of being able to make statements knowing that they might be incorrect, but I suppose at times all of us might like to have a dispensation of that kind if we could be sure that it was valid and coming from a responsible quarter.

I have been speaking briefly of the effect that high prices are having on the lives of individuals; but the havoc of high prices is not confined to individuals. High prices, as the Minister of National Defence told the American Arbitration Association, are throwing out of gear the defence program, the important objective for which we are making sacrifices and expect to make so many more. What irony if in the pursuit of peace we organize so badly by letting prices get out of control that we fail in the objective! Nevertheless the Minister of National Defence has warning words which we had all better consider, and I suggest even the Minister of Defence Production might pay some attention to these words too. The Minister of National Defence spoke to the American Arbitration Association on March 30. I think the minister visited that association not so much in his quality as Minister of National Defence but in his quality as a former adviser of the Chamber of Commerce. I think it was for his work in civil life rather than in the government; nevertheless there he was before the American Arbitration Association. He spoke at length about our defence problem, and after all, that is what he is interested in and knows most about. He said some things which we might very well have thought he might have said to us first before he took the American Arbitration Association into his confidence. Here is what he said:

> The armed forces and industry combined must make a frontal attack on the cost of defence equipment. This has become so costly that neither we nor our allies can get what we need—

Note this, Mr. Speaker.

> —without going on an all-out war economy.

These are pretty strong words. Here we have again, and not for the first time, two voices in the cabinet. The Minister of Finance has been telling us that we can make do as we are on what we will call a half-and-half basis, or a three-quarter-one-quarter basis, but the Minister of National Defence says: No; neither we nor our allies can get what we need without going on an all-out war economy. I suggest that as these ministers sit side by side they had better get together and find out what is happening. Incidentally they could tell parliament too.

I must say there are some figures I have read which seem to justify very fully what the Minister of National Defence said. For instance, the Toronto Telegram of April 12 has a dispatch which says that a frigate cost $1,700,000 in the last war, and that a subchaser, which I understand does somewhat the same work, now costs $8 million. Certainly that gives one furiously to think.

There are two other things the Minister of National Defence said in the same speech that I think are worthy of the attention of the house. No doubt one of these days the Minister of National Defence himself will come along and tell us something about these things, but I am giving hon. members a little advance information. The minister said further:

> Unless you actually see it, it is hard to imagine how defence costs have soared.

Then there is another statement which I find very interesting, for two reasons: first, because of the figures it contains, and second, because it seemed to me to indicate the extraordinarily difficult questions of judgment and decision which are involved in the problem now facing his department. The minister said further:

> I am always asking our people if a five per cent increase in performance justifies a fifty per cent increase in cost.

These figures are startling, and I say again they seem to me to indicate the size, the importance and the difficulty of the problems now facing the Department of National Defence as a result of whose decision so many hundreds of millions of our money are going to be gobbled up. I find these extracts from the minister's statement disturbing reading, particularly as I had more or less of a feeling that I wished they had been said here before they were said to the American Arbitration Association. One does not like to say it, but at the moment it almost seems as if the American Arbitration Association were closer to the minister's confidence than we are.

This leads me to make a suggestion. The public accounts committee is about to scrutinize the public accounts relating to defence, which of course come down to March, 1950. There is always a bit of a feeling in the public accounts committee that you are delving into the realms of ancient history. I am not suggesting how it can be avoided, but with the important and immediate decisions that have to be made in the Department of National Defence today it intensifies my feeling that if we are to be prevented in the public accounts committee from looking at anything after March 1950, it would be like having the play without Hamlet. I am hopeful that the government may decide that in this particular case the public accounts committee may carry on its review to a very much later time than March, 1950.

Discussion in a standing committee of course is better than in committee of the whole, for two reasons. First of all, the committee is smaller; you can have a much more informal and useful discussion, and, in the second place, standing committees may have expert witnesses. How important it is at this time to have the fullest information on these problems of immense difficulty such as the one the minister referred to when he said that the difference between five per cent and fifty per cent would have to be considered. How can any matter of that kind be dealt with in committee of the whole? The answer is that it cannot be dealt with in committee of the whole, that parliament should come closer to the matter. At the moment, as I have said, we really know less than the American Arbitration Association, and we really will not be very much better off after the estimates are through because we sit in this large room, in a large committee, and of course in public.

I suggest that the minister's words are disturbing. They will be disturbing to the public mind, and it is important that everything possible be done to reassure the public mind. After all, that is the duty of members of parliament, and if hon. members are more in the confidence of the government, then we can foster much better the spirit of confidence in the public mind.

How has this difficult situation arisen? Has it just "growed" like Topsy? Let me review it very briefly. After the unfreezing of prices and abandonment of subsidies which came after the last war, prices rose from 119 in 1945 to 123 in 1946, to 135 in 1947, to 155 in 1948, and to 167 in 1950. In 1948 there was an inquiry by the prices committee, and there was a temporary curb on credit, but in the same year there were also highly stimulating procedures at work, procedures invented in 1945 for the purpose of dealing with depression, such as double depreciation, and the boom generated by this and other inflationary measures continued. If I may take a moment of the time of the house I should like to read what I was bold enough to say three years ago about this very thing. Speaking in this house on May 21, 1948, at page 4246 of Hansard I said:

> But what I complain about . . . is that we continued to use those measures long after it was perfectly clear that we should have done exactly the opposite. Signs of the boom really appeared in 1946, and the methods outlined in 1945 should have been altered then, and altered quickly. Instead, the government continued to use them and even accelerated them. What we needed was a sedative; what we got was a strong tonic. What do I mean by that? I mean that the government did two things. It powerfully stimulated plant expansion by what I think were extravagant inducements in the way of depreciation, and it also continued to pursue an easy money policy, which was the other method of encouragement.

As I say, the government persisted in this technique, which was designed for a depression, long after it was made clear that there was a boom. As I have mentioned in this house before, the Winnipeg Free Press referred to this as the big blunder; while the Hamilton Spectator, in rather racy language, referred to it as the disastrous holiday-mood easy-money era that found politicians and economic pressure groups doing everything in their power to make inflation a permanent institution.

That policy was still in flower when the impact of Korea struck us. One would have been entitled then to expect that every effort would be made to overcome the mistakes and failures of the past. One would have expected vigorous efforts immediately; but try as we would, we could not get the government to declare an emergency. We could not even feel that they thought there was an emergency, though the cost of living had risen from 161 in January of 1950 to 169 in September. One wonders how much further evidence was needed to bring about immediate and effective action. In his budget speech on Tuesday evening the minister admitted that virtually nothing had been done—and I shall substantiate that a little later by quoting his words—until parliament assembled and the pressure was put on, if I may say so, by the opposition. Not only was nothing done; it was really worse than that, as is evident from the words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce in this house on February 8. Comparing the present with 1941 the minister said:

> This time many people expect the reimposition of the same kind of controls and are governing themselves accordingly.

In other words the minister was calmly informing us that with all the talk of controls that was in the air, the government, by doing nothing, or practically nothing, had stimulated buying for the rise. The minister had quite clearly in mind what was happening when he said people were "governing themselves accordingly," and his words not only did nothing to discourage that practice but I believe his words must have encouraged people to go on, because after all it was clearer then than ever before that the government was thinking about taking steps. It never got past the stage of thinking; nevertheless it stimulated these people to go out and try to beat the gun.

Now let us have a short post mortem of the September session. What did the Minister of Finance do after brave words about dealing with inflation? Well, it seems to me it would be fair to say, in the words of the old proverb, that "the mountains were in labour but all that was produced was a ridiculous mouse". The only thing we had was the instalment buying legislation passed in September, followed by some regulations in November. I believe those were ineffective, if not practically nugatory, and the best proof I can offer in support of that statement is that recently much more effective regulations were passed, and we are now to have an amendment of the instalment buying legislation. But those more effective regulations were passed only a few weeks ago.

Last September the need of credit controls, to which the minister referred the other night, was ignored—and I think that word is fair. There was reference to it, but nothing was done.

I think we can say practically the same thing about the Minister of Trade and Commerce, to whom we gave broad powers last autumn. The need for those powers he explained in the house in these words:

> If for war purposes we shorten the supply of materials and the remainder is insufficient for domestic supplies, we then take the right to fix prices on materials for domestic use and arrange distribution.

Notwithstanding that, so far as I can discover, virtually nothing was done until January. It was no doubt to explain his inactivity that the minister told us on February 8:

> Up to the present defence purchases have not been of sufficient volume to be in themselves responsible for shortages.

I find this absolutely unconvincing. I am not suggesting it may not be true in the narrow sense, but with prices rising and with every reason to believe they would rise further it is not possible for me to believe that nothing more could be done. Indeed I think it perfectly clear that both ministers were afflicted with what I may call Korea-itis; that is to say, when the lull came in the fighting in the autumn of 1950 they thought they were off the hook; they thought strong measures were not necessary, and acted accordingly.

I refer back to my complaint about the failure of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to take effective measures, and I quote again from the well known United States economist, Slichter, to indicate his belief that great results can be achieved along the very lines the minister suggested and for which we gave him power last September. Slichter says:

> An effective way of discouraging the demand for consumer goods, and thereby limiting inflation, is to prevent industry from making the kind and quality of goods that consumers desire to buy. Price ceilings, as I have pointed out, do this to a certain extent, though that is not their purpose. A more effective restraint on consumer demands comes from restrictions on the use of scarce materials.

I think it is merely a statement of plain fact to say that the government lost precious months. If they had begun in September we would have said they were slow starters. But they did not begin then; and all they did was miss the bus again. As I have said, I think the lull in the fighting in Korea is the answer.

Now let us look at the anti-inflationary steps which the minister brought to our attention. What is his plan of campaign? Well, first there is the restriction of credit. I have pointed out that this should have been done months ago, that it is months late. In effect the minister admitted this, because he said these policies——take some months to show their effects on excessive purchasing and the rise of prices, but already one begins to see evidence of their influence.

I devoutly hope that is true. The minister did not tell us that due to the delay in the application of the regulatory measures which the Bank of Canada was set up to exercise, some $400 million of new money was created through bank loans during those months, and this money went into competition with salaries, wages and other income, thereby helping to boost the cost of living. In passing I must say that the chartered banks are not to blame for this. Their business is to lend money to credit-worthy customers. The policy of restriction is up to the government through its agent, the Bank of Canada. I think the best we can say for the minister is "better late than never".

The next weapon the minister told us he had was that of economy. He told us, not without some pride, that he had been able to save $35 million out of a non-defence expenditure of $2,036 million. The Winnipeg Free Press has dealt with this matter fairly faithfully, and I think it would be better to use their words than my own, because they would be less prejudiced.

After praising the minister for his "pay-as-you-go" policy the Free Press says:

But if the underlying truths of this budget are examined it will be seen that the government's courage has outstripped its sense of reality. The budget in fact is a contradiction. Mr. Abbott stated the issue with clarity but he did not face it. "Two great issues face the world today," he said, "They are the pursuit of peace and the control of inflation."

And the Free Press continues:

The budget itself contains no answer. Of the total outlay of 3,700 million dollars, expenditures on defence will be 1,662 million. This represents the pursuit of peace and is not to be criticized. The balance of 2,036 million represents the other of Mr. Abbott's great issues—the control of inflation. This vast outlay is for non-defence, for government services of one kind or another. How great it is may be gauged by the fact that in 1945-46, the first year of peace, the corresponding expenditure was only 1,062 million dollars.

Further, in the same editorial the Free Press said:

Mr. Abbott had a great deal to say about economy. But the government's achievement here was only 35 million out of 2,036 million—virtually total failure . . . for the time being the government is trying to avoid a choice and to go on meeting the claims of peace and of war. The results are clear enough. The cost of living index stands at close to 180 . . . Instead of making the choice the government in the present budget is temporizing and hoping by the higher taxes and other measures to hold the inflation in check . . . but the issue remains . . . no government can continue to throw oil on the fire with one hand and keep down the flames with the other.

My comment on the $35 million is that, if the supplementary estimates are taken into account, the $35 million saving will, I fear, disappear and be replaced by an opposite figure, I would judge, considerably higher.

The truth is, of course, that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) has not had to face economy. We have allowed him to take money enough to get along easily. We allowed surpluses without demanding any plan for debt retirement in advance. As a result, the minister found himself for years with hundreds of millions of dollars up his sleeve. What chance of real economy is there in a situation like that?

The government's third instrument is instalment buying which I have already mentioned. I merely repeat that the legislation passed last September was ineffective, as well as the regulations, but that new regulations and new legislation are being brought forward.

We now come to a new and interesting remedy, namely, a new depreciation regulation which is described as a "stiff deterrent" to expansion. The right to charge depreciation is withdrawn on a wide range of production, in respect of capital assets acquired after April 10 last. Certain classes of capital goods are excepted automatically and certain additional classes on the certificate of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe).

This regulation invites comment. First of all, I think it can be described as an indication of the final break with the inflationary expansionist policy. Instead of double depreciation, we now have depreciation withdrawn for four years as a "stiff deterrent". We have gone from one extreme to the other. I think we must admit that the boom assisted by government action had grown so acute that something was needed, and this novel expedient may do good. But what an irony! Three years ago, double depreciation; now, depreciation cut off for four years. It may, I fear, cause hardship to those whose business demands expansion, unless they can come within the excepted classes, because it will greatly increase their taxes.

Another unsatisfactory feature is that this means more power gravitating to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I am not going to go over what I have said on that subject before, and which I know he likes so much to hear. But it is interesting to find the Montreal Star, which has not been niggardly in its attitude toward wide powers to the minister, now saying:

The scheme is not going to be easy to work out and it may work out in many instances unfairly.

Who is to choose between projects which deserve depreciation and those which do not? There will be both confusion and delay.

I hope those views expressed by the Montreal Star may find expression in many other newspapers, and that this feeling may become widespread.

One other factor the minister referred to was that of interest rates; and of course the government policy there we find reflected in a very practical form, namely, the reduction in the prices of government bonds. Tens of thousands of people—yes, I suppose hundreds of thousands—are outraged by this situation. Having bought bonds well above par—perhaps at 103, 104 or even 105—and now finding those bonds selling at 97 or 98, they are inclined to blame the government.

I was amazed the other day to find how widespread this feeling is. I suppose it is not surprising, because every effort was made to convey the impression that government bonds could not and would not go below par. The extent of this assurance—and nothing was done to check it, so far as I can see—was astonishing. In 1948, I think it was—at any rate, two or three years ago—there was a temporary drop in the bond market, and I ran into an investment dealer—it is true he had been in Ottawa during the war, and he may have acquired some of the control complex—and said to him, "Is the bond market going to find its own level?" He said, "Well, of course, it can never go below par." Could anything show more clearly the extent of this misleading assurance? It was in the air. It was widespread. It was almost universal. Nothing was done to disabuse the public mind. Indeed, I fear that in the highest financial circles there was a feeling that they had found some new secret by which they could control the bond market. Now, of course, they are finding that one of the old principles is now showing itself, namely, the need of incentive in order to get people to save.

We on this side of the house I suppose can take some negative satisfaction from these two measures, just as we did from the government's collapse in the foreign exchange control matter; because it is the case that the government has now, in effect—although we cannot expect the minister to say so—confessed that it has been wrong and has abandoned those two policies.

I now come to the minister's last inflationary curb, that of taxation. The main taxes, of course, are the general sales tax and other commodity taxes. In the general sales tax there was an increase of 25 per cent. Other commodity taxes were increased, some 66⅔ per cent and some a great deal more.

Then there are the corporation tax and the personal income tax. I wish to deal first of all with the commodity taxes and their effect on the cost of living. To the extent that they curb consumer buying they are deflationary, but to the extent that they add to the cost of living they will fail to be deflationary and they may only have the effect, which is widely pointed out, of putting pressure on the taxpayers to use every means in their power to demand pay increases in order to offset the taxes. Of course, if that happens, we know the difficulties that then arise.

Now, the corporation tax: We must face the fact that a large part of that will be translated into the price, and will also add to the cost of living. Looking at the other side of the shield, we have the income tax, which will lessen our capacity to pay.

The rises in prices will be immediate and inescapable, and the measures to combat high prices are just beginning and, as the minister very candidly said, they will take time. Failing a miracle, a further rise is inevitable.

The minister made a valiant effort to minimize the effect of the sales tax on the cost of living, but I found him, and I think others found him, very unconvincing. It was an ingenious argument but it will not carry much weight. Furthermore, no one will doubt of course that among the other things included in the other excise taxes, commodity taxes, articles such as stoves, washing machines, and so forth, in the life of the modern family have become practically necessities, however hard it is for some of us who are older to realize that.

And so we have as the primary effect not the lessening of consumption but the driving up of prices. For this reason Mr. Ralston in 1940 refused to recommend an increase in sales tax. He said:

We realize that increases in indirect taxes disguise the burdens imposed by the war, but they are much more likely to distribute these burdens harshly and unfairly. While increases in such taxes may eventually be necessary, we are striving in this budget to deal with the situation . . . by direct call on our citizens graded according to their means and responsibilities.

The following year Mr. Ilsley quoted with approval what Mr. Ralston had said, and also refused to increase the sales tax. Of course we are all familiar with the pyramiding effect: where you have the manufacturer, the jobber, the wholesaler, the retailer, you get a mark-up on a mark-up on a mark-up.

Now, let us see the reaction of public opinion, as reflected in the press, to the budget and perhaps in particular to the sales tax. The Windsor Star of April 11 said:

The dominion government has not checked inflation—either courage was lacking or the members of the government are so completely out of touch with the Canadian people that they don't know what is going on.

The Ottawa Journal of April 11 said:

It would be wrong to say that what Mr. Abbott brought us yesterday was an anti-inflationary budget. All Mr. Abbott seems to have done is to impose levies sufficiently heavy to bring the sums required for the defence effort, with no theory or nonsense about stopping inflation.

The Windsor Star again:

To think the increased taxes will appreciably reduce the demand for a diminishing flow of goods is to be naïve. The higher taxes are more apt to encourage demands for higher wages so the higher cost goods can be purchased.

L'Action Catholique mentions a special aspect which will be of interest to the province of Quebec. It says:

The increase in the sales tax will automatically increase the provincial sales tax, since the latter is based on the price of the merchandise including the federal sales tax.

The Ottawa Citizen, in an editorial entitled "It could have been worse" says:

The real shocker of the 1951 budget is the increase in the general sales tax to 10 per cent.

The Montreal Star, speaking of the general sales tax, said:

It will inevitably bring in its train demands for higher wages.

The Toronto Star adds:

It is on the whole a good budget marred only by the sales tax increase.

Throughout the press there was a remarkable unanimity against this increase of 25 per cent in the general sales tax. The quotations which I have given are typical.

To sum up, there is a wide belief that the general sales tax will be of little use as a reducer of consumption, but conversely will have the effect of increasing the cost of living. To a large extent the same will be true of other excise taxes.

Let us face the situation. This budget, which is purporting to cure inflation, will cause as its inescapable first result a substantial increase in the cost of living. One inevitable result, as the Montreal Star points out, will be forced on many of those in the community; the well organized will try to seek wage increases, and of course wage increases, unless accompanied by increased production, can have only one effect—the deadly spiral.

There is just one other aspect that I wish to refer to briefly, and that is an indication of a tendency on the part of business to take advantage of this situation, which I hope is not typical. The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) referred very forcibly and cogently to this the other day; but the things that I wish to refer to are but rather trivial instances, and yet they may be—I hope they are not—straws showing the way the wind is blowing. I understand that the tax on cigarettes was raised three cents, but that the price was shoved up four cents; conversely, I understand that the taxes on chocolates were reduced two cents a bar, but the price came down only one cent a bar.* As I said a moment ago, I hope that that is not typical. I hope that the business community—as I am sure many of them have—are showing a sense of responsibility very different from that.

Considering this situation, and the inevitable result in new taxes, I wish to examine the budget carefully from the point of view of the money the government is taking from us. A correspondent of the Montreal Gazette on Friday last sent the following report:

"The federal government will tax more dollars from Canadians per capita than in the wartime peak. In the 1943-44 peak, Ottawa took 207·17 per capita in all tax forms. Last year the comparable figure was 200·86. But for 1951-52 with defence costs mounting, per capita tax will be 242·97. The reason it won't be noticed is that national income figures are much higher now and the government's cut of the melon, while higher in dollar and cents, is lower proportionately. In the peak war year, the federal authorities took 26·9 of the national income. In the new fiscal year they will confiscate 21·5 per cent."

It is interesting to look back to 1939 and find that the comparable figure then was 38·76. It seems like another world.

As we look back over the budget, particularly during the years that the present minister has been Minister of Finance, we are struck with one remarkable fact. Each year there has been a tremendous increase of revenue over the estimates. Sometimes the difference seems almost fantastic, and last year was no exception. In the spring of 1950 the minister estimated, if I remember correctly, a surplus of $20 million. What happened? In four months it was up to $253 million, about twelve times the estimate. Last September he had another go at it. After the new taxes and appropriations, the estimate was $15 million. Well, the result made that estimate look silly. The actual result was $203 million. I should point out that this $203 million was after introducing two charges which I very much suspect were not taken into account in September when the calculation was made. I refer to the $65 million paid to the western farmers and the $75 million adjustment of the civil service superannuation fund, doubtless a necessary adjustment; although, incidentally, I might say that we have got no adequate explanation yet as to why it was so long in coming to light and being dealt with. Therefore I say it would be far fairer to compare the $15 million estimate of last September, not with $203 million, but with $343 million; in other words, something like 22 times, a good arithmetician tells me.

Of course, we remember the budgets before 1949, in those days when we had cyclical budgeting, the cycle of course not being a financial cycle, but a political cycle. We remember that the minister before 1949 held back plenty of money so that in 1949 we could have the sunshine budget in which, I believe, there was tax reduction to the extent of about $323 million.

But those times are gone. However lenient we were then, I think the time for that has gone past. And I begin to wonder if these extraordinary increases are pure coincidence. I am generous enough to believe that somehow or other the Department of Finance can estimate better than that. Indeed, I wonder if it is just becoming a habit. I suppose ministers of finance must love surpluses. Indeed, the other evening when the Minister of Finance announced the surplus and spoke about the buoyant revenues—caused, of course, largely by disastrous increases in prices—the thought crossed my mind: Is it possible that the Minister of Finance does not detest high prices as much as the rest of us do?

However that may be, when the minister announces his windfalls I notice there are never any apologies. He always sounds rather proud, although what he is really telling us is that he has picked our pockets to the tune of several hundreds of millions of dollars. And it is not all his fault, perhaps, because we poor taxpayers have been so foolish that we have almost allowed ourselves to be wheedled into a feeling of satisfaction over what is nothing short of a great failure on the part of the minister. What we should do is criticize him severely for having taken more money than he needed. I remind myself of what that great British Chancellor of the Exchequer, Philip Snowden, is reported to have said: If a chancellor of the exchequer has a half crown at the end of the year more than he needed, he is guilty of taking money under false pretences.

Mr. Abbott: Even if he had a heavy debt?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am coming to that. Let us just consider what surpluses are like, unless they are according to plan, and are earmarked for debt reduction, so that we have got something to which we can hold the minister. We have never had anything we could hold him to. Moreover our surpluses have never been from spending less but they have always been from taking more.

Of course it is obvious that the effect on the spending departments must be bad when there are surpluses. Can anyone imagine a nice fat surplus, and spending departments really co-operating with the minister in doing what they can to bring down their expenses? I simply cannot imagine it.

Now let us apply this to the present situation. I believe in pay-as-you-go—no doubt about it; but I do not think that this year we need budget for too great a surplus. I have spoken about the practice, now almost a settled habit, of having large, unexpected surpluses. There is a competent view that with the foreshadowed gross national product of $20 billion we are heading into another large surplus. I suppose it may be said that neither fiscal control nor the stiff deterrent of the reduced depreciation is likely to reduce by very much this $20 billion production if, as I imagine, this estimate is based mainly upon a construction plan already in existence.

And this brings me to ask this question: Suppose we increase the general sales tax, as the minister has asked, by 25 per cent, and other excise taxes by 66⅔ per cent and more and suppose we have another surplus, even though it be much less than surpluses we have had in the past and which, as I say, competent opinion is predicting for the current year; will we not feel that we have behaved in a very unwise manner by adding in this way further to the cost of living?

Therefore, having regard to the acute living cost situation which exists, having regard to the fact that it will be accentuated by this budget, having regard to the legitimate belief that this year of change-over and adjustment is an especially difficult year, and having regard to what we understand to be the fact, namely that defence spending is going at a rate less than anticipated—having regard to all this, I am going to propose that this year, instead of accepting without question the minister's request for money, we say to him that we will not give him the $3,700 million he asks, but that he can forgo at least the increase in the general sales tax.

I believe there is every expectation, judging by precedent, that his revenue will increase adequately to cover the amount—which I think is $105 million this year—but I also point out that, if contrary to expectations the surplus does not fully cover the amount, he can still have recourse to economy, perhaps with more enthusiasm than in the past.

There is small reason to believe that this budget will achieve the aim set up by the Minister of Finance, that of controlling inflation. Quoting again from the Winnipeg Free Press, "No government can continue to throw oil on the fire with one hand and keep down the flames with the other". At the present time it seems clear that the government is relying on events in the United States to pull them out. It is true that there is a sign of slackening in the United States at the moment, but it would be very premature to believe that, with all the pressure for defence expenditures, this slackening will be anything but temporary. It is much more likely that this results from some confusion and overlapping surrounding the changeover from civilian to wartime production. Indeed I read only today that evidently there has been poor co-ordination between wartime spending and civilian spending. I hope the government will not rely wholly on the United States, but that they will take whatever further steps are necessary.

I am not asking for a miracle. On the other hand negation is not a policy. The only result that follows from the disposition to use the old adage "wait and see" was described many years ago. This result can easily be "too little and too late".

I venture to use again the words I used the other evening: how long does this government think they can turn their backs on the people and still say that they have the people at their backs?

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross):

That all the words after "that" to the end of the question be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"the proposals of the Minister of Finance are unsatisfactory because they will inevitably increase the cost of living for all and especially for those least able to bear it.

This house condemns in particular, as inflationary, the increase by 25 per cent of the general sales tax and is of the opinion that the increase is unnecessary and unwise.

This house further condemns the heavy increase in excise taxes on certain essential commodities and is of the opinion that much of the government's proposed huge increase in taxation is due to its own extravagance.

This house regrets the failure of the government to take effective steps to deal with profiteering."

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, in spite of what I may say a little later about the budget, I wish to join with the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) who, shortly after the budget was delivered, complimented the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) upon his manner of delivery, and his placement of the records of the financial operations of the government before the country. I think the minister in the budget he has brought down has placed before the house a clear exposition of the government's view respecting the financial situation in which the country finds itself at the present time.

I join however with the hon. member for Greenwood in criticizing the department for not having estimated the surpluses more accurately than they have been estimated from year to year. There may of course be reasons why this has happened, but nonetheless I think we should have greater accuracy than we have had during the last number of years.

I listened with great interest to the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell). I agree with much of the criticism which he levelled at the budget, and at the government whose budget it is. I shall perhaps repeat some of that criticism but in a different manner.

We do indeed live in very interesting and challenging times. I know that people sometimes wonder how we are going to get through the period in which we are living, but I think one is privileged to live in a period like this when there are so many challenges to society and when we are in the midst of such great economic and social changes.

In his budget the minister stated that there were two great issues which face the world today. First, there is the achievement of an enduring and expanding peace, and then there is the other problem of inflation. In our opinion the first is primarily a question of how best to achieve world understanding and co-operation through the United Nations. We believe that the second problem can be dealt with primarily as a domestic problem. I do not agree that we have to rely on conditions in the United States or have to be wholly governed by what happens within the borders of our great neighbour. Of course we cannot be entirely uninfluenced by what takes place there and indeed across the world.

Regarding the problem of peace, we realize that all we can do, and indeed all we must do is to use our influence and power for the peaceful settlement of disputes among nations. We are of necessity forced to accept the co-operative decisions arrived at after consultation and negotiation with other members of the United Nations. In other words, whether we like it or not we are not wholly and entirely sovereign in the realm of international affairs.

On the other hand, while our domestic economy, as I have just said, cannot remain uninfluenced by world economic trends and tendencies, there is much that we can do within our own borders to protect our people from the devastating results of such runaway inflation as we are experiencing at the present time. The government has not done anything, nor does the budget do anything effective to relieve the Canadian people from the evil effects of rising prices and uncontrolled inflation.

Prices have risen in a spectacular manner over the last six months, that is, since the minister introduced his interim budget last September. At that time we were told that some of the objectives of that budget were to minimize the inflation that was then quite in evidence and which has since gone much further. Indeed the last increase recorded by the dominion bureau of statistics was the highest in points in Canadian history. The index now stands at an all-time high of 179·7, as the hon. member for Greenwood remarked.

Of course the basic cause of inflation is excessive money, credit and purchasing power in relation to the goods and services available for sale or purchase. Another cause is that business, wholesale and retail, makes demands for factory goods and raw materials in anticipation of the development of shortages, because it believes goods will be in short supply. The result is that prices, particularly consumer prices, are pushed up unduly. We can add to this the belief, encouraged by the government, that price controls may be introduced and the determination that when they come some business will be, and I quote the words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), "all set" and ready with high and profitable prices.

So far the inflation that we are experiencing has been largely psychological. Prices have been rising in anticipation of serious shortages and still higher prices. The vast expenditures for defence preparedness have not indicated their full effect. Defence expenditures are still largely in the first or preparatory stage. Only when defence industries are working to their fullest extent will the full effect of defence demands for basic materials, factory space, machines and labour be felt. If there is in addition demand for manpower from the armed forces as the result of more intensive recruiting, the consequent labour shortages and inflationary pressures must of necessity become intensified.

Thus it is that we of the C.C.F. are renewing today our insistent demands for a comprehensive national economic plan and the immediate institution of price controls and subsidies. Failing such a policy the relatively lower farm incomes along with increasing cost of production and a decline in purchasing power of wages will cause discontent on the farm and bring about renewed wage demands in the industrial areas. I say to the minister that these could upset both our defence efforts and all his budgetary forecasts. That this may happen has been stated by some of the leading men in both the farm organizations and the labour unions within the last couple of weeks. Yet neither in the budget nor in any of the government's pronouncements during this session can one find any realistic approach to these problems.

On the other hand, some of the proposals in the budget will increase further the already oppressive high cost of living. This is particularly true of the twenty-five per cent increase in the general sales tax. It is all very well for the government to argue, as the minister did the other night, that the sales tax applies only to one-quarter or one-third of the expenditures of families in the lower or middle income groups, but these are the groups that include pensioners of all types, persons living on annuities, savings and fixed incomes; these are the people who can least afford this substantial increase in the sales tax.

The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) is in her seat this afternoon. One week ago I quoted from a survey which had been made in Hamilton and which indicated the hardship and malnutrition faced by old age pensioners in that city in this province. Whatever way we consider it, the sales tax is fundamentally an evil tax and most oppressive. It is made more oppressive because it is collected at the manufacturer's level and thus is pyramided substantially before it reaches the consumer.

To illustrate what I mean, let us take an article subject to tax which the manufacturer prices at $10. To this he adds the sales tax of $1. Therefore the wholesaler who buys from the manufacturer bases his profit of 20 per cent, let us say, not on $10 but on $11, and the price he charges to the retailer becomes $13.20 instead of $12. The retailer now adds his mark-up of 33⅓ per cent, let us say, so that the consumer pays $17.60 for the article instead of $15. By the time the 10 per cent tax has been paid by the consumer it has risen, in the instance I have just given, to about 12·7 per cent, nearly 13 per cent. If there are intervening mark-ups or the mark-ups are larger, as they usually are—

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Where did you get the figure of $15? It is $16, is it not?

Mr. Coldwell: Yes, between $15 and $16 is right. I said $15 did I?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Yes.

Mr. Coldwell: —on many classes of goods, the tax is correspondingly increased, and its effect on the cost of living is correspondingly greater. We object, and always have objected, to this tax on principle, but since it is going to be imposed anyway we urge the house to provide that the ultimate consumer shall pay only the tax on the first or manufacturer's price. In other words, we urge the house to forbid any other person to add to it or to make any profit on the sales tax paid at the manufacturer's level.

Of course there can be little criticism in these times of taxes on luxury goods, but a tax of 25 per cent on some types of electrical appliances, and even in many instances on lower priced automobiles, is excessive. While some automobiles are luxuries, because of the way in which our cities have spread out and the manner in which hundreds of salary and wage earners, business and professional people, have to get to their work every day by automobile, an automobile is a necessity to them. Be that as it may, a most objectionable feature of the tax proposals included in the budget is the new levy of 15 per cent on mechanically operated domestic refrigerators, washing machines, and all domestic cooking stoves except those designed for the burning of coal and wood only.

Mr. Low: Scandalous.

Mr. Coldwell: As the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) says, that is a scandalous proposal. It means that all kinds of electric, gas and oil stoves will be subject to the tax. Today oil, gas and electric cooking stoves are of universal benefit as labour-saving devices when domestic help in both rural and urban areas is almost impossible to obtain. Modern suites, whether in large cities or in small towns, and many new homes are not properly equipped with chimneys for the emission of smoke from coal or wood burning stoves. I wonder what percentage of the houses that have been built in this city over the last number of years have chimneys so situated that the pipes of a coal or wood stove could be connected to them. I know a number of homes where it is absolutely impossible unless a new chimney is built from the kitchen to emit the smoke.

When we consider the higher down payments required on newly constructed homes, increased mortgage interest rates, the excessively high cost of furniture, the added burden of a 25 per cent increase in the sales tax on some articles of household use, and now this new tax on certain types of stoves, washing machines and refrigerators, those establishing new homes are given a very severe knock indeed by the minister's budget. In my opinion the minister certainly might have found other luxuries that could have stood further taxation before imposing these onerous taxes on such modern necessities as those mentioned in the budget. I think everyone expected increased taxes on alcoholic beverages, and, in spite of the minister's explanation as to why he did not meet this expectation, I am of the opinion that the money to be raised through taxes on modern household equipment should have been obtained by increased levies on users of alcoholic beverages, and indeed a wide range of other luxuries.

Let me say that it is not only the government's tax which increases prices but also the advantage taken by some business interests to increase their prices and profits on the basis of taxes, which in turn increases the burden placed upon society. The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) gave an example a few minutes ago, the increase of 3 cents in tax on 20 cigarettes which immediately became 4 cents to the actual consumer. Mind you, I am not objecting to high taxes on cigarettes and tobacco. After all, they are not necessities of life although many consider that they contribute to a pleasant way of living, if I may put it that way. On behalf of the C.C.F. party I wish to protest strongly against the new tax on cooking stoves other than those designed to use coal and wood exclusively, as well as on washing machines and refrigerators, and of course the 25 per cent increase in the general sales tax. It follows therefore that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Greenwood is in line with our thinking.

There is one further word I should like to say in connection with all these objectionable taxes. They hit hardest those who can least bear the blow. It seems to us that as an alternative certain types of household goods and articles of clothing manufactured according to standard utility specifications should be classified as utility goods and be exempt from both sales and excise taxes. Under the circumstances I think that is a constructive suggestion that the minister might well consider. With an increase of 25 per cent in the sales tax and a new excise tax on certain types of stove, as well as the other increased excise taxes, I should think the proposed amendment to the constitution to allow the provinces to collect a provincial sales or turnover tax will be nullified by the budget. I cannot see how the provinces can impose a further sales or turnover tax. Unfortunately the provinces have few alternative methods of taxation. The dominion government has very largely occupied the field of direct taxation and, as we see by the budget, is occupying it to an ever-increasing extent. Therefore what is happening is that the provinces have restricted fields of taxation. I think that means that federal grants to the provinces for specific purposes such as education and health are now more essential than ever. Indeed the whole cost of social security, including a national health plan about which I hope to say something more in a few moments, must be borne by the federal authority. Most of the provinces cannot bear an added burden.

To some extent these taxes are defended on the ground that they will discourage buying and hence relieve the pressure on scarce commodities like steel, in that way acting as a deterrent to further inflation. Well, of course this is the government's purpose in its policy of restricting bank credit and instalment buying, but I can tell the minister that the effect of this credit policy is being defeated to some extent by the activities of the small loan and finance companies. They still advertise widely that they have plenty of money available to lend to borrowers who are willing to pay the rate this house made legal several years ago, 18 per cent. Their balance sheets, their advertising and their busy offices indicate the extent to which purchasers of household goods as well as automobiles are turning to them to get enough money to provide for the cash payment, and thus escape the barriers placed against instalment buying or the making of small loans from our banking institutions.

Mr. Abbott: That is a breach of the provisions of the act, of course.

Mr. Coldwell: It is easy to escape that, though. They borrow money and as far as I know there is no check on what they borrow it for except what the person says. I hope the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) intends to investigate and inspect this kind of business pretty thoroughly. It seems to us that apart from the usurious rates of interest permitted by our own legislation, which we as a party strenuously opposed when the legislation was before the house several years ago, the government should place definite proposals before the house to deal with a situation of that kind. If we are to forbid the banks to expand credit, which they provide at relatively reasonable rates in normal times, certainly we should see to it that loan sharks are prevented from lending money at unreasonable and usurious rates of interest.

The minister urged people to save, but I find and I fear that the disposition is to spend. That disposition is becoming more prevalent, to spend and invest in durable goods that will have some value. This is encouraged by the steadily depreciating dollar. People who have saved in the past have seen their investments in life insurance, annuities, victory and other bonds steadily decline in value in terms of goods and services. I might add that when the victory loan campaign was inaugurated during the war the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) pleaded with the government to do what it did subsequently in connection with the savings bonds, and say to the people who invested in those bonds that they would be guaranteed at least par value for the bonds they bought. As the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) said, today some of these war bonds are selling below par. Thus the incentive is to say, "Let us eat, drink and spend and enjoy what we can buy, because in a year or two our dollars may be worth far less than they are now."

Yet while incomes in terms of goods have steadily declined, profits have continued to soar. In its previous budgets since the war the government has failed to drain off excessive profits or tax the enormous capital gains which have accrued to Canadian industry. Individuals who have fixed incomes, who work for salaries or wages, or farmers who deliver their produce to public or co-operative agencies, are taxed to the full extent on their incomes because the department knows exactly what their incomes are. But there is a widespread belief—whether or not it is correct I am not prepared to say, though I have been told a number of times, and quite reliably—that some companies, corporations and business people are able to charge against their business operations expenses which wage earners, salaried people and farmers must pay. I am informed that sometimes personal cars, travel and even holiday expenses are charged as business expenses.

Mr. McCann: But not allowed.

Mr. Coldwell: Not allowed if found. But I have an idea that the investigation is much more thorough in some parts of Canada than in others. I have always been puzzled as to why we should find farmers in one part of Canada paying millions of dollars in income tax and farmers in another part paying only $14,000 or $15,000 in all in a single year. It seems to me there must be a difference in the way the investigations are carried on. But to continue with what I was saying; Mr. John Doe of Blank and Blank decides he wants a trip to Montreal, or to New York, or to some other distant point. He has business connections there, it is true. He calls on a firm with which he has contacts to discuss something which might not really necessitate a trip at all. Unless there is very careful scrutiny he may be able to charge that to his business account.

Mr. McCann: Why don't you deal with something real? You are putting up hypothetical cases.

Mr. Coldwell: I am dealing with something real.

Mr. McCann: Then give us the names.

Mr. Coldwell: Income tax matters are all protected by secrecy. We do not know what the minister does in his department. He asks me to give him names. Let him give us the names of some of the taxpayers who have excessive profits and incomes, and we will give him the names for which he asks.

Mr. Lesage: But you are the one making the charge.

Mr. Coldwell: I am not making charges. I am drawing these matters and possible abuses to the attention of the minister and the government in order that a proper and thorough investigation may be made in all parts of Canada into accounts of this description. I am not saying this is done universally, but I am saying that I believe it is done in some instances; that there are tax evasion practices that are not open to farmers who deliver their produce to grain elevators or to wage and salary earners whose incomes are reported to the government and whose tax is deducted at the source. I am urging careful investigation.

Because of the criticisms we have made from time to time in the past of the general effect and advantage to some types of business of the depreciation write-offs, I was particularly interested in the minister's determination to prevent the writing off of certain types of capital investment out of the expected high profits of the next few years when corporate profits may be high and income taxes also high. This is in line with a criticism we made during the last war and subsequently of the government's taxation and depreciation policies. I was glad to have our arguments, at least in part, so strikingly confirmed by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech. Since his new deferred depreciation regulations are designed to prevent profits from going into new capital expansion, I suggest that he should go one step further and relieve the tax burden on the lower income groups by taxing these unusable accumulating profits on a steeply graduated scale.

Mr. Abbott: They will be taxed at the rate of 50 per cent and up.

Mr. Coldwell: I am glad the minister did not lower the income tax exemptions. With the soaring cost of living, they are already too low. A good case can be made for raising the exemptions under present circumstances to at least $1,500 for single persons and $3,000 for married persons without children. Certainly it was better to impose a surcharge on the tax to be paid; but, again, it should have been on a graduated scale instead of at a flat rate. The lower brackets should have been exempted and a graduated surcharge imposed in the middle and higher brackets. This would have been fairer and more just; and, under the circumstances, I think it is quite essential. However, apart from that, the idea of the surcharge on what is, if properly applied and if precautions are taken to prevent evasion, the most equitable form of taxation we have, namely, the income tax, is to be commended.

As for corporation taxes, the minister has been much more tender with them than with taxes on the individual citizens of the country. The minister said that to increase corporation taxes to a point of yielding still larger revenues, which would do grave damage to the economy in the long run, would be unwise; but as I have already shown, the hidden and indirect taxes placed upon the Canadian people are, in our opinion, likely to do much more damage to the health and welfare of the Canadian families than additional graduated taxation on corporations could possibly do.

If we look at the figures presented in the minister's budget, table No. 7, we find that in 1939 corporation profits, before taxes, amounted to $618 million; in 1946 they had risen to $1,450 million; in 1949 there was a further jump to $1,898 million; and in 1950 the minister estimates that they will amount to $2,270 million, an increase indeed of 19·6 per cent over 1949. Even after taxes, corporation profits in 1950 will amount to $1,402 million, an increase of 19·7 per cent over the 1949 figure.

On Saturday the Montreal Gazette published its initial compilation of earnings for 1950 compared with 1949 for one hundred Canadian firms whose financial years all coincide closely with the calendar year. These one hundred companies showed a profit increase on the average of 27·4 per cent, compared with the net, after all charges, including taxes, for the same one hundred companies in 1949.

The outstanding increase, in both dollar volume and percentage of profit, is to be found in the pulp and paper industry. Seventeen companies engaged in this industry showed an increase of 33·7 per cent compared with their 1949 totals. I say this indicates clearly that while wage earners, salaried people, farmers and people on superannuation and other forms of fixed income are being squeezed, Canadian corporations are enjoying unprecedented prosperity and profits. That is why we feel that if individual Canadians are called upon to endure the burdens imposed by our necessary defence preparations, corporations and companies should not be allowed to maintain very high and, in some instances, quite excessive profits.

The minister indeed is determined to protect them against the effect of the 20 per cent defence surcharge which he provides shall not operate so as to reduce the net income after the federal tax on any company to a point below 5 per cent on the capital involved.

Mr. Abbott: The capital employed. I thought my hon. friend said "involved".

Mr. Coldwell: The capital employed. This position is quite the reverse of that which was taken in 1939 when this house passed a Defence Purchases Act, since repealed, providing that profits on defence contracts should not exceed 5 per cent. This indicates clearly the fundamental difference in the approach of the Liberal party now and of the C.C.F. now in regard to this problem. We believe that when our institutions are in danger and sacrifices are to be made, there should be some attempt to achieve at least some equality of sacrifice. Because of this, Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a sub-amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), which is as follows:

That the amendment be amended by adding thereto the following words:

"This house further regrets the failure of the government to exempt from the proposed 20 per cent defence surtax the incomes of single persons up to $1,500 and the incomes of married persons up to $3,000."

The minister's budget obviously does not in any particular achieve the ends which I have outlined and which we should have in view.

During the last war Canadians were led to believe that as soon as the war was over a comprehensive social security system would be inaugurated. The Beveridge report had been placed before the British people and in Canada a somewhat similar report was made by Professor Marsh. Coincidentally, a parliamentary committee was established to recommend a national health insurance plan; indeed a bill was drafted, and prior to the 1945 general election the Canadian people were told that this measure would go into effect as soon as a dominion-provincial agreement had been reached on constitutional matters.

As a matter of fact, in the dominion-provincial conferences, this question and the problem of universal old age pensions were not reached on the agenda and as yet no adequate attempt has been made to fulfil the expectations that were raised by the presentation of the Marsh report and the formulation of proposals for a national health plan. In mentioning this, I want to say that if we are to maintain nation-wide support for our struggle against the threat of totalitarian aggression, the Canadian people must be granted the social security measures which they were promised during the second world war; and what is true of our domestic situation is equally true in the realm of our participation in international affairs. We cannot defeat the threat of totalitarian communism or fascism, should it again raise its ugly head, by military might alone.

The budget indicates clearly the huge expenditures involved in our military plans; these are expenditures that we must make. Yet in contrast, Canada's contribution to the first year, for example, of the Colombo plan is a conditional $25 million. While we are, I believe, making a great effort in military preparedness, we are not assuming, either within our own country in the realm of social security or in regard to such plans as the Colombo plan, obligations comparable with those assumed, for example, in a much harder-pressed country, namely the United Kingdom; nor are we contributing as much per capita to the southeast Asia plan as is Australia.

I therefore say that in order to achieve our objective in maintaining freedom and democracy, we must place greater emphasis upon the economic aspects of our own domestic situation, of such international organizations as the Atlantic alliance, and of the problem of southeast Asia.

While there are features of the budget that I could commend, such as the provision to allow union dues to be charged as a deduction, and the provision which will allow money spent on drugs, to a certain extent, to be used as a deduction for income tax purposes, yet, my time being limited and expired, I have made the criticisms of the budget which I felt we should make and which are in line with criticisms we have made in similar debates on many other occasions.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) brought down his budget last week, and yet the Canadian people today are still faced with two most serious threats. I acknowledge the seriousness of the international dangers that beset us at this time, and I want to assure the government now that we of the Social Credit group are most anxious that our country, Canada, shall take every step that is possible or required to do our full share in stemming the tide of communist aggression and in establishing peace, security and good will, and true liberty throughout the whole world.

The present budget ought to be viewed at least partly, as the minister said in his budget address, against the facts of the international background. But I would remind the Minister of Finance that the main consideration in providing for an adequate defence effort appears to be the wherewithal, or in other words, revenue.

Viewed solely from the angle of providing revenue, the budget appears to lack nothing. It does provide for enough revenue to enable the government to continue a fairly high level of services and at the same time make a substantial defence effort. But in my opinion inflation presents at this moment the greatest threat to Canadian strength, to Canadian safety and to Canadian well-being. And because inflation is our greatest enemy at the moment, and since the defence effort seems to be adequately provided for, I am compelled, in my address today, to consider the budget more from the point of view of its effect on prices and the cost of living than from any other aspect.

I ask hon. members today, what good will it do us to gain all our objectives in the international field through the use of diplomacy, armed strength and economic aid to other countries, if in the process we destroy our own economy and with it our chances of demonstrating to the whole world the superiority of the individual enterprise economy and our free way of life?

In his speech on Tuesday last the Minister of Finance said, as reported at page 1798 of Hansard:

> A third great asset we should take full note of is that here in Canada, unlike so many countries, our people are not split and divided by fundamental cleavages of opinion. My task this evening is made easier because I sense that there are no great issues of principle dividing us.

Well, I am thankful, as is the minister, that there is not in Canada a numerically strong part of our population who militantly champion the cause of communism, and who oppose our way of life. I believe almost all sections of our population agree that we must unite our efforts to resist aggression and the spread of communist imperialism; that we have an obligation to help backward and starving peoples in other lands to build up their economy so that they can help themselves, and that peaceful relationships with all countries and people the world over ought to be cultivated by us. But we of this group, Mr. Speaker, claim—and we have the best of grounds on which to make the claim—that the Minister of Finance is obliged to administer a financial and economic policy that compels him to be a petty dictator, because it forces him to put a much higher value on statistical figures than upon human flesh and blood.

We do not agree in any respect with that policy. We Social Creditors declare that every policy adopted by any government ought to have as its sole reason for existence the good and welfare of individual human beings.

I have often said that I like the Minister of Finance. I think he is a fine fellow, with great ability and buoyancy of spirit which are certainly difficult to match anywhere. I think he could be the greatest Minister of Finance Canada has ever had, if this house would lay down for him a financial policy which recognizes that human welfare must be its first and foremost obligation, a policy made for men, that exalts individual human beings to a position above institutional arrogance and disregard. That is the aim, and that kind of policy the minister has not got upon which he could lavish his great administrative abilities and his fine attainments.

The present budget is full of evidence of the truth of what I have just said; and as long as he has not got such a policy as I have suggested there will continue to be a decided fundamental issue dividing him and his colleagues from me and mine throughout this great country. I assure him, though, that that difference will not prevent us from giving the fullest co-operation to the government in all things designed to protect our country, our economy, our people and their welfare; but we must continue to struggle for the introduction into Canada of the Social Credit way of life which is nothing more or less than the principles of Christianity applied to finance, economics and the government, as well as to personal liberty.

Let me say to the Minister of Finance that he will never solve the threatening inflation danger and its allied shrinking of the purchasing power of the Canadian dollar until he does adopt a financial policy which regards the welfare of human beings as a paramount consideration. We place ourselves squarely on the side of the masses of the ordinary Canadians in their struggle for freedom from oppression of every kind, and the present financial policy administered by my good friend, the Minister of Finance, is an oppressive policy.

There are some good things that one could say about the budget. I liked the air of optimism that the minister had when he presented it. I relished also the faith that he expressed in our country and in its ability to come quite safely through the storms that appear ahead. I believe that the minister was wise in adding the simple surcharge to the personal and corporate income taxes, rather than disturbing the present rates and exemptions. When the time does come that he will not need so much revenue as he does now—and I hope it will come soon—it will certainly be easy, and not at all disturbing, to drop this surcharge. Furthermore in this provision—this is one at least—the minister did recognize the very heavy struggle that the people in the lower income groups are having to make ends meet under the impact of the highest living cost in our history. If he had not spoiled it later on in his budget we would have much more hope for the future, and he would have had much more reason for rejoicing.

I think the minister's provision of something of a deterrent to private capital investment for the next five years was good. It probably will not deter very much investment, but it is good as far as it goes, and it certainly is based on the right principle so far as I am concerned.

The minister was fair also, and he showed some sensitiveness to public opinion, when he provided in his budget for changes in tariff that are designed to give free entry into Canada to certain items of farm equipment, such as grain and hay driers, individual sprinkler irrigation systems and certain fishing equipment, and some items of dairy equipment. The farmers and fishermen of Canada will certainly be thankful for these changes because they will in some measure at least reduce the cost of production, and in so far as they do that they will be an inducement to greater productive effort. I compliment the minister on those changes.

There is also in the minister's declaration the pay-as-you-go policy. He says that through the present difficult period he intends following that policy. Well, certainly his financial arrangements this year indicate that at least during the next year he will follow it, and he will be able to. We support the idea of a pay-as-you-go policy now. But let us hope that the government does not make the same mistake that they made during world war II when, after declaring a pay-as-you-go policy, they departed quite swiftly therefrom shortly after the start of the war and ran our national debt from $3,500 million up to $16 billion by the time the war was over. Not only that, but some very foolish things were done in the name of bond selling which did help to establish quite firmly in the Canadian economy the roots of our present serious inflation.

I think the minister delivered a timely warning to the public at large which included consumers, producers of every kind, farmers, merchants, businessmen and labour when he asked for restraint and good sense in all economic matters, and appealed to all producers to increase their efficiency and their output.

It is plainly evident that if we are going to whip inflation and save and stabilize our economy we have all got to produce more, which means, of course, as the minister said, harder work and perhaps longer hours, and surely a definite increase in our efficiency in our productive effort. Unless we produce more, and unless at the same time we reduce costs, we cannot hope to bring prices down to within manageable proportions. The minister could very well, if time had permitted, have appealed to organized and unorganized labour of all kinds to concentrate their attention on increasing their purchasing power, rather than merely going through hell and high water to get increases in their dollar income. When they do take that line of action their efficiency is bound to increase, and their efforts will be really worth while.

On the part of employers of labour I think it is absolutely essential that they go all out in an effort to cultivate better employer-worker relations by every means at their disposal. If they do not, I cannot see how there can be higher production, and therefore lower consumer prices. I do not know of any better way of improving employer-worker relationships than through the introduction of incentive systems, such as profit-sharing.

A number of most interesting experiments along this line have been conducted in various parts of America over the last twenty or twenty-five years. Unfortunately the experiments have been mainly carried on by small companies, some of which have in those years grown to be pretty large and powerful as a result of the incentive system. The bigger corporations in this country would do well to concentrate on some such sort of improved relations between the management and those who work for them. A fine example for them to follow, in my judgment, would be that of the Lincoln Electric Company of the United States, which has been the leader in this sort of labour-management relations for some time. No strikes have disrupted their progress, and right from the time that the system was introduced the cost of producing a unit of goods has shown a steady decline.

After saying these good things about the budget—and I have deliberately taken those few moments to say some good things about it, in fairness to the minister and to the government—I must turn now to some criticisms. I could go on and say other good things, but I have not the time.

Mr. Abbott: Too many to cover them all.

Mr. Low: As I have said, the budget does appear to provide the government with sufficient revenue to make it possible for them to conduct a strong defence effort, and to continue to give a fair level of services. The dollars that will be brought in by the various methods of taxation, of course, will be emaciated ones that will have a hard time to buy fifty cents' worth. But there seems to be sufficient of those emaciated ones to fulfil the purposes the minister has in mind.

But the budget will do nothing to put value back into the Canadian dollar. Let me repeat that the budget will do nothing whatever to put value back into the Canadian dollar, and to bring down the cost of living. I see in the budget inflationary forces, and I cannot help declaring that the budget itself is an inflationary budget—just as the hon. member from Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) and the leader of the C.C.F. (Mr. Coldwell) have said before me.

I quite agree with those gentlemen when they say it is an inflationary budget. Here are some reasons—and I believe any man should be ready to give reasons for the faith that is in him. In the first place, the government proposes to spend essentially all the revenues that it takes in this year. That means that there is not going to be any surplus for the purpose of removing purchasing power, just so that it cannot be spent.

I am not criticizing that; I am simply making a statement of fact. This alone indicates that there will be $3,586 million of government spending out in competition with the many billions of individual spending during the coming year. There is no provision whatever in the budget to prevent further inflation of prices under these circumstances—not the slightest. In the second place, while it is quite true that the government has proposed certain tax increases on which it means to rely almost exclusively just now for controlling inflation, I am absolutely sure within my own mind that the taxation they propose will be no curb on inflation; and I am perfectly sure that under present circumstances the minister will soon discover that that is so.

Dr. Carl Shoup and two of his colleagues from Columbia university published in 1943 the results of a careful research project which they called "Taxing to Prevent Inflation". I secured a copy of that book and read it because I was intrigued with the idea of taxation to curb inflation. Here is what Dr. Carl Shoup and his colleagues had to say, on the very first page of the book:

> Prices may be about to rise because production and transportation have become more difficult, so that each unit of finished production requires more man-hours of effort than ever before. Although time-rates of wages remain unaltered, there is a rise in labour costs per unit, and possibly in other unit costs also. Under these circumstances it is unlikely that taxation can keep prices down; taking away purchasing power from consumers by taxation will not alter the fact that costs per unit of finished output will have risen. Prices must rise with costs unless the government provides subsidies.

And then comes the part which applies especially to Canadian conditions today. It is almost a recital of the conditions under which we live. Dr. Shoup continues:

> Similarly, if costs rise because the agents of production arbitrarily raise the price of their services by concerted action, taxation is no cure. The business world in general might refuse contracts unless promised a higher rate of money profits; labour might insist on higher rates of money wages. Whether the result were an increased money flow supported by an expansible credit system, or a decreased volume of production, or both, would depend in part on the tax policy that was adopted; but the rise in prices would be present in any case, in the absence of subsidies combined with rationing.

Now, one can easily see in Canada the exact situation described in these quotations, particularly the second part. Under the circumstances, to think that the taxation proposed by the Minister of Finance, unaccompanied by subsidies or other action, would bring down prices or take care of the inflationary situation is pure foolhardiness.

Mr. Blackmore: At least as bad as that.

Mr. Low: What does inflation mean? Inflation means simply a rise in prices; so that anything that increases prices is inflationary, whether on an individual basis or considered over the whole of the economy. James F. Lincoln, president of the Lincoln Electric Company, about which I spoke a few minutes ago, in a description of his Lincoln incentive system, says this:

> Taxes increase the cost of everything we buy. We could call them all sales taxes for they are all charged against the cost of production and show up in increased price of everything the ultimate consumer buys. Only the consumer pays taxes in the final analysis.

The only difference in the effect of the incidence of various taxes is the amount of price increase that results. Some taxes pyramid prices and others do not. I was surprised, and I am sure that people from one end of the country to the other were shocked, when the minister announced a 25 per cent increase in the sales tax. It is perfectly clear from the speech of the minister that the government is using this tax for revenue purposes exclusively, and certainly not for its anti-inflationary provisions. I am thoroughly in agreement with those who say that there are other sources from which the needed revenues could have been obtained without in any way causing an increase in general prices. As the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said, the minister could have placed an additional levy on liquor and beer to raise the whole amount. That is one place where he could have got more money. By increasing the sales tax from eight per cent to ten per cent the minister has increased the hardship faced by many Canadian people and has definitely increased prices or the inflationary condition in this country.

Let us take a look at what some experts have to say about the sales tax. I have heard it argued right in this house that the sales tax does not pyramid prices and does not necessarily cause inflation. Dr. Carl Shoup, and his colleagues, Milton Friedman and Ruth P. Mack of Columbia University, in a study called, "Taxing to Prevent Inflation", published in 1943, expressed this view on page 89:

> Both (manufacturers' and wholesale sales) taxes may result in some pyramiding; that is, the retailer and, under the manufacturers' tax, the wholesaler also, may apply their customary percentage mark-ups to a cost price that includes the sales tax, thus obtaining a profit on the tax.

I remark right here that the experience in Canada is that in periods when there are moderate corporation income tax rates and no excess profits taxes the sales tax at the manufacturer's level almost always results in pyramiding prices, which simply means that the consumer is forced to pay much more in additional prices than the dollar the government hopes to obtain from the tax.

Dr. Shoup conducted a survey of the general sales tax in France some years ago, and on page 323 of his report called "The Sales Tax in France" he says:

> Many French commentators, more especially those not connected with business firms, believe that the buyer (wholesale or retail) raises his prices by more than the tax, the theory being that the business man sets his prices on the basis that his profits must equal a certain percentage of his expenses; and as the tax is counted amongst his expenses, the base on which the profit percentage is considered, is swelled. Hence, the logical conclusion, frankly stated, is that the imposition of the tax increases the businessman's profits.

Nothing could be more clear than that statement by experts who have spent a long time in a most careful and comprehensive study of the effects of the incidence of the general sales tax. Back in 1923 the Illinois and Indiana bankers association sent their tax counsellor, Mr. H. R. Archibald Harris, C.P.A., to investigate the Canadian sales tax. It is something when you get a bankers association investigating the effect of the incidence of the sales tax. They must have been quite concerned about the effect of it upon the ordinary people. At the time it was being proposed to impose a sales tax in both Illinois and Indiana. At page 35 of his report entitled, "The Sales Tax in Canada," Mr. Harris says this:

> The so-called painlessness of the Canadian tax is costing the taxpayer about 40 per cent more in taxes than would be necessary if the tax were simply added on to the price which the consumer finally pays, instead of being put on the sales price of the manufacturer.

There you have a concise statement of the situation, and without question it is a true statement. That is one reason why I have always been opposed to a sales tax at the manufacturer's level. It definitely tends to pyramid prices and create hardship for people in the lower income groups. As an illustration of what the imposition of sales tax will do we have the announcement today by Imperial Oil Limited of an increase in the prices of gasoline, diesel oil, fuel oil and other oils, purely as a result of the imposition of the increased sales tax last week. That will increase prices and the cost of living to the Canadian people, as well as increase the cost of production to the Canadian farmer and those who use quantities of diesel and fuel oils.

When the minister asks himself and the Canadian people whether a threatened rise in price can be averted by additional taxation, let him re-examine the expert opinions I have just quoted. There is no doubt in my mind that under present circumstances the answer would be a resounding "No". I am definitely opposed to an increase in the sales tax at this time because it is inflationary and will cause hardship. All my colleagues are in thorough agreement with that. I am further opposed to it because it will impose hardships upon already over-burdened people in the lower income groups of our population and because it denies our people the advantages they should be getting from technological developments throughout the world.

As we go along we are inventing new methods of manufacturing, better materials, new types of machinery that can make things faster and cheaper than ever before in history, and yet the people of the country cannot have the advantages of this type of progress because the government insists on coming in and putting on such dreadful things as a pyramiding sales tax. Prices are going up and up, and continue to do so. They will continue to do so as long as we persist in following the present outmoded and foolish practices in our financial operations.

I am also opposed to what appears to be an inclination on the part of this government to convert as many direct taxes as they can into indirect and hidden taxes. That is not a sound thing to do. If the merchants of this country were to show the price of every article they sell to the public in two parts, the actual cost less tax on one side and the total taxes applying to the article in separate figures on the other side, which when added together would be the cost to the public, the people of this country would soon change the policy of the Minister of Finance. It might be a right good thing to have done.

There are very few up-to-date and comprehensive studies available to Canadians to inform them about the economic effects of the incidence of our various taxes. I have made quite a search in all the libraries I could contact and I have found that such studies are not common and are few in number. I think the government owes it to the people and to themselves to provide some money for the making of a thorough survey by competent students of our sales tax, income tax both corporate and personal, excise taxes and tariffs. The people of Canada have every right to this information, and certainly the legislators of Canada sorely need it if they are to do a good job of governing our country.

The special excise tax of 15 per cent on refrigerators, electric stoves, washing machines and certain other household electrical appliances is a discriminatory tax. Not only does it impose a higher cost of living on many people but it is also a discriminatory tax. It singles out especially young people who are just now trying to set up housekeeping. Goodness knows there have been enough impediments put in their way without having this discriminatory tax put upon them. What with sky-high prices for ordinary essentials, scarcity of building materials, lack of housing, high rents, and scores of other things, my gracious, anybody with half an eye can see that these young people should not be burdened any further. Anyway, I ask the minister: Why single out the electric stove, power washer and refrigerator and call them luxuries in this day when in many places, as was so well pointed out by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), there is no other choice? That is true of many places in Canada. These young people will be forced to pay $16 million more this year on these few items alone to get started in housekeeping than they would have had to pay last year. Does anyone say that the budget is not inflationary to them? Of course it is. As the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) says to me —this is the Liberal wedding present to our young Canadians.

Furthermore, can anybody justify a tax that discriminates against certain sections of the Canadian population? In my judgment no discriminatory tax can be justified in this or any other country. Here is one bit of revenue—it is only $16 million—that the government really did not need, so why did the minister not find some fairer way of limiting the use of scarce steel and other metals than this unfair way? He has budgeted for a surplus of $30 million.

I turn for a moment, Mr. Speaker, to the cost of living. Since I spoke in the debate on the cost of living early last week there have been fairly strong indications that organized labour, civil servants and others are beginning a drive for further wage increases to offset the recent great increases in the cost of living. The index for March shows a rise of 4·5 points over the index for February. As you will recall, the index for February showed an unprecedented rise over the index for January. Indications are now that the index may continue to rise further in the months ahead of us. Certainly the situation will not be improved if further wage increases are sought, no matter whether or not they are given. If wage increases are granted when they are sought then of course prices will soar again and inflation will become much more dangerous. If they are sought and not granted, then employer-labour relations may become strained to the point where production will suffer a decline, and that in itself would be a dangerous thing because it would intensify the effects of inflation.

Labour cannot be blamed for trying to survive in this crazy world, but I must say again that labouring men throughout Canada would be far better off if, instead of going all out after higher dollar incomes, they would spend their energies and capabilities trying to increase the purchasing power of their present incomes.

Mr. Blackmore: By bringing down prices.

Mr. Low: By bringing down consumer prices. They and everybody else would benefit that way, and we might possibly as a result begin to get away from this dog eat dog competition that threatens to destroy us and our economy. Putting sense—or cents—back into the Canadian dollar so as to bring back its purchasing power is the most important economic effort that anyone could be engaged in today. We have simply got to solve this terrible cost of living problem one way or another or it is going to destroy us, and that is not a pleasant prospect. It is the most pressing problem of this age. Every bit of useful information about the cost of living and the declining purchasing power problem that we can possibly accumulate, organize and place before the public ought to be made available to the people.

I am applying much of my efforts to this very problem, and I invite all other hon. members of the house to do likewise. On Monday, April 9, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar put on Hansard some very useful figures with respect to the cost of living. I was intrigued by them, and have studied them carefully. Since that time I have put them into short tabular form, and have extended them to show at a glance exactly how serious the decline has been in the actual purchasing power of personal incomes in Canada from 1946 to 1951. I compliment the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar for digging out these figures. They are available to everyone. They are simply compiled from dominion bureau of statistics figures quoted by the Bank of Canada in its statistical summary of February, 1951. I should like permission to put this short table on the record because, as I say, it is essential in the interests of progress that the people of Canada have before them all the facts and figures they can gather with respect to what inflation does to them and to their incomes. May I have permission?

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member permission?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Low: The table is as follows:

TABLE SHOWING SERIOUS DECLINE IN ACTUAL PURCHASING POWER OF PERSONAL INCOMES IN CANADA FROM 1946 TO 1951

Percentage decline—15·88% in five years.

This little table shows the Canada-wide picture. Oftentimes we hear just such exchanges as took place in the house today about one part of the country finding itself under more duress than another part of the country with respect to inspections, collections, and so on of income tax. It is often wise to take the dominion-wide picture and to break it down in order to show what the facts are in each of the provinces. I have done that, Mr. Speaker. I have broken down the figures in the table I have just put on Hansard to show exactly what the decline in the real purchasing power of personal incomes has been in each of the provinces. I am not going to ask to put them all on Hansard because it would take too much space. I have broken down the figures for the whole dominion to show what the increase in the cost of living index has done to the real purchasing power of personal incomes in my own province of Alberta as an example, and I should like to put it on record in this short tabular form in order to show what has happened in that province.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member permission?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Low: The table is as follows:

Figures from "National Accounts, Income and Expenditure 1942–1949" issued October 5, 1950 by Dominion Bureau of Statistics.

Personal Incomes includes salaries, wages, labour income, agricultural income, incomes of unincorporated businesses owned by individuals, interest, dividends, and rents.

Let me say here, Mr. Speaker, that the table I have just put on the record shows that, although the total personal money incomes of all the people of the province of Alberta increased from $521 million in 1942 to $879 million in 1949, and the per capita annual dollar incomes increased from $671 in 1942 to $1,009 in 1949, the real total purchasing power increased only from $445 million to $547 million. The per capita annual purchasing power rose only from $573 to $628. Just by a glance at these tables one can see what a terribly confiscatory effect the present inflationary situation has upon personal incomes, and it can be worked out in dollars and cents.

The present inflationary situation may be a world-wide condition, as the Minister of Finance says, but I can assure him it is no phenomenon. It is a serious indictment of the financial and economic policy being followed by this and other nations. Inflation, like unemployment, does not come about as a result of the appearance of some virus-spreading spots on the sun. It does not just happen. Inflation comes about as the direct result of policies that are laid down by men, and it can be cured only by other and better policies laid down by men who are determined to give the human resources of this and other countries the opportunity for development and growth which is their divine right. It is to that end, it seems to me, that we ought to direct our attention. It is to that end of providing opportunities for the fullest possible measure of individual development and progress that the Social Credit organization across Canada has directed its attention and efforts.

I think I cannot close with any better words than these. Unless we get down to business and solve this serious question of the cost of living and the declining value of the Canadian dollar that problem will destroy our economy, and with that destruction of our economy will go the destruction of our chances for liberty in the years to come.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. E. A. McCusker (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, tonight I should like to direct the attention of the house to a serious problem which is affecting Saskatchewan and to offer a solution to it. I refer to its loss of population. First, I should like to give a little of the history of its settlement; second, economic and other reasons that have led to the loss of population; and third, steps which should be taken to establish economic stability there so that we can retain and support our population.

About the turn of the century the settlement of the prairies started in real earnest. The tides of immigration from many nations flowed in, met and commingled. Racial traits, national antipathies and unknown tongues made slow the progress in welding these divergent people into a homogeneous community. But that amalgamation did take place, and today we have a united people in Saskatchewan.

In the great work of building up that country, many forces conspired to hasten this fusion taking place and none was more potent in influence than the opportunity given these people to work out their individual destinies under democratic institutions. Many of them for the first time experienced freedom there. These provinces were settled by young people from the maritimes, Quebec, Ontario, the United States, Great Britain, Ireland and many parts of Europe. They were the younger sons and daughters—the more venturesome—who sought opportunity in a new land. They brought from their countries little of worldly goods, but they brought a wealth of culture, ambition and determination. They quickly adapted themselves to the new life and to the hardships of pioneering, and built up that country. If you do not think that they have been assimilated and become good citizens, look at the honour rolls and read the names of those sons and daughters who served in two wars; look at the registration in the universities; look at the names of those taking part in the musical festivals. I am sure many of you were thrilled last night with the lovely voice of June Kowalchuk, of Regina, who sang in Toronto on the program "Singing Stars of Tomorrow" and won the first award. Look at the names of our athletes. In every part of the country you see the people who came there taking part in our activities.

After the first war our soldiers returned and helped us to build up that country. They had not been trained mechanically and industry in the east did not attract as much as it does today. Then came the recession with its economic upsets. Through drought our production was greatly reduced. Our herds had to be destroyed. We had no industry. Unwise marketing policies lost us our markets. I refer to the famous phrase "blasting our way into the markets". Our people started to leave. During the second world war our men were given mechanical and technical training in the armed forces. Those boys and girls not in the forces were attracted to eastern industry. They married and did not return. Upon their return from the war, our soldiers were absorbed in the industry of the east, for which they had been trained when they were in the army. In ten years we in Saskatchewan lost 98,000 people; that is, between the years 1936 and 1946. This was owing to unsatisfactory economic conditions caused by poor crops and lack of industrial employment due to lack of cheap hydroelectric power. Since 1946 we have regained 43,000 of our population; but once again manufacturing incidental to our defence preparations in the east is draining off our young and skilled people. The nature of our farming operations has changed and in this new mechanized age we employ fewer men. The disturbing feature of our agricultural situation today is that the farms are being operated by an older-age group who will leave no relatives on the land when the age of retirement is reached. What is the solution to this problem? The solution lies in irrigation and power development.

You will remember that in 1949, in the first session of this parliament, I spoke on the serious position that Regina and Moose Jaw found themselves in owing to lack of water. I explained the reason for this situation and outlined the measures which should be adopted to bring them relief. I am glad to say that my recommendations were accepted and that today the solution of that problem is in sight. With the irrigation and power development there will arise the important problem of soil conservation and water conservation.

You are aware that much of the poverty and desolation of the Mediterranean countries today is due to faulty soil and water conservation there in the past. As you come up the coast of the Mediterranean toward Tel Aviv you suddenly emerge from barren land and pass into a veritable paradise. This land has been reclaimed and put into productivity by irrigation. Today it is our duty to protect our land in Canada.

In southwestern Saskatchewan and in southeastern Alberta there is a large area which should have been retained for grazing; it was unwisely opened for settlement. This land cannot fully support the people now living upon it. The Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act has helped considerably in solving this problem, but much remains to be done. As irrigated land becomes available, many of the people will be moved off this land to which I have referred, and the rest will be able to support themselves by being given a greater acreage to till and graze. Near Lethbridge there is one area where, owing to irrigation, the population has increased 250 per cent in twenty years; and Lethbridge today is one of the most prosperous communities in Canada.

Irrigation is no longer an experiment. It has been tried and found successful in Alberta and in some parts of Saskatchewan. The project in Alberta will eventually develop 1,750,000 acres and in Saskatchewan 750,000 acres. In addition, the Saskatchewan project will develop 400 million kilowatt hours of saleable electric energy per annum, sufficient hydroelectric energy to supply the present needs of the province.

The South Saskatchewan river development project has been under study and in the public eye for a number of years, and the time has now arrived when we should proceed with its construction. It is necessary for all concerned to give their earnest attention to the place of this project in the national economy of Canada, and to study the data collected on all phases of the project from which a decision can be reached. A report covering all phases of this project has been tabled. It has been compiled by experts.

Many public references are made on the failure of irrigation projects in the past. Private companies such as the Canadian Pacific Railway have pioneered irrigation over forty years and it is from these experiences and similar ones in the United States that many lessons have been learned. It is now recognized by most governments that the total capital costs of the project should not be properly chargeable to the land. Experience in Alberta shows that the farmer alone does not benefit from the investment. Transportation companies, manufacturers, processing companies, distributors and business generally enjoy in total far greater benefits than the farmer.

By arrangement between federal and provincial governments, it is usually accepted that the federal government should stand the cost of impounding the water and that the provincial government should stand the cost of its distribution. The provincial government has the opportunity of recovering part of its expenditures by charges for water. The federal government usually regains its capital investment through increased revenues. Over a period of thirty-five years in the United States the government has recovered its entire investment in irrigation.

The history of irrigation has made it possible to assess the value of any new project and before the construction is undertaken the following factors must be studied.

We must ascertain whether (1) the water supply is adequate. That has been well established, I think. The South Saskatchewan river, through its tributaries, collects the run-off water from a large part of the east slope of the Rockies. There is sufficient water there to supply to the United States its share, to irrigate all the land in Alberta and Saskatchewan that is available for irrigation and have sufficient left over to supply the water power to develop this 400 million kilowatt hours of electric energy that I previously mentioned. It would also act as a reservoir and feed down the Saskatchewan river enough water to increase the potential hydro-electric production at Fort à la Corne by a hundred million a year.

(2) We must ascertain whether the climate and soil are suitable to assure much higher productivity on irrigated land than on dry land; (3) whether the project is feasible from an engineering standpoint; (4) we must ascertain whether farm units are of a size for economical and efficient production; (5) whether the financial burden placed on the farmers is light enough to permit better land use and to promote enterprise; and (6) whether the markets are sufficient to encourage development.

The South Saskatchewan river project has been studied in the light of the above factors. It has had the benefit of the experience of other projects in Canada and the United States. There is no water conservation project in Canada that has been so fully studied. A complete set of reports has been tabled in the House of Commons. The facts have been analysed by the most competent technical and engineering experts in Canada. In addition, the best consultants have been employed in Canada and the United States. They include Major General H. B. Ferguson, retired United States army engineer, Washington, District of Columbia, consulting engineer; Dr. A. Casagrande, graduate school of engineering, Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts, consultant on soil mechanics and foundation problems; Dr. J. A. Allan, consulting geologist, professor emeritus, university of Alberta, Edmonton, Alberta, consulting engineering geologist; and Dr. O. W. Israelsen, research professor of irrigation and drainage, Utah State Agricultural college, Logan, Utah, consulting engineer on irrigation and drainage problems.

In comparing the South Saskatchewan river project with Alberta and British Columbia projects, it must be remembered that the former is a multiple project of power and irrigation, whereas Alberta and British Columbia projects are mainly irrigation. Therefore, it is necessary to consider the South Saskatchewan river project on its merits.

In the report which was tabled all phases of this project were dealt with: climate, soil, engineering feasibility, economics of irrigation, power, recreation and other benefits. I am not going to review them tonight. The report has been tabled in the house and is available for the study of anyone who is interested.

The South Saskatchewan river project is in the heart of one of the driest parts of Saskatchewan. Its climate varies greatly and drought conditions occur periodically and cause tragic losses to the farmer, costly expenditures to governments, and the loss of purchasing power to business, both east and west. While these conditions occur periodically, yet this same area has produced hundreds of millions of dollars of wealth to Canada. This fact must not be forgotten. Therefore, it is in the interest of Canada to ameliorate the problems of drought and bring stability to agriculture. A reference to the situation in 1937 is a definite example: (a) Owing to drought it was necessary to ship into Saskatchewan over 500,000 tons of hay to maintain the livestock industry that year. This hay came from Ontario, Quebec and the United States and (b) shortage of grass and hay resulted in the forced marketing of over 480,000 head of cattle at ruinous prices, namely, one-half cent to one cent per pound. The whole livestock economy was upset. In addition, farmers lost their breeding herds and it has taken over fifteen years to build them up again.

With the development of the South Saskatchewan river project the drought problem would be greatly minimized and eventually we would have a permanent agriculture without the necessity of agricultural aid during drought periods.

The position can be emphasized further. In 1937, one crop district produced 600,000 bushels of grain, yet in 1942 the same crop district produced 92 million bushels of grain. Such a contrast is unbelievable. Yet this same area over a period of thirty-five years has produced an average of 40 million bushels per year. These facts in grain and livestock production point out the necessity of insurance against drought.

In order to develop this irrigation project, a dam must be built at Elbow on the South Saskatchewan river and a second one at the third meridian in the Qu'Appelle valley. The reservoirs thus created would extend 140 miles back in the Saskatchewan river and thirty miles down the Qu'Appelle valley. The powerhouse and spillway would be in Coteau creek. The use of power thus made available for industrial development of primary products will provide a great impetus for a more balanced economy.

The total cost of $102 million does not mean that all this money will be spent in Saskatchewan. At least half of it will be spent in Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver, where equipment and supplies are manufactured.

I want to review something of the employment that this project will give. In total there will be 26 million man-hours of on-site labour used during the period of construction. That means that in actual labour on the project it will provide employment for 1,500 men for a 200-day period per year for over 10 years. It is recognized that labour is required for defence construction now, and it may be said: defer the project construction until this need is met. The obvious answer is that for the first two years of construction little labour will be required in the preparatory stages. These two years of preparation are necessary in order to meet conditions when maximum work can be done in one year. The work can also be made flexible enough to shift work according to conditions. The two years of preparatory construction are essential in order to avoid delays at a later time. The same conditions apply to off-site labour in relation to industry. In other words, it would be a fallacy and poor business to delay construction until defence requirements are met. No nation can go wrong in developing and improving the productivity of the primary resources of land and water. Food is next to guns and ammunition and anything that is done to improve food production is a benefit to the nation. Production of food for export will eventually have to pay for the guns.

This project will not require essential war materials as the dam is to be constructed of earth. Much of the machinery needed for its construction is now in use on other projects in western Canada.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I should like to pay tribute to Dr. Thomson, director of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, and his able staff of engineers and consultants, from whose reports I have drawn heavily in the preparation of this address. I would ask the government and all hon. members earnestly to study the evidence which has been tabled, so that they may satisfy themselves as to the necessity and urgency of this project.

I would ask hon. members to consider the desirability of stabilizing the economy of a province which, in the past, has attracted, developed and given to the service of Canada parliamentarians such as Nicholas Flood Davin; Mr. Motherwell, former minister of agriculture; Mr. Dunning, former minister of finance; Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner, Minister of Agriculture; such legal minds as Mr. Justice Turgeon, Mr. Justice Martin and Mr. Justice Brown who have served so often and so well on many important commissions; such representatives in external affairs as the same Judge Turgeon, and the incomparable Judge T. C. Davis; such engineers as General Andrew McNaughton, of our international joint commission; Dr. C. J. Mackenzie, chairman of the national research council; such medical men as Dr. George Ferguson, whose pioneering work in the field of tuberculosis has brought health to thousands of our people and fame to this country; the late Dr. Blair, who contributed so much to the treatment of cancer, and whose cancer clinics in Regina and Saskatoon are models of their kind.

I would suggest that if there still remain some doubts in the minds of the government as to the necessity and feasibility of this project, they seek the advice of some of the men I have just mentioned.

Mr. W. G. Blair (Lanark): Mr. Speaker, the speeches this afternoon in the debate on the budget were devoted mainly to financial matters. I intend to introduce a new subject tonight, the consideration of the great dairy industry of Canada.

However, before entering upon the subject of my speech, for the information of the house I should like to read some of the propaganda that I found in an old pamphlet put out sixty years ago by the dairy people in the Department of Agriculture. Some of the expressions we may consider peculiar, but I think they will be found interesting. The pamphlet deals with the export of cheese, and goes on to say:

> Exports of cheese from Canada exceeded in value total exports of cheese from the United States. Soil, climate, cattle, transportation facilities in Canada are admirably adapted for the prosecution of successful dairy farming.
> The dominion government has established experimental dairy stations in different parts of Canada, and the provincial governments manage travelling dairies and dairy schools for the education of those interested in that branch of farming.
> There are over 1,500 co-operative cheese factories and creameries in Canada. In most of the provinces there are excellent opportunities for intelligent farmers with some means to make dairy farming pay well.

And hon. members will note the reference to "some means".

There are great areas of unoccupied fertile land in the Canadian northwest and in the older provinces of Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, Manitoba and British Columbia. Improved farms can be purchased in the neighbourhood where all the snug conveniences of life may be enjoyed.

That was the propaganda sixty years ago —the mention of the snug conveniences of life.

Free farms of 160 acres can be obtained in the Canadian northwest. For information apply to the Department of the Interior, Ottawa, Canada, or to James Anderson, suite 509, Stock Exchange Building, Chicago, Illinois.

I like that homey expression about the snug conveniences. Tonight I am going to discuss the dairy industry of Canada as one might find it in my own county, the county of Lanark. I am well acquainted with the farming district in the county of Lanark, and a large part of that county is peculiarly adapted to dairy farming.

Lanark has been recognized for years as an important centre in the dairy industry in Canada, especially in cheese production. The land is suitable for this type of industry. It has large areas of pasturage, well watered, and has fertile valleys capable of raising crops for the winter feeding of stock. For over sixty years Lanark has been closely associated with the production of cheese, especially cheddar cheese for export and for domestic consumption.

Cheese is produced mainly in the months from May 1 to the middle of November, and factories are closed during the winter months. There is practically no winter cheese manufactured during the winter season. Dairy farming is an occupation which requires long hours of hard work—not even a six-day week. Even on Sundays the cows must be milked and cared for; milk must be pasteurized and cooled in order that it may reach the market in good condition the following day.

Not only that, the dairy herd requires constant care and supervision and it takes years to build up a good dairy herd and to secure high production. But there is another fact that is very apparent, and that is that better breeding has lessened the immunity to diseases of cattle, such as tuberculosis, and so on, and has left the high-grade herd owner liable to serious financial losses, if his herd should become infected. In addition to the purchase price of high-producing dairy herds, there is the cost of maintenance of equipment, barns, silos and so on, as well as labour. The overall cost of production makes dairy farming an expensive proposition.

Dairying is one of the most important industries in Canada. Almost 450,000 farmers are dependent upon the receipts from the dairy industry as a source of income. The industry provides two million Canadians with either all or part of their livelihood, and this includes those engaged in the production, processing and distribution, as well as those supplying various services and equipment. It contributes more than $600 million annually to our national commerce. As a source of income, the products of dairy cattle rank first in farm income. In addition to milk and its products, 40 per cent of the beef and 60 per cent of the veal consumed by Canadians are products of dairy cattle. Food is of course the main product. Bottled milk, butter, cream, cheese, ice cream, powdered milk, evaporated milk and many other types of food are provided by the dairy herds. Health authorities point out the value of dairy products as one of the most essential foods.

Dr. L. B. Pett of the nutrition division of the Department of National Health and Welfare has stated that no type of food is more important to health and good nutrition than milk products, and that no type of food will receive greater emphasis in the future of Canada and the rest of the world. Milk is regarded as the perfect food. Nutritionists point out that dairy products supply 81 per cent of the calcium required for the human body, 57 per cent of the riboflavin, 17 per cent of vitamin A and other equally important vitamins. One pint of milk per day will provide an adult with 93 per cent of the minimum requirement of calcium, 83 per cent of riboflavin, and high percentages of other necessary vitamins. The Canadian housewife spends 20 cents of every dollar for milk and dairy products, but in return she gets more than one-third of all the nutrients she feeds her family.

I was rather pleased that the hon. member who preceded me brought up the question of conservation because conservation is closely associated with the dairying industry. We are now spending millions of dollars each year on conservation and we are constantly being warned about exhausting our soil and water and so on. Two years ago this house passed a bill dealing with conservation, while in Ontario a select committee of the legislature brought in an important report after it had studied the matter for months.

This is a most important subject which covers a wide range. It has to do with the control of rivers and streams and the building of dams; it has to do with replanting trees which have been cut from our hillsides and forests, but the important part of conservation is that concerning the proper use of the soil because so many things are dependent on it. A million dollar dam will be of little use if the soil is eroded and the rivers and lakes fill up. What was formerly good farming land will then become desert and will have to be abandoned as far as agriculture is concerned.

I said that there was an important relationship between conservation and the dairying industry. The raising of livestock provides the best and cheapest method of putting back into the soil most of the good which the raising of crops has taken from it. Good dairy farms do not become worn out and useless. A well balanced dairying program returns the refuse from the dairy barn to the land, plus the necessary commercial fertilizer. A competent dairy farmer keeps up the fertility of his land; he builds up his land, he does not destroy it.

It is interesting to note that after years of cropping a pasturage will not likely have those ingredients which will provide the quantity of mineral foods and vitamins which are necessary and which may affect the health of our population. There is no use talking conservation if we allow farmers continually to crop off their land, to cut down their wood lots in an effort to make a living for their families, without restoring and revitalizing the soil. Such a policy is little short of national suicide.

The place to start organizing conservation is on the farms, and the way to do that is to do something to stop the water running off the fields, to conserve moisture and to prevent erosion which is constantly increasing. In order to do this we require first-class farmers with up-to-date methods. You cannot expect a discouraged farmer to practise this kind of farming. As I have said there must be a healthy dairying industry in order to preserve the land. This dairying industry should not be made up of discouraged farmers. It should be an industry which will give an adequate return for the investment; it should be an industry which will stop soil exhaustion and thereby aid soil conservation.

The link between the dairy industry and conservation cannot be too strongly emphasized. One cannot expect under present-day conditions that the dairy farmer will show much interest in conservation. He is much more likely to mine his soil to the limit in an effort to produce as cheaply as he can, and then when the soil is non-productive to move on to some other land or into the town or city where we have our program of development and industrialization. Factory wages and shorter hours will look more attractive to a chap when he is discouraged with prices and competition.

In the long-term view we can therefore visualize abandoned farms unless there is a future for the dairying industry much brighter than exists now. It is possible to see abandoned farms in Ontario at the present time. I am sure that many hon. members have been in localities in Ontario where farms have been abandoned.

I come now to some of the factors which adversely affect the dairying industry. It is true that the farmers have a high-priced market for their export milch cows. During the past year approximately half a million live cattle were shipped to the United States, an increase of 40,000 over 1949. It is true that there are high current prices for almost everything that can be turned into hamburger meat. At one time the dairy farmer looked on the raising of cattle as a side line, but now the situation is reversed and most farmers look on milk as a side line. They are selling many of their calves, heifers and older animals. It is a poor calf that will not bring $35, and even an old bull will bring $400 or $500 for hamburger meat. He can sell any kind of animal that is considered to be beef at what were hitherto unheard of prices.

The export market for purebred dairy animals, even the poorest, has been exceptionally good. The net result is that the man raising dairy cows has not had to bother too much about his milk cheques. It is paying him more to let the calves run with the cows than send his milk to the manufacturing plant at something over $2 per hundred pounds, which was the 1950 price for milk used in the production of cheese and butter. The farmer has to live and he certainly cannot with what he gets from his milk. On the average farm this price means keeping four or five cows for a whole day in order to get $2. If a farmer has no other revenue he would show a loss in his books for last year's operations.

It is interesting to note some of the figures obtained as a result of a cost of production survey carried on by the Ontario department of agriculture in connection with the dairy herd improvement association. These figures were given by Dr. H. R. Patterson at the Ontario cheese producers meeting in Toronto last January. The experiment was carried out in Lanark county.

The figures show that between May 1, 1949, and April 30, 1950, the average dairyman in the Lanark association lost $147 on his milk production. The association is made up of twenty-four members, of whom twenty-two are cheese producers. The average production per cow in the twenty-four herds which average eighteen cows each was 7,675 pounds of milk. This accounted for those cows which were milked for ten months or longer. The average total revenue from milk was $3,052, while the cost of production totalled $3,199. The average cost of producing one hundred pounds of milk was $2.83. Dr. Patterson stated that the results showed that labour and feed costs made up from 75 to 80 per cent of the total cost of producing milk. The average man-hours required to produce a pound of butter was 0·4 hours.

In this survey by Dr. Patterson he allowed the farmer 50 cents an hour for his work. This is less than what the most unskilled labour any place in Canada would receive. He pointed out one peculiar fact which came to light in his survey. That is the amount of pasture which was available. This shows that all the pastures are not being utilized for dairy purposes, or even for the purpose of raising stock, when there is so much land available for it.

I come now to the matter of competition from other products affecting the dairy industry, and I refer especially to margarine. Let there be no misunderstanding. I am not unaware of the high prices paid by consumers for foodstuffs in Canada, nor do I blame any householder for purchasing margarine as a substitute. In view of the high price of butter you cannot blame the householder for buying margarine. I admit the food value of margarine as a spread under these conditions. Any criticism of this dairy substitute is apt to draw a barrage of words by way of letters to newspapers and editorials with the usual remark—

Mr. Harris (Danforth): It should carry a tax.

Mr. Blair: —namely, why should the Canadian people be deprived of this nutritious product? Very few of these people have any knowledge of or experience in the dairy industry. They seem totally unaware that the industry provides work for two million people. I am also aware of the fact that Canadian farmers are purchasing margarine. It is not my intention to enter into any argument regarding this product as a food, but rather from the economic standpoint. The vegetable oils used in the main products which are replacing Canadian dairy products—

Mr. Cruickshank: And whale oil.

Mr. Blair: —are almost entirely of foreign origin. The water—and I learned that water forms a substantial part of some of these products—and the salt are Canadian. It is also true that we might be able to build up a Canadian-produced oil industry from soya beans, rape seed or sunflower seed, but we know what it costs to produce oil this way. Few farmers would be foolish enough today to turn over a large acreage to these products, and at the same time have hanging over their heads the constant threat of further price reductions in foreign and more cheaply produced vegetable oils.

We must remember that the duty on edible oils produced within the empire was reduced from 13 per cent to nil about a year ago, and this is not the end. An application before the tariff board to hear an appeal launched by Canada Packers against a ruling of the Department of National Revenue has been postponed. That hearing was to be held on the 12th of March. The hearing concerns the fact that processed cotton oil and soya bean oil shipped in mixed loads in tank cars are dutiable at 20 per cent ad valorem but raw oils are subject to 10 per cent a ton. As I said, the hearing has been postponed, but it would indicate that the manufacturers of margarine are not willing to process these oils in Canada and want to bring them in already refined.

At the time parliament removed the duty on edible oils coming from empire countries there was little reaction from the dairy industry. At that time margarine was made from cottonseed and soya bean oils imported from the United States but in the last nine months of 1950, according to reports of the dominion bureau of statistics, over five and a half million pounds of coconut oil used in margarine were imported. In 1939 this type of oil could be purchased for 6·1 cents per pound.

Kreamy Wip is a new product being produced in Canada which is sold largely to the baking trade. It has a vegetable oil base, with possibly some skim milk or skim milk powder added, but no natural cream. This product has replaced hundreds of thousands of quarts of medium cream yearly, and for some dairies that means quite a high percentage of all the cream formerly sold. The product is being used by the baking trade to replace whipped cream used in such things as cream puffs, topping for pies, cakes, et cetera. This means another big market has been lost for milk producers. The oil product sells at a little more than half the price of natural cream.

In a few cities in the United States they allow a product to be sold today that resembles milk and is sold to replace it, but which is actually only skim milk fortified with vegetable oils to replace the cream which has all been removed. This product replaces whole milk for drinking. In many of the states vegetable oils are allowed to replace natural cream in ice cream mixes. It does not seem fair that Canadian dairymen should have to meet this type of competition. I should like to give you a set of figures which are authentic. I obtained them from the national dairy council, and while there may be some small changes I believe they are correct. The first has to do with the butter production in Canada. The table is as follows:

Total Butter Production in Canada

	Creamery	Dairy	Total
1948	285,629	62,845	348,474
1949	279,805	52,852	332,457
1950	262,500*	50,000*	312,500*

* Estimated.

Mr. Gardiner: Are these figures pounds?

Mr. Blair: These figures are thousands of pounds. Butter production in Canada in 1950 was nearly 36 million pounds lower than in 1948. Now we come to the consumption of creamery butter in Canada. The figures are as follows:

Consumption of Creamery Butter in Canada
(000's lbs.)

1950	276,959

Consumption of creamery butter in Canada in 1950 was nearly 30 million pounds lower than 1948. Then I come to figures dealing with farm cash income from dairying in Canada. The table is as follows:

Farm Cash Income from Dairying in Canada

1950	(estimated)	323,993,000

That is as close as the figures could be obtained. Farm cash income from dairying in 1950 was $62·5 million less than in 1948. Then I come to margarine production. The figures are as follows:

Margarine Production

1950	94,032,000 lbs.

I wish to remind hon. members that there are two provinces in Canada where the sale of margarine is not permitted. Then I come to margarine consumption. The figures are as follows:

Margarine Consumption

1950	93,648,000 lbs.

Consumption of margarine in 1950 increased 21·7 million pounds or 30 per cent over the 1949 total. Now we come to the total production of milk in Canada. The figures are as follows:

That is down 2·7 per cent but it amounts to nearly half a billion pounds. One cannot help but draw certain conclusions from a study of these figures. The effect of foreign vegetable oils on our Canadian economy cannot be considered as an immediate problem alone. The end of it is not in sight. It constitutes a permanent threat to the Canadian dairy industry, and I cannot see that the industry can control this threat until such time as we decide to exercise control over this unfair competition. Consumers and organized labour and its leaders should give consideration to this whole matter of dairy substitutes. It must be conceded that there is an appeal in cheap food in this time of high living costs; yet should we accept the policy of cheap food at any cost? Should we demand cheap food and cheap dairy products at the cost of jobs and unemployment.

One must take the long-term view of this matter. There seems to be an attitude on the part of some people of not wanting to compare the prices of dairy products with those of other commodities. High prices do exist in other commodities, both foods and manufactured goods, and they cause hardship; but dairy products are expected by the public to be sold at levels lower than those of other commodities. We must remember that the 350,000 to 400,000 dairy farmers, together with their families and all the people from whom they buy, consume large quantities of manufactured products. We cannot afford to have the income of that large group of people so reduced that their buying power will be impaired. We frequently hear it said, even by some in the dairy industry itself, that this industry should adjust its prices to meet this type of competition, that is, to meet competition on a price basis and fight vegetable oils in that way. Under present conditions this is utterly impossible. The present mark-up, wholesale and retail, of profits on vegetable oil is five or six times as high as on dairy products. It would be possible for the vegetable oil manufacturers to reduce their prices considerably and still make a profit. If dairy farm producers tried to meet this competition on a price basis their income would be so reduced that within a few months we would have serious unemployment in that industry. Under present conditions the producers of milk and cream, as a group, are expected to meet the competition of the lowest priced foreign products. Our fiscal policy should be based on protection for Canadian workers against lower priced goods from other lands. If workers in other industries were asked to produce at prices which would compete with goods from all other countries, many of our largest industrial plants would be put out of business. Workers in other industries are asking and getting higher wages and tariff and other protection, but the dairy farmer is expected to meet foreign competition.

This brings up another interesting point, the question of monopoly. One great company, with ramifications extending all over the world, is dominant in the world's edible oil industry. That company has plants in Canada, and is very much to the fore in the vegetable oil and margarine field. It can bring these oils by ocean-going tankers into the very heart of our manufacturing centres. It can buy them in the cheapest markets where they are produced under conditions we would not tolerate in Canada. At present it can bring quantities of these oils into Canada without having to pay any tariff whatsoever. If the price of United States oils, which are being used so much at present, gets out of line with the oils from empire countries, this firm would be in a position to dominate the Canadian edible oil industry and could dominate the great Canadian dairy industry on which hundreds of thousands of Canadians are dependent. This is one situation to think over when we hear so much talk these days about monopolies.

There are certain questions which come to mind when we give consideration to this question. How much employment does the whole margarine industry give to Canadians? What has become of the promise to use Canadian-produced oils? What effort is being made to interest farmers in growing the necessary plants? When this issue was debated in the Senate one of the great talking points was the establishment of a new industry for Canadian farmers. How is this going to end? What is going to be the ultimate effect on the dairy industry? Are we going to accept the position of an importing country in the world in so far as dairy products are concerned?

According to the brief of the federation of agriculture, recently presented to the cabinet, milk production is down about 8 per cent in the past five years. This amount is something more than would have been exported before it could be assumed that Canada is self-sufficient in dairy production. In the meantime the Canadian population has increased by about one and a half million persons, with the result that Canada, which is now a dairy product importing country, brought in some seven million pounds of cheese, five million pounds of butter, and considerable quantities of milk powder. It does seem a disgrace that Canada should be importing dairy products.

There was a time when the making of cheese for export was a great industry. Now we even import cheese. Some six or eight million pounds of New Zealand cheese was imported in November 1950. This was sold at 34 cents to the processors, or several cents more than our home-made Canadian cheese. Importers claimed that New Zealand cheese was required for processing as a result of government buying policy. Stocks of new Canadian cheese were abnormally low. Cheese was requisitioned in Canada for British export, but we could not fulfil our bargain. It is difficult for Canadian cheese producers to understand why their product was requisitioned at 28 cents and New Zealand cheese was brought in to retail at a higher price. About 70 per cent of all the cheese eaten in Canada is some variety of processed cheese. The processed cheese firms, many of them subsidiaries of large American firms, have obtained a hold on the market in Canada. They buy cheddar cheese at the domestic market price, or in the case of the New Zealand cheese at 34 cents, grind it, heat it, add some color, then sell it in packages for 65 to 70 cents a pound. The sales of processed cheese were high, and it was a case of cutting sales or buying new cheese outside of Canada. Certainly if the export price of cheddar cheese is not better than last year, there will be little for export.

Before the Easter recess we had a debate on the wheat contract and the government saw fit to reimburse the western wheat growers to the extent of $65 million. I point out that other branches of agriculture have also suffered under similar circumstances. It would seem only fair that they also should receive compensation. Ontario and Quebec had millions of pounds of cheese requisitioned at prices below those of the United States at the time. The producer was deprived of his domestic market and the requisitioned price was below the cost of production. The producer had no option but to sell to the government. When discussing the further amount payable to the wheat farmers the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said in the debate that the wheat farmers had "expectations". Apparently the cheese producers, after producing at a loss, were not considered to have "expectations".

Our cow population is almost half a million less than in 1945 according to the dominion bureau of statistics, but Canada's population has increased by a million and three-quarters since 1945. The human population has increased and the cow population has decreased. Prices paid by farmers in Ontario for feed have increased. Higher feed costs, higher wages and shortage of help on dairy farms, competition from cheap foreign oils, low prices for dairy surpluses, all are forcing the farmers to cut down production. Lack of production is now forcing upward the price of products like butter.

Then again, there is the episode of the New Zealand butter. Under the ruling of the government approximately five million pounds of New Zealand butter was imported for the Canadian market. This butter was priced at 56½ cents per pound at seaport, while the floor price of butter was 53 cents per pound. This is another matter of difficult competition for Canadian dairymen. But when, owing to shortages of butter, the price per pound reached a high of 82 cents, the price of margarine was raised without any reason or provocation whatever. The Canadian consumer suffered at the hands of the interests controlling margarine. And yet we have in Canada a great dairy industry unable to support its own domestic needs or unable to fulfil an export contract which is a skeleton of our former export trade.

We are now building up our defences against the danger of communist aggression, and we must organize our economy so that we can make the greatest possible contribution to the Atlantic pact. It is just as important that agriculture be organized in any campaign for preparedness or actual war, as it is that there be organization of manpower and industry. This was proved in the last war when Canadian agriculturists produced food for the allies, and it was one of the outstanding features of our war effort. Even then, when controls were first instituted, the price of farm products was not on a level with that of other commodities.

Conditions have changed since 1939. Then there were surpluses, manpower problems, and prices were depressed. Farmers were anxious to get into high production. It was simply a matter of telling farmers the requirements and to fix their prices. The result was that in the ten years from 1939 to 1948 we exported food products to help feed our army and our allies. We exported over a billion pounds of cheese, half a billion pounds of evaporated milk, over six million pounds of milk powder, and practically supplied the entire British ration for bacon. We exported nearly seven hundred million pounds of bacon in 1944 alone.

If we had kept up such exports after the war, to help relieve famine in Europe and Asia, we might not be in the position in which the world finds itself today. Hungry people are open to the propaganda of communism.

What is the position of agriculture in 1951? With the single exception of wheat we have no surpluses of food. It would require a tremendous amount of reorganizing to start to feed our allies, in comparison with the situation in 1939. In one year alone, 1942, we sent Britain 150 million pounds of cheese. It is doubtful if we could send 35 million pounds this coming year. There is no available manpower for farms, and dairy farmers require men who have had some training in the occupation. Surplus cattle, and surplus hogs, on which to start building, do not exist. Owing to the demand for export cows, and the high prices paid for meat, our stock has been depleted. Inflation has priced our products out of the market. Cheese and milk producers cannot produce at a world price and live and buy at inflated prices in Canada.

I remember an interview that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) gave to the Canadian Press when he landed in Montreal after his last trip to England, in which he stated that he cannot conceive of Britain offering prices high enough to stimulate extra production. He stated that the British would like to buy Canadian products but that they are not willing to pay the current domestic market prices in Canada and the United States.

In the event of war, the food production in this country would be in a deplorable state in relation to that which would rightfully be expected of us as a member of the Atlantic pact. If we attempt to plan anything like the amount of food required in the last war, much reorganization will be required before it can become available. It would require two or three years before cows could produce milk products, and hogs for bacon could be provided. This brings us to two alternatives. Are we going to start now in the hope of getting necessary production in two or three years, or will it be necessary in the event of war tomorrow to commence rationing and to reduce the standard of living at a time when we are calling for our greatest effort?

Under the Atlantic pact I believe that one of our greatest contributions would be food. In any war, or preparation for war, full production of agricultural products rates in importance with guns or aeroplanes. As part of our defence plans of the future we cannot afford to let the great dairy industry deteriorate, but it must be maintained as a great national industry providing employment and food for our own people and for our allies.

Mr. W. F. Carroll (Inverness-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to spend much time on the budget proposals as such. Everybody knows why we are greeted with a budget asking for higher taxation. As every person knows, that higher taxation is to be applied to our defences, in order to preserve peace in the world. I do not think there is anybody either within sound of my voice or across the broad dominion who is not pleased with the present government for having done what they are doing in the matter of defence and economic planning.

I want to say that the criticism made by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) was moderate and fair, as was also that of the leaders of the other parties. One thing about which some of them were perturbed was that in their opinion we were asking for too much, that we were asking to impose taxes that would give us $200 million or $300 million of a surplus this coming year. I would hope that it would be better for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) to budget for a surplus than for a deficit; because if anything should happen, we shall have the money to spend, and I myself have confidence that the minister will spend this surplus, if there is any, to the advantage of Canada.

All those who have spoken congratulated the minister on the work he put on the budget and the wonderful presentation he made. One of the leaders—and I think it was the leader of the Social Credit group—almost came across the floor of the house to hug the minister; and he thereby brought forcibly to my attention the old saying, "beware of the Greeks when they bring you gifts." If the minister knowingly and consciously did the things of which he was accused by the leader of the Social Crediters, he should not be loved or admired, and it should not be said that he is a good minister of finance. I am not going to congratulate the Minister of Finance on the budget. We on this side of the house knew that he would give us a good one. I do not think it is a place for congratulations at all; because everything the Minister of Finance does in the realm in which he is working is always good; and I do not think we should pick out this one particular thing on which to congratulate him.

As I said, the higher taxation of this budget is for the purpose of Canada's defence in order to avert war. The question arises here, and different opinions have been expressed by the Minister of Finance and those on the other side of the house who criticized the budget, as to the effect the budget is going to have on inflation. It is a question which is worthy of consideration and worthy of argument. So far as I am concerned, I am willing to adopt the opinion of the Minister of Finance in regard to inflation and what effect the budget will have on inflation. Nothing definite can be said about it on either side.

There are of course many theoretical economists in the country today who bring forth various ideas which are sometimes dreamy, sometimes hazy and sometimes without a real basis of foundation. I always think that we should abide by, live up to and try to follow the natural laws of economy rather than be led away by the theoretical people whose ideas have never been put into practice and who do not know what the result may be in the end. That is all that I am going to say on the budget as such.

A great deal has been said by the public and in this house to some extent about the situation in my native province of Nova Scotia. For years and years, up to about fifteen years ago, we in Nova Scotia blamed all our ills, or many of us in Nova Scotia blamed all our ills and all of our depressed areas, on the fact that we had confederation. There is no more distorted argument that could be made than that any of our ills were due to the fact that we entered confederation. There was a political propaganda started in Nova Scotia before confederation became a fact. It was followed up after confederation became a fact, and by very able men who prejudiced the minds of the public and the minds of the mass of the people of Nova Scotia against confederation. They succeeded in doing that; they succeeded in advising the people of Nova Scotia that confederation was no good to us; that it was better for us to get out of the country; that we could get nowhere because we would be overwhelmed by Quebec and Ontario.

This was purely political propaganda, Mr. Speaker, because the man who took the greatest part in the leadership of this propaganda was one of the men who first talked about the confederation of the British provinces in North America. And strange to say, after a few years, men of that calibre who had decried confederation and advised the people of Nova Scotia not only to get out of confederation but to leave the province, accepted high office in the government of Sir John A. Macdonald. After a time this prejudice seemed to become subdued, but in 1883 an election took place in Nova Scotia, and that election was on the issue of confederation, to get away from confederation, to make us a separate government entity in this country, in other words secession. The election was won on that basis. After the election nothing was done about it of course, and the gentleman who won the election afterwards came to this house as minister of finance in a dominion government, and a very able minister of finance he was. Still, down the years there was that same preaching amongst certain people in Nova Scotia against confederation, and it is only a very few years ago that the people of Nova Scotia made up their minds that they had enough of this stuff. They made up their minds that they were a people who would get along well in confederation, and there has been a wonderful change in the province of Nova Scotia in the last twenty or twenty-five years in that regard.

It is said that one of the results of confederation is that it took away from us our industries, our banks and so on and so forth. There was a movement of the banking institution of this country shortly after confederation, but it did not take away the banking institutions from the province of Nova Scotia. As a matter of fact, in every village, in every small town in Nova Scotia today we have branches of the various banking institutions of this country.

Then they say that it took away our industries. No, confederation had nothing to do with taking away our industries. Some industries were built in Nova Scotia before confederation. When confederation came the people who owned those industries saw that they could sell their stock in those industries, close up the industries and get their capital back, plus a splendid profit. That had nothing to do with confederation. It was the selfishness of our own people that caused this change in the industries of Nova Scotia.

Then, they talk about the days of the wooden ships and iron men. Yes, we had a wonderful shipbuilding industry in the province of Nova Scotia. The ships that were built there traded in the markets of the world, and it was a splendid outlet; but the time came when the people who were instrumental in building up these institutions, and many of them making fortunes out of them, did not have the vision, the foresight, to see that the end of wooden ships was at hand and that henceforth they would be made of steel. They did not have the vision and the foresight to see the trend of the time, of sails giving way to steam. The very first ship that crossed the Atlantic under its own steam was built in Montreal. I think it was called Prince William.

They put their money in their socks, or in some other place. They did not re-invest it in anything, and their children, their grandchildren and their great-grandchildren no doubt are having a fairly good time on it today.

A moment ago I mentioned those who were interested in industry in Nova Scotia selling out their industries for their own selfish purposes, because they were getting their capital expenditure plus a very good profit. The industries were taken over by competitors in the central provinces. I should like to point out to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the house, the fact that there are some industries in Nova Scotia. There were some men in Nova Scotia who were true to their province, who had the welfare of the province at heart. I have only to look across the floor of the house—and I am not sure that he is now in his seat—to see the hon. member for Colchester-Hants (Mr. Stanfield) whose father and grandfather built up in Nova Scotia one of the finest and one of the most competitive industries in Canada.

If the other people who are engaged in industry had done the same as those who were engaged in that splendid industry at Truro—and I am referring to the Stanfields —we would not be complaining today about having no industries in Nova Scotia. I am bringing those facts to your attention, Mr. Speaker, and through you to the house, to indicate to hon. members and the country that I at least do not think that confederation injured Nova Scotia. I do not think that Quebec and Ontario stole anything from us. But I do think certain people in Nova Scotia who decried confederation for years did discourage the inhabitants of that province from trying to do anything for themselves.

Something has been said in this debate about decentralization of industry; much has been said both in the east and the west about that same subject. If in Canada today we have a defence industry, then I am all for spreading it around, both to the east and to the west, when the work can be done as well and within reasonable reach of the manufacturing price in central Canada. I say that under those circumstances it should be distributed both east and west. But I for one think it is an absolutely wrong idea, an impossible idea, to urge decentralization of industry as such, outside the defence industries.

There is only one party in the house that can discuss logically this question, and that is the C.C.F. I am not saying they are right or that they are wrong. The only political party in the house whose object is to nationalize our industries is the C.C.F.—and again I am not saying they are wrong. Indeed I expressed some very bold opinions some years ago on that very subject. But they are the people who can talk about the decentralization of industry, because if they came into power they are the only people who would put into effect the methods by which industry could be decentralized. I am not criticizing them for that at all; I have nothing at all to say about it.

But when I hear a good Liberal or a good Conservative, or a bad Liberal or a bad Conservative, talking about decentralization of industry in this country, then I say they are talking against their own better judgment, and talking in favour of a thing they would not dare talk about outside the political realm.

How can this thing be brought about? At the present time and under our present conditions in Canada, it is just as well to talk about striking the rock of Gibraltar and knocking it into the sea with a pebble as it is for this government to talk about the decentralization of industry in Canada. Why? All industries in Canada are within the jurisdiction of local legislatures; and until the dominion government, either on account of war or for some other reason or because of the coming to power of the C.C.F., takes that power, there will be no way of decentralizing industry.

It is said that a good friend in Ontario—I believe it was the premier, who is a splendid type of Canadian—made a statement at a dominion-provincial conference to the effect that it would be a good thing if that conference, as part of its work, would consider ways and means of bringing about a more evenly distributed industrial development. Well, about two weeks after Mr. Frost made that statement there was sent abroad in this country, to the United States and to England a booklet showing an ambitious program of the Ontario government. No one blames them for that. It indicated what marvellous industries they have in that province, what marvellous opportunities there were for new industries, and stood as an invitation to all and sundry who wanted to start new industries to do so in Ontario.

I do not know whether the premier of Quebec has made comment about decentralization of industry; but, whether he did or not, certainly they are not showing much effort along that line in that province, because today they are advertising to the world their waterpower facilities, their labour and everything else they have, in order to get new industries. So much for that.

We have a splendid steel industry in Sydney, with ramifications throughout the country. Up until four or five years ago it is my humble opinion that that industry was not giving the service to this country it should have been giving, by way of fabrication of small steelware and the like. I believe at the present time however that the management of that industry, presided over by Mr. Forsyth, who is an ambitious Canadian, a progressive Canadian, and a Canadian who wants to do the best for Nova Scotia and the industry with which he is connected, will bring about a condition whereby we may expect better things. Today and for the last year they have had all the orders for raw steel they wanted, and all they could fill. I noticed some time ago, in a Canadian Press dispatch, where the president of that organization had said that plans were under consideration for the expansion of finished steel products facilities, and made the further statement that such plans required a lot of technical study before one could talk in terms of specific undertakings. It is too bad those technical studies were not made ten or fifteen years ago, rather than at this late date. Personally however I have absolute confidence in the Dominion Steel Corporation of today, so far as its management is concerned. I know they will do all they can to bring to the forefront and to improve that steel industry. An organization representing the steel workers and the coal miners came to see the government some time ago and I hope pointed out to the government some of the things that might be done in the way of fabrication of steel by the Dominion Steel Corporation.

A day or so ago I had something to say in this house about the establishment of a steel plant upon the shores of Canso strait. After I went out of the house a friend of mine, not from Nova Scotia, said, "Bill, you must be crazy." I said, "I don't know, I think perhaps I have always been crazy." As an example of my insanity he referred to my suggestion to establish a steel mill on the shores of Canso strait. I was not crazy, although it may be a dream. I am not asking the government to build this steel plant; all I am asking is that they give it the same assistance that they gave to other steel plants in the basic stages. Between Point Tupper, the terminus of the Canadian National Railways, and Port Hawkesbury there is in my humble opinion—I am not an industrialist, I am not the son of an industrialist nor am I the father of an industrialist—the finest site for a steel mill that can be found in Canada, if not on the continent.

Why do I say that? The strait of Canso is 600 miles from Seven Islands, which is the terminus of the railroad from the Ungava iron ore field. That is over 750 miles from Montreal, and as you go along the St. Lawrence it is further still. Unless the St. Lawrence waterway is built overnight I would think that the iron ore boats from Seven Islands to Montreal or further up will have a hard time navigating the river. There is all kinds of deep water in the strait. There is an absolute supply of good coal from which could be generated the power to operate the steel mill. The other facilities necessary for an iron mill are available.

There is open water all the year round on the south side of Port Hawkesbury right through to the Atlantic. We would be close to Saint John where they are fabricating steel today and it would be nearer than any other point I know of to Toronto, Montreal and Hamilton which could be reached during the season of navigation. It would be close to the fabricating plants along the Atlantic coast of the United States, especially to those which I understand are to be established in Connecticut.

I am serious in bringing this matter to the attention of the government. I hope that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), who perhaps knows more about industry in this country than any man I know of, will see that at least an investigation is made into this project. I said the other day that this would not be in competition with the Dominion Steel Corporation, but it does not make any difference to me whether it would be in competition.

We are short of steel in this country, and I hope that for many years the demand for steel will keep increasing whether there be war or no war. I have that faith in Canada that she is going ahead industrially and otherwise, and that for many years we will be unable to supply our raw steel demands. I think it would be worth while to give this matter some consideration.

I am not suggesting this as a war undertaking. I do not have much enthusiasm for building up war industries, especially in our own province, and then having ghost towns when the war is over. I am interested in industries in our own province, and any other province as far as that is concerned, that will have stability, that will be in existence as long as there is any requirement for the production.

Right at the spot I am talking about there is a railroad which passes through three or four mines. It is true that the mines in Inverness are in a pretty precarious way, but I understand that a geologist and another engineer are looking into the situation and have indicated that they believe there is a body of coal there which may be developed. Apart from that, there is plenty of coal in Inverness to supply the necessities of this steel plant. If we have not got it there, we could get it from the Dominion Steel and Coal Company.

I am sorry to say that just the other day the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said something about the great difficulty of producing good steel in this country because of our coal. That matter was investigated four years ago by a chemical scientist in Montreal who was asked to inquire into the question of making steel with coal produced in Nova Scotia. After what I hope was a fair and impartial analysis and investigation he reported that while it took more of certain kinds of coal produced in Nova Scotia to produce a ton of steel than it did of other coal, so far as the quality of the steel was concerned there would be no difference. Our government has been doing something as to the differential with respect to the Dominion Steel and Coal Company. I hope I have at least brought to the attention of the government something which I think is and will be of lasting benefit to our end of the province. I know that our minister from Nova Scotia, who is sitting in his seat now, has been good to that province. He has been doing a good job in so far as Nova Scotia is concerned. Possibly I should not say this because our western friends and those from New Brunswick might be jealous, but he is doing a good job in getting defence orders for the province of Nova Scotia.

There were some good things left in Nova Scotia after the last war. For example, the government built a large plant at Trenton for mounting large guns and that sort of thing. The Dominion Steel Corporation, or perhaps I should say the Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company, bought the plant. It has been a wonderful asset not only to Trenton but to the whole of the province of Nova Scotia, and has been a wonderful asset to the Dominion Steel and Coal Company. Last year they built there the largest coal hoist there is in Canada today, and placed it in the coal mouth at New Aberdeen. At that plant they are manufacturing today the material they want to implement the promise they made to the government some time ago when they received their loan to do certain things in the mines.

Then there is another place at Pictou, and also at Dartmouth. As I said before, I am not much interested in building defence institutions anywhere in this country if they are only to have a wartime life. It does good for the time being in so far as money is concerned, but otherwise it does no good. Comparatively speaking, I suppose that during the last war there was as much money spent in the province of Nova Scotia as in any other province of Canada.

There is one other matter that I wish to bring to the attention of the government.

The announcement has been made that the government is going to cut out all unnecessary expenditures. I have always been hopeful that no government in this country would spend money on something that was unnecessary. I do not quite understand that statement. I would not like to see the public services of this country suffer because of our war effort. Talking now of my own constituency, it is just as important to keep the public services going and in good repair as it is to put down communism, although I think that further steps should be taken so far as some of the communistic leaders are concerned. However, that is a matter for the judgment of the government. I represent a constituency that, with the exception of one other in British Columbia, has perhaps the longest coast line in Canada. That coast line is inhabited by Scotsmen, Irishmen, Englishmen and good French Acadians who have established themselves along the shores. In times gone by they have made their living, and are doing so now, from their little farms and the fishing industry. Through the years the government helped to supply them with breakwaters where they were necessary in small communities to give some protection to their boats, because they can only fish in small boats. There were wharves here and there.

During the first world war these public services were neglected, and in the last world war they were neglected. After the first world war it took more to put them in decent shape than it would have taken to build new ones. The same thing is happening now. I do not wish to see any unnecessary expenditures. However, if there is to be an attempt to keep away from what the government calls unnecessary expenditures, I wish to protest most strongly that the government should not do anything to interfere with public services such as I have mentioned.

Many years ago the town of Inverness had a flourishing fishing fleet. Thousands of barrels of mackerel were caught. A mine was opened there and the people left their boats to rot on the shores. They left their farm implements to rot in the fields, and went into the mine. So far as a worth-while occupation was concerned, their occupation was gone. Today I am told that the coal mine is about finished. I am hoping that the government will see to it that that little harbour is opened up again to give some access to small fishing boats. There is a recommendation to that effect from Nova Scotia engineers.

To indicate what can be done so far as keeping up public services along the lines I have suggested is concerned, I bring to your attention the village of Cheticamp, which years ago was a flourishing fishing village with a fairly good harbour. Then an industry was started there, fishing prices were bad and the people practically gave up their occupation—not in the sense that Othello's occupation was gone—but they really entered an occupation for which they were not fitted. Four or five years ago the fishermen of that village got together and with the help of the federal government and the Nova Scotia government they organized a little freezer for their bait. No village in the province of Nova Scotia has made such advances as the village of Cheticamp has in the last four years.

This government is also doing something along other lines. In the town of Louisburg a large fish plant is being built. That is a place where big vessels go in and out, and the little fellows are a bit too far away. They cannot get there. There is also splendid work going on at Petite de Grat. A United States company has come in there and the co-operative fishermen have leased their establishment to this fishing company. That is going to make a tremendous difference. For all that I for one thank the government, and would thank any other government that was in power. What I am trying to impress upon the government is that the necessities of the times even in war do not warrant not keeping up the public services of the country which are of advantage to any particular place.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I had intended to make a rather academic speech on this budget a few days from now, analysing its economic and financial aspects; but the remarks of my learned and hon. friend who just took his seat (Mr. Carroll) provoked me into rising and saying something at this time entirely different from what I had intended to say. During the course of his remarks the hon. gentleman stated that he had said something a few days ago, and he did not know why he said it. I am sure if he reads Hansard tomorrow he will wonder why he said a great many of the things he said this evening.

Just by way of a basis for the rest of what I have to say, after listening to the hon. member this evening anyone from this part of the country who is not familiar with developments in the maritimes over the past thirty years would think everything was fine, there were no problems, the government had found a solution to every difficulty, and that the troubles existing in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and now in Newfoundland, are entirely the responsibility of the people themselves because of their lack of vision and their lack of confidence in the future of that part of the country. In effect, that is the impression the hon. member left with me in the course of his remarks. I want to reiterate what I have said a good many times, that the problems of the maritimes are not entirely due to any lack of initiative or confidence on the part of the people of that part of the country. You need not take my word for it; go back to confederation. I think one of the most respected men to ever sit in this house was the late Norman Rogers, who conducted an economic survey of the maritime provinces. He made a report, which is in the library and which I have read a good many times. My hon. friend should also read it.

Mr. Carroll: I have read it.

Mr. Gillis: Well, you have forgotten most of it.

Mr. Carroll: But I do not believe everything that is in it.

Mr. Gillis: A great deal of money has been paid for many reports of this kind, some of which my hon. friend has made. If they are not to be accepted as setting out the problems which were investigated, at great cost to the Canadian taxpayers, then I think we should discontinue commissions and all that sort of thing. The late Norman Rogers set out in great detail the fact that since coming into confederation Nova Scotia lost 202 industries to central Canada. At the time of confederation the maritime provinces were the most prosperous part of Canada. That was recognized at the time, and the fathers of confederation granted certain concessions as of right and gave certain guarantees to the people of the maritimes. They recognized that in bringing about confederation they were setting a new base, and that in doing so they were going to disturb and uproot the economy of that part of the country in order to expand the economy of the central part of Canada and ultimately link all the provinces under one federal charter.

There can be no question about the loss of industry by the maritimes to central Canada. I am not quarrelling with that. That has happened; it is past history. But when my hon. friend tries to ignore the developments of the past fifty years and turn back to the people of the maritimes themselves responsibility for the condition in which they find themselves, I think that is unfair. Perhaps one of the principal reasons for that attitude in central Canada and particularly in the federal government over the years is that so many men have been sent to this house tied to the tail of the machine that has ruled this country for the last fifty years to the detriment of everything east of Montreal. They were men who neglected to face facts, who failed to fight for the part of the country from which they came, who sat complacently in this house and either said nothing or gave an erroneous impression by statements such as we heard this evening. If my hon. friend tries to create the impression that all the industry we have centralized in this part of the country today was created by private enterprise, that impression is completely wrong. I have sat in this house since 1940. I watched the development of our defence program in that year. At that time, when billions of dollars of the taxpayers' money was given to industries across this country, with about 85 per cent of it spent in these two provinces for the creation of new plants and the expansion of old plants for war industry, I rose in my place and protested. That development and expansion resulted from the investment of money by the federal government. I argued then that our defence planning should be carried on in such a way that the effort would be distributed equally across the country on the basis of population.

That is not very much to ask. In Nova Scotia we have about 4 per cent of the population of Canada. We have 2 per cent of the gross production in terms of dollar value. If we had our share—and surely it is not asking too much to merely ask for your share—we should have at least 2 per cent more; and that 2 per cent added to the gross production of that province at this time would make a tremendous difference. But my hon. friend is not prepared to ask for that. He is satisfied with things as they are. I am not. The defence planning in the last war was completely wrong; and the present defence planning is wrong again.

Several times in this house I have suggested decentralization; my hon. friend made reference to that this evening. I was not expressing my own opinion only; I read a good deal. I was expressing an opinion which is held by the leading public men of the province of Nova Scotia. I was expressing an opinion that has been expressed time and again by the newspapers of that province. I consider the Halifax Herald-Chronicle, for example, one of the best informed newspapers in Canada. I consider it one of the greatest instruments to fight for the rights of the maritimes; and in editorial after editorial that newspaper has stressed the importance of the decentralization of industry. Many people in this country and in the United States are doing that now, not only as an economic development but for the protection of industry in the event of war. While I am very much interested in it from the standpoint of equalizing the production of this country as between province and province, to which I think we are entitled, I am particularly interested in it—

Mr. Carroll: May I ask the hon. member how he is going to do that decentralizing?

Mr. Gillis: That is a simple question. You are starting now on a program that is going to cost the taxpayers of Canada a great deal of money.

Mr. Carroll: I am not talking about war industries.

Mr. Gillis: I am. The hon. member talked about it a moment ago. That is why I am talking about it. I intended to talk about the sales tax and so forth. The federal government is now embarking on a program that is going to cost the taxpayers of Canada in the neighbourhood of $5 billion over the next three years. May I emphasize the fact that that is $5 billion of money belonging to the taxpayers of this country. That money is going to be spent for the purpose of creating a great deal of new industry for war purposes. Instead of further loading up the province of Quebec and the province of Ontario, where you have approximately 82 per cent of the productive capacity of the country centralized today, what is the matter with locating some of the plants that are going to make shells, ammunition and that kind of thing down in a part of the country where you already have your steel, iron ore, unemployment and all that kind of thing? It should be done. What is the matter with locating your new plants for production purposes, as related to the defence program, in parts of the country other than those where you have 82 per cent of them today? If there is another war, it is going to be an atomic war. If that kind of a war comes, decentralization will be desirable; and I would point out that most of the people who are making public statements today with regard to defence matters, both in Canada and in the United States, have made statements a good many times in the last couple of months pointing out the desirability of decentralization of your war plants at least. Now that we are going to spend $5 billion of the taxpayers' money, there is no reason why the federal government should not plan that production so as to scatter it across the country and thus make for a greater equalization of the defence expenditure and, of course, for the protection of industry in the event of an atomic war.

That is something that was not done in the last war. It should be done at this time. I suggest to the government, as I have time and time again previously, that the plants we are building now should be built and owned in such a way that they can be turned over to civilian production for peacetime use if and when the war was over. I think that the thing was handled wrongly in the last war. For example, a plate mill was built down at Sydney, Nova Scotia. I am going to stick to maritime problems because my hon. friend did so. That plate mill was built on land that was owned by the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation. When the war finished, you had a new, modern, up-to-date mill with all kinds of markets in this country for the plate it was producing. The federal government said, "We have gone into shipbuilding. We do not need that plate any more."

We were taking it in our own yards. Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation did not want to operate it; it would run in competition with their mill somewhere else. Therefore you were in this position. You could not sell it. Dosco owned the land. If someone wanted to buy it, they would have to move it off that site. If they moved it off that site, it was difficult to find another one. There was a firm in the United States that I think would have bought that mill; at least I talked to them about it. They said, "if we move it, and if we can find a site, will Dosco supply us with raw materials?" The answer was "No raw materials." That is a fairly high-handed way of handling the resources that they have leased from the Newfoundland government, such as iron ore and so forth. That is an example of how your defence planning was done with regard to building plant and equipment in the last war. It should not be done in that way this time.

The main point I want to make about the decentralization of industry is that now is the time to think about it, when you are creating new plants and new equipment. We should benefit by the mistakes of the last war.

My hon. friend is all in favour of that St. Lawrence waterways development. That is another project that is going to cripple the maritimes further, and it is going to cripple them in this way. I want to remind the house for a moment of the statement that my hon. friend made to the effect that the government is doing a wonderful job, that they have loaned Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation $7,500,000 for the purpose of a mechanization program that will cheapen production, and that kind of stuff. You should go down and take a look at the equipment they are installing. I did so. I saw it first hand. May I say that I would not want to work under the conditions under which the miners are compelled to work today.

But the point I want to make is this. While the government have made a $7,500,000 investment in that mechanization program, they are not taking a long-range view when they support the idea of developing the St. Lawrence waterways because that is a project which, if completed, will rout the Nova Scotia mining industry out of the Quebec and Montreal market, the only market they have today. As far as the St. Lawrence waterways project is concerned, I am convinced that it is for one purpose, namely, the development of cheap power over in the United States; and the Canadian government is going to spend a great deal of the money of the taxpayers of Canada in giving the United States cheap power. But it will serve the purpose of providing a water route in to the Montreal market, with coal for the American operators that they have not today. That is point number one. It is going to offset the investment the government is making in the Nova Scotia industry. In the second place, in connection with that industry in which my hon. friend is so proud that the government has an investment, may I say that they have more than an investment. They make subsidies and that kind of thing—payments which, in the course of the year, run into millions of dollars. But this is an investment on which they should expect a return.

The government is also giving to a pipe line company the right to pipe natural gas from Alberta clean down into Montreal and the city of Quebec. When natural gas is available it will not only heat the homes but it can be supplied to any industry that is being supplied with coal today in that region. It will be much cheaper than coal, much cleaner, and it will do the same job. The only industry in which you cannot use natural gas is the basic steel industry; you still must have coal and coke in order to make steel. But in any other industry in that Quebec and Montreal market, where approximately 2,500,000 tons of coal from Nova Scotia are now sold, gas may be used. But besides investing in that coal industry, to mechanize it and cheapen production, the government are piping natural gas down there, through an American company; they are giving to outside people a franchise to come in and exploit the natural resources of the Dominion of Canada, in perpetuity, for all time; there is no return of them. That is going to offset, in my opinion, the investment the government is making in the industry at this time.

I sat on a committee which met this afternoon, and I heard the president of the Canadian National Railways say that they had under way a program of shortly putting ten diesel engines on the road from Halifax to Montreal in order to take the heavy freight hauls. That again is replacing coal. While the government, out of the goodness of their hearts, will loan the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation $7,500,000 to develop that coal industry, at the same time they are granting to outside capital franchises to pipe natural resources into that section of the country. That has as its ultimate end the replacement of that industry in its only economic market. Railways operated by the government are scrapping that market, and my hon. friend should not feel so good about the whole thing; because while they may be doing one thing which looks as if it might help, there are many other developments in that section of the country which offset the things that my hon. friend thinks the government is doing.

My hon. friend made one remark with which I partially agree. He said that the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters) was a pretty good fellow. I agree with that. I think he is one of the best men in the house. There are many things he would do if he could. My hon. friend said that the minister has done many things in Nova Scotia. I cannot see what they are. He has tried to do many things, but I believe he has been prevented from doing some of the things that he would do if there were more men like himself in the cabinet. I cannot see where he has succeeded so far in doing very much. He had a good housing program, but that was split up and stopped on him, and so forth and so on. I just wanted to make these few remarks, Mr. Speaker, because I did not want the impression created that everything was so fine in the maritimes.

There is no future for young people in that province, and nobody knows it better than my hon. friend.

Mr. Carroll: I do not know that.

Mr. Gillis: The hon. member knows that for the last fifty years, according to the figures compiled by the dominion bureau of statistics, we have been sending 15,000 young people from the maritimes to the United States every year, and that is especially true of the last thirty years.

Mr. Carroll: No, no.

Mr. Gillis: The hon. member should dig out the figures.

Mr. Carroll: No.

Mr. Gillis: That is absolutely right.

Mr. Carroll: Not 3,000 people have left the maritimes for the United States in the last five years.

Mr. Gillis: The hon. member does not look at the statistics. For the last few years we did have a little bit of a program, in that we have been sending a few young people into the province of Ontario, but they gradually went back home, and many of them are over in the United States today. That kind of development in this country is not good enough.

I might say, Mr. Speaker, that these young people are the citizens of tomorrow. They are young people for whom we have made investments in schools and universities. We have put them through school, because the average young person today is not leaving school to go to work; there is no work for him and he gets the best education possible. I will say this for that province: its educational standards are as high as any in Canada. Perhaps as much money is spent per capita on education in that province as in any other part of Canada. After that boy or girl is educated he or she has to get out of that part of the country in order to secure employment. The only thing that we have been exporting to other countries for the last twenty-five years is our young people. I am sure my hon. friend knows that. We are slowly but surely developing into a province of old people. The highest percentage of old age pensioners in the whole Dominion of Canada is in Nova Scotia. There is no work for the young; there is no employment for a man over forty years of age. Ten per cent of the working population of the area from which my hon. friend comes is unemployed at the present time; that is the registered unemployed in that area. Those are official figures of two weeks ago released by the Sydney office of the employment service. That is for the whole island of Cape Breton.

I know he has received letters from his own section recently, and so have I, to the effect that there is a possible chance of the marketing of coal from the Inverness mine being lost completely because of the dieselization of the Canadian National Railways between Halifax and Montreal. Things are not so good, even in his own riding. There is a bad employment problem there, and it is static. Nothing is being done to cure it. While you may have about a four per cent unemployment problem for your working population across Canada, actually in that area it is ten per cent. The experts tell you when it gets over five per cent you have to do something about it because it is dangerous. If it were on a national scale you would say it was dangerous, and this house would be raising a lot of noise in order to have something done about it. Last year, when it was around six per cent, this house was passing supplementary benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act and doing something about it on a national scale.

I say emphatically that it is just as important to the people affected in that community as it was to the whole of Canada when the unemployed figures were up over six per cent. It is just as important to that section of the country that something be done there in order to relieve that unemployment problem because it has reached dangerous proportions.

Before my time is up, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a little about the budget. I know you have been patient and very lenient. I know you can discuss anything in the budget debate, but I generally like to be relevant to the subject matter before the house. It is not often that I get off on tangents unless somebody provokes me.

In regard to the budget itself I should like to say that I was disappointed. I think the main question that faces the Canadian people today is the question of inflation. It is one of the most disturbing factors in our whole economy.

During the last couple of weeks, before the budget was presented, labour delegations came to Ottawa and met with the cabinet. They were sent away; they were told that the government did not intend to do anything at all at this time in regard to price controls or matters of that kind. But the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) did suggest that when the Minister of Finance brought down his budget there would be measures in it that would assist in overcoming any further inflation. That statement was published in the press as having been made by the Prime Minister to the Canadian Congress of Labour, the Catholic Federation and the American Federation of Labour. These bodies represent a large section of the Canadian people. But the important thing to remember is that they represent the industrial workers. These are the people who are going to work in the plants, in the mines and in our defence industries.

Our main problem of course is to build up adequate defences to meet any emergency that might exist in the future. One of the first things that we should have in mind is to try to create an atmosphere of confidence in the minds of those who are going to produce the sinews of war. They should at least have the assurance that the government is doing everything it can to protect the workers on whom we depend so much. Do not forget this; it is on discontent, lack of confidence and lack of faith in our own institutions that the people whom we may be obliged to fight some day build their machinery. I think the government was ill advised at this time in taking the stand that we are going to wait to see how the control system works out in the United States. I do not think myself that that is good statesmanship to inspire confidence, but we did not wait in 1941. We established price controls in this country a year ahead of the United States. The federal government in Canada pioneered in that field, and they made controls work. And if any lessons were learned about price controls, then it was lessons the Canadian government taught the Americans for at least a year prior to the adoption of controls in that country.

There can be no doubt about the saving to the Canadian people. The man who made the hardest fight for controls was the then minister of finance, Mr. Ilsley, who told us in 1945 that the Canadian people saved two and a half billion dollars. From a business standpoint alone it was a good investment for the people of Canada.

We had all that experience; we had it during all that time. I think the government was ill advised in saying that it was going to wait for the United States. We are told that the budget included measures that were going to prevent inflation, or to assist in overcoming inflation. I cannot see anything in the budget that is going to assist in overcoming inflation. The government has proposed one new device, but nobody knows how it will work. I am referring to deferred depreciation for a period of four years. They hope there may be something in that.

Actually there are in the budget measures which will add to the spiral of inflation. I looked it over rather quickly and my reaction to it is that the sales tax, which was discussed thoroughly by several hon. members, but particularly by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), adds to the cost of living. While it sounds very easy and very simple to add 2 per cent, actually it works out at from 13 to 24 per cent. The sales tax is applied in this way: the manufacturer charges it, and passes it on to the wholesaler. The wholesaler takes the manufacturer's 10 per cent tax and adds that on before he marks up his profit. Then it is passed on to the retailer who takes his 20 per cent, and charges that up as cost to himself for that article. He adds his mark-up on top of that and then adds the other 10 per cent to the sales tax.

As one follows it through he will find that it works out anywhere from 13 to 24 per cent. That is a tax that will hit a great many commodities in this country. It is an added expense to every householder or anyone who buys anything. How can the government say it is going to help overcome inflation by a measure such as that when they have deliberately added to the cost of living, which ultimately will shove up the spiral of inflation?

Mr. Fulton: And profits.

Mr. Gillis: There is no doubt about it that it will add to profit, too.

Secondly, the government did not increase the tax on beer or liquor. I think that was very shortsighted—and, mind you, I am not a teetotaler, I do not say this because I am a temperance man; but I do believe that anyone who has the money to buy a bottle of Scotch or a couple of bottles of rye, or who can afford to drink some beer, would not kick very much if a dollar or so per gallon were added to the cost of the liquor. It is something one does not have to buy, and I think a tax of that kind would have been preferable to the tax on washing machines, refrigerators and other equipment of that kind. These things are not luxuries any more; they are essentials in every household. There are many young people who would want to get married and equip their homes, and those are the first things they will have to buy.

But under these conditions they are not able to buy the stove, the refrigerator or the washing machine they want. Those three articles are considered necessities in any household today. If the tax had been put on liquor—and a good stiff one—these essential commodities could have remained free and the cost of living would have been kept down to some extent for people who either had to furnish new homes or replace worn-out equipment.

Then, let me say this about profits: that the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), owing to his close association with this group, has gradually begun to think as we do.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege: while my admiration for my hon. friend's character and ability is unbounded, unfortunately I cannot say that I admire his policies.

Mr. Gillis: You see, Mr. Speaker, he has just finished prompting me into talking about profits; and I heard him arguing today most venomously—

Mr. Fulton: Venomously?

Mr. Gillis: —for pipe lines carrying oil to British Columbia, and stating that they should be common carriers, developed by the government.

Mr. Fulton: Common carriers, but not developed by the government—the two things are different.

Mr. Gillis: He is a little young yet; perhaps when he is as old as I am he will be worse than I am. However, on the question of profits, let me say that in my view the present profits structure is one of the main causes of inflation in Canada today. Press statements being released—and I have a lot of them here—show that in company after company profits are up by 300 per cent or 400 per cent. When I read these balance sheets in the papers I am really ashamed of the companies. For instance, Westinghouse nets $5,809,000, and all that kind of thing.

When one takes a look at those profits his only conclusion can be that the manufacturer is charging a lot more for everything today than is necessary. That, in turn, is passed on to the wholesaler and the retailer and the consumer has to take those skyrocketing prices, and all because there is too much profit.

All right, we are told the government has not the power to control it, and that they do not want to. I am suggesting that if the government were to take a look at the profits of the bigger corporations today they would realize that there is plenty of room for a redistribution of income to be spread among salaries, wages and subsidies to hold down the prices of essentials, and to increase the standard of living of those who produce. This is obvious from the balance sheets appearing in the press from day to day, and every day.

From hon. members opposite, and those who sit to my right, the argument in the past has been that the excess profits tax tended to waste and extravagance in management. That is not so. I remember that when I came to the house in 1940 the standard of living for the average worker was pretty low. Salaries and wages were low when compared with those in the United States. There were no welfare schemes in industry, and no pensions paid.

When the excess profits tax went on, what happened? Immediately employers in this country smartened up, and said, "Well, if we are going to give it to the government in taxes, we might as well revise wage schedules". I remember how easy it was for unions to approach employers and get increases in wages. That was one thing. But by an upward revision of salaries and wages, largely promoted in my opinion by that excess profits tax, the standard of living of all the people of Canada was improved enormously. That money was not wasted.

Secondly, many companies established pension and medical schemes on a contributory basis for their employees. A lot of that money that is now going into excess profits was diverted into those channels and as a result we had a fairly comprehensive picture of pension and welfare schemes in most of our industrial and business establishments. This was due to the fact that the federal government told these companies that if they earned over a certain percentage of profits it would come back to them in excess profits taxes, but certain things were exempt from that tax.

I see, Mr. Speaker, you are looking at me so I assume my time must be drawing to a close. The argument that excess profits taxes will promote waste and extravagance in business is not true. I contend that because of that tax things were done in industry and business during the last war which created an upward swing in the standard of living of the Canadian people. If that had been done, if the government had established price controls on essentials and used some of the money going into excess profits for the purpose of subsidizing, they would have established some confidence in the minds of the Canadian people.

Another thing that should be done by the government is to have a conference with the primary producers of this country. This has been suggested many times. There should be representatives from the major labour bodies who would sit in with representatives of the primary producers and the government to work out a wage and price base or stabilization program for industry and agriculture. In that way we would be drawing into our national defence program the primary producers and the industrial workers of this country. They would be given a say in planning their future and it would inspire confidence and ensure the government of getting maximum production and understanding from those who produce the wealth of the country.

I am sorry that I was provoked into making a speech which I did not intend to make and I shall just have to leave unsaid a lot of things I should like to say about the economic and financial aspects of the budget.

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I agree with all that the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) has said about the decentralization of industry in this country. He and I have argued this matter on several occasions in the past. There is much that should be done in that respect. We have pointed out the difficulties which our respective provinces labour under.

I want to endorse all that the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair) said so well this evening about dairying and the problems of the dairy producers, principally the cheese producers. The hon. member must have put a lot of study into his speech. He gave us many facts that will be valuable through being in Hansard.

We have been hearing many medical members this evening expound on behalf of agriculture, and that is all to the good. I think the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McCusker) gave us a fine discourse on the South Saskatchewan irrigation project. I have been rather conversant with this matter. I endorse the congratulations he offered to Mr. L. B. Thomson, superintendent of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act administration. I knew this gentleman before I came to Ottawa because it was my privilege to serve on an advisory committee of the P.F.R.A. before coming down here. At that time Mr. Thomson was working in another capacity. I am sure that he will make a splendid head of the department he has now taken over.

Those who have been here for some years will remember the many speeches made by the late John R. MacNicol with regard to the South Saskatchewan irrigation project. The late Mr. MacNicol represented a Toronto riding but hon. members will recall how he used to spend his vacations travelling throughout the country studying our natural resources. He was very keen about this South Saskatchewan project. I have talked with many people from the prairies, especially from Saskatchewan, and irrespective of politics they have told me that they thought the project should be named the John R. MacNicol irrigation project. Those in charge of this matter for the government should take the advice of these residents of the prairies, many of them staunch supporters of the government, who are asking that this tribute be paid to the late Mr. MacNicol.

I realize that it is too much to hope for, that every citizen in Canada would read the speech delivered by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). I compliment the minister upon his manner of delivery. He does his job well. I do not agree with much of the material contained in the budget, but I wish all the citizens of this country would read the detailed speech he delivered. He is a kindly member of this government. Then I wish the same people would read the detailed criticisms which were so well advanced this afternoon by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell). If all the citizens of this country would read and study both those speeches I think they would get a different understanding of what these tax proposals will mean to them in the days that lie ahead.

I was pleased to hear the hon. member for Greenwood ask the Minister of Finance and the government rather pointedly not to persist in their proposal to increase the sales tax from eight to ten per cent. I have always been greatly opposed to sales taxes of any kind because I do not like indirect or hidden taxes. I think it is an unfair tax. As has been so well pointed out by several speakers this afternoon, by the time this tax is paid by the consumer it has been pyramided until it is several times the original eight per cent, or ten per cent as it is now. It is difficult to estimate what the final tax is after it has been pyramided from the wholesaler right through to the consumer.

It is a vicious type of tax and certainly it will not assist those who are trying to fight the cost of living and finding it most difficult in these times. As was pointed out by the hon. member for Greenwood, the sales tax should be repealed because his surplus will probably be more than the revenue from the increase. Therefore he should withdraw that proposal. In this afternoon's press is an article indicating that the budget has boosted gasoline prices. The article points out that Imperial Oil Limited has decided to increase the prices of gasoline and diesel fuel because of the proposed sales tax increase. I do not think I need tell anyone here that that will add to the cost of production of the farmers of this country, as well as of many other people. That is just one of the items, as already pointed out. I think it would be an unfair increase and an unfair tax.

With respect to the tax of 15 per cent on electric stoves, refrigerators and washing machines, as was pointed out by speakers this afternoon these are now considered necessities of life throughout this country. I am sure that this tax will be very much disliked in the province of Manitoba from which I come because a great hydro expansion is taking place in the rural areas at the present time. After the type of life that our farm people have been accustomed to, and having in mind that these things are now considered necessities of life, the extra 15 per cent tax is going to be rather a hardship on very many people. I think it is most unfair.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) wonders why some additional tax was not imposed on beer or liquor. Personally I am bound to agree with him. I do not think anybody will accuse me of being a crank about these things. However, a letter appeared in a paper the other day written by a bride to be. She was wondering when liquor and beer had become essentials of life and why electrical stoves, refrigerators and washing machines were at the same time considered luxuries.

Mr. Ward: What is the tax on liquor?

Mr. Ross (Souris): I cannot tell you exactly what the tax is now. It probably is fairly heavy but I can tell my hon. friend that the taxes on liquor so far have not in any way decreased consumption in this country. I think he will agree as to that. In fact, if he asks me about that I will tell him what happened in our own province. Coming from Manitoba, he probably knows as much about it as I do. At the time of the baby budget last September an additional tax was imposed on liquor and on hops and so on for beer. I forget the exact figure but it amounted to one and a fraction cents on a bottle of beer. Notwithstanding that, the provincial government imposed a tax of 4 cents on a bottle of beer to take care of that. That is a fact. I think that was a pretty heavy tax but following that the consumption of beer increased in the province of Manitoba. I think it is a fair assumption that no harm would have been done by imposing extra taxes on alcoholic beverages at this time, and I am not one who advocates taxing anything when it is not necessary. If one has to make a decision on these matters, I think it would have been beneficial to young people attempting to set themselves up in their own homes, as well as to many other people in this country, if a tax had not been imposed on articles which are so essential in setting up a home. Those of us who might want to buy liquor or to have the authority to buy it—

Mr. Stick: Or get married.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Yes—would not mind having to pay an extra tax there. However, that is just a personal observation. My colleague, the financial critic of our party, this afternoon referred to an article appearing on the editorial page of the Winnipeg Free Press of Thursday, April 12. I want to quote a portion of the article again. It reads:

> But if the underlying truths of this budget are examined it will be seen that the government's courage has outstripped its sense of reality. The budget in fact is a contradiction. Mr. Abbott stated the issue with clarity but he did not face it. "Two great issues face the world today," he said. "They are the pursuit of peace and the control of inflation." The budget figures document that statement to the hilt. But the budget itself contains no answer. Of the total outlay of 3,700 million dollars, expenditures on defence will be $1,662 million. This represents the pursuit of peace and is not to be criticized. The balance of $2,036 million represents the other of Mr. Abbott's great issues—the control of inflation. This vast outlay is for non-defence, for government services of one kind or another. How great it is may be gauged by the fact that in 1945-46, the first year of peace, the corresponding expenditure was only 1,062 million dollars.

There is more to the article. It is quite lengthy. I think any hon. member would do well to read it because it sets out the matter very well, and certainly points out what little help the budget will be to those who find the cost of living burdensome at this time. In fact the whole budget will greatly increase the difficulties faced by the people today. It does nothing to assist them. I have heard references to my right about the proposed provincial sales tax. In that respect I was very disappointed that just a few days ago the province of Manitoba saw fit to pass enabling legislation which would give them power to impose a provincial sales tax of 3 per cent. True enough, the attorney general and the premier pointed out that they had no intention of imposing that tax in the province but that it was enabling legislation to assist other provinces and the agreement to be made later with the federal authorities if such becomes a fact. Nevertheless I was disappointed that our provincial government would even pass that type of legislation.

Mr. Garson: I am sure my hon. friend wishes to speak accurately in this connection.

Mr. Ross (Souris): That is correct.

Mr. Garson: Is he not referring to a resolution which was passed by the Manitoba legislature approving of a sales tax constitutional amendment? I would point out to him that resolution is not in any sense enabling legislation, and that Premier Campbell has announced that in fact he has no intention of using that power even if it were granted.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I have already said that both Premier Campbell and the attorney general had stated that they had no intention of using that power.

Mr. Garson: It is not enabling legislation. It is just a resolution approving of the constitutional amendment in question.

Mr. Ross (Souris): That is true, a constitutional amendment. I understood from the discussions arising from questions put by other members to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) that these resolutions were required from the various provinces before the amendment could be undertaken. Am I wrong there?

Mr. Garson: You are wrong in that also.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I still dislike very much the fact that our provincial government has passed such a resolution, and it was by a very close vote. Now that the Minister of Justice has raised the question, I have an editorial here dealing with the federal sales tax as well as the matter to which we have been referring. A short while ago a number of editorials appeared in many papers across the country. I think the minister probably will have read them. The one to which I wish to refer appeared in the Globe and Mail of Tuesday, March 6, 1951, and its heading is "Garson vs. Garson". The editorial reads:

Justice Minister Garson was in a placatory mood last week when he addressed the Montreal reform club. Speaking of the proposed constitutional amendment, which would enable the provinces to finance old age pensions by means of a turnover tax on gross retail sales, he denied allegations that the federal government was trying to foist it on any provincial government. It was completely up to the provinces, he said. Some would wish to impose such a tax, some would not. Of those which were anxious to enter the field of indirect taxation (now barred to them by the B.N.A. Act) he declared: "They have good reasons . . . Over the recent years the demands for provincial and municipal services, and the costs of satisfying such demands have both increased very greatly."

It is curious to find Mr. Garson defending the general idea of indirect taxation by provincial governments. Just a few years ago, when he was premier of Manitoba, he was frankly hostile to indirect taxation by any authority. On August 7, 1945, he told the dominion-provincial conference:

"Direct taxes are imposed upon the basis of known ability to pay. It is therefore a progressive tax. Indirect taxes fall on the poor with greater severity than on the wealthy. The indirect tax . . . is proportionately more to the man whose income is small than to the man whose income is large. It is therefore a regressive tax."

In another speech given that day, he warned the federal government not to finance its postwar program with "indirect taxes which retard business, minimize consumption and bear with unusual severity upon the poor." The same appeal is to be found in the opening paragraphs of the province of Manitoba's submission to the conference, presented January 26, 1946.

By April 30 that year Mr. Garson was denouncing the federal government for its extensive use of indirect taxes during the depression years. "In the 1930's," he said, "it was the undue reliance upon indirect taxes on staple articles of everyday use which so seriously curtailed the quantity of goods which could be purchased by families with low incomes . . ."

In the same speech, he charged that the federal government's "business-destroying, depression-creating" tax structure, based too heavily upon indirect taxes, had "bankrupted marginal enterprises by taxing costs regardless of whether such enterprises were making profits, and thereby discouraged enterprise, investment and employment."

There is nothing wrong with these arguments. This newspaper supports them, and because it supports them, opposes a provincial turnover tax as a means of financing pensions or anything else. Like most indirect taxes, it is unjust, restrictive and regressive. Premier Garson saw that in 1945-6. Justice Minister Garson doesn't see it in 1951—or maybe he prefers not to see it: whichever is unimportant.

Mr. Stick: The same man?

Mr. Ross (Souris): Yes, the same man in a different capacity.

The important fact is that Mr. Garson is now looking for an easy way out of the federal government's difficulties. If it can fob off the provinces with a shoddy tax deal, it will feel that it has managed to shelve the fundamental issues of welfare, reform and jurisdiction for an indefinite time, perhaps for a generation.

The people of Canada do not have to accept this shabby evasion of responsibility. They can take their stand simply by instructing their member of parliament to vote against the constitutional amendment.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I come to another phase with which I should like to deal, so if I may I will leave this where it is and with your permission move the adjournment of the debate and ask you to call it eleven o'clock.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull) moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: Tomorrow we will continue this debate.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10:55 p.m.

FISHERIES

QUOTA ON SHIPMENTS OF LOBSTERS TO THE UNITED KINGDOM

Mr. J. Watson MacNaught (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Fisheries): Yesterday the hon. member for Queens (Mr. McLure) directed the following question to the department:

What is the quota to the United Kingdom on the shipment of lobsters for the year 1951? Is the quota based on cases or on dollar value?

Under the scheme of token shipments administered by the Department of Trade and Commerce, the 1951 quota for shipment of canned lobsters to the United Kingdom is fixed at forty per cent of the average annual value of exports of this commodity to the United Kingdom during the base period 1936, 1937 and 1938.

The 1951 quota amounts to $489,138.

JAPANESE PEACE TREATY

QUESTION AS TO DRAFTS SUBMITTED BY UNITED STATES AND UNITED KINGDOM GOVERNMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. T. Stick (Trinity-Conception): I should like to ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has he anything to add to the statement with regard to consultations on the Japanese peace treaty which he made in the house on April 2?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I have only this to add, that we have received a draft treaty from the United States government, and we have made a careful study of it. The observations of the Canadian government with respect to it will be forwarded shortly to Washington. I might also say at this time that there is a broad measure of agreement between our views and those of the United States government on the basic issues of the treaty. It is our expectation that after the views of the governments concerned have been submitted to the United States government there will be further consultation, with the object of concerting future procedure.

Mr. Graydon: Is it the intention to have any kind of conference among the powers in connection with this matter?

Mr. Pearson: It has not yet been decided whether the Japanese peace treaty will be signed at a formal conference, or will be signed separately by governments, with the Japanese government, as a result of negotiations among themselves.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to ask a supplementary question. In today's Ottawa Citizen there is a statement to the effect that the United Kingdom had submitted a draft treaty to the United States. Has that also been submitted to Canada, and can the minister say whether the government of Canada is in agreement with the terms of that draft treaty?

Mr. Pearson: I understand that the comments of the United Kingdom government on the American draft have taken now the form of another draft treaty submitted by the United Kingdom government. That United Kingdom draft has been submitted to us, but I have not yet had an opportunity to see it. In fact I am not sure whether it has actually arrived in the department.

Mr. Graydon: The situation is full of drafts.

Mr. Green: Is the question of a Pacific defence pact included in these discussions?

Mr. Pearson: No, not in discussions of the Japanese peace treaty.

STEEL

DEFENCE PRODUCTION—SUPPLY IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, with reference to a question asked in the house by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), as reported at page 1988 of Hansard for April 13, I would say that representation has been received from the Sheet Metal Association of British Columbia by letter to myself dated April 9. A reply was sent on April 16 from the director of the small industries division, and a further letter on April 17 from the chief of the general purchasing branch. A meeting is being arranged between officials of the Department of Defence Production and representatives of the association.

However, it should be pointed out that the statement made by the Sheet Metal Association, and repeated in the house by the hon. member, that steel supplies have been cut off in the province of British Columbia and that there has been no defence production in that province, is completely erroneous. Steel suppliers in Canada are distributing steel in accordance with past purchases. This appears to be the fairest and most equitable method of distributing the supplies which are available after taking care of defence requirements. Particular attention is being given to keeping steel distributors in all parts of Canada supplied with their normal requirements.

It is not possible to furnish all the steel that purchasers would like to have, but some success is being achieved in furnishing steel that is required for essential construction and maintenance purposes.

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Monday, April 16, consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, last night at the adjournment I had been discussing the sales tax and the increase of 25 per cent as set forth in the budget proposals. I had pointed out that this has greatly added to the problem of higher living costs throughout the nation.

I had also quoted the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) when, as premier of Manitoba, he had pointed out to the federal government that it was the undue reliance upon indirect taxes on staples and articles of everyday use that so seriously curtailed the quantity of goods that could be purchased by families with low incomes. I had pointed out that, as a result of the proposed increase in the sales tax from 8 to 10 per cent, only yesterday the Imperial Oil Company had announced an increase in the prices of gasoline and diesel oil. This adds to the cost of production of farmers and others throughout the nation. There have been continuing increases in their costs, and this is an added one resulting from the budget.

Just prior to the Easter recess there was announced a final settlement with respect to the five-year wheat pool and a supplementary vote making provision for the payment of $65 million to cover that settlement. This amounted to a settlement of approximately ten cents on the dollar of the loss taken by prairie wheat producers during the five-year wheat pool.

During the Easter recess the Minister of Justice addressed a series of meetings in Manitoba in which he attempted to explain the wheat situation, but he carefully avoided all reference to the increased costs of production with which those farmers are confronted and with which they were confronted during the term of the five-year pool. In that respect, Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not know whether the hon. member proposes to reopen the debate on the United Kingdom wheat agreement. I do not think that should be permitted on this occasion. We had a long debate on the subject when the Speaker was in the chair, and subsequently in the committee of the whole. Under those circumstances I do not think that debate can be revived at this time.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, if you rule that the $65 million has no bearing on the present budget, then I am out of order.

Mr. Speaker: That is my ruling—and not only with regard to the hon. member but with regard to all hon. members who may follow in the debate. I thought I should bring it to the attention of the house at this time.

Mr. Graydon: On a point of order, surely an hon. member has a right in the budget debate to discuss anything connected with the financial aspects of the government's program. I suggest he should not be debarred from discussing this important branch of the program.

Mr. Martin: How could there be a point of order on that?

Mr. Graydon: You are not Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Peel is right to a certain extent. In the present instance, however, the matter in question has already been decided. If the discussion were reopened now it would be a revival of a debate on a subject which has been decided in the present session. On that ground I would rule the discussion out of order.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I must certainly abide by your ruling, but the farmers do not consider the matter settled, by a long shot. I would just refer to the editorial page of the Winnipeg Free Press for March 30. Anyone who cares to read it will find it interesting material which will bring him up to date on the subject. However in view of your ruling I will not discuss the matter further.

According to the Economic Annalist of December 30, a study was made by officials of the Department of Agriculture of the costs that farmers are called upon to bear. According to that survey, which was carried out in the Gilbert Plains and Sifton farming section of central Manitoba, it was found, as set out in this pamphlet, that a number of the farmers could not pay their expenses and support their families from the revenues derived from their farms. Those findings are referred to at pages 1708 to 1710 of Hansard for April 6, which reports the discussion of estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

There is another matter with respect to wheat that has not been decided as yet. It was taken up with the government after Easter. It has to do with the $48 million to the extent of which the farmers of western Canada subsidized the consumers of Canada when all the other controls were taken off for a period of years following the war.

Mr. Speaker: Was not that question fully discussed when the amendment to the wheat board act was before the house? If my memory serves me correctly, there was an amendment to the effect that 25 cents per bushel should be paid to the wheat farmers, and in that 25-cent proposal was the question the hon. member proposes to discuss now. I do not think it would be in accordance with our practice to revive that question at this time.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Again I must abide by your ruling, sir, but a delegation did interview the government after Easter on this very matter. It certainly has a bearing on the budget, but I shall abide by your ruling.

I assume I shall be in order in making some reference to the international wheat agreement and the bearing it has on the cost of living in Canada today. This international wheat agreement means that right now, in April, the wheat farmers of the prairies are subsidizing all the consumers of wheat bread in Canada to the extent of 36 cents per bushel of wheat. This international wheat agreement is going to mean a loss of many more hundreds of millions of dollars to the wheat producers of the prairie provinces. This is something that has not yet been discussed in this house; it is a new angle. I think the government should have provided in that agreement an escalator clause for annual consideration or adjustment.

Mr. Speaker: Was not that wheat agreement discussed earlier this session?

Mr. Ross (Souris): Not to my knowledge.

Mr. Speaker: I was under the impression that it was discussed.

Mr. Knowles: Is Your Honour not confusing two different wheat agreements, namely, the United Kingdom wheat agreement, which had a duration of four years and which has ended, and the wider and now current international wheat agreement? They are two separate agreements. I submit that while there was a fairly full discussion about the settlement of the Canada-United Kingdom wheat agreement, which had a duration of four years, there has been no decision during this session with regard to the international wheat agreement. I do not agree with all the things the hon. member is saying, but I think he has the right to say them.

Mr. Speaker: For the time being I shall not rule against the hon. member. It is for the house to decide whether or not this question has been discussed previously and settled.

Mr. Graydon: Do we take it from your ruling, sir, that you are outlawing the term "wheat" from the debates of this house?

Mr. Speaker: Far from it. I am simply ruling that, in accordance with the practice of this house, questions which have been decided cannot be brought up in future debates in the same session. In effect, you cannot refer to a debate which is closed.

Mr. Quelch: There has been no amendment or resolution moved during this session with regard to the international wheat agreement. There has only been reference to it, but there has been no discussion based on a resolution or amendment.

Mr. Speaker: Apparently no hon. member takes the stand that the international wheat agreement has been discussed this session. If the international wheat agreement has not been discussed this session, then of course I cannot rule it out of order. If it has been discussed, I would rule it out of order. I shall go this far at the present time: a discussion on the subject of wheat which has been settled at this session would be out of order now.

Mr. Ross (Souris): My understanding is that this matter has not been discussed at this session. At any rate I have practically made my point about the international wheat agreement. It was simply that it was going to cost the western wheat producers some hundreds of millions of dollars. I do not think there is any argument about that. I repeat that there should have been an escalator clause to provide for annual adjustment or consideration of the agreement. I repeat also that the western wheat farmers are subsidizing the consumers of bread in Canada by 36 cents per bushel.

I am reading from the Searle index, and I may be asked if I believe in it. I think their research man is one of the most efficient there is anywhere in Canada. While I am not concerned about the company he works for, or the Winnipeg grain exchange, I have known this gentleman for many years and no one has been able to contradict any of his findings.

I want to refer to the marketing of grain at North Portal. I have referred to this in other sessions, and to the fact that the United States farmer markets his grain on one side of the street while the Canadian farmer markets his on the other side. As of March 10 the United States farmer was receiving $2.23½ cents per bushel for his grain net, while the Canadian farmer received $1.43½, a difference of 80 cents per bushel.

Mr. Howe: What are the grades?

Mr. Ross (Souris): It says on a comparative basis; I presume No. 1.

Mr. Howe: There is no No. 1 in that locality.

Mr. Ross (Souris): That was the quotation set out, for that day's market, and I do not think the minister will deny it.

Mr. Howe: The participation certificate goes with the quotation.

Mr. Ross (Souris): If the minister wants to make a speech I will sit down.

Mr. Howe: I do not like to see you put phony figures on the record.

Mr. Ross (Souris): There is a difference of 80 cents per bushel. I will be fair to the minister and to the people who are handling the wheat and say that there will be a further adjustment to the Canadian farmer, because that is the initial payment.

Mr. Howe: I am glad you put that in.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I hope the minister will rise in his place and tell the nation through this house that there will be a final settlement amounting to one-half of that 80 cents. But still there will be that great difference left.

Our class II wheat, No. 1 basis Fort William for export, is selling at $2.26¼. The price under the international agreement, and also for the Canadian trade, is $1.90¼. That shows a difference of 36 cents, and that is the amount by which the prairie farmer is subsidizing the consumers of Canada.

Somebody has asked why I do not refer to Australia. I do not know why the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Studer) does not get up and make a speech on behalf of the farmers who sent him here. I shall refer to the price of wheat right here in Ontario, which I believe is a part of Canada, and where they are being paid $2.35 per bushel. There is a difference there of 91½ cents between what the Ontario farmer receives and what the western farmer is paid under compulsory marketing by this government. The net to the western farmer is $1.43½.

So much for wheat, Mr. Speaker. We will see whose prophecies come true.

Mr. Ferrie: Say something about rye.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I could say a lot about rye. The hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Ferrie) says, "Say something about rye". I remember the Minister of Agriculture a few years ago telling the people of western Canada that they should not grow rye.

Mr. Gardiner: No, no.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I know that I started to grow rye and I am not unhappy about the circumstances at all. Normally rye sells for 80 per cent of the price of wheat. What is the price of rye today? It is $2.35 a bushel. There is your comparison on rye.

Mr. Ferrie: $1.99.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I am not going to say anything more about wheat now, other than to repeat that on February 6, in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I requested the appointment of a royal commission to inquire into the grading, marketing, transportation and storage of grain in Canada and abroad. On March 8 I repeated that request. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) also requested that an impartial appraisal be made of the losses of the wheat farmers of Canada under the five-year pool. The handling of the 1950 grain crop has been very unsatisfactory so far, and this is the ninth month of the crop year. I repeat the request for the appointment of a royal commission. The cost of such an inquiry would be very much less than one bushel of wheat per prairie farmer. If everything is in order, why should there be a refusal to appoint a royal grain inquiry commission? I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, there are many items I have not mentioned in the house so far this session that would be brought to light as not having been in the interests of the wheat producers of western Canada. Again I ask for the appointment of such a commission.

I ask that the proposal to increase the sales tax from 8 to 10 per cent be withdrawn by the Minister of Finance, because it distinctly adds to the burden of the cost of living in this country and to the cost of production, especially for the farmers. I ask also that when the special committee is appointed later to study amendments to the Dominion Elections Act, 1938, provision be made by amendment for the transferable vote. Our election act is antiquated, and should be brought up to date.

I should like to refer to the result of a Gallup poll published in the press on Saturday, April 14. The heading is: "Much Profiteering in Canada? Three-quarters think there is". I will not quote the article. It can be found in the Montreal Daily Star for April 14 and in other daily papers of that date throughout the nation. The result of the poll of average citizens throughout Canada is that 75 per cent believe there is undue profiteering at the present time.

I will certainly support the amendment moved by my colleague, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell). If you will permit me, sir, I shall read it at this time. It is to be found at page 2053 of Hansard, and is as follows:

That all the words after "that" to the end of the question be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"the proposals of the Minister of Finance are unsatisfactory because they will inevitably increase the cost of living for all and especially for those least able to bear it.

This house condemns in particular, as inflationary, the increase by 25 per cent of the general sales tax and is of the opinion that the increase is unnecessary and unwise.

This house further condemns the heavy increase in excise taxes on certain essential commodities and is of the opinion that much of the government's proposed huge increase in taxation is due to its own extravagance."

An hon. Member: You do not believe that.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I continue:

"This house regrets the failure of the government to take effective steps to deal with profiteering."

Somebody says that I do not believe it. I wish I had time to enumerate the many instances of wasteful expenditure of money that should rightfully have been saved for the taxpayers.

(Translation):

Mr. Robert Cauchon (Beauharnois): Mr. Speaker, during this tragic hour in the history of the world, when human rights are disregarded or flouted in so many different conflicts, it is pleasant to be living in a country such as ours. It is indeed pleasant to be living in Canada, this huge expanse where stout-hearted people grow amidst security, because of an excellent administrative system that guarantees the highest degree of individual freedom as well as the full flowering of their activities, in their march towards progress, to which the unlimited resources of their country entitle them to aspire.

Canada is a great and beautiful land; it is truly a land privileged amongst all others, one towards which the economists say the eyes of the whole world are now turned.

I do not believe that I will mislead the hon. members of this house when I say that, in these modern times, Canada sets an example to the various countries of the world, as the stronghold of democratic liberties. Let us not forget that this remarkable fact, which goes unnoticed by none, never fails to stimulate the curiosity of foreigners, from the very moment they set foot upon our hospitable soil. We must admit, without fear of contradiction, that Canada is truly a privileged country and that, consequently, its citizens are entitled to consider themselves as particularly favoured by Providence.

It so happens that within this immense and extraordinary country which is this dearly beloved Canada of ours, there is a bit of land of which, as a member of this house, I am particularly fond. It has rightly claimed the better part of my being and thus fastened upon itself my constant and devoted attention. This constituency, Mr. Speaker, of which I am justly proud, to which I can promise my selfless support and sincere devotion, this constituency which is making such strides forward and shows such great promise of future greatness, whose present prosperity is beyond doubt and which is so remarkable from every point of view, this constituency whose picturesque vistas and truly great resources make it so attractive to tourists, this constituency which belongs to a province which was one of the earliest to join confederation and which borders, for the most part, on our majestic St. Lawrence is the constituency of Beauharnois which I am introducing to you today with feelings of sincere admiration.

As I said a moment ago, the constituency is prosperous in spite of depression periods and many trying days. Perseverance has been rewarded by success. When Sir Wilfrid Laurier paid us a visit during his 1911 election campaign, at which time he won us over by the charm of his silver tongue, the great statesman was able to see that our district was in full activity and well on the way to success in the various fields of industry and trade. While travelling through the fertile countryside and the pleasant towns of Beauharnois county, he did not fail to show his just appreciation for the excellent work done by the farmers and the townsmen. But how surprised would have been the great and illustrious Liberal leader of 1911 if he could have accompanied our present leader in his triumphant tour of the same constituency in 1949. The enormous and very real progress achieved would have surely held the attention of the great Laurier.

For, from that day on, our fellow citizens have followed, practically without a break, the ascending road to success and prosperity, which, according to Virgil, can best be attained through unremitting toil. That is why, Mr. Speaker, I repeat that I am really proud of the county I represent today, thanks to the confidence placed in me by my fellow citizens.

The people of Beauharnois constituency are peaceful and hard-working, true to their ancestral traditions. They have inherited the strength and valour characteristic of our forefathers, discoverers and pioneers of noble and pure stock. In different parts of the constituency, especially in the towns of Salaberry de Valleyfield and Beauharnois as well as in Chateauguay and many rural centres, there are people of different nationalities, French-Canadians and Anglo-Canadians, living and working side by side the whole year round in the most complete harmony. That feeling of brotherhood, which ensures good understanding and harmony between the two races, is really to be admired.

It is a well-known fact that our various ethnic groups live in the greatest harmony, showing the unity of their views in their daily relations. This fact constitutes an excellent and most important factor of success which makes life more interesting and more heartening and greatly increases the performance of all in striving towards a common ideal of comfort and prosperity. That is an outstanding example which I deem it my duty to mention in the house since it is in harmony with the great virtue of charity, the main basis of the democratic ideal, a virtue which is so useful and so necessary today especially, to strengthen us in the face of present dangers. The harmony existing among the people of our riding deserves public recognition and should be brought to the attention of the entire nation since it constitutes such a powerful means of protecting the population from class struggles and of consolidating at the same time the entire social structure by upholding peace and security.

That union and cohesion of our people has brought quite wonderful results in our riding. Whenever there is a good purpose to be served in the matter of social welfare, such concerted effort becomes conspicuous and makes for the success of the various campaigns. In each case, our citizens have realized where their responsibilities lay and they have been equal to the task.

In due course, the city people as well as the farmers have shown that they knew something about business and that they were alive to their duties as Canadians, by answering generously to the call of their country at a time when all our forces had to be directed towards a common goal. Thus, our people have greatly contributed to making every loan drive a success, conscious as they were of the importance of such contribution for the safeguarding of our most sacred rights.

During the last war, as in the war of 1914-1918, the constituency of Beauharnois made a fine effort. A great number of recruits enlisted in His Majesty's armed forces. Various plants, on the other hand, worked on the production of war equipment and munitions. The same spirit of co-operation prevailed amongst related organizations such as civilian defence. All in all, worth finds and asserts itself. This is true of citizens of our constituency, whenever a generous effort, a helpful hand is required for a good cause.

In the constituency of Beauharnois there is a power plant noted not only in the district but throughout the country. It is an asset provided by the St. Lawrence river, the development of which is in the blueprint stage. It will contribute to the fuller use of the water power of this great river.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot resist the impulse to congratulate the Minister of Transport for the magnificent statement he has made on several occasions in connection with the St. Lawrence seaway project.

The competence of the Minister of Transport is well known, but at the risk of offending his modesty, I must say that the brilliant outline he has made on several occasions of the St. Lawrence seaway project has brought much comfort to all those who have our country's development at heart.

The people of Beauharnois, Salaberry de Valleyfield and of the whole constituency are deeply interested in the seaway project because of the advantages which everyone, in his own sphere, would derive from this undertaking. Everyone favours and takes a keen interest in the vast project related to the deepening of our mighty St. Lawrence river.

The Beauharnois plant supplies power to an unlimited number of factories of every description. Beauharnois county has made a fine name for itself and is justly proud of the success achieved by a few of its sons in literature, fine arts, science and even sports. In the field of science, one of our citizens has gained recognition not only in Canada but abroad.

As regards social relations, employers and employees work in a spirit of co-operation and mutual understanding. In this connection, the workers have shown themselves well disposed; they are also very efficiently organized and enjoy, in this respect, every privilege granted by the established statutes. On the other hand, industrial leaders have shown a fine spirit of initiative where their employees' welfare is at stake. Undoubtedly, some claims are necessary and, at times, disputes did arise, but no regrettable incident has ever occurred and relations between salaried workers and industrial leaders were renewed on a harmonious basis. I have no doubt that these industrialists would be the first to press for the necessary measures if ever the government required of them a united effort for the common good. I am sure that the industrialists of Valleyfield, of Beauharnois and of other parts of my constituency would be the first to meet the wishes of the government in this respect.

(Text):

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw the attention of the house to a social problem which I encountered very frequently during my four years as mayor of the city of Valleyfield, and also while acting as director and vice-president of the union of municipalities for the province of Quebec. Until a few months ago this social problem was urgent, but because of recent international events it has become for the moment less pressing. This problem is of concern to one of every three workers in Canada.

I am referring to all Canadian workers over forty, whose plight can be appreciated by even a cursory examination of the advertisements in any of our daily newspapers. In recent years it has been in the field of labour that the most severe economic losses have been suffered. Loss in the field of employment is always an obstacle which hinders progress toward other objectives. Thus it is important to solve first the problem of employment if we are to lead the way to a progressive economy. Both nationally and internationally, unemployment is a waste of productive resources. Indeed, when a section of labour is inactive, both production and revenue are lower than if there were employment for all.

Since the 1930's everyone who has the welfare of the workers at heart must be deeply concerned about the ever-increasing tendency to discriminate against those over forty-five. Except in skilled occupations the older worker who does not retain his employment is faced with much greater difficulty in finding new employment. This was proved during the depression, when the numbers of unemployed older workers increased. The war demand for labour of necessity did away with much of this discrimination. It also showed that the prejudice was not based upon the fact that the older worker did not do his work satisfactorily. Nevertheless, once the war was over the older worker in North America was found in greater numbers among the unemployed.

Some employers would have us believe that these workers are the inevitable victims of the machine age and the modern accent on youth. The entrance of ex-service personnel into the labour market has sometimes been used to justify or excuse such discrimination, which is often practised against veterans in that age group. Post-war demands all over Canada for manufactured goods and building materials were such that all workers were needed and should have been employed.

A moment ago I stated that the problem is an urgent one. In order to prove my assertion as to its gravity, one has only to consult the statistics issued by the officials of the national employment service. Vocational guidance and employment counselling are absolutely essential. This is not a mere expression of personal opinion; it is the considered opinion of those of the international labour office whose business it is to study the reports on unemployment from all over the world.

On page 89 of the book entitled "Action Against Unemployment," issued by the international labour office in Geneva for the year 1950, we find the following:

> The main need of workers who lose their employment, apart from an income for themselves and their families to live on, is for technical assistance in finding alternative employment or the training or retraining required for re-employment. In present-day employment conditions it is too much to hope that individual workers will be able accurately to diagnose their own position and prospects and find their way, unaided, into the most suitable alternative employment available. Many of them, in fact the great majority, need access to vocational guidance or counselling services capable of helping them into suitable employment. The provision of such assistance is therefore an essential part of employment market action against unemployment.
> The importance of guidance and counselling services for the unemployed was further recognized during the early part of the war when, despite labour shortage, the unemployed were not being absorbed as rapidly as had been expected. The process of re-absorbing ex-service personnel and war workers into peacetime economic life also gave new impetus to the development of guidance and counselling facilities. Finally, post-war full employment campaigns have included emphasis on such facilities as an integral part of action to ensure manpower distribution and redistribution contributing to the smooth and efficient working of the economy.
> In 1949, the international labour conference, aware of the importance of these trends not only for promoting individual work satisfaction, but also for improving employment market organization, adopted the vocational guidance recommendation. This recommendation urges the rapid development of vocational guidance and employment counselling services and suggests standards to accelerate the development of these services along sound lines.

Our government was even quicker to recognize the situation, and in 1947 set up a counselling service in the city of Toronto. So successful has it been that Dr. Louis I. Dublin, vice-president of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, in an article appearing in the January 6 issue of Collier's—a United States publication—pointed to it as a method of coping with this problem which the United States is also attempting to solve. I quote:

> Canada has already demonstrated what can be done along this line. Several years ago it found that almost half the men registered with the Ontario region of the national employment service were over forty-five, and that industry rarely offered openings for this group. So it set up in Toronto a free experimental vocational guidance service for older people.

Not only does a successful businessman like Dr. Louis I. Dublin approve such an attempt at organization, but we find the following on page 8 of the same international labour office book:

> Experience has proved conclusively that the systematic organization of the employment market is an essential condition for the permanent control of the problem of unemployment.

[Mr. Cauchon.]

The subsistence of those over forty-five is too vital to risk continual subjection to the hazard of negotiation. Again, in the same book at page 110 we find:

> As unemployment increases, employer specifications with respect to age are tightened, and the percentage of older workers among job seekers rises. In a very loose labour market, older workers become over-represented among job seekers, and employers with a much larger reserve to choose from become increasingly reluctant to hire them.

An editorial in the Montreal Gazette of February 12 expresses similar views. The writer concludes that:

> Canada as a nation will itself show signs of aging if it fails to adapt itself to the new problems that its aging population is creating. There will be a great need to revise old ways of thinking about age, so that the lengthening years of its workers may also provide for a lengthening usefulness in industry and business.

Reasons given by employers for their deliberate adoption of this policy of discrimination can be briefly stated as follows: (1) the high cost of group insurance premiums for older workers; (2) the high cost of company pension plans for older workers; (3) the older workers' inability to master quickly new industrial techniques; (4) the high accident rate among these older employees; (5) their lower output.

The first objection can be answered in a few words. One has only to compare the premium charged per thousand for workers at the age of twenty-five with that charged at forty. In one case the difference is as small as $1.58 per thousand.

What can be done to meet the second objection as to the cost of a company-sponsored pension plan? If pensions are computed, as they are in many cases, only according to the number of years employers and employees have jointly contributed, this objection does not hold. It has been shown that the older worker, desperately anxious for employment, may be willing to relinquish his right to participate in a company's pension plan. Why should he be obliged to give up his right to a degree of security when he is forced to retire? We must find a solution. It has also been suggested that the contributions of those employed for only a short period be remitted. The idea that we can continue to advance our civilization by insisting upon giving less and less for more and more is a dangerous illusion.

Inquiries which I have made in my constituency of those in charge of personnel in various industries would indicate that the facts do not support the contention that older workers are not adaptable. Their contribution during the war years is surely convincing proof of this. Their past experience should be of value to the employers, whose counselling services could direct the older workers to tasks within their capacity. They need not be asked to learn entirely new techniques. Surely it is in the interests of efficiency to make use of the older workers' skill and experience. It is absolutely wrong to think that old age always impairs man's faculties. The greatest contributions in the fields of philosophy and culture have come from the minds of older men.

Accident cases in which compensation was paid prove that the high accident rates are in the twenty to twenty-four age group. The older worker is by nature more cautious, more deliberate, and more accident-conscious. If productivity declines as employers imply it does after the age of forty, how can they explain the fact that earnings on a piece-work basis reach their peak between the age of fifty and fifty-five? When workers are asked to assume additional responsibility in any office, it is generally given to those whose age and experience enables them to handle ever increasing duties. These older employees probably have very heavy family commitments; they are less bored by routine; they are less likely to change their jobs, and are certainly likely to keep their minds on their work. All this contributes to high productivity.

Canada, like the United States, has become, gradually but inevitably, a nation of older workers. At present—and this percentage will increase with the advancement in preventive medicine—thirty-three and one-third per cent of Canada's workers are over forty-five. How could a rearmament program be carried on without them?

The only direct purchasing power is that of goods and services which are offered. Our economy needs their purchasing power; the country needs their contribution to its exchequer. The burden of taxation cannot be borne only by part of the population.

The young workers must, in their own interest, support a policy of employment for all. They are separated by only a few years from that same category. Can they feel secure in an employment market which denies its oldsters the right to work and the self-respect which employment secures? This is their right in a democratic society.

Employers must remember that one of the most elementary desires of every human being is the preservation of his dignity. Is it not better for society or for a nation to provide work for its older members than to dole out a monthly pittance which degrades the dignity of the human being?

Employment and government must co-operate to solve the problem in the interests both of industry and workers. Men are born with equal rights to work and to economic independence. Any worker who has to worry about losing his job because he has reached forty-five cannot produce as much as one who feels his job is secure. Nor can he feel free to seek a better job. One of our ideals expressed in the Atlantic charter is "freedom from want." Is want less distressing and intolerable in middle age than in youth? The movement to secure the social welfare of the workers carries in itself great hope but not only for those who benefit directly by it. Failure to obtain work because of this prejudice against workers of forty-five gives communism an opportunity to spread its ideology.

The very existence of democracy depends upon the active co-operation of labour, both now and in the future. If the situation is such that the labourer over forty-five is denied employment, democracy will surely suffer.

It is fortunate that the voters do not share employers' reluctance to trust those over forty-five with the nation's business. Who could bear to think of depriving the country of the accumulated wisdom represented on the government side of the house? Dare we mention the Senate?

Unquestionably work brings health, financial independence and happiness to all. It is essential to the welfare of mankind.

Those who think that this social problem is of concern only to labour and industry are not facing reality. It is a most urgent one, the solution of which will restore to the labourer his reason for living and his joy in working.

This is the situation as I see it. The Department of Labour has done everything in its power to win the co-operation of industry in solving this problem. It produced a film called "Date of Birth" which was shown throughout Canada by the unemployment offices of the country. Unfortunately industry's response was disappointing, and the situation has not improved appreciably. However, I am glad to know that the effort was not entirely wasted. Mr. George K. Foster, vice-president of the Canadian Johns-Manville Company, Limited, in an address to the Royal Canadian Institute in Toronto on January 29, is reported by the Montreal Star of that date as follows:

> Modern management is not just cold industrial efficiency. Modern managers are equally concerned with industry's human relations, with the dignity of man and with the harmonious co-ordination of men and machines.

This view is expressed not only by the vice-president of a big company such as Johns-Manville, but also by a man who represents the boards of trade and chambers of commerce of all Canada. Mr. F. G. Winspear, president of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, in an article appearing in the "Monetary Times Annual National Review, 1951" and entitled "A fine new national spirit necessary in Canada," makes this statement:

> As we move further into this period of deepening crisis, I believe that Canadian business is ready and alert to assume its leadership which the country has the right to expect of it.

Also:

> I believe attention should be directed toward the emergence of a fine new national spirit, the sense of enlightened leadership on the part of the business men of Canada.

Though it may be argued that we may be facing a shortage of manpower or a period of employment for all, and that this matter does not at present require immediate action, I am not in agreement with this point of view. In support of my contention, let me refer you to a report that was presented by the division director of the Department of Labour, division of research and statistics, at a public hearing of the New York state joint legislative committee on: "Problems of the aging," December 9, 1948. This is a conclusion reached after a thorough study of the situation, and I quote:

> As a group, however, the older workers are set apart by employment obstacles which leave them vulnerable to economic changes and with inferior status in the labour market even in periods of high employment.

Delegates to a conference on the problems of the aging, under the chairmanship of Dr. Albert Abrams, agreed that:

> There are no insuperable obstacles to employment of older persons once management, labour and government sit down together to do the job.

I would propose that the federal government set an example to industry by employing in the civil service qualified older workers. These positions are suitable, for they require qualities which such workers generally possess—patience, judgment and experience rather than great physical strength.

The ability to work without the chance to do so means nothing unless we provide the opportunities.

According to a pamphlet put out by the institute of labour and industrial relations in connection with the university of Illinois and entitled "Who is too old to work?" we find on page 19, the statement:

> Much of the success in making job opportunities for older workers will depend upon research findings.

As reported on page 70 of Hansard, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) made a statement as to the establishment of a national advisory council to make a survey of the manpower resources of the country. Would it not be desirable to instruct this advisory council to study at the same time this problem of older workers, in order to save these workers from suffering in a similar situation after the present emergency is over?

Perhaps even better would be the appointment of a special committee of the house to investigate fully means of making and finding job opportunities for older workers.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I wish at this time to direct my remarks to the speech delivered the other evening, by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), to deal with certain aspects of his budget speech and taxation proposals, and to refer in particular to certain paragraphs in his statement wherein he informs parliament and the country that the allocations for certain construction projects under the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Public Works and the Department of Resources and Development are to be curtailed, as part of the government's economy program.

I listened last night with a good deal of interest to the speech delivered by the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McCusker). May I compliment him at this time upon his able presentation of the immediate need for the construction of a dam across the South Saskatchewan river in order to obtain irrigation and power development.

One of the main questions in my view is whether the budget is truly anti-inflationary, in the sense that it will prevent a further serious increase in prices, and whether or not the taxation proposals covered by the budget protect the low income groups within our nation. Of course the budget has to cover expenditures for the defence program. It is true that 10 per cent of the production of the country at this time must be used in the defence effort. But while the defence program is a real cost and burden upon the masses of the Canadian people, one group or one section in our economy has already benefited immeasurably by the present state of affairs in the world and the incident in Korea. I refer to corporations, and the profits of corporations after the payment of all taxes.

Corporation profits after taxes in 1949 were $1,171 million. In 1950 they had increased by $231 million to a total of $1,402 million, after the payment of taxes. Corporation profits from 1949 to 1950, after taxes, went up by 19·7 per cent, whereas the incomes of salaried persons and workers in Canada increased in the same period by only 6·4 per cent. In the same period net agricultural income decreased from $1,513 million in 1949 to $1,424 million in 1950, a decrease of 5·9 per cent.

So this is the situation we have in 1950 compared with 1949: Corporation net profits, after taxes, are up 19 per cent, while salaried workers and labourers had an increase in their wages of less than one-third of that amount, or about 6 per cent. Then, the net income for farmers in Canada decreased within that period by approximately 6 per cent.

I say it is certain from those figures that neither workers' wages nor farm prices have contributed in the main to the inflationary spiral. Inflationary prices have been brought about mainly by corporations, monopolies, and semi-monopolies making increases in prices which were wholly unwarranted, and the result of which has been an increase in net profits, after taxes, in 1950, as compared with 1949, of over 19 per cent.

We have the minister's proposal of a surcharge or a surtax of 20 per cent on corporation profits, resulting in most instances in an increase in corporation taxes of 7·6 per cent. Does it follow from that proposal that corporation net profits in 1951 are going to be less than corporation net profits in 1950? I do not think it follows at all. Without price controls the great corporations of Canada are free to set the prices for their products. It will not be hard for companies like Massey-Harris, for example, to add on to their retail selling prices of machinery sufficient to pay the 7·6 per cent increase in corporation taxes, and sufficient to increase their 1951 net profits, after taxes, to a point higher than 1950 profits.

I say that without price controls the 7·6 per cent increase in corporation taxes, taken alone, can result only in one thing, and that is higher prices and further inflation. The other proposals of the Minister of Finance do not improve—indeed they do not maintain the present standard of living of the lowest income group in our country. In arguing the advantages of a sales tax the minister said: Oh well, persons in low income groups have to pay the increased tax on only 25 per cent of their expenditures, and persons in the middle income groups from $3,000 to $7,000 will pay the increased sales tax on only a third of their expenditures. Then he admitted that the incidence of the sales tax will decrease after the $7,000 income bracket.

The present increase in the sales tax is a regressive tax. It means a redistribution of purchasing power by taking it away from the lowest income groups in the country. When the minister came to increasing the tax on incomes he did not bring in a progressive increase by varying the percentage. Instead of doing that he placed on a surtax.

Mr. Sinclair: Work it out.

Mr. Argue: He placed on a surcharge of 20 per cent all across the board which, in my opinion, in no way compensates those in the low income groups for the increase in the sales tax and in no way compensates for the inflationary increase in prices that has taken place over the last few years.

The end result of all the tax proposals advanced by the Minister of Finance will be a further relative increase in the burden on the low income group. The minister increased the income tax on single persons earning $1,500 or less and on married persons earning $3,000 or less. We in this group do not approve of that part of the increase in the income tax. It has been said already a number of times by ministers of the government that 10 per cent of the production of Canada must be used in our defence program.

Let us look at the contribution already made by the married person earning $2,500 quite apart from the new burdens being placed upon him by this budget. If one compares the cost of living in 1949 with the last figure which was available on March 1 he will see that the purchasing power of a person earning $2,500 has gone down $263. In other words the effective buying power of people in that income group has been decreased already by more than 10 per cent. I think a further increase in income taxes on that group at this time is entirely unwarranted. There has been a reduction in purchasing power of $263; the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) adds a further increase in the income tax for this year of $15 and for a full year of $30; and there is also the increase in the sales tax.

The low income groups in this country have no means by which they can pass on their income tax to someone else. By charging higher prices corporations can pass on all of the increase in the corporation tax. People in the low income groups, those on old age pensions, those with large families are the people that should be protected by this budget, but they are the people whom this budget has failed to protect. They are the people upon whom this budget forces an even lower standard of living.

There is nothing in this budget to encourage people to save. If a person bought a $1,000 bond in 1945 he finds today that his $1,000 is worth only $665. There is no incentive in this budget for Canadians to save. As a result of this budget prices can only go higher. As a result of this budget a further penalty is placed on savings. To that extent this budget is certainly an inflationary budget.

Over the last number of years this government has brought in some excellent social security measures. While some of them did not go as far as we in this group would have liked to have them go, nevertheless this government sponsored and enacted many important social security measures. For example, on April 1, 1949, a couple of months before an election—that may or may not have had something to do with it—the government increased its share of old age pensions so that old age pensioners might be paid $40 per month. Two years after that date the government by its inflationary method of finance and its failure to impose price controls took back $3.43 per month from the old age pensioners. The purchasing power of that $40 is today only $36.57.

The late W. L. Mackenzie King took to himself and to his government, and rightly so, a great deal of credit for the family allowance legislation which came into effect on July 1, 1945. Those payments were intended to make a redistribution of purchasing power within Canada whereby those in the higher income brackets had some of their purchasing power transferred to those in the lower income brackets who had large families. I think the family allowance legislation was excellent, but the money that was paid to mothers in 1945 should have had some protection from this government. The government should not have allowed inflation to the extent that the $5 cheque is worth only $3.32 today, while the $8 cheque for older children is worth only $5.32 today.

For the last few years, and particularly last year, this government has allowed a redistribution of purchasing power by permitting a further lowering of the standard of living of those in the lower income groups. The weak in Canada, the old age pensioners, those who must depend to a considerable degree on the family allowance cheques, and persons on pensions of various kinds are in no position to protect themselves against inflation, are in no position to pass on the increased burdens of this budget. But the strong, those who are well organized in labour unions, are able to get increases in wages which to some extent may compensate them for the present inflationary prices. The great corporations of Canada which made more profit in 1950 than in 1949 are in position to load their increased corporation tax on the backs of the Canadian people. It is time that this government brought down a budget which would stop inflationary prices and protect the living standards of the ordinary Canadian people.

I wish now to refer for a moment to the South Saskatchewan river project. In every election for almost twenty years the prospects of the building of this dam with its consequent irrigation and power developments have been held before the people of Saskatchewan by the Liberal party. As a matter of fact every political party has supported this development. In 1947 an article appeared in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix, which article was quoted on a previous occasion in this house by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). This article read in part:

> It will be two years before construction work can begin on the South Saskatchewan river dam.
> That the South Saskatchewan project will be carried out, let no one doubt. Mr. Gardiner has committed the present government to the undertaking, according to a report of his speech at Lethbridge the other day.

It was to be two years from that date before construction could begin on that great project. That brings us to 1949. In the election campaign of that year the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) made many statements with relation to the advantages of the South Saskatchewan development project. He called upon the people of Saskatchewan to send to Ottawa an increased number of members of the Liberal party to sit with the government, and he said: By doing so you will ensure that the dam will be built. I should like to quote from the Regina Leader-Post of June 23, 1949, the report of a speech made by the minister at Lemberg. It reads as follows:

> "The South Saskatchewan project would provide cheap power and encourage building of industries in small towns, provide an incentive for young people to stay in this province. I think we have made a fairly good start now," said Mr. Gardiner. "Send us back to complete the job . . ."

They sent the Minister of Agriculture back to complete the job, and within a few months after the election during the first session in the fall of 1949 the minister said: Well now, the completion of this project will depend upon the province of Saskatchewan paying large sums of money towards its final completion. He even said at one point that he might hold a gun at the head of the government of Saskatchewan to the point where he would ask them to pay 50 per cent of the cost. As I understand the situation, the Saskatchewan government has now agreed to pay the share the Minister of Agriculture has said would be equitable. But even though Saskatchewan has agreed, the Minister of Finance in his budget speech has apparently scuttled any prospects for the building of this very necessary project. The Minister of Finance has this to say at page 1801 of Hansard:

> We have paid particular regard to our expenditures on construction . . . Examination of the estimates for the Department of . . . Agriculture reveals very large reductions in their construction programs, notwithstanding urgent needs for expenditure of this kind, following twenty years during which works have been postponed, first for lack of funds, then for war, and finally, in recent years because of shortages of materials and labour.

There never was any lack of funds. In the depression days the government should have found the money, as it well could have, to build this project. The people of Saskatchewan did not complain when it was postponed during the war, but we have never admitted that there was such a severe shortage of materials and labour following the war that a start on the project could not have been made. Now we have the defence program taking, as the Minister of Finance says, only 10 per cent of the production of Canada, and the Minister of Finance has apparently squelched any chance there was of getting the South Saskatchewan development project started and finally completed.

I want to say to the Minister of Agriculture that, even though we in the west feel that he failed to obtain a satisfactory settlement from the government with respect to the five-year wheat pool, we do not want him to fail to obtain this very necessary project. I say to the Minister of Agriculture that if he cannot secure approval for the project from the government he should dissociate himself from the government and leave it. The project is so important to the welfare and rehabilitation of the province of Saskatchewan that at this stage the Minister of Agriculture should dissociate himself from his colleagues in the cabinet if he fails to have the project approved.

Mr. Knowles: Apparently he is not one of the big three after all.

Mr. Argue: Apparently not. The province of Saskatchewan has agreed to pay even its increased share of the moneys for this project, a share which the Minister of Agriculture did not spell out until after the election. In a letter to the Minister of Agriculture on February 10 the premier of Saskatchewan said that, if the federal government would agree to the proposal of the Minister of Agriculture, namely, that the federal government pay $68 million and the provincial government pay $33 million, the Saskatchewan government stands prepared to proceed immediately this year with the construction of the project. The Minister of Agriculture can no longer say that the Saskatchewan government is in any way responsible for the project not being started at this time. Whether we get the South Saskatchewan development project, with the possibility thereafter of irrigating 750,000 acres of land and developing 400 million kilowatt hours of electricity, depends directly on a decision of the federal government.

The estimates that might be used for this project have been decreased from a total of $2,770,000 to $2,045,000. It is clear from the estimates, together with the statement of the Minister of Finance, that the government has no intention in the world of building the dam in order to provide irrigation in south Saskatchewan at this or any other time. They have delayed the project from one time to another. They have found one excuse after another, and apparently they have found an additional excuse at the present time.

An hon. Member: They are waiting for the next election.

Mr. Argue: They will trot out the same old carrot on the stick in two or three years' time when the next election rolls around.

Mr. Knowles: The same dam.

Mr. Argue: I think we should view the project, Mr. Speaker, in the light of its actual cost to the government with relation to our defence program. I support the defence program. Nevertheless I believe that it is possible to construct the dam without in any way detracting from our defence program. In the estimates this year for the Department of National Defence our defence expenditures amount to $1,600 million. The total cost of this project is $68 million for the federal government, not to be spent all in one year but spread over ten years, or a cost to the federal government of less than $7 million a year, a cost of less than one-half of one per cent of our present defence program. If the government wished, certainly it would be possible to proceed with the construction of the project at this time.

I have always believed that the building of more tanks, guns, planes and ships is only one aspect of our defence program. Coupled with that there should be economic aid to the underdeveloped countries. According to this morning's press, 40 million people in India face starvation. As our share in the Colombo plan the government has earmarked $25 million. The government of India turned down the suggestion that part of the $25 million should be spent on the purchase of feed wheat from Canada. I do not blame India for thinking she might spend the $25 million to her advantage in some other way. But I say that the government should offer 100 million bushels of wheat as a gift to India, and other backward nations in need of food, without any strings attached and apart altogether from the Colombo plan.

If we are to protect democracy in the world, and if we are to spread democracy to other nations, one of the things we must do, and soon, is provide food to the starving peoples of the world. We must help the backward and underdeveloped countries. If the government would go ahead with the irrigation project on the South Saskatchewan river we could greatly increase our production of foodstuffs. I believe $7 million a year spent on the construction of that project would be as valuable to Canada by way of providing for defence as any $7 million of the $1,600 million in the estimates for national defence. If we are to protect democracy we must see that the underdeveloped countries have technical assistance and that the starving peoples of the world are adequately fed. If we do that we can help protect ourselves against the inroads of communism; and as a part of our defence effort I suggest that the government immediately embark upon the development of the South Saskatchewan river.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the remarks I propose to offer this afternoon will relate directly to the budget, both the proposals submitted by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and the speech which accompanied them. The bare, hard facts of this budget are these, in a word. This year the government is proposing to take out of the pockets of the people $3,730 million; to spend $3,700 million, and at the end of the year have a surplus of $30 million. Of that total contemplated expenditure of $3,730 million we are told that defence will cost $1,664 million and the non-defence expenditures and supplementary estimates will account for the balance of $2,036 million.

The minister reported that in the year just closed he extracted from the pockets of the people $3,105 million; that he expended $2,902 million, and had a budgetary surplus of $203 million. In order to achieve his goal this year and take from the people $3,730 million he proposes now to apply new taxes and increased taxes which will yield revenues not of $3,730 million per year but of $3,900 million. Just two years ago, on the eve of the election of 1949, the minister was at great pains to see that the estimates then introduced should not amount to a sum as large as $2,000 million. Therefore the estimates for that year were conveniently put just a fraction below that figure, at $1,985 million, so that with characteristic window-dressing on the eve of the election the government might say it was not going to take an amount as large as $2,000 million out of the pockets of the people. Now this same minister expresses the fear of budgets of $4,000 million a year. What a change!

Let us measure the objectives of the Minister of Finance as disclosed in his budget speech. What has he sought to accomplish in the budget he has introduced? Well, we know what he is seeking to raise by way of revenue, and we have heard what he proposes to spend. What are the objectives he holds before parliament and the people in asking support for these estimates of revenue and expenditure? He has announced his objectives in these terms: "the pursuit of peace and the control of inflation." Let us then measure the proposals in the light of those announced or professed objectives.

As far as the pursuit of peace is concerned, I am sure there will be no haggling in this house about any necessary expenditures on national defence, as long as this house can be sure the taxpayers of the country will receive value for the money so spent. We will have to acknowledge that as the machinery of parliament is now constituted there is little effective opportunity for a parliamentary check on these vast expenditures on national defence; and, far from assisting parliament in devising new and improved procedures for checking these expenditures, the government has taken a sort of gleeful pleasure in defeating any constructive proposals put forward to that end. Apparently they do not want any assistance from parliament in surveying the expenditures they propose.

Then let us look at the other announced objective of the Minister of Finance, the control of inflation. Would that this budget might accomplish this end! Would that it could make some effective contribution toward combating the forces of inflation! It is evident that the government is not sufficiently aware of what those forces of inflation are doing to the budget of the average Canadian family. If you want a good measure of the extent of inflation, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that you turn to page 6 of the white paper tabled by the Minister of Finance, where you will find the figures on the gross national product taken first at market prices and then in terms of constant dollars on the 1935-39 basis. This will show that a good deal of the so-called "buoyant revenues" and a good deal of the so-called prosperity of the country have been simply a fiction of figures and a measure of the elasticity of the Canadian dollar.

In 1939 the gross national product, measured in those two ways, was almost equal in value. At market prices it was $5,598 million and in constant dollars it was $5,523 million. Then we come forward to 1946. In that year the gross national product at market prices was $12,008 million, while in constant dollars it was only $8,902 million. In 1949 the gross national product at market prices was $16,382 million, while in terms of the constant dollar it was only $9,648 million. On the preliminary 1950 figures we are told that the gross national product at market prices was $18,000 million in round figures, but in constant dollars only $9,982 million, or barely more than half. That is the gross national product to which the government is wont to refer in glowing terms when trying to picture the present situation.

The minister has said he wants to balance his budget. I do not think a single member of this house will have any disagreement with that professed objective. We all wish to see this budget balanced this year; but we do not wish to see the minister building up big surpluses at a time when the cost of living is pressing with an ever-increasing, intolerable weight upon the average Canadian family. There was a time when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) talked in the terms that are used by those who believe in the theory of the managed economy, and when, under the same guidance, he apparently believed it was his function to siphon off purchasing power by budgeting for a surplus. We saw that in the way in which he resisted the legitimate demands for decreases in personal taxation. In presenting this budget he has not used the jargon of those who believe in the managed economy, but one can sense the presence of that theory pervading the speech.

Now, that leads me to make an observation on budget surpluses and accurate budgeting. I submit, sir, that the first duty of a minister of finance in submitting a budget is to give the house a true estimate, and as accurate an estimate as can possibly be devised, of the expected revenues accruing from the various fields of taxation. There must be no covering up. We will not expect any superhuman ingenuity in estimating revenue, but we will expect that there will be no attempt at covering up, either of fact or of theory. I am not suggesting that there has been any deliberate covering up here of a budgetary surplus in the figures the minister has put before us, but I do say that the best that can be said for the figures put before us in this budget, having regard to the record of these past five years, is that this budget, like its predecessors, contains the vice of inaccurate budgeting. In presenting this budget the Minister of Finance has been guilty, as in the past, of a chronic underestimation of revenues. With possibly one exception, sir, that has had a very misleading effect upon all budget debates in the last five years.

Inaccurate budgeting, sir, not only has a misleading effect on the house in leading the house into the approval of rates of taxation which are not justified to meet the legitimate expenses of government, but it also has a very harmful effect upon those who are charged with the management of the nation's finances. With budgetary surpluses rolling up during the year the inevitable effect upon the minister and his colleagues in the government, who are so often looking for opportunities of spending more money, is to create a loose attitude on their part towards expenditures. We have seen many examples of it.

When we are talking about budgetary surpluses, let us come down to the hard facts, and acknowledge that these budgetary surpluses do not reflect any credit on the Minister of Finance. They simply establish the fact that he has taken more money out of the pockets of the people, in most cases hard-earned money, than has been required to meet the legitimate expenses of government. If you want evidence, sir, of the loose budgeting that has occurred during recent years, let me give you some figures. These figures I am giving now are for the fiscal years ending on March 31, of the year I shall mention. In 1947, the minister budgeted for a deficit of $260 million. At the end of the year he turned up with a surplus of $374 million. He was just out $634 million in his calculations. In 1948 he budgeted for a surplus of $350 million. He turned up at the end of the year with a surplus of $676 million. In other words, he was out $326 million in his calculations. In 1949 he budgeted for a surplus of $549 million. He turned up with an actual surplus at the end of the year of $595 million. That year he was out $46 million. Then 1950, that is the fiscal year ending March 31, 1950, reflects the largess of this government on the eve of election. According to the previous pattern of budgetary surpluses the Minister of Finance budgeted for $202 million, which at the end of the year proved to be $131 million. He was out $71 million that year. You will notice that in that year the error is in the other direction, for this time he underestimated. Those of us who recall the way in which the government, during the election campaign in 1949, used public money to create good will for the government to serve its partisan purposes, will not have to look very far for an explanation of the budgeting error revealed in those figures.

In this year just closed on March 31, 1951, the Minister of Finance, even after he had an opportunity last September to revise his budget estimates, announced an estimated surplus of $20 million. He turned up at the end of this year with a surplus of $203 million. Let me remind you, sir, that was after having provided $65 million of expenditure of an extraordinary nature recently that was no part of the original budget. He finishes up with a budget surplus of $203 million, and this $65 million is not the only expenditure of an extraordinary nature which the Minister of Finance incurred in the closing days of the fiscal year when he saw that he had this comfortable surplus.

If you will total those figures, sir, you will find that in round figures for the last five years the minister has been out something like $1,200 million in his estimates. The net average is about $240 million a year. If the Minister of Finance is running true to form this year, and there is no reason to think he is not, the budget surplus for which he now budgets, namely, $30 million, may be expected to turn out to be something like $270 million. On those figures, sir, there is no excuse whatever for any increase in the sales tax; there is no excuse for any of these increases in commodity taxes. There is very little, if any, justification for any increase in taxation at all.

What has the minister achieved by way of economies in expenditures, because he used some brave words about the necessity on the part of the government for reducing expenditures on non-defence items? Out of a total contemplated expenditure during this fiscal year of $3,700 million, the minister asks the house to regard as a great achievement on his part the fact that non-defence items have been reduced by $35 million as compared with last year. Poor little thing—$35 million! It is less than one per cent of the amount he is proposing to spend this year. That is the achievement of the Minister of Finance in carrying out all his brave talk about the way in which he was going to economize this year and reduce expenditures. Remember, if you will, that the reduction of $35 million on non-defence items was based on a comparison not with a year of slight expenditure but with a year of swollen expenditure, because in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1950, this country spent more than in any year since 1946.

We will not soon forget the brave words used by the Minister of Finance in this house last September 7, 1950, when at page 420 of Hansard he said:

> I can assure the house that this search for economies will be pressed forward, and that in preparing the estimates for next year a rigorous standard of essentiality will be applied.
> [Mr. Fleming.]

The result of those efforts is a reduction of less than one per cent in the total expenditure. What an accomplishment! What a triumph of labour on the part of the Minister of Finance! What ground for a due return of thanks to his colleagues that he offered in the course of his budget speech last Tuesday night!

Now, sir, when we are talking about economies and the elimination of extravagance in this budget, when we call for the squeezing of the water out of this budget of expenditures, we of the opposition say: Which would you rather have? Would you rather have some contraction of these expenditures, or do you prefer an increase in taxes, an increase in the sales tax, an increase in commodity taxes, an increase in the personal income tax? Well, the answer of the government is that apart from this trifling and inconsequential reduction of less than one per cent as compared with the total expenditure this year, they apparently prefer to soak the people of Canada with these new and greatly increased and oppressive exactions.

Where is the economy drive that the Minister of Finance so bravely talks about? Sir, it is abundantly clear that this government is impotent to undertake any serious drive directed at the elimination of extravagance. It is no credit to this government that when members of the opposition have been critical of the government because of extravagance and wastefulness, and when we have put forward concrete proposals for the establishment of machinery here that will give the house an opportunity of participating in this design of the economy drive, the government, as I said earlier, has taken gleeful satisfaction on every occasion in defeating those efforts. Here we are, still lumbering along in this house with this clumsy old procedure of committee of supply, with every member of the house a member of the committee. We still have the clumsy, awkward procedure that never gives any member of the house an opportunity of getting down to details of this problem in a way that would be possible if we had some up-to-date procedure in the form of a special committee of the house on the estimates. But the Minister of Finance will not have a committee of the house sitting on the estimates to give detailed scrutiny to those estimates. So far as the poor old standing committee on public accounts is concerned, it is not given an opportunity to do anything with respect to the estimates. It is to be compelled to be content with reviewing stale expenditures. So, sir, let us be perfectly frank. There is in the present machinery established by this house no effective review of proposed expenditures. We might as well admit the fact, and the government, with its tyrannical use of its majority in this house, simply defeats our efforts to apply that effective scrutiny which those swollen expenditures demand.

Is there any extravagance? Well, sir, time alone prevents my giving in greater detail some of these examples of extravagance; but let me remind you of just one or two examples. Last year, my colleague, the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), put before the house the startling—yes, shocking—fact that expenditures on travelling, publicity and sundries in the estimates of that year totalled $49 million, exhibiting a startling increase year by year, as the government spending machine has demanded more and more oil. What do we find this year has been accomplished by the government in this so-called "economy drive" in relation to travelling expenses? Well, we find, sir, that the Minister of Finance reports an increase in the appropriation for travelling and removal expenses, going up from $27,786,602 in the year 1950-51 to a figure of $36,309,109 for this current fiscal year. Let me remind you, sir, that the figures last year included defence expenditures as well. If you take out the defence expenditures in both years you will still find that the contemplated expenditures this year by the government on travelling show an increase as compared with last year.

Is it not about time, Mr. Speaker, that some effective brake was applied to many of these expenditures, which cannot be justified in times like these when the government is making these huge impositions on the people? And yet, where there is this deliberate choice between soaking the people on the one hand, and effecting necessary reductions in extravagant expenditures on the other hand, this government's deliberate choice is the soaking of the people with more and more taxes.

Let me turn now to some of these proposals of increases in the already heavy load of taxation borne by the people of Canada, and let us especially measure these proposals in the light of the professed object of controlling inflation. Here we see an increase of 20 per cent in the personal income tax, and the Minister of Finance thinks that he is entitled to great credit for not having reduced the exemption below the present relatively low figures of $1,000 for single persons and $2,000 for married persons without dependents.

Let me remind you, sir, that when these exemptions were established two years ago the Progressive Conservative party in this house, and on the hustings in the election campaign that followed, demanded exemptions at that time of $1,200 for single persons and $2,400 for married persons. Measure today the burden of the increase in the cost of living on people of low means, and I think you have there a sufficient refutation of the claim of the Minister of Finance for any credit whatsoever for not having reduced these already very low exemptions.

Then he goes on to impose sweeping increases in indirect taxes. He proposes to take $3,730 million out of the pockets of the people this year as compared with what one might have thought was quite a heavy load of $3,105 million last year. Thus this year in the 11½ months which remain between now and the end of the fiscal year on March 31, 1952, the Minister of Finance proposes to take $625 million more out of the pockets of the people than the swollen sums that he took last year. Let us examine these indirect taxes, because the Minister of Finance has announced sweeping increases in the sales tax from 8 per cent to 10 per cent, and a sweeping increase as well in other commodity taxes in the form of excise taxes.

We say, sir, concerning these indirect taxes which are levied at the producer's level, that they are all subject to certain inherent vices. There has been no effort on the part of the Minister of Finance to grapple with these vices in announcing sweeping increases in taxes of that nature. He is going to go on taking more than 40 per cent of his total revenue this year in the form of these indirect taxes.

In the first place, sir, they are hidden. The people do not have an opportunity of measuring the extent of the taxes that they are paying when they buy things which have already been subjected to these heavy indirect taxes.

In the second place, these taxes pyramid as they pass from hand to hand. Several years ago I gave in the house an actual example of a manufacturer who sells his product at $1 a unit. He adds the 8 per cent sales tax. He sells to the wholesaler. The wholesaler adds his 20 per cent mark-up, not only on the $1, but on the 8 cents tax as well. It passes on to the retailer, who in turn adds a 50 per cent mark-up, not only on the tax, not only on the mark-up on the tax, but on the 50 per cent mark-up on the mark-up on the tax.

Consequently, in that case what the consumer pays is not 8 per cent, but 14·4 per cent. And if by chance there should be one other hand in the process through which those goods pass, for instance a jobber, the poor consumer will pay, not simply as in the case I gave, a mark-up on the mark-up on the tax, but he will be faced with a mark-up on the tax, plus a mark-up on the mark-up on the tax, plus a mark-up on the mark-up on the mark-up on the tax.

What does the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) say about all that? He not only accepts the process, but he wants to go on and increase the tax. In that way, by an increase in the tax at the source, you will find that the spread, the pyramiding, will increase greatly. It will be far more than in the case I gave, from 8 per cent to 14·4. In that case the increase will spread by the additional 25 per cent to 18 per cent.

That brings me to an observation concerning taxes of this kind, that the government gains less than the consumer pays on account of the tax. The government does not receive in that case 14·4 per cent. Under this shocking tax the minister will not be collecting 18 per cent. No, he will receive 10 per cent, as in the former case he received just 8 per cent. And what justification can there be for taxes of that nature, where the government gets into its coffers far less than the consumer has to pay on account of the imposition of the tax?

Those are weighty enough reasons in normal times, but in a time of inflation, surely this is far from being a time when taxes of this nature should be increased. It is a time when, if the government were really serious in trying to combat inflation, it would be reducing taxation of that kind. And I say to you that the sales tax in this budget ought to have been reduced, if the government really meant seriously to confront the problem of inflation with a series of effective measures.

The fourth vice of the hidden tax, which is so objectionable at a time like this, is that the government inevitably increases the cost of the goods, but it does not create any more goods in the process. It simply intensifies that process of inflation which has been described as too many dollars chasing too few goods. This kind of taxation does not create any more goods; it simply increases the cost of the goods.

Now, do you recall the year 1935, when the late Mr. Mackenzie King went up and down this country during the election campaign of that year and, as reported in various dispatches of the Canadian Press, denounced the sales tax in these words:

> That iniquitous tax which presses alike on the rich and the poor.

"That iniquitous tax"—do you heed those words? And yet the Minister of Finance today is proposing an increase in that iniquitous tax.

When the late Hon. J. L. Ralston as minister of finance, on June 24, 1940, came to make his budget speech, he dealt with the subject of the sales tax in these words:

> We realize that increases in indirect taxes disguise the burdens imposed by the war but they are much more likely to distribute these burdens harshly and unfairly.

And what Mr. Ralston had then to say about the burden of war taxes can be applied with equal force and validity today to these increases in taxes necessitated by the expansion of our defence program, as well as by the government's inability to curb its own vaulting extravagance.

When Mr. Ilsley in the following year made his first budget speech, on April 29, 1941, he said this:

> An increase in the sales tax has, I think, been fairly generally expected. At least, there are evidences of a good deal of buying in anticipation of such an increase. This tax, while comparatively easy of administration and collection and extremely productive, has marked defects as a fiscal instrument. After extended consideration, we decided on balance against any increase. In coming to this decision, we were not forgetful of the problems of agriculture, which would have been intensified had the sales tax been raised.

And, sir, by the increase in the sales tax today, following Mr. Ilsley's sound reasoning, the burden which agriculture is unfairly being called upon to bear today will thereby be intensified.

Then Mr. Ilsley had something further than that to say in peacetime, because when he brought in the budget on October 12, 1945, he had this to say concerning the sales tax:

> I have been impressed also with the extent to which the sales tax is having a discouraging effect on the rapid and efficient modernization of our productive equipment.

And later on he says:

> Particularly we should remove those taxes which, imposed far back in the production process, increase costs out of proportion to the contribution which they make to the revenue.

Mr. Speaker, could you have more effective indictments than those of the sales tax, in general, and thereby of the proposals the Minister of Finance has put before the house that those burdens should be intensified now, and that the iniquities of these indirect hidden taxes should now be multiplied? The Minister of Finance should be called upon in this house to withdraw his proposal for this 25 per cent increase in the sales tax. At a time when people are having so much difficulty in purchasing clothing, boots, shoes, shirts, furniture, let us remind ourselves that these necessities of life are subject to the sales tax, and that that tax is going to be greatly increased. The Minister of Finance could not have done worse than he has done in this proposal.

And, sir, his proposals with reference to commodity taxes are open to the same kind of objection. I wish I had time to review them; but what he has done, apparently, is to choose out many things that are necessities for most people, and to pass over such things as liquor, in the process. He has fastened on things like irons and ironers, electric kettles and electric toasters for an increase from 15 to 25 per cent in the tax which was unfairly imposed upon them last year.

He goes farther, and he applies that tax, now increased to 25 per cent, to a range of articles which were not subject to it before, including clocks and watches, fountain pens, luggage, shopping bags—with the exception of paper ones—and I suppose we will all be carrying paper shopping bags soon, under this budget. It includes cameras also. There has been no attempt in the budget to distinguish between articles that are expensive, and thus extravagant, and articles which are not expensive, and are necessities for people in every walk of life.

He comes along and imposes a new 15 per cent tax on electric stoves, hot plates, washing machines and refrigerators, thereby inevitably increasing inflation and casting further heavy impositions upon young married people.

While at the same time he makes a great to-do about reducing the tax on candy and soft drinks, let us look a little further and heed the effect of the sales tax. I read in a dispatch from Toronto, as reported in the Globe and Mail of April 13, that a board of education committee meeting was told by business administrator Fuller that the increase to 10 per cent from 8 per cent in the general sales tax would add $4,000 to the price tag on classroom supplies, such as scribblers and pencils.

Now, can you imagine anything more utterly foolish than to heap all these exactions on the things that people have to buy, and thus intensify the unfairness of a tax which bears more heavily, relatively, on people of small means?

And sir, in measuring the inflationary effect of the budget, and the futility of the policy of the government, let us not forget that there are already rumblings of demands for a general wage increase, as a direct result of these burdensome impositions.

There is another aspect of this matter to which I should like to refer. At the dominion-provincial conference the government came forward and apparently agreed to an amendment to the constitution to give the provinces the right to levy a 3 per cent turnover tax. While that matter was under discussion, while negotiations were proceeding between the dominion and the provinces; after giving the provinces to understand that it would facilitate an amendment to the constitution to permit them to levy that objectionable kind of tax, this government now comes forward and slaps on a 2 per cent increase in the sales tax from 8 to 10 per cent. They beat the provinces to the gun, and have made it that much more difficult for the provinces, even in the unfortunate event that there should be an amendment to the constitution permitting them, to impose such a tax. This government has made it virtually impossible for the provinces, having regard to the actualities of the taxing situation, to use that taxing power, for that would mean an increase from 8 to 13 per cent in these taxes levied at the consumer level, or a total increase of 62·5 per cent in this kind of tax as a result of these measures of the government. In that way I say that the government has broken faith with the provinces.

There are just two more matters I should like to discuss. I wish to say just one word on the subject of personal savings. I am sure that there never was a time when it was more desirable that people should have the opportunity of setting aside personal savings. As under the inflationary heat they watch their savings in the form of life insurance melt away, they need more savings with which to buy more insurance in order to protect themselves and their families. At this very time the Minister of Finance reports that last year there was a drop of $270 million or 30 per cent in the total personal savings in Canada. That is a most significant decrease when you consider that the national income in terms of the same kind of dollars has been rising rapidly. The budget is going to take another $625 million from the personal savings of the people, which last year were just $645 million. Unless there is some relief for the people, unless the figures change, unless there is an increase in savings or some relief so that they may increase their personal savings, this budget is going to take all of last year's total personal savings in Canada, less $20 million.

I say in conclusion that if the purpose of this budget was to stimulate inflation, the minister could not have done a more effective job. On the other hand, if his purpose was, as he professes, to control inflation, he could not have done a much worse job. This budget and these taxes will intensify inflation. They will accelerate inflation. They abet inflation.

They share in inflation. This budget profits by inflation. This budget was conceived in inflation, and it proposes to live on the avails of inflation.

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my first remarks of this afternoon will relate specifically to the financial proposals contained in the minister's budget. After having completed that reference I intend to deal with the Canadian coal mining industry, which industry at the moment is suffering considerable stress and strain. After having listened to the speeches delivered yesterday by the three opposition leaders I am forced to conclude that there is actually little left to say with respect to the principal weaknesses in the budget unless I am to indulge in rather prolonged repetition.

Hon. members will appreciate that because of the arrangements for speaking in this house the financial critic of the official opposition is placed in the position of being able to move an amendment if he so desires. The second speaker is the leader of the C.C.F. who is in position to move a subamendment, which was done in this case. That leaves us in the position where we are not able to move an amendment even though we should desire to do so. Even when a decision has been rendered on the amendment and subamendment we are still prohibited under the rules from moving an amendment.

I should like to turn for a moment to the amendment moved by the financial critic of the Progressive Conservative party. This amendment asserts in its first paragraph:

> The proposals of the Minister of Finance are unsatisfactory because they will inevitably increase the cost of living for all and especially for those least able to bear it.

My leader indicated in the course of his remarks yesterday that that is the conviction which we hold. The second paragraph asserts:

> This house condemns in particular, as inflationary, the increase by 25 per cent of the general sales tax and is of the opinion that the increase is unnecessary and unwise.

In the course of his observations my leader indicated that we concur in those observations. The third paragraph reads:

> This house further condemns the heavy increase in excise taxes on certain essential commodities and is of the opinion that much of the government's proposed huge increase in taxation is due to its own extravagance.

Before a decision is reached on this section I should like to have one or more Progressive Conservative speakers elaborate upon that reference to extravagance. I realize fully that it is an easy reference to make, but I would feel much better if the subject could be elaborated upon by a subsequent speaker. The fourth clause reads:

> The house regrets the failure of the government to take effective steps to deal with profiteering.

We concur fully in that. The leader of the C.C.F. (Mr. Coldwell) added a further clause to that amendment, reading as follows:

> This house further regrets the failure of the government to exempt from the proposed 20 per cent defence surtax the incomes of single persons up to $1,500 and the incomes of married persons up to $3,000.

We concur in that. If the exemptions which prevailed prior to the very substantial increase in the cost of living were just, then it is particularly proper that we should press at this time for the raising of those exemptions. When I examine the budget I am personally convinced, be the facts what they may, that it was thrown together in a hurry. It reminds me very much of the housewife who is an afternoon bridge addict and who discovers about five minutes to six that her husband will be home from work almost immediately after six o'clock and it will be necessary for her to rush home, slap some things together and call the result a dinner. That is the impression I cannot help but take out of the budget.

The minister has asserted that his purposes are twofold: First, to raise money to meet government expenditures and, second, to use financial methods as an economic weapon designed to influence and control the factors working upon the economy. In simple language, it was an attempt to curb the inflationary trend.

Obviously the minister had in mind the killing of two birds with the one stone. The minister's almost savage bites at income, and let us not forget for one moment that he sank his teeth deeply into moderate incomes, is designed to siphon off enough purchasing power to reduce prices. I am personally convinced, as has been said by previous speakers, that the things which he has done must inevitably have a completely opposite effect to that which he seems to desire. The sales tax has been characterized as being iniquitous. Knowing the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) as I do, I rather fancy that if he had not been quoting when he used the word "iniquitous" he would have found some much more effective and appropriate language with which to describe it. If I were anywhere except here I believe I could think without any difficulty of appropriate language with which to describe the increase in the sales tax. The increase of 25 per cent will certainly aggravate the position of the low and middle income groups.

The excise tax on washing machines, stoves and refrigerators is like a twisting and grinding foot that has been on the throat of the ordinary man for all too long already.

After having increased the burden of costs on the low and average income groups by increasing the sales tax and by imposing an excise tax on additional commodities, the minister then deliberately hit below the belt by imposing an additional 20 per cent surcharge on income tax. I think that the Canadian consumers, particularly those in the low or middle income groups, can quite properly cry foul. However, since the minister is not only the offender but the referee the little fellow can only cry foul in vain. Actually the whole budget represents nothing more or less than a kick in the teeth of those who during the past several months particularly have laid such emphasis upon the rapidly increasing cost of living which, as has been stated by my leader more than once, is undermining the health of many Canadian people, is lowering their morale, and could in effect actually threaten Canada's defence effort.

Because of higher taxes, because of higher living costs—and they are certainly going to be higher as time goes on—it is inevitable that organized labour and others will demand higher wages. Let us make no mistake about it. The result is certainly bound to be a swamping of any good purposes which the government may have had in mind, or hoped to accomplish, as a consequence of the budget. Obviously the government and the Minister of Finance have found it desirable to either overlook or forget that fact. It was said by the Minister of Finance that the sales tax does not apply to so-called staple foods. It is argued that because of this it will not increase costs for a good many people. May I ask the minister this question? Even though for the sake of argument, we were to accept his view that it will not increase costs, can he say that it will decrease costs to the Canadian people? His answer could not be yes under any circumstances.

As I have stated once or twice already, it is going to increase the cost of living of the average family in Canada. While still referring to the sales tax, I might say that I received a communication from one of my constituents only today. It is not often I get a request that entails so much difficulty in the preparation of an answer. This chap submitted this to me and asked me to comment. I cannot comment so I am going to put it on the record and let the minister or the parliamentary assistant to the minister do so. He refers to the sales tax as part of a vicious circle or, as he calls it, part of the house which Abbott built. He says that first you have the sales tax. Then you have the rise in the cost of living to pay the sales tax. Then, he says, there is a demand for higher wages to meet the rise in the cost of living to pay the sales tax. Then, he says, there is the granting of the demand for higher wages to meet the rise in the cost of living to pay the sales tax. Then he says there will be an extra issue of money or more taxes to meet the granting of the demand for higher wages to meet the rise in the cost of living to pay the sales tax. Then he says there is likely to be devaluation of the extra issue of money to meet the granting of the demand for higher wages to meet the rise in the cost of living to pay the sales tax. Then he says there must be, according to his way of thinking, another sales tax to—or has Mr. Abbott's house by this time collapsed?

I hope that either the minister or his parliamentary assistant will indicate to me some time during this debate whether this man's thinking is right or wrong, and if it is fallacious I should like to know in what respect. Certain of these so-called non-staple goods include tea, coffee, cocoa, mustard, relishes, prepared household beverages, vinegar, flavouring extracts, sauces and so forth. The minister knows as well as all other hon. members of the house know that, while we cannot properly categorize these things as staples, they are found on almost every table at each and every meal. In effect they have become staples. They are to be taxed, and the tax is to be heavier as a consequence of the 25 per cent increase in the sales tax.

It was said in the house yesterday that certain merchants have taken advantage of these tax increases to extract from the Canadian people actually more than the new taxes represent. There is no denying that fact. I would be the first to admit that most merchants are perfectly honest. However, there is evidence that in some cases not only is the tax which has been imposed larger than that which the increase actually represents, but certain merchants impose the taxes on goods which they had in storage in large supply, and the government cannot possibly benefit as a result of the additional tax upon them. The Canadian consumer, however, is bound to suffer as a result of prices going up when it was not necessary for them to do so. Where definite evidence of that sort of thing can be found I think that action should be taken to impose penalties.

Since the minister delivered his budget statement, I have read a number of statements such as the following: It could have been worse. Certainly it could have been worse, but in my opinion that is a poor standard by which to judge. It is very much like a doctor saying to an individual: Brace up, my friend, you have chicken pox; it could have been worse; it might have been smallpox. My opinion is, and has been right along, in spite of everything contained in the budget, and in fact because of certain things contained therein, that certain effective action must be taken by the government now to stop the ever-spiralling cost of living. We must remember that, at this very time when we are presumed to be developing a defence program within our nation, at a time when we are presumed to be developing security measures designed to combat sabotage within our country, at this very time when we are participating in external conflict outside of our country, at a time when we are supplying arms to those who, with us, desire to preserve the democratic concept of life, we are doing other things which can in effect destroy our entire effort to make the maximum contribution toward the preservation of democracy.

Yesterday the financial critic of the Progressive Conservative party quoted Stalin's reference to currency. I think there are numerous quotations which could be taken from communist propaganda and which would be just as effective. Karl Marx, who together with Engels produced the communist manifesto, stated more than one hundred years ago that there was only one way to kill capitalism; that was by taxes, taxes and more taxes. Had he been dealing with the situation today he might have said crazy taxes and crazier types of taxes, because that seems to be the trend in our country.

I appreciate that a substantial portion of the taxation now imposed results from obligations which arise in connection with the defence of our country. The other day I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) if it were the intention of the government to set up a defence expenditures committee, comparable to the war expenditures committee which served during the war and to the war expenditures and economies committee which functioned shortly after the war. In view of the fact that we intend to spend $5,000 million for defence purposes over the next three years I am convinced it is absolutely imperative that a committee of this kind be set up without delay. I am not favorably disposed toward referring this matter to the public accounts committee, but I will not elaborate on that point.

Yesterday the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) made reference to small loan companies. I had intended to refer to those companies myself, and had good reason for doing so. When certain credit restrictions were adopted, I understand voluntarily in part, the small loan companies across the country became as active as beehives. As a matter of fact I rather feel there may be some intrigue in high places. During the Easter recess two cases came to my attention, and without mentioning names I should like to indicate to the house the nature of those cases. One man wanted to expand his small business, and negotiated a loan from a chartered bank. He was advised that the money would be available, but before he had an opportunity to use it he was advised that "due to government regulations" they had to withdraw the loan. Within two days the manager or a representative of one of these small loan companies approached this man and said, "We hear you require $2,000. We are in a position to make the money available to you." Where did that man get his information? Only two men knew about this, the businessman and the bank manager. There may be some significance in the fact, as he said to me, that these small loan companies can compound their interest to the point where the borrower is paying 18 per cent. It could be that there is connivance between these financial institutions.

That is as far as I am going, except to say that recent statistics indicate that the loans made by small loan companies have multiplied in recent months. Many young people maintaining their own domiciles and experiencing acute difficulty in living on their present incomes are going in and mortgaging their furniture and their cars, if they have cars, in order to borrow from small loan companies and get by what they think is a temporary condition, but which I am afraid is going to be anything but temporary. As a consequence I fear that many of these families are going to be completely destroyed economically. That is all I intend to say on this matter at the moment, but I would suggest to the minister that this aspect of the situation be checked rather carefully.

I mentioned earlier that I desired to refer to the question of coal. I do so because, as I also said, the coal mining industry in Canada is suffering great stress and strain today and if appropriate action is not taken without delay the situation is likely to become far more acute. I come from a province in which is found approximately 92 per cent of Canada's coal reserves, and I represent a constituency in which coal mining is an important industry. Speaking in the house yesterday, the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) expressed certain of his fears, and I can sympathize with the way he feels. He referred to the export of gas from Alberta to central Canada and the detrimental effect he thought that might have upon the coal mining industry and the general industrial development of the maritimes. The hon. member also registered opposition to the development of the St. Lawrence seaway project, for very similar reasons.

I am not referring to these measures for the purpose of criticizing what the hon. member had to say. I believe he is quite right to feel as he does, but I cannot agree that we should give up any idea of exporting gas and oil to central Canada, nor can I agree that we should permit the St. Lawrence project to remain undeveloped. In my opinion these things need not have a detrimental effect upon industry either in the maritimes or anywhere else, but certainly steps will have to be taken in order to obviate what could occur if we just continue to drift. As I say, I come from Alberta, where we have had tremendous gas and oil developments particularly since 1947; yet in that same province we have a tremendous coal mining industry. When I tell you that we have 92 per cent of Canada's coal reserves there; then when I tell you that last year we produced 27,595,702 barrels of crude oil; when I tell you there are 2,088 producing oil wells in Alberta—775 being at Redwater, 548 at Leduc, 329 at Turner valley and 446 in other areas; when I tell you there are 401 gas wells producing; when I tell you there were 59 million acres of crown and privately-owned land under exploration in 1950; when I tell you there were 127 drilling rigs in operation last year and that in 1950 alone they drilled over 820 miles of wells: then you will realize why the coal miner in my province is a bit exercised about what could conceivably happen to him.

I do not hold the fears some people seem to have. In the first place, as I say, I cannot believe that we should even think of retarding progress. I am not unmindful of the fact that when the generation of electric energy was undertaken in volume a great many people felt that it would result in the destruction of not only the coal mining industry but other industries within the country. I am particularly pleased that we have had this gas and oil development. As a matter of fact, even though there are coal mines in my own constituency I do not hesitate to assert that I have joined with others in pressing to have gas brought into my town. I know that it is cheaper than coal; I know it is cleaner to handle; and I know it is easier to handle and regulate in connection with the heating of my house. At the same time, I must say that we in Canada must concentrate upon the development of new markets for Canadian coal. There are parts of Canada which could not conceivably be supplied with gas. We must determine new uses for coal—as a matter of fact, the word "determine" is not a good one. We already know uses to which coal can be put. We must undertake the extraction of the products that can be derived from coal when it is broken down. Moreover, if there should be a decline in employment in the coal mining industry as a consequence of the development of gas and oil, then certainly every opportunity must be provided to enable the coal miners to become established in other fields of employment.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to mention a few more things about coal. In Alberta there is an estimated 100 billion tons, and yet in 1950 there was actually less coal mined than in 1949. I know that the big Brazeau collieries at Nordegg in my own riding were inoperative last year owing to a tragic fire which destroyed their surface workings, and that contributed to the decrease in production. Two or three other factors contributed to it as well. During that same period, however, we imported more coal from the United States into central Canada than ever before. I have heard arguments about United States coal being cheaper. I have heard arguments about its being cleaner. But if we require this product some time during a period of national stress, and imports are cut off, cheapness and cleanliness will not be of much consequence.

Last year there was a decrease of almost half a million tons in coal production in the province of Alberta. Actually, four mines in the Drumheller valley were closed. There is a bright spot, though, because in January of this year coal production was 807,456 tons as compared with 761,157 tons last year. We have had government subventions paid on the delivery of western coal. There has been a maximum rate of $8.40 a ton, with a subsidy of $2.50 a ton. It was only recently that we encountered a further increase in freight rates on coal from western to central Canada. There was an increase of $2.35 per ton. We are told that at this time next year the same thing is going to happen. Mr. Speaker, it has been estimated by reliable authorities that by next year, because of our inability to find other markets, because of our failure to take proper action in connection with freight rates, because of the development of gas and oil, the production of coal in Alberta is likely to be two million tons less than in 1950.

This would mean two things. Many mines will go out of business, and it is proper for us to realize at this time that you just cannot allow coal mines to go out of business, then expect to have them start up again overnight. Every time a coal mine closes, it could well be a permanent loss so far as the industry is concerned. There are 10,000 miners in my province, and 75,000 people dependent upon the industry. It is a fight for survival. The loss of the two million tons to which I referred a moment ago is computed as being the margin of profitable operation. If we do not expand our markets, and production should fall by two million tons, it is conceivable there will be a collapse of that industry in that part of Canada. As Canadians, we cannot afford to allow the coal mining industry to be smashed. This is especially true when we are in the shadow of war, and may be in the shadow of war for a long time. It is equally true when we consider the vulnerability of our oil and gas fields, as well as the vulnerability of the refineries and pipe lines.

At the moment there is an acute shortage of power in the country. Surely, there is a market for a tremendous amount of coal, even low grade coal, if we expand our power developing industry in this country. The United States has been concentrating upon this for some time. They claim that they produce electrical energy more cheaply this way than by any other. Mr. Speaker, it all resolves itself into one very important factor. In referring to that important factor, I might well quote what the premier of Alberta recently had to say about this subject:

> The production of coal in 1950 amounted to 3,118,206 tons, valued at $41,631,579 as compared with 3,616,981 tons, valued at $44,541,538 in 1949. This decline is at least partially due to the stiff competition which the coal industry is facing from oil and natural gas. The principal consumers of Alberta's bituminous coal are the two transcontinental railways and their program of conversion to oil burning and diesel locomotives makes it imperative that other markets for bituminous coal be developed.
> The railways have announced that on March 31, 1951, the special freight rate of $8.40 per ton on Alberta coal moving to the Ontario market will be cancelled. The so-called normal tariff is $13.10 a ton and the railways propose to re-establish such rate by means of two increases—one of $2.35 per ton effective March 31, 1951, and a second similar increase effective a year hence. This will render substantially more difficult present efforts to establish an eastern Canadian market for Alberta coal and emphasizes the need for a national fuel policy designed to open Canadian markets to Canadian producers.

What I was coming to, Mr. Speaker, is that Canada requires a national fuel policy. May I call it six o'clock?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

[Mr. Shaw.]

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

SECOND READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Mr. H. W. Winkler (Lisgar) moved that the following bills be read the second time:

Bill No. 170, for the relief of Viola Rupert Moran.—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 171, for the relief of Philip Rosen.—Mr. Winkler.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Gagnon: On division.

Mr. Speaker: Carried on division.

Motion agreed to on division and bills read the second time.

CANADIAN LEGION OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE SERVICE LEAGUE

Mr. David A. Croll (Spadina) moved the second reading of Bill No. 190, respecting the Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League.

Mr. Brooks: Is the hon. member going to explain the bill?

Mr. Croll: Mr. Speaker, this bill is presented on behalf of the Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League. I am not going to say very much about the organization, which is very well known in this country. It is a very important and a very influential organization of war veterans which reaches into every home in this Dominion of Canada.

It is a very simple bill. Its purpose is to make three changes in the act. When these changes are made the objective will have been attained, which is further to democratize the Legion. At the present time the bylaws and regulations of the Legion can be amended by the dominion executive. When the bill came before the house in 1948 some members were critical in a kindly way of that particular aspect of the bill. This bill will no longer empower the dominion executive to pass bylaws and regulations, but rather will leave it in the hands of the dominion convention.

In addition to that, it proposes to give the provincial conventions the right to enact bylaws and rules governing their own command, provided that those bylaws and rules are not inconsistent with nor contrary to any passed by the dominion convention.

Its third purpose is designed to protect the badges, insignia, and regalia against use by persons other than those authorized by the Legion. This house will appreciate that no outsider should be permitted to capitalize on the goodwill and the reputation which the Legion bears in this country. That is all there is to the bill. I trust that it will appeal to members of the house and that we shall be able to pass it tonight.

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to oppose this bill in any way. I think it will meet with general acceptance so far as the house is concerned. It is a bill which has been before the other chamber, and I understand that it was recommended by the committee of the other chamber without any amendment.

The hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) has said that the original bill as now being amended was before this house in 1948. At that time there was considerable debate on the different sections of the bill. I think that this bill corrects some of the matters which it was felt at that time should be corrected.

I should like to say a few words, Mr. Speaker, with reference to the Legion and its organization. Before 1948 I understand the Legion was organized under the different provincial companies acts, and we are not surprised that an organization of its size and extent should look for a dominion charter.

The Legion has had tremendous growth. As we all know, it started after the first world war, and then of course after the second world war it practically doubled its members. I understand that there are over 2,000 branches in Canada today, and I believe it has a membership of around 400,000. Its members consist of ex-soldiers who fought in the South African war, in the first world war and in the second world war. Now we have men who are fighting in Korea who will also be eligible for membership in the Canadian Legion. Therefore we can realize what a large place the Legion has in the life of this Dominion of Canada.

I think that the success of the Legion since its inception has been due mostly to the calibre of the men who have been directing its destinies. One has only to mention such men as General Turner, General Currie, General Crerar, General LaFleche, Brigadier General Ross, General Price, Alexander Walker and men such as those, and last but not least, our present president, Alfred Watts. These men have been outstanding not only in the Canadian Legion but in other walks of life in this country of ours.

I should like to pay tribute, if I may, to some of the secretaries of the Canadian Legion. As I remember, when I first came to Ottawa—and I am sure that other hon. members who attended the different veterans committees will remember—Mr. Reg. Bowler was untiring in his efforts for the advancement of returned soldiers at that time. We had the late John Herwig, who also used to appear before our veterans committees. I should like to pay a special tribute, Mr. Speaker, to a gentleman who passed away here just last month. I refer to the late Richard Hale. He was known as Dick Hale. I remember Richard Hale attending all the meetings of the veterans committees of this house since 1935, and he was attending meetings before that. Dick Hale, as we knew him, was on the staff of The Legionary for ten years. He wrote the page called "The helping hand". For thirty-three years he worked for the disabled veteran. I do not think there was anyone belonging to the Legion or outside of it, Mr. Speaker, who had a better knowledge of the Pension Act or the other acts which refer to the soldiers' welfare than had Richard Hale. A recent article in The Legionary said that he had handled over 20,000 individual claims for different returned men; therefore thousands of men have reason to be very thankful indeed to the late Richard Hale.

I should also like to say that in my opinion, Mr. Speaker, never in the history of this country have we had such a splendid organization as the Canadian Legion is. The Legion, as we know, stands for practically all that is best in this country. They have worked and are working untiringly for the betterment not only of returned men but of our country in general. At this time, when it is necessary to consider pensions, and matters connected with the cost of living, the hospitalization of veterans, as well as the question of manpower and of civil defence, we know that all these matters are receiving very careful attention from the Canadian Legion.

I am also very pleased indeed that such a powerful body as the Legion is non-political, and I hope this is something the Legionnaires and the organization generally will guard jealously.

The hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) mentioned that it was an exclusive organization. As I said a moment ago, only those men who served in the South African war, or in the first or second world wars, are eligible for membership. Members of the Legion are proud indeed to belong to that organization and to wear its insignia. I am sure it is for this reason that in the bill there is a section which will guard even more carefully the insignia of the Canadian Legion.

It is not my intention to say anything further. I am satisfied that the bill, coming as it does from the Legion, will meet with the approval of the house. So far as I am concerned, I am very pleased indeed to give it my approval.

Mr. O. L. Jones (Yale): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join with previous speakers in paying my respects to the Canadian Legion, and its work in Canada. It is not often one has the opportunity to speak in the house about this organization, because it very rarely comes to the house with any request beyond those affecting pensions, or other matters handled through committees of the house.

I consider the Canadian Legion one of the greatest stabilizing influences in the Canadian economy and way of life. As a non-political organization, and working as it does through its committees in every town and village in the dominion, people perhaps are not fully aware of its work in those communities.

I should like to pay tribute not only to the secretaries in those branches but to the executive committees, men who not only give their time night after night to looking after the welfare of their fellow returned soldiers, but take an interest in the welfare of the whole community.

The bill aims to make the Legion still more democratic in its operation. In my view it is an advance to have dominion conventions make changes. I was wondering however if in the new section 15 there is not some weakness. We see that it says that no person except the Legion, or a person authorized in writing by the Legion, shall do certain things. My suggestion is that the meaning of the word "Legion" should be defined. Is it the provincial command, the dominion command, an individual club or a group that may be operating as a Legion in some small town?

I believe if the term is defined we will be further ahead than we are at the present time, because we know that certain local clubs have initiated drives—and I shall not mention the kind—which have not met with the approval of the command itself. As the act now reads, with the full blessing of the law a branch could carry out what is distasteful to other branches, or to the Canadian Legion command. I would ask the sponsor of the bill if he has thought of broadening the definition so as to clarify this situation. I am satisfied it is the wish of the Legion to keep the same control over its operations, and to prevent individuals or small groups from exploiting the good name and the insignia of the organization.

[Mr. Brooks.]

I am one hundred per cent behind the idea involved in the bill, and before closing my remarks I would ask for further clarification of that section. In the name of the people in my riding I pay the highest possible tribute to the work of the Canadian Legion in that part of Canada, where it has been operating for the last twenty-five years, since its inception.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join with other hon. members in praising the very good work of the Canadian Legion. They are a great stabilizing force in times of peace and war, and they provide an agency to which any veteran may take his grievance, in the full knowledge that the Legion will do everything within its power to see that such grievances are redressed.

I recall that when the bill to incorporate the Canadian Legion was before the house in May of 1948 several members objected to section 5 on the ground that it provided for an undemocratic procedure in that the executive council would have the right to repeal bylaws or rules when the dominion convention is not in session.

At that time I did not oppose the section because I felt that, in view of the fact the Legion had asked for the enactment of the legislation and the request had come from the floor of the convention, the Legion knew best what it wanted. On the other hand I am glad this amendment is before the house, making provision that the bylaws can be repealed only by the convention instead of by the executive council. I also note the amendment provides that no person except the Legion shall have the right to manufacture, distribute or sell Canadian Legion insignia or emblems or badges. This is only right because it provides employment for veterans. I recall some years ago a most unpleasant incident in connection with poppy sales. We have always looked upon the manufacture of poppies as providing employment for veterans; yet at that time we found that a large number of poppies had been manufactured in Japan and sent to this country for sale. That certainly did not meet with the wishes of the people.

In the same way, I think it is desirable that the manufacturing of insignia should be carried out by veterans. It provides employment for disabled and blind veterans. Therefore I say the amendments in the bill merit the support of the house.

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add a few words to those already expressed on behalf of the Canadian Legion. I well remember in the years that followed the first great war the difficult time many of us had to bring forth some such organization as this. There were many attempts made, and different forms of veteran organizations were set up before the present Canadian Legion was brought into being. I think that today the Legion is probably the most influential organization in this nation.

As has been said by my colleague the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks), they now have some two thousand branches with a membership of something over 400,000. He stated, and I agree with him, that much of the success has been due to the capable officers who have been in charge of this great organization.

Coupled with the names that have been set forth in Hansard I should like to add that of a personal friend of mine, the immediate past president, Colonel Baxter. Colonel Baxter is a very influential citizen and a good businessman who spends most of his time flying from one part of Canada to the other in connection with his business. Despite all this, he has given a great deal of time to the welfare and advancement of the Legion during the past few years. He was asked to continue in office at the last convention, but because of his business activities he found that he could not give any further time.

Mention was made of the secretaries, ex-comrades Bowler and Herwig, both of whom obtained their first experience with the Legion in my province of Manitoba. Both gave splendid service in the provincial command before taking office with the dominion command. They both gave great service on behalf of their comrades.

I think this amendment is much in order. I do not agree with everything in section 4 which amends section 15 of the act and which states:

> No person except the Legion, or a person authorized in writing by the Legion, shall manufacture, distribute, sell, or use any Legion insignia, regalia, emblem, badge—

I think we should have some further information from the sponsor of the bill as to whether this would apply to just the executive officers. There is no more influential organization in Canada than the Canadian Legion. It would be difficult to enumerate the contributions they have made to the federal government and to this nation. During the last great war their assistance to the government of the day and to the people of this nation was invaluable. They have a stabilizing effect on the country in peacetime as well as in wartime. The civilian population of the country owe a debt of gratitude to the Legion.

I want to indicate my wholehearted support of the splendid work they are doing and say that I approve of these amendments.

Mr. H. P. Cavers (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, any organization with the fine reputation gained by the Canadian Legion during world war I, after world war I and during world war II should receive the consideration they are asking for with this bill. As one who had the honour of serving in the Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve I think I should say on behalf of the naval veterans that they have received great consideration and help from the Canadian Legion. In the part of the country from which I come there are five branches of the Canadian Legion. As the previous speaker has said, they have done great work in peacetime as well as during wartime and this bill commends itself to me as I think it will to other hon. members.

With regard to the amendment to section 15, I suppose there are those who take advantage of the insignia, emblems and other articles that might be sold by the Canadian Legion, so it is proper that they should be given the right to stipulate who shall have authority to sell these articles. Mention has been made of possible confusion with regard to the Legion. I have not the act before me but I would imagine the phraseology would be interpreted in the interpretation section of the act.

Mr. C. E. Bennett (Grey North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join with other hon. members in paying tribute to the Canadian Legion. There are a number of Legion branches in my riding and I say without qualification that they are exceedingly well managed and contribute a great deal to the well-being of the veterans and their families and to the general welfare of the whole district. The Legion branches have sponsored many worth-while activities—to mention only a few: community centre projects, hospital drives, the founding of high school and collegiate scholarships and so on. We have learned in Grey North that when a worthy cause is before the public the members of the Legion are solidly behind it. The Legion is playing an important part in the furtherance of Canadian citizenship.

In the old days the Legion was an army organization. Being interested particularly in the R.C.A.F., I am glad to say that the Legion today is a harmonious amalgamation of members of the three services. As would be expected, the president of the Legion is a former air force officer, Group Captain A.

Watts, A.F.C., a world war II pilot and an efficient administrator. Group Captain Watts and the dominion executive council are providing aggressive and able leadership for the Canadian Legion organization.

As previous speakers have said, there is nothing particularly contentious about this bill. The first two amendments are constitutional changes requested by the Legion while the third amendment aims to protect the insignia, regalia and badges of the Canadian Legion. This is a very necessary amendment. As has been stated, the general public will be protected by this amendment because these articles will have to have the approval of the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley). I am sure that this bill commends itself to the house.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I rise to commend this bill to the members of the house. As has been said more eloquently than I could say it by other hon. members who have spoken, the Canadian Legion is worthy of our support. I have a slightly different background from that of many of those who have spoken. I was denied the opportunity of enlisting in two world wars. Like a great many others in a similar position, I have a sort of complex with respect to matters of this kind.

When the nation is in danger and uniforms are worn by so many one feels that perhaps he is not doing his full share in the national interest. I have had that feeling keenly from time to time, as I suppose many others have, but there is not much one could do about it. Because of that background I welcome the chance to support the Canadian Legion on an occasion such as this when they come before us asking for amendments to their charter.

I think perhaps the proudest night in my life was about two years ago when the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg), then Minister of Veterans Affairs, came to our branch of the Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League in Brampton on which occasion I was given an honorary membership in the organization. I look back on that night with the greatest of pride.

During the period between the two great wars and during the last war and since there has been a well-founded feeling that the Legion is in the forefront of all things that are worth while and worthy of patriotic Canadianism. Those feelings have found their core and centre in the Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League.

We appreciate the opportunity of saying a word on behalf of an organization that has meant so much to Canada, to the empire—yes, and to the world. I can speak tonight with perhaps a little more feeling and emotion than usual in supporting a bill like this which is designed to help the people who have made it possible for us to sit in this chamber and to legislate instead of having a different system of government under which we might be living today were it not for their valiant efforts. It is easy to forget over the years because time changes things so much. It is so easy for us to forget that between wars, as was the case between the last two world wars, there must be someone like the Legion, prepared to carry the torch of patriotism, endeavour and activity in the interest of all that is best in our national life. All these things the Legion has done and will continue to do. I might say again that one of the proudest moments of my life was when I was admitted as one of the members of that great band of men and women who have left and are leaving their mark for better citizenship and for the advancement and the betterment of Canada as a whole.

Mr. Pouliot: In Brampton they always say it with flowers, and wonderfully too.

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, as another member of the Legion I want to join wholeheartedly in supporting this bill. I want to join with other members from all sides of the house in the nice things that have been said and the tributes that have been paid to the Canadian Legion. The many compliments that have been paid to the Legion are well deserved because the Legion has done a wonderful job. I do not think that any other party or club should be allowed to use the insignia or any other emblem or regalia that the Canadian Legion have used over the last twenty-five years. I do not want to take up the time of the house. I merely want to say that I wholeheartedly support the bill.

Mr. L. E. Cardiff (Huron North): Mr. Speaker, I too should like to associate myself with those who have spoken. I consider that the members of the Canadian Legion are the first citizens of Canada. I think we owe more to them than to any other group in our population. Therefore they are deserving of every consideration. It is not often we have a bill before the house on which all members on both sides can agree. I think it would be a very good thing if more bills came before the house on which members on both sides were able to get up and say that they agreed. The members of the Legion have certain privileges. I do not suppose there is even a small community in my riding that has not a branch of the Legion. They have rooms in which they congregate to enjoy themselves in talking over old times. I suppose that is the reason that other people who have no business there would like to be able to get in with them. I am not a returned man and do not belong to the Legion. Because I am an outsider I feel that I should join with others in supporting the bill.

The Legion has done a lot of good. Those of us who have been members of the house since the last war ended have had before us problems concerning which we sometimes could not get what we wanted. The Legion would take up these matters and support us, and we would support them. I have had a lot of support from the Legion in trying to get things for men who were seeking to re-establish themselves after the war. Sometimes it was rather difficult. The government lays down rules and regulations, and unless somebody is generous-hearted enough to interpret the law flexibly someone is hurt. I sometimes think that no law that we pass is capable of taking care of all circumstances. There are certain cases where the law has to be administered with a little laxity. Unless the minister concerned with the administration of a particular law can see his way clear to be a little freer in his interpretation, then someone is hurt. It is not very long ago that I went to the minister about a certain case, and did not get any support at all.

Mr. Lapointe: It must have been a poor case.

Mr. Cardiff: It was not a poor case. If you would like me to air it I would love to do so right now.

Mr. Lapointe: I would not advise you to.

Mr. Cardiff: It was a case that should have been taken care of. It was not particularly within the law but, as I said before, we do not have any laws that can be administered properly unless there is some flexibility. If the bill will help the Legion in any shape or form I am all for it, or anything else that will help the Legion. They have done more for Canada than any other section of our population. For that reason I support the bill.

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I agree with all that has been said about the veterans of the Canadian army. They deserve every praise that has been bestowed on them. However, as an honorary member, believe it or not, of the British Empire Service League, I have a word or two to say about the organization. I find that there is somewhat of an anachronism in the name of the Legion. It is like M.B.E., C.B.E., O.B.E., Commander of the British Empire, Order of the British Empire. The British empire no longer exists since India gained her independence.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Order.

Mr. Pouliot: It is the commonwealth of nations, not the British commonwealth, the commonwealth of nations. I wonder why the gallant men who belong to the Legion do not call themselves the commonwealth service league in order to be up to date.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): No, no.

Mr. Pouliot: I cannot understand why some members put after their names the three fatidic letters, C.B.E., M.B.E. or O.B.E. It means they belong to the past. I will not move an amendment but I suggest that at the next session of parliament the Legion should come forward with legislation to change their name—

Mr. Harris (Danforth): No, no.

Mr. Pouliot: —from British Empire Service League to commonwealth service league. Such an action would be understood by all. It would be the same gathering of fine men with the same recollections, but they must also think of the future and not live in the past by retaining a completely out-of-date designation.

Mr. F. E. Lennard (Wentworth): As a member of the Canadian Legion and a past president of the local branch of the Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League, I join those who are not in favour of any change in the name.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): You are not alone.

Mr. Lennard: I have not risen in order to prolong this debate. I am absolutely in favour of these amendments. I believe they make for a better Legion, and I am all for them.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I rise to support this bill, Mr. Speaker; in fact I am very pleased with the amendments which are proposed. When the original bill was under consideration some members of this group questioned the wisdom of giving such wide powers to the dominion council, and I see that one of these amendments is intended to correct that situation.

I want to take this opportunity to express my appreciation of the good work done through the years by the Canadian Legion for veterans and their dependents, and for Canada as a whole. I am particularly pleased to note that the sponsor of this bill is himself a veteran who has taken a great interest in veterans affairs and has made a great contribution in the veterans affairs committee. Since 1926, when most of the veterans organizations in Canada were brought together to form the Legion, it has done a tremendous amount of work not only for veterans and their dependents but for the nation as a whole. Without a doubt the Legion is a tremendous influence in our democratic society, and its work in the national sphere is obvious to anyone close to veterans and their problems. The amendments to the Pension Act were largely based upon recommendations coming from the Legion. It might be said that the War Veterans Allowance Act sprang from the recommendation of the Legion. Then we have the great mass of legislation in the veterans charter, to which the Legion made a great contribution. The Legion did great work in helping veterans across Canada through its national pension bureau and the other services it renders. It has shown a great interest in national affairs, as was evidenced in the excellent brief presented to members of this house not long ago, upon which was based an interesting and important debate.

Then we come to provincial activities, which are manifold. I have had experience with those activities in British Columbia, like the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) and the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair), who also has been very active in veterans affairs. As a member of the provincial legislature I remember the annual pilgrimage of the Canadian Legion to Victoria to bring to the attention of the cabinet the problems of the veterans with respect to employment, preference in the provincial civil service, and the relationship of certain legislation to veterans and their dependents, including the education of the dependent children of veterans. The Legion in British Columbia has closely followed the needs and requirements of the veterans and their dependents; and there, as elsewhere, the Legion is respected in the community.

The Canadian Legion is a democratic organization, in that its decisions are not made at the top and then handed around for others to adopt. They come from the bottom. Certain branches are grouped together in such a way that they can conveniently get together to deal with the problems affecting a particular area within the province. I am happy to say that the West Kootenay zone is one of the most active in British Columbia. I have been associated with it through the years, being a charter member of the Legion, having been president of the branch for ten successive years, and a member of the provincial executive. I have been associated with many men and women who have worked actively in the interests of the Legion, so I have a personal knowledge of what the Legion stands for. In our zone we have an excellent magazine called The Banner, which covers the activities of the various branches where the resolutions originate that are sent to the provincial convention for consideration. The whole organization is based upon the branch, where the real work of the Legion is done.

Time will not permit me to describe the many things done by the local branches of the Legion throughout Canada. The branch, being close to the people, is close to the problems of the veterans, and from the local branches come the questions which are finally taken up by the dominion convention. This has been the practice through the years, and has been possible because numbers of veterans, men and women, have been willing to accept their personal responsibility for the welfare of the veterans and their dependents. In my opinion if we want to demonstrate our appreciation of the work of the Legion in Canada it is up to us to pass legislation that will give a better deal to pensioners, the recipients of war veterans allowances, and veterans and their dependents generally.

Mr. J. H. Harris (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I want to take about twenty seconds to say that I favour this bill and congratulate my colleague from Toronto on bringing it before us. I hope it passes unanimously.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, it is not the intention of anyone to talk out this bill, but I feel it incumbent upon me to make a few remarks. I am in accord with the amendments proposed. I say I feel obliged to say something about it because in 1948, when the original bill came into this house, practically writing the constitution of the Canadian Legion, I took exception to the powers that were vested in the executive at that time. Now I think time has proven me correct. My protest at that time was against granting the executive head of the Legion the right to cancel charters, to decide on memberships and all that sort of thing, without reference to the branches or commands. I believe the first amendment proposed in this bill has been brought in because the fears I expressed at that time have been shown to be justified. It is now proposed to divest the executive head of the organization of the power to make hard and fast rules infringing upon the rights of the membership down into the branches, and to hand that power back to the convention.

The second proposal is that the provincial convention should have the power to make regulations and so on, which power was taken from it in the previous bill. In effect we are really getting back to the position that existed before the bill was adopted in 1948. I have seen a very disturbing thing happen in two or three places in Canada, I think in British Columbia, Quebec and on the island of Cape Breton, where there were what were known as district command charters. These were granted by the provincial command to a certain area, which gave them jurisdiction in that area to promote the best interests of the Legion in accordance with provincial and national policy. The one to which I have particular reference is the Cape Breton district command. After being in existence for twenty-five years, and doing an excellent job of organization and promoting, that command lost its charter after the last convention. This was done without any consultation with the provincial movement or the command affected. It created considerable resentment and turmoil. So far as I know, that matter still stands as it was a few months ago when I discussed the problem with the people who carried on the work of that command.

I am in agreement with the amendments that are proposed here. I am also very much interested in the proposal contained in section 4, that the name of the Legion be not used for certain purposes. I recall that when I was actively associated with the Legion in an official capacity some very lucrative offers were made to us if we would allow the name of the Legion to be used to promote sweepstakes and gambling of different kinds. The Legion always turned thumbs down on that kind of thing. It was a matter of principle, because there was no written prohibition. I am glad to see the prohibition being specifically written in now, so that the name of the organization cannot be used for that purpose.

I thought, Mr. Speaker, in view of my very critical opposition to the original bill, concerning the very points that are now being amended, that I should say a few words. I am very pleased to see that the Legion has returned to the democratic process, where control of the organization in matters such as are contained in the amendment go back again to the rank and file of the membership.

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Cruickshank: Hon. members do not need to worry, because we will have plenty of time to put through this important bill. If some of my friends were as interested in the organization as I am, they would not be calling "question". There are six branches of the Legion in my riding, and one of the badges of which I am most proud is the gold badge of a life member of the Legion. There is one group that has not been mentioned in connection with the Legion which I should like to mention, and that is the ladies auxiliary. The Legion, like any other organization, could not function if it did not have the ladies behind it. Fortunately we have within that organization the pick of the women in Canada. These six branches in the Fraser valley function very well.

I do not think enough attention has been paid to what the Legion does on behalf of the dependents of veterans. In the first place, irrespective of what government had been in power since the first great war, we would not have secured the pension and advantages to the widows and their dependents, or the suitable disability pension that we have, if it had not been for the influence of the Canadian Legion. Since coming to this house I have had the privilege of sitting on a few committees on veterans affairs. The other day the veterans' widows from the various sections of Canada appeared before the committee to request certain legislation. I hope that, so far as possible, the committee sees fit to make that recommendation when the time comes.

There is one thing I do not want to allow to pass, Mr. Speaker. Mention was made about changing the name of the organization. Probably it was made in an irresponsible moment, because this Canadian Legion has great traditions behind it. It is not merely the Canadian Legion, but is affiliated with the Legions in the rest of the British empire. In so far as my riding is concerned you can change the name to "commonwealth" if you like, but we will continue to be extremely proud of our connection with the British empire. We are going to continue to be proud of it. There has been some discussion before, I think from the same member, when I heard it said that the Legion should go home—I may be wrong in the words, but it was something to this effect—and mind its own business. Mr. Speaker, there are some 400,000 men still left representing some 66,000 men and women who are remembered in this building by the memorial chamber, who do not need any advice along that line, particularly from those who were not qualified to speak on behalf of those who made the supreme sacrifice.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: This bill is now referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

Mr. Croll: Mr. Speaker, is there any particular reason why this bill should be referred to the standing committee? I thought perhaps we could deal with it here tonight.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With the unanimous consent of the house.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Croll moved that the Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee on Bill No. 190.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Sections 1 to 4 inclusive agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, in the very few moments left I hope to conclude my remarks with respect to the Canadian coal mining industry. Prior to six o'clock I expressed the personal fear that the Canadian coal mining industry is in an extremely precarious position. All available evidence points to that fact. This situation has developed substantially as a consequence of several factors, some of which I mentioned this afternoon. First, I lay it to the absence of a national fuel policy, something which is long overdue in Canada. Second, I attribute it to the stiff competition which has developed from natural gas and oil. Now, I may add a third, the failure on our part to have the greatest possible decentralization of secondary industry in Canada. I realize with respect to that latter that it is of far more serious consequence in some parts of Canada than in others. In my own province, as I indicated earlier, we have approximately 10,000 coal miners. They and their families comprise approximately 75,000 people. The collapse of the coal mining industry, or a serious impairment of it, does naturally create a serious problem as far as these people are concerned. However, as I stated this afternoon, I realize fully that in an area such as my own province of Alberta, where industrial development is progressing rapidly, there is a greater opportunity for the absorption of many of these workers into other branches of secondary industry. In the maritimes, however, especially in the province of Nova Scotia, as the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) indicated, the problem would be more severe as a consequence of, if I understood him correctly, the actual diminution of the secondary industry field in that province.

It would be a national tragedy, Mr. Speaker, if we were to allow this industry to deteriorate when we can prevent that deterioration. We all realize fully that oil and gas development is the most desirable thing. That is progress. I do not want it to be restricted unnecessarily, but I am not unmindful of the fact, as I indicated earlier, that our oil fields, our wells, our refineries, our storage facilities are vulnerable to attack, if attack should occur and heaven forbid that it ever should. But we must be fully conscious of the fact that it can occur.

In the second place, I think that we should never forget that our oil and gas are diminishing assets. We do not know; conceivably thirty, forty, fifty years from now we may not be talking in the same glowing terms of our vast oil and gas production; but if statistics can be believed and if surveys tell the truth—and we think they do—we will have coal reserves here several hundred, if not a few thousand years from the present time. So let us never lose sight of that fact, plus the fact that once the industry is allowed to deteriorate a long, long time will pass before we ever get it back on its feet.

With respect to the national fuel policy, I think it is imperative that we give further consideration to the development of new markets for Canadian coal. There are vast markets within our own nation. I think, too, that such a policy should give consideration to consumption of a greater volume of Canadian coal rather than to continue, as we are continuing now, to consume more and more imported United States coal.

As I said this afternoon, it is all right to talk about United States coal being cleaner and easier to handle; it is all right to talk about its other qualities; but let us not forget that we have no assured supply of coal from the United States. They can clamp down in time of emergency almost overnight, and under those conditions try to start your coal mining industry operating to capacity overnight and see what the results are.

I think that such a policy should give real consideration to the question of freight charges as applied to the movement of coal from the maritimes and from western Canada to the central markets of this nation.

Just one other point, Mr. Speaker: greater consideration should be given to the various products that can be procured from coal through the process of destructive distillation. It is a well known fact that coal tar can be fractionally distilled to yield certain organic products known as tar crudes which form the starting point for the synthesis of numerous products such as dyes, drugs, explosives, flavourings, preservatives, synthetics, resins, paints and stains. We should also remember that the residual pitch from this fractional distillation is utilized for paving, roofing, waterproofing and insulating. I think we are missing a golden opportunity if we fail at this time to engage in strenuous activity—if that is the proper way to describe it—toward the procurement from coal of the various other fractional products which in turn can be utilized for the production of these many things that I mentioned.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me emphasize again, as I did when commencing my remarks this afternoon, that I cannot possibly agree with those who assert that we should restrict our gas and oil production because of a presumed adverse effect which it may have upon industry in specific parts of the country. If we drift, as we are drifting at the present time, these fears may well be realized; but if we have a national fuel policy, if for defence purposes, and for economic stability within our country, we concentrate on the decentralization of industry, if we do engage in determination of how we may get specific existing markets, plus a number of other things which I am not going to take time to mention, then we can develop the gas and oil industry, we can develop the St. Lawrence waterways project, and we need not impair any part of this nation. Do it haphazardly, which seems to be the present program, and dire consequences will inevitably result.

(Translation):

Mr. L. D. Crestohl (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure and it is also for me an honour to say my first few words in this house in the language spoken by the majority of the people of my province. I do so out of respect for my fellow citizens of the province of Quebec, particularly for those who have elected me as their representative in the parliament of Canada, an honour which I greatly appreciate. I wish to assure them, and the hon. members that I will apply all my energy and such talents as I may possess to the task of serving their best interests.

(Text):

And now, Mr. Speaker, it is not wtihout some trepidation that I rise to speak in this house for the first time. This pulsation flows from my profound awareness of the great responsibility which rests upon every member of this house when he speaks. Such consciousness no doubt alerts every speaker to the exercise of caution, restraint and oftentimes courage, and I am certain that every hon. member of this house has at one time or another—like I am at this moment—been overawed by this great obligation, to the discharge of which we are all dedicated by a fervent desire to apply ourselves to the best of our ability.

May I first of all say to the voters of my constituency that I, Mr. Speaker, am deeply grateful to them for having given me their confidence to represent them in this house, and to speak for them whenever occasion makes it necessary.

Cartier, as hon. members know, is perhaps the most cosmopolitan riding in the country. It could be virtually called "Canada in miniature", as there is no other section in Canada in which there are more languages spoken. Concentrated in this small area, there are ethnic groups from almost every central European country. Many of these include people who are comparatively recent immigrants.

I meet these people often. I speak to them frequently; and it is heartwarming to sense the anxiety they have to integrate themselves completely into the life of our country. The present generation of course still retain some of their native customs and speak their native tongues. But the children, the coming generations, will, as time has already proven to us, live the Canadian way of life in every respect. I bespeak for them the patience and tolerance of their good Canadian neighbours to facilitate for them the necessary fusion which will eliminate obstacles and enable them to become totally adapted as Canadians.

This desire and anxiety was abundantly manifested at a touching ceremony less than one year ago which took place at the Baron Byng high school in my constituency, when some 750 of these new Canadians were admitted to the first steps of Canadian citizenship. Never before in the history of Canada has such a ceremony taken place. The entire assembly was electrified by the deep and respectful solemnity, as the associate chief justice of the province of Quebec himself administered the oath of allegiance. Hundreds were moved to tears with the realization that our country has accepted them and makes of them free men and women. It was indeed a most stirring event and well accredits the government's vision and foresight to stimulate an expanded immigration program.

The United States today is reaping the benefits from its wise immigration policy during the fifty years preceding 1925. In this period it secured an influx of some 30 million people, enabling it to become the most powerful democracy in the world. And today it is even a bulwark for the defence of our own country. We in Canada should profit by that experience. We have the space; we have the natural resources and we have the absorptive capacity. Of all that there is no doubt. But we lack the population to be able fully to expand our wide-open spaces and our limitless natural resources. This view has been most forcefully expressed in the March 9 issue of the United States News and World Report. I quote a digest of this report which appears at page 20, as follows:

"Canada, booming with the United States, is to grow rapidly into the industrial giant of the north.

Oil is a great new industry in Alberta. Canada's aluminum industry already rivals that of the United States. Great hydroelectric projects are planned and industry springs up near cheap power. Iron-ore mining is making great expansion, notably in Labrador. A big future is seen for titanium, a metal lighter than steel, stronger than aluminum, and Canada has the largest known deposits. Production in nickel and cobalt is being stepped up sharply as is lead, zinc, copper, magnesium, gold, silver and asbestos.

Uranium mines of Canada are becoming one major source of materials for atomic weapons.

Canada's newsprint output is the world's largest. Its lumber of many types for varied uses is moving to all parts of the world.

Factories in Canada are expanding their output and now manufacture automobiles, diesel engines, textiles, electrical equipment and chemicals. New capital is finding its way to Canada. At least one billion dollars of U.S. capital went into Canada.

As Canada becomes a giant in the industrial world, it needs people as well as money.

In 30 years, Canada's population has grown from 8·8 million to 14 million. Immigration, tightly controlled, is being geared to entry of 150,000 European workers, mostly skilled. The shortage is in people."

The government's decision, therefore, to stimulate immigration is a step in the right direction with an eye to Canada's future. I am hopeful that the new program will be effectively implemented. There are some minor bottlenecks which tend to slow the process, but I know that the departmental officials are wrestling with these problems, and I have every confidence that existing obstacles will be speedily eliminated.

An active immigration policy has been urged by all the distinguished members in this house who came from the constituency of Cartier. The late Mr. S. W. Jacobs, who was the first representative of my faith to sit in this parliament, the late Mr. Peter Bercovitch who succeeded him, and the late Mr. Maurice Hartt who followed, all pressed for increased immigration. They saw how the great flow of immigrants to the United States was making of that country an influential power. They knew that Canada, too, can grow rapidly if we had more people. They made eloquent pleas year after year, and today the intensified development of our natural resources and the present government immigration policy confirm the views which they expressed.

For their foresight and for their courage I pay them my respects and my tribute, and I deem it a privilege now to follow in their footsteps.

One can readily appreciate the reasons for immigrants wishing to settle in Canada. The reputation of our country abroad has been so enhanced that it is almost universally accepted as being the country of the future. Our diplomats have placed Canada on a pedestal in the consideration of those who seek a democratic way of life. Our representatives in the councils of the nations enjoy not only the reputation of being able men but, what is much more important, the reputation of being honest and sincere men.

Never in the history of international affairs have men enjoyed a greater reputation for integrity, sincerity and honesty of purpose than our diplomats enjoy today. On this point I am moved to quote our Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) who, in one phrase on the floor of the house, gave a description of our Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) which more completely than anything else we have ever heard describes his stature.

The minister, during the emergency session last September, referred to the Prime Minister in the most simple language as a man of transparent honesty. How complete and how appropriate a description—"transparent honesty". It is precisely that; and it is this theme of transparent honesty which guides every one of this country's actions, both on the national and on the international scene. The people of this country have sensed this basic characteristic of our leader. In fact the entire democratic world has sensed it and therefore many of the vexing international problems seek solution at the hands of our Prime Minister and his equally conscientious representatives at the United Nations. It is my personal thought, or perhaps it is shared by others, who like myself, have a profound belief in divine guidance, that it was providential circumstances which placed on the shoulders of these men of transparent honesty-of-purpose the mission of successfully solving a two thousand year old historic problem by returning the Jewish people to their biblical country of origin.

I do not want to sound mystical, nor is it within my competence to adequately emulate the hon. member who quite recently referred to himself as being somewhat evangelical, but I do believe that only a country with a leader and a government, whose sincerity and honesty of purpose transcend all other considerations, merits the distinction of being recorded in history for the achievement which I have just mentioned, which in human grandeur and historic importance can be likened to that of Cyrus, King of Persia, and Sir Arthur James Balfour of Great Britain, who in ancient days and modern times proclaimed the return of the people of Israel to their promised land.

I believe too that it is more than coincidental that this historic act should be the first major achievement-of-conciliation which has acclaimed our Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) as an effective and impartial mediator whose talents for peacemaking are being sought constantly by the nations of the world. Perhaps international diplomacy has outgrown the age of Machiavelli and is reaching a new level of approach in which cunningness and intrigue will be replaced by a transparent honesty in our quest for a permanent peace, and in which our Prime Minister and our country will be showing the way.

The same lofty reputation is enjoyed by our diplomatic representatives and civil servants. In conversation with many of the harassed people of central Europe that I met on the continent last year, two years ago and three years ago, it was a source of great pride to hear their praise of Canada and the Canadian personnel with whom they had occasion to deal. The humane conduct of our immigration officials and other civil servants in European countries reflects truly the high sense of tolerance, justice and fairness of the country which they represent.

It is therefore my solemn conviction, that because we are now at a peak in our reputation as being a desirable country to which to migrate, and because some immigrants are still available, we should act with the utmost diligence to help populate our country. Hundreds of thousands of excellent immigrants have been anxious to come to Canada since 1933. Many of them made their way to the United States, Australia, South America, South Africa and recently to Israel. A goodly portion came to Canada, thanks to the humane consideration of our government and its immigration officials who dealt most sympathetically with the various representations made by the international refugee organization.

Unfortunately millions were cruelly and wantonly destroyed. Many thousands still want to come to Canada and we should facilitate their arrival. The pool from which to draw immigrants is rapidly running out. We may have already missed our opportunity. That would be sad. Let me quote to you what our Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) said on this question when he appeared before the standing committee on immigration and labour on March 8. Speaking about the availability of displaced persons for domestic service, the minister had this to say, as reported on page 22:

"The number of people available for this employment from among the D.P.'s is practically exhausted and we are searching for other sources of supply.

On page 23 he said:

A few minutes ago, I pointed out that the supply of D.P.'s suitable for employment as domestic workers was about exhausted. This is also true in a general way of D.P.'s for other occupations.

He stated further:

With regard to the outlook for 1951, we expect that we will be faced with labour shortages of greater proportion than we have had to deal with during the past few years.

Under the group movement plan, we have placed orders for 16,000 D.P.'s to help meet anticipated labour shortages. The indications at the moment are that we may not be able to get the required number from among the D.P.'s and if this proves to be the case, we will have to look for sources of supply elsewhere.

The leaders of our commercial and industrial futures are deeply concerned about this problem. The Canadian Chamber of Commerce only last week urged the government to adopt an active immigration program. Speaking at a citizens forum in Toronto on March 28, 1951, Mr. W. F. Holding, president of the Canadian Manufacturers Association, did likewise. Both these views were most effectively summarized in an editorial in the Ottawa Citizen of April 10, 1951, as follows:

The Goal of a Doubled Population

"A goal of 30,000,000 Canadians within the next 25 years does not seem so far out of reach today as might have been the case during the depressed 1930's. In urging this target upon the government, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce expresses a realistic faith in Canada's future. It cites the present needs of agriculture and industry for more workers, and the need of greater manpower to defend a vast territory. These needs are likely to increase, for Canada's natural wealth is still largely unused. Even before the rearmament program caused shortages in many labour categories, a high level of employment in the post-war years had confounded pessimists. It is reasonable to assume for the future that Canadians will never again tolerate the kind of laissez-faire slump from which they suffered through a painful decade.

But at the rate of 150,000 immigrants a year, as set by the federal government for 1951, Canada will be a very long time in doubling its population. Present circumstances seem to have outdated this target, and the pace of departmental activity as well. Many potential Canadian citizens are eager to come here. Greater efforts should therefore be made to obtain the co-operation of other governments and to arrange transportation. At this end, reception facilities should be still further improved, and in this connection the individual citizen has a responsibility to help make the newcomers welcome. Though the government has taken steps to speed the inflow of immigrants, its policy is not yet sufficiently ambitious and energetic to satisfy the widespread demand for action."

It is evident that we are rapidly coming to the realization that an effective immigration policy is a sine qua non for the industrial, commercial and defensive future of our country. Implementing it satisfactorily will make of Canada that great democracy that it is destined to be in the future.

It perhaps follows that in looking ahead to a greater Canada, we should examine briefly the human rights enjoyed by the people of this country. The hon. gentlemen of the "other place" performed an act of public service when they created a committee to hear submissions from public and private bodies on the question of human rights and fundamental freedoms. They prepared a report and submitted it on June 21, 1950. In my humble opinion this is an important document which I recommend to the careful attention of every hon. member of this house. Briefly the report declares that the Canadian parliament could adopt the covenant on human rights without invading the provincial legislative authority. The report further briefly states:

A Canadian declaration of human rights could follow in its general lines the preamble of certain of the articles of the United Nations declaration of human rights, subject to the reservations expressed by the Canadian delegation at the United Nations. It would declare the right of everyone in Canada to life, liberty and personal security; the right to equal treatment before the law, to fair trial, to freedom from arbitrary interference with one's privacy, family, home and correspondence; to freedom of movement, to a nationality, to obtain asylum from persecution, to found a family, to own and enjoy property, and to freedom of thought, conscience and religion.

I am therefore of the opinion, Mr. Speaker, that, in view of the rapid growth of our country, now may be the appropriate time to deal with this matter. It well behooves a country such as ours to show the way and take leadership in a matter of such lofty moral and humane importance by adopting such a bill at the earliest opportunity.

I should like, Mr. Speaker, at the same time and on the same level to deal with another phase of human relations. I refer to the genocide treaty. Genocide has been described as an old crime with a new name. It is the old crime of Attila and his Huns. It is the crime of Genghis Khan and his Tartars. It is the crime of Hitler and his nazis. In a word, it is the unspeakable crime of the massacre of a people.

In our own time and within our own memory we have heard of the Ottoman massacres of Armenians, of the massacre of Christian Assyrians in Iraq, of the Ethiopian massacres by Mussolini, of the Chinese massacres by Japan; of the Jewish massacres by the nazis, and only recently of the massacre of 120,000 Chinese by the communists. These mass murders must be outlawed by international agreement. A genocide pact may be the answer. Such a treaty has been approved within the framework of the United Nations. I do not know whether there has been presented to parliament a resolution calling upon Canada to sign the genocide treaty. I do know, however, that we have not yet signed this treaty.

There is no constitutional issue involved, nor is there a political aspect involved. It has international sanction, and unless there is some special reason for not having done so, I would urge that it suits the stature of our country as a humanitarian nation to associate ourselves with all those others who have already signed the genocide pact, and thus take another step forward in our civilization.

I am impelled, Mr. Speaker, at this point to draw to the attention of the house that a crime against humanity is being committed by a member of the United Nations at this very time and for several weeks past. The savage treatment by the Iraqi government of some 80,000 of its population merits the deep concern of all mankind.

I do not want to describe the heartbreaking details. Suffice it to say that the Baghdad government has recently adopted legislation not unlike some of the Hitler Nuremberg laws. When in 1933 and the years that followed German inhuman legislation and behaviour was drawn to the attention of the democratic nations, interference was withheld on the argument that it was a matter of internal administration. There was no United Nations organization at that time, and there was no jurisprudence by international tribunals on crimes against humanity. Nor was there a genocide treaty at that time. The situation, however, is different today. The Iraqi crimes against humanity, not unlike the German attempt to replace the law of civilization by the law of the jungle, must be stopped. Our country should concern itself not only with this but with every violent breach of human decency.

I am therefore hopeful that our Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) will reach the appropriate authorities for a report on the situation and make our country's views known and publicized before it is too late.

I have already, Mr. Speaker, by placing two questions on the order paper, shown deep concern about the release of nazi criminals by the United States authorities. The answers indicate that our government was not consulted since the released prisoners were convicted by American tribunals over which they alone had jurisdiction. That makes the situation no less distressing, and wholly apart from the fact that this action violates the sensibilities and feelings of our great ally, the republic of France, and millions of people throughout the world, I am concerned with this matter and disturbed by it for an additional reason.

These criminals were condemned for war crimes. Their specious defence that they did nothing more than obey orders of superior officers was rejected by the courts. The courts ruled that what they did was a heinous crime, and will be stamped as such for all time, for which they must be punished. The decision to release them tends in my opinion to nullify the great principles enunciated in the judgments, and vitiates important jurisprudence created at such great sacrifice. The distinguished American general in his process of wooing doubtful German support makes an over-generous gesture in returning to the nazis their lives, their freedom and their fortunes, which he might do, but only if the nazis could in turn give back the freedom, the fortunes and the lives of the millions of innocent men, women and children whom they murdered. That and that alone would be a fair quid pro quo under these circumstances.

The man who prosecuted the criminals at Nuremberg makes a very cryptic yet forthright statement on this question, and I quote a report in the Montreal Daily Star of March 29, 1951. The headline is, "Shawcross Opposed to 'Whitewashing' Nazis." The article reads:

"Sir Hartley Shawcross, attorney general and chief British prosecutor at the Nuremberg war crime trials, said yesterday it would be a mistake to 'whitewash' nazi war criminals because they were opposed to communism."

Under the same heading, Mr. Speaker, falls the problem of rearming Germany. Some of the dangers have already been very poignantly emphasized in this house. I should like to underscore just one feature. History is replete with Teutonic martial activities. In our own lifetime we have seen what Teutons will do with arms. We remember 1870, 1914 and 1939. They had arms but they abused them, to the great sorrow of millions of families throughout the world.

And we are now considering placing weapons in their hands once more! What can we expect in 1952, 1953, 1954 and the years that will follow? Already Mr. Krupp is boastfully striding through Germany announcing from the housetops that the Krupp military empire is going back into operation. What an alliance for the democracies to contemplate! To me it is a sad and unholy alliance, fraught with the greatest dangers.

There is no love in German hearts for France, England or America. It is puerile for us to think that the illustrious general can entice or create that love by wooing Germany through offering to strengthen her military and industrial might. I am not unmindful of existing dangers and the need to stop Russia; but is the danger not greater that, at a moment's notice, the Germans, with the utmost glee, will turn our weapons against us? This they would do for one of two reasons. The first would be out of a desire to save their own necks. If they should get the notion that the Russian march through Germany could not be halted they would promptly join the Russian forces and continue the march with them westward against us. The second reason is their insatiable and grim desire for revenge. Revenge against France, revenge against England, and revenge against the United States. Can we risk arming Germany under these circumstances?

There is an even greater danger now that consideration is being given not only to rearming Germany but also to giving her political and industrial freedom. This danger was strongly emphasized in an editorial in the Montreal Gazette as recently as April 5, 1951. For want of time I quote only extracts from that editorial, but I urge that it be read in full by all hon. members. The headline is "Where will Germany sell?", and the editorial goes on:

"The announcement has been made at Bonn that the production of West German industry is to be greatly broadened . . .

All this would seem a natural and desirable development, were it not for the disturbing question: Where is West Germany to sell its industrial products? The fact is that a very considerable proportion of West German production has been passing eastward into the communist realm. It is estimated that the value of these exports eastward now amounts to $230 million a year. And since the lifting of the Berlin blockade, at least 150,000 tons of steel have gone to East Germany from the Ruhr valley.

. . . The "known" or legal trade is only a small proportion of the total trade . . .

It is said that some of the German industries think that doing business with the Communists is a form of "insurance." If the Communists were ever to seize West Germany, these friendly relations in trade might be accounted to them as a form of economic righteousness. This mentality, strange as it may seem in North America, is perhaps more easily understood among those who feel they are living on the rim of the abyss.

. . . But if a West German republic becomes master of its own affairs, it may see fit to make an economic treaty with Russia or any of her satellites.

. . . And if West Germany should have political freedom to make such a deal, and should have the expanded industrial capacity to fulfil it, the other nations of the Atlantic union might find that a large segment of their economic ramparts against communism had crumbled.

The trade now taking place between West Germany and Communism (even with West Germany's present industrial and political limitations) is sufficiently disturbing to point a warning for the future.

Building West Germany into the Atlantic world is going to be difficult. But allowing West Germany to build an economic pipe line to the east is much too easy a solution. It is solving our own problem by also solving that of the Russians."

These manoeuvres, to liberate the prisoners and to arm Germany, seem prompted by nothing more than military exigencies, the real value of which is still in grave doubt. And for these doubtful and uncertain advantages the United States military authorities appear to overlook important legal principles and considerations of great moral value.

Daniel O'Connell, the illustrious Irish parliamentarian, many years ago appropriately epigrammed this type of action when he declared, and I repeat with all the emphasis at my command:

"Nothing is politically or diplomatically right if it is morally wrong."

—and Mr. Speaker, in my humble opinion these moves are morally wrong! And the voice of this parliament should be raised in protest against anything that is so morally wrong.

Since a permanent peace is our objective, let us bear well in mind the words of the eminent philosopher, Ralph Waldo Emerson, who declared:

"Nothing can bring peace more quickly than the triumph of principles."

The corollary of that is that peace will never endure if won through the sacrifice of principles. This view was very clearly stated by Senator William Fulbright in an address to the United States Senate on April 9, 1951, which is reported at page 42 of Life magazine, which I quote in part. He said:

"The vast majority of great civilizations have been destroyed, not as a result of external aggressions, but as a consequence of domestic corruption. I wonder whether in recent years we have unwittingly come to accept the totalitarian concept, that the end justifies the means, a concept which is fundamentally and completely antagonistic to a true democratic society. Democracy is, I believe, more likely to be destroyed by the perversion of, or abandonment of, its true moral principles than by armed attack from Russia."

It is therefore my prayerful submission, Mr. Speaker, that this house should urge our military experts not to sacrifice great moral values for doubtful and dangerous military exigencies.

Now, Mr. Speaker, by your indulgence and with your very kind consent, permit me as an eyewitness to inform this house of the great honour which you have yourself, sir, conferred upon our country at the ceremonies during the dedication of the new British House of Commons in London. You will recall, sir, that through fortunate circumstances it was my privilege to be present and witness the various functions at which you were called upon to represent Canada. Hon. members, your hearts would have glowed with the greatest pride to have seen our Mr. Speaker, who from the very first procession to the final function, not only by his natural height and the tricornered hat, but by his dignified bearing, his judicious statements and the courtly manner in which he and his charming wife carried themselves, he captivated the admiration and respect of the entire royal and distinguished assemblies.

The final function was a farewell dinner tendered to the commonwealth speakers. The Hon. Senator Roebuck, as chairman of the executive committee of the commonwealth parliamentary association, presided with great distinction. It was a glorious evening for Canada, as both our Mr. Speaker and the hon. senator shed great lustre on the country which they represented.

As a matter of personal privilege, Mr. Speaker, permit me at this point to express my gratitude to the genial clerk of this house, and to Sir Howard d'Egville, the director of the commonwealth parliamentary association, and his efficient assistants Mr. Spencer-Hess and Major Lockhart as well as to their staffs, both here and in London, for their gracious attention in making my participation possible at some of these functions in London.

May I also, Mr. Speaker, just say a word about the great emotion which stirred me as I witnessed the opening of the British parliament by His Majesty the King. It was an experience beyond description, and one which I would recommend every member of this house to witness at some time if at all possible.

One saw the great institution of democracy in all its glory, with the dignity and respect for those things in life which we hold sacred.

Having thus been stirred by witnessing the opening of the mother of parliaments, permit me, Mr. Speaker, to tell this house of my unique experience within eight days of also witnessing the opening of the baby of parliaments in the sacred city of Jerusalem. It was my privilege to have been invited by the speaker of the Israeli Knesset to be present at the opening ceremonies.

This enabled me to reflect upon eight hundred years of parliamentary government, from the oldest parliament in the world in London, the capital of our commonwealth, to the youngest parliament in the world in Jerusalem, the first capital of civilization, which gave the world its greatest precepts for human relations, and its greatest moral teachers, philosophers and prophets of peace; and from whence came forth the prophetic plea of Isaiah, which holds so true even today.

". . . to beat our swords into ploughshares and our knives into pruning forks.

And that nation shall not lift up sword against nation.

Neither shall they learn war any more."

I trust, Mr. Speaker, that hon. members will understand the spirit which moves me to make this reference, and that they will graciously attribute it to the fervour which radiates to anyone who comes in such close proximity to the sacred places and to the very cradle of civilization. Add to this the deep-rooted affection of the people of Israel for anything Canadian, and you will more readily understand the personal gratification I experienced, and the affectionate expressions which greeted me whenever and wherever I was introduced as a Canadian. The gratitude of the people of Israel for our country is a matter of permanent historic record. Their anxiety for every association with Canada and things Canadian is unbounded. It is therefore not surprising to find that Israel's trade with Canada increases daily. In the first ten months of 1950 we exported to that little country Canadian products to the extent of about $12 million. I am sure this trade will continue to grow, as will no doubt also our commercial and diplomatic relations to the mutual advantage of both countries.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, permit me to refer to the well-known academic dispute between philosophers and historians who differ as to whether it is the leader that produces the times or whether the times produce the leader. Personally I share the latter view. The times always produce the leaders necessary to cope with the existing problems.

It has also been said that a country has the leaders it deserves. Ours is a great country with a great destiny, dealing with great problems. This calls for a great leader; the times and kind Providence have produced him. Canada deserves him. We are therefore fortunate indeed that the welfare of our country is now in the hands of the present Prime Minister. Therefore, not only we in Canada, but every freedom-loving person in every part of the world should pray constantly for his good health, so that he may continue to be endowed with divine guidance in leading the free people of the world in their successful quest for a permanent peace and a democratic way of life, to the great glory of God and all mankind.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this budget debate, I shall discuss in the main one aspect of our income tax legislation which, so far as I am aware, has not yet been touched upon since this debate started. I refer to the question of the amount that taxpayers are allowed to deduct because of medical expenses, and in particular to the fact that there is a floor under that amount of 4 per cent of one's net income.

Having indicated that that is the main subject with which I shall deal, I should like to take just a minute or two before I return to it to make one or two general comments on the budget. The reason I am satisfied to limit myself to a moment or two is due to the fact my views have already been expressed by others who have taken part in this debate. I regret that the incidence of taxation imposed by the changes announced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) bears most heavily on those least able to bear it. It has already been pointed out that when one looks at the rates of increase in taxation, the greatest increases have taken place in the field of the various commodity taxes rather, for example, than in the field of corporation taxes.

With regard to corporation income taxes, there is no increase for corporations whose net earnings do not exceed $10,000 per year. For those above that figure, the increase is at the rate of 20 per cent. Similarly, the rate of increase in the personal income tax is 20 per cent across the board. But when it comes to the sales tax, that tax which bears most heavily on those least able to bear it, the increase in the rate, so far as the general sales tax is concerned, is 25 per cent. When one looks at the excise tax, he finds that in some cases there is an increase of 66 2/3 per cent. I am referring to those cases where the rate of 15 per cent is raised by 66 2/3 per cent of that amount to the figure of 25 per cent. Then there is the case of washing machines, mechanical refrigerators and electric stoves, where the increase in the rate is such that it cannot be calculated in percentage terms. It goes up from zero all the way to 15 per cent.

I would point out also, Mr. Speaker, that there is in these proposals a form of double taxation against those who are least able to bear it; for the income tax and these various commodity taxes hit the same people.

No one denies the need, under present conditions, of increasing the revenues of the country, but it does seem to me that the Minister of Finance might have found a fairer way to impose increased taxes than is the case with the budget that has been presented to us.

I want to say that I support wholeheartedly the protest against the sales tax increase that is involved in the amendment moved by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), and I am also supporting wholeheartedly the amendment moved by my leader, which regrets that the 20 per cent surtax on individuals has been made to apply as low as it has. In our view that tax should not be applied until $1,500 in the case of single persons and $3,000 in the case of married persons.

I indicated, Mr. Speaker, that most of what I have just been saying has been mentioned previously in the course of this debate, so that I do not need to expand on it. I am sure that my own position with respect to these matters is quite clear. Rather, when one comes into a debate after it has been going this long he feels an obligation to deal with some matter that has not previously been dealt with. Therefore I raise the matter I referred to at the outset of my remarks, in the hope that something might yet be done about it this year, or if not this year, another year, namely the limited way in which deductions for medical expenses are allowed.

We all support the idea that there should be some consideration in the income tax to those persons who are hit by heavy medical expenses. There is a notion abroad, however, that the provision in that respect is much more generous than it actually is. The lack of generosity which I allege arises from the fact that the taxpayer is not permitted to take from his net income the total amount of his medical expenses, but rather only that portion of his medical expenses which is in excess of four per cent of his net income.

Mrs. Fairclough: And under the ceiling.

Mr. Knowles: And, as the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) points out, there is also a ceiling on the total amount that can be deducted. In fact, that will come out in just a moment in what I wish to read from the ordinary income tax form. I am reading from page 3 of the individual tax return for 1950:

> You may not deduct your total medical expenses. The amount deductible is only that portion of the expenses over 4 per cent of your net income and may not exceed: single, $750; married, $1,000; dependents, $250 each ($1,000 maximum).

There are some other rules that follow on page 3 of the income tax form which limit the kinds of expenses that are allowed as medical expenses, mainly payments made to hospitals, doctors, nurses and so on. By no stretch of the imagination do the expenses that are allowed as medical expenses cover all the costs that any family incurs when it is faced with a serious illness.

First I want to say that what I have just read from page 3 of the income tax form is of course taken from section 26, paragraph (b) of the Income Tax Act of 1948, which indicates that there may be deducted by the taxpayer an amount equal to that portion of medical expenses in excess of 4 per cent of the taxpayer's income incurred and paid either by the taxpayer or his legal representatives, and so on.

It seemed to me that the best way to look at this matter was to work out some specific examples and see just what help Canadians who are hit by heavy medical expenses obtain on the basis of that provision in the Income Tax Act. Therefore, I have worked out two or three cases. It happens that I have worked them out on the basis of the rates that applied for 1950 and also on the basis of the new rates that apply for 1951 and subsequent years, namely a 20 per cent increase. I have both sets of figures in front of me, but I think to avoid confusion I had better stick to the new 1951 rates.

I took in the first instance a case of a married couple with no children, and with an income of $2,400 a year, and I asked the question: What assistance, what relief from income tax, will that couple get if in a full year on the new rates it is faced with medical bills amounting to $200? I submit that there will be many cases in Canada of amounts of that much having to be paid during 1951 by families of two people with that much income. Well, if that couple, earning $2,400, has no medical expenses during 1951 and no other deductions allowed from the $2,400 the tax they will have to pay will be $70.80. But by being permitted to deduct from their net income the amount of their medical bills in excess of 4 per cent of their net income the taxes which they would have to pay will be reduced to $52.80. At first blush it may seem very nice on the part of the income tax authorities; but look at it. It is a reduction, a tax relief, of only $18 to a couple who have been faced with $200 of medical expenses out of an income of $2,400 in the year 1951.

On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, may I point out that if that same couple chooses, not involuntarily as is the case with medical expenses, but voluntarily, to give to churches, charities and so on, of one sort and another, provided that they are approved by the department, the same amount of $200, when that couple comes to file its income return it will get an allowance not just of the portion of that $200 above 4 per cent of the net income, but the whole $200. The result is that they will pay only $34.80 in income tax; in other words, the saving in that case will be $36.

Let me put these two savings before you again, side by side. A couple earning $2,400, having $200 medical expenses in 1951, will get income tax relief against that $200 of $18. If the same couple, not having had medical expenses, gives away $200 to approved charities, they will receive income tax relief of $36.

I am not complaining about the latter, but it does seem to me that the former, namely, medical expenses, should be on the same basis. After all, when we make donations to whatever charities, organizations or churches in which we may be interested, we do it of our own free will. And while it is very popular when some organizations are soliciting donations to point out that there will be income tax allowance for those donations, still I think we should not expect the government to help us out too much with free-will donations we choose voluntarily to make.

Medical expenses are in a totally different category. They are involuntary; they are forced upon us by conditions beyond our control. And I submit the least the government should do is to put medical expenses in the same category as charitable donations. I may point out that when this commendable provision allowing some consideration for medical expenses was first written into the income tax law, when Mr. Ilsley was minister of finance, the original figure was five per cent. Some of us made speeches in those days, like the one I am making tonight; and eventually Mr. Ilsley met us 20 per cent of the way. He reduced that 5 per cent figure down to 4 per cent, and that was a welcome change. But I submit the time has come to wipe out that 4 per cent floor altogether, and to allow the total amount of medical expenses, in the same way that the total amount of charitable donations is allowed.

Perhaps I should put on the record, in case the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance is following me, the fact that there is a ceiling on the amount that can be charged for charitable donations—and I think it is right that that ceiling should be there. I do not think a similar ceiling should be placed on medical expenses, again for the reason that they are involuntary, and that the whole idea of the allowance, when it was first introduced, was that consideration should be given to people who have these exceptionally heavy medical expenses during the course of a year.

Let me take another example, the case of a family earning $3,600 a year, a man and wife and two children. Let us assume that in 1951 such a family is faced with medical expenses amounting to $300—and there will be many families with incomes smaller than that faced with medical expenses equal to that amount, or greater, in 1951. If such a family had no medical expenses their tax on $3,600, at the new rate, would be $240. The right to deduct the amount of their medical expenses in excess of the 4 per cent figure would reduce the $240 tax to $210. In other words, the law as it stands will permit them tax relief of $30 against medical bills of $300. Mr. Speaker, that is not good enough in a day and age when the country is crying for health insurance. It is not good enough to help our people to that very limited extent.

I have here the figures worked out to show what would happen if the same family were to give away $300. In that instance the amount of tax payable would be only $178.80. In other words there would be tax relief of $61.20. Again, let me put the two figures side by side. A family having an income of $3.600—a man, his wife and two children—with $300 medical expenses in 1951, will have a tax allowance of $30 against that $300. The same family giving away $300 would have a tax allowance more than twice the amount of the medical allowance, or an amount of $61.20.

I say the least the government should do is to put the two kinds of expenses on the same level, or in other words allow the whole of one's medical expenses as a deduction from net income before the tax is computed.

I want to give one more example. This time I have taken the case of a man and wife with two children. The income in this instance is $3,600 a year, and the medical expenses amount to $500. Their tax for a full year at the new rates, if they had no such medical bills, would be $240. By taking the deduction above the 4 per cent figure that amount would be reduced to $170.40. In other words there is a saving of $69.60. But if that same family were allowed to deduct the full $500 they would save a total of $97.20. That is little enough to help out with $500 in medical bills, but $97.20 is better than $69.60.

Let me go back over those cases and point out what happens, as so often is the case, when these families are unable to pay the whole of their medical bills within the twelve-month period. We know how many times that happens. First, let us take the couple with the income of $2,400 and with medical bills of $200 incurred during the year, and suppose that it is impossible to pay off those bills in one year; in those circumstances if the couple pays $100 in one year and $100 in the next, by the time one does the calculating he finds they do not get any tax relief at all.

The same is true of the family drawing $3,600 in salary—a man and wife and two children—and having medical bills to the extent of $300 during the year. If they are able to pay them off in two years, paying $150 the first year and the same amount in the second, by the time the calculations are made we find they get no tax relief at all in lieu of their $300 medical expenses.

Then, with regard to the $3,600 family having medical bills of $500 in the year, and paying $250 in each of two years, we find they would have only $14 in each of those years, or a total of only $28 in tax relief, against a total medical outlay of $500.

I submit that those figures tell the story of how little the present provision means, and that it is time for the kind of consideration Mr. Ilsley gave to our representations years ago, which led him to reduce that 5 per cent down to 4 per cent. It is time for further consideration of this matter—only this time let the government wipe out the 4 per cent floor altogether, and allow the whole of one's medical expenses against net income.

As I said earlier in my remarks, the items allowed as medical expenses do not cover all the costs a family incurs when it runs into illness. The law allows the doctor's bill, the dentist's bill, the hospital bill and the nurses' bills. I am glad to say that in the budget this year allowance is being made for a limited list of drugs. But there are many other drugs that are necessary and are prescribed by physicians that cost people many dollars per year, but which are not included as an exemption. When there is illness quite often extra help is required in the home, the food bill goes up, and in many cases time is lost by the wage earner. These things are not allowed as medical expenses, yet in many cases they equal or exceed the actual amount allowed by the terms of the income tax law.

I recognize the difficulty in defining medical expenses to include these other items, but because of that difficulty I think the government should go the whole way so far as these allowable expenses are concerned and see to it that the 4 per cent floor is wiped out altogether. I make no bones about it; I think the government should go further than that. I think that the amount of medical expenses incurred by a family, so long as you define medical expenses in the narrow terms set out in the law, should be allowed, not just as a deduction from the net income before the tax is computed, but as a deduction from the amount of the tax itself.

I go back to the family at $3,600, the man, wife and two children, with $300 medical expenses during the course of the year. If there was no illness their tax would be $240. What is the matter with wiping out the whole $240 in order to help that family with its $300 medical expenses during the year? I submit that that is living up to the spirit that led the government in the first instance to bring in the provision about which I am now talking.

We have talked for many years in this country about health insurance. In a few moments, when I associate this question with another question, I shall pile evidence up on my desk to indicate the amount of consideration that has been given to that question and to certain other questions. Despite all the talk, despite all the documents that grace the shelves of this building, we still do not have health insurance. We still have no real assistance for our people when they are faced with heavy medical bills. I want health insurance to be brought in. I regret the negative answer the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) gave me earlier in this session when I suggested that there be set up a committee to go into this matter, comparable to the committee that dealt with old age pensions last year. For my part I intend to continue pressing for that action.

Until such time as that action is taken I say that the least this government can do is to show its concern for the financial problems created by the health of our people and to make one or other of the more generous arrangements I have suggested with respect to allowances against income tax for medical expenses. My first suggestion is that the least they should do is to put medical expenses on the same basis as charitable donations. My other proposal, which I favour more strongly, is that the total amount of medical expenses should be allowed as a deduction, not from the net income before the tax is computed but from the actual tax itself.

It is well known to the people of this country and to the people of the entire world that health is a precious asset. Ill health, sickness and operations of one sort or another hit a large percentage of our people, and the bills that go with them become millstones around the necks of far too many. Surely it is part of the functioning of democracy, surely it is part of the business of our government to deal with the problems of our people and to try to solve in some way this question of medical expenses. It calls for far more than I am asking for tonight; it calls for a well-rounded program of health insurance as part of an over-all program of social security. May it come soon, but in the meantime, and since we have the kind of government that takes time to do these things, surely what I am asking for now is the least that can be done. I urge consideration of these points by the Minister of Finance and the government with the least possible delay.

I said that I had some evidence here that I wanted to pile up on the desk. I held it back because I wanted to present it with respect to two matters. I have had a bit to say just now about health insurance and the discussing of this question that has taken place in this country for many years. The same thing has been going on with respect to old age pensions. I know that there is abroad in the country today a feeling that we have just about reached the goal with respect to old age pensions. Far from it! There is a notion that it is just a matter of weeks or months until the recommendations of the parliamentary committee on old age security which sat last year will be implemented and then all will be well.

Well, there are two questions about that that bother me. The first is: When is it going to be done? We have the promise of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) that there will be no unnecessary delay. We have the assurance of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) that there is no act of omission on the part of the government that is causing delay. But still there is delay. Still the people are wondering when the means test is going to be removed at age 70 and when there is going to be a pension at age 65.

There is the old question about consultation with the provinces and we have these letters, telegrams, perhaps telephone calls and all the rest of it. We have had that sort of thing for a long time. One thing I am wondering about just now is what this increase in the sales tax announced by the federal government will do to the thinking of those few provinces that want a provincial sales tax along with a new old age pensions program.

Frankly I am sorry that the federal government ever let that concept of a provincial sales tax get associated with the new old age pension plan. The committee of last year was asked by certain witnesses to consider a sales tax as a means of financing old age pensions, but the committee rejected it out and out. The committee made other suggestions as to ways in which old age pensions might be financed, but no sales tax or turnover tax was acceptable to the committee. I deplore the fact that that idea is now being thought of at all and that the constitutional amendment to make possible old age pensions such as the committee recommended last year and the constitutional amendment with respect to a provincial sales tax are being associated together. They do not go together at all. The one does not depend on the other.

My fear is that now the federal government has increased its sales tax some of the provinces are going to say that there has been a breaking of faith in that matter and we may have the whole thing in a mess once more. The federal government will blame the provinces and vice versa. That has happened before about matters that were of dominion-provincial concern. I say to this government that if it uses the difficulties of dealing with the provinces or any other excuse for delaying much longer the implementation of the recommendations of the committee of last year it will incur the intense disfavour, the unending criticism—perhaps I should use stronger words than that—of the people of this country from coast to coast.

If there is one thing that the people of Canada know that this government promised, that this government said it would do something about, it was old age pensions. I tell this government that if it even leaves it to the eve of the next election it will find that the people of Canada will give them a severe rebuke. The time for action on old age pensions is now, not next year when many of the people affected will no longer be alive. It should be done now when they really need it.

My other concern about the recommendations of the committee is with respect to the $40 figure. It was unfortunate that the committee did not see fit last June to make a recommendation with respect to that phase of the matter, but look what has happened since then to the cost of living. The result is that $40, which is still the maximum federally for our old age pensions, is worth only $22.25 in terms of 1935-39 dollar values. Therefore it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the time has come not only for the removal of the means test at age seventy, not only for the lowering of the age to sixty-five, but for increasing the amount of the pension, and I urge that consideration be given to that by the government.

I am sure there are some hon. members opposite who wonder why I keep on making speeches about old age pensions, particularly after the partial but significant victory we won in the committee of last year. Why do we not sit back and wait for the thing to happen? Here is why, Mr. Speaker. I have piled up here in my deskmate's seat, and I will now pile them up on top of the desk, some of the documents that indicate the attention and thought that have been given to the two subjects about which I have been talking tonight most of all, health insurance and old age pensions. The documents I have go back only a decade. That is the length of time I have been around these parliament buildings.

First of all, a decade ago there was the Sirois report, three volumes, very significant, and the result of this report was to be the remaking of the Canadian constitutional and financial set-up. Included in the Sirois report are discussions and recommendations about a better basis for old age pensions, and about health insurance. I can remember in my younger days, when I sent a dollar to the king's printer to get these books and read these sections, I thought it would not be long until we would be approaching the millennium. I do not suppose very many hon. members of the house even have copies of this set of books. In fact they are out of print now. You cannot get them, but there they are. Away back in 1940 there were recommendations with respect to old age pensions and health insurance.

Of course the matter was not allowed to die right away. In 1943 there was set up in this house a special committee on social security. I well remember the debate on the motion to set up the committee. I was still a young member of parliament, and again I was enthused that there was a proposal to go into this whole question. I was enthused by the nature of the debate. There seemed to be interest on all sides of the house—and this was in the middle of the war, if you please, when we were hoping for a brave new world—in doing something about the important question of social security. The committee met, and there are its minutes of proceedings and evidence starting at March 16, 1943 and running through until July 21 of that year.

That committee did not only do its own thinking and discussing of the matter. It was furnished with some useful information. To begin with, it had before it this document prepared for the special committee on social security, entitled health insurance report of the advisory committee on health insurance appointed by order in council P.C. 836 dated February 5, 1942. There it is, a fine big book over two inches thick, which is an excellent treatise on the whole question of health insurance. I well remember when it first came out. To me it was so valuable a document that I tried to get a number of copies of it to send to people interested in the question of health insurance, and it was difficult to do so. When one sent to the distribution office one was told that they did not have very many copies, and it was pretty hard to get even one at a time. I remember that a year later word came from the distribution office that they had a large supply of this book downstairs, and would members please send for them and help get rid of them. They were cluttering up the shelves in the distribution office. I think I got twenty or twenty-five just as easily as that. Interest had been lost in this particular document, but there it was in 1942 and 1943 for the benefit of that committee.

In addition, the social security committee had laid before it the Marsh report, a report on social security for Canada prepared by Dr. L. C. Marsh for the advisory committee on reconstruction. That was another committee. I did not bring their minutes down here, but the Marsh report was also laid before the special committee on social security. I was glad to hear Canadians being reminded of this report last Sunday night on the C.B.C. by Dr. Marsh himself, and I believe he is to speak again next Sunday night. He is reviewing the extent to which some progress may have been made since the days of that report. It was an over-all comprehensive report dealing in the main with these two important questions of old age pensions and health insurance.

What came next? The next important date was Saturday, July 29, 1944, when there was tabled in the House of Commons by the then minister of pensions and national health, the late Ian Mackenzie, a draft bill on health insurance. It is a document half an inch thick and it forms a part of the official records of the house. It is included in the Journals of the House of Commons for 1944-45. It is difficult to locate a copy of the bill itself today but there it is, in the Journals—a draft bill, which some of us thought meant that there would be action at the next session; but nothing was ever done about that draft bill.

I move on. In 1945 we had an election, and after the election we had a dominion-provincial conference. There was laid before that conference these green books including in particular a document on health, welfare and labour, and another containing the dominion government's proposals to the provinces. As hon. members will recall, two of the main items in those proposals were national old age pensions and a program of health insurance. We have not only these books which constitute the documents laid before the conference but we also have this book an inch and a half thick which is a summary of the discussions at the conference at which two of the main questions were those to which I am referring, health insurance and old age pensions.

I move on. I point out, Mr. Speaker, that if I had also taken the trouble to collect and bring down every volume of Hansard in which these questions have been discussed this pile would be too high for me to handle. Therefore I have left out all the Hansards containing discussions of these matters in the House of Commons. I now jump all the way from 1945 right down to 1950, and I lay on the pile next the minutes of proceedings and evidence of last year's special committee of both houses of parliament on old age security. We had some discussion of health insurance in that committee as well but that was beyond our terms of reference. Therefore our recommendations related only to old age pensions. We recommended in the main that the means test be removed as at age seventy, and that the pension as at age seventy be paid 100 per cent by the federal government. In addition, we recommended that there be inaugurated a pension at sixty-five to run from sixty-five to sixty-nine and to be paid fifty-fifty by the provinces and the dominion.

I want to say that it was an excellent committee. I remember with a great deal of pleasure the experience of being a member of it. We did a good job, an exhaustive job, and we educated a great many people.

Mr. Laing: A good committee.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Laing) is interjecting, and he is perfectly right, it was a good committee, did a good job, and produced a report, a blue book. I put it on top of the pile. My only hope, Mr. Speaker, is that this pile of books is not an altar that is going to be consumed by fire; I don't want that to happen to this blue book.

Mr. McCann: Why don't you get on top?

Mr. Knowles: We thought that was the end of talking about these things, that we were going to get action. Well, that book does not remain the topmost one on the pile; I have to put on at least two more. I now add the proceedings of the constitutional conference between the federal and provincial governments which took place at Quebec, September 25-28, 1950, and then the proceedings of the conference of federal and provincial governments at Ottawa, December 4-7, 1950. There it is; quite a pile.

Mr. McCann: Put the public accounts on top of it.

Mr. Knowles: Well, I do not doubt that they might have talked about these matters in the public accounts committee, but I have been conservative in this matter. I have limited myself to documents reporting proceedings that have borne directly upon these two questions, and in this whole pile I have not included a single Hansard.

Mr. McCann: Have you read them all?

Mr. Knowles: I am not yet forty-three years old; there has not been time.

Mr. McCann: What good are they, then?

Mr. Knowles: I for one know what is in these books right from the bottom to the top. That is a fine array, is it not, showing the thought and work that have been put into these matters. And what have we got? We do not have health insurance, though it starts in the bottom book and works right up to the top. What have we in terms of old age pensions? People around me are saying we have Liberal promises, but they are worth nothing. When the book at the bottom of the pile was printed the old age pension in this country was $20 a month at age 70 with a means test as long as your arm. What is it today? It is $40 in 1951 currency but it is worth only $22.25 in 1935-39 dollars, still payable at age 70, with a means test still as long as your arm. I submit that we have had enough of this kind of thing and that the time has come for action.

Mr. McCusker: I suggest that there is an extra means test imposed by the C.C.F. government in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Blackmore: That was a wonderful contribution.

Mr. Knowles: It is possible to discuss that if the hon. member wishes. He knows that the means test which applies in Saskatchewan is the means test determined by federal legislation which fixes a ceiling of $50 on a single person and $90 on a married couple.

Mr. McCusker: I would correct the hon. member on that. The provincial government makes an extra contribution towards the old age pension and imposes a means test.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member is completely wrong. The provincial government makes an extra contribution within the $50 for single persons and $90 for married couples provided by federal legislation. If the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McCusker) is so scandalized by a means test, I suggest he should do something to remove it from the federal legislation. Let us get rid of it not next year, not the year of an election, not ten years from now but right now, when it will mean something to our people, particularly in view of the present high cost of living.

If hon. members do not remember what I have said tonight, Mr. Speaker, I hope they will remember this pile of documents, at least two feet if not thirty inches high, showing the attention and thought that have been given this matter by many members of parliament and others who have worked hard. I say it is a crime that all we have got—

Mr. Laing: There is not much wrong with the three volumes on top.

Mr. Knowles: No; the third from the top is the blue book with which the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Laing) and I had a fair amount to do, and it is a good book. There is not much wrong with the other two, but we still do not have a proper old age pension.

Mr. Laing: You know the reason.

Mr. Knowles: Yes, I know the reason; but it is not going to be satisfactory to me or to the old age pensioners to still know the reason a year from now, two years from now or ten years from now. It is not the reason for delay we want, or the excuse; it is the implementation of what is in those books, on the statute books of this country.

Mr. Laing: That is what the government wants too.

Mr. Knowles: Then let them do it, and let them do it now.

On motion of Mr. Weir the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull) moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: Tomorrow we will continue this debate.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The house met at three o'clock.

CANDY

EFFECT OF BUDGET PROPOSALS ON PRICES—REFERENCE TO REMARKS IN DEBATE ON APRIL 16

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Speaking in the budget debate on Monday I said, among other things, as reported at page 2051 of Hansard:

I understand that the taxes on chocolates were reduced two cents a bar, but the price came down only one cent a bar.

It has been brought to my attention by the confectionery industry of Canada that that was a mistake. I wish to read a brief extract from a letter I received:

Before the interim budget was brought down last September, candy bars were selling at seven cents, with popular acceptance, as evidenced by sales.

The reimposition of the excise tax of 30 per cent meant an increase in cost to the manufacturers of 29 cents a box of 24 bars, or 1·21 cents per bar. The candy manufacturers passed on to the consumer 24 cents per box, or one cent a bar, making bars eight cents, thus absorbing five cents per box.

Due to public resistance to this tax increase and subsequent alarming decrease in sales, manufacturers reduced bars to seven cents, thus absorbing the entire tax.

The relief given the industry in the present budget is half a cent a bar, which the manufacturers cannot pass along, having absorbed the tax already.

I wish, Mr. Speaker, to express my regrets to the house and to the confectionery industry for this mistake.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

Second report of the special committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government.—Mr. Cleaver.

The Manitoba paylists show the names of persons receiving pensions from the provincial pension authority arranged in numerical order. The information requested cannot therefore be obtained from the records furnished federal authorities by the Manitoba authorities.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I have spoken to the hon. member who is moving this motion, and I would ask that it be permitted to stand.

Motion stands.

POSTAL SERVICE

LETTER CARRIER SERVICE TO RECENTLY ANNEXED PARTS OF OTTAWA—DIFFERENCES IN RATES WITHIN THE CITY

Mr. L. Langlois (Parliamentary Assistant to the Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer to a question which was asked on Friday last by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), as reported at page 1987 of Hansard. I indicated at that time that I was going to investigate the matter and report to the house. I had planned on making a statement yesterday, but as the hon. member was not in his seat I thought it preferable to wait until today.

The existing legislation provides a rate of four cents on a letter, and makes an exception when the letters are not transmitted through the mails but are posted and delivered at the same office. In the latter case the rate known as the drop letter rate is three cents. Postage rates on letters are therefore statutory, and the Postmaster General has no latitude.

Letter carrier delivery is an expensive service, and it would be unnecessarily wasteful and economically indefensible to grant letter carrier delivery to every residence within municipal boundaries. Furthermore, there are certain conditions which govern the establishment of the letter carrier delivery service, such as:

1. The area to be served shall be immediately adjacent to the existing letter carrier delivery boundaries.

2. It shall be compactly built up, so that the letter carrier is not traversing vacant spaces in giving delivery.

3. The average distance between points of call must not exceed forty yards.

4. In the proposed letter carrier delivery area there must be good walking conditions, namely, sidewalks, paved or good gravel roads, open and traversable under all weather conditions.

5. There must be suitable walks from the street line to the residences.

6. Houses must be systematically numbered, and before delivery begins must be equipped with mail receptacles or slots in the doors.

7. Streets must be named, and the names must not conflict with street names already served by letter carrier delivery.

8. Streets must be labelled at intersections.

These involve a certain amount of co-operation on the part of the residents themselves; but when the conditions are complied with, and the area is such as to justify any necessary expense involved, the department is always willing to give the matter the most favourable consideration.

The postal needs of the added areas have been very carefully studied and, as I stated here on Friday last, the result has been fully and satisfactorily explained to a delegation representing the city of Ottawa, which included His Worship the Mayor. A full statement of the position at that time was contained in a follow-up letter to the mayor, a copy of which was sent on February 27 to the leader of the opposition.

Our latest reports indicate that before long some of the areas will have complied with the conditions and will then receive the promised service.

Dealing particularly with the city of Ottawa, the boundaries have been extended to an unusual degree. To grant the drop letter rate to all residences within the area would, as indicated a moment ago, not only be inconsistent with the provisions of the act but would create an undesirable precedent, and it is not felt that there is any justifiable reason for treating one city differently from other cities in Canada so far as this question of the drop letter rate is concerned.

In conclusion may I be permitted to add that the difficulties experienced by residents of the districts involved could to a great extent be avoided if they always gave their correct post office address on their letterheads or stationery, and each time gave their address, such as Westboro post office, Woodroffe post office, Carlington post office, etc., instead of simply using their street address and "Ottawa".

[Mr. Langlois (Gaspe).]

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would point out that the answer given by the parliamentary assistant does not cover one very important consideration. I pointed out to the Postmaster General (Mr. Rinfret), in the letter in which I brought this matter to his attention most recently, that if there is any difficulty in dealing with this question an amendment could be made, as parliament is now in session.

My question was directed also to whether it is the intention of the department to cure this very real injustice, because there is no way in which a person living in these areas, whether it be Ottawa or anywhere else, can prevent the payment of penalty postage in addition to the ordinary extra postage when circulars and catalogues and things of that sort are sent to him by commercial houses in the city under the natural assumption that the same postage rate applies throughout the whole city.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): I have made it clear in my statement that there is no discrimination against one city or another, or against Ottawa in particular. The Post Office Act applies equally and evenly to all cities and sections of Canada. The hon. member surely realizes that an amendment such as he suggests would be a matter of government policy. It is not, however, to my knowledge that such an amendment is contemplated.

Mr. Graydon: May I ask the parliamentary assistant whether any revision of the Post Office Act is under contemplation for introduction during this session? I understand that some work is being done on the matter by government officials.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): That, again, is a matter of government policy which will be announced in due course.

Mr. Graydon: May I ask the parliamentary assistant if he is aware that the Post Office Department's public relations have now reached a new low?

TORONTO MAIL CARRIERS—INVESTIGATION OF WORKING CONDITIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): In the absence of the Postmaster General I should like to direct a question to his parliamentary assistant. Will he give us a report on the result of the department's investigation of the working hours and other working conditions of the mail carriers in Toronto, and tell us what, if any, changes have been made as a result of the investigation?

Mr. L. Langlois (Parliamentary Assistant to the Postmaster General): I respectfully submit that such a question should be put on the order paper. However, I received no notice of it but I will take the question as notice and answer it in due course.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

VETERANS BUSINESS AND PROFESSIONAL LOANS ACT—EXTENSION OF APPLICATION, ETC.

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Veterans Business and Professional Loans Act to make the act applicable to a greater number of veterans and to enlarge the period within which guaranteed loans may be made under the act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

BUDGET DEBATE—SUSPENSION OF STANDING ORDER 28

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That in relation to the adjourned debate on the motion of the Minister of Finance that Mr. Speaker do leave the chair for the house to resolve itself again into committee of ways and means and any amendment or amendments thereto, on the budget brought down Tuesday, April 10, 1951, the provisions of standing order 28 be suspended until the said debate be concluded.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAYS

QUESTION AS TO FREIGHT SERVICE FOR FARM PRODUCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. B. Huffman (Kent, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In the Globe and Mail under date of April 18, and on the radio, it has been stated that all freight service for farm produce from rural centres in the London district, which includes the greater part of southwestern Ontario, will be discontinued on Saturdays as of June 1. Can the minister say whether this statement is correct, or will the present service be continued?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I did not read the statement in the Globe and Mail to which my hon. friend has reference, but I heard it over the radio, and the statement made over the radio is inaccurate. From the information I have, when both railways put the forty-hour week into operation they will not in any way affect carload shipments. In other words, the regulations as to carload shipments or more will remain in operation as they are at present. Less than carload lots will be affected to this extent, that instead of receiving shipments on six days of the week they will be received on five days only.

WHEAT

QUESTION AS TO OFFER MADE BY CANADA TO INDIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs arising out of a press dispatch with reference to a statement made in the parliament at New Delhi, India, by the deputy food minister, Mr. Rao, with respect to Canadian wheat being shipped to India in order to relieve the starvation faced by some forty million Indians. Are negotiations proceeding with a view to providing wheat under the Colombo pact in order to alleviate the conditions in which so many of our fellow members of the commonwealth find themselves today by reason of food shortages?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the position in this matter remains as stated by me on April 9 in answer to a question by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. I have seen the reports to which the hon. member for Lake Centre refers, but have not had any confirmation of them from official sources. In any event, I think these reports would not contradict what I said on April 9. They merely indicate that the Indian government prefers not to take as part of our contribution to the Colombo plan class 5 and 6 wheat now but rather to wait until later in the year when they might be able to get wheat of a higher grade.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Has the Indian government agreed to accept wheat from Canada later in the year as part of the Colombo plan?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, they have agreed to accept wheat as part of the Colombo plan, the proceeds from the sale of which would go into capital development in India.

POULTRY

NEWCASTLE DISEASE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—USE OF BRITISH VACCINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Are officers of his department using a British vaccine with the idea of curbing Newcastle disease in British Columbia? If so, will the minister say what results have been achieved?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): The hon. member was kind enough to send me a copy of his question, and I have had an answer prepared. British vaccine is not being used to curb Newcastle disease in British Columbia. Vaccine used is produced at the animal diseases research institute, Hull, province of Quebec, and is known as the Doyle-Wright vaccine, being made according to the formula of Doyle and Wright, British scientists.

The original issue of this vaccine was found of too high a potency for British Columbia poultry and did not protect as expected. The potency of the vaccine was reduced as of March 31, 1951. Since that date up until today there have been 124 flocks, comprising 81,068 birds, vaccinated with the modified vaccine. No outbreaks have so far occurred among any of these birds, therefore it may be assumed that the results following the use of the modified vaccine have been quite satisfactory.

CHINA

REPORTED ARREST OF MISSIONARY SISTERS BY CHINESE COMMUNISTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Today's press carries a report that further Catholic sisters in China have been arrested, on the same sort of malicious charges concerning their orphanage as the five Canadian sisters who were previously arrested, and that some of these sisters just now arrested are also Canadians. Is the minister in a position to confirm or deny these reports?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, but we are looking into the matter.

Mr. Graydon: Can the minister give some indication offhand as to the number of Christian missionaries still in Red Chinese territory?

Mr. Pearson: I have no idea how many Christian missionaries there are in Red China. We have an estimate of the number of Canadians in Red China, but I should not like to give that figure offhand. I will see if there is any information that can be obtained, and I will give it to the house at a later date.

[Mr. Pearkes.]

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

QUESTION OF ASSISTANCE TO BRITISH COLUMBIA FRUIT GROWERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arthur Laing (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance I should like to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant. It arises out of an answer made by the Minister of Agriculture on Monday last dealing with the winter killing of fruit trees in the Okanagan valley. Has the Minister of Finance given consideration to a revision of the provisions of the Farm Improvement Loans Act to provide for the removal of dead trees as well as the purchase and planting of replacements.

Mr. James Sinclair (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) have been giving consideration to the proposal made by the hon. member for Vancouver South on behalf of the fruit growers of the Okanagan valley. Hon. members will recall that the Farm Improvement Loans Act does permit the chartered banks to make loans for the purchase and planting of new trees and also for clearing land. The Minister of Finance, therefore, thought it was reasonable and within the intent of the act to extend the regulations to cover also loans to be made for the removal of the frost-bitten trees before the purchase and planting of new trees.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask why the Minister of Finance waited until the hon. member for Vancouver South made that request, in view of the fact that when the matter was discussed earlier in the house—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fulton: —on the amendment to the Farm Improvement Loans Act, I made exactly the same request?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fulton: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker; I did not observe that you were on your feet.

Mr. Speaker: I could not hear all the question, but I do not think it is one that should be asked at this time.

ESSENTIAL MATERIALS

INQUIRY AS TO CONTROL OF SHIPMENTS TO COMMUNIST COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce what safeguards are being maintained by the government of Canada to see that essential materials are not shipped out of Canada to communist countries, such as the five carloads of wool rags worth $77,000 which, according to a report from Washington, have been held up at Boston by United States authorities?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Under the Export and Import Permits Act very tight control is imposed on shipments to countries behind the iron curtain. In the case of the wool tops the shipment was made to what was believed to be a reputable house in Boston. Through some juggling of the export permits the material was being transshipped to one of the communist countries, I believe Poland. In co-operation with the United States authorities the situation was investigated, the shipment was halted, and consideration is being given to a prosecution as soon as the facts are made clear as to responsibility.

Mr. Fraser: Will this firm in Boston now be put on the blacklist so far as shipments of that kind are concerned?

Mr. Howe: I cannot say as to that. It will depend on the action that may be determined upon by the authorities of Canada and the United States.

Mr. Graydon: May I ask the minister if this is the first case of this kind that has come to the attention of the government?

Mr. Howe: It is the first that has come to my attention.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Tuesday, April 17, consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. Ralph Maybank (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, the expression "swan song" is apparently of ancient lineage. It has been suggested that philosophers of very olden times came to believe in the idea that swans sang, by a process of deductive logic which ran like this: All birds sing; a swan is a bird; therefore swans sing. But no one has ever heard a swan sing. Hence these ancients squared their logical conclusion with the failure of any person ever to hear a swan sing, by asserting that since no one was ever about when the swan died, probably it was at the time of death that she burst into song. This idea apparently was accepted and gained great currency. Poets and writers have popularized it from that time onward. Only recently I was reading "The Isles of Greece" by Byron, and I ran across this line: "There, swan-like, let me sing and die".

The swan is a beautiful bird. The swan is about as graceful a creature as we have. Usually we picture her as pure white, and, indeed, she is taken as an emblem of purity.

I lack any and all of the attributes of a swan.

Again, according to lore, her song is a deathbed lament, or dirge. While I cannot foresee, being neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet, I do not feel as though I am going to die soon. Because of my unswan-likeness, and the fact that I am still pulsating with life, I do not give the name "swan song" to my remarks today; but this will be my last appearance in the house.

Before bidding farewell, however, I should like to express myself on one or two questions that are before the house and the country at this time.

The first of these is old age security. We are engaged in, what for us, is a very large program of preparation for conflict, and we have the hope that preparation will avoid that conflict. There is no disagreement as to the essentiality of what we are attempting. But we must not allow ourselves ever to say that the essentiality of old age security is less than the essentiality of guns and ammunition.

I have been privileged to see a number of reforms since coming into this house. I have seen many old age pension improvements. I have seen love and appreciation for children translated into concrete legislation in their behalf. I have seen health improvement plans instituted, and I have seen them bring great benefits. I have seen unemployment scientifically attacked by unemployment insurance. I have seen enacted for veterans the best legislation known to the world.

For all this and more the governments and parliaments which did these things are to be praised, and I do praise them.

A good system of old age pensions such as is now proposed by the government can be the coping stone of the edifice so far erected. I hope and expect that will come about this year. I have worked unceasingly for such a measure, and I take pride in the knowledge that it is near. I adjure everyone to press forward the plans. Do not let the fabrication of war materiel be financed by continued penury of aged people.

Before us is another great humanitarian project. Its locale is outside the boundaries of Canada, but it will return to Canada incalculable spiritual, political, and economic benefits. I refer to that splendidly conceived program for the uplift of people who live in darkness, squalor, poverty and disease, and every kind of misery in south and south-eastern Asia.

It is known as the Colombo plan, and I love the knowledge that it was born while I was here. It can signalize a new day for all the world.

In this scheme for aid we have come completely around the circle from the political ideas which obtained in and prior to the year 1776. At that time Adam Smith wrote that "beggar my neighbour" was the chief motive of government policy. Fortunately civilized people repented of that motive and broke away from it. Mankind came to hold it was not a good motive for government action; but a very bad motive. There, however, we stopped. We did not go on and declare that "uplift my neighbour" was a good maxim of government; and, of course, we did not frame policies to any such end. But lately mankind has begun to talk about the "interdependence" of nations, and this idea of interdependence is gaining wide acceptance.

With the advent of the Colombo plan, we in Canada, with a number of other nations, are proceeding to act upon the true interdependence idea. We are making the idea dynamic. We are seeking to uplift our neighbours.

Let me ask you for just a few minutes to look at the problem, the plan itself, and at the hoped-for results from it. In south and southeast Asia there are 570 million people. That number is one-quarter of the world's population. Their economic level is very low, but I would not say they are the poorest in all the world. Amongst the other three-quarters of the world population there are millions even worse off than these. Even amongst the white race, which is a peculiarly favoured segment of the human race, we have great sections of poverty and suffering. On this continent we are a good deal like a rich suburb surrounded by slums. Neither this country, nor any other, can afford to have, within its boundaries, permanent slums. There must be clearance. Nor can the world continue to have vast slum areas. Either those at the bottom will be lifted up or those higher up will eventually be pulled down.

The one-quarter of the world's population now envisaged is not poor in natural wealth, but its potential has not been touched by the revolution in methods which in the last hundred and fifty years have catapulted the western world ahead. Poor even as they are in south and southeastern Asia, they export nearly all the world's jute, and most of the world's natural rubber. From them we get three-quarters of the world's tea, two-thirds of its tin, and one-third of its oil and fats. Rice, cotton and sugar are likewise produced in quantity, but industrial production is negligible. The 570 millions cannot live on what is produced; indeed they can barely exist.

The situation is worse even than such a statement suggests. The 570 million are increasing. The count of mouths for food goes up, and ever up; the measure of food to fill mouths goes down, and ever down. When one thinks of the vast number of people of Asia, he will think of malnutrition and disease; of rickets and tuberculosis; of vermin and filth and squalor. All such abound. One will think of blindness and maimed bodies; of hunger and thirst to the point of chronic torture. Everywhere there is helplessness and hopelessness to the point of despair. There is not even clothing. In Pakistan people must make-do with no more than nine yards of cotton in a year. Of course, shelter is terrible.

Some people appreciate or apprehend a condition better from a statistic than any other way. For them some comparisons may be offered. Whereas Britain is served by roads to the point of 3·7 miles per thousand of population, in Pakistan they have one-tenth of a mile. As to telephones, the United States has 261 for one thousand people, Britain 98 and Canada somewhere between the two, but in Ceylon there are only 2·2, and only a small fraction of that in India and Pakistan. So, one could go on to give similar figures for all these commodities, the consumption of which is used to measure national welfare.

However we view it, the picture of the plight of these people is enough to break one's heart. But if the horror of it all will not break a man's heart, it ought to frighten him in his mind. Any man who looks at this sort of conditions with complacency is a fool. Widespread misery is bound to have its effect on others. As inexorable as the flow of the tides of the sea is the certainty that misery of this sort will destroy the well-being of people like ourselves. The island of luxury will be engulfed by the stinking flood of poverty around it.

We talk today as if communism were our sole foe. That is nonsense. Certainly it is our enemy, and we must stop it or perish. But do you think we shall be secure when we have destroyed that devil? Well, we shall not be secure then, and incidentally if that is the sum total of our aims we shall not deserve to be at peace and to be secure.

Anyway, we cannot stop communism with a gun. It is an idea, and guns cannot be sighted on an idea. Russian imperialism we can down, but to put down the idea which gives strength to that imperialism we have to remove the conditions which nourish it. We must remember that while we see tyranny as we look at Russia and her system, millions of outcasts see liberation from rapacity of overlords. They see a plan. They will believe that the plan may end their misery. Tyranny does not frighten them; that is all they have ever known.

The first important feature that strikes me about the Colombo plan is that it is co-operative; both the recipient and those who give are working together. Some of the beneficiaries will help others. No one will assert that merely doling out largess is the best way to help people. This is a fault sometimes found with the endeavours of the United States, sincere and charitably motivated as they are. It is always better to help people help themselves. The proposal under this Colombo plan is to spend $5 billion over a period of six years. Each commonwealth nation will subscribe its share. The nations which benefit will put up what they can. Our share is $150 million, which is $25 million per year. This comes to a little less than $2 per head per year for Canadians. Our share is no more than it should be, or could be. The Canadian people would willingly contribute more if they were made to see the need and the benefits. The world cannot suffer from too much benevolence.

I should never like to be caught, and I should not like any Canadian government to be caught, in the way a certain rich man was caught when he went to heaven. He had difficulty, when he came to the gate, in thinking up data about his own charities. The admitting seraph was a little bit dubious about allowing him into the celestial regions; so he sought the advice of St. Peter. He reported that the only benevolence the rich man had been able to recall was a ten-cent gift, one time, to a beggar on the street. St. Peter was reading—probably one of the Winnipeg daily papers—and he looked up from the sheet. Laconically he addressed the angel and said: "Oh, give him back his dime and tell him to go to hell."

In respect of this matter and this project, sir, I should hope that it will be found, before the end of the story is written—as has been the case in many other instances—that Canada will be doing more than she has contracted to do.

It will be of value to glance at the uses to which the $5 billion will be put. The various benefiting nations naturally are proposing different ways of applying the money. Pakistan will use 32 per cent of her allotment in improving agriculture, and 20 per cent in improving transport and communications. One scheme is to build a great barrage across the Indus, in order to irrigate three million acres of land. Another project will irrigate 700,000 acres. Pakistan also proposes to develop industry and mining. Fuel and hydroelectric power will absorb a large part of the fund.

India with her population of 350 millions will spend the largest proportion in the improvement of industries. She will harness some of her great rivers and open up some of her rich mineral sections. Ceylon, Singapore, Borneo and other places will make appropriate uses of the money allocated to them.

As an end result of some of the developments to be undertaken we shall find such an increase in wealth creation as to be startling. At the present time people over there use, as I have said, only about nine yards of cloth per person a year. This can be increased to seventeen yards. They will have thirteen million acres more land under cultivation. Thirteen million acres more will be under irrigation. Food grain production will be increased by six million tons. Bear in mind that food consumption is of the low average of 2,000 calories a day. Twelve ounces of cereals per day is often the total supply of food for a man. Kilowatt hours of electricity will be increased by 1,100,000. Many more direct benefits will result. The accrual of indirect benefits will be almost endless.

As is said in a little booklet put out by the British government:

> Help being forthcoming, there is real ground for hope that the peoples of these areas will gradually succeed in winning for themselves a higher material standard of living than they have known in the past. A long road lies ahead of them, and there are many difficulties and dangers to be overcome, but with the support and encouragement of the other free peoples of the world, they will surely prove equal to the challenge and achieve the measure of prosperity and well being which is their due.

Looking at the whole picture one can state with assurance that, because of what we now do, millions of people will enjoy a better standard of living than ever before in the history of these countries, and, further, that such a result will be an inspiration for other acts to be undertaken, so that this which shall have been done will be but an earnest of that which will afterward be accomplished.

Any who have a part in such a project are entitled to be proud. There is no higher form of service. Burke's studied panegyric on Fox is the only rhetoric that comes anywhere near adequacy in describing actions of persons responsible for such a beneficence as this, as well its conception, its development, its enactment into law, and its execution. Burke spoke of Fox in terms of praise to a degree that probably no orator has ever equalled, let alone surpassed; and, after it would seem he had reached the zenith of his peroration, he coupled with the name of his then friend the House of Commons itself, in these words:

> In confess I anticipate with joy the reward of those whose whole consequence, power and authority exist only for the benefit of mankind; and I carry my mind to all the people, and all the names and descriptions that, relieved by this act, will bless the labours of this parliament and the confidence which the best House of Commons has given to him who best deserves it. The little cavils of party will not be heard where freedom and happiness will be felt. There is not a tongue, a nation or religion in India which will not bless the presiding care and manly beneficence of this house and of him who proposes to you this great work. Your names will never be separated before the throne of the Divine Goodness in whatever language or with whatever rites pardon is asked for sin and reward for those who imitate the Godhead in His universal bounty to His creatures. These honours you deserve, and they will surely be paid when all the jargon of influence of party and patronage are swept into oblivion.

The whole eulogy will well repay anyone's reading, and its terms, with appropriate changes for time, and place, and persons, apply to those who are today taking part in this magnificent beneficence.

I wanted particularly, Mr. Speaker, to speak of certain matters of public concern. I have done so. I have said what I intended to say upon matters of public importance. May I now be permitted to make some remarks of a personal nature.

This is my last opportunity to make public confession of my feelings towards my colleagues in this house and the many other pleasant and esteemed persons with whom I have been privileged to associate for all or part of sixteen years. I would emulate Art Smith of Calgary in expressing my appreciation to all those persons attached to this building in serving in one way or another the members of the House of Commons. There is no exception I could make in applying to men and women about us the adjectives "smiling, considerate and courteous."

Entering the front door of this building on either of two levels, one is invariably met with a cheery greeting. Post office employees offer help before it is asked. Down the corridors, in the carpenter shop, the barber shop, the mailing room, at the accountant's desk, everywhere, pleasantness is invariable. I have a special word of praise for one, namely, the master of the keys. I am continually losing mine. As for the stenographic pool, as hon. members know, there one gets charm as well as friendship. I do not know what institution could be better served than we are by the messenger service we have; it is prompt, efficient and courteous. You do not have to make yourself believe you are dealing with gentlemen when you are dealing with one of them; you just know it the moment you deal with him. Gentlemanly service at all times is what you get.

I agree with what Mr. Smith said about Hansard, its reporters and its editors. I have never had the hardihood to do what he asserted he did. He said he read some of his own speeches and that Hansard had made them into good oratory. If they have done that with mine, I should like to compliment them now on being able to make a silk purse out of a sow's ear.

As to the officers of the house, the Clerks, the Sergeant-at-Arms, and the page boys—if we have bothered them, as we must have done many times, they have never shown that they noticed it. The impression I have always had among those who are about us in the house is that there seemed to be a vying one with the other to be of service to us.

Not all persons can be named in a speech of this kind, but I should be remiss if I failed to mention the purveyors of food. In the cafeteria and the restaurant everybody is so nice to us always that, if at any time one is low-spirited, he has himself mentally face-lifted when he receives their service and their food.

After sixteen years I can do some reminiscing, and I should like to mention a few members who have been here in my time. I well remember R. B. Bennett, later Lord Bennett; and what I remember particularly about him was his astounding ability to fight and never stop fighting. I have heard him join issue on questions here as many as a dozen times a day, and always with great energy. We of the party to which I belong did not generally agree with him, but he was a great Canadian.

Jim Woodsworth was another—no question in my mind about that. I knew him for many years, long before I came to the house. I knew him well in the house. I suppose our disagreements with him were as great as they were with R. B. But he, too, was a great Canadian.

I remember with much pride my association with men like Mark Senn, Karl Homuth, Ewen Matthews and Lester Douglas, who left here but lately, but whom I remember for a long time back; and it was a privilege to know them.

Going back further there was Sam Jacobs. He was a great and colourful commoner. He remarked philosophically at one time, when he was not appointed to the Senate despite the urgings of many Gentile friends that he should be appointed: "Oh, it is all right; I haven't any complaint. I feel I have been given Jew consideration".

There have been many good men, so many good men whom I have met here that I cannot begin to name them all. There is one, however, who is still living in British Columbia, in retirement, whom I should like to name; I refer to Hon. Grote Stirling. I have great respect for him. Mr. and Mrs. George Black, both of whom were M.P.'s, must close my list of celebrated people I have known in the house, but I feel guilty about the many I have failed to mention.

I have deliberately kept below cabinet level, in the main, as befits one below that level himself. Mr. Speaker, I should like to leave behind me a few wishes and hopes. I have mentioned the page boys, and in respect to them I have the wish and hope that the kindly guardianship of our respected friend from Fort William (Mr. McIvor) will continue over them, and that they will accept him as their mentor. They can't go wrong on the advice of the lakeshead sky pilot.

I have some other wishes.

About six months ago I changed my sartorial habits; I began to wear bow ties. This change occurred through the generosity of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). He began to pass on to me the ties he was discarding. Now that I am leaving these parts, I wish he would distribute his old neckwear to the members generally. I used to wear them in order to acquire an air of distinction. He need not give any to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent); that gentleman is distinguished enough already.

It will not surprise anyone when I say I wish well for the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). Although we have not always seen eye to eye, I have for him feelings of regard and esteem. I am pleased to say publicly, as I have already said to him privately, how much I appreciated his sportsmanship and good humour when, at Christmas, after the general election, he sent to all of us a bit of rhyme in which he sort of joked at his own expense over his not-so-good election fortunes. I considered it very sporting; it showed his head was bloody but unbowed. I wish him every success. I mean, of course—and I know he will take no offence over this qualification—I mean every success as leader of the opposition. May he long be spared to lead His Majesty's Loyal Opposition.

To the other groups in the house, and to their leaders, I also express my best wishes. I have no objections to the existence of a threat on the flank; I think it is a good thing, but I am not in favour of its developing to anything more than a threat.

I wish the Secretary of State for External Affairs would do something about making the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) another parliamentary assistant in his department. This is because that member can get fast action in foreign countries. Newspaper headlines about a week ago said two things: No. 1, "Thatcher attacks General MacArthur"; No. 2, "Truman fires MacArthur".

There is a member on this side of the house respecting whom I should like to say something, and to whom I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to direct your attention. Our member for Dauphin (Mr. Ward) has started to catch and process whales. The steaks from these whales are valuable in more ways than one. First of all, they are good substantial food. Secondly, this meat is filled with hormones—or "hormonees"; I am not sure as to the correct pronunciation. It is said even to be an aphrodisiac. When whale meat is fed to male minks their potency is greatly increased; and when it is fed to female minks their litters are larger. I wish success to the hon. member for Dauphin, and I hope he distributes his product widely. He will relieve much pressure from the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris), if he does. After this plug by me, I think the hon. member will experience a terrific senatorial demand for whale steaks.

After the turr debate a little while back, I heard someone speak of men from the big eastern island as "turreadors." No offence is intended. For all of our brethren from Newfoundland I wish that they would come to my province and we will let them shoot all the grain-fed duck, prairie chicken and partridge that they may wish. They are better than turrs. If there are any interfering laws in Winnipeg, Newfoundlanders need not worry. They are grand people and we will not enforce the laws where they are concerned.

I did not mention the press when I was paying my respects to the various people here who serve us. I wish to say now how well the fourth estate has always behaved towards this House of Commons. With the thousands of reports made and articles written, doubtless comprising millions of words, it is a matter for special remark how seldom anyone has to claim misquotation. I take pleasure in testifying that I have always and everywhere been treated by the press, not merely with fairness but indeed with generosity. It is not amiss I think that I should offer a wish for the gentlemen of the gallery, in addition of course to the very natural one that springs to mind immediately, of continued good relations with this house.

The fraternity has had some domestic trouble lately, and one would wish for them that there should be no more. It must be very sad for this family to be struck at, even if not struck down, from within their own midst. Let us hope that iconoclasts will find other icons to topple over rather than the fourth estate itself. With all the trouble of dealing with this government, this opposition, these opposition groups, and all these members of parliament, the men of the press have a sufficiently heavy "Cross" to bear already.

Facetiousness aside, let me express to all in this house, with some particularity, and generally, the sentiments I entertain. For you personally, Mr. Speaker, it is difficult for me to adequately express my admiration. Comparisons are invidious, and I shall make none, but I will say that it would be impossible to find a presiding officer of any deliberative or legislative assembly who could rise above yourself in all those qualities which we attribute to the ideal Speaker. I know that as long as you grace the throne here we will have dignity in the house, debate will be decorous, and good humour will prevail.

I have always believed that in times of special need the right man is found for a country, and I can confidently appeal to history to support me in this belief. Churchill and Roosevelt are two names that come to mind at once to bear witness. Canadian experience will also supply us with several examples, but no example is better than the one before us today in the person of the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. St. Laurent). We are in times that require the highest qualities of heart and mind, times that need profound understanding of all kinds and sections of the population. This and much more we have in our first minister, and I have been and am happy and proud to call him my chief.

But at once I think of the opposition, and I have a word for them. I should like in humility—a quality in which I admit I do not excel—and in all sincerity—a quality which I can claim—to thank all sections of the opposition, and all members of the oppositions, for their treatment of me in the many years I have faced them across the floor of this house. I know I am truculent, though good humoured enough when I am not fighting, and that I am provocative. I feel I am provocative to a degree that may often have been objectionable. No fight, however, has left continued anger, or appearance of anger. I have never been unfairly treated by opponents, and I wish to express appreciation to members of all oppositions for the way they have treated me at all times throughout the years.

I depart from this chamber with deep regret. I have always enjoyed what I was doing. Words of John Ruskin which I read long ago come to my mind:

> If a man is rightly employed his amusement comes out of his labour.

I always felt rightly employed and my employment was my recreation.

I have not read any newspaper articles or stories about my retirement, but I have been told that some writers have suggested that I am dropping out of parliamentary life because of frustration, or disappointment, or something of that sort. Any such explanation is wide of the mark. In fact, such an explanation is so wide of the mark that it is not even near the target. I would have been quite content to keep on working here, either at today's level or at the level of former days. I should have continued had it not been for what I shall now state.

The simple truth about my retirement is that I have a wife and three sons to whom I have been only a part-time husband and part-time father for 21 years. In addition to the 16 years in this chamber, I was 3 years in the legislature of Manitoba and 2 years an alderman on the Winnipeg city council. I feel that the condition I have just described should be remedied. My sons are very decent towards me—so is my wife—and have been good enough to say that they would like to have me around more than has been my custom. In fact the youngest one told me not so long ago that he regretted sometimes that I was not handy always, as he put it, because on several occasions he had problems or questions which he had wanted to talk over with me. I want the enjoyment I can get from being in my own home. "Reunion in Winnipeg" is the name of the play on which the curtain rises today. What I have said is the alpha and omega of my decision. It is just as simple as that.

I have been associated with several ministers in departmental work. I could very well be called the peregrinating parliamentary assistant. I fear I did not give them full assistance at times. I record my gratitude to them for their consideration and forbearance. This particularly applies in the case of the minister with whose name my own is coupled at the present time. He has not had much from me in the way of assistance. I, on the other hand, have had great help from him. The Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters) is one of the truly outstanding persons in Canada's cabinet galaxy. I predict great things for him and that he will go far in continued advancement in this business of government.

I am glad that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) is absent from the chamber today. It leaves me freer to speak of him. He was good enough to say some kind things about me at a certain meeting in Winnipeg, and I had no opportunity of speaking in reply. Among other things, he said I had always given him loyal support, and he extolled me for it. He said I had always given him good advice. I do not know about the advice, but the other statement was factual, I admit. And why would I not be loyal? He earned loyalty. People nearly always invite the treatment they get. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) has always acted towards his colleagues, and to me in particular, in a way to deserve loyal friendship. Any loyalty from me to him was no more than his due, and I would have been an ingrate if I had acted differently.

I repeat that I leave this house with much regret. As I have said, I have always enjoyed what I was doing. I enjoyed the association with all of you. There is a camaraderie here that would put anyone in thrall. I cannot express my desires for you, to you, in the way I should wish. There is, however, a famous character in fiction whose words come to mind and help me. I adopt them, slightly paraphrased, and apply them to all of you. The famous character is Tiny Tim, and with him I say: God bless you every one.

Mr. A. Earl Catherwood (Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, as the first member to speak following the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank), I should like to congratulate him upon the very excellent address he has just made. Parliament is a great institution, and although we disagree often on political matters nevertheless we are Canadians first. It is only with mutual respect that parliament can function and discharge its responsibilities. It has been my privilege to have known the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre for some two years since I became a member of the house in 1949. I can say that I respect him very highly, and along with many other members of the house I hold him in high esteem. I think that must also apply to the people of his constituency who have elected him as a member of this house continuously since 1935. In assuming the new duties he is undertaking, I know that every member of the house joins with me in wishing him the very best in his future activities.

There is one thing about the budget that I can say I really and truly like, namely, that it gives us an opportunity of speaking not only on the budget itself but on other matters that we feel are of considerable importance to our constituencies and to parliament. This is also true of the debate on the speech from the throne when we have a similar opportunity to speak on matters that we consider are of public interest. I should like to commend the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair) on the splendid address he made on Monday evening of this week. I think he outlined the position of the dairy industry in Canada perhaps as well as it has ever been explained in this house. These are things that should be brought to the attention of parliament, and I believe the people of Canada and the great dairy industry in particular will appreciate the remarks he made on that occasion.

I should like to add a word to the remarks he made with respect to the production of butter in our country, and the decrease in that production during the last three years. The hon. member told us that our butter production had decreased about 36 million pounds since 1948. This is a very serious matter. I think that every member of the house has had representations made to him from the many dairy organizations throughout Canada requesting a floor of at least 62 cents a pound for butter. I believe that all members of the house will agree that their request was very reasonable, and that it should be acceded to by the government.

I believe that the Minister of Agriculture will give consideration to this matter because, in speaking to a meeting of the crop improvement association in Toronto about two and a half months ago, he assured those in attendance that conditions as to a floor price for butter had helped materially to adjust the uneven supply to the even demand, and these same conditions would apply to the floor price in 1951. I hope the minister was sincere when he made that statement. I believe he was because I was present at the meeting. In fact I had the privilege of moving a vote of thanks to him following his address. I know he will consider this matter, and I hope he will advise the cabinet of the necessity of setting a floor price that will not only encourage but stimulate production to the point that it will halt the present decline in milk production all across Canada.

There are three points that I think should definitely be considered in setting a floor price. First the price should be sufficiently attractive to encourage and extend production. Second, there is the problem of short hours and high wages that have attracted labour away from the farms to urban industries. Third, there is the present disparity in prices and costs in the dairy industry compared with other agricultural sources of income. I should like to discuss very briefly one phase of agriculture that concerns not only those who are actually engaged in agricultural production and represent agricultural ridings but concerns, I feel, all members of the house. I refer to the gradual disappearance of our export trade, particularly as it applies to Great Britain and the other commonwealth nations.

The question we have to ask ourselves is whether Canada has come to the parting of the ways with respect to the imperial preference that we have enjoyed for many years for our surplus farm products. Every hon. member knows that Canada has made important trade concessions with the country that lies to the south of us, the United States of America. That in itself is excellent. It would be difficult to analyse our position with respect to trade if we had not had that alternative market in the United States. However, we cannot help but be conscious of the fact that there is a very definite split with respect to the dealings between the dollar and the sterling areas, particularly Great Britain, the United States and Canada. This trend can have serious and grave repercussions in that it cannot fail to have its effect on Canada's exports of agricultural produce.

As was pointed out in an article by Mr. Kenneth Wilson in the Financial Post of April 7, the threatened Torquay breakdown may magnify the situation, as the reciprocal Trade Agreements Act will expire this summer. Although President Truman is endeavouring to seek an extension for three years, all indications point to the fact that the agreement will not be renewed. Canada's position is simply that we are practically barred by the restrictions that operate against the hard currency nations. As has been brought to the attention of this house on many occasions, the market for agricultural products in Great Britain, which has been the stabilizing factor and a fortifying influence in maintaining the economy of Canada for generations, is practically a thing of the past.

As I mentioned previously, we have been most fortunate in being able to market our surplus production in the United States. That is very acceptable for the present; but owing to the similarity of our production—and I think all hon. members will agree that agricultural production in the two countries is very similar—dependence upon this market in the long-range view is not at all wise. Since normally we are a large exporting nation I believe the government should immediately open negotiations with a view to retaining at least a portion of the British market which has meant so much to us in the past. I was greatly disturbed and even astounded to learn last week, through questions placed on the order paper, that in January and February of this year Canada imported 3 million pounds of pork products from the United States, while at the same time our shipments to Britain have been reduced almost to the vanishing point.

The farmers of Canada have proven beyond any question of doubt that they can deliver the goods if they have an assured market. We had ample evidence of that not long ago, when in one year we exported to Britain between six and seven hundred million pounds of bacon. Recently in a speech delivered to a conference in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) made the statement that America is the only area producing surpluses of food, and the part of that area producing the surplus food which can be transported is mainly Canada and the United States. Then he added the very significant remark that it remains for governments to assure the distribution of food to other food-buying countries, with all obstructions removed; and I should like to emphasize those last words. That is the duty of governments. Then in a speech just last month the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) suggested that Britain might well consider easing the restrictions on dollar imports from Canada, and with that I think we can all agree. When these restrictions were applied it was understood and expected that it was a temporary measure, as was the action of the government of Canada in restricting imports from the United States three years ago. The situation as between Canada and the United States improved very rapidly, and within a very short time those restrictions were removed. The situation as between Canada and the United Kingdom also has improved substantially. In 1946 Britain's exports to Canada were down to $150 million. In 1949 Britain's exports to Canada amounted to $300 million, and by 1950 were well over $400 million. On the other hand our exports to Great Britain amounted to $704 million in 1949, and by 1950 were down to $469 million. These figures are taken from the trade of Canada statistics. This means a reduction of over 30 per cent in one year in the value of our export trade with Britain. Our total export trade with Britain now is only approximately one-fifth the pre-war total.

With the trade picture what it is, with the views expressed by the two ministers, which I quoted, I think we might be entitled to hope for some indication that the government will now be favourably disposed toward giving consideration to the motion presented to parliament on February 28 last year by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), in which he asked that a commonwealth conference be called to discuss trade relations. This proposal was supported by all members of the Progressive Conservative party and by our friends of the C.C.F. and Social Credit groups, but was turned down by a majority vote of the government. I believe it would have served a very useful purpose, and I should think it would be even more necessary today. Ever since confederation Britain and the sterling area countries have been a vital outlet for Canadian agricultural products.

There are many other items we should be selling to Britain in addition to agricultural commodities, including mineral and manufactured goods, which we cannot hope to sell permanently in the United States in sufficient volume. But, as has been pointed out by other hon. members, we cannot hope to revive this trade unless Britain withdraws the restrictions that were intended to be only temporary. There has been a great deal of talk about freeing the channels of trade with the sterling area. I think it is about time that we translated that talk into action, and Canada should give leadership in this regard. To again quote the Minister of Finance, such translation in these boom times could be accomplished without any serious upset or dislocation, for even if we wanted to we could not possibly flood the British market with goods at this time. Our real desire is to have concrete evidence of the determination of all our trading partners to move as rapidly as possible toward the exploration of every possible means of breaking down the barrier that stands between the dollar and sterling countries. That should be the declared policy in our relations with the commonwealth countries.

I have some figures I should like to put on record in connection with our trade. Our total agricultural exports to the United Kingdom in 1949, excluding animal products, were $340 million, while in 1950 they were $228 million. Our total exports of agricultural products in 1949 to all countries, excluding animal products, were $773 million. Our total agricultural exports to all countries in 1950, excluding animal products, were $636 million. So the decrease in our exports to all countries was $137 million. The total of our exports of animal products to the United Kingdom in 1949 was $72 million, while in 1950 it was $53 million. Our exports of animal products to the United States in 1949 totalled $200 million, while in 1950 they amounted to $253 million. Certainly there is a definite trend toward marketing in the United States, which I am afraid is not a stable market in the long run for our products. The similarity of our production to that of the United States is so pronounced that should a surplus of any of the commodities I have just mentioned develop, or if there should be even slight overproduction there in dairy products, we could easily find ourselves in the position we were in back in 1922, when the Fordney-McCumber tariff suddenly cut off our market in the United States for beef cattle. This has happened before; it can happen again. The American is a shrewd businessman. If he feels that the interests of the United States are jeopardized in any way whatever there will be no hesitation in bringing into operation laws that will correct the situation.

So I urge the government to leave no stone unturned in their efforts to salvage at least a portion of those markets which have been practically lost. I think we must all agree that those markets are vital to the long term security and welfare of Canada. We must remember that when markets are once lost, it is almost necessary to move heaven and earth to regain them. So I hope the government will see fit to put into effect some of the recommendations I have made.

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, as one of those who came to the house back in 1935, at the same time the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank) came here, on behalf of this group I want to extend all good wishes for his future success and happiness. As has been stated by others, he has been a nice member to get along with here. I am sure the cafeteria will miss his patronage, because every time I went there I saw him with his cup of coffee looking for a place to sit down and enjoy a little conversation. I wish him every happiness in his life after he leaves here.

Returning now to the budget which was introduced by the Minister of Finance

(Mr. Abbott) on April 10, I may say that I have received a number of letters expressing disappointment at the heavier taxation. When I listen to some of the government members speaking of the Minister of Finance, I think he might be compared with the king who could do no wrong. I think that is a mistake. It is following the blind political path of accepting what is provided without any criticism, and without any thought of the effect it will have upon the constituents who sent the various members to this house. All members have a definite obligation when they come here to examine all the proposals of the government. I feel that the letters expressing disappointment came partly as a result of the terrible licking our wheat growers have taken under the five-year contract just concluded. I am not going to discuss further a question which Mr. Speaker has ruled must not be discussed again at this session. Do not forget there are other sessions coming, and we shall not lose sight of this grievance which has not been rectified. Another 32 cents a bushel will help to rectify it.

On Monday last we heard the financial critic of the Progressive Conservative party, as well as the leaders of the C.C.F. and Social Credit parties, make an analysis of the budget. During their discussions they made some very thought-provoking remarks. I thought the member for Peace River (Mr. Low), who is my leader, made an exceptionally fine analysis of the effects of inflation and the proposed taxation levies. On my own behalf I should say that the minister read his speech very well, but it will take more than a good reading of his address to make people swallow the pill that was delivered that night. It will take a lot of candy coating to make us swallow this pill when we realize the damage that is being done to us, individually and collectively.

The minister stated that the expenditures for the current fiscal year will amount to $3,700 million, and he has proposed taxes to collect $3,900 million. I can clearly recall that when I came to this house fifteen or sixteen years ago the total expenditures of government for all purposes amounted to $450 million or $500 million a year. Last year expenditures were estimated to be $2,400 million, and that is approximately five times what they were when we came here about fifteen years ago. In order to make provision for these expenditures, the minister states that he proposes to place a surcharge of twenty per cent on corporation earnings as of January 1, 1951. It must be remembered that in the baby budget brought down last September the minister also placed additional levies on corporations, but did not raise the personal income tax at that time. He has done double duty by the personal income tax this year, because he proposes a ten per cent defence surcharge for this year, while for next year, and we do not know how many years to come, a twenty per cent surcharge.

I feel that the purpose of the heavier taxation levied in this budget is to make preparations to prevent communist aggression. In my opinion the proposed levies will do more than anything that has been done here for some time to build up the communist organization in Canada. On different occasions it has been stated in this house that one of the best ways to destroy our capitalist system, and our democratic way of life, is to levy heavier and heavier taxes. I think the minister and his colleagues are co-operating to a great extent in bringing this about.

There is one thing I should like to say on my own account at this time. I have not discussed it with my colleagues, but I do not feel the men who are overseas fighting our battles should have to pay income taxes on their army pay, either at the old rate or at the new rate. Think of all the sacrifices that are being made by these men day after day, night after night, and then when they come back they will not only have to dig in with the rest of us to make a living but they will also have to help pay the cost of the fight over there. Personally, I want to say that I do not believe these men should have to pay one cent of income tax on their service pay, because we are levying enough taxes in other directions. We all know that a large percentage of our population are today, and perhaps for some time in the future will be, in the low income brackets. Before these proposed taxes are levied they have had to bear the effects of uncontrolled inflation.

The other day the hon. member for Peace River placed some rather interesting figures on the record. At the time I did not realize how interesting they were, but upon looking over them later I find that the confiscated purchasing power per capita from inflation in 1946 amounted to $150; in 1947, to $215; in 1948, to $326; in 1949, to $353; in 1950, to $384. The estimate for 1951 runs up to $426 per capita. Up to the present time people have not realized the ill effects of this inflation. I believe those figures should make them do a little thinking on their own behalf. When speaking on the address in reply to the speech from the throne I said that I hoped that under these circumstances the minister would not reduce the exemptions on personal income tax. I am glad to see that the minister did not make any reduction on this occasion, but he certainly has not gone as far as I wanted him to go and that was to leave the income tax without any increase. He has placed a very heavy burden on the people of this country, particularly those in the low income brackets.

Dealing with 1939 levels, and based on the present 56 cent dollar, exemption of $1,000 for a single person for income tax purposes amounts to $560 per year; for the married person who now has $2,000 exemption, that would amount to $1,120 per year. As we have advocated before, it would be preferable to have exemptions of $1,500 for single persons and $3,000 for married persons instead of the heavier tax, because that would give a single person the benefit of $840 in actual purchasing power as an exemption, and $1,680 for married persons.

I turn now to the little man. Someone said not very long ago that God must have loved the little people because he made so many of them. Perhaps we should also deal with the 25 per cent increase in sales tax. During the first election campaign in which I took part, I can well remember the Liberal candidates raising old Ned, if one can use that expression, with the Conservatives for placing a six per cent sales tax on the statute books. Those who came in here at that time or who were in here before that time will remember that one of the first acts of the Liberal government at that time was to increase the sales tax to 8 per cent. The proposals in the present budget increase it again to 10 per cent. I think it is about time for all the supporters of the government to do a little bit of thinking in the interests of the Canadian people.

We have at the present time, and have had for years past, a number of young people trying to start up. By looking around here in the city of Ottawa or in our respective constituencies we can learn readily of the trouble many of these people were having, even before this budget was brought down. Their wages are not sufficient to give them a decent standard of living; and those who are trying either to pay rent or to build a house under present conditions are up against an almost impossible situation. I therefore feel that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) did not do a particularly good job.

> We propose to make no changes in the present scale of taxes on alcoholic beverages. Last September we increased these taxes by $22 million a year. The rates are now high, and I am aware that whenever we change these taxes we impose a good deal of inconvenience and some confusion upon the provincial authorities.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that had the minister neglected to take cognizance of the trouble that would be imposed upon provincial governments and had he placed slightly heavier taxes there, I believe that he would perhaps have been doing the country a good turn. If we look at the newspapers from day to day, we shall find that the consumption of liquor is responsible for many of the car crashes that occur on the highways from time to time, and even deaths. Slightly heavier taxes on that dangerous luxury would have been accepted much better by the people than are some of the other taxes that have been levied.

Then the minister went on to tax tobacco. I am not interested in that commodity either. My neighbour behind me here says: "go easy there." In connection with tobacco I want to point out that a large percentage of fires in Canada every year are caused by cigarette butts carelessly thrown away or perhaps by cigarettes used by people who are half soused and go to bed or sit in a comfortable chair or chesterfield, and the fire starts there—once in a while burning up the smoker himself.

> Next I come to what we call the special excise tax, that is the tax now imposed at a rate of 15 per cent on such things as motor cars, radios, household electric appliances, cameras, jewelry, cosmetics, and so on. We propose that this tax be increased to a rate of 25 per cent.

The Minister of Finance is again placing barriers in the way of our people who are trying to start up housekeeping and who are trying to make an honest living. Again I say that the Minister of Finance and his colleagues are contributing to the promotion of communism in this country by imposing taxes that make it almost impossible for people to get along and to have even a reasonable standard of living.

Then in the next paragraph the minister said:

> The house will also recall that last September we deliberately decided not to place this special tax on refrigerators, stoves and washing machines. I regret that we can no longer afford to leave these entirely free of extra tax, and I am recommending that a tax at 15 per cent be levied on all mechanically operated domestic refrigerators and washing machines and on all domestic cooking stoves except those designed to use coal or wood only.

That is still furthering the old program followed by the minister. I am sure that if the minister would place himself on a low salary such as that received by many of those people about whom I have already spoken, he would then see that something was done to keep down taxes on those necessary items for everyday use.

A little further on in his speech he talks about the 30 per cent tax which he placed on candy so that he could take candy away from the kiddies. Now he finds that is too big a penalty, so he cut the tax to 15 per cent. Nevertheless we find that manufacturers, in many cases, are taking the benefit of the reduction of the tax on candy; the kiddies will therefore be robbed of that sweetmeat.

As reported at page 1813 of Hansard the minister said:

> The other tariff proposals include changes which would widen the application of certain items pertaining to farm equipment. They would provide for the free entry of such things as grain or hay driers, individual sprinkler irrigation systems and several items of dairy equipment when for use on the farm.

On behalf of the farmers and the people of Canada, I want to say that this reduction in tariff, even though on a small list, is greatly appreciated and will perhaps help to even up some of the burdens that have been placed upon our farmers.

I wish to say something about that class of people mentioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank) this afternoon, namely, the old age pensioners, the potential old age pensioners—those between 65 and 69—and many others who are unemployed or who are perhaps physically incapacitated and unable to work. Again this increased taxation places a heavy burden upon them.

I have in my hand a clipping, under the heading "The Castaway". May I say that the description will probably fit many of these old people to whom I have referred. It reads as follows:

> The Castaway
> Cast off, forsaken, left to die,
> Unloved, forgotten, and alone,
> I do not ask the reason why,
> Nor find I where I might atone.
>
> A wornout, wasted human frame,
> Useless for labour in the mart:
> All fruit of age—Is that a shame?
> And yet I'm quaintly set apart.
> I do not rant, nor do I rave;
> Call down no curses others on:
> I'll stem the tide, I'll breast the wave,
> I'll run, alone, my marathon.
> I'll win the race—the goal is death—
> I'll pass beyond the searing pain.
> When I breathe out my last faint breath,
> Home, love, good cheer, I shall attain.
> So, homeless, friendless though I be,
> I still may travel on my way;
> May pat stray puppy dogs and see
> Friendly response to castaway.
> Then life is not a loss complete,
> Companionship may yet be had,
> By country lane, or city street,
> A friendly pup may make me glad.

I feel that we have a duty toward our old age pensioners, potential old age pensioners and many others who are unfit to work and to take care of themselves. We have not hesitated for a moment to send millions—yes, even billions—of dollars to countries overseas while at the same time neglecting many of our own people right here at home. It will be found that a farmer takes care of his faithful work horses by giving them good feed during the winter and turning them out on green pasture in summer. But we have not given even that consideration to many of our old people who have been instrumental in building up to its present state Canada which, in my opinion, is the best country in the world today and which should provide some better standard of living for those who have helped to build it up.

In addition to higher prices, we find that the quality of the goods that we buy, even at inflated prices, is going down; and so far as I know, no attempt is being made to check the quality of the goods sold. The people selling those goods are free to sell any quality the people will buy, and charge any price people will pay.

Then, as a result of the increasing prices and the new taxes being levied, we find many of the labour organizations are preparing again to ask for high wages. We find that certain sections of the civil service are making plans along the same line, and we cannot blame them, when their dollar is cut down to 56 cents. We understand that the St. Laurent two-dollar note is being printed and will come into greater use. It will be a handy instrument to have, when one requires two dollars to buy one dollar's worth of goods. And so the vicious circle continues, and rolls right along.

I was keenly interested in the speech delivered on Monday by the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair), upon which occasion he placed on record a straightforward and honest case for the dairy farmers in his constituency. Many of the statements he made should be pondered by those in office on the other side of the house. It must be kept in mind that farmers throughout Canada, during the past year and indeed ever since I came to this country, have been treated as poor relations. At last the farmers are becoming aware of the fact that it is not up to them to feed the people of Canada at prices far below the cost of production. I have here some proof that similar ideas are held in the United States. An extract from the Rural Co-Operator of February 27, 1951, under the heading "Farming Said Most Exploited", reads:

> Agriculture has been the most exploited industry in the whole modern world, Jerry Voorhis, Chicago, executive secretary of the Co-operative League of the United States, told the annual banquet of the Co-operative Union of Ontario in Toronto on February 15.

"When prospects are poor the farmer produces as much as usual and takes his chance on price," Mr. Voorhis said. Industry lays off people, cuts production and nobody says that a law of God has been violated because people can't get shoes that manufacturers have stopped producing.

"But when a wheat farmer stops producing that's a different story. Everybody thinks that a law of God has been violated."

Mr. Voorhis suggested that the farmer is the only businessman in all history to buy retail his business supplies. By organizing co-operatives to purchase farm supplies the farmer is able to compete to some extent with other businesses, he added.

This will show clearly that there are people in the United States in exactly the same position as we are, with the exception that the government in that country is doing something to provide parity prices or, to use an expression the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) likes better, to give an even break to the farmer, as compared with other people.

I do not think there could be any better way for the government to go about increasing the production of butter than to reduce taxation on farmers. Many people do not realize that the farmer must work overtime, not only in the evenings but in the mornings as well. He must do some work before breakfast. Then he goes out and does a full day's work, following which, in the evening, he must put in more overtime in order that the cows may be milked and the hogs—I believe some people use the word "slopped"—and the poultry cared for. Yet the farmer is never allowed one cent for the overtime he puts in.

In my part of the country there has been a concentration of income tax officials who have been checking, rechecking and cross-checking so that the farmer will not get away with a five-cent piece when, in fact, those farmers have paid to the government thousands of dollars, to which the government are not entitled. Farmers are not bookkeepers; income tax inspectors are. That makes all the difference in the world, and I think the practice being carried on by those inspectors should be stopped immediately.

When one looks over statistics in connection with payment of income taxes he will find that prairie farmers are being persecuted in this connection. Recently I have received complaints in connection with the expenses incurred by patients who have to go to hospital. People in cities such as Ottawa do not realize that on the prairies we have some small hospitals which do not have the equipment or the medical personnel sufficient to take care of all cases. Provision is made in respect of those hospitals to send patients to hospitals in cities or to points outside the smaller districts. We find in many cases patients who have to pay railway fare, and must pay board and room in city hotels while they wait for a chance to get into hospitals, are not allowed to show those expenditures as exemptions for income tax purposes. This is a matter which I suggest should be attended to.

Then, again in connection with income tax, when a bachelor hires a housekeeper so as to free himself to take work outside I say he should be permitted to show the board and wages of the housekeeper as a proper deduction when making his return for the year.

I had intended on this occasion to deal with another matter which has been before the house for some time, namely the British wheat agreement. Mr. Speaker has ruled, however, that this subject cannot be discussed again at the present session. There is however another agreement still alive, and that is the international wheat agreement. Before it is too late I would make a suggestion in line with the brief presented recently by the farmers unions of the three prairie provinces to the Prime Minister and the cabinet, upon which occasion they asked that from year to year a review of the prices under that agreement be made.

At the time it was entered into provision was made for a maximum price of $1.80 a bushel and a minimum of $1.40, for certain quantities of wheat in each of the years ending, I believe, on July 31, 1953. The agreement also makes provision whereby the price per bushel shall drop ten cents per bushel per year, without any thought whatever being given to the increasing costs of the things the farmer has to buy to produce that wheat.

I believe a mistake has been made in that connection. The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) suggested to the government, before the agreement was entered into, that a certain number of staple articles should be selected and their prices indicated in comparison with the price of wheat, and that the price of wheat should be permitted to fluctuate so as to keep pace with the prices set out in the selected list. Neither the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) nor any other minister has taken any notice of the suggestion. Until something like that is done, we will not have equitable prices for our wheat. There is no reason in the world why we should continue to subsidize the consumers of Canada who, speaking generally, are much better off than the farmers who are providing the wheat.

In the four crop years between 1946 and 1949 it has cost the wheat growers of Canada approximately $137 million to subsidize the consumers, by supplying cheap wheat to the millers so that they could mill flour to make cheap bread. That program is still continuing. In my opinion that should also be revised and we should not ask the farmer to continue to provide cheap bread for the people of Canada.

Some of the newspapers have referred to these subsidies as a sop. I am not allowed to mention the $65 million which was recently paid, but the fact is that it is only a drop in the bucket because we need approximately $450 million to square up that steal.

I feel that what we have asked for for a number of years will have to be put into effect if agriculture is to get the kind of deal to which it is entitled, and I refer to parity prices. Many people today think that agricultural prices are higher than they should be, but the best information we can get from the bureau of statistics indicates that about 25 per cent of the people of Canada, those living on the land, receive between 10 and 15 per cent of the national income. That is not good enough. If we are going to have the Canada we should have, a united Canada, a Canada where all people enjoy the decent standard of living which this country certainly can provide, it is about time that active consideration and action was taken to provide parity prices for agriculture.

Mr. J. H. Rousseau (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that a newly elected member making his maiden speech in the House of Commons has the right and privilege of using his maternal language. Being a Canadian of French descent, I am going to exercise that right and I shall speak in French.

My first words will be words of thanks to the two hon. members who introduced me in the house and accompanied me to your throne. And to you, Mr. Speaker, I extend respectful and cordial thanks for your kindness and generosity on my behalf. Indeed, you kindly consented to come down the four steps of your throne to welcome me, thus welcoming also the 30,000 electors of the county of Rimouski whom I have the pleasure and the honour of representing in this house.

Next summer, when I visit the various parishes of my constituency, I will make a point of drawing your fine gesture to their attention.

I also wish to thank all hon. members of the house, ministers and private members, for the sympathetic manner in which they welcomed me into this chamber, and more particularly on the occasion of my first vote. I have been deeply moved by the genuine spirit of fellowship which exists among all hon. members of this house. A newcomer is perfectly at ease from the outset.

It would be discourteous of me not to thank the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) for our interesting trip to Montreal, when we visited the Canadair plant. We witnessed the various steps in the manufacture and assembly of jet planes, as well as the incredible feats of the airmen who fly those speedy craft. The officials of the company gave us a rousing welcome.

There was also another interesting trip that took us through the large army equipment depot. After extending courteous greetings, the officers showed us, with maps, how the different departments were administered and then escorted us around the building.

There, we saw how much time and money are saved in the administration of this large depot. A striking instance of economy is found in army footwear, for instance. Formerly, used or slightly broken boots were discarded. Now, they are repaired at a cost of $2 a pair. Two hundred pairs are reconditioned daily. As a new pair costs $10, this means that expenditures will be reduced by $8 a pair and that a saving of $1,600 will be effected on the 200 pairs which are repaired every day.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I believe it is my duty to make profession of my political faith, and after having done so I shall tell you why.

For the past fifty years I have shared in the struggles of the Liberal party, in twenty-nine major fights both in the provincial and federal arenas, both in Quebec and in New-Brunswick. In those twenty-nine fights I have never insulted an opponent because I have always thought that politeness and gentlemanly behaviour were the best means of persuasion.

I am every inch a Liberal, a Liberal in the Laurier tradition. I have had the priceless privilege of being a friend, I might almost say an intimate friend of Sir Wilfrid. His lieutenants of 1904, the hon. Messrs. Lemieux, Bureau, Préfontaine, Béland and Fielding, to mention but a few, considered me as a friend and knew I was an earnest, ardent and devoted Liberal.

The late lamented father of the hon. Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe), the Hon. Ernest Lapointe, was almost a fellow-townsman of mine, since his native parish, St. Eloi, had been parcelled out of Trois Pistoles, my own birthplace.

Like him I entered the fray in 1900. Like him I put off my wedding for a year because of the 1904 campaign. He had a great liking and consideration for me, knowing that I was a genuine Liberal, that I shared his political principles and would remain faithful to them forever. With him and for him I took part in several campaigns.

I remember that in the course of an intimate conversation I had with Sir Wilfrid Laurier at the Château Frontenac, in Quebec, Sir Wilfrid said to me: "Hervé, when I am gone, keep your eye on Mackenzie King." That is what I did throughout the 27 years this great man was at the helm of the Liberal party.

Have I been, am I now a true supporter of the present Liberal administration headed by the right hon. the Prime Minister? Mr. Speaker, allow me to answer in the affirmative and to prove my statement.

During the general election of 1949 I had occasion to assure the right hon. Prime Minister that I was a wholehearted supporter of his. In so doing I was in worthy company since the whole country asked the right hon. gentleman to continue what he had so well begun. At this point, Mr. Speaker, allow me to recall a fact that is very little known to the public but which I claim as correct in all particulars.

While he was a law student, the right hon. the Prime Minister was doing his clerkship in the office of the Hon. Louis-Philippe Pelletier, who had been a minister in the provincial legislature and later assumed the office of minister in the cabinet of Sir Robert Borden. Let me add right away that Mr. Pelletier was and had always been a true blue Conservative. Mr. Pelletier was then a professor at Laval university, and the facts I am now reporting date back more than thirty years. Mr. Pelletier was one of my fellow citizens, as he was born, like myself, in Trois Pistoles.

One afternoon, during the holidays, Mr. Pelletier and I were talking casually on his veranda when he told me: "Hervé, at one time Mr. Louis St. Laurent was a clerk in my law office. I can tell you that of all the students who have gone and will go through Laval university, none so far has ever shown and probably will never show such legal comprehension as he. I consider him a genius in the field of law and I think he will go far." Such an appraisal becomes even more eloquent and valuable since it came from a man who, apart from being level-headed, harboured political ideas different from his clerk's.

That prophetic utterance was true. It was confirmed when this man, whom we admire so much and who has been so gifted in the choice of his colleagues in the various fields of political activity in the country, was unanimously chosen by all the provinces as their leader.

Why did I make that profession of faith? Well, because I have been a Liberal for fifty years, because I have always supported the Liberal party and advocated Liberal principles, my constituents did not much relish the word "independent" coupled with my name by some newspapers. I did not particularly like being called by that unwarranted term. I hope I will not have to uphold my own political party for another fifty years before I can prove that I am a Liberal.

Some local papers even went so far as to say that I was in disgrace in this house. As far as I am concerned I never did take offence at being given a seat in one particular section of the house, because I think that a member's political beliefs retain their strength whether he sits close to or far from the government benches. Mr. Speaker, the Liberal electrical current which has always held me to my party was as strong from my seat over there as if I had sat next to the Prime Minister and his colleagues of the cabinet. An alternating current is as strong at the end of a line as it is when it comes out of the generator.

I am now here through the explicit and formal wish of the electors of Rimouski county; they have asked me, by a substantial majority, to take the place of the late Mr. Gleason Belzile, who had represented the riding so worthily since 1945.

The designs of Providence are inscrutable. Mr. Belzile, who enjoyed the affection of his family and the admiration of his party, was carried off at a time when he was constantly earning new laurels.

The fine gentlemanly qualities, the seriousness and the competence of my distinguished and lamented predecessor had been noticed by his superiors. He had already attained the important office of parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), the nation's tireless and distinguished treasurer.

I remember what the Prime Minister said when he visited our constituency in 1949, accompanied by his charming wife, Mrs. St. Laurent. I quote: "Ladies and gentlemen, I ask you to elect Gleason Belzile; we need him in Ottawa. He has already attained a high position, but we want him to go much higher."

In answer to that call, I, who now have the honour and pleasure of speaking to you, did all in my power, and went all out, if I may use a popular phrase, to ensure Mr. Belzile's victory.

What I did in 1949 was done at the special request of our distinguished Prime Minister and to make up for the inertia evident in others. Judging by the flattering letter he wrote to me after the election, we must have succeeded remarkably well.

May I, Mr. Speaker, be permitted to interject in this profession of faith in the Liberal doctrine my own patriotic profession of faith: five of my sons were on active service during the last war, four of them overseas and one of them in Canada. The one who married Miss Belzile spent three and a half years as a prisoner in Germany. He was an observer in the R.A.F.; eight days before he was brought down over Hamburg, the King had honoured him by chatting with him in French for almost half an hour when my son, the only French-speaking Canadian member of his squadron, told him he came from Canada.

Let me say also that the last honours paid by the province of Quebec to Their Majesties the King and Queen were paid at Trois Pistoles by the person who has the privilege of addressing you at this moment. The mounted police had asked me to prepare vocal and band music to salute Their Majesties when the royal train made a stop at Trois Pistoles during the night, to replenish its water supply. At the time, I had seventy-five youngsters, accompanied by the band I have been conducting for 50 years, sing God Save the King, O Canada, and Alouette for the Queen.

Personally, during both world wars, I prevented an act of sabotage which might have had most harmful effects on Canada's war effort. Let me explain.

At Trois Pistoles, there is a high bridge on the C.N.R. line. When, during the first world war, German submarine activity was preventing the sending of American soldiers to Europe through New York, American troops took the C.N.R. to Halifax. One day, to the west of the village, there settled a man who claimed to be a veterinary surgeon. I was rather dubious about the real reason for his stay. I thought that this stranger had some other idea in his mind than just looking after sick animals. I took him for a spy entrusted with the job of blowing up the railway bridge.

I then came to Ottawa, at my own expense, in order to acquaint the authorities with my misgivings. Sir Eugene Fiset, a personal friend of mine, was at the time deputy minister of militia. The session was on and parliament sat in the national museum, the parliament buildings having burnt down. Sir Eugene then introduced me to the Hon. Sam Hughes, to whom I communicated my misgivings, and a few weeks later the stranger disappeared.

One Sunday afternoon, during the last war, I dislodged from under the same bridge a stranger who had settled there with his easel and paint brushes to paint the bridge. I immediately notified the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and, a few hours later, the intruder had been shooed away and the bridge was left standing.

Before giving you, Mr. Speaker, as true a description as possible of my county to make it better known, I have a very pleasant duty to perform, in the name of my electors as well as in my own name, towards the hon. member for Gaspe (Mr. Langlois).

During the long and painful illness of the late Mr. Belzile, the hon. member agreed to look after the interests of Rimouski county as well as those of his own constituency. It was a heavy task and he did a wonderful job. I might even add that it has affected his health. For that hard and tiring work, I offer him once more my thanks and those of my electors.

As I do not wish to impose upon his kindness, and knowing besides that his new duties as parliamentary assistant to the Postmaster General mean more work for him, I am willing to look after all the work pertaining to my county. However, I shall still be asking for his help and his advice, and I know that he will give me both.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am proud to tell you about my county, 312 square miles in area, with a population of over 61,000, including nearly 30,000 electors.

Between Trois Pistoles, its western boundary, and Mont Joli, its eastern boundary, the distance is 60 miles facing the beautiful St. Lawrence river, the average width of which, at this point, is 35 miles.

As the waters of the river begin to get salty at L'Islet, 150 miles farther west, it is really salty at that point of the St. Lawrence river. My county extends 52 miles to the south.

This area of 312 square miles comprises 34 well-organized parishes, 34 churches, 25 convents, 1 classical college, 1 seminary and 1 bishopric.

This reminds me that last fall, the Rimouski diocese mourned the loss of its archbishop, the Most Rev. Courchesne. He passed away in November. In March, Rome appointed her new representative, Most Rev. Parent whose school examinations I had the honour to supervise when he was six years old.

A few hours after he had been appointed, I went to Rimouski to offer him my respects on my own behalf and on behalf of my electors. He then recalled having met the Speaker of the House of Commons in Rome during the summer. He urged me to offer him his regards, which I am most glad to do.

Now, if I may continue: 1 school of agriculture, 1 technical school, 1 school of commerce, 1 navy school, 4 commercial schools. There are 210 male teachers, 7 female teachers, 141 schools and 6,271 children attending those elementary schools. We have a hospital, a sanatorium, two newspapers, three homes for the aged. There are 3,500 farmers, 697 settlers, 2,459 day-labourers. There are also 342 farm tractors, 11 butter factories, 9 cheese factories, 80 industries, 10 tinsmiths, 22 shoemakers, 23 blacksmiths, 205 merchants, 36 hotels, 114 professional men—doctors, notaries, lawyers, surveyors, agronomists—and 73 restaurants.

Although I have represented Rimouski for the past six months only, I have tried to be well informed in order to give immediate answers to the legitimate and reasonable requests of my constituents. Mr. Speaker, if I may judge from the hundreds of letters I have received since I was elected, I am considered by all the electors as their representative with the government. My electors and myself are convinced that the present Liberal government will be pleased to consider the requests submitted by the representative elected by the majority.

On the St. Lawrence, there are three cities, Trois Pistoles to the west, Mont Joli to the east, and Rimouski practically in the centre. Mont Joli takes its name from its beautiful, lofty site; a little to the west, on a great height there is the St. Georges sanatorium, an impressive building accommodating nearly 600 patients who receive remarkable care and attention from the religious authorities, the director, nurses, doctors, attendants and the whole staff. I had the opportunity to visit this fine institution and I was truly amazed by the splendid work accomplished there for the recovery of our dear patients.

I know the Department of National Health and Welfare has paid hundreds of thousands of dollars toward this hospital. I understand there will be other requirements and I know my requests will be well received by the minister of health when I submit them.

The railway terminal and divisional point of the C.N.R. are located at Mont Joli. A good many of its citizens are railroad employees, still on the payroll or retired.

I know that a large number of the retired employees will ask the government, if they have not already done so, for an increase in pension. Their request is justified and I shall consider it a duty and a pleasure to support their claims.

Yesterday afternoon, in the railways committee, I had the pleasure of learning from Mr. Donald Gordon, chairman of the board of the C.N.R., that a committee of representatives of the C.N.R., of the Canadian and international union of railroad employees, had been set up. It is already at work revising the pension of all classes of C.N.R. and former Intercolonial Railway pensioners, with a view to granting all of them a pension in keeping with present standards of living. Mr. Gordon is honest, fair and a real businessman. We are confident he will treat everyone fairly.

During the last war, the Department of National Defence built an airport which I know the people of Mont Joli wish to preserve and expand in order to take care of the increasing volume of business that comes from the north shore.

My lamented predecessor, Mr. Belzile, had succeeded in preventing several buildings from being torn down, even though some people hoped to do away with them. He had even obtained funds for improvements. I am determined that this work will continue, perhaps on an even larger scale, and I am confident that the Minister of National Defence will agree to my request.

A handsome modern building, much of it occupied by the Post Office Department, was inaugurated last September in the centre of Mont Joli.

There is still space available in that building for the staff of an unemployment insurance officer. They could do an excellent job in helping those who have the chance of benefiting from the provisions of this act. There have been urgent requests for the opening of such an office and I hope these requests will be granted in the near future. In the very same building, the people of Mont Joli would like to see and, as a matter of fact, they urgently request the opening of a customs office. Here again, I will take all the necessary steps to have this request given proper consideration.

Mont Joli is also faced with the matter of improving the viaduct in the centre of the town. The municipal authorities have sent me an urgent plea for improvements to this viaduct, now forty years old and no longer meeting the requirements of the people. I will make the necessary representations to the board of transport commissioners in order that they may take the necessary steps to improve this viaduct.

From Mont Joli, Mr. Speaker, you go in a straight line to Ste. Flavie sur Mer. You will find there a fairly long wharf, which does not seem, however, to ensure adequate protection to the coasting vessels that have to stop there. Should a wharfhead be built in an easterly direction, for a distance of a few hundred feet and thence back landward, you would have there almost a true seaport where these coasters could safely put up, load and discharge cargo even in the heaviest weather.

I have seen that kind of a wharf in New Brunswick. It is of great service to seafaring people. I know that works of that description would be most useful in that part of my constituency; I intend to request them from the Minister of Public Works. I consider this establishment at Ste. Flavie as being useful to national defence since the coasters transporting war material can easily stop off there.

Leaving Ste. Flavie and going in a westerly direction—always along the river—one comes to Ste. Luce sur Mer, which really rivals "Old Orchard" with its beautiful rockless sandy beach, and its thousands of visitors during the summer season.

In the fall and the spring the flood-tide undermines the shore and even the highway. I understand that the Department of Public Works is going to be asked to build a retaining wall. This matter is also urgent, and I will support that request with all the energy at my command.

Leaving Ste. Luce, again in a westerly direction, and before reaching Rimouski, one comes to Father Point, where the trans-Atlantic liners pick up or let off the pilots. I have been told that work has to be done on the wharf at that strategic point. I shall submit the request to the Minister of Public Works, the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Transport, as these three departments are interested in that work.

After passing through Rimouski, with which I shall deal further on, we come to Sacre Coeur, an interesting summer resort where real comfort can be found at the Rocher Blanc hotel.

Then you reach Bic. The wharf there needs to be repaired and we shall see to it. At the entrance to the bay there is a small island on which there is a cave where human bones were discovered a few years ago. According to Relations, a daily record kept by the Jesuit missionaries, it was in this cave that the Iroquois exterminated the last of the Hurons. Before taking refuge in this cave where they thought they would be safe, the Hurons came down the great river—Trois Pistoles river—right to its mouth and had spent three weeks on Ile aux Basques. Thinking that the Iroquois had lost their trail, the Hurons came right down to Bic, travelling on the ice, but the Iroquois followed them to the mainland, caught them and exterminated them in this cave.

From Bic we come to St. Fabien, a pretty summer resort, then to St. Simon and to Trois Pistoles.

I will not mention all that could be said of the other parishes in my constituency that do not border the coast; that would be too long. I can assure you, though, that the people in all of them are most interesting from every point of view. That is where farmers and settlers, especially, are located.

Now, Mr. Speaker, before speaking of the county seat itself, I wish to acquaint you with Trois Pistoles. I will tell you the meaning and the origin of the name. The pistole was a French coin. In the early days of the colony, to go from the village of Trois Pistoles you had to cross a river that the Hurons had called the great river. One day a missionary, crossing that river, tried to draw salt water with a silver goblet. He inadvertently let the goblet fall into the water. Whereupon he told the boatman: "When the tide ebbs, you will find the goblet and keep it as fare." That goblet was worth three pistoles. That true story can be found in the history of Trois Pistoles, written by a member of parliament, the Hon. Charles A. Gauvreau, who married the adopted daughter of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and who, for 27 years, ably represented the constituency of Témiscouata in the House of Commons.

For the past 18 years that city has become a sort of smaller Canada. Young men and women from all over Canada come to Trois Pistoles and spend eight weeks there to learn French. When they arrive, from the various English-speaking provinces, they do not speak French at all. Living in families where no English is spoken, they must, of necessity, become familiar with that new language and with the home life of those families. As a result, when they return home after that eight-week course, they speak French fluently. May I say, Mr. Speaker, that these summer courses were inaugurated eighteen years ago by Western university of London, Ontario. At that time, its president was Dr. Sherwood W. Fox, who had dreamed, in his youth, of achieving unity and understanding between the two great races that live in Canada. This patriot always felt that if people were better acquainted, if they could chat together and understand one another, harmonious relations would prevail. With this ideal in mind, he inaugurated the summer school at Trois Pistoles in 1933. These classes, which have continued from year to year, have given wonderful results in the field of good relations.

We have among us here in parliament a former pupil of the school who attended classes in 1935-1936. He did not speak French when he first came to Trois Pistoles, but he learned to express himself fluently in that language which now, fifteen years later, he still speaks very well. I refer to the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Dickey) who is still an eligible bachelor.

This school is directed by Dr. H. E. Jenkins, one of the professors attached to Western university in London. In recognition of his admirable and patriotic work in the sphere of education, Quebec's Laval university conferred on him an honorary doctorate.

May I add, Mr. Speaker, that the university authorities were kind enough to come to Trois Pistoles in order to confer this honorary degree upon this distinguished gentleman, an unprecedented event in the history of the university. The generosity of a Catholic university towards a gentleman of another faith is a fine example of the friendly relations which exist between these races, without religious or racial distinction.

I cannot help but tell you and I am proud so to proclaim: the generosity of Western university towards Monsignor Vandry, rector of Laval university of Quebec, and towards one of my distinguished fellow citizens of Trois Pistoles, chief inspector Epiphane L'Italien, was equal to that of Laval, since that institution conferred the handsome degree of Doctor of Laws honoris causa on those two gentlemen.

Just recently Western university did itself proud by writing on its honour roll the name of another distinguished doctor of laws, that of the right hon. the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. St. Laurent).

In so doing, I know that the authorities of Western university have wished to grant recognition to the great administrative qualities and more particularly to the great legal mind of the Prime Minister of Canada, thus confirming and underlining the judgment passed more than thirty years ago by the Prime Minister's former employer.

Pleasant things were said on that occasion. The Prime Minister was so kind as to speak of Trois Pistoles, my native town. I thank him most sincerely for that.

If the Liberal government were to grant a few thousand dollars as an encouragement to these summer courses, taking care however not to infringe upon the educational rights of the provinces, they could not make a more patriotic gesture. The Carnegie Institute of

New York has been granting, these last three years, substantial sums to encourage these summer courses. That generous gesture was not interpreted as an infringement upon the rights of the provinces.

The lumber trade adds to the importance of Trois Pistoles. It is the most important dressed lumber exporting port in the eastern part of the province and even in the eastern part of the country. Each year, more than 125 million feet of lumber are dressed there, part of the lumber being sent in transit from the maritimes either by rail or water.

The service given by the C.N.R. is good, but the wharf needs to be extended and improved in order that the schooners and other coasting vessels coming from the north shore may load and unload. I am grateful to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) who favoured us with a visit three years ago in order to see for himself the work which had to be done, and I thank him for what he gave us. However I would like to suggest to him that he should not stop there; I know that he will pay attention to my request and grant us that which is part of the war effort of this country.

For the last fifty years there has been a daily steamship service between Trois Pistoles and Les Escoumains. The ship starts to operate when the ice is still in the river, on April 15, and stops when the river is freezing over, on November 15. That steamship service is very valuable to the parishes on each side, both for mail and passenger transport.

In the spring when the trains cannot get through on the north shore because of the swollen rivers, the mail which is delivered by land is often two or three days late. The ship from Trois Pistoles picks up the mail from Quebec, Montreal and Toronto at 4.30 a.m. and delivers it at Les Escoumains, for Baie Comeau. Thanks to the Postmaster General (Mr. Rinfret) and to my hon. colleagues from Gaspe and Saguenay, this service has been renewed this year and I sincerely thank those hon. gentlemen.

Now, last but not least, we come to Rimouski. Mr. Speaker, you are aware of the great disaster which befell this beautiful and prosperous little town last year. Fire, that great destroyer, caused several million dollars worth of damage, and the people of the county seat have not yet recovered from the effects of this catastrophe. I know the government has been generous. I even know that the kind-hearted Prime Minister went to the scene of the fire to see the damage for himself, and the plight of these good people. I thank him for what has already been done and again I convey to him the thanks of all the poor victims of that disaster. I understand that the need is still great and urgent, but I know that the government will not turn a deaf ear to the requests I may be asked to make.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I come to general politics. I am aware that Canada, like other democratic countries, is faced with a most distressing problem.

I feel that the United Nations' decision to keep a well equipped army on a war footing in Europe under the able leadership of General Eisenhower, the greatest general and strategist of modern times, and of his assistant Field Marshal Montgomery, is bound to reassure us in regard to the actual threat of war, and when the Prime Minister tells us he believes and still hopes that war is avoidable, he does so not only to reassure the people. but because he has good reasons to think so.

We must truly place our confidence in the government. The members of the cabinet have shown, in the past, that they have the interest of the Canadian people at heart. The Canadian people have confidence in the government which they returned to power two years ago. As far as I am concerned, as the representative of 30,000 electors, I have complete trust in the straightforwardness, honesty and competence of those who make up our government. That is why, during my electoral campaign, I stated I was a Liberal, I accepted and endorsed the Liberal party's actions, the party in which I had put all my trust. As such, Mr. Speaker, I was elected and as such I have voted for the government. This was indeed the mandate I received from my electors and I wish to remain true to it.

I am not surprised at the government's reticence as regards steps to be taken for the defence of our country and as a member of the United Nations. At the beginning of the second great war, I was in the office of the late Hon. Ernest Lapointe. As he seemed tired, I asked him what was worrying him. He replied: "If the people knew what news comes to us ministers, every twenty-four hours from England, France, Belgium, they would be desperate". Today, the situation is less critical. We should therefore have confidence in those we have honoured with our trust.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that all hon. members, like myself, have received from their electors letters about the high cost of living, requesting the establishment of price controls. Again, Mr. Speaker, I am confident that the members of the government are aware of the situation and will make the necessary decisions at the proper time.

In closing, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Richard) on his interesting speech and especially on the part dealing with his visit to Rome last year.

He suggested that Canada send a representative to the Vatican.

I heartily support the hon. member's motion. I do so not as a Catholic but because the Pope, whose reign is so glorious, is considered by every right-thinking nation as one of the greatest diplomats of modern times.

One of the most famous and renowned of American presidents, the late Franklin D. Roosevelt, who, at the request of his people, served during four consecutive terms—something unique in American history—was not a Catholic. Yet, every month, from the beginning to the end of the war, his confidential representative, Mr. Myron Taylor, a non-Catholic, was sent to call on the Pope and ask his advice.

In these critical times we need the advice of wise and impartial persons. His Holiness Pope Pius XII is one of the wisest men on earth.

It is therefore proper and reasonable that he be consulted. I will therefore support the resolution for the appointment of a Canadian representative to the Vatican.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am happy to say that I will do as I have done since I came to this house and will support the government on the budget issue.

I congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) for his ability in securing acceptance of an operation that could have been more painful than it turned out to be. With his usual smile, he reminds me of a dentist who is sure to hurt his patients, but who knows how to divert their attention with fine words.

Nevertheless I will make so bold as to suggest to him that he modify that part of the budget which concerns the increased tax on refrigerators, electric stoves and washing machines, which are absolutely essential domestic appliances. To compensate that increase, he should raise the tax on alcoholic beverages.

This tax would increase our revenues and would help to prevent much criticism. In so doing the minister would please an immense number of housekeepers who would be eternally grateful to him for having taken that step.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

Mr. Argue:

1. With what provinces has the federal government reached agreement as to their 1951 trans-Canada highway construction program?

2. How many miles of new construction on the trans-Canada highway does each province intend to build in 1951?

3. What is the estimated cost of the above 1951 program for each province, and what amount has the federal government agreed to assume?

Mr. Winters:

1. No agreement is necessary between the federal government and the provinces regarding the annual construction program. Projects are planned and made ready for construction by the provinces and are then submitted to the federal authorities for approval prior to tenders being called.

2. Complete records of actual construction costs at the end of 1950 are not available, but such records for the year ending March 31, 1951, will be available by May 1, 1951. However, the total estimated work committed, completed and under construction, together with the claims submitted to the federal government and paid as at March 31, 1951, were:

(a) Establish one or more open or closed seasons as to each area.

(b) During both open and closed seasons limit to size, and limit or prohibit the incidental catch of halibut that may be taken from each area by vessels fishing for other species.

(c) Make such regulations as it shall find necessary for the registration of fishermen and vessels engaged in fishing for halibut in the convention area.

The proposals also contained provision for appointment of one additional representative from each country on the international fisheries commission.

DOMINION ELECTIONS

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER AND SUGGEST AMENDMENTS

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State) moved:

That a special committee consisting of thirty members to be named later be appointed to study the several amendments to the Dominion Elections Act, 1938, and amendments thereto, suggested by the chief electoral officer, to study the said act, to suggest to the house such amendments as the committee may deem advisable, and report from time to time, with power to send for persons, papers and records and to print the proceedings, and that the provisions of section 1 of standing order 65 be waived in respect to this committee.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we were not informed at six o'clock yesterday that this notice of motion would be proceeded with today. I had a few words that I wanted to say about it, and since the motion has now been called perhaps I have no alternative but to express at this time my thoughts on the motion.

I am sure we are all in agreement with the practice that is followed of setting up such a committee as this every once in a while so that the Dominion Elections Act can be reviewed. I understand that the chief electoral officer is constantly reviewing electoral practices, and when he feels there are changes that should be recommended he makes that fact known so that the committee can be set up and consideration given to ways to improve our election machinery.

Since the committee is to be set up and the act is to be reviewed, it seems to me that this is the occasion for members to indicate any matters which they feel should be given particular consideration. All of us in this house have had a good deal of experience with Canada's election machinery, and no doubt all of us have suggestions that we would like to make. There are a number I should like to make, but I shall confine myself on this occasion to one. I refer to the problem created for a great many electors in Canada by virtue of the fact that they do not happen to be in their own home constituencies on election day. In the election act there is provision for advance voting, but that privilege is accorded to a very limited number of people. It really does not fill the bill.

I think everyone will agree that, so far as the exercise of the franchise is concerned, the ideal is that it should be extended as widely as possible. Our aim should be to encourage Canadian citizens to get out and vote on election day. But the fact is that there are reasons that make it necessary for people to be away from their homes, away from their constituencies, on the day that the election happens to be held. People are sometimes away because of business. There are times, let it be said, when people are away on their holidays or vacations. When one realizes that many people in this country are tied to their work for 48, 50 or 51 weeks of the year, surely when they get one or two weeks' holidays it is a matter of importance that they get away if they possibly can. If an election falls when working people are away on their holidays, I suggest that some arrangement should be made to enable them to vote.

There are various ways in which it can be done. The simplest move to make—and I cannot understand why it was not made long ago—is to extend the right to advance voting and put it on a much broader basis. As I indicated at the start, we did not know this motion was going to be called today; therefore I do not happen to have the election act here, but I believe that advance voting is restricted to people who work for transportation companies and who are necessarily absent from their homes on election day in connection with their work. There are one or two other classes, such as fishermen and the mounted police. I hear some hon. members saying "commercial travellers", but I am not sure of that. At any rate there is obviously some doubt or uncertainty on that point. Certainly a great many people who find themselves away—frequently of necessity—on election day are not permitted to vote at the advance polls.

That is not true with respect to all elections in Canada. I know, for example, that in my own province of Manitoba the right to vote at advance polls in provincial elections is open to anyone who for any reason finds that he will have to be away on election day. No harm is done by virtue of that fact. No one abuses the privilege of democracy when he is allowed to vote in that way. I submit that the least that can be done with respect to this problem, so far as people away on election day are concerned, is that they should be allowed to vote at advance polls.

On a previous occasion when this matter was under discussion, I drew the attention of the house to the fact that there is another way in which this matter is handled in one province at any rate, and I refer to the province of British Columbia. In that province there is what is known as absentee voting. The mechanics are rather simple; if any qualified elector of the province of British Columbia is away from his home constituency on election day he may vote in whatever constituency he finds himself on that day. There is a special ballot for the purpose, so that he votes for one of the candidates in his own riding. The counting of absentee ballots takes place a little later than the counting of ballots cast in home constituencies and after that the final results are announced.

I have heard many complimentary things said about the way in which absentee voting operates in British Columbia. In order to make the picture complete, I believe I should point out that the right to vote in another constituency than one's own does not apply to persons moving about in the Vancouver or Victoria areas. For example, if your home is in one constituency in Vancouver you cannot claim the right to vote as an absentee voter in some other Vancouver constituency, but if your home is in Vancouver and you find yourself in the interior of the province on election day you do not thereby lose your vote. I submit that consideration might be given to working out something of that kind in connection with federal elections as well. I readily recognize the problem if one were to try to do it on a nation-wide basis—in other words, if an attempt were made to permit persons from Halifax to vote for the Halifax candidates of their choice anywhere in Canada; but at least it could be tried out within provincial areas.

I offer these suggestions in the hope that they will be taken into consideration by the committee. This is not the first time suggestions of this kind have been made on the floor of this house, and I believe they have been considered by similar committees on previous occasions. As yet, however, no action has been taken to alleviate the situation. I believe it is important that Canadians be encouraged to vote, and that the right to vote be accorded to them as widely as possible. The least I would hope that the committee might do this session with respect to this problem is to recommend an enlargement of the provisions with respect to advance voting.

Mr. Graydon: A week or so ago, when the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe) was taking part in the debate on the constitution of the committee to deal with matters coming under his department, before the discussion proceeded he gave hon. members a general review of what he had in mind and some of the suggestions which were to be put forward by his department. Here we are to consider a number of amendments to the Dominion Elections Act which have been suggested by the chief electoral officer. I think it would be helpful to the house if the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley) would give a review of what he has in mind, indicating the amendments which have been suggested by the chief electoral officer, so that this matter may be debated in the regular and usual way. I am sure the minister is both eager and anxious to do this, and I want to give him an opportunity.

Mr. Bradley: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The minister has moved the motion, and under the rules if he speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Knowles: Let us give unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

Mr. Speaker: Unless the house gives unanimous consent—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: —the minister will close the debate if he speaks now.

Mr. Knowles: Who is objecting to unanimous consent being given?

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): I do not feel it is necessary to make any extended remarks on this subject. I believe this is to be simply a continuation of the work commenced last session, which it is hoped to complete now. We should not take up a lot of time here on matters that can be dealt with much more expeditiously by the members of that committee. I have been a member of every elections committee appointed since 1936, and we have a fairly good act at the present time. One thing is still lacking, however—a system which will give us much better representation than we have at the present time. When the committee meets again I hope there will be strong support for the single transferable vote in single-member constituencies. I understand that this matter is now under consideration by the chief electoral officer, who has made quite a study of the problem. I understand also that the Canadian Chamber of Commerce received representations from all its branches across Canada giving strong support to this suggestion. I am looking forward to seeing that change made in the act this year.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): The suggestion has been made that the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley) should explain the general intention as to the procedure to be followed, and also indicate the nature of the recommendations that have been made. Before that suggestion is disposed of, it seems to me that, after all, the main concern of every hon. member should be to make sure that the business of this house is carried on in the most expeditious and satisfactory manner. I should think it would be the desire of hon. members to give unanimous consent to any procedure that would bring the most satisfactory results in dealing with a matter of this kind.

Surely no subject could be brought before this house for consideration which is of much greater importance to hon. members and to the people of Canada than the amendment of the act which provides for the democratic expression from time to time of the will of the people. In the motion before us there is an indication that apart from the general opinion of the members of that committee, and apart from such views as may be put forward by those asked to comprise the committee, the Secretary of State has received a number of recommendations. During the sittings of any important committee many hon. members who are not on the committee convey their opinions to members of the committee as to the subjects that should be brought forward, and give some indication of the views they feel should be expressed there. It appears that the Secretary of State has a number of recommendations of which hon. members generally are wholly unaware. I should think this would be the time for an expression of opinion as to some considerations which should receive particular attention by this committee. Without any attempt to impose the rules as a limiting factor, it would seem to me desirable that the Secretary of State should indicate the particular recommendations which will be put forward and the procedure he thinks should be followed, so that hon. members who are not on the committee will be in a position to make their recommendations to members of the committee as to what should be discussed.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when I had the honour to propose the name of the present chief electoral officer for that important post, not as a nominee of the government but as a nominee of this house, the proposal was received in this chamber with unanimous acclaim. I think we are all agreed that it is desirable that under the act the franchise shall be exercised as widely as possible, and no one would wish to insist upon any rule that unduly diminished the possibility of any elector exercising his franchise.

The chief electoral officer I am sure is objectively concerned at all times with what he feels from his experience, not only as chief electoral officer but as assistant to the chief electoral officer, may be workable. I do not think it would be in accord with the former practice, and perhaps not the right thing to do, for the government to make recommendations to the house as to what should be done under the elections act. Here we are endeavouring to set up a representative committee. We are bringing no pressure whatsoever upon the chief electoral officer as to the nature of his recommendations; and I would not like any of those recommended as members of this committee by the whip on this side to feel that they had any duty to the government in exercising their functions as members of that committee. It is not a matter of government and opposition; it is a matter of the general membership of the house striving to get the kind of act that will make it easier to bring to this house proper representation of the whole body of electors. I would hope that the committee would consider these recommendations which come objectively from the chief electoral officer without any thought as to how they might work to the advantage or disadvantage of one party or another.

It seems to me that those of us who will not be members of the committee will be entitled to attend and make representations directly to the committee, or have them made by someone who will be of its membership. The matter will be dealt with more expeditiously if the house defers any debate until the committee has made an investigation and submits recommendations. The recommendations of the committee will not be binding on the house, but when they are presented we shall have not only their substance but also the reasons which induced the committee to make them. We could then have a more profitable and expeditious debate than we can if we attempt now to discuss in advance recommendations which may or may not have been made to the Secretary of State by the chief electoral officer.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I want to agree with the Prime Minister, because I am sure all members are anxious to produce the best election act possible. I want to make it clear that in suggesting that we should have proposals from the Secretary of State it was not my purpose to extend the debate. I thought that if we had a concise statement as to how the committee was to proceed, and some indication of the suggestions that were to be put forward, it might avoid a debate.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to debate this motion, although there are certain matters connected with the elections act which I think are important. The debate, however, having been opened by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair), I see no reason why I should not add my little bit.

Although I agree with much of what the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said in connection with this resolution, I believe that it is in much the same position as any other resolution coming before this house for the setting up of a committee. The members of the house are free to express their opinions concerning any aspect of the act that may come before the committee.

I intend to be brief, but there are two things to which I should like to refer. One of those things will certainly have to have government approval before it can become law. In conversation with the returning officer in my own riding, Vancouver East, as well as with returning officers in other ridings in Vancouver at the last election, I found they were unanimous in insisting that they were cramped in carrying out their duties because of the smallness of the remuneration they were allowed to pay for help. I suggest that that is a matter which should come before the committee, and upon which the chief electoral officer should be in a position to guide the committee, as no doubt complaints have been made to him.

Then, there is the question of persons being unable to vote who are not in their constituencies on election day. I think I have been a member of all the election committees that have been set up by this house since I came here. This question has always been one that received a great deal of consideration by those committees. I am sure the members of the committees were anxious to extend voting privileges to those who may be absent from their ridings on election day, but the difficulty was to find a formula that would extend that advantage to those people without developing a procedure that might be abused. I believe I am correct in putting it in that way.

As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has pointed out, in the province of British Columbia we have developed a technique for allowing those who are not in their constituencies on election day to cast their ballot. I believe the formula is efficient and foolproof. It is the absentee ballot. It does not matter in what part of the province the voter happens to be on election day; if he wants to vote for the candidates in his riding he can do so if his name is on the voters' list in the riding in which he resides. If the riding in which he lives and has his vote is a large one and, because of the distance, he is not able to be at the designated polling place in his riding, he can vote at any other polling place in the same riding. He cannot do that, of course, in the urban ridings.

I recall that in one election, I think it was in 1941, I was in the city of Prince George on election day. I live in the constituency of Vancouver-Burrard, and I voted for the candidates in that constituency just as easily and just as effectively as if I had been at home on that day. I believe the method used in British Columbia can be adopted in federal elections just as easily as in provincial elections. However, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said, it might be found advisable to limit the absentee vote to the constituencies within a province.

With these few remarks, Mr. Speaker, so far as I am concerned I am quite willing to let these matters go to the committee and have them discussed there.

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I think there could be several improvements made in this election act. Ever since I came here in 1940 there is one amendment about which I have been concerned, and that is the one which would provide for the transferable vote. I agree with the principles set forth by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in connection with making an effective act for the individual elector. From experience, however, I think there is plenty of proof that we should have the transferable vote.

In the general election of 1949, for instance, there were 121 members elected by a minority of the votes cast in their respective ridings; that is a very large percentage of the total number of members in this house. As a matter of fact, during that same election supporters of the present government, which has such an overwhelming majority, were elected to approximately seventy-five per cent of the seats in this house with less than fifty per cent of the vote which was polled across the country. I believe those figures were issued by the chief electoral officer at the time. I am not complaining about that and saying that the election act should be revised now, because that has happened on other occasions. But in a modern democratic nation we should reduce this sort of gamble as much as we can. It is important that this committee should recommend to the house an amendment to provide for the transfer of votes, so that if there is a multiplicity of candidates in a riding a candidate must receive a majority of the votes cast before he can be elected. I believe that change should be made in the interests of modern democracy.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to raise a point of order at this time as I did before. I rise now to take part in the debate, in order to suggest to the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley) that, in view of the present voting hours provided for under our election act, a large and, if I may say so, growing group of voters are virtually disfranchised. I refer more particularly to those who are now in that greatly increased class of people who commute from their residences to their places of work.

I suppose it will not be any news to hon. members to be told that there are now in Canada many people who are commuting from places as far as fifty miles or more away from their work. To travel these distances takes a considerable length of time, even if they use a motorcar, thus making for flexibility of hours which may meet their convenience in special instances. But there are large numbers of people—and a great number in my own riding—who use the train service morning and night in going to and coming from their work. What it means is this, if they are to continue to use that train service: they cannot stay long enough in the morning to vote, and they cannot get back early enough at night to do so. The committee ought to make a thorough study of that question; because, following up what the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) so aptly said a few minutes ago, I fancy it is the desire of every member of this house that there should be, under an act of this kind, as little inconvenience, lack of accommodation and disfranchisement as possible.

I should also point out, Mr. Speaker, that this group of people to whom I have referred is rapidly increasing in numbers in many sections of Canada. What may not have been a problem ten, fifteen or twenty years ago has now become an acute one which these commuters and suburbanites feel is a matter of discrimination with regard to their franchise. I hope the committee will deal with that matter.

Before I sit down, inasmuch as the minister did not make a statement at the opening of this debate may I suggest that he take the opportunity of doing so before the debate closes, and of at least disclosing the information with regard to amendments that was given to him by the chief electoral officer. When he does so, we will follow the principle laid down by the Prime Minister and will not regard him as a cabinet minister but just as one of the rest of us.

Mr. Abbott: Does the hon. member want to make a third speech?

Mr. Graydon: I could, if you like.

Mr. Abbott: Heaven forbid!

Mr. Bradley: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now, he will close the debate.

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State): The matter of amendments to the Dominion Elections Act is of course one of great moment to every member of this house. Hon. members will recall that last year a committee was set up to make a study of the elections act and to suggest such amendments as they deemed to be appropriate. At that time the chief electoral officer had a substantial number of proposals to make to the committee. Many of them were formal in character; some went to matters of substance. In particular I recall that one concerned my own province. It will be remembered that provision was made for a first election in the province of Newfoundland; but the force and validity of that particular provision has now been exhausted, and it is necessary that the situation be reviewed in order that Newfoundland, in any future election, may vote as do the other provinces of Canada. I think the same consideration applies to one or two other sections of the dominion.

I have not had any discussion of the matter with the chief electoral officer since then. Last year the matter went to the committee; and of course I am not a member of that committee. This year it is proposed to continue the work. At the moment I have no list of the amendments which were to be suggested by the chief electoral officer, nor have I any report of the committee which would indicate just what amendments they might be considering or might be prepared at some later date to recommend to this house. I feel, however, that the debate this afternoon has been of value. A number of suggestions have been offered, and I am sure that the committee will take due notice of them and give them serious consideration.

Motion agreed to.

NAMES OF MEMBERS COMPRISING COMMITTEE

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa) moved:

That the following members comprise the special committee on the Dominion Elections Act: Messrs. Applewhaite, Argue, Balcer, Boisvert, Boucher, Cameron, Cannon, Decore, Dewar, Diefenbaker, Fair, Fleming, Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont), Fulford, Harris (Grey-Bruce), Hellyer, Herridge, Jeffery, Kirk (Antigonish-Guysborough), MacDougall, McWilliam, Murphy, Nowlan, Pearkes, Power, Stick, Valois, Viau, Ward, Wylie.

Mr. McLure: Is Prince Edward Island represented on the committee?

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

AIR FORCE—ESTABLISHMENT OF BOMBING AND GUNNERY RANGE NORTHEAST OF EDMONTON

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I should like to report that agreement has been reached with the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan for establishing a large R.C.A.F. bombing and gunnery range roughly 100 miles northeast of Edmonton. The range will cover an area of several thousand square miles, and is necessitated by the high speed of modern jet aircraft and the long range of their weapons, including rockets and cannon, which result in a large increase in the danger area. There will continue to be a requirement for the existing bombing and gunnery ranges in current use.

The new range will also be used in connection with the development and evaluation of various forms of air weapons, including particularly air-to-air rockets.

The range will lie to the east of the Northern Alberta railway and will be roughly centred on Primrose lake. It will stretch about 115 miles from east to west and 40 miles from south to north, with the possibility of extension to the north if later required.

There are no settlements in the area, and compensation will be paid for any property rights in trap lines, etc., affected.

Construction will be commenced at once on necessary runways, operations buildings and barracks blocks, etc., at an estimated cost of $14 million.

REPORT AS TO PROPOSED EXPENDITURE AT MACDONALD AND PORTAGE AIRPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. J. Wood (Norquay): I should like to direct certain questions to the Minister of National Defence. My inquiry is prompted by a news item appearing in the Winnipeg Free Press of April 16, in reference to the airport at Gimli, Manitoba. It reads in part as follows:

But lack of adequate accommodation—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think the hon. member should read the dispatch. He might ask the question.

Mr. Wood: My questions are: Has the minister seen the reports in the Winnipeg Free Press and the Portage la Prairie Graphic, wherein it is estimated that over $10 million will be expended this year on the airports at Macdonald and Portage? Is this correct?

Is it correct that the minister intimated, as suggested in the Graphic report, that small housing units should be prepared, and that Portage should "get going" on the project now?

If the minister has not seen the reports referred to I will send them over, and he can answer later.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): My attention was drawn to this matter only after coming into the house today. I shall be glad to look into it and give the hon. member an answer.

[Mr. Claxton.]

PACIFIC DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO SECURITY AGREEMENT—UNITED STATES-AUSTRALIA-NEW ZEALAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Yesterday President Truman announced plans for working out a security agreement between the United States and Australia and New Zealand which apparently is to lead to a full-scale Pacific pact comparable to the North Atlantic alliance. Will the minister tell the house where Canada fits into this picture?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The statement which was made by President Truman yesterday in Washington—and I believe statements were also made in New Zealand and Australia—referred to a proposed arrangement between the governments of Australia, New Zealand and the United States for mutual security pursuant to articles 51 and 52 of the United Nations charter. The Canadian government has been kept closely informed of those negotiations, and we have already indicated to the governments of Australia and New Zealand that we welcome them as an important contribution to the defence of freedom by increasing stability in the area to be covered by these arrangements. That area was referred to by the Australian minister of external affairs in a statement to the house of representatives in Canberra on March 14 last, when he said—and I am quoting from Mr. Spender's statement:

The objective has been to obtain an arrangement which will benefit the whole of the western Pacific area, guaranteeing friendly aid and protection in the event of a renewed threat of attack.

Yesterday in his statement President Truman did say that these arrangements constitute initial steps, not, as I understood him, necessarily to a Pacific pact, but initial steps in the consolidation of peace in that area. If these negotiations are extended to cover anything like a Pacific pact analogous to the North Atlantic pact, naturally the Canadian government would be interested; but we have received no indication that these additional negotiations are going to take place.

IMMIGRATION

REPORT AS TO TREATMENT OF PERSONS COMING TO CANADA FROM EUROPE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): In the absence of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the statement of John Fisher, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation commentator, made yesterday in Toronto, to the effect that immigrants coming to Canada from Europe are treated like cattle, and his description of his own experience recently on his return from Europe, been brought to the attention of the Prime Minister? If not, having regard to the importance of any statement made by Mr. Fisher, and the regard the people of Canada have for him, will that question be looked into?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The matter has not been drawn to my attention, and I should be very much surprised if any responsible person compared the treatment received by immigrants to Canada as that proper to be given to cattle.

[Later:]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Now that I have sent over to the Prime Minister the article in question from the Telegram of yesterday, does he not consider that the statement is of such a nature that it should be looked into, particularly in view of the eminence of the person who is quoted as having made it?

Mr. St. Laurent: The hon. member was good enough to send over to me the clipping from the Telegram of Wednesday, April 18, which contains the statement that Mr. Fisher had witnessed bad treatment which he attributed to the picayune attitude of Canadians who, he said, resented the immigrants on grounds that there was a housing shortage and that there were not enough jobs to go round. He said that there had been treatment of one young woman which he resented, and that he felt like making representations to the immigration official.

The conduct of the immigration official will certainly be inquired into, because it is not the policy of the department to have anything but the greatest possible degree of kindness and courtesy shown to those who are coming here to become Canadians. If any official has behaved otherwise, his case should be very seriously considered. If he is not capable of carrying out the policy of the department, he should be relieved of his duties.

With respect to the statement that there are Canadians who have a picayune attitude about housing and jobs, we all know that the matter of substantial immigration, while it may have the approval of a vast majority of the people everywhere, is opposed by some.

Inquiries of the Ministry

VETERANS LAND ACT

BRANTFORD SUBDIVISION—REPORT AS TO FLOODING OF BASEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Charlton (Brant-Wentworth): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. In view of the resolution which I believe his department received, and an article which appeared in the Globe and Mail this morning, is the government prepared to establish immediately a committee of investigation to review charges of Brantford branch, local 461, of the Canadian Legion, that the Veterans Land Act administration sold waterlogged land to veterans, who are now in danger of losing their homes because water is being forced upward from an underground lake?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I have not seen the item appearing in the Globe and Mail to which my hon. friend refers, but I understand that it has to do with basement flooding which is being experienced by some veterans who are building their own houses on a Veterans Land Act subdivision in Brantford. This matter has received and is receiving the attention of the department. I may tell my hon. friend that a meeting is to take place tomorrow of the veterans themselves, the Legion, and representatives of the Veterans Land Act administration.

I might add that the property to which my hon. friend refers was purchased, I believe, in 1945, by the director of the Veterans Land Act, and it was purchased after having been inspected by qualified engineers who certified that it was suitable for building purposes. Up to 1950 some fifty houses were built there, and none experienced any unusual drainage problems. It is believed that the trouble in this area—there are sixteen further houses involved—is due mostly to the unusual water conditions this year. All these houses to which reference is made are not finished. Actually I believe there are only six which are finished and occupied; the others are in process of being built. That is given as one of the reasons for the trouble. However, the matter is well in hand and is being looked into.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS

CABANO, QUE., FIRE—DEVASTATION OF B. C. ORCHARDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): May I ask the Secretary of State, or if it is not something that he is responsible for, the appropriate minister, if he will be kind enough to look at Hansard of March 19, page 1384, which shows that a question which I asked was passed as an order for return. The return has not yet been brought down. I asked for a comparison of the amount requested to assist in the disastrous fire at Cabano and that requested to assist in the damage caused to the fruit orchards in British Columbia. I should be very glad indeed if the return could be expedited.

DIRECTORS OF CROWN COMPANIES—EXPENSES, FEES, ETC.

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): A question of mine was passed as an order for return two months ago today, as is indicated on page 454 of Hansard of February 19. I have not yet received the return.

NEWSPRINT

QUESTION AS TO CONTROL OF ALLOCATION TO SMALL PUBLISHERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I direct a question to the Minister of Defence Production? Does the control over newsprint which was announced within the last day or so give the government authority to control the allocation of newsprint supplies within Canada to enable smaller publishers to get such newsprint as they require?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): That is not the purpose of the order, whether the authority is contained in the order or not. There is no present intention to control allocation of newsprint.

FISHERIES

ATTENDANCE OF SECRETARY OF STATE AT ST. JOHN'S, NFLD., CONVENTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. Did he attend the convention of fishermen in St. John's, Newfoundland, in an official capacity? If he did so, has he any statement to make to the house?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State): I do not think that a statement on a subject of that kind is one which I should make at this time.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Did the minister attend that convention in an official capacity? If he did not, in what capacity did he attend?

Mr. Bradley: I was not there as Secretary of State for Canada.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Graydon: That is twice this week that you have divested yourself of your portfolio.

CIVIL SERVICE

INQUIRY AS TO ORDER IN COUNCIL WITH RESPECT TO OUTSIDE WORK

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Last Monday the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) asked if there had been a recent order in council relating to outside employment for civil servants. I indicated that there was such an order, and promised to give a statement at a later date, which I now wish to do.

Order in council P.C. 3/1440 lays down certain principles relating to outside employment undertaken by civil servants. Earlier orders in council dating back to 1925 had laid down the general principle that no full-time civil servant earning more than $1,600 a year could engage in any outside gainful employment without the express approval of treasury board. Literally applied, this meant that no civil servant could, for example, receive payment for serving as an organist in a church, or even acting as a baby sitter, without prior approval by treasury board. This was manifestly inoperable and, in fact, the regulation has not been generally enforced.

After full discussion the national joint council of the public service of Canada recommended the new regulations which have been incorporated in P.C. 3/1440.

In effect, the new regulations define certain classes of prohibited employment; for example, where the employee would make use of confidential information acquired in the course of his duties.

In all other respects the control of outside employment has now been passed to the deputy heads of the departments, who may lay down principles applicable to their respective departments. Subject to such departmental rules as the deputy head may lay down, a civil servant may engage in non-prohibited outside employment so long as it does not impair his efficiency in the public service. Where a deputy head is of the opinion that outside employment is impairing the efficiency of the employee's regular duties, he may direct the employee to cease or to limit such outside employment.

I shall table a copy of the order in council, if it has not already been tabled.

Mr. Knowles: May I point out that the minister has overlooked one aspect of my question? My question was based on the way in which this order was being interpreted in the press. It is being interpreted as an order the purpose of which is to permit civil servants to supplement their government earnings. Has the minister any comment to make on that aspect of the matter?

Mr. Abbott: I am not responsible for the interpretation that is put on these matters by the press. For the last twenty-five years there has been an order in council respecting outside employment, and I summarized the terms of it. It was felt that it was inoperable and unenforceable; consequently a new order in council was drafted which sets out certain employment in which civil servants may not engage. So far as other jobs are concerned, that rests with the deputy head of the department.

Mr. Graydon: Are there very many cases of that kind in the civil service?

Mr. Abbott: I have no idea.

POSTAL SERVICE

TORONTO MAIL CARRIERS—INVESTIGATION OF WORKING CONDITIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. Langlois (Parliamentary Assistant to the Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer to a question asked yesterday by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) regarding an investigation of the working conditions of mail carriers in Toronto, as reported on page 2142 of Hansard. In reply may I say that as a result of the investigation conducted in Toronto the department authorized the postmaster to make a cut of one walk for every four walks, instead of one in three. This was done. The whole situation is constantly under study.

GASOLINE

EFFECT OF BUDGET PROPOSALS ON PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance, based on a Winnipeg press report indicating an increase in the price of gasoline of two cents a gallon. Can the minister explain how an increase in the sales tax of considerably less than one cent per gallon becomes two cents per gallon at the retail level?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I do not know that the price rise is two cents a gallon. I am not in the gasoline business. The increase in the sales tax is two per cent, and merchants who have commodities to sell presumably are adjusting their prices accordingly. I do not make their prices, and there is no control so far as the government is concerned over the price of gasoline, any more than there is over most other commodities.

Mr. Knowles: The increase in the sales tax would be only about half a cent per gallon.

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Wednesday, April 18, consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. G. S. White (Hastings-Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, today at 12.30 the ears of the whole world were tuned to Washington to hear an address by that great soldier, General Douglas MacArthur. His classic speech will long be remembered, not only by our American cousins but throughout the entire world where freedom still survives today. His remark that the American concept of human liberties was the best yet devised and his remark that the hopes and aspirations of the human race centred in the historic chamber from which he was speaking may to the same degree apply to Canada and to this chamber.

The warning of General MacArthur that you cannot appease communism in Asia may well be repeated in this house. His reference to the dignity of all mankind should be remembered. His warning of there being no substitute for victory or a sham peace laying the base for future demands should be well heeded by all pacifists and isolationists in Canada. His reference to prolonged indecision, political indecision and the lack of reinforcements for the American army when he called for reinforcements may well be pondered over by this government.

Those of us who were here in the 1944 parliament well remember the tragic price that Canada had to pay for the lack of trained reinforcements for service overseas. There are many in Canada today who feel that the strength of our armed forces is much too low in view of the world situation. I sincerely hope that the reason for this is not the result of political indecision.

In taking part in the budget debate I wish to refer only briefly to certain matters which have been discussed already by other members. It has been pointed out already to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) that corporation profits during the past year have been at an all-time high, while the net income of the primary producers has been decreasing. While the minister has imposed an additional 20 per cent surtax on corporations, I think he will find that at the end of the year when their statements are issued profits for 1951 will be even higher than in 1950. In the past it has been proven that when additional taxes are imposed on corporations it simply means that the price of the product or manufactured article is raised and the increase is passed on to the consumer. After all, there is nothing to prevent a manufacturer of washing machines, radios, or anything else from setting his own prices. As the Minister of Finance pointed out a moment ago, he has nothing whatever to do with setting the retail price of gasoline. Neither has the minister nor the government anything to do with setting the price of any product. Therefore I submit that, so far as many corporations are concerned, these additional taxes will simply be passed on to the consumer.

Many speakers have already referred to the 20 per cent increase in personal income tax. In his remarks the minister indicated that he was pleased and took credit for not lowering the exemption. If the minister wanted to take credit for doing something, he could have easily increased the exemptions to $1,500 and $3,000 respectively, and he would have received cheers and credit all across the country. The minister should remember that when the exemptions were set at their present figures the value of the Canadian dollar was much higher than it is today, and the cost of living index was much lower than it is at the present time.

The so-called luxury tax is most unfair in many aspects. I for one often wonder who the experts are who decide what items are to be classed as luxuries. We live in a cold climate, so let us take furs, for example. Under the system of taxation it does not matter whether the fur in question costs $75, $200 or $500. They are all subject to the same rate of tax. The same applies to a watch. It does not make any difference whether it costs $50, $300 or $500. The same scale of taxation applies to many other items which today are classed as luxuries. I suggest to the minister that in the taxation of these so-called luxury items some limit or line be established whereby the tax would only apply to such articles when they exceeded a certain price. There are many other items classed as luxuries today such as clocks, luggage, pens, and so on. It is rather difficult to understand how the minister can justify taxing these items of ordinary everyday use and necessity when at the same time expensive articles of furniture, oriental rugs and oil paintings are not taxed.

The new tax of 15 per cent on washing machines and other electrical equipment is in my opinion most unfortunate. In Ontario at least the hydro commission each year builds hundreds and hundreds of miles of new hydro lines. For the first time many new consumers are able to obtain the benefits of cheap power and the great benefits that flow from the use of the many electrical appliances we have today. Naturally these people, who for the first time are hooked up with hydro, have no electrical equipment of any kind, and today they find that on top of the present very high price for electrical equipment they are faced with an additional 15 per cent tax. It seems to me that many articles for which electricity is used are too high today. Take, for example, the ordinary electric stove, which is not a complicated piece of machinery. Nevertheless the average price in Ontario, without the additional 2 per cent sales tax and the 15 per cent excise tax, is $300. The same high prices apply to practically every other type of electrical equipment. Young married couples furnishing their first home will find that these taxes on absolute necessities impose great hardship. These young people are faced with the necessity of buying electrical equipment not because of the fact that the minister has put a tax on stoves but because in the great majority of cases electricity is the only thing used for cooking and other purposes.

I agree with the remarks made the other evening by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) with respect to medical deductions for income tax purposes. I think the minister could well afford to adopt the suggestion made by the hon. member and allow all medical expenses as a deduction. In my opinion the present method of allowing the amount over 4 per cent of the net income, with the provision that such figure is not to exceed $750 for a single person and $1,000 for a married person, should be abolished. I would point out to the minister that when the 4 per cent provision was inserted in the income tax law hospital charges, nursing fees, doctors' fees, surgeons' fees and all other fees pertaining to sickness were much lower than they are at the present time. I know from personal experience that I have had occasion many times to examine medical bills both in connection with estates and for income tax purposes, and I am always amazed at how much it costs to be ill or to have an operation. I think the change suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg

North Centre is very fair, and is worthy of serious consideration by the minister.

I should also like to bring to the attention of the minister an item appearing in the brief submitted by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce on the 23rd of February, 1951, having to do with the Dominion Succession Duty Act. The submission in the brief is as follows:

> The chamber reiterates its protest that in estates over $50,000 the federal government levies succession duties not only on the excess of $50,000 but on the initial $50,000, thus establishing an inequality of exemption, and setting up in the Succession Duty Act a discriminatory provision.

It is pointed out in the submission that there is inequality of exemption, and I suggest to the minister that his department could well afford to amend the act so that there would be an allowance of $50,000 in all estates thereby removing this inequality of exemption. I am sure the loss suffered by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) would be very small.

As the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) is here, I wonder if he has seen the very interesting picture that appeared on the front page of the Ottawa Journal of yesterday. It shows the foundation for the new printing bureau across the river in Hull, and the heading is, "How's the Fishing?" Then there is this comment:

> Boaters and hopeful anglers this morning were "cruising down the river" on a newly formed body of water in the excavation of the government printing bureau in Hull. The water was 19 feet deep, and was formed by the backing up of flood-swollen Brewery creek.

I presume it is water; it does not say it was beer.

> Works department pumping crews this afternoon were pumping the water back into the creek so that the work on the superstructure could go on. The 13-acre printing bureau site cost the federal government more than $800,000 in expropriation payments.

I should like to suggest to the minister that if he is having difficulty with the location over there he might move the location to my riding. There is plenty of good high land and the foundations could be built on solid rock. The cost of the land would not be anything like $800,000.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I will take it into consideration.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): I must say that if you come up there you will not be able to fish out the windows, but I can assure you that you will not have far to go to enjoy the best fishing to be found anywhere in Canada.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak briefly on the dairy industry in Canada. I want to commend the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair) on the very fine, fair presentation he made in this house on behalf of the industry last Monday. I agree with, and concur in every way in, the remarks made by the hon. member, which will be found at page 2071 of Hansard. For a long period the county in which I live has been a great producer of cheese. For many years it produced more cheese than any other county in Ontario. The famous Black Diamond cheese, manufactured and cured in this county, is becoming famous in many countries, and every year the demand in the United States is increasing. The importance of the cheese industry to this county is indicated by the fact that the first producer storage plant to provide cheese curing, storage and laboratory facilities was erected at Belleville.

Since Hastings is an agricultural county it is only natural that the farm producers should be greatly concerned about any fall in prices which affects their products. The very serious inequity as between urban and rural producers which existed at the outset of the war could not be cured by wartime controls. In order to get production at that time labour were given practically everything they asked, but at the same time farm products were strictly controlled. It is quite clear now that the unavoidable wartime controls and the unnecessary peacetime compulsory marketing and political prices since the war have cost the Canadian farm producers hundreds of millions of dollars, and it seems to me the government should take some action to reimburse the farm producers of eastern Ontario and Quebec for the losses they have sustained.

Apparently the government recognized that it had some obligation in the matter. I will not say it was a legal obligation; it could only be a moral obligation, but already they have approved the payment of $65 million to reimburse western farmers who sold their product under practically the same conditions.

Mr. Ross (Souris): That was just a token payment.

Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough): It shows the advantage to any group of producers in Canada in being well organized and exerting great pressure on the government, as well as having their members in the house make insistent demands in their behalf. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) went to England to see what could be done to obtain further moneys for Canada to pay for our wheat. He was unable to make any settlement, however, and as a result of his visit the general public of Canada have had to pay $65 million as a bonus to western farm producers. The farmers of eastern Ontario and Quebec certainly will have to pay their share of this $65 million, despite the fact that during the same period their products were being shipped to Britain at much lower prices than prevailed in the United States. The cheese and bacon of eastern Ontario and Quebec were requisitioned and confiscated, and the producer had absolutely nothing to say in the matter. If there is an obligation, even only morally, to pay the western wheat producers, there is exactly the same moral obligation to make up to the producers of eastern Ontario and Quebec the losses they sustained on the sale of their products. And if the payment of $65 million was made on a moral basis only, then I suggest that the whole issue of the post-war food contracts with Britain should be reopened and reviewed.

During the war there was never any question of a surplus of farm products. The government encouraged farmers to increase production of every kind. The farmers did increase their stock and their acreage, and this at a time when farm labour was scarce and machinery was hard to get and very expensive. The production of foodstuffs was greatly increased, both for civilian use and for the members of the armed services. But during the war years farm products were strictly controlled, and the farmer had no price tag on them. During the same period, however, industry did have a price tag on its products. In many cases industry operated on a cost plus basis, and that is the way industry operates today. There is a price tag on every article turned out, and that price tag makes sure that the manufacturer gets back his cost of production plus a very fair profit.

In his remarks the hon. member for Lanark gave the results of a survey in his county, which showed that in one year the average farmer lost $147 on his milk production. In its report in 1947 the Ontario royal commission on milk showed that it cost $2.69 to produce one hundred pounds of milk for cheese, while the milk producer received in return only from $1.95 to $2.10. I should like to quote a few paragraphs from this report. Under the heading "Price and cost of production" it says:

> The farmer producing fluid milk for consumption in towns and cities of the province is as much entitled to a fair return for his work as a consumer who works in a factory or an office. If up to the present time, through lack of sufficiently effective organization, he has not been able to make his demands felt, that is not a reason for asking him to produce milk for the fluid market at prices less than his cost plus a reasonable profit. He is primarily entitled to the costs of producing milk and to a fair profit for that labour.

[Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough).]

In regard to milk and cheese the commission found these very interesting facts:

> The results of an over-all survey made by the accountants attached to the commission . . . show an average net cost of producing one hundred pounds of cheese milk in 1946 to be $2.34, to which an administrative allowance of 35 cents was added, making a total cost, including administrative allowance, of $2.69 for one hundred pounds of cheese milk.
> At the time of the inquiry . . . the return to the cheese milk producer was estimated at between $1.95 and $2.10 . . . If the average figure is one of general application, as I believe it is, it would seem to substantiate the contention brought forward by the cheese producers association that the price structure existing at that time did not permit a return to the farmer sufficient to pay his cost of production and give him even a modest profit.

If it cost $2.69 to produce one hundred pounds of cheese milk in 1946, certainly it will cost a great deal more in 1951, because as everyone knows the cost of labour and materials has greatly increased. Yet, so far as 1950 is concerned, the milk producer was only receiving approximately $2 per hundred for his milk. In 1950 the cheese producer received 28 cents at seaboard for his product under a contract made by the Minister of Agriculture. The cheese producer had no say in the matter. Additional freight rates and increased cost of production will no doubt further reduce the returns to the cheese producer in 1951.

I would point out that since 1941 over 150 cheese factories in the province of Ontario have closed. In the district in which I live I know of three factories which will not operate during the 1951 season. Speaking to the farmers who have formerly sent milk to these factories, they tell me they will not continue sending milk for prices similar to those which they received in 1950. In many cases the production of milk is simply a side-line. Many farmers will not continue to produce milk for the production of cheese at a loss. I would point out that cheese, butter and other farm products were most important during the war for food for both armed forces and civilians. Surely as a defence measure for the future at least the remaining cheese factories should be kept in operation.

I recall that only a short time ago a protest was made in this house against certain cheap foreign shirts from Japan that were being dumped on the Canadian market. Apparently the Canadian textile industry had enough influence or brought enough pressure to bear on the proper authorities to have the importation stopped. If it is necessary, Mr. Speaker, for the textile industry to have protection of that type, surely then it is not unreasonable to ask that the dairy producers have some sort of protection from substitutes shipped into this country, and then manufactured into food products which take the place of natural food products.

On Monday last the Minister of Agriculture stated that no decision had yet been reached as to the price of butter for this year. No doubt the minister and his department have received many letters, telegrams and petitions—as many members have—from farm groups and cream associations requesting that a floor price for butter be set at 62 cents a pound. I for one hope the minister will see fit to recommend a floor price for butter of 62 cents a pound.

So far as cheese is concerned, I fail to see how our producers can operate on even smaller margins of profit if the price in 1951 is less than 32 cents a pound, and that f.o.b. the factory. I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture a question. Does he feel that the price of 28 cents a pound at seaboard received by the cheese producers of Ontario in 1950 was a fair and reasonable price, and a price at which the milk producer for cheese could operate at a profit?

As I have mentioned to the minister before, there are many veterans in my county who used their gratuities and re-establishment credit to set themselves up in farming. These veterans have heavy commitments to meet in the future, and if they are to be successfully re-established in our peacetime economy they must receive better returns for their farm products. Not long ago a dairy farmer was one whose main objective was to produce and sell milk, and his farm was run to that end. Today the average dairy farmer, apart from the one who produces whole milk for large communities, simply means a farmer who keeps cows as a sideline. It could not be otherwise, considering the prices of manufactured milk during the past few years and the rising cost of everything that a farmer must purchase, including labour. Any man dependent wholly upon his milk cheque during the past few years would have to be pretty good to keep his head above water.

The dairymen in eastern Ontario and Quebec have been kept in business by a thriving export business for dairy cattle, and the high prices paid for any kind of animal that could be used as meat. I know that in my county every week in the year there are buyers from New York state who are anxious to buy dairy cattle. I admit that the prices are good, in fact the prices are extra good. Unfortunately every year the number of cattle in the county is seriously decreasing. No doubt there are some farmers who never sell on the export market, but they have a ready sale to other farmers and to local butchers willing to buy all their young cattle for beef. So far as the dairy farmer is concerned, this is not good. It has made him content to accept low prices for manufactured milk, such as those prevailing last summer. It has also made him indifferent to the fight against substitutes for milk and cream. This has been most noticeable lately. The use of substitutes for milk and cream strikes at the very core of the dairy industry, not just butter but every other product that is made from milk.

Some time ago it was reported that in the city of Toronto alone the large bakeries had discontinued their daily purchases of hundreds of cans of thick cream. They are now using a filled product, the chief ingredient of which is imported into Canada. The uses to which this imported filling can be put are practically endless. Certainly, it could be used in cheese and probably will be in the future if something is not done to assist this industry. For the past ten years there has been no problem connected with the sale of pork and cheese. Both these products were taken by the British, but not always under satisfactory conditions. It now appears as though this whole method of trading and doing business with the British would end unless there is another war. It can practically be taken for granted now that a cheese contract for 1951 based on 1950 prices will be little more than a farce.

So far as cheese and bacon are concerned the British want all we can give them, but they feel that they cannot afford to pay the prices which are necessary to secure those supplies today. A curious sidelight on this aspect is that, while the British are not willing to pay the going prices for our food or raw materials, their own charges for manufactured articles exported to Canada are very high. If you look about in the stores you will find that everything of British manufacture is expensive. No one will ever find a bargain. Occasionally that is a little hard to understand.

A short time ago an article appeared in the Farm Journal under this heading: "More Talk of Wanting Cheese and Bacon". The article reads in part as follows:

> There has been another article in the daily papers to the effect that the United Kingdom "wants" more cheese and bacon from Canada in 1951 than she obtained this year, and again the suggestion she was unwilling to increase the price.
> It is about time this sort of talk ceased and things got down to a businesslike basis.
> Things are in a bad enough mess in the Canadian dairy industry without this sort of talk. The best course would be for Mr. Gardiner to stop it all by telling the British that if they want cheese and bacon they should go into the open market, and pay for it as Canadians have to pay. If he wants to be generous and big hearted he can make any kind of a "contract" he wishes, and be prepared to pay a subsidy. He should not again expect Canadian producers to foot the bill.

The article continues:

Add to the competition from foreign oils the fact that cheese and now powdered milk products are coming into this country from Australia and New Zealand, whose production costs are evidently a lot lower than here in Canada. It is being rumoured that New Zealand whole milk powder will undersell the Canadian product by six cents a pound.

Then there is the riddle of butter. Despite the inroads of margarine on the butter industry all signs point now to a shortage of domestic stocks of butter next spring. The production situation on the prairies is particularly bad, and much of the surplus comes from there.

We are likely to see imports of butter into Canada by next spring. Which means that every Canadian dairy product, except whole milk, will have competition from outside sources on a price basis. It is doubtful if such a situation ever faced the whole industry here before.

And certain new developments in the canned milk trade do not leave even the whole milk people free from the threat of a new kind of competition.

I would ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) if in 1951 we are to have a repetition of our own cheese being requisitioned at 28 cents at seaboard and the permitting of New Zealand cheese at 32 cents to 34 cents to be imported into the country in order to meet our domestic needs. The recent ruling of the Supreme Court of Canada allowing the sale of margarine was another blow to the dairy industry. Certain Canadian companies are making huge fortunes out of the manufacture of margarine. It will be recalled that in this house it was often said that if the manufacture of margarine was permitted in Canada the Canadian farmer would benefit because he would be able to produce certain crops from which oil could be produced; but we all know that there is no Canadian product that we could produce that could compete with the imported edible oils produced in many cases under conditions which we in Canada could only class as slave labour.

It was pointed out by my colleague the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair) that over two million Canadians depend on the dairy industry for their livelihood. He asked a pertinent question, namely, how many Canadians were employed in the manufacture of margarine. This large number of Canadians who depend on the dairy industry for their livelihood supply a large part of the purchasing power for Canadian goods. One wonders if all this is to be swept aside; if the dairy industry, which has always been one of the basic industries of this country, is gradually to fade out; and if our butter, cheese and other dairy products are, in the future, to be made out of substitutes imported from abroad.

[Mr. White (Hastings-Peterborough).]

The minister has not yet announced any contract for cheese for 1951 or whether or not cheese will be requisitioned. At the present time it certainly appears that the production of cheese in 1951 in Ontario will reach another all-time low. Everyone knows that producing herds in Canada are at a low figure; and in the event of war it will take a long time to build up those herds. Surely it is just as much part of the program for defence to build up our food producing defences as it is to build up our military defences; for certainly, if war comes again, Canada will be expected to provide huge supplies of food products for our allies, for the armed forces and for the civilians.

I trust, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Agriculture, even at this late date, will see fit to recommend to his cabinet colleagues, as he did before, that something should be paid as compensation to the cheese and bacon producers of eastern Canada, and especially to those in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, in order to compensate them in some way for the loss they suffered on the sale of their dairy products to the United Kingdom during the same period that the wheat was sold. As I pointed out before, if there was any moral obligation to pay the wheat producers, there is the same obligation to pay a like amount to the bacon and cheese producers. However, if the minister will not recommend any such payment I would ask him at some time to explain to the house how he could justify the $65 million paid when no legal obligation existed. If no payment is to be made—and frankly, I for one do not expect that any such payment will be made—the citizens of Canada can only regard the payment of $65 million to the western farmers as a well-organized raid on the federal treasury, which raid was led and engineered by the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. F. G. Robertson (Northumberland, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, in joining in this budget debate, I wish to add my appreciation to that already expressed by previous speakers of the able and patriotic attention which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) continues to give to his exacting duties. His presentation of this budget again demonstrates that he has a wide knowledge of the economic situation in Canada and is giving us wise leadership in the financial field. I consider this budget to be a realistic one, considering the present international situation. It is not a pleasant budget, but I believe it is not an unfair one.

No one can quarrel with the minister's statement that, in the framing of this budget, he was guided by concern over two vital matters, namely, the pursuit of peace and the control of inflation. These matters are the first concern of all of us. We are ready to make severe sacrifices in order to attain them both. His review of Canada's economic activities was constructive. He told us of our huge national production. Last year it amounted to about $18 billion. We find that there are 130,000 more people employed than there were a year ago, in spite of the unemployment situation which was so sorrowfully predicted by the members of the opposition. Our international trade is in good condition. We maintained the volume of our export trade. Our imports increased to some extent. This is a condition which we all welcome, because we are now importing more from the British empire, thereby earning for the British dollars which they greatly need. I believe that this change in the direction of our trade is a good thing for the entire British empire. I am pleased to see that we have a balanced budget, with a surplus of $203 million. Members of the opposition have objected to having a surplus; but in my humble opinion, running a government is much like running an individual business. If you are in debt, it is wise to pay off that debt. I do not consider that it is inflationary. I insist that it is anti-inflationary, as the Minister of Finance has stated it to be. The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), as reported at page 2107 of Hansard, had this to say with regard to a balanced budget:

> The minister has said he wants to balance his budget. I do not think a single member of this house will have any disagreement with that professed objective. We all wish to see this budget balanced this year; . . .

Later on he continues, on the same page:

> I submit, sir, that the first duty of a minister of finance in submitting a budget is to give the house a true estimate, and as accurate an estimate as can possibly be devised, of the expected revenues accruing from the various fields of taxation.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that our present Minister of Finance did just that. How could anyone, one year ago, predict the great buoyancy of revenue which we experienced during 1950? Certainly the members of the opposition did not make any such prediction. Had the minister followed the advice of the members of the opposition, when they were predicting early in 1950 prolonged unemployment and a serious recession of business, he would have been forced to conclude that even higher taxes than he recommended at that time would be necessary to ensure a balanced budget.

I believe that the reduction of our national debt to the extent of nearly $2 billion over the last five years is a remarkable achievement. When we remember that the interest charges of that amount would be in the neighbourhood of $70 million, I think we have made a great contribution in giving tax relief to the people of our country.

I also believe that the government has a notable achievement in the field of economy. We have reduced our estimates on non-defence expenditures by $35 million, and this in spite of the fact that we have had increased salaries, increased wages, and the fact that we are giving to old age pensions, family allowances and the provincial governments $40 million more than last year, over which we have no control.

The members of the opposition cry extravagance. I should like to read some of their statements. The hon. member for Eglinton said at page 2109 of Hansard of April 17:

> Is there any extravagance? Well, sir, time alone prevents my giving in greater detail some of these examples of extravagance; but let me remind you of just one or two examples. Last year, my colleague, the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), put before the house the startling—yes, shocking—fact that expenditures on travelling, publicity and sundries in the estimates of that year totalled $49 million, exhibiting a startling increase year by year, as the government spending machine has demanded more and more oil. What do we find this year has been accomplished by the government in this so-called "economy drive" in relation to travelling expenses? Well, we find, sir, that the Minister of Finance reports an increase in the appropriation for travelling and removal expenses, going up from $27,786,602 in the year 1950-51 to a figure of $36,309,109 for this current fiscal year. Let me remind you, sir, that the figures last year included defence expenditures as well.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when I looked into this matter further I found that there had been an increase over last year of approximately $8,522,507; but when I checked it further I found that of this increase $8,378,108 could be charged to national defence and defence construction. That means that the shocking disclosure which the hon. member for Eglinton gave to this house shows that the government did increase the expenses of travelling to the extent of approximately $140,000; and when we look into these expenditures further we find that nearly the whole of this sum has been necessary in increased expenditure of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and we all know how necessary in times of threatened war an increase in the activity of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is. There we have the startling and shocking disclosure that the hon. member for Eglinton has used to impress this house that this government did greatly increase its expenditures on travelling.

When we come to the matter of printing I know that there is an increase this year of some $775,279. Yet the increase in printing on behalf of national defence and the Department of Defence Production is indeed greater than that amount. That shows, Mr. Speaker, how much we can depend upon the charges made by some members of the opposition.

I have this further quotation from Hansard. Speaking on April 17, at page 2097 of Hansard, the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) said:

> I wish I had time to enumerate the many instances of wasteful expenditure of money that should rightfully have been saved for the taxpayers.

This comes from the hon. member who asked many more millions of dollars for the wheat farmers of Canada. I would suggest that he should talk to his deskmate because they certainly do not agree on the wheat policy.

Then we heard much of government extravagance on publicity and publications, and hon. members of the opposition singled out the Department of National Health and Welfare for this attack. I happen to be a medical man and I stand here and say that the money spent on such publications has been spent in the best interests of Canada. We know that greater and greater emphasis is being placed on preventive medicine. We believe that we can save much money and much human suffering if we can prevent disease rather than to try to cure it; and there is no better way to bring to the people of Canada the need for preventive medicine and what they can do to enjoy good health than these publications which come from the Department of National Health and Welfare.

We know that we are making progress against that dreaded disease cancer, but we know that one of our great difficulties in dealing with this matter is the ignorance and fear which exist in the minds of the people of Canada. These publications can bring a true picture to the people of Canada, and they can derive much benefit from them, and they know where they can come to seek relief from that dreaded disease. The same can be said of many other diseases. I say that the money which is being spent on these publications is being well spent.

Last year we had a very entertaining afternoon when the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) produced some pamphlets which he had picked up from the Post Office Department, and he made some dreadful charges that the Post Office Department was spending thousands of dollars on such publications. When we learned the whole truth from the Postmaster General (Mr. Rinfret) the next day we learned that the huge sum of $2,000 had been spent on these publications, and we learned also what a good purpose those publications were serving. There again, Mr. Speaker, we have an exposure of the lack of details in the charges which members of the opposition use to attack the government on the extravagance subject. I maintain that the best proof of the efficiency of this government in financial affairs is to be found in the fact that little or no factual criticism has been produced by opposition members. They may tell us that they have not time to go into these things, but I am sure that the rules of the house give every hon. member all the opportunity he needs to bring forth factual criticism of the expenditures of this government.

Mr. Sinclair: And the public accounts committee as well.

Mr. Robertson: Right. Let me give another example. The very able parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance—

Mr. Knowles: Who got his name on the record just in time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mutch: Nice teamwork.

Mr. Robertson: —this session answered the challenge of the leader of the opposition of this reckless expenditure of money by going over the estimates item by item and asking any hon. member of the opposition to tell him what he wished to see deleted, and I did not see any one of those hon. members getting up in his place and saying: Let us cut this out.

Coming back to the budget itself, I must say that labour is very pleased to note that union dues are to be allowed as a deduction from income tax. I attended a meeting of labour some months ago and they told me that they felt that this was an unfair tax that they were paying. I agreed with them at that time and assured them I would do what I could to have this corrected. I regret that I was not in the house because of illness when the resolution was presented asking that union dues be not subject to taxation. If I had been here I certainly would have voted in favour of such a resolution.

I regret the need of having to place in the budget a 15 per cent tax on certain household goods, particularly stoves. I realize that in imposing this tax on stoves the minister was not thinking of the revenue that would be derived therefrom but was using this as an anti-inflationary move. It is anti-inflationary because the government is trying to conserve steel for more essential purposes, but I would hope that as soon as this inflationary pressure declines the government will do away with the taxes on stoves, refrigerators and other necessary household articles.

The international situation is still of great concern to all of us. Only the good judgment and cool courage of the leaders of the free world has stopped the Korean war from becoming a full-scale war. We are indeed proud of the part which our own leaders, particularly the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), have played in this cause of peace. I am sure they have our hearty support.

We are much interested in the critical situation which has developed in the United States where it has become necessary for the President to recall that famed soldier, General MacArthur, from command in the Far East. I wish to associate myself with what the hon. member who preceded me said about General MacArthur. I believe that he is one of the outstanding leaders of the free world. I deprecate what was said in this house about General MacArthur by an hon. member not long ago. I think it reflected little credit on that hon. member or on this house.

We had the privilege of hearing General MacArthur today and I am sure that he has proved beyond any doubt that he is one of the outstanding men of this generation. I personally support the President in what he has done because I believe that as one of the bases of democratic government there should be full control over the military.

We who are completely uninformed on what is going on in the inner circles must be prepared to give our full support to the great men who are leading us today. But I think we also have the right to demand that there shall be no appeasement in this present situation.

Not long ago President Truman in a broadcast revealed that before the Korean war Moscow-trained officers instructed spies and soldiers that the plan was to liberate all Asia, crush the United States and accomplish the long awaited world revolution. The whole communist imperialism, said the President, is back of the attack on peace in the Far East. It was the Soviet union that trained and equipped the North Koreans for aggression. The Chinese communists massed forty-four well-trained and well-equipped divisions on the Korean frontier. These were the troops they threw into battle when the North Korean communists were beaten.

In view of that statement I trust it is not an idle hope to expect to be able to separate Peking from Moscow. I certainly agree with the Secretary of State for External Affairs when he said in a broadcast not long ago, I believe from Lake Success, that the free nations of the world must do everything in their power to prevent another great war. He said that if we are to have another war it was most important that we have overwhelming public support for our cause. I think that that is vital for our security and our survival.

I hope sincerely that history is not repeating itself and that in asking us to take stronger action against the enemy General MacArthur is not another Churchill crying in vain in an effort to awaken the democratic nations to their real danger. I ask our leaders to weigh that possibility and I hope that any decision they make will be governed by that. We have a right to ask of our leaders that there be no mistake in this matter because it is far too vital to permit a second chance.

I was much interested in the discussion which took place in this house last Friday with regard to the St. Lawrence waterway development. One could not help but be struck by the fact that hon. members from the maritimes of all political parties objected to the construction of the St. Lawrence waterway. One can well appreciate the worry that those members might have at feeling that the construction of such a seaway would interfere with the economic well-being of their part of the country. I cannot help but feel that their fears are unfounded. I believe that if this development goes through the whole economy of Canada will profit, and it will also be of benefit to the people of the maritimes.

I know the vast majority of the people in my riding look forward to the development of the St. Lawrence waterway. They think it will be advantageous to their part of the country to have ocean-going boats in the great lakes. They know the value they will receive from the development of electric power and they appreciate the urgency of the development of this project from a defence point of view. Therefore I feel that I can tell the house that the people in central Ontario welcome this project.

I note the railway brotherhoods have submitted a brief to the government against the development of the St. Lawrence seaway. I can understand that they are worried that the development of this project may interfere with their livelihood. But I know also that the heads of both the railroads in Canada are behind the development of the St. Lawrence waterway. I am sure that they are interested in the welfare of their own employees as well as of the railroads. If I did not believe that, I could not support the construction of this project because many of my best friends in Cobourg are members of the railway brotherhoods and I could not recommend anything to this house that might prejudice their livelihood.

I believe that this project will mean much to the development of the ports on the great lakes. We in Cobourg look forward to the day when ocean-going ships will come direct to our town. We have one of the finest harbours on the great lakes. Contrary to what was said the other night by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Fulford), that there was no way of keeping these ports open in the wintertime, I can tell the house that we have no difficulty in maintaining our harbour in operation throughout the year. We in this house and in all parts of Canada are concerned about the procrastination that takes place in the United States whenever the St. Lawrence waterway development is mentioned. Whenever the matter is brought before congress powerful interests seem able to scuttle the project. In a United States paper I noticed the following:

> In Washington last week a daily program of government activities published by the United States chamber of commerce carried this eyebrow-lifting item: "Monday, April 2, hearings of the St. Lawrence seaway to continue at least ten years." It should have said "days" but at week's end many capitol hill newsmen thought the typographical error might have been more factual than funny.

I am pleased that the Canadian government has already expressed its support of this project, and I hope that in the near future we will find that the better people in the United States are able to secure ratification of it by the United States congress. I know that this development will mean much to the people of both Canada and the United States.

Very briefly I should like to urge the government to take what action lies in their power to decentralize industry. We in Canada are fortunate in having a country of such wide extent. It makes it more difficult for an enemy to wipe out our defences, and it also makes it easier for us to defend our country. I have been worried by the fact that industry seems to crowd into some of the larger centres in Canada, particularly Toronto, Windsor and Montreal. I believe that this is unwise because we do not know what fifty years from now may bring. We cannot imagine how destructive and powerful the weapons of those days may turn out to be. Therefore I think it is very bad for industry to crowd into narrow sectors. I think this is one of the ways that we might respond to the appeal of members from the maritimes. If the government can encourage industry to move to the maritimes I think that would be a good thing to do. I am pleased at the fact that the government is already placing defence projects over wide areas in Canada.

I also believe that there are many small communities in Ontario which offer wonderful sites for the construction of such projects. I am thinking particularly of course of my own county of Northumberland where we have many wonderful sites, a high standard of labour and excellent transportation facilities, in fact all that any industry would wish in order to establish a plant. Not only would it have the advantage of benefiting industry itself, but it would also mean much to the people in the smaller communities. It would make unnecessary the removal of many of our young people from the smaller centres to the large cities as is the case under the present situation.

There is one other very important matter to which I should like to direct your attention. We hear much these days of our wonderful resources, of the richness of the fields, lands and mines. We believe that we are potentially richer than even the United States. They have depleted many of their precious minerals whereas ours have as yet hardly been scratched. We know that we have even more varied resources than the United States. In spite of this, Mr. Speaker, we are wilfully wasting one of our most precious resources. I speak of water. We know that the water level in many parts of Canada is becoming very low and thereby creating a serious situation. A study of the question has been made by the select committee on conservation of the Ontario legislature. They found some very informative facts from their observations. We know that one-half of the people of Ontario are dependent upon sub-surface water.

Farmers complain that their wells are going dry. In order to secure sufficient water supplies in some areas of Ontario we find that it is necessary to dig deep wells in order to obtain water. In doing that they are robbing adjoining farm wells of necessary water. This problem is not peculiar to Ontario. The hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McCusker) spoke in the house the other night when he so ably brought to the attention of the government the need for the development of the South Saskatchewan river project. He told of how in past days this country, which should have been left for grazing, was put to other agricultural uses, and as a result people cannot live in that area today. I believe that this matter is also of concern to other parts of Canada. I have just learned today of the passing of the dear mother of the hon. member for Regina City, and I am sure that all hon. members would wish to extend to him their sincere sympathy in the loss of this dear one.

The cause of failing ground supplies of water is not hard to find. It means that we have cleared too much land, that we have cleared swamps which should never have been cleared, and as a result these areas do not act as reservoirs for the storage of water. It is true that the drainage of some swamps has been of great agricultural benefit to the people of Ontario, but in other cases the drainage of swamps has served no useful purpose. What steps can we take to improve the situation? I believe we should have a planned program for increased reforestation. I believe that people should be taught more about this matter. I know that in the county of Northumberland wells which formerly were full of water all year now go dry in the summertime. That is true of many parts of Ontario.

Therefore we must educate our people as to what they can do to preserve the water supply in Ontario. I was pleased to see in the paper today that near Newmarket they are having discussions about how to conserve the water in the Holland river area. We can construct large reservoirs in the river valleys so that these areas will not only serve as a means of flood control but will also serve a very useful purpose so far as safeguarding our water supply is concerned. We should also construct dams on many of our smaller streams wherever that is deemed advisable. I believe the development of electricity in Ontario, and in fact in all parts of Canada, has had a bad effect on water levels. Hon. members will recall that some years ago, before the development of electricity, all our industries were situated on small streams near dams. They derived their power from the dammed-up water, and at the same time the holding back of the water served the very useful purpose of aiding our water supply. I would therefore urge the federal government, through the Department of Resources and Development, to take the lead in devising a useful program for the conservation of water wherever that is necessary. Conservation of our water supply and prevention of soil erosion are inseparable, and through a study of the water supply program much can be done to prevent soil erosion.

These are but a few of the problems confronting us in Canada today. There are many more that will require our wisdom, our confidence and our courage. But I believe that in Canada we have those resources, both material and in the quality of our people, and I have no fear for the future of this country.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, Liberal frontbenchers and near-frontbenchers must grow tired of hearing their praises sung continually by Liberal backbenchers, so perhaps a little honest criticism for a change might prove somewhat refreshing. I have stated in this house on previous occasions that in my opinion this is no longer a Liberal government; that this government has been persistently departing from many of the basic principles of Liberalism, and is well on the way to establishing the reputation of being one of the most reactionary governments this country has seen for many years. The budget we are discussing at this time confirms that opinion. Through the centuries one of the basic principles of Liberalism as far as taxation is concerned has been that taxes should be levied according to the ability to pay. There was a time when Liberal governments observed that principle in their budgets, but it has been completely disregarded in the measures for raising additional taxes contained in the budget now before us. There is just no regard whatever, in the application of new taxes, to the principle of taxation according to ability to pay.

In the first place the sales tax is increased by 25 per cent right across the board. The small wage earner with a family to support, who notwithstanding the explanation given by the minister must spend anywhere up to 30 per cent of his income on clothing, home furnishings, drugs and a variety of other articles coming within the scope of the sales tax, will pay exactly the same rate of tax as the millionaire. Already in this debate it has been shown that this tax will not be a mere 10 per cent on the retail price of goods but in some cases will amount to as much as 20 or 30 per cent when wholesalers, jobbers and retailers have pyramided their mark-ups. In this increase in the sales tax there is just no recognition of the principle of taxation according to ability to pay. This tax can only drive the cost of living still higher, and will bear hardest on those least able to pay.

In the second place the new levy of 15 per cent on refrigerators, stoves and washing machines will bear particularly heavily on young couples just establishing themselves in homes of their own. The young couple going out to buy their first refrigerator will pay exactly the same rate of taxation as the millionaire who goes out to buy an extra refrigerator for his cellar. Again this tax will bear most severely on those in the lower income brackets. Particularly will that be so in the many cases where the wife has to go to work in order to supplement her husband's income, because she will need these labour saving devices in order to cope with her household duties and at the same time carry a full-time job. In many thousands of homes today the income of the husband is not sufficient to meet the high cost of living, and that income must of necessity be augmented by the wife's earnings.

In the third place the new surtax on personal income is applied right across the board on incomes of more than $1,000 for single people and $2,000 for married people. In the light of present living costs I suggest that if the minister had not disregarded the principle of taxation according to ability to pay he would have increased the exemptions, before imposing the surtax, to at least $1,500 and $3,000 for single and married people respectively. Had he wanted more taxes from this source, and had he kept ability to pay in mind, he would have increased the surtax in the higher brackets.

In contrast with the taxes I have mentioned we find the minister unduly solicitous of the welfare of corporations. In the first place the corporation tax is to be adjusted so it will not reduce the return on investment below 5 per cent. A new principle of placing a floor on returns from investments before taxation—

Mr. Sinclair: After taxes.

Mr. Noseworthy: —was introduced to safeguard corporation profits. In the second place the surtax is not to apply to corporations showing a profit of $10,000 or less. In the third place, while the sales tax is increased by 25 per cent, the surtax on corporations showing net profit of more than $10,000 is only 20 per cent. In the imposition of these new taxes the minister must have been following the injunction that "to him that hath shall be given, and from him that hath not shall be taken away, even that which he hath." The fact of the matter is that government policy as revealed in this budget shows much more concern for the welfare of corporations than for the rank and file of Canadian citizens. In this budget the voice is the voice of the St. James streets of Canada, and not the voice of the ordinary small James streets of the country.

Among other things the amendment of the official opposition regrets the failure of the government to take effective steps to deal with profiteering. Certainly the official opposition and others on this side are not the only ones in Canada who believe there is profiteering at this time which should be curbed. The most recent Gallup poll, published in the Montreal Star of April 14, asked this question: "Do you think there is much profiteering, that is unfair profit-making, going on in Canada now?" The vote was yes, 75 per cent, and no, 13 per cent. Among the occupational groups, business and professional men voted 65 per cent yes, and 23 per cent no. The white-collar class voted 75 per cent yes, and only 14 per cent no. Labour voted 79 per cent yes, and only 9 per cent no. Farmers voted 80 per cent yes, and 9 per cent no. The difference between those percentages and 100 per cent represents those who were undecided. The most interesting feature of this Gallup poll is that of those who would vote C.C.F., 85 per cent thought there was profiteering taking place in Canada today, and among those who would vote for the two private enterprise parties, either Liberals or Conservatives, there were 75 per cent who thought there was profiteering taking place. Whether the government believes there is profiteering or not, whether the government believes that some effective measures should be taken to curb profiteering, those of us in the opposition have a great deal of support throughout the country for the belief that there is profiteering.

Surely if the minister had any intention of dealing effectively with profiteering, he would have imposed a more steeply graded corporation tax. In fact many of us believe that a greater degree of equality of sacrifice in the defence effort would be achieved by the imposition of an excess profits tax. The present Minister of Finance speaks with considerable disdain of such a tax. He uses as his argument that such a tax leads to waste and extravagance in production. I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that is very complimentary to industry in this country. This argument was not used by the government against the excess profits tax during the years of the last war, nor did the tax appear to impede production. During those years the industrialists of Canada gave us the greatest increase in production in our history, notwithstanding the excess profits taxes collected by the government. Let me remind the minister, who apparently had some difficulty in finding ways and means of raising an extra $300 million or $400 million, that since 1941 the government has collected the following amounts in excess profits taxes: 1941-42, $135,168,000—I am giving the figure in fairly round numbers—in 1942-43, $454,581,000; 1943-44, $468,718,000; 1944-45, $465,805,000; 1945-46, $494,196,000; 1946-47, $448,698,000; and in 1947-48, although the tax came off in December, 1947 the government collected $227,030,000. The total during those years amounted to $2,694,196,000. I notice, incidentally, that although the excess profits tax was repealed in December, 1947, the government is still collecting back debts on account of excess profits taxes. In the table given on page 64 of the appendix to Hansard of April 10 of this year, it is estimated that in the fiscal year 1950-51 the government will collect another $10 million on account of excess profits taxes. For five consecutive years the government collected each year between $400 million and $500 million of excess profits taxes.

In those years the minister of finance did not speak with disdain of this tax as does the present minister. In fact, the present Minister of Finance took a very different attitude towards this tax in 1947 to that which he takes today. When in April, 1947, he was being pressed by the official opposition to repeal the excess profits tax, the minister said, as recorded at page 2558 of Hansard for April 29, 1947:

> If business conditions had now returned to normal and we could rely upon the forces of competition and bargaining to keep profits at normal levels, we would be justified in repealing this tax . . .

Then again, in the same paragraph:

> If business needed larger profits to encourage and enable it to provide additional employment by greater expenditures, we should repeal the tax forthwith.

Then he went on to say that neither of those conditions existed at that time. The minister then thought profits were still running at abnormally high levels. He said that businessmen were competing more in their efforts to expand their investments quickly than in getting down their costs and keeping down the prices at which they sell their products. In April, 1947, the minister said profits were abnormally high. In that year, 1947, according to a table published in the Montreal Gazette on April 14, 1951, one hundred companies whose fiscal years coincide with the calendar year showed net profits after all charges including taxes had been paid of $338,451,000. According to the same table, these same companies in 1950 showed net profits of $475,255,000, an increase over 1947 of 35 per cent. In other words, these same 100 companies showed 35 per cent more profit in 1950 than they showed in 1947, when the present Minister of Finance told us that profits were still abnormally high and therefore merited the continuation of the excess profits tax. If profits were abnormally high in 1947, surely they were still abnormally high in 1950. In fact, in introducing his deferred depreciation policy, the minister implied that he expected profits to remain abnormally high in 1951 and for some years thereafter.

Again, if business did not need larger profits to make capital investments in order, in turn, to provide more employment in 1947, the same thing holds true in 1951. If as the minister stated in April, 1947, business was then more concerned with making profits than in keeping down the prices of goods, surely that situation also holds true for today. Indeed, every reason the minister gave in April 1947 for retaining the excess profits tax has much greater force today than it had in 1947. Yet the government shies away from an excess profits tax and prefers instead an increased sales tax on clothing, house furnishings, et cetera, and an excise tax on stoves, refrigerators and washing machines. Instead of an excess profits tax or a more steeply-graded corporation tax, the minister prefers to levy a flat surtax on the incomes of all those whose incomes exceed $1,000 and $2,000. The budget we have before us is far from recognizing the principle of taxation according to ability to pay. In fact, this budget might well be termed a profiteers' budget.

Another feature of the budget, taken in conjunction with this government's fiscal policy, is its effect upon the home and the family. Most of us in this house recognize that the home and the family are two institutions that constitute the bulwark of our way of life. Instead of contributing to the building of home and family life this government, in my opinion, is persistently following a policy that militates against these institutions. Consider the situation of a young couple today who wish to marry, to buy or to build a home and to raise a family. What assistance or encouragement for following that laudable course is to be found in this budget or in this government's general attitude toward rising prices?

In the first place, the price of every single necessity which that couple must buy to live is today higher than ever before in our history. If those young people look around for a house, they find that the down payment has recently been "upped" by government policy until it is now beyond the capacity of the young couple to meet it. If they are fortunate enough to secure an unfurnished house or apartment for rent, the minister's new tax on stoves and refrigerators has made the purchase of those necessary articles far more difficult. If they turn to instalment buying they find that the down payment has been increased and that the time for paying the balance has been shortened. Their clothing, house furnishings, drugs and numerous other articles have increased in price by reason of the increased sales tax. Their personal income will be further reduced by a surtax.

Just how does the government expect Canadians to become home owners and to raise families under those conditions? At a time when we are spending millions of dollars on defence to protect ourselves from an enemy who would destroy our way of life, our government, by failing to check inflation, and by making it increasingly difficult for young Canadians to marry, to acquire homes and to raise families, is undermining at home the very foundation of that way of life that we seek to save from destruction by external enemies.

There is another feature of inflation that has not yet been mentioned in this debate. In addition to the high price that every Canadian citizen must pay for the commodities he buys, every municipal taxpayer this fall will find that his tax bill is increased because of the increased cost of living and because of inflation. The municipality which I represent just last week increased its mill rate by twenty mills. That increase was rendered necessary because of the higher wages and salaries the municipality was called upon to pay to its employees and the increased costs of all the materials that the municipality had to buy in order to service it. Taxpayers and home owners all across Canada, in their municipal tax bills, are finding repercussions of inflation. Those increased taxes have to be charged up to inflation. Unfortunately, municipal governments are not in the happy position of the federal government and the Minister of Finance. From the minister's speech when he introduced his budget and when he announced his surplus of approximately $200 million, one would almost gather that the minister was not particularly disturbed about inflation. Inflation certainly makes it easier to balance budgets and to provide surpluses. I think it is readily admitted that that surplus was directly due to the increased costs, the rise in prices, and with that the rise in profits and the rise in the minister's taxes. Municipal officers are not in that happy position. When they find it necessary to increase the salaries and wages of municipal employees, when they find it necessary to pay more for the goods they buy, they have no recourse but to increase taxes on the home owner, which is one more tax making it still more difficult to maintain homes in this country.

The government's policy on inflation was apparently set forth by the Minister of Finance in his broadcast as reported in the Montreal Gazette of April 18. It says:

> Though rationing, price control and wage freezing were useful instruments during the last war, when almost half of our national output was devoted to war, they are not appropriate measures at the present stage when only some 10 per cent is being devoted to defence needs.

Apparently there is no relation between the rising cost of living and the need for those controls. The need for those controls is to be determined, according to government policy, strictly on the basis of the percentage of our national income that is going into national defence; regardless of the effect of rising prices on the people of this country, no measures will be taken on that ground by this government.

The minister went on to say:

> Existing controls on essential materials and the various programs we are following, designed to increase the total savings of the community, should enable us to come through.

We should certainly appreciate hearing from the minister, or from some government speaker, a more detailed account of just what these measures are which are designed to increase the total savings of the community. The only one that I can observe is the possibility of the minister having another $200 million or $300 million surplus at the end of the next fiscal year. I presume that could be considered as community savings. The higher down payments on houses, the higher taxes on stoves, refrigerators and washing machines, the surtax on income, the increased sales tax will probably force many people to buy fewer of the things that they absolutely need; but I fail to see where these measures are likely to increase, in the words of the minister, the total savings of the community.

The government's policy apparently is influenced by that of the United States. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) intimated to us the other night that we were waiting to see how these controls work out in the United States. I notice that in his broadcast the minister has a slight change in the phrasing that he used. Heretofore in this house we have been speaking of price control and wage control. I do not know that we have been particularly considering wage freezing, but the minister speaks of rationing, price control and wage freezing, which, in effect, is exactly the position in regard to controls in the United States.

In its special inflation issue of Sunday, April 1, the New York Times has this to say regarding controls:

> The present pattern of controls to deal with the inflationary threat is mixed—soft here, hard there. This is the picture:
> As to prices, the controls are on the whole soft.
> As to wages, the controls are on the whole hard. A general freeze was imposed on January 26.
> As to credit, the controls are on the whole soft.

It is quite evident that the minister, in speaking of price control and wage freezing, is adopting the principle underlying these controls in the United States, and one which the Minister of Trade and Commerce assured us the government is watching very closely before embarking upon any such policy in this country.

I would simply close, Mr. Speaker, in asking just what mandate this government has for following the example of the United States in a matter so closely affecting the economy and the life of this country as does the cost of living? Since when did this country give any government a mandate to shun matters that were of national importance just because they were difficult? Many of the arguments that we have heard against price control from the government side of the house were simply enumerations of the difficulties that stand in the way of price control. What is true, I submit, Mr. Speaker, is that this government, secure in its overwhelming majority, secure in the fact that there is no immediate general election in the offing, can afford, or thinks it can afford, to ignore the opinion of 75 per cent of the people of this country, to ignore the demands of practically every organized group except possibly chambers of commerce, and carry on without price control. In closing I submit that were this an election year this government would not dare face the people of this country on the policy that they are pursuing at this time.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to be representing the constituency of Fort William in this debate, and in doing so I must express some of the things that have been told to me during the past week or so. Before doing that I should like to pay a tribute to my comrade, friend and good fellow worker here, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank). We were every-day friends and companions and he did a lot with his sane, common-sense judicial advice to keep me out of difficulties into which I had the knack of getting.

I cannot forget the first time I visited him when I came down here in 1935. You know what new members think of the House of Commons. They think that the men who come down here love money above everything else, but they soon get that knocked out of their heads. When I paid my first call on the hon. member I found him reading Dr. Smith's commentary on "The Minor Prophets". This was the lawyer from Winnipeg, the former alderman and member of the provincial legislature reading "The Minor Prophets" under the leadership of Dr. Smith.

I looked at him and I suppose I showed some surprise because he said, "What is the matter?" I said, "I am agreeably surprised but I know you will get there just the thing you need for anything in life. From Amos you will get the idea of justice and how to dispense it. From Hosea you will get the meaning of real love and the source from which it comes. From Daniel the prophet you will get the way of courage and strength to meet any lion you may meet on the way." The hon. member was independent, but he had a judicial mind. He was kind and courteous and, like myself, enjoyed a good clean joke. I never heard a joke from him that I could not repeat to my grandchildren.

Coming to the budget, may I say that I think that it is a great budget. Like many great things, there are things in it that need to be improved. That shows it is a budget of growth. Some people in Fort William during the past weeks have objected to every tax there is. Nobody likes to pay taxes. I do not like to pay taxes. The only way I like to pay them is when I can pay them without knowing, but I do not like it when I have to hand out ready cash because it is difficult to hold on to cash.

I have five letters objecting vigorously to those hidden taxes and to the idea that the British North America Act be amended to allow the provinces to impose a three per cent retail tax. These letters are all from Fort William and I shall give the names of the writers because I do not think they have any business writing me unless they want to back up what they say and let their names appear on Hansard. These men are all businessmen and they say that the small businessman will be put out of business. One letter is from a man who has lost both legs. He is well known in Fort William and he says that he cannot carry on. I have letters from Gerry Hardware, Strachan Jewelry store, Mahon Electric and Clemens grocery. These are all outstanding businessmen and they object vigorously to these taxes. I hope it is not too late for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) to change his mind.

Another matter to which there is objection is the change in the postal procedure in order to save money. I do not think the postage on books should be increased. Our public library sends books out to people in the country who are not able to enjoy the modern conveniences we have. Some of these people have battery radios which have the knack of running down, but when they get one or half a dozen books from the library it is a great treat to them. I think the government would be well advised to go back to the former rate and allow these people out in the country to enjoy their reading.

I must say that I do not have one objection to the taxes on cigarettes and tobacco. The hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) objected, not to the tax on cigarettes but to there being no tax on liquor. Another man writes to me and says that the post office should attempt to increase their revenues in some other manner. I suggest to the minister that he limit our franking privileges to letters only, and not have it cover the magazines we send out. If we had to pay for the magazines we send out we would be more careful what we sent. I do not know how many hon. members will agree with me on that. If we say that the revenue should be raised then let us impose the taxes some other place because we are told in the budget that the Minister of Finance has to raise certain taxes. Where is he going to get them? The budget is his plan to raise them, and if some of these taxes are to be cancelled let us put others in their place. Another man said to me: Reduce the tax on utilities of the home and impose an extra tax on beer and liquor.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. McIvor: The hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) agrees with that. I noticed when the Minister of Finance announced that there would be no tax on liquor a groan went up all across that side of the house and from some on this side. Why not tax liquor if you are taxing everything else? If the people of Canada could spend $633 million on liquor in 1949, and more in 1950, if the people of Canada could spend $300 million on cigarettes, then the people who are doing these things can afford to pay taxes. I must say that I am not objecting to the tax on cigarettes because when a man buys a cigarette it goes up in smoke anyway.

Mr. Stick: You do not pay it anyway.

Mr. McIvor: Therefore I think it was a very wise tax. During the past few months I have noticed in our cafeteria, which is the hub of the House of Commons, that some people are cutting down on their cigarettes because they are beginning to see the harm they do.

I should like to congratulate the Minister of National Health and Welfare on the way he is pushing forward old age pensions. I think I am right in saying, and if not I will say it anyway because I think if it is not so it ought to be, that the old age pension should be given as of right at age seventy with no means test, and from sixty-five to sixty-nine to those who need it. I think that is a splendid step in the right direction but we want to make sure of it because there are those who need it.

An hon. Member: They will be dead before they get it.

[Mr. McIvor.]

Mr. McIvor: Before any increase is made in the amount of $40 a month paid to old age pensioners I would say that every cripple in Canada, every man who has to use a wheel chair and is not able to get around, should be paid $40 a month. Of course, Mr. Speaker, a little drink does not hurt. I have been interested in athletics all my life and still am, but there are certain things in the athletic world that give me some concern. I was told by a lawyer from Port Arthur that one of the greatest combines we have in Canada is the national hockey league. Boys of sixteen years of age are infatuated with hockey. They play a good game, have plenty of speed and can find the goal. A scout comes along and such a boy signs something. Afterwards he may want to change his mind. Perhaps his dad has talked to him, the man who is coaching him, or his mother has had something to say about it. Nevertheless the big magnate says to him: You will play for us or you will not play at all. To my mind that is one of the worst combines in Canada, and I support what this lawyer said.

I am a bit concerned about our game of hockey. If it continues to be so destructive to our good athletes by way of injuries, I am afraid that our national game of hockey is going to go the way of our national game of lacrosse.

Mr. Graydon: I rise on a question of privilege. The game of lacrosse is not dead. It is flourishing in our part of the country as it has never flourished before.

Mr. McIvor: Of course, Mr. Speaker, my hearing is not good, but the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) has a good deal of common sense although I do not think he has any more experience than I have, and I am talking from that source now. What I should like to say now, and the hon. member for Peel will support me in this, is that members of the House of Commons are often allowed to go on trips. They are invited to banquets, and somebody comes back into the house and thanks the sponsor of the trip. I think it is most commendable, and the more trips of that kind we have the more we will know our country. However, I should like to say to members of the house: Give our page boys a trip after the session is over. If you will give me permission, Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to collect a dollar apiece from the members to give the page boys a real holiday. I do not see anybody clapping.

Mr. Graydon: It is not enough.

Mr. McIvor: The way we can help our tax situation and the Minister of Finance is by the development of our natural resources. I have noticed that nickel is now being rationed. In our district we have perhaps one of the greatest sources of nickel in Canada. The International Nickel Company bought up all the claims that looked good but that is all that happened. We think that the International Nickel Company should develop those claims and produce more nickel. In the Shebandowan area we have many claims with high assays of gold and silver. Now the people from south of the line are asking us to send them samples of iron. The only difficulty is that it has a little bit too much silica but when they get the machinery ready that can separate the silica from the iron we are going to have a real industry in that district. It is one of the finest districts in Canada and runs all the way from Shebandowan up to Steep Rock.

I know that the budget will be hard on those who like to spend their own money. An increase of 20 per cent in income tax is pretty heavy but, as I said before, we have asked our minister to raise these taxes, and I think that is one of the most popular sources from which to get the money. We must raise these taxes. The other reason that we have for supporting the budget is that there may be something in it that will help to stop inflation.

I should like to say a word about Korea. It is dangerous for an Irishman to take sides but I should like to pay my tribute to President Truman for his courage. He was in a terrible corner, showed his courage, and I admire him for it. I also admire General MacArthur as an outstanding soldier and perhaps a part statesman.

Mr. Graydon: Go on, give him a clap.

Mr. McIvor: I have just received a note and it indicates to me the greatness of this House of Commons. It says that the Maple Leafs are going to win the Stanley cup. I did not know there were such outstanding prophets in this house. They may be wrong this time. Both President Truman and General MacArthur are outstanding citizens. I think the best thing for us to do is to let them fight their own battles. I think you will find before the battle is over these two men will come together. Just as one hon. member said today, we do not stand for any appeasement. I think of some of the letters I have received during the last three weeks from communist people who say they want peace. I have answered each of those letters, and have said they should put at the top of their program the abolition of the iron curtain. They should let the workers of Russia see what is going on in the outside world, as they cannot see now, and let the workers outside see what is going on in Russia; then there will be more chance of their coming together. But I repeat that I am not a bit afraid of Russia or China, because sooner or later any country that treats God as a myth will go to the bow-wows.

I want to mention just two other matters. In Fort William we have difficulties in connection with floods. For certain reasons the river there is flooding more extensively every year. I must pay my tribute to the deputy minister of public works, whom I interviewed today; and I was pretty stiff about it. He gave me every encouragement that the dominion government would do the fair thing by the province and the city. I did not bother the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier), but I am sure he will be even more generous.

Fort William has been very pleased with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier). During the past summer he said that if the St. Lawrence waterway was not developed in co-operation with the United States, Canada would go ahead and do it herself. That might be a splendid stimulant to wake up the people of the United States. I think it would be a great thing for the world if this development could be accomplished, and I can assure the minister he will get every co-operation from us.

I should like to speak for an hour, Mr. Speaker, but I know it is not the men who speak longest who say the most. As a boy I chose Canada as the land of my adoption, and I have never been sorry. It is the greatest country on earth. We could boast about the things we have. We have the greatest wheat fields on earth, the longest railway in the world, the best machinery for handling wheat. We also have the best young men and maidens the world knows, as they have proved in the past. When we think of Canada there is music in the name. We feel like the Irishman who said the real patriot was the man who was loyal to his native land, whether or not he was born there. We are loyal to Canada because we believe it is the land of the free, a place where we can grow and develop and train our children according to the way we have been led. We will lead them Godward, and Canada toward the eternal kingdom.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): It is always a pleasure to listen to the remarks of the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor). He says many things with which invariably I can agree. Like the hon. member I do not smoke cigarettes, but unlike him I do enjoy my little toddy. It was with a little disappointment I noticed that when the hon. member was passing around his numerous bouquets, and particularly when he was referring to the great game of hockey, he overlooked the fact that there is a team from a little town called Nanaimo, where the most westerly of all hockey rinks in Canada is located. The team travelled all the way from the other side of British Columbia to northwestern Ontario to play Fort Frances in the Allan cup playdowns; and the series is tied at one game each. I know Fort Frances is not in my hon. friend's constituency, but it is very close to it; and I was a little disappointed that he did not hand a bouquet to that hockey team from far off. However, I must say that the Fort Frances team played an exceedingly good game and the Nanaimo team learned much from them.

I feel that many advantages arise from the fact that we have an Easter recess which enables hon. members to visit their constituencies and obtain the opinions of their people in regard to what is being done in this parliament. I believe the advantage is greater the further the constituency is from this capital city. I took advantage of the recess to visit my constituency on Vancouver island, and in moving around among the people I found their interest was focused on the then and still rising cost of living and the inflationary trends prevalent in British Columbia. When the budget was brought down I think the first reaction was that the increased taxation was not as heavy as had been expected. There was a general feeling that taxes would be much heavier than appeared to be the case on a first reading of the budget. But the more one studied the budget resolutions the more one felt a haunting fear that the steps being taken by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) would not achieve the result for which the people on the back concessions were hoping, namely that these inflationary trends would be halted and the cost of living brought down. Of course it is still too early to say positively that the budget will not have that result. The minister has told us that this is his intention, and I am sure the people hope his intentions will be fulfilled.

The people of British Columbia were expecting some form of controls on various commodities. Few would have wanted the full, burdensome and detailed control system administered by the wartime prices and trade board during the war, but all expected some more flexible and perhaps more temporary plans which would have relieved the hardships being experienced by those living on fixed incomes. On Vancouver island there are a large number of retired people. A very high percentage, as compared with other parts of this dominion, are people who have moved to the more temperate climate of British Columbia, there to spend their declining years. It is by these people that the increased cost of living is felt most severely. There is anxiety on the part of thousands of people living on small fixed incomes as to their future financial position. They see hardships and privations facing them. That applies to people who have worked hard on the prairies during the days of great expansion when our far west was being developed; people who have, through their thrift, been able to accumulate a small amount of capital, the interest from which they hoped would keep them in some degree of comfort in their later years. It also applies to those who have seen service in the great companies of this country, in the civil service and in the armed forces, people who are living on pensions.

There is little indication that the pension is going to be increased for any of these people. There is every indication that their pension dollar does not go as far as it did ten years ago. It is quite obvious that, with the increased cost of living, these people are going to experience grave anxiety about making both ends meet.

This evening, I should like to call attention to one particular class of pensioners, and that is the people who derive their pension or income from sources outside of Canada, mainly from sources in the United Kingdom. There are many imperial pensioners, if I may call them that, living on Vancouver island. Their position has been gravely aggravated by the devaluation of sterling. I know that the imperial pensions are not subject to Canadian tax. The British government deducts income tax from the pensions and other sterling income. The British government bases that assessment on the inclusion of the dollar income which is converted into a sterling equivalent at the devalued rate for that purpose, and thereby assumes an exaggerated value as regards its purchasing power. The pound has gone down in value. If a British pensioner comes out here and works at some job or in casual employment, then the amount of money he earns in Canada is added to his total income so the income tax on his British pension is assessed higher.

The effect of devaluation has been, of course, to increase the amount of any such dollar income in terms of sterling, and thus to increase the liability of the pensioner to the United Kingdom income tax authorities. One might say he gets it in the neck both ways. He has to pay more taxes and the dollar value has gone down. This does not apply in all dominions, and one wonders whether it could not be arranged for the pensioner to have the option of paying either the British or Canadian taxes. If he could pay the Canadian tax, he would then share in the obligations as well as the privileges of Canadian citizenship. The man who has immigrated to this country wishes to assume full Canadian citizenship. He expects to pay for the advantages of that full Canadian citizenship. He does not want to be classed as a second-class Canadian. Surely, if he is to receive full Canadian citizenship, then he should expect, and he does expect, to pay taxes in the country in which he lives. As it is, he is now forced to pay on his British income the taxes placed by the United Kingdom government.

We should bear in mind that in the United Kingdom the taxpayer is paying for what is frequently described as a welfare state. The advantages which are offered through that welfare state, social service advantages, are not available to the British pensioner in Canada. He has to pay for this welfare state, but he does not have the benefits of it. Furthermore, he is disfranchised. He has no vote so far as the United Kingdom is concerned. So far as disability pensions are concerned, those paid by the British government are not comparable to the pensions which are paid by the Canadian government. I am not suggesting at the moment that disability pensions are taxed by the British government. Of course, they are not, but it does illustrate the difficulties under which British pensioners are living in this country. I call attention to the fact that the British pension was progressively reduced from 1919 until 1935, when it was stabilized somewhere about 9½ per cent lower than the 1919 figure. An increase has been granted to the pensioners by the Pensions Increase Act of 1947, but that is on a sliding scale in accordance with his total income.

An imperial pensioner living in Great Britain would receive the advantages which accrue from a £400 million grant in the way of food subsidies made by the British government, and of a £300 million grant which is made to health services. United Kingdom pensioners living in Canada are forced, by the present agreement, to make their contribution to these social service schemes, yet they are debarred from taking advantage of them. Now, when they are living in Canada they will be expected to contribute through this sales tax, and rightly so, towards Canadian social services. I appreciate that very little can be done. Perhaps it is a matter of some delicacy because the United Kingdom naturally pays the pensions. But I do think it is a matter of negotiation between the Canadian government and the British government. It is no help to say that the British pensioner who has moved to Canada can return to Great Britain if he so desires. He does not want to do that. He has connections here, and mind you, many of these British pensioners are men who were born in this country. They are Canadians in every sense of the word; but they saw their opportunity and perhaps they felt it their duty to serve in the imperial forces or to take some job in the colonial service of the United Kingdom. They have no desire to return. They are anxious to live as good Canadian citizens, and to bring their children up in this country to be Canadians in every sense of the word. Not only because it is going to affect their pocketbooks to their advantage but for these other reasons they would appreciate having the responsibility of paying taxes in the country in which they live.

Imperial pensioners who are residing in New Zealand and Australia are given the option whether they have their pension deductions made at the source, namely, through the United Kingdom government, or by the New Zealand or Australian government. Those who reside in Canada do not have that opportunity. This arrangement was made by a tax convention between the United Kingdom and Canada which I believe was signed on June 5, 1946. After having raised this point a year ago, I understand that there have been some discussions between the two governments to see whether this matter might not be adjusted. I therefore repeat my request of a year ago that these discussions be continued and that Canadian citizens living in this country be given this consideration. Though they may have spent their working years in the service of the commonwealth—or perhaps in those days when they started their service, that organization was known as the British empire—they were rendering service that they thought was helping this dominion as much as it was helping any other dominion or the so-called mother country. But now, having taken Canada as their home, they have adopted Canada for their families and they feel that they should be privileged to pay the taxes which will gain for them the social advantages of living in this country and which they as Canadian citizens feel it is their responsibility to pay. They have severed connections with the old country and therefore, through me, they ask that these negotiations be reopened to see whether it will not be possible to enable the tax agreement to be amended to meet their wishes.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, Canadians from ocean to ocean desire of this parliament in the present session three main achievements: first, the greatest measure of strength for combating communism; second, the reduction of the high cost of living; third, as great an increase as possible of Canadian income.

The budget speech and the financial policy behind that speech deny Canadians all three of these desires. They deny the freedom to marshal their total fighting strength against communism abroad and at home. They deny the lower cost of living that everyone feels that he is entitled to. They deny the higher rate of income to which everyone also feels fully entitled.

There have been volumes of criticism all over the country, inside and outside of parliament, but no one has taken time out to tell the minister where he could have obtained the money without the burdensome taxes about which they complain; or whether or not, if he had chosen any other means whereby to obtain the money, those means would have resulted in less onerous imposts. That is the first important thing that I believe everyone in this house ought to bear in mind when facing the situation.

It is easy enough to find fault. It is a different thing entirely to tell what to do. The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), as reported at page 2044 of Hansard, said:

> . . . and so we grope along in the dark.

Then later on, on the same page, he said:

> We will need capacity, resourcefulness, patience and forbearance.

I heartily agree with the hon. member.

Two passages which the hon. member for Greenwood quoted are, I believe, worthy of placing on Hansard again. They are from the speech made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) as reported at page 1762 of Hansard of April 9, and are as follows:

> I am sure that we can get along quite comfortably as consumers and still engage in a substantial defence effort . . .
> Unless all-out war comes, Canadians can continue to live well.

Those two statements by the Minister of Trade and Commerce indicate to me rather distinctly that there is no reason for drawing off purchasing power from the Canadian people in order to prevent inflation. In other words, there are plenty of goods in this country to justify everybody in having as full an income as he had before this budget speech. Consequently one of the major reasons which have been advanced for the budget changes, as advocated, is swept away at one fell swoop. I shall have more to say about that matter at a later time.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

But the more one reads and hears of remarks in parliament and out concerning this budget, the more he appreciates the force of the gloomy remark of the hon. member for Greenwood: ". . . and so we grope along in the dark."

May I suggest that some help in groping our way along in the dark might be found through a careful study of the Canadian financial system? To me, Mr. Speaker, it is one of the marvels of our time that people are prepared to seek for the cause of their difficulties in anything except in the financial system. Somehow or other they seem to think that the financial system under which Canada and the United States endeavour to carry on must have been divinely inspired from Heaven or have obtained untouchable sanctity from some other source. I have never been able to persuade myself to share such views as that. May I suggest that Canadians study their financial system above all other things at the present time, and that probably they will find in a study of that financial system the only possible way out left for us in these trying times that surround us.

There are, I believe, four aspects of the financial system which will repay careful study: First, the feasibility of changing the financial system. This we can appraise by learning the answer to the following questions: What is sound money? Where does money originate? How much money could Canada have in circulation without having that money cause inflation? How could the Canadian financial system be changed so as to circulate that amount of money without having that amount cause inflation? What is inflation, its nature, its cause, its cure, its prevention? How could our financial system be changed from a system of scarcity, such as the budget shows it now to be, to a system of abundance, and yet be completely subject to democratic control in spite of that change?

The second phase of consideration which will merit study will be this. Do Canadians inside and outside parliament appreciate the importance of a nation's financial system in making or marring their well-being? I doubt very much that they do.

The third main consideration would be this: What essentially is the nature of the present Canadian financial system? What makes it up? To what extent do Canadians employ debts as money, and is Canada's a debt-creating financial system? If so, what makes it such? And would it be possible and beneficial to change a debt-creating financial system into a non-debt-creating financial system? Has this Canadian parliament the power so to change our financial system?

The fourth field of investigation might be suggested by these questions: What would be the general object of changing our financial system from a debt-creating system to a non-debt-creating system? Would such object not be to provide parliament more adequate control over the issue of currency and credit in Canada, and what should comprise genuinely adequate control of currency and credit in Canada?

In a desire to help Canadians along with the Canadian Department of Finance to make a logical study of their present financial system, I should like to submit for the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) a series of questions as to the feasibility of changing our present system. What, in the minister's opinion, constitutes sound money? Is it money backed by gold? If so, what percentage of gold is essential, and why? What percentage of gold was actually on April 1, 1951, behind the Canadian dollar? What percentage of gold was actually behind the Canadian dollar on April 1, 1944?

Is sound money, money which is backed by approved securities? If so, where must the securities be deposited? Must sound money be money that goes into circulation as a debt? Must money be scarce in order to be sound? If so, then scarce in respect of what? And if so, how scarce? And by what criterion can the necessary degree of scarcity be measured or estimated?

Must money be hard to get in order to be sound? If so, then hard to get for whom? If so, then hard in respect of what: low wages? low prices? unemployment? shortage of markets, or overproduction? lack of suitable securities in the hands of would-be borrowers? restriction on bankers' lending through policies imposed upon the banks? high interest rates? Are these the things which are requisite in order to have money to be known as sound?

Must money, in order to be genuinely sound, possess a stable purchasing power through the year and from year to year? If so, then by what means can such stable purchasing power be maintained?

Could money be genuinely sound if it were merely part of a managed currency backed by the going concern producing and consuming activities of the country, and supported by an abundance of production and by a stable price structure?

Was money issued by the Canadian government under the Finance Act of 1914 sound? If not, why not? If so, why so? Was money issued by the Canadian government under the Finance Act of 1923 sound? If not, why not? If so, why so? Would a $5 gold piece issued by the Canadian mint in 1930 have been sound? If so, why so? If not, why not? Was the 25-cent piece issued by the Canadian mint in 1946 sound? If so, why? If not, why not?

Would that 25-cent piece have been sound if it had been spent into circulation directly as a part of an old age pension paid to John Doe? If so, why? If not, why not?

If the ordinary person in Canada and in this house learns how to answer these questions, Mr. Speaker, we shall not have a whole lot of silly remarks such as emanated from various uninformed quarters when the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) the other night held up the Canadian one-dollar bill. I submit that unless hon. members can answer these questions with accuracy they had better learn how to do so, because they certainly are not in a position to judge of the value, or of the possibilities, of the financial system of Canada or of any other country. If it should be found that the very life and existence of this nation and of the British commonwealth depends on our being able to get the facts about finance, the seriousness of what I am saying will be borne in upon all.

As to the creation or origin of money, I find that when I start talking to a great many people they seem to think that money descends from heaven, grows on trees, or something of that sort. I ask the following questions: Is it correct to say that banks create money to lend (a) as currency or pocketbook money; (b) as credit or cheque book money?

Did the Canadian Department of Finance, before the Bank of Canada was founded, create at any time money to lend as (a) currency; (b) coinage?

Did the Canadian government ever create money to spend into circulation as debt-free money? If so, was such money sound? If not, why not?

Has the minister ever discussed with the officials of his department the advisability of changing his financial system from a debt-creating system to a non-debt-creating system? If he has not already done so, will the minister take steps to bring on such a discussion at as early a date as possible, looking: First to the establishment of the advisability of changing his financial system from a debt-creating system to a non-debt-creating system?

Second, the discovery of the means whereby such changes might be effected?

Third, the effecting of such change as rapidly as may be possible, having in mind the peace, order and good government of Canada?

Will the minister give careful consideration to the advisability of setting up a Canadian currency and credit commission and of charging it with the responsibility: First, of setting up a national account book; second, of issuing debt-free or interest-free money, whether currency or credit or both, and providing for its use in such amounts and in such ways as will in the most effective manner stimulate Canadian production and consumption to the optimum, consonant with Canada's resources, material and human, and thereby providing for a steady and rapid growth of general prosperity and strength in Canada?

We come now to the matter of inflation, its nature, cause, cure and prevention. If the minister is told by some person that the creation, issue and use of debt-free money by the government will mean or cause inflation, would the minister point out to that person:

1. That the word inflation in respect of money matters is used with three main meanings. First, any increase in the amount of money in circulation; second, any undue increase in such amount of money; third, any increase in the amount or ratio of money in circulation which causes or is accompanied by rise of prices; and that lately inflation has come to mean any increase of the price level regardless of the factor or factors causing that rise?

2. That the creation, issue and use of presently employed debt-money will mean or can cause inflation in accordance with all four meanings of the word inflation, just as definitely as ever could the creation, issue and use of debt-free money?

3. That as regards their inflationary or non-inflationary effect upon an economy, the main essential difference between debt-money and debt-free money would arise from the fact: First, that debt-money theoretically would necessarily have to be withdrawn from circulation and cancelled out of existence upon repayment of the loan or debt, the taking of or the contraction of which brought such debt-money into existence? And that this fact, making the money in circulation depend upon the whims of hundreds of bankers and other lenders in the matter of granting or refusing to grant loans, and upon the whims of tens of thousands of borrowers in the matter of borrowing or failing to borrow, renders government control of the amount of debt-money in circulation an almost impossible task?

Second, while debt-free money would not necessarily have to be withdrawn from circulation because it was not brought into existence through a loan or debt, yet such debt-free money in so far as withdrawal of it would be desirable, would be naturally withdrawn by offsetting, counteracting or cancelling out the debts, resulting from such factors as interest, profit, savings, taxation, alternating depressions and booms, alternating periods of bankers' willingness and unwillingness to lend money, fluctuations of price and other fluctuations, etc. or could be withdrawn at will by appropriate taxation?

And that this fact, making the amount of money in circulation depend not entirely upon whims of lenders or borrowers but in considerable measure upon the spending policy of the currency and credit commission acting from only one motive, namely, the maintenance of Canadian prosperity, renders government control of the amount of debt-free and debt-money in circulation a much more manageable task?

4. Will he tell the person speaking that the inflation men fear, therefore, is not an inflation arising necessarily from increase in the quantity of money, but is a rise in price due to any factor or factors?

5. That in case of increase of either debt or debt-free money in circulation unless there is a rise in price, there is no real inflation and can be no real inflation?

6. That the rise of price called inflation is primarily the result of having too few goods and services available in markets to match the purchasing power in the hands of would-be buyers of such goods?

7. That therefore if goods are scarce enough, prices will rise whether or not money either debt money or debt-free money is plentiful in the hands of would-be buyers?

8. That if goods are adequate enough, prices need not rise, whether or not money is plentiful in the hands of would-be buyers?

9. That the safeguards against inflation, therefore, are, first, abundant production of the widest variety of goods within the nation concerned; second, maintenance of price regulation by inducement through employment of subsidies to producers and consumers aiming at a price structure fair and stable; third, measures to ensure equitable distribution during temporary shortage of any commodity or commodities; fourth, sufficient import of goods to make up for any deficiency of goods resulting from exports?

And if the minister is told by some person that the new government-created money would fall into the hands of the chartered banks and might be used by them as reserves upon which to make loans ten times greater in amount than the total of that new money in their possession, thereby causing a boom and an inflation, will the minister point out to that person:

First, that if the Bank of Canada really possesses the power to control Canada's currency and credit, which that bank is believed to have, then the Bank of Canada will be able to restrain excessive loaning tendencies on the part of chartered banks? Second, that if necessary, for the sake of controlling their credit expansion activities, the chartered banks' cash reserve requirements can be increased to whatever percentage of loans may be found necessary; even to 100 per cent?

Third, that if need arose, it ought to be logical to put a ceiling upon the amount of credit to be issued by chartered banks at any given time, and so to prevent them from expanding credit beyond the safety limit?

Fourth, that if bankers choose to disregard government policy in spite of the moderate measures referred to as first, second and third then the government could consider the acquisition itself of the chartered banks? But that this would never be necessary provided bankers fittingly recognized their vital responsibilities to their country, appreciating appropriately their position as essential parts of the productive mechanism of the nation's economy?

Fifth, that if production in sufficient abundance be brought about and maintained, cause for fear of inflationary rise of prices of goods will be greatly diminished?

Sixth, that if, in addition to maintaining abundant supply of goods, the government continue to employ a system of discounts and subsidies of prices to maintain just prices for both producers and consumers, then cause for fear of inflationary rise in prices will be reduced to an almost negligible minimum?

Finally, seventh, if any commodity found to be in short supply be distributed equitably as long as it continues to be scarce, then cause of inflationary rise of prices will be practically eliminated?

As to the means of democratic control of debt-free money: If the minister is told by some person that if the government were to begin to create and spend debt-free money then the government would become fascist because it would have money independently of loaning agencies and independently of parliament, that with such money the government would be able to keep itself in power indefinitely—if this sort of reasoning be used with the minister, will the minister point out to that person:

1. That the currency and credit commission would be required to submit at the end of each accounting period not less frequently than once every three months a most exactingly detailed and comprehensive report to parliament through the Minister of Finance showing:

(a) the actual capacity of the nation's means of production during each of the months of the year being reported, specifying the percentage of capital goods and the percentage of consumers' goods;

(b) the percentage of that capacity being actually used in each of those months;

(c) the amount of the production of each month being purchased and consumed with the money in circulation;

(d) the amount of money in circulation going into the hands of the consumers throughout the nation each month;

(e) the estimated actual physical demand for each kind of goods being sent into the markets throughout the nation;

(f) the effective demand for each kind of goods being sent into the markets;

(g) the actual amount of each kind of goods not being consumed for the apparent lack of consumers' money with which to buy;

(h) the consequent estimated amount of new state-created debt-free money that would be required at the end of each accounting period to be voted by parliament, issued by the state and put into consumers' hands, whether through dividends to all or through price subsidies, wage bonuses, pensions, grants and other sound economic measures as may be deemed best to enable the consumers of Canada to consume the optimum amount of the production of Canada, or goods received by Canada through external trade therewith;

(i) the exact amount of state-created, debt-free money issued by the state and so spent into circulation, together with a detailed breakdown showing the amounts spent into circulation through each of the sound economic measures referred to in the next preceding clause?

2. That because of the detailed reports mentioned in (1), parliament will be able to have under effective supervision the creation, issue and use of every dollar of state-created, debt-free money?

3. That the estimated amount of state-created, debt-free money likely to be made available for the nation's use in the following year would be printed in the estimates each year, together with the amount of such money rendered available during the current year and the year previous, as well as the use to which it will be, or has been, put?

4. That the Minister of Finance would be required in debate on the estimates to be ready to justify every item of government procedure in respect of the state-created, debt-free money issued and employed?

Now, Mr. Speaker, I submit that members of this house and the people of the country generally should learn to answer exactly each of these questions submitted. I have had to read them rapidly but if they go into the details, as members will be able to in Hansard, they can answer each and every one of them. We will have an end to all the nonsensical talk in this country about money. There will not be a whole lot of silly talking about Social Credit. There will be a whole lot more light thrown into the darkness in which the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) gropes.

Now we come to the importance of a financial system and the need of change. In the minister's opinion does the Canadian economy exist for the Canadian financial system, or does the Canadian financial system exist for the Canadian economy?

An hon. Member: Answer that.

Mr. Blackmore: Again, what ought the Canadian financial system to accomplish for the Canadian economy? (1) Is it to enable and stimulate production of goods? (2) Is it to enable and stimulate the consumption of goods? (3) Is it to enable and stimulate the liquidation of debt by payment in full?

If it be found that production of goods in Canada be less than the optimum—as it is now—considering physical resources, might Canadians be justified in looking for the fault into their financial system?

Again, if it be found that consumption of goods in Canada be less than the optimum—as it is now—considering physical resources, might Canadians be justified in looking for the fault into their financial system?

The question should be asked: Is the Canadian financial system measuring up? Is it worthy of all the worship which our Conservative and Liberal friends so abjectly render to it? Let me ask this question. In the main over the past twenty years has the Canadian financial system brought about optimum production of goods and services in Canada? If not, what would the minister suggest as the causes for the failure? Again, in the main over the past twenty years has the Canadian financial system brought about optimum consumption of goods and services in Canada? If not, what would the minister suggest as the causes for the failure?

An hon. Member: Answer that.

Mr. Blackmore: Do not urge an answer just now. It will require a lot of thinking before any minister will dare to attempt to answer these questions. We now come to the third of my considerations, the nature of the present Canadian financial system. What does the minister believe to be the fundamental principles upon which the present Canadian financial system is based? Would these be:

(1) That all money must be issued as a debt? What are the exceptions, if any?

(2) That all money must be distributed through industry as wages, salaries, dividends, et cetera, in other words, through jobs?

(3) That no one has a right to money unless he earns it, or it has been earned through producing goods or services?

(4) That competitive foreign trade is a fundamental essential mechanism for the distribution of purchasing power or money into people's hands?

(5) That competitive foreign trade is the fundamental and essential mechanism for the distribution of goods as between nations of high productive potential, the so-called "have-nations," and nations of low productive potential, the so-called "have-not nations"?

What other fundamental principles, if any, underlie the present Canadian financial system? In other words, the purpose of the questions is to seek to find out what we mean by the Canadian financial system, and I find there are very few people inside parliament or out who can answer that question or have the slightest idea what the answer is, but they know all about Social Credit. They can tell all the flaws of Social Credit right off but they do not know anything about their own system.

Now I come to the question of whether Canada's is a debt-creating financial system. Assuming that under the present financial system all money issues as debt and is regarded as debt, would it be correct to say that Canada's system is essentially a debt-creating system? Again, what elements in the present Canadian financial system combine to make that system a debt-creating system? Again, would several of such elements be: (1) use of only debt money? (2) interest? (3) profit? (4) savings and investments including purchase of insurance, life insurance and the like? (5) taxation? (6) alternating booms and depressions? (7) alternating periods of bankers' willingness to lend money and unwillingness to lend money? (8) fluctuations of prices?

(9) fluctuations of wages? (10) fluctuations of markets? (11) fluctuations in unemployment?

Could our financial system be changed? Does the minister believe that there are any valid and unavoidable reasons why Canada's financial system must continue to be a debt-creating system, that is, a financial system of scarcity? Does the minister believe that in Canada, or in any similar individual enterprise country such as the United States, there absolutely could not be a non-debt-creating financial system or at least a debt-liquidating financial system, that is, a financial system of abundance? Can the minister suggest any valid reason why it should not be conceivable to modify the Canadian financial system in such a way as to change it into a non-debt-creating or at least an automatically debt-liquidating system, that is, a system of abundance? If so, then what are the valid reasons?

Would the minister be willing to consider objectively and scientifically the possibility of discovering the means of bringing about such a desirable change from a scarcity system to an abundance system? If not, why not? Would the minister be willing to employ such means when discovered? If not, why not? If the Canadian government through the finance department were to discover the means of changing the Canadian financial system from a debt-creating system to a non-debt-creating system, that is, from a system of scarcity to a system of abundance, and if the Canadian government were to become convinced that such a change was necessary in order to give Canadians the results to which Canada's resources entitle them:

(1) Would the Canadian government be free to make such a change?

(2) Would the Canadian finance department be free to make such a change?

(3) Would the Canadian minister be free to make such a change?

We come now to what should be the ultimate objective of the desirable change of Canada's financial system. Would it not be adequate control of the issue of currency and credit in Canada? What would such adequate control be comprised of?

How would the minister define the expression "control of the issue of currency and credit" as used by Mr. Mackenzie King in his famous quotation? Does the minister believe that the government of Canada at the present time has adequate control of issue of currency and credit? In the minister's opinion, what factors ought to determine the optimum desirable amount of money in circulation in a state? Is adequate control of the issue of currency and credit being exercised in Canada at the present time by the Department of Finance? In other words, is the optimum desirable amount of money being maintained in circulation in Canada today? If not, in what respect or degree is the Department of Finance falling short of its duty in efforts to attain the desirable objective? And if not, what reasons would the minister give for any deficiency at present obtaining in the control of the issue of currency and credit in the conduct of Canada's financial and economic system?

In the minister's opinion, what ought to be the definition of the expression "money in circulation"? Ought it to be the amount of money in the possession of citizens of the state or the amount in the possession of the probable producers and consumers of the state? Would the minister agree that effective control of the issue of currency and credit in Canada would comprise:

(1) Ability to get into and maintain in circulation in the right hands a sufficient amount of money to enable Canadian producers to produce enough of every kind of desirable Canadian goods and services to supply all the Canadian people with the optimum amount of such goods in so far as the physical resources of Canada render possible such optimum production?

(2) Ability to get into and maintain in circulation in the right hands a sufficient amount of money to enable Canadian consumers to consume enough of every kind of desirable Canadian goods and services to supply all the Canadian people with the optimum amount of such goods in so far as the physical resources of Canada render possible such optimum consumption?

If not, why not in each case?

Would the minister deny, upon his responsibility as minister, that it ought to be possible for the Canadian finance department to get into circulation in the right hands a sufficient amount of money to enable Canadians to produce enough of every kind of desirable Canadian goods and services to supply all the Canadian people with the optimum amount of such goods in so far as the physical resources of Canada render possible such optimum production?

If so, why?

Would the minister deny, upon his responsibility as minister, that it ought to be possible for the Canadian finance department to get into circulation in the right hands a sufficient amount of money to enable Canadians to consume enough of every kind of desirable Canadian goods and services to supply all the Canadian people with the optimum amount of such goods in so far as the physical resources of Canada render possible such optimum consumption?

If so, why?

What measures are available to the minister for use as effective means of getting into the hands of Canadian producers enough money to produce as indicated above?

Give detailed answer:

(4)

What reasons has the minister for believing that these measures would be efficacious in case of:

An overproduction of goods in Canada, bearing in mind that, in a depression, banks hesitate to lend for production, while in times of overproduction producers hesitate to borrow?

What measures are available to the minister for use as effective means of getting into the hands of Canadian consumers enough money to enable them to consume as indicated above?

Give detailed answer:

(4)

Does the minister believe that the finance department has the responsibility of controlling the issue of currency and credit in Canada?

If not, what department or departments or agencies of the Canadian government has or have that responsibility?

Has the finance department the power to control the issue of currency and credit in Canada?

(1) If not, why not?

(2) And if not, what department or departments or agencies of the government has or have that power?

Does the minister believe that the control of the issue of currency and credit is the biggest and most important public utility in the economic activities of the Dominion of Canada?

Does the minister believe that control of the issue of currency and credit in Canada means, in effect, control of the whole national life of Canada?

(a) If not, why not?

(b) And if not, then in what respects?

[Mr. Blackmore.]

(c) Would the minister concur in the opinion expressed in the statement: "Money is the bloodstream of the national economy"?

I have taken considerable pains to draft these questions, Mr. Speaker. I present them to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), the deputy minister of finance and all the members of the finance department, and I ask that those questions be answered during this session of parliament. I submit the same questions to all hon. members of the House of Commons in all parties. Just as soon as anyone, from the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) right on down, thinks he can answer those questions in such a way as to prove that this country cannot have money other than what is stolen from the people by taxation, he will be welcome to demonstrate his position.

Mr. Graydon: When do we try the examinations?

Mr. Blackmore: I shall be right here to check you up. I conclude with the earnest and sincere contention that if we will study the financial system of Canada with a desire to find a way out of the difficulties which surround us, we shall find that way; and we shall find it in no other manner.

Mr. Raymond Bruneau (Prescott): Mr. Speaker, discussion of the budget and its various provisions and implications may well be regarded as a general survey of the national economy and an examination of the state of the country. Speeches delivered so far by almost all opposition members have revealed a definite pattern, that pattern taking the form of a concerted attack on the budget. The criticisms have been notable for their lack of constructive suggestions. A dispassionate onlooker would gather the impression that the main purpose of the critics is to tear down the budgetary structure rather than consolidate its foundations. Parliament, composed as it is of representatives of all parties, both government and opposition members, is presumed to be the mirror of the nation. Keeping this thought in mind, one may well inquire at this stage, what substantial segment of the country do the criticisms voiced so far represent? It is extremely difficult to reconcile these criticisms with the seemingly general acceptance of the budget by the country at large.

Some suggestions have been made as to the taxation measures that should be discarded and the fiscal policies that should be made effective to provide the necessary revenues for the management of the country's affairs. Too many criticisms have been notable for their lack of realism and objectivity.

Canada's taxation structure is at best a delicate fabric. It must be designed to establish a proper balance between the national economy and the economy of the ten provinces constituting the dominion. An ill-conceived national taxation policy can, by reason of its implications and repercussions, so operate as to deprive the provinces of essential revenues. Overly heavy taxation of spirituous liquors is a case in point.

No government, federal or provincial, relishes the task of increasing the burden of taxation. But there are times when a state of national or near national emergency leaves no other course open to the government. Such a situation now confronts the government of Canada. My deeply respected and able leader, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), recently expressed his views in this respect when addressing a group of students of the Hawkesbury high school who visited the parliament buildings. He emphasized that national necessity imposed on the government unpleasant duties, such as the levying of taxes to provide revenues for the purchase of death-dealing armaments and the waging of war against the forces whose sole aim is the destruction of our civilization and all that it implies in the realm of human rights and fundamental liberties. The action which the government has taken on behalf of the people of Canada is actuated by but one desire, the determination to prevent occurrences such as the rape of Korea and the further enslavement of the free peoples of the world.

A nation is no stronger than the sum total of its individual strength. In this time of crisis, the people living in the 262 ridings that make up the dominion must so integrate their efforts as to give the fullest support to the government in the pursuit of its main policy, that of strengthening the country from within and helping friendly and still free nations meet the threat of the common enemy, Soviet Russia and its satellites.

My constituency, Prescott county, is in the happy position of being able to make a not inconsequential contribution to the national effort. But Prescott county's contribution is conditioned on co-operation. During the second world war my riding, where the topography of the land is admirably suited for aviation purposes, had the benefit of two airfields, one situated at Pendleton and the other at St. Eugene. These two airfields, which played an important part in the expansion and full development of the eminently successful commonwealth air training plan, have been virtually unused since 1945. A moderate outlay would be sufficient to ensure their rehabilitation and utilization. Hawkesbury has a flying club which has been in existence for several years now. The unflagging enthusiasm of its members has ensured its successful operation in spite of many handicaps, among others the lack of finances. The preliminary training of fliers under the direction of flying clubs like the one operating on the outskirts of Hawkesbury is directly associated with the broad pattern of national defence. Young aviation enthusiasts learn the fundamentals of flying at these clubs. The theoretical and practical knowledge of flying acquired at these clubs constitutes an important preliminary step in any national air training plan. Bearing in mind the over-all cost of training each flier, the national budget is relieved of a portion of the financial burden the complete air training course entails. I have been urging for some time now the installation of a beacon at the airfield of the Hawkesbury flying club. Such a beacon would be of great help to the flying enthusiasts who, by reason of their employment, can only engage in night flying. The benefits to be derived from the installation of a beacon are so obvious that I need not labour the point. The very small outlay required would pay dividends to this country.

I should like to stress another factor that ties in closely with the national defence program. I have in mind the decentralization of industry. Economic and strategic reasons make such a decentralization increasingly imperative. Decentralization relieves transportation congestion in heavily populated areas and facilitates the quick movement of traffic both in times of peace and war. New methods of warfare centred around the use of the atomic bomb and its more lethal companion, the hydrogen bomb, are undoubtedly the most compelling reason for the decentralization of industry. Prescott county, situated as it is midway between Ottawa and Montreal, is splendidly located to meet the needs of decentralization. There is ample power for the operation of almost any type of industry, and the county is well endowed with rail and highway transportation facilities.

The full development of Canada's agricultural possibilities is another paramount consideration. This country is most fortunate in that there is a fairly happy balance between its agriculture and its industry. We are well aware of the outstanding part Canada's agriculture played in the successful prosecution of two world wars. I fully endorse the action taken by the government, and confirmed by a parliamentary majority, in connection with the voting of a $65 million subsidy to the western wheat growers. However, I will avail myself of the opportunity presented by the reference to this matter to emphasize once again the importance of maintaining a proper relationship between all the constituent elements of our agricultural economy. There is an all too pronounced tendency in some quarters, and among some informed and less informed citizens, to regard the farmers of the eastern section of the country as quite capable of coping with their own problems. There is such a thing as penalizing farmers for their qualities of sturdy individualism. I have often asked myself if eastern farmers receive all the encouragement to which their efforts and initiative entitle them. I strongly urge the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to do his utmost to ensure the setting of a floor price for butter at 62 cents a pound, as suggested by Mr. A. L. Sloan, secretary of the Prescott and Russell counties federation of agriculture, and Mr. Emile Laplante, president general de l'union des cultivateurs franco-ontariens. In relation to its farming population, Prescott county is the largest producing centre of cheddar cheese in North America. Flax is grown in large quantities.

Another drawback for the eastern farmers is the rampaging Nation river, the wickedest river in Canada which at flood times creates havoc on a vast area of the fertile golden triangle of the Ottawa valley. I sincerely hope that before too long a program will be devised to check this stream.

A full defence effort should not divert attention from the pressing needs of many of our fellow-Canadians. I have in mind the aged people of this country who have reached the twilight stage of life and are incapable of fending for themselves or providing for their own sustenance. There is too the tragic case of invalids who know not where to turn for succour, and who have no kith or kin to lend them a helping hand along life's all too thorny path.

There is some evidence that the program of price stabilization applied in the United States is producing results which should be reflected in the Canadian economy. Canadians are following this economic experiment with interest.

Taken by and large, the 1951 budget is one that should not fail to commend itself to the people of this country. It will be assayed and judged in terms of its ultimate results. Those results will, I feel confident, help most substantially in the furtherance of Canada's national defence program and redound also to the ultimate benefit of the Canadian population.

[Mr. Bruneau.]

Mr. Frank T. Stanfield (Colchester-Hants): Mr. Speaker, there are a few matters pertaining to my own province which I should like to bring to the attention of the house this evening. Before doing so I have a few observations to make concerning the budget. The first is with regard to the depreciation allowance the minister announced in his budget this year. Ever since income tax and corporation tax have come to be a major source of revenue they have always been allowed corporation depreciation rates levied on a very prudent, proven and well established basis. I believe it is a great mistake to depart from this procedure. I realize that there is a shortage of metals and steel that go into the making of machines, or in other words, capital goods. It was the minister's intention to discourage the buying of capital goods through the adoption of these new rates of depreciation. It would seem to me to have been much better to adopt a system of priorities such as that established during the last war. Then, if anyone wants to buy a new machine or spend a large amount of money on capital goods, he has to get a permit from the minister before he can proceed. It seems to me that would have been a much better system than the one proposed by the minister in the budget.

The second matter to which I want to refer is the tobacco tax. Cigarettes and tobacco do not greatly concern me, and I am not one to encourage their use. It is a sort of dirty habit, but today one cannot class cigarettes and tobacco as a luxury. They are used by many of our people, and it seems to me a lot of money to have to put out forty cents for twenty cigarettes. It seems still more foolish to me when you cross to the United States and buy cigarettes for around twenty cents, but when you come back into Canada you have to pay forty cents. It does seem to me that the spread is too great, and perhaps we have gone too far in the taxation of tobacco and cigarettes. The tax was steep enough before this increase was brought down.

The third matter I wish to bring to the attention of the house concerns the sales tax, I should say the increase in the sales tax. Personally, I am against sales taxes in any way, shape or form. I do believe that if we have to have a sales tax the amount of the tax should be shown to the people buying a shirt or a pair of shoes. I realize that this is poor politics, but I am certainly against any hidden taxes whatever. If we have to have a sales tax, I believe the amount of it should be shown in the cost of the goods to the buyer. I go still further and say that the sales tax is a bad tax. It bears hardest on those who can least afford to pay it. I have heard it said by some officers in the Department of Finance that the sales tax is not pyramided. I cannot agree with that, Mr. Speaker. Anyone who is familiar with the retail trade in this country knows that the sales tax is pyramided to quite an extent. The retail mark-up is always taken on the sales tax as well as on the actual cost of the goods to the merchant. As to automobiles, I will admit that I do not believe there is a mark-up on the sales tax; but as far as I know, that is one of the few things that do not bear a sales tax mark-up on the retail price.

As I say, it is a hard tax on a great many people and is one that I certainly would like to see done away with. But if we must have a sales tax, I am all for showing it on the actual cost of the article to the purchaser at the retail level, or for working out some system whereby this may be done, because I think it should be brought home to the people at all times how much it costs to run this country, so that they will have a greater interest in that matter at all times.

Now I shall come a little closer to home. I should like to bring to the attention of the house this evening the matter of freight rates. To the maritime provinces this is a matter of great importance. Unless some better system can be worked out with regard to freight rates, we in the maritime provinces are certainly not going to have too much prosperity. We in the maritime provinces are so situated that our natural market in which to trade is not east and west but north and south, namely, in the New England states and the state of New York. But if we are closed off from those markets, or if we have to trade with western Canada and central Canada, certainly some system must be worked out whereby the freight rates will not bear so heavily on us in the maritimes.

I know that is an extremely difficult question. It is a hard one to work out. In the past efforts have been made to rectify that situation, and they have helped. But with the great increase in freight rates that has taken place over these last two years, it has become a much more difficult question to us in the maritimes than ever before. We had a great deal of prosperity during the war and since, and perhaps, with the great defence program getting under way again, we may not feel these heavy freight rates in the maritimes as much as we would if we were in ordinary times; but I can assure everyone that if the maritime provinces are to be prosperous, some cheaper method must be worked out by which they can trade with the central provinces and also with western Canada.

I should also like to commend to the minister the continuation of the subsidy on feed grains. I can assure the minister that this subsidy is a great help to the farmers in our part of the world. It also helps to keep down the price of milk and other dairy products. I also think that it is a good thing for the western farmers, as it helps them to dispose of a great deal of their coarse grain. They can really grow those coarse grains in the western country much more cheaply and of much better quality than we can in the maritimes. I would strongly urge the Minister of Finance that the subsidy on these feed grains be retained; and I am sure that consideration of this suggestion would be greatly appreciated by all the farmers not only in the maritimes but in Quebec and Ontario as well.

It is perhaps a dangerous thing to raise this question of coal, inasmuch as people from the maritime provinces have been talking about coal for a long time; but a large item in the economic life of Nova Scotia is that commodity known as black coal. Today it is having a hard run against oil, in all its forms, that is burnt today not only in Ontario and Quebec but even in the maritime provinces themselves. There is, however, a large market for coal here in Ontario. Our coal now comes up to Montreal but little of it passes beyond that point or reaches Ontario. I notice that the number of tons of coal mined in Nova Scotia and in Alberta was less this year than it was a year ago but that the importations of United States coal have been greater.

I should like to see adopted some national policy with regard to coal, to the end that more of our Nova Scotia coal as well as Alberta coal would be brought to the Ontario market, thus giving the miners in our province more work. In addition, perhaps a greater number of mines could be operated than there are at present. There is no doubt about it that in our part of the country not nearly as many coal mines are in operation today as there used to be. Alberta, of course, has all kinds of resources, but we in Nova Scotia are not so fortunate. It would be a great gesture on the part of the rest of the country if some kind of national fuel policy could be drawn up with regard to coal, as a result of which more of our Nova Scotia coal might be brought to Ontario.

There is another way in which I am sure the government could greatly assist the people in Nova Scotia and in New Brunswick. That is by the establishing of more industries in connection with this great program of national defence that this government has just undertaken. If they could not locate large plants down there, perhaps a large number of small plants could be established in the various cities and towns throughout those two provinces, in which subcontracting work could be carried on. I do not know whether or not the same thing could be worked out with regard to Newfoundland, but I presume that a certain amount could be done over there. But I feel certain that, if the government so desired, a great deal of new employment could be provided in the maritime provinces by bringing to these provinces many of the industries that I feel they are contemplating setting up in Ontario and Quebec. I think it is only fair that those industries should be spread around the country as much as possible.

In Nova Scotia and in New Brunswick we have not the same full employment that is enjoyed in Ontario and Quebec. I am sure that the establishing of some of these plants in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick would greatly improve the employment situation in that part of the country. It would also perhaps have the effect of permanently building up many more industries down in those two provinces. I hope that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) will listen to those of us on this side of the house who have been urging this course of action for some time. The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black) and the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) have been continually pounding on this question. I certainly give them my wholehearted support in the good work that they have been doing, and I do hope that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) will do something about it.

Hon. members will recall, Mr. Speaker, that when the Cuban market was open to us in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick it was a great market for many of the products of the maritime provinces. A few years ago the Liberal government brought in the West Indies trade treaty. The Cuban government took exception to it, and they stopped buying anything, or practically anything, from us in Canada. At that time we lost some of the best markets we had for our fish, potatoes and many other products, and we have never obtained a market to take the place of the Cuban market.

The West Indies market is a small market so far as we are concerned. I should like to see the Minister of Trade and Commerce take steps to try to get the Cuban market back for our exports in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. I am not saying that the West Indies trade treaty was a bad one, or anything of that kind, but it was a very tough one for the people in the maritimes. The West Indies market in no way, shape or form took the place of the Cuban market.

The English market is another market that we in the maritimes really must have. I do regret that there has been a little—I do not know the word to use—disagreement or misunderstanding between the English and ourselves with regard to exports. We had enjoyed the English market for many, many years, and up until the second world war broke out. We all know since that time England was not in a position to trade with us so freely or to put up good money for the exports from our country which had to be paid for in dollars. The result was that we lost our apple industry. We also lost a great deal of the lumber market, and other markets that we enjoyed, such as markets for pit props and other things which we sold to the British isles for so many years previous to 1940. It was another hard blow for us in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, perhaps more so to New Brunswick than to Nova Scotia. However, I am glad to learn that the English market for our pit props has been reopened to us since the first of 1951.

When the government is working out trade agreements with the British isles I do hope that they will not overlook us, but will try to get our apple market back for us, and also the market for our long lumber, and many other of our commodities which we had enjoyed over there so many years prior to the second world war.

The English people are among the best there is. They always pay their bills, and we should make every effort to get back with them all the markets that we have lost.

If the minister has any great amount of money to throw around, to play Santa Claus with, as he sometimes has, perhaps he could appropriate a little to the maritime provinces to help conserve the forests of those provinces. The forest wealth of the maritime provinces is the greatest form of wealth we have. It has fast disappeared in the last few years. I should like to see something worked out whereby our forests could be conserved in the same way as they are being conserved in Sweden, in Finland and in many other European countries, where they have been successful in having large timber cuts each year, but have also been able to conserve their forest wealth.

The forest wealth is of very great importance to us, and I do not hear a great deal about it in this house. It is a matter of great concern to us in the maritime provinces.

Every hon. member should take a greater interest in conserving the forest wealth of this country.

Perhaps the house has listened long enough to what I have to say; but I do wish to say that we in the maritime provinces, as everybody knows, are not as fortunate as the people in western Canada. I do ask you all to give the very best consideration to our requests and to the special needs and the special help that we need in those provinces.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, since listening to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) deliver his budget, I have been somewhat indisposed, but I managed to pull myself together tonight in order to make a few comments on the budget because of the importance of this matter to my constituents, and because in the time that has elapsed since he gave his budget speech and now I have received communications from a number of people.

I might say, Mr. Speaker, before proceeding, that for one in my condition I do not get very much inspiration from the rather bored expression on the face of the Minister of Finance, but I do get some inspiration from the enlightened attention I am receiving from the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson), so I shall continue with that inspiration.

We in this group fully realize that the Minister of Finance must have the funds to give effect to the decisions of this parliament —there is no question about that. And we know that money has to be raised and we know you cannot raise taxes without taking something away from people. This group believes in the principles of arithmetic, that two and two always make four, but we want to be sure that you take the two from the right people. We criticize this budget, Mr. Speaker, on two grounds. The first is, there is no specific provision in the budget for the checking of inflation.

I understand the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) told a group of labour people representing the Canadian Congress of Labour, the Trades and Labour Congress and the Catholic Federation of Labour that the government did not see fit to introduce price controls and subsidies now, but that when the budget was introduced they would find that it contained some provisions for checking inflation. Well, I am quite sure, Mr. Speaker, that a great number of members in this house and a great number of people in the country are not satisfied that this budget is a determined effort to check inflation.

We in this group believe, Mr. Speaker, in income tax as a fair and a sound tax, and we believe in the principle of taxation on the basis of ability to pay. We do not believe that this budget, in these serious and urgent times, has been drafted sufficiently on the principle of ability to pay.

I am not going to speak at length this evening. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) gave a very full criticism of the budget. We had an excellent speech from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), particularly that portion of his speech in which he dealt with possibilities for changes in the act in connection with deduction of medical dues and so on. Then we had a very down to earth oration from the well loved member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis). This afternoon the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) gave what I thought was an excellent criticism of the budget based on soundly presented evidence. I am going to deal with just a few items in the budget. I shall stay with the budget entirely from my point of view.

My constituents are already informing me that they consider this 25 per cent increase in the sales tax, the increase from 8 to 10 per cent, entirely wrong, and I think they are correct. We in this group are very much opposed to the principle of sales taxes and hidden taxes because we believe they are oppressive and unfair. This sales tax pyramids because it is applied by the manufacturer, by the wholesaler and by the retailer. We believe that this type of tax is not sound in principle, and if the government see fit to apply it, it should be applied at the retailer's level so that the consuming public will be asked to pay the 10 per cent only once.

The new 15 per cent levy on refrigerators, washing machines, gas and electric stoves was quite a surprise to many people in this country. We believe that that tax could have been omitted from the budget. This group particularly, and many members of this house, realize that the basis of the Canadian economy, if it is to be a stable and worthwhile economy, is the building of satisfactory homes. We believe that this tax is going to work considerable hardship on people, particularly young people who are attempting to furnish new home units and things of that sort.

The increase in the cigarette tax of three cents a package will create a small hardship for a good number of Canadians, but I do not think we can complain too much about that under the circumstances. While I am one of those who enjoy the so-called filthy habit of smoking pipe tobacco, I do not think we are suffering too much in the increase in the tax on tobacco from 67 cents to $1.15 a pound. These are not essentials. I have found from experience, and as a result of my wife's prodding, that on occasion I can do without these things when I am pushed. So in future I shall be allowed just that much less tobacco and my budget for tobacco will be the same.

The increase in the special excise tax from 15 to 25 per cent on cars, radios and luxuries is one that we could expect. We cannot complain about the tax being increased on luxuries. I do not know whether we can complain too much about the increase in the tax on radios. But there are certain people in this country, particularly those with lower incomes and who may require a car with which to travel to work, or who would like to enjoy a radio, who may find this somewhat of a hardship.

I come now to the 20 per cent defence levy on personal income taxes, effective July 1. We contend that there should have been higher exemptions from that tax; that it should not have been a flat 20 per cent, that it should have been graduated. It will bear heavily on a certain group of people in this country, but if the exemptions for this special levy had been raised to $1,500 and $3,000 this defence levy could have been more easily borne by the majority of the Canadian people.

We in this group are pleased to note that the government has seen fit to allow union and professional dues to be deducted for income tax purposes. I think that is a tribute to the efforts of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), which were supplemented by the efforts of this group. I remember the time when that was first brought up and there was so little support. It was considered to be a sort of Utopian idea; it was considered to be unnecessary. I am glad to note that the government of the day has seen fit to recognize the constructive and progressive work of the C.C.F. group in this house.

I understand that the corporation taxes under this budget will impose a tax of about 50 per cent on the profits of a corporation making over $10,000 per year. Under normal conditions that would be considered quite a high rate of taxation. I understand that the smaller corporations making a profit of $10,000 or less will not be affected by an increase in taxation. I am not so sure but that the smaller companies could have stood at least a 5 per cent increase from 15 per cent to 20 per cent. Some of the smaller companies are operated by people who draw good salaries and they are permitted to make a profit up to $10,000. When you consider that in the case of a corporation with a profit of $10,000 the tax is only $1,500 it will be seen that they are not suffering too much under present conditions.

We submit that a larger tax should have been imposed on the large corporations. I realize that this is a popular suggestion to make, but I am not making it because of its popularity. I make it because it indicates an opportunity to secure revenue which would make it unnecessary to impose some of these other taxes on the people in the lower income group.

I believe that figures prove that the larger corporations could have stood a somewhat higher rate of taxation. Table 7 in the papers presented with the budget indicate that in 1939 corporation profits before taxes amounted to $618 million; in 1946 they had increased to $1,450 million; in 1949 to $1,898 million; and in 1950, which is estimated, to $2,270 million. Corporation profits after taxes in 1950 will amount to $1,402 million, an increase of 17·9 per cent over the 1949 average.

The Montreal Gazette of Saturday published the computed earnings of over 100 Canadian companies in 1950 as compared with 1949. The financial years of these companies coincided closely with the calendar year. These one hundred companies showed an average increase in profit of 27·4 per cent compared with 1949, after all charges, including taxes, had been deducted. I think these figures indicate that the larger corporations could easily have stood a somewhat higher corporation tax.

I have always wondered at the principle upon which income tax was based. In the case of corporations, they are allowed depreciation and deductions for maintenance on a most generous basis. But when you come to the human machine it is simply left with enough for a day-to-day existence. No allowance is made for human depreciation. The average working man in this country is not permitted to provide reserves for contingencies. I have often wondered at the strange difference in the principles governing the taxing of corporations and individuals.

I have mentioned a few of our objections to the budget. Who supports this budget? I think that is a good indication of the approach of the Minister of Finance to the matter of raising funds in Canada. I find that the Canadian Chamber of Commerce issued a statement to the effect that the budget was reasonably fair, sound and realistic. The Edmonton Chamber of Commerce stated that there had not been a single protest by businessmen. That indicates clearly that they do not feel that they are suffering too much. It indicates that they consider it satisfactory from their point of view. When a chamber of commerce issues a statement like that you can rest assured that the budget coincides pretty generally with the wishes of big business in this country. Whom do we find opposed to it? We find the various labour organizations. They state it is equivalent to a serious cut in wages. A Halifax housewife protests the tax on stoves and washing machines. The chairman of the Ottawa United Church social service council says it it outrageous that no further taxes have been imposed on liquor while necessities of life have tax increases. The Trades and Labour Congress of Canada says the new budget tax proposals appear to be aimed directly at our working people to force them down to lower living standards. You see, these people represent the mass of the working people in this country. They understand their opinions and know the effect the budget will have on the living standards of a considerable number of Canadians at this time.

I want to refer to an editorial in the Nelson Daily News, which is a daily paper published in my constituency. It is a Conservative paper. I am very pleased to see, Mr. Speaker, that I now have the honour of having the attention of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance. The Nelson Daily News is a Conservative paper owned by a Conservative publisher. It is very fair in its presentation of the news. It has permitted its correspondence columns to be used by people of very wide and divergent views. On occasion it gives the government credit, and it criticizes the government when it sees fit, and the same with the member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge). What does this very cautious Conservative editor say? In the issue of April 14 he says:

> But just how effective a brake has been achieved against inflation is certainly by no means immediately evident. It is true luxury buying has been dealt a blow by the increase of excise imposts. But there are millions of Canadians in these inflation days to whom the end of luxury buying means nothing. They simply haven't been doing any. The demands of daily living have been taking up all of their wages. To these millions, the budget and other methods undertaken by the government as weapons against inflation do not show as overwhelmingly effective. The avoidance of debt financing of the defence measures will have some good effect toward holding down inflation. However, advanced government spending on the defence effort is just as likely to offset this gain.
> Inflation is a greater enemy today than at any time during the war years or in the years since. During the twelve months preceding Mr. Abbott's baby budget last September the cost of living index advanced 7·5 points. In the six months since, it has raced 6·4 more points. In other words, the rate of increase has doubled. That is how quickly this enemy is advancing. Doubts as to the effectiveness of the measures against inflation are aroused first by the immediate demands being considered by some labour to offset the effects of the budget; secondly, by the example of some business in taking advantage of the interim period before the application of new taxes to charge advanced prices and so reap additional profit.

This is the comment of a very sound and stable editor who in my opinion views taxation and budgets quite objectively. I have criticized several aspects of the budget, and I want to make a couple of suggestions. We in this group believe that the larger corporations should have had a higher graduated income tax or excess profits tax. I say excess profits tax because of Canada's experience with the application of an excess profits tax. In the latter days of the last war and after the war an excess profits tax was in effect. What effect did it have? Because the employer knew he would have to pay the excess profits tax it influenced him in meeting wage demands of his employees. Many employers increased wages when the excess profits tax was in effect, and at the same time many employers for the first time established pension and medical plans, and so on.

In that respect the excess profits tax was an indirect way of raising the whole Canadian standard of living. In addition, as was mentioned by a previous speaker—I believe the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy)—there were large sums of money paid into the dominion treasury. In my opinion if we had an excess profits tax it would tend to influence employers to meet wage demands so that wages and prices could be brought once more into a satisfactory relationship. At the same time by the strict application of price control and subsidies where necessary we would be doing something in the budget to provide the commencement of a condition of financial stability in this country.

The government actually would like to see the people of Canada save because if we are going to meet our production obligations, if we are going to meet the situation facing us, there should be considerable saving. But there is no incentive whatever to save until the people of Canada are assured of a reasonably stable dollar. Another point I wish to make is that I think even yet there are a considerable number of corporations and individuals in Canada avoiding certain income taxes that they should pay. There is quite an opportunity to do that in certain types of business. I remember the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) asking for a return as to the farm taxes paid in the various provinces. I remember the return showed that for one province the figure in 1946 was approximately $14,000. I understand that situation has been substantially corrected, but I think there can be a closer checking of certain aspects of income tax collection.

I know it is difficult. We have wide spaces to travel in Canada, but I suggest that the government would be well advised to have more spot check audits in various types of businesses and for certain individuals. When we come to the question of taxation we must realize that the only persons who are bound to pay their full tax are the wage and salaried workers who have their tax deducted at the source, and the farmers who are selling their products through marketing agencies such as the wheat pool, Tree Fruits Limited in British Columbia, vegetable growers organizations, dairy co-operatives, and so on. I am not suggesting that there are large numbers of dishonest people, but the ones to whom I have referred are the only people concerning whom the government can be certain that they are collecting every dollar of income tax owing to the government. They are placed in a somewhat different position from any other people in this country.

The question of taxation in modern times has reached astounding proportions. I want to indicate the position of the average man of modest income in a province like British Columbia under the present circumstances. I want to indicate the taxes that will be paid by the average home or farm owner. He is not born more than a few minutes before his parents have got to buy a birth certificate so that the Minister of Finance will know he is here. Then he has a land tax, a school tax, and a provincial sales tax in British Columbia. Then he has an electrical energy tax, and a poll tax if he lives in a municipality. All citizens who use automobiles and gasoline pay the gasoline tax. After going along for a while he decides to get married and he has to buy a marriage licence.

Mr. Gibson: Amusement tax.

Mr. Herridge: And there is the amusement tax. I appreciate the assistance of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson) very much. Then this person decides to get married and for the first time he begins to realize the full impact of federal taxes. Then he knows what income tax means, the excise taxes, the federal sales tax, and the tariffs which are a form of tax. On top of that he has an insurance tax. I am not giving them all; I am only giving the more important ones. I do not want to discourage people too much, but then he has many licences to buy. He buys a business licence, a radio licence, a fishing licence, a hunting licence, a car licence and a driver's licence. After he has paid taxes all during his life he dies, and then they insist upon his relatives paying for the death certificate so the Minister of Finance will know he is gone. Then shortly after his death the monument manufacturer comes around and says, "Don't you think it would be nice to put up a nice headstone to your relative?" He might suggest, "I will put on it 'Rest in peace; Abbott cannot get you now.' "

The situation in the world today is serious. The position of Canada, in common with all other members of the United Nations, is very serious. I am disturbed by the business as usual attitude of a good number of corporations and individuals in this country whose main motive in life is still the making of profits. I am not going to be sanctimonious about this. We live in a capitalist society and companies have to make profits in order to exist, just as individuals who invest their money have to make reasonable profits. But I meet any number of people who seem to have no conception of what faces the western world, but are just as keen as ever on raking in every dollar from the Canadian economy that the law will permit, and in many instances more than the law legally allows.

There is evidence of that right in this house, and in the newspapers of the country. Look at the prospectuses being issued by those making application for gas pipe line charters. You should read some of the literature being circulated in the United States. They say that in Canada there is a glorious opportunity to make more money than can be made by any other investment; and it is a highly productive investment. It is the same with the oil pipe lines; you should see some of the prospectuses I have in my office. There is no mention of the seriousness of the situation. And mind you, when you are doing these things, building pipe lines and so on, there are great opportunities for depreciation and things of that kind. Look at my own province, where the British Columbia Telephone Company is asking for an increase in its authorized capital from $25 million to $75 million. People do not realize that the telephone business is the greatest industry in North America. The owners of the Bell company in the United States have more capital and make more profits than United States Steel and two American railroads put together. This new capital in British Columbia will come principally from the United States; and you see advertisements in Canadian newspapers, even here in Ottawa, in connection with preferred stock issues and bonds which are being sold in the United States. The lure, shall I say, or the whole approach is that here is an opportunity to make more money than usual, more money than average business is able to make.

The same situation exists in connection with other corporations, and again I am going to mention International Nickel, which I consider one of the vilest monopolies in this country today. These companies think of profits while we are asking men to join the armed forces and defend the principles of the United Nations in Korea. Before I proceed may I say I firmly believe that no member of the active forces who leaves Canada to serve this country in the field should be required to pay income tax on the pay he receives as a member of the armed forces. I think that is the least we can do for them and their dependents while they are overseas. But here we have these large profits, with people going about their business quite unconcerned over the fact that the whole world about them may be crumbling. It takes a great deal to shake large segments of humanity out of their lethargy and greed.

I have suggested that we should have an excess profits tax. This would be a way to assist companies in meeting wage demands, and would help keep prices and wages in better relationship if applied with price controls and subsidies. In addition it would give us the extra money we require to do something about old age pensions, which were dealt with so well the other evening by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). In addition it would make it possible for us to distribute the burden more fairly and lift what we consider an unfair burden from the shoulders of the lower income groups.

In view of my approach to the budget and my criticisms, Mr. Speaker, when the vote is taken I intend to support the subamendment and the amendment.

(Translation):

Mr. Raoul Poulin (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, like other members I have received during the past few days many messages and letters from farmers in my riding asking the government for a floor price on butter, namely 62 cents to the producer. I know this is a slippery matter as a certain party has learned at its expense. However, even if the problem should be a difficult one, that is no reason for refusing to cope with it.

The workers in our cities and villages must be asking themselves how it is that in these critical times, when the cost of living is already so high, public men are seeking to set the price of butter at what must appear a very high level. If it is fair to set a reasonable floor price for the farmer, I believe it is only logical to let workers know the reason why. I should like to give my personal impression on the matter without, of course, attempting to solve the problem in my own way.

We know that over 400,000 producers are interested in Canada's dairy industry and that over two million people are employed in that industry. We also know that butter is the most important product of that industry. City workers will readily understand that those two million people, who are in fact consumers, make up a very important market, since those same workers purchase manufactured goods.

They will surely understand that, in their own interest, they should not ignore the agricultural class. They cannot risk that those two million consumers interested in dairy production stop purchasing their products. I believe it is not an overstatement to say that the Canadian dairy industry now stands in jeopardy.

There are various reasons for this, some of them rather obvious. First, there is the high price currently offered farmers for beef cattle. Last summer, in rural districts, those of my constituency at any rate, I saw dealers go up and down the countryside every day offering to buy from the farmers not only their beef cattle but their dairy cattle as well. Farmers are naturally tempted to sell their dairy cattle since this stock fetches a high price. That is the first threat.

Of course, the farmer has to be cautious and avoid cutting down his dairy herd, for while it takes very little time to cut down, it takes very much more time to build it up again.

The second danger is somewhat like the first, because of the fact that our dairy cattle find a ready market south of the border. On March 19 last, in reply to a question in my name on the order paper, we were told that 47,000 of our dairy cattle had been exported to the United States in 1950. There lies another temptation for the farmer. He is likely to yield to that temptation because he is always offered a high price.

The third danger lies in the manufacture and sale of margarine in this country. I must say I am very happy that the Quebec government has banned the manufacture and sale of margarine. In my humble opinion, margarine is one of the greatest threats still facing the dairy industry.

We note that between 1949 and 1950 the production of margarine has gone up 27 per cent. Also that in the same period butter production has decreased 6 per cent.

As for the consumption of margarine, we see that in 1950 it was up 30 per cent over 1949 and that in the same period butter sales had gone up only 2·5 per cent.

Plainly there has been a rapid and constant rise in production and consumption of margarine.

On the other hand, we find that butter production has fallen off while consumption remained at about the same level. Of course, I am no economist, but I have some business experience and it seems to me that these figures show clearly that margarine now endangers our butter production and consequently our dairy industry.

While I am dealing with the butter situation may I be permitted to mention what happened in the last couple of months, when butter was selling at 75, 80, 85 and even 90 cents a pound in our small villages.

Although the producer had sold his product last fall at 57 or 58 cents a pound, it was stored for the winter and, two or three months later, it sold at huge profits. I am not in a position to say who is responsible for this condition but it surely is untenable. It should not exist and should not be allowed to recur if it can be avoided. I know that some people are dissatisfied in my district and I fear that the public will be resentful, through no fault of their own.

I wish to add a few words about taxes, especially the general sales tax which has gone up 25 per cent. It has been said many times that this tax directly affects the consumer and will surely entail a higher cost of living. As another result—it can already be foreseen and all the newspapers have foretold it—the labour unions will request higher wages. What will happen? The increases will either be granted or they will not. If they are granted, they will have a direct effect on the cost of living, which will rise still more. If the salaries are not increased, well, a state of uneasiness will prevail amongst the working classes, an uneasiness which may well become dangerous.

The second tax levied—and it is perhaps more striking to the imagination—is the increase of 20 per cent in the income tax. Already this tax was imposed on a class of people with rather small incomes. I wish to express the opinion, if I may, that all incomes under $3,000 should not be taxed. Nevertheless the income tax is increased by 20 per cent. The poor will necessarily suffer, although taxpayers with large families have the benefit of certain exemptions based on the number of children, which is an excellent principle. It is generally acknowledged that this is all to the good. Nevertheless, in my opinion, the 20 per cent surtax is applied at too low a level of income and should have been applied to a much higher level.

There is perhaps one item that the government forgot to tax—and it was referred to this evening rather ironically—and that is alcohol and beer. This omission has evoked many a pointed and caustic remark on the part of the public. But our country's treasurer simply forgot to levy a tax on liquor and beer. Yet it would have been easy since, in my opinion, they are not essential products. They may even be harmful in some instances. Revenue from taxes on liquor amounted in 1950 to $107 million. If the two taxes I have just mentioned, that is a 20 per cent tax and a 25 per cent tax, had been added to this, the tax would have stood at 45 per cent and the revenue would have been increased by some $50 million.

I know that there is a limit to increasing levies and that any product that is too heavily taxed might not sell so well or be consumed so widely and might not bring so much revenue. The country would be no worse off if the day ever came when no liquor at all was consumed. That would be no great evil. At this point, may I recall an incident that occurred in 1942 when we were then going through a very trying period. The world was waging a war that threatened to destroy everything. We needed all our strength. I well recall that on Christmas day 1942, the late prime minister, Mr. King, took the trouble to broadcast a plea to the nation. Pointing out that we needed all our energy for the defence effort, he asked the Canadian people to abstain entirely and to practise temperance.

If that was the right thing to do then, it would certainly be all the more so now. Once again, may I say that even if consumption of liquor were to disappear because of excessive taxation, that would not be such a great evil for the country.

For some time now, the government have been requested to control prices, to take steps in order to prevent too rapid increases in the price of foodstuffs. Reference was made to controls, to a controlled economy. It was stated that there was to be no interference with private enterprise. All that is all right. Personally, I am all for it. During the last war, controls were imposed and prices were frozen.

I am a believer in free enterprise just as long as it does not deprive a certain portion of the people of their liberty. I am anything but a socialist. Needless to say, I am no communist. I should not have to assert it, in spite of what has been said in this house by the member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Cannon), who claims I have been repeating communistic propaganda. He need not fear; I am not spreading any communistic propaganda at all.

However, it cannot be denied that today the poorer classes are in an absolutely miserable way. If we do not wish them to rise in revolt some day, we will have to seriously consider their plight.

I wonder if the situation is really well known, if we know exactly what goes on among our poorer people? I would like to be entirely impartial. I have no wish to criticize needlessly but I do think that most of our public men are not well acquainted with the true state of affairs, do not really know what goes on in our poorer families and that, consequently, they have not much to offer in the way of suggestions towards putting things right, in order to help out those of less than modest means.

May I be permitted to make a humble suggestion. I have no illusions on that point for I know perfectly well that it will not be well received. Besides, no one is bound to accept it. To remedy the state of poverty in which a large part of our people find themselves due to the high cost of living, the government might double the rate of family allowances. I know that it would cost something like $275 million a year. It is a lot of money and it would mean new taxes. These taxes would have to be levied where they would not affect directly the poorer classes.

I was wondering a moment ago if the statesmen are really aware of the situation. Let us consider the cost of a few items taken from the list of consumer goods; milk, for example, which sells from 18 to 20 cents a quart. It costs between $5 and $6 a month to buy milk for one child, if we take for granted that a child should get a minimum of one quart of milk a day. A man having five children, infants or older children—such families are not uncommon here—he will have to spend from $25 to $30 a month on that one item.

And now butter, which sells at 70 cents per pound. Let us say that a child needs 1½ ounces per day, which is not exaggerated. It will cost $2 per month per child, or $10 for the family. Thus for those items only, milk and butter, that family will have to spend between $35 and $40 a month.

To that must be added bread, meat, vegetables and a few sweets; all of which are essential to the normal development of children. If we add clothes, shoes, etc., how can the mother of a large family in the low-income bracket give her children the bare necessities? That means privation for the children, anxiety for the parents and continuous nervous strain for everybody. Should such economic conditions persist, it is highly probable that such a family would bring up underdeveloped citizens both physically and intellectually, individuals unprepared to play their part, embittered, aroused and perhaps persecuted, of which at least a few will easily fall prey to subversive propaganda.

However true it may be, as the old saying goes, that society is no better than the family, it is one thing that is apparently overlooked in certain quarters. This is not merely an opinion but an established fact recognized by leading sociologists of all races and creeds. In seeking to make my humble contribution to this debate tonight, it is chiefly in order to champion the cause of the family, particularly the large family, the bulwark of society. I did suggest to the government a few moments ago to double the amount of family allowances as a means of protecting the family, and therefore society, in these troubled times.

Money can always be found though not always from the right source whenever preparations have to be made to prevent war. We rightly fear that an enemy from without might destroy our institutions, our freedom and our rights.

Let us not forget however that the enemy from within can achieve the same results, as surely if not as openly, by slowly undermining the very foundations of our society.

Let us give our taxation and economic policies a definite family trend; let us protect the family against too heavy taxes. Let us give it, on the other hand, the financial assistance it requires to carry on; let us spare the family the "undeserved misery" mentioned by a great pope.

When danger becomes more threatening, when a call is made for defenders of the country, where do we draw generously to ensure a continuous flow of soldiers? From the abundant source of large families.

The homeland sometimes asks from the mother the sacrifice of two, three and even four sons. It has happened during the two last wars. In return, at least, let the country be generous towards her, let the country support her in her arduous task, let the country give her all facilities in her work of salvation.

To provide for the security of our families is to provide for the security of society.

Mr. P. L. Dube (Restigouche-Madawaska): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure to avail myself of this opportunity of saying a few words in this house to draw the attention of the government to certain necessary projects in my constituency of Restigouche-Madawaska.

I must say with regret, Mr. Speaker, that my constituency is not receiving its rightful share of money spent in this country.

The citizens of Campbellton derive their living almost exclusively from trade within the limits of their city. It is therefore most important that transportation facilities should be improved there. This requires, above all, the erection of a bridge across the Restigouche river. At present, the majority of the people have to purchase what they need by catalogue, as there is no means of crossing the river, especially in the spring and fall, when the ferry service is suspended. That situation hampers the city's development. The only remedy is to build a bridge.

You probably heard, Mr. Speaker, that the ferry which operated between Campbellton and Cross Point on the Restigouche river was destroyed by fire. Following this catastrophe, a delegation of businessmen from that district waited on the Quebec and Ottawa governments early in April in order to convince the appropriate authorities that a bridge over that river—we have been requesting it for more than thirty years—is essential to the inhabitants of both shores.

I do not hesitate to urge the government, once again, to undertake the building of this bridge which would improve the lot of these people and link Quebec and New Brunswick in a friendly manner. The city of Campbellton boasts modern hospitals, specialists in surgery, movie houses, arenas, garages, stores of every description and so on. It is also a valuable seaport, as well as the terminal point of an important railway. However, Campbellton's industrial development was delayed by the lack of permanent communications between the two provinces.

I am convinced that if the Department of Public Works took the trouble of making an investigation, based on the representations made by civic organizations such as the town council and the chamber of commerce, they would realize the necessity of carrying out this project for the greater benefit of the people in general.

For several months, indeed for several years, the municipal authorities have been asking that a bridge be erected over the Restigouche river. The members of the committee in charge of this project had to overcome many obstacles, but they are prepared to sacrifice time and money to achieve their end, namely, the development of trade, the welfare of the farmers and the establishment of new industries.

From the political point of view, it would serve to strengthen the bonds which unite us with our northern neighbours, thus promoting national unity.

Looking at the matter from a personal point of view, we could then, when visiting Quebec, avoid a lot of inconveniences—for example, the annoyance of having to wait for the ferry, to name but one.

Allow me, Mr Speaker, to recall that we have repeatedly requested the C.N.R. authorities to erect a freight shed in the town of Edmundston. We consider this to be a very necessary project since the town has a fairly important railway terminal. I want to add that revenues from the storing of freight, for the year 1950, reached a figure of over two million dollars. According to information received from authorized sources, $50,000 has been voted for the construction of that shed. The structure we have now was built back in 1914 when the town had a population of only two or three thousand. Now the population is 10,000. Trade has grown threefold since those days. I am proud to say we are the only division in the Atlantic region to show a profit. Yet it is the division that receives the least encouragement.

Moreover our station, which was built at the same time as the shed, is in a very bad condition. It has no waiting-room, and travellers should be provided with the comfort they deserve for patronizing the Canadian National Railways.

I therefore urge the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) to speed up the building of a shed and station at that point.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that I would fail in my duty if I did not also mention the plight of the potato-growers of my constituency in the past few years. The government has put a ceiling price on their product. Had it not been for the set price they could have sold their potatoes at $5 or $6 a barrel, and they would all be better off today.

I am disappointed to learn that no answer has been given to the delegation which came to Ottawa, during the week of March 20, to meet officials of the Department of Agriculture and ask the government to include their product in the list of subsidized commodities. If the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) persists in his refusal to grant them the help they ask for, many of them will have to give up their farms. This would be unfortunate after all the sacrifices the farmers have made in order to improve their crops.

I am counting on the good will of the Minister of Agriculture and I hope he will reconsider his decision and help this group of citizens so worthy of all his consideration.

On motion of Mr. Applewhaite the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We will continue this debate tomorrow.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, April 20, 1951

The house met at three o'clock.

DOMINION ELECTIONS

LACK OF REPRESENTATION FROM PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND ON SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. At page 2173 of Hansard for April 19 the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa (Mr. Weir) moved that certain members comprise the special committee on the Dominion Elections Act, and then the names are recorded. The motion was agreed to. Before the motion was agreed to I asked whether my province of Prince Edward Island was represented on the committee. This question was not answered.

I find the following numbers of members representing the different provinces: Four from British Columbia; three from Alberta; four from Saskatchewan; two from Manitoba; seven from Ontario; six from Quebec; one from New Brunswick; two from Nova Scotia; none from Prince Edward Island, and one from Newfoundland. Therefore I object to the special committee on the ground that it does not represent all the provinces of Canada. My question of privilege is: Why should any one province without representation be dictated to by the other provinces?

INCOME TAX ACT

AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO SECRECY PROVISIONS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 199, to amend the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member leave to introduce the said bill?

Mr. Abbott: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Knowles: Since there seems to be such unanimous consent, perhaps we could give this bill all three readings today. The purpose of the amendment proposed by the bill—

Some hon. Members: Dispense.

Mr. Knowles: —is to remove in part the restrictions as to secrecy imposed by section 121 of the Income Tax Act, which as it stands at present can have the effect of preventing a minister of the crown from giving the Senate or the House of Commons such information as it might be perfectly legitimate to ask for and obtain.

No change is made in the matter of information obtained from personal income tax returns. Such information must still be kept secret. On the other hand, this amendment would make it possible to make public, at the request of a member of parliament, any information respecting corporations obtained by the income tax division of the Department of National Revenue. Surely the salutary effect of such an amendment must be obvious.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member leave to introduce the said bill?

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed. When shall the bill be read the first time? Now?

Mr. Abbott: Now.

Mr. Speaker: Next sitting of the house?

Mr. Knowles: The first time? No; now.

Mr. Chevrier: Six months hence.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DAIRY PRODUCTS

INQUIRY AS TO FLOOR PRICE ON BUTTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Charlton (Brant-Wentworth): I should like to know whether the Minister of Agriculture is yet prepared to make a statement as to the position of the government with respect to a floor price on butter, which will give some assurance to the cream producers of Canada.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I do not think I shall be in a position to make a statement until about Friday of next week.

INQUIRY AS TO DETERMINATION OF PRICE OF CHEESE TO PRODUCERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. Tustin (Prince Edward-Lennox): Has a delegation from the Ontario cheese producers interviewed the minister recently, and if so has any price per pound to the producer been arrived at for this year?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): A delegation from the dairy producers of Canada interviewed me recently, and I think a separate delegation from the cheese producers, then interviewed officials in the department. As I have just stated, by Friday of next week we hope to be able to make an announcement with regard to the matter.

POSTAL SERVICE

INQUIRY AS TO REPORTED INCREASE IN LETTER POSTAGE RATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): I should like to ask the Postmaster General if he can give the house an assurance that the government has no thought or intention of raising the ordinary letter postage from four to five cents, as is suggested in a news item in the Montreal Gazette of today.

Hon. Edouard Rinfret (Postmaster General): I saw the article to which the hon. member refers. This is another of those statements that have absolutely no foundation. It is off the record and also off the beam.

Mr. Graydon: Sometimes where there is smoke there is fire.

Mr. Rinfret: Not in this case.

REVISION OF POST OFFICE ACT—DIFFERENCES IN POSTAGE RATES WITHIN CITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): In view of the fact that the Postmaster General was away when I asked an earlier question which was answered by the parliamentary assistant, and in view of a further letter I have directed to the hon. gentleman, will the Postmaster General indicate whether the government intends to introduce any amendments to the Post Office Act or to the regulations, which will end the discrimination in regard to postage which now exists in Ottawa and, I understand, in some other cities as well?

Hon. Edouard Rinfret (Postmaster General): A revision of the Post Office Act will be introduced this year. When it is brought down it will speak for itself.

Mr. Graydon: If I may ask a supplementary question, will the new Post Office Act be sent to a special committee so that we shall finally have an opportunity of going into the administration of the Post Office Department?

[Mr. Tustin.]

Mr. Rinfret: No decision has been reached on that point as yet.

INCOME TAX

INQUIRIES AS TO EXEMPTION OF SPECIAL FORCE PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Now that the Canadian forces have left for Korea, could the Minister of Finance say whether the personnel will be exempt from the liability of income tax on their service pay?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker, it is not contemplated that there will be any exemption from income tax. As I stated in the course of my budget speech, we are introducing some special rules with respect to the tax on those in the armed forces, but I think the house is aware of my own personal view that no group should be exempt from the payment of income tax.

FLOOD CONDITIONS

OTTAWA AREA—QUESTION AS TO HOLDING BACK OF WATER AT UPPER DAMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works, of which I have not had the opportunity to give formal notice; for that reason I am bringing the question forward more by way of notice than otherwise. In view of the flood conditions in the Ottawa area, has the minister explored the possibility that the dams above the Quinze rapids near lake Timiskaming and at South Timiskaming, as well as dams lower down the river, might hold back a greater head of water, since flood conditions there are not as serious as they are in the Gatineau and other rivers tributary to the Ottawa in this area?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I have not gone into this matter with my officials, except that I did inquire of the deputy minister if there was any way of storing more water in these reservoirs north of lake Timiskaming. I understand the flow is actually over these dams, but I will have a report prepared in answer to that question and bring it down, perhaps on Monday.

Mr. Drew: Without seeking anything further from the minister at the moment, might I point out that the information I received, which was the basis of my question—and which did not come to me early enough to be presented to the minister previously—was that at these dams and at some of the lower dams, water was being by-passed which might be held back; and it is to that question I am asking the minister to direct his attention.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I will have a report ready by Monday. Tomorrow being Saturday, I could not bring it down then.

CHINA

ARREST OF MISSIONARY SISTERS BY CHINESE COMMUNISTS—CANADIANS ON MAINLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jean Lesage (Parliamentary Assistant to the Secretary of State for External Affairs): On Wednesday last the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he could give some indication of the number of Christian missionaries still in Red Chinese territory. I may say on behalf of the minister that the department has no information as to the total number of Christian missionaries in China. However, there are now known to be 370 Canadians in continental China, of whom 332 are missionaries and their dependents.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the parliamentary assistant if he or his department is in possession of any further information on the reported arrest earlier this week of further Canadian missionary sisters?

Mr. Lesage: I shall inquire and give an answer early next week.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

OLD AGE PENSIONS, FAMILY ALLOWANCES, ETC.—MANITOBA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): On April 18 the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Health and Welfare answered a question concerning pensions and family allowances paid in the city of Winnipeg, and said he could not give any information in that respect about each of the constituencies in that city. I should like to know if I could get that information about old age pensions, pensions for the blind and family allowances for the province of Manitoba as a whole.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I shall be glad to look into the matter and see to what extent I can accommodate my hon. friend.

ORDER FOR RETURN

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY SIGNATORIES AND OTHER COUNTRIES—GIFTS MADE AND RECEIVED BY CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): On Monday, March 19, more than a month ago, a question of mine with respect to reciprocal gifts as between Canada and other countries was passed as an order for return. The last paragraph read:

> What was the amount or value in Canadian dollars of each gift mentioned in the two preceding questions?

In order to simplify the work of those engaged in calculating these amounts I would ask permission to withdraw the third paragraph of that question. In order to make easier the task of those working on the answer to this question I will give an illustration of what I want to know. For instance, Canada spent $450 million on the air training plan. In return we received as a gift the wrought iron gates at the Trenton camp. It is all those facts I want to know on both sides of the picture.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Thursday, April 19, consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. W. A. Boucher (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak in this debate, I do so primarily as the elected representative of the Rosthern constituency, but I believe I am correct in saying that we are all elected to this democratic parliament to look after the interests of the people in all parts of Canada.

It is a privilege and a pleasure to open my address by extending warm congratulations to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) upon his great effort this year. I believe there is no more arduous position in the government of our great country than the one which he holds. I feel sure that the people of Canada, irrespective of party, appreciate the services that he has given to our country. It is quite generally known that he has served us in this difficult task at great financial sacrifice. To unthinking people who cynically criticize politicians I would throw out this challenge. Let anyone who belittles the services of those who guide our political destinies show where they have made comparable sacrifices in seeking to serve other than their personal interests. It is my hope, and I believe it is the hope of a large number of Canadians, that the Minister of Finance, during the critical period through which we are passing, will remain in the office he now holds.

It is a pleasure to congratulate the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Prudham) on his elevation to the cabinet as Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. The minister, at a comparatively early age, has made a success of his private business, and I am confident he will extend his record of success as he continues to serve his country in public life. We of his neighbouring province of Saskatchewan will watch his career with a great deal of interest and enthusiasm.

I know that no minister and no government is happy when it becomes necessary to increase the taxes which they must collect to administer the affairs of the country. I feel sure, however, that our people will understand and appreciate the need for a greater contribution at this time. A large proportion of the people of Saskatchewan have come from the countries of central Europe. They came to Canada to escape wars and rumours of wars. They know, even better than we know, that the security of our nation, the security of our homes, is a primary need if we are to build a community of prosperous and happy people. For this reason I am sure that each person in Canada will consider it a privilege to bear his share of the cost of protecting our homes from invasion by the communists.

I take second place to no one in advocating the greatest possible measures of social security. But all our security measures would be worthless if we neglected our defences and let ourselves be overcome by the aggressive communist forces in the world. We would be enslaved without recourse. It is for this reason, then, that I am particularly proud to support a government that has given so much of its energy and ability, especially in the last year, to the preservation of peace. One of the greatest guarantees that we can have for peace is to remain united and strong with our western neighbours. The record of the government of Canada in its quest for peace is a notable one, which needs and deserves the support of all peace-loving people. We were proud to see our own minister of external affairs appointed to the cease-fire committee of the United Nations. His efforts were tireless, and I feel sure that they will yet have an important effect, even if it is not obvious at this time.

The efforts of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and of the government as a whole to preserve peace have been a sharp blow to the aggressive forces of the world which use the language of peace in order to weaken the free nations and leave them prey to the aggressive intentions of Russian imperialism. The quest for peace and the necessary action to defend our homes against communist aggression must come first in all our plans and expenditures, because these things are basic in our search for prosperity and happiness.

An important part of these basic aims includes certain developments at home to increase our production. I refer particularly to the South Saskatchewan dam and irrigation project. This project will give stability to a large section of our productive prairie land, in addition to the production from the lands which are actually irrigated. The early completion of this project will enable us to make a greater contribution to our national and humanitarian desires.

During this session we have had the interesting spectacle of an opposition which has spoken, and continues to speak, with two voices on the question of the special powers to be given our government to be used as and when needed to protect our homes. On the one hand the opposition has used extreme statements in accusing the government of trying to take undemocratic powers, while on the other hand it has criticized the government severely because the government does not use special powers more drastically. In my constituency, and in the province of Saskatchewan generally, I have found that the majority of the people trust this government to use special powers with the greatest discretion and in the interests of all our people.

The farmers of my constituency—and practically all our people, because we all live directly or indirectly from our farms—are enthusiastic supporters of the wheat board. I regret to say that the socialist government of Saskatchewan has done our farmers a great disservice by sniping continuously at the work of the board in an effort to make political capital for itself. It has thus given aid and comfort to those who are trying to break this method of marketing and to bring back the open market of the Winnipeg grain exchange. I believe our farmers will remain steadfast in support of the wheat board. They have a great fear of what could happen to them, with so much frozen and low-grade grain, if they were thrown on the mercy of the Winnipeg grain exchange or any other open market. They know that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) have not let them down, and I am sure that they will refuse to be stampeded into any position that will threaten the continuance of the wheat board and the pooling system of handling and selling their grain.

Mr. Wright: On a matter of privilege, Mr. Speaker, may I say that if the hon. member is going to read his speech he had better stay away from controversial matters and not accuse people falsely.

Mr. Boucher: Take your medicine once in a while. I have been listening to you for a long time.

Mr. Blackmore: For goodness' sake tell us the truth.

An hon. Member: You can't take it.

Mr. Blackmore: Tell the truth occasionally.

Mr. Boucher: If the hon. gentleman will contain himself, I will deal with some of his statements later.

Mr. Wright: If you don't lose the page.

Mr. Boucher: With respect to the five-year contract with the government of the United Kingdom, I wish to say that—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have already ruled that the five-year wheat contract cannot be discussed during this debate.

Mr. Boucher: I am not discussing the wheat contract with the British government, Mr. Speaker. Let me say just this. I am sorry that they did not see fit to give greater regard to the "have regard to" clause.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have ruled that that matter is not debatable at this time, and that reference should not be made to it during this debate.

Mr. Boucher: I bow to your decision, Mr. Speaker. I will just say that I had hopes that our farmers would have received about twelve cents per bushel as a final payment on the five-year pool.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member persists in discussing this matter, I shall be forced to ask him to discontinue his speech.

Mr. Fulton: What about having it struck out of Hansard?

Mr. Boucher: The farmers of Canada need the support of every hon. member of this house in their quest for a fair proportion of the national income. I am sure that the farmers of Saskatchewan could only wish that the many stories that you hear about their great prosperity were true. If the interests of the people of Canada should ever require that the type of price controls imposed in the last war be reinstated, careful consideration should be given to the position of the farm and agricultural economy. The farmers of Canada have never asked, and will not ask now, for more than a fair share of our economy, but they do ask for that.

Mr. Wylie: They are not getting it now.

Mr. Boucher: They are getting a lot more than they ever did before, Mr. Speaker. I am proud to say that. Generally speaking, the farmers of Canada never before got along as well as they have been getting along during the last few years under this government.

I am pleased to see that the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) is in the house. Some time ago he said that every Liberal member had made promises all over our province during the last election with respect to the final payment on the five-year pool.

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Boucher: I am not discussing the wheat agreement. Do you want to hear an answer to what he said?

Mr. Knowles: The Speaker has ruled it out of order.

Mr. Boucher: I am not discussing the five-year pool at all.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope the hon. member is not going to refer to the five-year wheat pool.

Mr. Boucher: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Brooks: He does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. Johnston: Who wrote that speech, anyway? He has it all mixed up.

Mr. Boucher: It is not written; it is just notes.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member is reading every word of it, and he knows it.

Mr. Boucher: The remarks made by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) will be found at page 1095 of Hansard of March 9, 1951. That statement, Mr. Speaker, is absolutely untrue. I did not at any time make any promises.

I should now like to quote from the speech of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue).

Mr. Wright: You cannot quote from a former debate.

Mr. Boucher: It is reported at page 1326 of Hansard of March 16, 1951. He said—

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member must not refer to a debate in the present session. That debate was concluded and cannot be reopened at this time. I must be firm. Hon. members must observe the rules of the house, and I hope they will co-operate with me in endeavouring to enforce them.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member should not read his speech at all, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Boucher: I am not reading my speech.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Boucher: May I quote what the hon. member said, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Johnston: Not from that speech.

Mr. Speaker: Not at this time.

Mr. Johnston: The hon. member is about six weeks too late.

An hon. Member: Turn the page.

Mr. Boucher: I will not make any quotation, then, Mr. Speaker. Some time ago the hon. member asked: What kind of animal is the Liberal party?

Mr. Ross (Souris): That goes for every session.

Mr. Knowles: Put it on the order paper.

Mr. Boucher: Through you, Mr. Speaker, I want to tell the hon. member that we are not the kind of animal that will steal a constituency from a colleague.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Ross (Souris): That isn't the way we heard it.

An hon. Member: You steal from somebody else.

Mr. Boucher: The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) made some severe attacks, both in the house and over the air, on the Minister of Agriculture. These attacks were not well received and were not appreciated by the farmers of western Canada. I am sure that all the farmers of Canada know that the Minister of Agriculture is the best minister for that department that this country ever had. I am sure they all appreciate the great service that he has given to agriculture and to Canada as a whole.

I now wish to say a word about the report of the royal commission on transportation. I want to congratulate the royal commission on transportation on the thoroughness with which they have made the investigation assigned to them by this government. The implementation of this report will go a long way toward overcoming many of the inequities that have existed in the economy of the widely separated areas of Canada, and I would strongly recommend that this report be implemented as soon as possible. It will be a further step toward that greater Canadian unity which has been developing so rapidly over the past few years.

I am pleased and proud, Mr. Speaker, that my predecessor, Mr. Walter Tucker, gets credit for the great contribution he made to this matter. Mr. Tucker gets the credit in a memorandum attached to the main report of the commission by one of its three members, Dr. H. A. Innis, of the university of Toronto.

I think that we in Canada are fortunate to have such great leadership as has been given to us by this government. Our government has realized that the basis of our defence, our progress and our happiness must be the greatest possible unity of our people from the eastern shores of Newfoundland to the far-flung western islands on our Pacific coast. These are challenging times in which we live. I am satisfied—as I feel sure are the great majority of the people of Canada —that the present government will be equal to the needs of the occasion. They will measure up to our highest expectations in seeking to establish peace all over the world, on the basis of which we can make still further progress to prosperity and happiness. For these reasons I am glad to support this budget on behalf of the electors of Rosthern constituency.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to repeat many of the criticisms that have already been made, because the views of the opposition in regard to the budget were set forth by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) when he moved an amendment on behalf of His Majesty's Loyal Opposition. To summarize what he said on that occasion: The budget is inflationary. Large sums of money could be saved in an economy drive by the government, which would render unnecessary the application of the general sales tax. Over the past few years there has been overtaxation year by year. Finally, measures should be taken to meet the high cost of living arising from profiteering.

This has been a most unreal discussion. All the statements made by the hon. member for Greenwood, and offered as his considered criticism, have been unanswered by any member of the government. Never before in my experience in the house has the government of the day been unable to answer criticisms and has therefore remained silent, as this government has in recent days. It is all very well for the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Boucher) to say that everyone is satisfied—

Mr. Boucher: The great majority is.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He referred to one gentleman for whom I too have a high regard, namely, Mr. Tucker, but he did not express the same views in the legislature that my hon. friend did a while ago; for, sir, he voted for a proposal that a larger sum of money be paid by the Dominion of Canada to help western agriculture, and in particular—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member for Lake Centre is referring to the five-year wheat agreement, I would ask him not to do so.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I was referring to a motion in the legislature of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Weir: Having to do with what?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would not say anything, Your Honour, to transgress any rule, but it was difficult to resist a reference to something which had actually been stated by my hon. friend, and which, if unanswered, might leave a wrong impression.

Mr. Speaker: May I say I hope that this matter will not be discussed again during this debate? The question was raised this afternoon and has been answered, and I hope we shall not hear it again.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Before dealing in general with some matters that I should like to discuss—because the budget gives to members an opportunity of bringing to the attention of the government matters of interest to their constituents and to the people of the country as a whole—I should like to refer once more to the serious situation on the prairies resulting from a lack of the necessary freight cars to move the wheat crop, amounting to tens of millions of bushels. That problem is not answered by statistics given by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier). It is one that affects every farmer in western Canada. Having regard to the conditions which prevailed last fall, many millions of bushels of wheat are in danger of being lost entirely as a result of failure to act on the question of the supply of freight cars.

There will be serious loss to farmers everywhere unless something is done about it.

It is all very well to say that there are not as many freight cars in the United States now as there were three, four or five weeks ago, but the adverse balance of freight cars in the United States today is still a great deal more than one and a half times what it normally has been in past years. Nothing has been done about it except consultation. I mentioned the other day, and I repeat, that in 1919 a similar condition existed, and the then government of Canada appealed to the government of the United States to do something. Even today, with the month of April almost gone, I urge the government to make representations to the government of the United States to the end that something be done in this regard; otherwise something approaching disaster faces western farmers.

I hold in my hand a resolution dated April 16, which comes from a town in Saskatchewan with a population of about 400. It states that the elevators are filled; 410,000 bushels of grain are in the elevators, but there are an estimated 200,000 bushels among the farmers that cannot be disposed of, part of which is wet wheat or damp wheat. I am not one of those who over the years has believed in bringing up only such matters as are of particular interest to my own area; this is a condition which prevails, and I make an appeal that something be done before it is too late.

In view of the situation which now exists, most farmers will have to face the necessity of providing their own storage. I therefore suggest that consideration be given, as has been done in the United States, to adequate balance of payments for farm storage so that the farmers themselves will be in a position to arrange for a type of storage which will meet present needs.

The quota system has been unfair and inequitable, and the result is that in certain areas only a portion, and not a large portion, of the crop of last year has been sold. I ask the government to act immediately, and not merely by a parade of statistics. The situation is serious when one considers that 170 million bushels of wheat are unsold in the western provinces.

I now wish to say a few words about the budget. Last fall I had the honour, along with other hon. members, of attending the meetings of the commonwealth parliamentary association in New Zealand and Australia, and in passing I would pay my tribute to the bountiful hospitality and warm welcome extended to us by the governments of these two commonwealth countries. It was pointed out by one after another of the representatives there that one of the greatest allies that Stalin has in the world today is inflation. The Minister of Finance said in his address the other night that inflation was more serious in Australia than it is in Canada. That was not my view while I was there. In Canada there is almost hysterical inflation, mounting from day to day to an extent never before equalled, and with no effective action being taken by the government. The leader of the opposition referred to the condition as runaway inflation; I think it is actually galloping inflation. Nothing in particular is being done to meet the problem of the ever-declining savings measured in purchasing power of our people, those who invested their money in insurance, those who are in receipt of pensions. Inflation has cut away almost half of the purchasing power of their savings or allowances. Great as are hidden taxes, the most objectionable of all is inflation. It undermines and destroys. Burglary is an offence; but the silent, effective theft of inflation undermines the fabric of our country—and no effective action is taken.

The situation is so serious as to merit something more than adulation of the government as exemplified by some hon. members. That provides no remedy. None of us wants a condition such as this to continue, and when there are criticisms it is because we believe they are called for in view of the gravity of the situation as we see it.

The Minister of Finance contended that the extra levy of sales tax really did not amount to anything for persons in the lower income brackets for it covers only about twenty-five per cent of the commodities purchased by those whose incomes are less than $3,000. But that is not the whole story. There is no tax on bread; yet the sales tax actually increases the price of bread to the consumer. Sales tax is imposed on the motor vehicles used for delivery, on the wrappings of the bread, on the machinery and equipment that goes into the production of bread, and so forth.

Hidden taxation is greater than ever before in our history, and it is being increased at a time when inflation is at its height. There can be no answer to the argument advanced by the hon. member for Greenwood that the increasing of the sales tax would increase prices. It has done so already. While we talk of its effects, prices rise on commodities subject to the additional sales tax.

Only in the last few days the prices of cigarettes and gasoline have been increased, and there is also the expected increase in the price of oil used for agricultural purposes. Prices of furniture and shoes are rising at a time when the government should act to meet the situation relative to inflation.

One of the means suggested by the hon. member for Greenwood was that there should be a reduction in government expenditures. The answer of the minister is: There was; we have attacked the problem. Well, of $1,992 million of non-defence expenditures the reduction has been $35 million, or just one and four-fifths cents on the dollar.

Why could not the government set up a commission similar to that advocated last year by the leader of the opposition, similar to the Hoover commission in the United States, which recommended savings of hundreds of millions of dollars in controllable expenditures? Why could this not be done, at a time when it is so necessary in the preparation of our defences?

If we do not win the fight against inflation, defence costs will mount to intolerable and bankrupting heights. We cannot beat Stalin with a 56-cent dollar and maintain incentive in our country. The other day the Minister of Finance, in clarion tones, called for action to meet inflation. But a few minutes later his voice was muffled by its own inconsistency when living costs were increased to every family in the country by the increase of the general sales tax to the extent of twenty-five per cent.

If the government had practised economy the extra sales tax would not have been necessary. I agree with the subamendment of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) wherein he suggests that the incomes of single persons earning up to $1,500 and married persons earning up to $3,000 should be exempt from the defence surtax. I think there is justification for that position.

Exemption from personal income tax is based upon the considered opinion of government authorities as to what it costs the individual or the ordinary family to live. But when provision was made for the present exemption, on March 22, 1949, the cost of living index stood at 159·5, whereas today it is 179·5, representing an increase of about twenty-one per cent. In view of the statistics set forth in the Labour Gazette of March 1951, unless the standard of living of persons in low income tax brackets is to be materially reduced there must be an increase in the amount of exemptions.

Having said that, I am not going to indulge in any further criticism of the budget. The Minister of Finance said the other night in a radio speech that he thought the people were satisfied with it. That has not been my experience. I know of no family in this country in the lower income brackets that can find justification for the imposition of an additional sales tax at a time when they find it almost impossible to carry on by reason of the increased cost of living.

We need money to finance the country; that was admitted by the hon. member for Greenwood. Yes, we must meet the danger we face throughout the world, and we can meet it with an economy-minded government that will scrupulously reduce all unnecessary expenditures. What have they done? The Minister of Finance in his radio speech said in effect: Did we not reduce the number of civil servants by five per cent? When he says that, I think of the mail carriers in various parts of the country, overworked as they were before the reduction; I think of the paltry savings effected by their removal from office and I have a suspicion that the mail carrier was chosen so that in every community the people would see at first hand that something was being done by the government to economize. In the face of reductions that could be made, and in the light of what the Hoover commission in the United States showed could be done and was done in that country, the interference with the employment of these post office employees, hard-working as they are, is not justified on the grounds of economy or otherwise.

Yesterday over the air we listened to General MacArthur in one of the most outstanding speeches made anywhere in the world since last June when, for the first time the conscience of mankind moved against international wrongdoing.

Unfortunately within the last few weeks I have been obliged to be absent from the house for some time. But I have read Hansard more carefully, Mr Speaker, than I do even when I am here. One thing that strikes me particularly is that members of this house know so little about what the government proposes to do with reference to international affairs that affect the people of Canada. General MacArthur said much yesterday about the need of expanding the area of warfare in Korea to the Yalu river, and about the bombing of portions of China. I am not going to enter into any controversy on these matters; they are for military men. But in such a course there are dangers that are not attributable to appeasement.

At the commonwealth conference in New Zealand, and the later one in Australia, there were representatives of every colour and race from every part of the commonwealth, and there were among them some who spoke of the need of effectively using the atomic bomb against the North Koreans. I bring to you today, Mr. Speaker, the answer of the coloured races from every part of the world, from Asia, from Africa, from other areas in the south Pacific. Every one of the coloured races represented there argued against that. They said in effect: Do not discriminate against us again. Do not use the atomic bomb a third time against a coloured race, for in doing so you will unite the coloured races everywhere in the world against the white democratic peoples. That was their message, and it is a message that I believe deserves consideration.

Yesterday General MacArthur stated his position on Formosa, which he regards as a bastion in the western Pacific. The attitude taken by the British government seems to be that, as Mr. Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill had made certain agreements at Cairo, those agreements should be carried out and Formosa turned over to China. I ask you, Mr. Speaker: Who in this house knows what the attitude of Canada is going to be on this matter so important to the future peace of the world? I feel that we have a right to ask that the fullest possible discussion take place on these matters in the House of Commons and not in the service clubs, that we in parliament have a right to know what our government will do on our behalf in a matter that affects the future of every Canadian and our very way of life.

What will be its attitude to Formosa with relation to the United Nations? What stand has the Canadian government taken with relation to the United Nations and expansion of the area of active warfare north of the boundaries of North Korea? These are matters the import of which concerns the salvation and future not only of people in other parts of the world but ourselves. I will give you the picture as I saw it in the commonwealth parliamentary association. There were representatives from the various provinces of the dominion. From this house there were the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Fulford), the hon. member for Vaudreuil-Soulanges (Mr. Beaudoin), the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacNaught), the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce), and we were accompanied by the Clerk of the House of Commons, Mr. Leon Raymond, K.C., O.B.E. Senator Roebuck represented the other place and was chosen as the chairman of the council.

We went over there to an unofficial parliament of representatives of every part of the commonwealth. I have heard Canadians say sometimes that there is no future for the British commonwealth. Such views were answered when one after the other these men representing every religion, race and colour spoke of what the British commonwealth meant and what it would mean to the future of the world and to freedom. I think of one representative from India who spent years fighting for his national freedom, and who measured his contribution in the biographical sketch in the back of the guide by the number of years that he had been in prison. He said to me one day: Do not sell the commonwealth short. Realize that it comprises 22 per cent of the world's population and does 33 per cent of the world's trade compared with 8 per cent on the part of the Soviet republic and all the puppets aligned with it. Freedom depends on the survival of Britain and the commonwealth.

The strength and diversity of the commonwealth are things that we do not often speak about because for some reason it is not popular to do so. These men of every race and colour asked that we ensure within the commonwealth freedom from discrimination and thereby unite every part of the commonwealth against communism. None of them seemed to consider war inevitable; but the common feeling was that as communism advances in southeast Asia and gradually stretches its hand in the direction of Australia and New Zealand the commonwealth should stand together.

They pointed out that Singapore is weak compared to the days before the last war, that all through the Malayan states communism has infiltrated, that in Ceylon a very considerable percentage of the representation of their parliament is composed of communists. I do not presume to interfere with the internal affairs of other countries within the commonwealth but when one reads of the situation in South Africa it is very disturbing in a world where communism is doing its best to enlist the coloured races in its ranks on the promise of material advantage in return, coupled with equality without regard to race or colour.

I am convinced that wherever there is anti-racialism or hunger exists there are potential breeding grounds of communism. It is for that reason that they asked, first, that each of the countries within the British commonwealth and empire eschew anything that discriminates against any race or colour. They contended too that in addition to military assistance we should do our part, not in a spirit of charity but in a spirit of Christian benevolence, to assist underprivileged peoples and thereby raise their living standards.

The other day I listened to the admirable address of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank), in which he left with the members of this house a message that could have come only from the heart. He asked for the support of the Colombo plan as a means to meet the advance of communism in Asia. Those who live in the Pacific area believe that the great danger spots of communist aggression are in Asia. The attitude taken in the United Kingdom is that the danger spot is in western Germany. I am speaking only of the Asiatic situation, for that was one about which we learned particularly at the time of that conference.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

The yearnings of peoples suffering from hunger cannot be met by the promise of parliamentary government and democracy alone. H-bombs are not all we need fear in Asia. The H-weapon of communism is hunger. I am disappointed that Canada, having agreed to advance $25 million under the Colombo pact—a mere drop in the bucket when compared with the cost of our defence program—did not agree to send to India, at a time when 40 million people are facing starvation, the best wheat available in our country, rather than wheat that could not be milled. We should make a contribution to the welfare of the people of India now, when they need it. At the same time, if the matter is looked at from the national interest we would have been building up future markets; we would have been building up goodwill, and would have been meeting the onrush of communism which, as never before in history, challenges the future of democracy in Asia.

The representatives of various coloured races spoke English with faultless diction and with a power and eloquence that we whose native tongue is English seldom equal. These races are moved by resurgence of nationalistic pride greater than at any time in history. They want freedom to preserve their fundamental rights, by way of democratic government. They want something that will meet their material demands. Communism promises an acre of land. We cannot do that but we can help to ease the gnawing pangs of ever-recurrent hunger. When Liaquat Ali Khan spoke in this house, I wondered what he meant when he said:

> There can be no peace without removing the economic disequilibrium which keeps more than half the world in poverty and the ferment of discontent. Neither peace nor progress is possible without international co-operation.

I know now, and that is why I make this appeal. I ask the government of Canada to do something tangible in connection with the Colombo plan it has accepted before millions starve. How many of us realize that the population of the world is increasing at the rate of 60,000 a day? How many of us appreciate that if India were able to reduce her death toll by raising health standards and improving living standards, at the end of a hundred years its population would be twice the present population of the world? The increase in the world population is taking place mainly in Asia and Africa, and it is for that reason we must meet communism there. If it gains control there, world control will be an easier objective.

We have to break the stalemate of inflation which uncontrolled will emasculate our country and its efforts. At the same time we have to accept our international responsibilities in connection with helping to raise the standards of underprivileged countries. As the leader of the opposition has said on more than one occasion, while plans to meet inflation give temporary relief, no final solution for the problem can be secured except by greater production. How are we going to get that? Some who attended the parliamentary conference spoke of Australia, of New Zealand and of Canada, great countries with tremendous resources still undeveloped. They contended that they should not be denied admission to these countries only because of their colour. They were perfectly willing to be denied admission on economic grounds and provided we had the necessary population and were developing our countries so that our greater production would help them and raise living standards elsewhere.

If we are to meet this problem of inflation—and I intend to deal with the question of immigration and will on another occasion, merely make this passing reference now—we will have to greatly increase our population within the next ten or fifteen years. Otherwise we will not be able to meet the demands that face us, nor will we be able to fulfil our responsibilities, having regard to the magnetic influence on communist peoples of a country with our vast resources. Last year 73,000 people came to Canada as immigrants, while 31,000 left Canada as emigrants. That shows that there is something wanting, something that has to be done. After all it does not mean very much to have an immigration policy under which two people are brought into our country while one Canadian leaves in the same period.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I say we must meet the problem of inflation. We must do something more than bring forward statistics and say things are not as bad as they seem. Even at this time the government of this country would be doing something worth while if it were to agree to the setting up of a commission similar to the Hoover commission which did so much in the United States. For some reason or other, however, the government takes an adamant attitude toward this suggestion. In the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States members do not practise their political partisanship to the extent that one might imagine. There, in committee, without regard to party, considerable amounts were written off even the defence estimates without in any way diminishing the effectiveness of the national contribution. I feel this problem must be met, and it cannot be met by adding to the cost of living through taxation under a general sales tax, at a time when people already face the highest cost of living in history. I wonder what hon. gentlemen opposite would say if they were over here and a Conservative government were in power, with the cost of living higher than ever before. Surely, so far as our people in the low income brackets are concerned, relief should be given against an additional sales tax of 25 per cent. With effective economies practised, not 1·8 cents on the dollar economies, there would be no necessity for extra taxation, as was stated by the hon. member for Greenwood. He made that statement several days ago. Since not one minister of the crown has risen to challenge it, all one can conclude is that it is correct.

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I shall delay the house but a few minutes. Since this budget is designed to accommodate a huge war preparation, it can hardly be expected to please one and all. I am sure that it meets with the general approval of the Canadian public. The opposition members are fully aware of the necessity for raising such huge sums. While criticizing the government severely, they have offered little advice as to how such sums could be raised or should be raised. Last evening when the member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) rose in his place, I thought that perhaps he did have the solution. From the number of questions which he asked the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), I fear that the Social Credit party does not have the answer either.

I agree with some hon. members that perhaps there was room for an increase on the tax on liquor, which after all is a luxury and should be used only when the necessities of life have been provided. Last year the people in the province of Ontario spent in excess of $118 million in government liquor stores. I do not believe this sum includes the amount spent on cheaper beverages such as beer and wine. A tax increase in this area could possibly have had a twofold effect. It would have decreased the consumption, and made labour available for more essential industries.

The fact that the minister has decided to allow union dues to be deducted from the total earnings for income tax purposes gives me very great pleasure. I am sure that this removes from the statutes of Canada what has been said by many, and appears to me, to be class legislation.

It has been said that the tax on electrical appliances will weigh most heavily on newly married couples. I think we must not forget the fathers and mothers who have three and four children, who do not necessarily have all these facilities but certainly have all the budgetary difficulties of raising a large family. I feel that none can escape this terrific burden of the defence preparation; it falls heavily on the nation as a whole.

I wish to develop what I consider to be one of the prime objectives of this battle against inflation. With ten per cent of our national production going in the direction of war expenditures, and without any appreciable increase in our total national production except in terms of dollar values, a reduction in our standard of living is almost inevitable. All the money in the world cannot buy the things that do not exist. If we were to distribute every earned dollar of profits, savings, and investments to the consuming public for the next year, we would not increase the goods available. The standard of living would continue to decline until we were able to find a means of increasing production. The exception, of course, would be the amount by which we were able to import from other countries by reason of the fantastic prices we would be prepared to offer. This may sound like poor reasoning, but I am simply trying to prove that unless we increase our national production by something in excess of ten per cent we cannot escape a reduction in our living standards. This alone will not stem the rising cost of living, but at least it will provide the materials for continued high living.

It has been said many times in this house that higher wages are the cause of inflation. I challenge this assertion, Mr. Speaker. The necessity for extremely high wage demands is but another symptom of the inflation or shortage of consumer goods. You show me an establishment where wages and conditions are poor, in relation to the whole, and I will show you an inefficient operation. High priced and a high quality labour encourages the development of better machines. Labour's continued desire for better conditions has always been, and will continue to be, a stimulus to industry to mechanize and modernize. The ability of the operators of industry to pay differs widely because of world and local market conditions. The unions must be left free to strike the best bargain possible for the employees concerned. I believe that many labour leaders, and the majority of the rank and file, seldom ask for or insist upon more than industry and the general public can afford to pay. In my opinion it is yet the only equitable way to distribute the wealth of the industries whose profits depend largely upon foreign markets.

The deferred depreciation plan provided in the budget will no doubt have the desired effect of deferring expenditures on gadgets, frills and a general dressing up of the establishment. I am somewhat apprehensive of the long run effect it may have upon our standards. It will mean a further set-back in capital expenditures coming so quickly on the heels of a six-year delay consequent upon the last great war. This may have an adverse effect upon our living standards. Our rapidly increasing population, without an equal expansion of capital expenditures for increasing the productive capacity of consumer goods and farm machinery, will tend towards further shortages. This could increase the pressure on the inflationary spiral.

It has been said by leading economists, and many times in this house, that inflation is an enemy of force equal to any military power which we may face. That being so, any factors which may contribute to a lessening of production must not be overlooked, and conversely any factors which may tend to increase our productivity must be given consideration. While our valiant soldiers are fighting and dying on the battlefields, let us ask ourselves if we are doing everything in our power to win the battle against inflation on the economic field at home. It is not so much controls and a controlled economy that is needed most, but a measure of self-denial and the will to produce. How is this to be brought about? I would say first that we must make sure that the steel, which is presently in extremely short supply, is allotted in such a manner that it finds its way into the many labour saving devices and machines. We must adopt measures most likely to create amicable labour relations between employer and employee by an educational policy sponsored by our Department of Labour. I feel that this could go a long way towards the establishment of joint production committees such as were in existence during the last war, many of which are still in operation today and doing excellent work. They could discuss production problems, review individual suggestions and make awards for useful applications for labour and material savings, as is being done in many of those committees in operations that continue that plan. They could encourage industry to adopt job simplification and method studies and could work toward the abandonment of old and obsolete rules which, in many ways, strangle progress.

I would suggest the exemption from income tax of all earnings acquired on an incentive and overtime basis and of all income earned in addition to regular yearly wages and salaries. At least if this were not possible, an alternative incentive would be to reduce the taxation on such income. That is to say anyone who is prepared to put additional effort into productive capacity will not be put in a position of pyramiding his earnings for income tax purposes, something which has a repressive effect on individual initiative.

I would suggest calling a halt to the present practice of compulsory retirement of able-bodied employees at 60 and 65 and urge re-employment of those now retired who are willing and able to take positions in industry. Women who have no family ties should be encouraged to return to industry wherever possible. But we have those who are now on statutory fixed incomes and they must be looked after at the earliest possible moment if they are to continue to suffer under this present inflationary condition. I would urge that steps be taken immediately to carry out the recommendations of the old age security committee, that supplementary payments be made and that the means test be abolished at the earliest possible moment.

Leaving the general economic scene for a moment, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) who in an exceedingly able manner showed the precarious position that the western coal industry is in today. This situation is indeed serious; and before huge sums of public money are expended on such projects as the St. Lawrence waterway, I would suggest that we should make a complete and thorough survey of the economic conditions of both the far east and the far west. This is not to say that I am opposed in principle to the St. Lawrence seaway; but before accepting the scheme in toto, I should first wish to be assured that this heavy capital debt, running perhaps for generations, would not outweigh the benefits of the transportation facilities it would provide the nation. It is, of course, indisputable that water transportation is vastly more economical when the Creator and nature provide the channel; but it is quite probable that this big ditch may forever put a burden on the Canadian public.

Is it necessary at this time that the iron ore of Labrador be brought to central Canada for the production of steel for the western provinces? Would it not be advisable first to investigate the possibility of a steel industry in the west where much of this material is consumed? The coal produced in western Canada, particularly in the Fernie district, is particularly suitable for coking and blast furnace purposes. East Kootenay, of which Fernie is a part, has all the natural resources necessary for such a development; and the markets in the prairie provinces and on the Pacific coast are constantly expanding. Farm machinery production has always been a heavy user of steel, while gas and oil pipe lines will be needed in ever-increasing quantities.

There are some deposits of hematite ore in the Kootenays, and also an extremely large iron sulphide deposit, millions of tons of which have been milled and are lying in storage near the Sullivan mill at Kimberley in Kootenay East. Many more millions of tons can be produced and 500 tons daily are going into storage at that point. Generally, this iron sulphide is not considered to be a useful iron ore; but recent developments in that area, in the plans for building a fertilizer plant at Kimberley, changed the picture considerably. The roasting of iron sulphide for the production of sulphuric acid leaves a residue of iron oxide low in sulphur that can be utilized for blast furnaces. This sulphuric acid, by the way, is used in the production of fertilizer for the western provinces and export markets. Limestone, a raw material which is necessary in the operation of a blast furnace, is also available in the nearby Kootenay area.

I wish to commend this extremely important project to the attention of the house and to the government, and to ask that they give its possibilities serious consideration.

(Translation):

Mr. Paul E. Gagnon (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, the budget speech, delivered last Tuesday by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), has been both a surprise and a disappointment. In fact, following the oft repeated declarations of friendship by members of the government for the labouring classes, nobody could expect that the proposed changes in the Income Tax Act would strike first and above all at the householder's budget. That is one reason for our surprise.

The unconcern, inaction and inconsistency of the authorities in the face of the present economic confusion are the causes of our disappointment.

Mr. Speaker, one of the first items of our defence program should be the fight against inflation. The government, however, is not giving that serious problem all the attention it deserves. No efficient steps have been taken to curb the excessive rise in the cost of living. What steps are suggested to prevent the situation from deteriorating even more? None, or very few. The authorities justify their inaction by repeating everywhere that other countries are faced with the same evil, that we are not the only ones who must grapple with this problem and that this thought should relieve our anxiety and put an end to our representations.

The people, especially the workers, whose salaries have hardly increased since the war, are frantic. The necessities of life have reached a fantastic price, savings disappear, pensions, annuities and allowances, everything goes.

A worried public requests the government to take steps to stem this artificial wave of prosperity which absorbs savings and forces labour unions to ask for trade controls.

Unfortunately, price and wage controls alone cannot stop inflation. Such steps can bring temporary relief but, sooner or later, unless one strikes at the root causes of this capitalistic vice, powerful forces will break loose with such fury that no one will be able to curb them. A tied-down safety valve on the boiler won't hold the steam in check very long if you keep shovelling fuel into the fire box.

The government, whose duty it is to protect the public, should find means to remove the tremendous pressure of this increase.

Waiting to see what the effect will be of the United States government's orders in that respect, is to adopt the policy of the ostrich. A people who imitate others must necessarily lag behind.

Our ministers have no right to undertake, with the taxpayers' money, experiments as costly as these when immediate assistance is needed everywhere.

It is painful to note that, as far back as 1948, when the cost of living index stood at 155·0, the bureau of statistics, following an investigation bearing on the year ending August 31, proved that in Montreal 526,000 families and independent persons, with incomes in the neighbourhood of $3,000, were unable to make ends meet and that the average deficit was $8.19.

On the whole, since the publication of this report, the cost of living index has gone up 25 per cent. It is not hard to realize the plight of housewives and breadwinners at this time when the food index has gone up by 133·9.

In five years, the cost of meat has increased fourfold, while clothing, fuel and lighting also show a sharp increase.

A remarkable fact, however, is that while the salary cheque is too small to allow for proper family nourishment, dividends declared by various companies are higher than ever, and their profits greater than ever before in their history.

The Minister of Finance—

Writes L'Action Catholique.

—does not seem to think that inflation has already been hard enough on the low-income taxpayers. He wants to pave the way for inflation, to help it along.

[Mr. Gagnon.]

Viewed in that light, the sales tax increase is the worst thing that could happen to the Canadian people at this time, especially those who are unable to increase their income within a short time.

As a matter of fact, the 25 per cent increase in the sales tax, besides being inflationary, adds to the existing burden of taxation. It is an anti-social, vexatious and unfair tax, that should be abolished. Levied directly on the consumer, it adds to the cost of goods in strict ratio to its fixity, but when applied at the manufacturer's level it spirals up. In most instances, the dollar thereby extorted by the treasury costs the consumer three, four and even five dollars. For instance, the publicity, the advertising which enters for a certain proportion in the cost of any product, is taxed.

This tax on advertising means a further addition to the price the customer has to pay for the goods. At the various levels, wholesaler, distributor, jobber and retailer, the sales tax is applied several times, and this accounts for the frightful spread between the factory price and the retail price. The sales tax is a dreadful evil. I believe it should be replaced by increased import duties on wine and liquor.

Both in peacetime and in emergencies there is no respite for the Canadian taxpayer who last year contributed approximately $3,600 million in municipal, provincial and federal taxes. In 1952, the tax bill will exceed $4 billion. Of this tremendous taxation in a country of 14 million people, the federal government, true to the turn of mind of our centralists, takes the lion's share, or two-thirds. There remains 20 per cent for the ten provincial governments and 13 per cent for the 4,000 municipalities of this country.

Ten years ago, for example, the taxes collected at the three levels of government barely exceeded a billion dollars, one-half of which went to the federal government. 20 per cent to the provinces and 30 per cent to the municipalities. But the situation has changed considerably. The authorities do not seem to care if the municipalities, whose administration is the closest to the population and who are therefore in the best position to help our citizens, are incapable of balancing their budget and cannot meet their obligations, having been deprived of practically all their sources of revenue.

Taxes which, normally, should fill their tills are diverted into the coffers of the federal government who uses them to further aims infinitely more dangerous for the security of individuals and families than those pursued by municipal councils.

Those who claim that our cities, towns, and villages are not well run, since they have to report deficits year after year, forget that the property tax is practically their only source of revenue.

Far from correcting that abnormal situation, the government overtaxes our people, both directly and indirectly. The latter process, more cunning and hypocritical, is none the less quite distressing. Indirect taxation comprises chiefly excise duties on liquor, tobacco, cigarettes, automobiles, gasoline, furs, electrical appliances and countless items wrongly classed as luxuries, such as refrigerators, washing machines, radios, stoves, and so on. In many cases, customs duties add a substantial amount which has to be paid by the buyers.

The tax on home appliances is particularly hard on large families who rely on those articles to make housekeeping easier. Through this tax, an extremely heavy tribute is asked from the mother. It shows contempt for family life. The last budget is one of the worst, the most unfair people with modest means have had to bear for the past ten or fifteen years.

That was written in L'Action Catholique of April 12.

At a time when modern democracy should emphasize the part played by the family, the oldest organic cell in the world, and protect it because it is the best stabilizing factor, the family is overburdened with taxes.

The budget before us is directed against the family. The wealthy and the unmarried are treated with consideration but those classes of society the most in need of protection and support are burdened more heavily still.

According to a newspaper, a study by a group of economists shows that there are 150 taxes on the manufacture and sale of a lady's hat, 200 on a well-tailored dress, 120 on a man's suit and 150 on a loaf of bread.

On each package of cigarettes, the people of Chicoutimi will now pay 25 cents in taxes and over $1,000 on the purchase price of a $2,000 automobile.

For having failed to distinguish between the legal and technical aspects of our traditional economy, our politicians have passed from legitimate intervention to a deadly monopoly in the purely economic sphere. War placed all resources under government jurisdiction, it gave the state a governing hand in our economy, it transformed certain activities into public utilities and afforded an opportunity of practising paternalism, that doctrine so dear to socialists.

The dominion government always finds an excuse to lay hands on other people's money.

Since the government invaded the field of income tax in 1917, it has collected from that source a total of nearly $11 billion, to which the excess profits tax adds some $3 billion. From June 1941 to 1950, it has collected $184 million in succession duties, $30 million of which were paid in 1950. Succession duties represent the real tax on capital. Yet, we ought to maintain legacies intact and prevent the state from absorbing, bit by bit, and from one generation to the next, the wealth of the country in such a way that it can no longer maintain itself.

The moral aspect of family capital is that it represents savings, that is, privations. It represents thousands of small pleasures and diversions of which parents have deprived themselves in order to leave their children in a better position. It is immoral to tax this effort as the dominion government has done and is still doing.

It must be remembered here that the two provinces of Ontario and Quebec alone paid 73 per cent of the total of $1,300,781,000 which personal and corporation income taxes and succession duties have brought to the federal treasury in 1950. The eight other provinces paid only $346,334,000 or less than the province of Quebec alone, which paid $354,000,000.

May I be permitted, in passing, to mention that in 1948, 12,300 persons or companies from Chicoutimi county, whom it is my privilege to represent in this house, paid the federal government $2,403,000 out of a total income of $32,064,000. I might add that Chicoutimi county included, in 1948, the county of Lapointe, represented today by my hon. friend opposite. We are in fourth place among the income tax payers of the province of Quebec, after Montreal, Quebec and St. Maurice. We are therefore entitled to mention it and to voice our grievances. Why are we taxed? For war. It has become a habit with the government.

Since 1935 the Liberal party has spent billions of dollars for military purposes. War has become its specialty. The tragedy begins once more. Nothing is changed. The same actors are once again found in the principal parts. The very same generation of men and women is once more being called upon to pay in blood and money the cost of our overseas ventures. Canada has taken its place among war-mongering nations and our ministers, unable to restore peace to the world, have decided that we would participate in the Korean conflict while awaiting another theatre of operations.

The Minister of Finance is taxing us to send our young people to their death in Asia. He is taxing us to produce planes and bombs in order that our Atlantic pact commitments may be carried out. What if the old age pension is not increased, what if invalids receive no financial assistance from the state, what if urgent works are abandoned, what if people are weary of hearing talk of massacres, rations and taxes? Those are things of no concern! We will make war alongside the United States if, when and wherever they will it, against Russia or China or anybody else.

We have lived through a period when our leaders were all but ready to canonize Stalin. Today the idea is to take him down from the pedestal where our prayers had put him.

Our leaders are wise, they have much experience. Their propaganda is clever. We fought for the freedom of nations during the second world war with our friends in Moscow. We shall fight again for freedom, but against them this time and with our friends in South Korea or elsewhere. It is always in the name of liberty that people are led to slavery. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) chooses our enemies, and the Canadian people foot the bill for these changes. Our international policy is decided by dreamers who want Canada to put forth a war effort beyond her capacity and the Minister of Finance has to find the billions necessary to satisfy their unrestrained ambitions.

If those who are responsible for international policy worked as hard to ensure peace as they do to launch us on a new crusade, if the representatives who attend the meetings of the United Nations council gave more importance to moral values and to the true destiny of the world, if God held the place which belongs to Him in people's hearts and minds and at the meetings of the poor human beings who are vainly seeking a solution to the world's problems, there would be on this earth more happiness and welfare, less hardship and less tears. This armament race will be very costly.

[Mr. Gagnon.]

The crown has squandered the goods it had acquired with the money of the people from 1939 to 1945. Plants, ships, equipment, material which had cost hundreds of millions to the workers of the country have been sold for a few thousand dollars. Political favourites or privileged companies have been given, so to speak, water power installations, telephone and telegraph lines, equipment, etc. And now we must start all over again, building airfields, machine shops and other plants, once more with the people's money.

Once more, billions of dollars will be thrown to the four winds for the benefit of munition makers and international monopolistic profiteers.

I refuse to subscribe to such aims and to believe that it is on the battlefields of the Orient that we shall clinch the defeat of communism. We want peace, a noble, serene and dignified peace which will free our people of the crushing burden of taxes and allow them to progress in peace and honour. We wish to work, to suffer and to pay taxes to assure life but not death. I will therefore vote in favour of the amendment.

(Text):

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take advantage of the opportunity afforded by this debate on the budget to give hon. members of this house a brief description of my riding and to inform them of our problems and our needs, a duty which perhaps I have delayed too long.

The riding of Burin-Burgeo extends along the south coast of Newfoundland, from Cape Ray in the southwest corner to Come-By-Chance in Placentia bay and includes all the numerous islands for which this beautiful bay is noted.

History records that as far back as 1621 Placentia bay was the base of operations for the famous pirate, Captain Peter Easton, and on the picturesque island of Oderin, where he was reported to have his headquarters, a mysterious oaken floor still exists at the bottom of a small salt water pond and is considered to be one of the several engineering feats attributed to this famous sailor.

Legend has it that one of Captain Easton's ships was sunk in a battle with another famous pirate by the familiar name Cruickshank and that this shipload of treasure still rests on the ocean bottom beneath the cliffs of Cape Roger head, six miles across the bay from Oderin.

Pirate gold is also supposed to be buried in beautiful Cape Roger harbour, but all attempts to unearth it have been frustrated by mysterious water spouts. These spouts rush up through the sandy loam when the hole reaches a depth of seven or eight feet and continue to rise to a height of ten feet above sea level.

I mention these stories to emphasize the fact that Newfoundland is an old province with a history dating back centuries before that of the mainland and her communities are steeped in history and very rich in folklore.

Incidentally, I am hoping that these names may catch the attention of the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) because I have been trying for some time to have a guardian placed on Cape Roger river and if the salmon are not sufficiently important, perhaps the buried treasure might provide an added inducement.

The riding which I have the honour to represent is a veritable paradise for both the sportsman and the artist. All along the one thousand miles of coast line the scenery is magnificent. High rocky cliffs rise perpendicular to the sea in their stark naked and rugged beauty. Between these steep cliffs, so narrow as to be almost imperceptible, are numerous openings which run inland for miles, rivalling the fjords of Norway and ending in pools where beautiful salmon rivers cascade into the sea. In season these rivers and pools are teaming with salmon and salt water trout. A mile or so in the interior the country abounds with moose, caribou, partridge, rabbits and other game. The provincial government is already working to develop these natural attractions but it will take some time before they will be able to cater satisfactorily to the tourist business. Many fine salmon rivers are without protection of any kind, and it is hoped that before too long guardians will be placed not only on Cape Rogers river but on many others.

To get a picture of my riding you must visualize approximately one thousand miles of coast line studded with some 260 settlements perched close to the sea, their peaceful harbours dotted with tiny fishing boats riding at their moorings. Along the shore line nestling close to the sea the simple fishers' cottages though often poor and humble nevertheless extend unfailing welcome and boundless hospitality. In these 260 settlements live some 44,000 of the best people in the world, fisher folk who are the very salt of the earth. They live close to nature and close to their God. They ask so little from life in this age of materialism that their humility is both touching and inspiring. They ask nothing but the bare necessities of life, and I know from personal experience that for years many of them have had to be content with much less than that. It is a great honour and privilege to serve such people, and I pray that my efforts will be worthy of their trust.

When the great issue of confederation came up my constituents gave it wholehearted support. They remembered the time when they had to exist on a government dole of 7 cents a day. They remembered the relative prosperity of their brothers fishing out of Lunenburg, of their relatives settled in Halifax, Toronto and Vancouver. They remembered the nice things in Eaton's and Simpson's catalogues on which no duty would have to be paid. They remembered the coastal services which they had enjoyed fifteen and twenty years ago, and which they had to forfeit along with their responsible government. They looked at their dilapidated wharves and breakwaters upon which not a cent had been spent for fifteen or twenty years, and they thought of the public services, the navigational aids and communication system enjoyed by the maritime provinces.

Then they reasoned: Surely confederation will bring us back at least the kind of services we used to enjoy twenty and thirty years ago, and perhaps a little better. They pictured Canada as a young giant just beginning to realize his strength and eager to use it by extending a helping hand to a weaker and less fortunate brother. I mention all these things to dispel any notion that Newfoundlanders voted for confederation to get family allowances. That was something outside their experience, and many actually doubted their existence.

Two years have now passed, and what is the position today? I think that ninety per cent of the people are still satisfied that confederation was the wisest and best course. They know now that the family allowance is a reality, and they have had time to realize what a blessing it really is. Our children are now comfortably and respectably clad irrespective of family income, and school attendance has become stabilized at a much higher level, so that the benefits of family allowances alone as an investment in the youth of our province are sufficient to justify the wisdom of confederation.

The social benefits of unemployment insurance, old age pensions and pensions for the blind are other blessings that are very greatly appreciated by our people, and we hope that in time it will be possible to extend unemployment insurance to include our fishermen. Then there are the federal health benefits which I understand totalled $1 million last year. In my riding alone this has helped to provide three clinical boats whereby doctors can make periodical tours of their districts, and patients requiring hospitalization can be transported to the nearest cottage hospital to receive treatment under a provincial system of subsidized medicine. A new cottage hospital is being built at Channel with federal assistance at the rate of $1,000 per bed.

Then there are the improvements to our harbour facilities, marine installations, public wharves, breakwaters, slipways and protection works. In the majority of settlements this is the first money to be spent on public works for over fifteen years. Perhaps the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) is not used to being applauded for his efforts, but I feel that my constituents would want me to voice their appreciation to his department for the sympathetic consideration which has been given to these needs, and the improvements that are being accomplished through the untiring efforts of their district engineer and a small but efficient staff. They have not been able to accede to all our requests but it is very evident that they are carrying out a well considered plan to distribute their efforts over the whole province of Newfoundland as evenly and fairly as their limited staff and circumstances will permit. In this connection I should like to urge the Minister of Public Works to increase the staff of the Newfoundland office in order to alleviate the unfair burden which now falls upon the district engineer, and thus expedite the work of his department.

In looking back on confederation I believe that at least ninety per cent of our people, and possibly more, would appraise the benefits of confederation as I have outlined them and would feel that it was the right thing to do. That is not to say, however, that there have not been disappointments, and bitter disappointments too. The greatest disappointment of all was that the substantial reduction in our cost of living, to which all had looked forward with such great expectations, failed to materialize. This was due to a rise in prices on the mainland which coincided with the date of union, together with the fact that Canadian National Railways chose to take advantage of loose wording in the terms of union to apply a system of freight rates far in excess of the preferential maritime rates which everyone, including those who negotiated and signed the terms of union, understood would apply to Newfoundland. Recently the board of transport commissioners decided this question in favour of Newfoundland, but in the meantime Newfoundlanders had paid several million dollars more than they would otherwise have paid on goods brought into the province. Mail and passenger service have improved considerably, but in spite of the improvement they are not a great deal better than the service Newfoundlanders enjoyed twenty or thirty years ago, before they were forced to give up responsible government.

Several new post offices have been opened in my riding and a fairly satisfactory service has been extended to other settlements by including them in rural water routes, a kind of travelling post office. We are grateful to the Postmaster General (Mr. Rinfret) and his efficient staff for these improvements, and for the courteous and sympathetic consideration his officials give to all our requests. However, many difficulties and even hardships arise from the fact that regulations governing postal operations on the mainland are not at all applicable to Newfoundland. A good example of this is a regulation requiring a distance of two miles between post offices. This may be all right on the mainland where settlements are connected by road, but in Newfoundland very few settlements are connected by road. In order to get to a post office one must launch a boat and row over two miles of salt water. That is quite a different matter. When the men are away fishing the women and children have to do this. In view of the hardships and dangers involved, especially in stormy weather, I feel that this regulation should be relaxed or eliminated altogether as far as Newfoundland is concerned.

Then there is the system of remuneration, which is based upon the sale of stamps. On the mainland there is probably a direct relationship between the value of the stamps sold and the amount of work the postmaster has to do. In Newfoundland there is no such relationship, because the incoming mail is usually ten to fifteen times greater than the outgoing. Family allowances have made ready cash available to parents, and a large proportion of that cash finds its way to the mail order houses. As a result the number of incoming parcels has multiplied many times. This state of affairs is likely to continue indefinitely. This increased mail order business has resulted in increased c.o.d. deliveries, insured parcels, money orders and so on, all of which have no relation at all to the stamps sold. In addition, some postmasters have to sort and distribute mail for other smaller offices which sell their own stamps. As a consequence of all these factors which do not obtain to the same degree on the mainland, the system of remuneration based upon stamp revenue is very unfair to Newfoundland postmasters. The same is true of rental rates of post office accommodation. Probably the maximum rates are satisfactory; but when you consider that in Newfoundland soft coal costs $25 per ton, the minimum rate of $1 per month is very low when heat, light and cleaning have to be provided as well.

While I am on this subject I should like to bring to the attention of this house the plight in which our 437 postmaster-telegraphers find themselves as a result of confederation. Prior to confederation they were civil servants and as such enjoyed certain privileges such as sick leave with pay and vacations with relief operators supplied at government expense. Today as a result of confederation, though their pension rights are safeguarded by the terms of union, they have lost their civil service status and their sick leave and vacation privileges, which had considerable value in terms of dollars and cents. As a result most postmaster-telegraphers are not able to take an annual vacation for the simple reason that they cannot afford to pay travelling, board and salary expenses for a relief operator, and in consequence their health is beginning to suffer. More serious still is the plight of those who need medical treatment, surgical operations and hospitalization, and must do without because they cannot afford the cost of a relief operator.

The sad thing about this whole affair is that now no one has any responsibility for them. The Canadian National Telegraphs regard them as postmasters. They are not telegraph employees, because the telegraph company merely rents their services from the Post Office Department. On the other hand the stamp revenue is too small to qualify them as full-time postmasters, so they are only part-time postmasters and part-time telegraphers, through between the two they are full-time employees and have more than a full-time job.

There is also the erroneous idea that the salaries of these people have increased considerably since confederation. Even if this were true it would be only fair and right because the work they have to do has multiplied many times, but from my own investigation I know it is not true. About one-third are actually better off. Another third have received increases just about sufficient to offset the loss of free vacations and sick leave with pay. The remainder get exactly the same salary as before, but the loss of sick leave and vacations with pay makes them definitely worse off than before confederation. Furthermore, their telegraph duties require them to work overtime and on Sundays, for which they are unable to claim any extra remuneration. I hope the ministers concerned will do everything possible to find a remedy for this situation because this state of affairs, while it may conform to a strict, literal interpretation of the terms of union, is definitely not in accord with the spirit of union nor with the spirit embodied in the terms of union.

Another big disappointment is the lack of Canadian National Telegraph service to smaller settlements. Most of these communities expected that confederation would restore those telegraphic and telephonic communications which they enjoyed some twenty years or more ago but which they lost along with their responsible government. These hopes have not been realized, and worse still there seems to be little chance that they will ever be realized, because Canadian National Telegraphs is organized to operate on a profit basis and most of these small offices would operate at a loss.

On the other hand there is a definite need for these telegraph and telephone services, a need all the more urgent because of lack of roads and other means of communication. We all know that a good system of telecommunications is absolutely essential to progress. In my province it is also essential to offset the handicap of isolation, to send a call for medical aid in time of sickness or accidents, to enable the bank fisherman to contact his family when his ship puts into port. How can we measure human values in terms of dollars and cents? Of what significance is a monetary deficit when human lives are at stake? During the last war these little offices were the means of saving the lives of many of our airmen who had to make forced landings in out of the way places. They were also the means of forwarding much valuable information to defence headquarters concerning submarines and other suspicious craft. In fact, the excellent work done by the aircraft detection corps would have been utterly impossible without the aid of these small stations. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that these small telegraph and telephone stations constitute an essential part of our defence program. This fact alone is sufficient to justify an expansion of the system. The importance of these small telegraph offices cannot be judged in terms of their revenue, because without them the revenues of the larger offices would be much less. It was gratifying to me to learn in a recent committee on railways and shipping that the Canadian National Telegraph Company has now initiated a definite policy with regard to the expansion of these services.

The coastal services of the Canadian National Railways have increased their frequency to a little better than that enjoyed twenty years ago, but the number of ports served still totals only 73 out of 260. The ship used on the Placentia bay service has accommodation for only eight passengers, while the number requiring transportation averages around 30. I travelled on this ship and saw the terrible conditions that obtain. Passengers are forced to sit up all night huddled together in narrow alleyways or crouching on their suitcases. How could anyone with red blood in his veins help but feel a sense of indignation at seeing his fellow men subjected to such treatment? Conditions during stormy weather and the winter season are beyond description. They are made bearable only by the skill of the captain and his crew, and their general solicitude for their fellow man which often compels them to give up their berths to passengers thus sacrificing their own much needed rest and comfort.

I am satisfied that the local management is in no way to blame for this state of affairs. The blame rests with the mainland offices where policy in these matters is decided by people who, I believe, are fully aware of this situation. I realize that it must be a terrible dilemma to the Canadian National Railways to be required to operate as a private enterprise on one hand and as a public utility on the other, but nevertheless, for humanitarian reasons, these conditions which I have described from personal experience should not be permitted to exist.

The urgent need of at least three small passenger and cargo boats is apparent when it is realized that the Canadian National Railways in Newfoundland not only do not have sufficient passenger boats to take care of present traffic, but they have no spare boat in reserve in case of accident or emergency. Should one of the present ships be lost, the whole coastal service would collapse. To make matters worse, one of the ships now in service is over fifty years old and is due to be retired; another is approaching retirement age. We are all very pleased that a new ferry is being provided for the gulf service, but there is serious doubt of the wisdom of building at this time such a large ship as contemplated, requiring such extensive terminal facilities, harbour installations and improvements. Experienced captains and navigators have expressed serious doubts as to whether such a large ship can be safely manoeuvred during bad weather in the small space available in the terminal port.

On my way to attend this session I was met by a delegation from Channel and Port aux Basques, who felt that the proposed change in the location of terminals would have an adverse effect on the life of these twin towns. They expressed surprise and indignation that Canadian National Railways should finalize plans for such extensive changes without even consulting the town council or some local organization. I believe it would be wiser to build a smaller ferry, which in conjunction with the ships now in service would be big enough to take care of the peak load traffic but still small enough to use present installations. The money saved would provide for the coastal service those smaller ships which are needed just as urgently as the new ferry. Later on a second ferry might be provided if the need arose. The ships that the new ferry is supposed to release are not suitable for the coastal service because they are too big for most of the harbours and cannot be operated economically in that type of service.

In view of the important part played by the merchant navy in the two world wars, the provision of these small ships could be regarded as almost an essential part of our defence preparation. Because the need is so urgent, I plead with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) to give serious consideration to these proposals.

Related to this subject is the case of wharfingers, of whom there are a considerable number. Prior to confederation the Newfoundland government paid these people for the handling of government-owned packages for the federal government without ingers have been required to handle parckages for the federal government without any remuneration whatever. It does not seem right morally, and it is certainly not democracy, that any person should be required to work for nothing or to give his services for nothing, even to the national government. I understand that statutory authority is lacking whereby the government is able to make such payments, but surely that is a simple matter to remedy. I trust that this little problem will be solved on the basis of what is right, rather than what is legal.

We are grateful, too, for what the Department of Transport has done to improve our navigational aids. But many more fog alarms, gas and whistle buoys and radio beacons are needed to afford our fishermen a standard of protection comparable to that enjoyed by the maritime provinces.

A few weeks ago my good friend the member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne) described to this house the terrible plight of our inshore fishermen owing to the market price of salt cod dropping from an average of $14 per quintal in 1949 to an average of $7 per quintal in 1950. Some received even less than that. The cost of living is still on the increase, and we hope that steps will be taken to ensure that our inshore fishermen receive a fair return for their catch. In Ottawa fresh cod retails for 39 cents per pound, yet the fisherman receives only 3 or 4 cents per pound. Salt cod retails at 49 cents per pound, and the fisherman gets 10 to 12 cents per pound. I should explain, Mr. Speaker, that this fish is from the maritimes and not from Newfoundland. I understand that mainland firms are reluctant to buy Newfoundland fish from the marketing organization known as NAFEL. It is difficult to believe that processing and transportation can account for such tremendous price spreads. I feel that this is a situation which might well be investigated under the combines act.

In his reference to merchants, I am sure that the member for St. John's West did not intend to imply that all merchants exploit the fishermen. Possibly some do, but there are many who do not. Many merchants have invested their profits in the fishery and sustained heavy losses in the interests of the fishermen. There are also many smaller shopkeepers who take staggering risks in supplying for the fishery, and they get only a small commission for collecting the fish for the exporters.

Recently the restriction on the shooting of turrs was debated in this house. This is also another matter of great concern to our people for which we hope a satisfactory solution can be obtained.

I mention all these matters, Mr. Speaker, not in any spirit of complaining, but because they are a source of real dissatisfaction to a large number of my constituents and I feel I would be failing in my duty if I did not direct attention to them. Trivial though they may appear to be, nevertheless they are very important because they concern people and they represent points where our people feel that democracy has ceased to identify itself with their needs.

When Lincoln defined democracy as government of the people, by the people and for the people, he left no doubt that concern for people constitutes the very essence of democracy. Like the Sabbath, democracy was made for man and not man for democracy. I think we sometimes tend to forget this great truth. When we set up a democratic machine and try to fit man into it, when we subordinate man to profits, to political considerations, to expediency or to any other thing, how much better are we than the Kremlin which sets up the state above the individual?

We may have all the exterior trappings of democracy; we may go through the democratic motions as often as we like; but unless we are motivated by a genuine care for the needs of mankind, in our own land and everywhere else, we do not have true democracy and we fool nobody, except perhaps ourselves.

I hope that the government will be able to give favourable consideration to the matters which I have brought to their attention and which mean so much to my people. We realize that our coastal and telegraph services cannot be brought up to standard overnight; but those conditions—such as those with regard to the postmaster-telegraphers, the wharfingers, the Placentia bay coastal boat service, and the postal regulations—which are causing such unnecessary hardship should be remedied at once. Immediate action is necessary to convince our people that government is not indifferent to their needs and to restore their faith in democracy.

I should like to repeat that we are grateful for what has been done so far and we appreciate the benefits of confederation, particularly the social benefits; because we are like our brothers from Quebec in that our Newfoundland families are extremely close knit.

Here, Mr. Speaker, as an English-speaking Canadian I should like to say to my French-speaking colleagues how grateful I am for them and for the people they represent. Their way of life and the emphasis which they have always placed on those deep spiritual values symbolized by the home, the church, family ties and simplicity of life, give them much in common with the people of my own province. I should like to say that we Newfoundlanders are proud to join with them and with the other provinces in working out, under God, the true destiny of our young and vigorous nation.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the true destiny of our nation is to give to the world a demonstration of true democracy—an inspired democracy that will capture the hearts and minds of the millions in Asia, in India, in Africa, and in Europe who are now searching for a form of government that will meet all their needs and aspirations. These millions leave no room for doubt that they are not at all impressed by the brand of democracy that we have demonstrated to them to date.

This new democracy, this true democracy, will put people before things and service before profits. Industry and business, management and labour, will be inspired by a motive higher than profits; and out of their sense of responsibility for the nation and their caring for the needs of people will come that creative thinking which will solve our housing problems and stabilize the purchasing power of our dollar. The labourer will give an honest day's work in return for an honest day's pay, and the individual production of real wealth will increase. Instead of shortages there will be abundance for all our own needs and plenty left over to give to those who have not. Along with our gifts we will give our hearts so that our assistance may have a spiritual value as well as a material value.

Freedom of enterprise will not be the freedom of the jungle. There will be no strikes because all disputes will be settled on a basis of what is right instead of who is right. There will be no poverty because when everyone cares enough and shares enough, everyone will have enough. Honest prices and honest profits along with increased production per man will lower the cost of living. Communism will wither in the face of this superior idea by which it will be outmoded and outlived. Self control in the individual, which in its highest form is God control, will make government controls unnecessary; because the more that people govern themselves, the less they have to be governed.

Government will present issues to the people on a moral basis instead of on an economic, legal or political basis and people will be taken into partnership with government and fully briefed for the part they have to play. Individuals and organized groups will not bargain with their votes nor try to impose their will on the nation, nor will they seek advantages at the expense of others.

In parliament there will be total honesty between parties and between members: total honesty in debate, honesty of motives and honest admission of mistakes and failures. We can best preserve peace by removing the causes of war, and most of the causes of war, Mr. Speaker, lie within ourselves. This new order cannot be built without sacrifice. Temporarily we may have to sacrifice our standard of living. We shall certainly have to sacrifice our greed, our selfishness, our ambition and our comparative moral standards. We cannot build a new world and retain the old evils. We shall all have to change; because as I am, so is my nation. We shall have to learn to live on a basis of absolute moral standards. We shall have to match our external defence program by developing our internal defences of moral and spiritual strength; and we can do that only by exercising moral judgment and by making moral decisions.

[Mr. Carter.]

This, Mr. Speaker, is my idea of true democracy. This is my blueprint for a new Canada. This I believe is Canada's true destiny. These are the things I want to fight for in my home, in my riding, in my province and in this parliament.

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): In my first words, Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the hon. member from the tenth province on his wonderful address with reference to his constituency and the province of Newfoundland. I must say that I enjoyed it greatly indeed; but I want to give him this warning. If he expects this government to fulfil the terms of confederation, he will have to be on tap each session and demand the fulfilment of each one of those terms. This I know from past experience with reference to the province of Prince Edward Island.

Canada is taking part in the present momentous struggle with communism. Military preparedness must play a large part in the administration of this government. Hence the huge budget presented to this house on Tuesday, April 10, by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). It is equally important that our domestic problems are not entirely neglected; for instance, unemployment, old age pensioners, retired pensioners, the incapacitated and the helpless. Many of these are on starvation allowances at the present time. Without any interference with military preparedness, but by real co-operation, we could become producers by using our manpower who are not physically fit for military purposes or military training, and we could thus continue —and I address this remark to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier)—public works and other essentials both for war and for peace.

A question arises, and it is heard quite often: Is Canada at war? The answer to that question by some people is yes, and by other people it is no. We have had no declaration of war since 1939 when Canada declared war. But on the other hand, we have never had a declaration of peace; therefore we must still be at war. At any rate, our soldiers and airmen are fighting today; our men are in training; our sailors and our marines are all in the fray, and we are having casualties announced among our men, and some of them have made the supreme sacrifice. I repeat we must still be at war. Still our government is making great preparations, and I hope they are making preparations for a global war, which I also hope may never come.

I am glad to note that in this budget debate Mr. Speaker has allowed a very wide latitude of discussion. This enables one to speak with reference to his own province and his own constituency. The budget is remarkable in a great many ways. Some of the statements that we have seen in the press since the budget was brought down have called it by a great many varied names. One of them was that it is a most senseless budget. When one looks at it he considers that there are many things in it, and also many surprises. When the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. White) was speaking the other night I noticed he said that one of the surprises to him was the discriminatory taxation on the fur industry. Another great surprise to me was that I did not find, either in the estimates or in the speech of the minister, any amount included for damages to Prince Edward Island because of the railway strike.

The legislative assembly of Prince Edward Island in an emergency session called on September 7, 1950, asked that the dominion government be assessed owing to the failure of the government to keep the Borden-Tormentine ferry in operation during the railway strike. It was a surprise to me that no reference was made to it in the budget, and I am inclined to believe that the Minister of Finance did not know that there was an election in sight in the province of Prince Edward Island, or a reference to it would have been made in the budget, or in the estimates.

Budgets come and budgets go. Since two of them have gone by I must say that there is some record in connection with this one. The minister has the record of producing three budgets in a year and thirteen days. I think this is a record that no other minister of finance of Canada has ever held. The first two are gone with the wind, and this one is remarkable in several ways. The budget is being criticized; yet it is claimed by the government side that it is a budget for economy. Perhaps it is, but I do not wish them to economize to the detriment of commitments they have made, which should be fulfilled.

I suppose the Minister of Public Works will now blame the Minister of Finance because public works such as the dominion building in Charlottetown, which has been promised for four years and more—in fact at the last two elections—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Did the hon. member promise it?

Mr. McLure: I suppose it will be postponed until the eve of another election.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am told the hon. member promised it.

Mr. McLure: I did not hear the minister.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am informed that the hon. member promised that public building to the people there.

Mr. McLure: I sure did; I really and honestly believed what the minister said.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You can have faith in me.

Mr. McLure: We are waiting, and there has been no statement yet with regard to what we are to have there. I do hope that even after this budget the Minister of Public Works will get together with the Minister of Finance and treat my constituency and my province in regard to public works in the same way as he is treating his own province and his own constituency.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We are doing a little more for the hon. member's province.

Mr. McLure: I suppose that must be treated as a hope. I might add, Mr. Speaker, that with all the power vested, as it is, in the ministers of the crown, when they start making arrangements for preparedness for war, I hope that they make a list of the provinces that have had nothing to do with the preparation for war, the supplying of materials for war—I am now speaking of the last war—and give them an opportunity to do some of that work at this time. For instance, I am hoping that Prince Edward Island will have an opportunity. During the last war, out of the hundreds of millions of dollars spent for war purposes, Prince Edward Island received something less than one-tenth of one per cent of the disbursements made to the upper provinces.

For years we have been struggling to get some further fulfilment of the terms of union. Now that provision is being made to spend vast sums of money, as set out in the estimates, for the erection of new plants, and the taking over of plants already in existence, this might be an opportune time for the government to implement the recommendations of the Andrew Rae Duncan commission of 1926. I have mentioned this matter before in connection with harbour improvements at Charlottetown, and the important recommendation respecting the marine railway slip at that city.

This marine railway slip should have been built long ago. It has been promised to us by all governments. Now would be the opportune time to have it built, because it would give our machine shops and foundries an opportunity in these days of preparation for war to do certain work on boats they have thus far been unable to do because of the lack of the marine railway slip. With the marine railway slip we could take care of the repairs connected with the Borden-Tormentine ferry service, and repairs to the boats on the Wood Island-Caribou route. In addition to that there are in service boats such as the Brant, the Saurel and others, that are laid up during the winter, or are performing other tasks in the maritime provinces. In servicing these boats, in addition to smaller craft such as tugs, we would have a source of employment for, according to the estimate, some two hundred men annually. I say that now would be the time to make that expenditure so as to provide a service absolutely essential to Charlottetown. We need it so as to give employment to the men in the machine shops.

At the time of the last war we did obtain a few small subcontracts for the repairing of corvettes. Our men did an excellent job in all the work they had to do. However there was some work below the waterline they were not permitted to do. If some of the government contracts are to be decentralized, if some of the centralization which has worked to the detriment of the maritime provinces is to be eliminated, we would ask at this time consideration in respect to the building of this marine railway slip.

During the last war we did make repairs to some marine boats, and I am glad to say departmental records show that the workmanship was satisfactory, and that the cost of repairs done in the machine shops and foundries at Charlottetown was less than at any other point where similar repairs were done. This point in itself should be of interest to the government, and afford us an opportunity to have these public works built in Prince Edward Island, and more particularly in the city of Charlottetown.

I should like to say a few words on another matter. During the last war money was spent recklessly indeed. It was spent as Monte Carlo gamblers would have spent it, and without any incentive, apparently, to look after more than a few of the provinces of Canada while, at the same time, making it more difficult for the rest of us. However in Prince Edward Island when soldiers, sailors, fliers, food, bond purchasers and more taxes were required the people of that province did more per capita than those of any other province in Canada. That is a record of which we are proud, notwithstanding the fact that we were not given any work so that we might keep the labouring element of our population at home. They had to follow the contracts to cities in other provinces.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

[Mr. McLure.]

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

RUTHENIAN GREEK CATHOLIC EPISCOPAL CORPORATION OF CANADA

Mr. A. F. Macdonald (Edmonton East) moved the second reading of Bill No. 174, respecting the Ruthenian Greek Catholic Episcopal Corporation of Canada.

Mr. Green: Could we have an explanation?

Mr. Macdonald (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, the Ruthenian Greek Catholic Episcopal Corporation of Canada was incorporated by chapter 191, 3-4 George V, 1913, being a church under the jurisdiction of the Roman pontiff but following the Greek rite or liturgy rather than the Latin rite. The adherents of this church were originally made up of immigrants to Canada from the Ukraine, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Russia and other Slavic countries of eastern Europe.

Since 1913 these people have developed into fine Canadian citizens, a fact which is recognized universally throughout the country. Originally they settled in Manitoba and the other prairie provinces, but since that time these people and their descendants have spread throughout all the provinces of Canada. As a result of this great increase in their numbers, the Holy See has established two new dioceses, one for eastern Canada with a bishop resident in Toronto, and the other for western Canada with a bishop resident in Edmonton. The third diocese is the original diocese which now has spiritual jurisdiction over central Canada with a resident archbishop in Winnipeg. The apostolic jurisdiction of the archbishop resident in Winnipeg is now restricted to the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and the sections of the Northwest Territories immediately to the north of those provinces.

As hon. members are aware, bills have also been introduced at the present session of parliament for the incorporation of the Ukrainian diocese of western Canada and for the Ukrainian diocese of eastern Canada, and are before the house at the present time. The purpose of this particular bill is to amend the original incorporating act which applied to all of Canada before the inauguration of the new dioceses, to change the name of the corporation to a name appropriate to the diocese of central Canada, and to make other minor amendments in the 1913 act of incorporation so as to accord to the diocese of central Canada rights and powers corresponding to those given to episcopal corporations by parliament in recent years.

The bill also provides for the change of name of the corporation to "The Ukrainian Catholic Episcopal Corporation of Central Canada." I understand that the term "Ukrainian" is preferred to the term "Ruthenian" and, I am informed, more correctly describes the adherents of this church. The term "Greek" is being omitted from the name as that term, while it describes the rite, has been misinterpreted as indicating the place of origin of these people.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

UKRAINIAN CATHOLIC EPISCOPAL CORPORATION OF WESTERN CANADA

Mr. A. F. Macdonald (Edmonton East) moved the second reading of Bill No. 175, to incorporate the Ukrainian Catholic Episcopal Corporation of Western Canada.

Mr. Green: Could we also have an explanation of this bill?

Mr. Macdonald (Edmonton East): As has been stated in connection with Bill No. 174 which has just been accorded second reading, the Ruthenian Greek Catholic Episcopal Corporation was incorporated in 1913. The church has increased very materially in numbers since that time. In consequence of this increase, the church has been divided into three dioceses each presided over by a bishop. In order to properly administer the property, business and temporal affairs of each diocese, incorporation is desirable.

The purpose of the present bill is to incorporate the diocese of western Canada which is presided over by His Excellency Bishop Savaryn at Edmonton. The diocese includes the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia, the Yukon Territory and the areas in the Northwest Territories immediately north of Alberta and British Columbia. As hon. members will observe, the bill contains the clauses customarily granted by parliament on the incorporation of a religious diocese respecting bylaws, holding of real property, transfer of property, borrowing and investment powers. I suggest that the bill be accorded second reading and referred to the committee on miscellaneous private bills where an explanation of the powers sought will be given.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

UKRAINIAN CATHOLIC EPISCOPAL CORPORATION OF EASTERN CANADA

Mr. H. P. Cavers (Lincoln) moved the second reading of Bill No. 176, to incorporate the Ukrainian Catholic Episcopal Corporation of Eastern Canada.

Mr. Lennard: I might say I have no objection to this bill—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Lincoln.

Mr. Lennard: I was merely asking for an explanation.

Mr. Cavers: Mr. Speaker, this bill is presented on the petition of His Excellency Bishop Borecky who presides over the diocese of eastern Canada for the Ukrainian Catholic Episcopal Corporation. The bishop resides in Toronto, and his spiritual jurisdiction extends to the provinces of Ontario, Quebec, the maritime provinces and Newfoundland. By this bill it is sought to confer corporate entity on the diocese, and it is in accord with the usual form for the establishment of a diocese of this kind. The petitioner requests the powers in the bill to administer their property, to carry on the ordinary business of the diocese and the temporal affairs of the corporation, which are generally the management and control of the various officers, agents and servants of the corporation. I would suggest that the bill be accorded second reading and referred to the committee on miscellaneous private bills.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

MERCANTILE AND GENERAL REINSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. H. P. Cavers (Lincoln) moved the second reading of Bill No. 177, to incorporate the Mercantile and General Reinsurance Company of Canada Limited.

Mr. Fulton: Could we have an explanation of this bill?

Mr. Cavers: This bill seeks to give incorporation to a company now carrying on business in England, which is known by a similar name. This company seeks to carry on its legitimate business of insurance and reinsurance in Canada, as they have been doing for some years in England. They merely seek subsidiary powers to carry on the reinsurance business in Canada. The types of insurance it is sought to carry on are fire insurance, accident insurance, aircraft insurance, automobile insurance, guarantee insurance and the usual types of business falling within the scope of that type of company. The bill is drawn in accordance with the requirements of the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, and carries the approval of the superintendent of insurance. The bill provides that substantial amounts will be deposited with the superintendent of insurance before the company commences to do business in this country.

I would therefore suggest that the bill be accorded second reading and referred to the committee on miscellaneous private bills.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I should like to make a few remarks on this bill and to ask the hon. member who introduced it if he will be kind enough when closing the debate on second reading to reply to some questions of a general nature which I should like to place before him.

Personally I welcome this bill, which on its face seems to simply seek to incorporate in Canada a company presently incorporated in the United Kingdom and which no doubt is already doing business in this country. I think that is a desirable thing to have done with these companies which at the moment are unincorporated branches of companies in other countries. I believe they should be incorporated in this country, because then shares will have to be offered to the public in Canada, and there will be Canadian directors and so on. This suggests two things. The first is the confidence of these companies in the future of Canada. The second is an increasing degree of control by Canadians over the affairs of corporations doing business in this country. These are both healthy trends, in my opinion.

The questions I should like to address to the hon. member who introduced the bill are these. First, what is the dollar volume of the annual business presently being done by the company in Canada, on the basis of which I presume it seeks incorporation? I do not imagine that if the company were doing only a small or relatively negligible amount of business in this country it would consider it worth while to incorporate. I should imagine the company hopes and intends to increase the volume of its business in Canada. If that is the object I think it is a desirable one. It is the object which on the face of it I attached to the desire to incorporate, and I should like confirmation of that fact and information as to the present volume of business being done.

Then I notice that all the persons seeking incorporation are residents of the city of Toronto. I should like to know whether any of these persons are at present directors of the company in England, or whether any person in Canada has been appointed a director of the British company. Then, coming as I do from western Canada, where we have a great interest in industrial and commercial enterprise and expansion of all sorts I should like to know whether at present the company does any substantial amount of business in western Canada and whether, in view of the increased interest the company is showing in this country, it intends to make an effort to extend its business in the west. I suppose I have certain misgivings consequent upon the fact that according to section 1 of the bill all these gentlemen are from Toronto, and I wonder if they have that intimate knowledge of and unbounded confidence in the growth of western Canada in general and British Columbia in particular which is felt by those of us who know that country well.

Mr. Gibson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the questions the hon. member is addressing to the sponsor of this bill would not more appropriately be asked in the committee to which the bill would be referred later.

Mr. Cruickshank: Speaking to the point of order, apparently there are a few members of this committee who are not as interested in protecting the interests of western Canada as others are. This is the only opportunity the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) will have to obtain this information. Many of us from western Canada are vitally interested in these matters. I was particularly interested, for instance, in the question of the volume of business being done in western Canada, and I was also interested in whether or not any Canadians are directors of the British company.

Mr. Fulton: I quite appreciate that it is not proper to have questions and answers at this stage, but I would point out that here we are being asked for approval of the principle on second reading.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): And you approved that in your opening sentence.

Mr. Fulton: That involves the adoption of a motion by this house. My approval would be based upon certain conclusions I have drawn from the nature of the bill itself, because we have not had a very extensive explanation by the hon. member who introduced it. Therefore before I give my formal approval to second reading I should like the answers to those questions, to confirm or otherwise the conclusions I have drawn. That is why I am putting these questions. I do not intend to take up much time or to talk out the bill, even if that were possible. I just want to place certain questions and general conclusions before the hon. member which I would like him to either confirm or deny, following which I will be able to make up my mind as to whether or not I, as one member of this house, should approve the bill on second reading.

Mr. Speaker: On the point of order, I might say there is some substance in the point raised by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson). However, I think I should allow the questions to stand. The hon. member who is introducing the bill may not have the information, and it might be more appropriate to get the information in committee. If the hon. member can answer the questions, I think he should be given an opportunity of doing so. At this time I might say that I do not think the questions should be repeated by other hon. members, but the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) has asked the questions and I will allow them to stand.

Mr. Fulton: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. There is one other matter on which I should like to make some remarks. In introducing the bill the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Cavers) referred to the carrying on of a general insurance business. That raises in my mind a question which is perhaps not very material, but on which he might enlighten me. I notice the name under which the company seeks incorporation is the Mercantile and General Reinsurance Company of Canada Limited. Of course, there is a fairly substantial difference between a straight insurance business, where a company accepting a direct risk charges for that risk a premium which is higher or lower in proportion as the risk is greater or less. There is quite a difference between that and the business of reinsurance where some companies who have issued policies of insurance accepting risk turn around to other groups and ask them if they will reinsure the company against a loss under the policy issued. It is quite a different type of business, and quite a different type of risk, in so far as reinsurance is concerned. The name of the company would give the impression it is going to undertake only the business of reinsurance. I would ask the hon. member who introduced the bill and made the statement, which seemed to me to imply the company was going to carry on the business of general insurance, whether there is a limitation. Does the company intend to undertake all forms of insurance, both direct and reinsurance, or will it confine its activities to one form or the other? If the hon. member can give the answers to those questions, Mr. Speaker, I for one would find them helpful indeed in making up my mind as to how to vote on the motion for second reading.

Mr. J. H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, any insurance company will carry on a business of reinsurance. Quite often a primary writer is asked to reinsure a risk, and he will take part of that risk. To handicap this insurance company applying for a reinsurance charter by asking the representatives to state whether they are ever going into the primary writing of insurance seems hardly fair. I do not think any group organizing a company would like to pin themselves down by saying they did not intend in the future to write primary risks. They are asking for a charter now to start as a reinsurance company. As a matter of fact, practically every primary writing insurance company does a reinsurance business today.

Mr. Fulton: On a question of privilege; I am sure the hon. member would not want to take from my words an inference which was not there or which I did not intend. I did not intend to suggest that this company should be restricted to one or the other type of business. I merely asked for information as to whether they desired to restrict themselves to one or the other type of business. I was not able to gather clearly from the remarks of the hon. member who introduced the bill what was intended, and that was my only purpose in asking the question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member for Lincoln speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Cavers: Mr. Speaker, in answer to the question directed to me by the member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) as regards the amount of insurance which this company may undertake or which is now carried on by the company, section 7 (1) of the act provides that the company shall not commence any business of insurance until $250,000 of its capital stock has been bona fide subscribed. With regard to the amount of insurance that is already being done in this country, I am not in a position to say now how much is in force, but I would be prepared to have available for the hon. member in committee stage the amount of insurance that is now being carried.

With regard to the incorporators, it will be noted that all the incorporators reside in the city of Toronto. These gentlemen are also all solicitors, and I assume that I do not have to remind him that probably they are the original incorporators of the company. I am not able to give any undertaking as to whether they have or have not any shares in the English company. However, I think that, as solicitors, they are entitled to apply for incorporation. I hope that will be a sufficient answer to that question.

So far as western business is concerned, I am not able to say whether the company have any western business, but I am sure if they undertake to carry on business in Canada they will wish to carry on business in all parts of Canada. I am sure that they will be anxious to go into western Canada where very much fine business is done. No doubt they will wish to avail themselves of the opportunity of obtaining that business.

Speaking of the reinsurance features, I probably did not make myself clear. I think the bill in which incorporation is sought for this company provides not only for the right to reinsurance but also the right to carry on those types of insurance that are set out in section 6.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

SECOND READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Mr. H. W. Winkler (Lisgar) moved that the following bills be read the second time:

Bill No. 178, for the relief of Leah Berniker Berger—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 179, for the relief of Betty Suffrin Sher—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 180, for the relief of Muriel Violet Marcella Barkas Sauve—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 181, for the relief of Lois Christine Flemming Foster—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 182, for the relief of Joseph Napoleon Romeo Moisan—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 183, for the relief of Catherine Veronica Joynt Bragdon—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 184, for the relief of Sarah Alice Thompson Getzler—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 185, for the relief of Grace Andersen Hallam—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 186, for the relief of Edna May Walker Green—Mr. Winkler.

Bill No. 187, for the relief of Donald George Story—Mr. Winkler.

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to have these bills read separately. There is a reason for that. I understand that it is not possible otherwise to ask questions and obtain the information I should like to have concerning each bill. I am sure there are other members of the house who would like to have this information as well. For instance, I fully expect the member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson) to speak along the same line.

I want to know, Mr. Speaker, how many children there are. I am giving an example of the type of information I want. I understand I cannot ask such questions if the bills are grouped. I should like to obtain this necessary information in connection with each one of these bills. I want to know how many children there are in the families, and what provision has been made for their education, both spiritual and academic. I am sure that other hon. members, particularly those from the province from which these bills come, desire to have this information to report to their constituents. I should like, Mr. Speaker, to have each bill read separately.

(Translation):

Mr. Paul E. Gagnon (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, once again I wish to oppose the enactment of this legislation designed to dissolve the marriage bonds and increase the number of divorces in Canada.

According to statistics that appeared in the newspapers recently, there are fewer divorces in Canada this year. Let us rejoice over the good news.

Our duty as members of parliament, however, consists in enacting legislation that is not at cross purposes with moral law. We must protect institutions considered sacred by the Catholic church, the United church and many others.

The rule decreeing that marriage is indissoluble may seem harsh, yet it was made in man's interest. It is the best ally and indispensable guardian of family happiness. It provides for a solid foundation of the home, even before the house comes into being, since it leads those planning to marry to prepare for their future carefully.

The young man and the young woman who know that marriage is indissoluble, who have a sense of responsibility, do not doubt for an instant that marriage is something particularly great and important, to be entered into only after serious preparation.

At a time when the world is morally adrift, one has to be strong enough to go against the current. We must show ourselves fearless defenders of the family. Let our actions, and especially our legislation, impress upon those around us the greatness and beauty of Christian marriage. I believe that in doing so, we shall effectively promote the prosperity of the country, the happiness of our fellow countrymen and the salvation of their souls.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): It is well known, Mr. Speaker, that I am not in favour of divorce. But these bills have been thoroughly examined by a committee of intelligent members of the other place, and I do not think that we are showing good judgment by not passing them. The thing that concerns me is not the situation when a couple comes to the place where they seek divorce. I think it is the duty of every member of this house and of every dignitary in the church to kill the thing that causes divorce, whatever that thing is. Whether it is selfishness on the part of one or of the other or whether it is a habit that creeps into the home, that thing should be crushed; and that is the thing that concerns us.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who has just taken his seat has provoked my thoughts on this subject. He says he is opposed to divorce. So am I. But it is a rather peculiar situation to have the House of Commons constituted as the court of last instance which puts the final O.K. on divorce bills, accepting them like a pipe line—the whole stream of them—without ever having seen anything of the evidence, or examined it in any way, shape or form. Notwithstanding that fact, we are the people who say, in the final analysis, that these divorces are granted equally. I just cannot understand that situation.

The hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank), who wisely and courageously on many occasions rises in his place in this house and asks for the details of anything that affects the country, I think was well advised tonight when he stood up and said that at least these bills should be taken one at a time. If we have not the time to examine these bills, understand them, and make an intelligent decision on them, then we have not any right to have them here. In that connection, may I say that not so long ago there was introduced into this house a bill that had for its purpose the removal of divorce bills as such from the House of Commons and from the other place and the transferring of that responsibility not to a court in the province from which these bills come, and which is opposed to a divorce court, but to a federal court that is already established. If that were done, men who are trained in law and who understand this subject would be handling these bills and it would be done without the cost that there is today in connection with them. I think they could be handled much more cheaply in that way and without the undue publicity that there is now all through the country. This evidence goes out in book form. These cases make the best true stories that you could pick up. We argue in the house for that kind of thing, not because I believe in divorce—because I do not—but simply because I think it would make this matter much cleaner and would move it into a court administered by trained personnel, men who are better qualified than we are to make decisions.

I hate to sit in this house and be a member who accepts all of these bills en bloc and joins in putting the final O.K. of the House of Commons on them, when I have not seen the evidence and do not know whether or not these bills should be granted. For a time I served on the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills. When these bills would come before that committee I always objected to them on the grounds which the hon. member for Fraser Valley has stated. First, if there are children affected, they are the real sufferers. Second, in the province of Quebec where you can get a legal separation, if the parents are legally separated and neither is in a position to maintain the children or do not want to accept the responsibility, there are organizations which will look after the children. In some cases, however, when parents came before us we were told that this would be done as long as there was only a legal separation but that in the event of divorce these children were cut adrift, that the organizations then would not accept the responsibility for them. In many cases in which we are passing bills of this kind, we may be depriving children of the protection they are now receiving, in view of the fact that they will lose that protection in the event of a divorce being granted.

All of these things cannot be taken up, examined and decided on by laymen who merely take this business as an added responsibility and just get rid of it as fast as they can. This is a serious subject. You are dealing with the very foundation of the nation when you are dealing with family life. I still say that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was right; he is a minister of the church. While we may disagree with him in some things, I think we shall have to agree with the principle of the bill that he presented to the house for the purpose of placing this matter in legal channels, in the hands of people who are able to handle it properly, thus getting rid of the publicity that there is in connection with it at the present time and doing away with the possibility of collusion, manipulation and all that kind of thing that goes on under present circumstances.

I just wanted to make those remarks because I think the time has come when both the other place and the House of Commons will have to consider, more seriously than they have in the past, business such as we are transacting tonight.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I think that the discussion so far has been all out of order. The last time when similar divorce bills were before the house—I think it was a week ago tonight—a similar debate took place. I drew to the attention of the Speaker—who at that time was not yourself—the fact that the debate was out of order. We are not debating the right of this parliament to deal with divorce cases. At the moment there is a particular point that you have to settle, namely, whether it is necessary, when an hon. member asks for it, that each bill be taken separately. But even if each bill is taken separately, such speeches as we have heard up to the present time are out of order.

Mr. Fulton: Why?

Mr. MacInnis: Because the speeches did not deal with the principle involved in the bills before the house. It is not the principle of whether—as most hon. members say when they rise in their places—we are or are not in favour of divorce. Surely, it is a silly statement for anyone to make, and particularly for a member of parliament to make, that he is in favour of divorce. No one in his right senses is in favour of divorce?

Mr. Fulton: Are you?

Mr. MacInnis: Wait a minute, and I will tell you whether I am in favour of divorce or not.

Mr. Fulton: You are going to tell us, but you say it is a silly statement to make.

Mr. MacInnis: I say it is a silly statement for any member of this house to say that he is not in favour of divorce. I am not in favour of people divorcing each other just for the sake of divorcing each other. But I do believe, sir, it is the consensus in all of the civilized countries of the world—nearly all countries have divorce laws—that when two people cannot live together in harmony, each with respect for the other, it is not only desirable but it is the decent thing to let them separate. I cannot conceive of anything more indecent than for two people to live together in the intimacy of married life when the love and devotion that brought them together in the first place have disappeared. That is the way it appears to me, and to that extent I am in favour of divorce.

Now, sir, I am making a speech myself, and I am just as much out of order as the other hon. members were. I just wanted to draw a point of order to your attention—and perhaps we had better deal first with the point raised by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank), whether you must, sir, at the request of any hon. member deal with each divorce case separately or, as we have always done, and as the custom has been for years, when a particular divorce case is not opposed, deal with them en bloc, because they have already been dealt with, not by people who do not know anything about legal procedure in those matters, but largely by lawyers who have become expert in dealing with divorce cases. I think, sir, that you should give your decision on the point raised by the hon. member for Fraser Valley now.

Mr. Riley: What God has joined together.

Mr. Speaker: As the hon. member for Vancouver East has said, it is not in order to discuss the principle of divorce generally on these bills. In my opinion the proper time to discuss that was when the bill to which the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) referred was before the house. The principle on which discussion can take place now is the principle involved in these bills, not on the question of divorce generally.

As the hon. member for Vancouver East has said, it has been the custom in this house to pass these bills by one motion, for the reason that the principle involved in all the bills is practically the same. It is true, as the hon. member for Fraser Valley has said, that in some instances there are children, and in other instances there are none. There is also the question which some hon. members may like to raise as to whether or not the party who has been wronged is being properly provided for. I do not know whether the act of parliament can do anything about that, but these matters can be considered in the committee on miscellaneous private bills to which these bills are referred.

As an hon. member has said, these cases have been considered in the Senate. After they receive second reading here, they are then referred to the committee on miscellaneous private bills, where the details on each case can be considered. I cannot rule that all the bills should be passed by one motion, unless the house so wishes me to do. I merely repeat that that has been the practice for a long time, but unless there is unanimous consent I will have to call the individual bills. Is it the pleasure of the house that I should call all the divorce bills which are on the order paper by one motion?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house that the motion for second reading of these bills shall be adopted?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Green: No.

Mr. Knowles: On division.

Mr. Speaker: Carried on division.

Motion agreed to on division, and bills read the second time.

BRITISH COLUMBIA TELEPHONE COMPANY

The house resumed, from Tuesday, April 3, consideration of the motion of Mr. Applewhaite for the second reading of Bill No. 116, respecting British Columbia Telephone Company.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, this bill to amend the charter of the British Columbia Telephone Company was last up for second reading on April 3. On that occasion I was able only to commence my remarks, and I am afraid I shall not be able to finish them this evening. However, I had pointed out that the Vancouver city council are opposing this bill on two grounds: in the first place on the ground that an excessive increase in capital is being sought by the company; and in the second place because under the present charter there is no protection against unreasonable charges being levied against the British Columbia Telephone Company by its parent and affiliated companies.

To deal with the question of the increase sought being excessive. In 1947, just four years ago, this company obtained an increase in capital from $11 million to $25 million. Of that total of $25 million, $5 million still remains in the treasury, although since I spoke early this month the $5 million in shares is being placed on the market. The company now asks for an increase from $25 million to $75 million, which of course would mean trebling the capital structure; if it is given this increase the result will be that in a period of four years the capital stock will have been increased sevenfold. As I said a moment ago, the company still has $5 million of the $25 million present capital; therefore, if there is the increase from $25 million to $75 million it will have available as share capital a total of $55 million unissued.

For many years they have been paying dividends of 8 per cent on their common shares. Now when they are planning to issue common shares we find that instead of getting $100 for those shares they are able to get $132.50. That means that on common stock issued at the present time and in the future they are able to get an extra third, approximately, over and above the face value of that stock.

Their published plans with regard to the $5 million in shares now in process of being issued are that $4 million is to be in common shares and $1 million in preferred shares. On the common shares now being issued the company will get $4 million, the face value, or the par value; and in addition will receive another $1,300,000, because these shares bring in $132.50 each.

Furthermore the present holders of common shares are getting share warrants which will give them the right to subscribe to these new shares now being issued on the basis of one new share for each two common shares held at the present time. On the other million dollars of the $5 million which, as I said, is being issued in the form of preferred shares, they will also get more than the face value of $100. They are receiving something like $102 per share.

So much for the capital; for that method of raising money for expansion—because, of course, the plea made for this increase is that the money is needed for purposes of expansion. But the practice of the company in financing has been not to rely upon shares alone, but to finance only to the extent of approximately 40 per cent by way of shares, and to raise the other 60 per cent by way of bonds and similar securities. So that if the company gets $55 million in share capital to use, it will be able to raise, on the 40/60 basis, an additional $82,500,000 by way of bonds. If this present increase in share capital is granted, this will give a possible $137,500,000 for expansion, plus the premiums on the shares to which I have referred, plus a very large depreciation reserve amounting to approximately $17 million at the end of 1950. So that the company will have available for expansion purposes over $150 million.

Let us look at the requirements. The sponsor of the bill said the company would require about $10 million a year for a period of ten years. Even if that is so, it means that with this increase the company will have sufficient money for at least fifteen years. But the company itself, at a hearing before the board of transport commissioners last year when consideration was being given to an application for an increase in telephone rates, said that its expansion program would be lasting until 1952, which is next year. And just a little over two weeks ago, at a hearing before the board of transport commissioners held here in Ottawa for permission to issue the five million in shares to which I referred, we find that counsel for the company said, as reported in a press dispatch of April 4, that the funds were to be used as part of an expansion program stretching into 1953—which is a matter of only two more years.

Nothing at all is said about an expansion program for a period of ten years.

Mr. Applewhaite: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Green: As a matter of fact even in 1949 and 1950 the company spent only approximately $8 million per year.

Mr. Applewhaite: I should like to ask the hon. member a question, because I know he has no desire to create a false impression. Was not the expansion program to 1952, to which the hon. member refers, the program referred to in the house in 1947 when the original $20 million was asked for?

Mr. Green: In any event, I do not believe the company will be able to spend $10 million a year for the next ten years. Much of the expansion has been caused by the installation of automatic telephones, and at least in the city of Vancouver that work will soon be completed.

Mr. Sinclair: We hope so.

Mr. Green: Furthermore, because of the shortage of material I do not believe it will be possible to get sufficient equipment to carry on an expansion program amounting to anything like $10 million a year. I believe if given the increase for which it is asking, the company will have enough for the next twenty years.

This would mean that parliament would have no check on the company for a period of twenty years. And remember, Mr. Speaker, that the necessity for the company to come before parliament fairly frequently has a salutary effect. It influences policy; it makes the officials more careful of the way they treat the public. I believe they fear having to come to parliament more than they fear making an application before the board of transport commissioners. In my view it would be a tragedy if the company were given an increase so large that it would not have to come back to parliament for a period of twenty years.

That is the first point upon which the city is protesting. I have not the time tonight to develop the second point which, as I said, is the need for protection against unreasonable charges by the parent and affiliated companies of the British Columbia Telephone Company. I shall deal with that when the bill comes up again.

On motion of Mr. Green the debate was adjourned.

Mr. Speaker: It being nine o'clock, the house will resume the business which was interrupted at six o'clock.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): Mr. Speaker, when the house recessed at six o'clock I had been dealing with some matters which were of vital importance to my province of Prince Edward Island. I have only a few more subjects to discuss, and I shall be as brief as possible in doing so.

The first matter is one that I know will please the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) because, if carried into effect, it will show an annual saving for the government and the department presided over by the minister. This matter has to do with maritime freight rates. The estimates contain a large sum of money for maritime freight rates.

I wish these fellows would do their gossiping some place else, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. McLure: I do not know whether they have the floor or whether I have. If they do not want to stay inside there is plenty of room outside. I was about to say that the Maritime Freight Rates Act has been misunderstood not only by members of parliament but by many people outside the house. It is looked upon as, and sometimes is stated as being, a subsidy to the maritime provinces. The Maritime Freight Rates Act of 1927 was brought into effect to equalize freight rates in the maritime provinces compared with those of the western provinces, and also through rates from the maritime provinces to the west. From 1912 to 1926 freight rates were increased on a basis of 92 per cent in the maritime provinces against 55 per cent over all in the western provinces.

When the Sir Andrew Rae Duncan commission made an examination of the claims of the maritime provinces one recommendation made for the benefit of the farmers was that a 20 per cent reduction be made in the freight rates they paid to bring in feed grain and other freight to the maritime provinces for the benefit of the agricultural producers. Therefore it was not a subsidy but an equalization, or an endeavour to equalize, by lowering freight rates in the maritimes so that they would be more equitable compared with those in other parts of Canada. This was of great benefit to the maritime agricultural producers. I do not know the exact amount of the benefit to Prince Edward Island, but I know it would be quite large because our farmers are large buyers of feed grain from western Canada.

My proposition is a repetition of what has already been said to the government. I suggest that the government should build an elevator at Charlottetown so that freight might come by water from Churchill to Charlottetown, be stored in the elevator and then distributed to our farmers as required. It would mean a large saving annually. I would say without fear of contradiction that it would save the government at least a million dollars annually and give better satisfaction to the agricultural producers of Prince Edward Island. I am not going into the details of the elevator that we hope will be built as has been promised to us. The matter has been placed before the government on several occasions, and I know very well that it will be of great benefit to our farmers. It will be appreciated by them, and all the maritime provinces will support it in parliament.

Furthermore, members from the vicinity of Churchill will also give it their fullest support. If it is possible to do so at all, I would plead with the government to give the matter the fullest consideration at this time having regard to what it will do for the maritime provinces, particularly Prince Edward Island, if the elevator is built, and the great benefit it will be to our agricultural producers.

Mr. Ward: Might I ask a question? Would the farmers of Prince Edward Island be able to use a full boatload of grain?

Mr. McLure: I did not quite hear the hon. member's question.

Mr. Ward: Would the farmers of Prince Edward Island be able to use a full boatload of grain, three or four hundred thousand bushels?

Mr. McLure: Of course it would depend on the size of the boat. It might be a very small boat.

An hon. Member: How about a whaleboat?

Mr. Knowles: That is a whale of a good answer.

Mr. McLure: Along with others you will have an opportunity to discuss it later.

Mr. Ward: I might say that I am all in sympathy with the suggestion of building an elevator at Charlottetown, but it would be necessary for the people of Prince Edward Island to be able to use a boatload, three or four hundred thousand bushels of grain.

Mr. Sinclair: They would put potatoes in it.

Mr. McLure: That would be a mere bagatelle with the livestock they have in the province of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. Ward: I am very pleased to hear it.

Mr. McLure: I am sure of that. Another problem that has been laid at our door recently with which I want to deal has to do with transportation. I might say that transportation is vital to any island province such as ours, and the same will be said later on of the island province of Newfoundland. The problem with respect to Prince Edward Island to which I wish to refer is not of our own making. Canadian National Railways have condemned the Hillsboro bridge leading from Charlottetown to Southport, a distance of a mile. I am sure that when they condemned it they must have had something else in mind in order not to shut off all traffic from Charlottetown to the southern part of the island. True, we have another way of shipping our freight, a detour from Charlottetown to Murray Harbour which is a much longer route. Passengers coming from Murray Harbour to Charlottetown, a distance of fifty-six miles, can come as far as the bridge to Southport. Then they have to get out of the cars, walk the rest of the distance, hire a taxi or get a bus in order to travel to the city of Charlottetown.

I mention the matter at this time because I understand that Canadian National Railways are negotiating with the government of Prince Edward Island. It is a proper time for these negotiations to go on because when the trans-Canada highway is being built that will be the time to rebuild the Hillsboro bridge from Charlottetown to Southport. It was an old bridge that was finished in 1904. As I have said before in this house, the top part of the bridge was fifty years old before it came to us, having been brought from the Miramichi river. However, it stood the test up until the present time. Now we expect that the Canadian government through the Canadian National Railways will build a new bridge there. With the completion of the trans-Canada highway they must cross in the region of the Hillsboro bridge at some point to go to the terminal of the line and also to connect with the Wood Island-Caribou ferry. I will leave that matter with the government but I did wish to draw it to their attention at this time.

Having mentioned those problems I have one more, in connection with the fisheries and fishermen of Prince Edward Island. During a storm last autumn the breakwater at the best fishing port in Prince Edward Island, namely North Rustico, was badly damaged. That breakwater is the only protection we have for the processing plants, the fishing plants and the homes of the fishermen. Had the storm not subsided just when it did all those plants and homes, as well as the two range light, would have been carried out to sea. Kind Providence was good to us and the storm subsided, but it left the breakwater in a very dilapidated condition. Some 150 feet were carried away, and the rest was left in bad shape. Now the government are looking it over to see what can be done, and I understand some work has commenced already. I would suggest that the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) get in touch with the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) and have this harbour thoroughly inspected from the point of view of what will be of lasting benefit to the fishermen of this port. I need say no more on that matter, but I do hope consideration will be given the interests of those people. I understand from fishermen who have spent their lives there that the work being undertaken now will not be satisfactory. They are afraid the tides may be somewhat altered and that as a result the harbour will be filled with silt and sand. Even today it is hard enough for the boats to get to and from the fishing grounds. I hope both departments will take this matter into consideration.

In the few moments remaining at my disposal I want to mention one other matter, and I shall be very brief. I refer to the mail carriers in Charlottetown in my constituency and the mail couriers in Queens county. The new regulations brought in by the Postmaster General (Mr. Rinfret) have worked a great hardship upon these most faithful public servants. Under the new regulations, which were put into force with the idea of saving a few dollars, the position of the mail carrier has been affected for the worse. I had a letter from one of them today who says he is now compelled to serve 600 boxholders or residents of the city whereas previously he had to serve only 430. There is just one delivery a day, of course; but because of the large quantity of mail that must be handled these men have to go to work at 6 or 6.30 in the morning and are not through until 4.30 or 5 o'clock in the afternoon. In addition no recognition is given for the number of years they have served. Many of these men are veterans of the first war. The man from whom I had the letter today says that with the extra ground he has to cover and the extra mail he has to carry he finds it very difficult to continue his work from day to day.

As far as the rural mail couriers are concerned, the government has adopted a method under which they try to force down all tenders to the lowest possible figure. They call for tenders. After they are received those tendering get back a letter saying, "We find your tender rather high. Can you reduce it?" I always understood that when tenders were called and opened, if the sureties were satisfactory the lowest tender would be accepted. Today very few mail couriers in my province, and particularly in my constituency, are even making a living wage when you consider their taxes and expenses. These men are becoming dissatisfied, and I do not wonder at it. At the same time I must say that our city mail carriers and country mail couriers are the finest class of individuals in Canada. If the department were so eager to make a saving I think they might have started with the top salaries instead of with the lower ones. I am sure that if even a small cut had been made at the top it never would have got down to the low brackets, because the objective would have been gained long before that. But it is always the same old story; when any economies are to be effected the department begins with the lower paid individuals. This does not make for good citizenship, because it breeds discontent among those people. I hope the Postmaster General will not carry this too far, because even now you hear things said that could not be placed on record because they are hardly parliamentary.

I see my time has almost expired, and in closing I want to make just one statement. In view of the facts I have brought forward this evening I believe it is my duty to insist and demand that our province be treated fairly and squarely. I know the people of Prince Edward Island would not desire me to beg, or to ask for any favours or handouts from the government. They do expect me, however, as the elected representative of both Liberals and Progressive Conservatives in my riding, to demand just and fair treatment, and the implementation of all the promises that have been made to my province. So I will demand that the federal government fulfil its pledges, political and otherwise, as well as the terms of confederation, as long as I am a representative from Prince Edward Island.

Mr. H. P. Cavers (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this budget debate, my first words must be those of commendation and appreciation of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), who for the past three or four years has carried on faithfully and earnestly in his duties as supervisor of the financial structure of this country. I would be remiss if I did not mention his parliamentary assistant, who has given him a great deal of assistance in the matters which he has carried out.

The budget which was brought down by the minister a few days ago I find has been accepted by the people of Canada. The people of Canada are aware of the serious international situation with which we are confronted. They are ready to submit themselves to the additional taxes which must be levied upon them in order that the preparedness program may be met by the federal treasury. Even though we have before us at all times the serious international question, I believe that we should not lose sight of certain domestic problems which we have in this country. It will be my purpose tonight to point out to this house, and to other legislative bodies, a serious domestic problem which is the concern of the constituency I represent. I refer to the great menace of erosion.

In speaking on this particular subject, I ought to point out the geographical location of the constituency of Lincoln. We are the greater part of the Niagara peninsula, bounded on the north by lake Ontario, on the east by the Niagara river, on the west by the county of Wentworth, and on the south by the great industrial county of Welland and the Niagara escarpment. The county of Lincoln is a rich alluvial plain which slopes from the Niagara escarpment towards lake Ontario. In addition to the great industrial city of St. Catharines, we have the fertile lands which abound in this area. The farmers of our area cultivate the best peaches, pears, cherries, grapes and vegetables grown in the Dominion of Canada. However, they depend to a large extent on the products of the soil for their livelihood. It is an intensively cultivated area, and constitutes the major fruit and vegetable growing area of the province of Ontario.

Lake Ontario is the smallest of the great lakes, having a total water surface of about 7,500 square miles. Its length, from Burlington to the easterly end near Kingston, is 193 miles, and it has a breadth of 53 miles. The easterly portion of the south shore of the lake is exposed to northerly winds. A prominent cliff occurs along much of the shore, having a height of some 20 to 30 feet which gradually decreases to the west and gives way to a sandy shore. The water level of lake Ontario has been increased to some extent in the last ten years, owing partly to the fact that two diversions have occurred in lake Superior for the purpose of developing power. One of the diversions is referred to as the Ogoki diversion, and the other is the Long Lac diversion.

At these two points additions of water are permitted to go into the great lakes system, which has the effect of raising the water level of lake Ontario about 4 inches. I am told that the full effect of these diversions will not be felt on the great lakes until about 1956. It is true that some water is abstracted from the great lakes system at two points, Chicago and Tonawanda. The Chicago drainage canal, built about 15 or 20 years ago, takes some water from the great lakes system and lowers the level of lake Ontario by about 1·8 inches. The New York state canal, which diverts about 100 cubic feet per second, takes water from the Niagara river at Tonawanda but returns it again by way of the Genesee river near Buffalo, so the difference in the supply of water at this point is relatively negligible. However, we have placed a gut dam in the St. Lawrence at the head of the Galop rapids and the flow of water from lake Ontario has been retarded to some extent which has the effect of raising the water level by another 5 inches.

These mechanical changes are not the only factors which raise the water level, as additional height is given by reason of evaporation and precipitation. This gradual rise in the water level has a tendency to bring about a resultant wave of destruction which has caused the banks of lake Ontario to recede to a considerable extent. I am most concerned with that part along the southern shore of lake Ontario. In 1949 a survey was conducted by Dr. G. B. Langford, professor of mining and geology at the university of Toronto. This work was undertaken with the approval of the department of planning and development of the province of Ontario. Dr. Langford has published his report, which I have before me, dated May 1, 1949. It sets forth the rate of recession along the shore line of the southern part of lake Ontario. I refer to Dr. Langford's report and deal specifically with the townships, proceeding easterly from the Niagara river inward towards the city of Hamilton.

In Niagara township, the shore line from November, 1935, to December, 1949, has receded at the rate of 4·7 feet per year. In the township of Grantham in the period between September, 1936, and November, 1946, the shore line has receded 5·9 feet per year. For the township of Louth, the recession has been to a lesser degree. From December, 1922, to April, 1942, it was at the rate of 3·5 feet per year. By a reference to this report it will be noted that the easterly twelve miles of the shore line has been receding at the rate of 5 feet per year. There has been a loss along the other end of the peninsula of about 6 feet per year, or a loss of 3 acres of land per year over a period of five years. You may say that 13 acres is a relatively small thing, but in the 160 years during which farm operations have been carried on in the Niagara peninsula, there has been a loss of 2,000 acres of land, 13¼ square miles of valuable, arable land. There are farmers who state that they have lost one or more rows of fruit trees in a period of five years. As the population of our country grows there will be an increased demand for the type of farm produce that can be grown only in our particular area. It is imperative that we should protect every square foot of it. It is a limited national asset which, once gone, cannot be replaced.

There are those who, by individual effort, have endeavoured to solve this problem. Some individuals along the shore line have endeavoured to erect breakwaters and have deposited rock in order to erect groins jutting out into the lake. Their efforts have been rewarded to some extent. Where this work has been done, you will see small promontories extending out into lake Ontario. Then there were others who banded themselves together in an association known as the Ontario Shore and Beach Preservation Association.

The object of this association was to urge upon governments the formulation of a plan to combat the serious menace of erosion in the province of Ontario. The association did not pick out any particular area. Being a province-wide association, it was necessary that they should commence and continue their work on a province-wide basis. But their work was not in vain, for they were successful in obtaining the report of a special select committee on conservation in the province of Ontario; they also have for their efforts the report which I have read, undertaken by Dr. Langford. The opinion seems to have become more prevalent of late that this matter is not one for the individual but rather is one of public responsibility. A project of this kind to save the shore line and particularly valuable lands in this area should not be undertaken by the individual but is a matter for collective work. It is a public responsibility. Dr. Langford in his report has recommended that there should be placed out in the lake, groins which would tend to collect sand deposits about them and produce a wider sandy beach.

I think that the time is opportune for work of this kind to be undertaken in our particular area. The Niagara power diversion plan is about to be commenced by the Ontario Hydro Electric Power Commission. In commencing this work they will endeavour, within the next few months, to develop an open cut extending from Chippawa north through the Niagara escarpment and opening again on the Niagara river at Queenston. This would seem to be a most advantageous time to commence work of this kind.

[Mr. Cavers.]

I would suggest—and such suggestions have been made to the Ontario Hydro Electric Power Commission that they should provide the rock for an undertaking of this kind. There is a local rumour to the effect that the rock may be dumped on valuable lands in the area. I hope that this rumour is not well-founded, because such action would ruin many of the valuable lands in that particular area. The Ontario Hydro Electric Power Commission have done something to provide additional beauty for their power house at Queenston, in the establishment of the finest floral clock on the North American continent. I would hope that they would not with the one hand build up an edifice of this kind and with the other hand wipe out that advantage by destroying the landscape of the lands in our particular area. Furthermore, they would save investment in lands required for this purpose. In the course of my remarks I shall not attempt to assess the cost of such an undertaking. It would be ridiculous for me to attempt to assess costs of this kind because in this day of fluctuating prices and increasing costs any such attempt would have but little meaning. I propose, however—and such proposals would be made—that the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario might donate the rock. I urge upon the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters) that the federal government should assume 25 per cent of the cost of this undertaking. I also urge upon the provincial government of Ontario that 25 per cent of the cost should be assumed by them. The adjoining townships or municipalities have already intimated that they are prepared to contribute 25 per cent of the cost; and the owners of adjoining lands on the lakefront have already undertaken and agreed to supply the remaining 25 per cent of the cost of this work.

Some years ago the government of the United States recognized the problem of erosion. By public discussion results have been obtained in the formulation of policies which will deal with this problem. European countries on the north Atlantic and on the North sea, for some years "have been fighting the eroding seas". I think that we in Canada must accept this public responsibility, and that this is a most opportune time to make a beginning on the south shore of lake Ontario.

Mr. F. E. Lennard (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, as one who has not much time for the repetition which takes place in this house, I find myself at a loss for words this evening. I might say that the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Cavers) has practically taken the words out of my mouth.

Mr. Gibson: Then say, "me too."

Mr. Lennard: This is not a new subject with me. I have brought it to the attention of this house on one or two occasions previously. I must compliment the hon. member for Lincoln for making a fine presentation of this problem which is of great concern to the counties of Lincoln and Wentworth and to other adjoining properties. At a meeting of the Lake Shore Erosion Conference, held in Toronto in March, 1948, the following resolution was passed:

> Resolved that this organization ask the provincial and federal governments to instruct their engineeers to make a survey of the erosion on the great lakes and report with a recommendation for a remedy; and in this report be included a report on the effects of the Ogoki and Albany river diversions on the level of the great lakes.

While this resolution went forward at that time to the Ontario government and to the federal government, the latter have disclaimed any knowledge of ever having received it. As has just been said by the hon. member for Lincoln, however, the Ontario government appointed Mr. G. B. Langford, and he made a survey and a report several years ago. I have always claimed that the federal government should assume a portion of the responsibility because it was only a few years ago that a former premier of Ontario approached the federal government and persuaded them to legalize the diversion of waters from the Ogoki and Albany rivers into the great lakes system which means, as the hon. member for Lincoln has just said, that there is flowing into the great lakes system some 1,700 cubic feet per second of additional water that formerly flowed towards James bay and the Arctic circle. It is argued by many engineers that this diversion had a great deal to do with the higher levels that we have experienced during the past several years.

In the immediate vicinity of Hamilton beach and Van Wagner's beach just a few months ago they experienced a great deal of trouble, and many houses have been practically washed away. The common answer to that is: Well, they should not have built so near the shore line. In many instances the older houses that were built years ago were built a considerable distance from the shore line at that time, but because of this constant erosion, in some instances up to six and often nearly seven feet a year over the past fifteen or twenty years, the shore line has receded upwards of 200 feet. A serious condition is facing the people in the Niagara peninsula.

As I said on one other occasion, if the two governments, the federal and provincial, do not stop passing the buck, and get together and do something on this matter, the great Niagara fruit belt will pass out of existence in a few years.

In that connection the United States policy was slow to develop in the beginning, but it is quite definite today. In 1929 the problem was formally recognized by the establishment in the corps of engineers of a departmental board on sand movement and beach erosion. This was followed the next year by the creation of the United States beach erosion board of four officers of the corps of engineers and three civilians. The board was originally authorized only to make studies and investigations of erosion problems in co-operation with state governments, and the expenses of such investigations were to be shared by the two governments.

The duties of the board were expanded, however, in 1945 and it was authorized to act independently of state governments in studying shore erosion; while at the same time being able to act with them if asked to do so. The state governments were no longer asked to share the cost of such investigations. As an evidence of a growing sense of federal responsibility in this matter, the board was asked to make specific recommendations on what share of the expenses of recommended shore protective works should be borne by the federal government.

The following year, the central government's willingness to share in the cost of protective works was stated as follows:

> It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to assist in the construction, but not the maintenance, of works for the improvement and protection—of the shores—that are owned by states, municipalities or other political subdivisions.

The existing policy in the United States can be summed up as follows:

1. The federal government is prepared to make studies of shore erosion and recommendations for protective works on any shore property, whether publicly or privately owned. This may be done in co-operation with state governments or independently of them.

2. The federal government is also prepared to assist in the construction of protective works for property that is publicly owned, up to one-third of the total cost of such works.

3. The federal government will not assist in the maintenance or repairs to existing structures, except in the case of protection of important highways.

It is quite evident that the United States government recognizes the seriousness of the erosion that is taking place on our great lakes in connection with property over which they have control. The federal government should seriously consider taking such measures as would set up machinery to do likewise in Canada. The suggestions made by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Cavers) that the municipalities, provincial and federal governments, share the cost is certainly commendable.

Just a word on the budget; it has been pretty well covered, and as I said earlier this evening, and as I have said on other occasions, I am not one who believes in repetition in this house—we hear so much of it and it is so tiring. What I have to say, while it will be repeating what other members have said, will yet take only a few minutes, and therefore I feel it will not cause too much hardship on some of the hon. members who are so patient and who sit here for many hours listening to this tiresome repetition.

I cannot understand why electric stoves, washing machines and refrigerators were picked out as luxury items, and liquor was considered a necessity. I am absolutely opposed to the increase in the sales tax. I am opposed to a sales tax of any kind, and always have been. I say that, knowing who was responsible for introducing the sales tax in this country. I have always been opposed to it. It is an unjust tax. I do not believe in hidden taxes—goodness knows we have too many of them. If the people of this country knew just how heavy the hidden taxes were we would have a revolution.

To begin with, any sales tax should be visible, not hidden. If the minister hopes, as he says he does, to keep down inflation by discouraging spending, then, by having a hidden sales tax he will not achieve that result; but if the sales tax were visible people would be discouraged from buying many articles that they buy today. I know that is a fact today because I have been in other countries where they have a visible sales tax. In fact I have been in some provinces of this country where they had a visible tax, and it rather irritated me a bit, and when I was about to buy an article with an additional tax on it I said: "You can keep it"; and I went off without it.

In closing I may say that this sales tax, with its increase, is in my opinion one of the most stupid taxes to have inflicted on the country at this time. If a sales tax is to be applied it certainly should not be applied to what I consider necessities, absolute necessities to people in the lower income brackets, people with large families who have to pay so much for the clothing they require. They should not have to pay these multiple taxes to secure these necessities.

Mr. A. C. Murray (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, coming as I do from the great dairying county of Oxford, I think I should use first of all, in appreciation of the warmth of the applause tonight, the reply that the Oxford county cow is reported to have given a kind lady on a cold frosty morning, namely, thank you for the warm hand.

I should like to say also that as the member for Oxford I would want to join in the sentiments that were conveyed here this week by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank), namely, words of appreciation to the Speaker of this house, who comes from the city of Brantford, a city close to my home, and say also to you, sir, it is my hope that you may long be spared to add lustre and distinction to this assembly and to confer upon this chamber the benefit of your wisdom and of your talents.

Likewise I should like to join tonight in this, my maiden speech before the house, in a word of appreciation to the one who today leads this nation of Canada, the revered and respected leader of the government, the Prime Minister of Canada, the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, and to say to him that, just as mothers of men rejoice in the achievements and accomplishments of honoured sons, and not less for those achievements than for those qualities which endear them to their fellow men, so too, in turn tonight, do we pay tribute to the Prime Minister of Canada—not less for his achievements, not less for all his accomplishments in the legal world than for those innate qualities of kindness and of friendship and of integrity and of character which have endeared him to all the people of this nation.

I am reminded, sir, that it is neither wealth nor riches that brings greatness to an institution, yea even to the House of Commons, but it is the men and the women who travel in its service. And so tonight I am proud to be associated with hon. members of the house who are giving of their time and of their talents for the betterment of a better Canada, and for the betterment of our citizens.

It seems to me, sir, that if a man tries to do the job he has set out to do, and does that job faithfully, efficiently and well, even though he be a humble member of the house, a backbencher, he is serving Canada just as efficiently and just as well as those in higher positions. I can realize that that may find reluctant resistance in the minds of some at this time. I hasten to say I am not thinking of the grand eloquence surrounding us, or of the magnitude of the task. I am thinking of the soul and life of Canada. And so again I say I am proud to be associated with the membership of the house who are giving of their time, of their ability and talents for the betterment of the citizens of today.

After all, the quality of a nation is nothing more and nothing less than the quality, integrity and character of its people, and of those who manage its affairs. I think it was Schiller who once remarked that an artist is judged, not by what he places on canvas but rather by what he leaves out. I hasten to say tonight that I make no claim to artistic genius or eloquence. It is because of the repetition that has already taken place in this debate that I must, of necessity, eliminate a great deal that already has been said.

However if I should be halting in my words or in expressing my thoughts I know hon. members will not judge me insincere when I join my voice with the many who have already spoken in commendation of the Minister of Finance for the straightforward and businesslike manner in which he has approached this year's budget. The very reason for having a part in Canada's parliament is to make some contribution to the preservation of Canada's democracy. It seems to me that the very foundation of democracy lies in voluntary co-operation and the preservation of personal liberty.

These are days, we recognize, when men are assailing the ideals of democracy, not only in those countries which are distinctly anti-democratic; in our own country there are some who are saying that democracy has failed, and that we should replace it with some other type of autocratic control. My own ambition for the rest of my life, and for whatever influence I may have in the public affairs of this nation, is to make some contribution to the preservation of Canadian democracy.

I do not say that tonight in any vain-glorious spirit, nor for the purpose of making myself feel superior; but because of our natural surroundings, because of the great natural resources of our dominion, and because of the splendid parent stock that is to be found in the old races of Canada. In that heritage I feel rests the inspiration which makes possible an even higher and finer contribution to Canada today than we have hitherto dreamed of.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that in this debate one is privileged to tell something of his constituency. With the poet tonight I can easily say that—

> The sea hath its pearls
> The sky hath its stars
> But my heart hath love—

—a love for Oxford, and its people. Born within its boundaries, as I was, and having lived there all my life, I have come to know and to appreciate the wondrous heritage of the hospitality of its people.

While I have listened to many members within this chamber tell of the greatness of their constituencies, one's heart naturally yearns for his native riding. With due apologies to Robert Burns tonight I fain would say:

> The bridegroom may forget his bride,
> Who married was but yesterday;
> The mother may forget her child,
> Who sleeps so sweetly on her knee;
> The king he may forget his crown
> That on his head the hour hath lain
> But I will not thou—

Oxford—

> —forget
> For a' that thou hast been to me.

So I say to you tonight that while others have mentioned the greatness of their constituencies, this evening I choose to kodak, to develop and to print one of the finest counties in the Dominion of Canada, the finest flower in the garden, the first prize chrysanthemum, the county of Oxford in the province of Ontario.

Last week while I was home I heard my mother retell the story of how my grandparents came from the land of Scotland, taking as many weeks to cross the Atlantic as it now takes days. I heard her tell of how, around my home city of Woodstock, which in those days was bush and forest, with only a trail through the woods, by industry and hard work the trees were felled, the log cabins built and the soil tilled.

Oxford is famous for its Scotch ancestors, and has given many men to all branches of life—men who have given everything to take their places in the professional, the commercial and the industrial life of the nation. Born in humble homes, reared midst hardships and want, at times, unconsciously they were trained by a stern but kind Providence in those habits of economy, of temperance and of hard work which have later brought them to the fore in all departments of life.

I think it was Emerson who wrote that the true test of civilization is not the size of the cities or the population, but rather the kind of men a country turns out. And tonight, in passing, I shall mention only Ralph Connor, known to many because of his writings, and particularly his book "The Man from Glengarry." I would mention likewise the late Dr. George Leslie McKay, the well known missionary to Formosa.

I would pause briefly to pay tribute to the township of my birth, the township of Zorra in the county of Oxford. I cannot think of any finer honour Oxford county cherishes today than this, that it is the birthplace of an honoured colleague in the House of Commons, the genial member for Hamilton East (Mr. Ross), and likewise the birthplace of my honoured colleague and namesake, the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Murray), whose mother, whose brothers and whose sisters are deeply respected citizens of my native Oxford.

Likewise as a native of Zorra I am sure my honoured colleague would join me tonight in the lines reported as having been said by a lady at the time of the Fenian raid in Zorra: They may take Montreal, they may take Ottawa, they may take Toronto, but they will not take Zorra. So I say to you this evening that Oxford is noted for its prosperity, for its quiet beauty of rolling hills, of well cultivated fields, its gentle streams and its friendly people. Nestled within its boundaries are the towns of Ingersoll, Tillsonburg, Tavistock, and my own home city of Woodstock, ofttimes called the city beautiful or the industrial city, indicative of the long rows of maple trees which adorn our city streets and the initiative and enterprise of our people. Situated as it is in a very prosperous section of Ontario, it has shared in the general prosperity which our nation has enjoyed, and my fondest wish tonight as I take my stand on behalf of my people is that it may continue to share for many years to come that prosperity which has enriched it in days gone by.

Taking my stand tonight on behalf of the constituency of Oxford, I am reminded that it has been represented by a number of illustrious men including the late Sir Francis Hincks, the Hon. George Brown, Thomas Oliver, the late Hon. James Sutherland, Dr. Sinclair, A. S. Rennie, and in more recent times, the Hon. D. M. Sutherland, formerly minister of national defence, my predecessor, Mr. K. R. Daniel, and others, who in the past have given to this assembly the benefit of their wisdom and their talents, and have truly lent lustre and distinction to it. Tonight as I think of that long line of illustrious men, and while I realize that imperfections no doubt may follow tonight, I want to present some thoughts particularly as they pertain to this year's budget.

I want to say first of all that one could be alarmed at the amount that is to be appropriated for the defence of our nation. I think, however, that we all must realize the situation in the small atomic world wherein we live, but I would not want to be an alarmist. I would not want to wave any flags of undue patriotism or to be accused of speaking directly against the peoples of any nation because I do not think that the mass of the people of Russia want war any more than you or I or other nations throughout the world want war today. I think we all want peace but because of these fourteen or fifteen men in the Kremlin, because of their record of leadership, a leadership that cannot be trusted, there is no other course to follow than that which has been followed by the government of this nation, namely, to build its defences strong.

Therefore I say, and I am weighing every word as I say it this evening, that as of now the people of Canada must be prepared to build our defences strong. Without indicating that there will be any war, any atom bombs used, any germicidal warfare, I think all hon. members must realize that we must put first things first, and by so doing I for one hope that the jet planes that are being built and the bombers that are being constructed will be the means not of winning world war III but rather of preventing it. Therefore I say tonight that while I realize it is not a very popular thing for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) to come to the people of the country and say that large sums of money have to be appropriated for the defence of our land, on the other hand there is no other method to follow than that which has been followed, and which no doubt will be followed increasingly over the next number of months, the method of solidarity building for that day which we hope will come when the peoples of all nations will come to learn to live together in peace and harmony, and when those who have perverted ideas in places of leadership will finally be dethroned.

Turning from international relations to domestic affairs I want to bespeak at this time the appreciation of the profession to which I belong, the pharmaceutical associations throughout Canada, and the appreciation of all citizens, to the Minister of Finance for the exemption under the budget of special drugs the cost of which is deductible for income tax purposes. I should like to say to the Minister of Finance that while we appreciate that he has recognized this principle of deduction we hope in turn that he may see his way clear to add to it to include all medical prescriptions so that it may be of equal benefit to the citizens of the nation.

I should like to intimate that Oxford is also concerned about the transition that is taking place today in the agricultural life of the nation. I hope that even a preponderance of government members does not preclude my emphasizing within this chamber that agriculture should receive a most considered position. It is needless to repeat that a prosperous agriculture means a prosperous Canada, that farm income is the keynote to national prosperity. I can personally vouch for the fact that when the farmer is prosperous, cash registers ring more merrily in the cities. I think we can pretty well all agree that agriculture and industry will rise and fall together. But what we must not forget is the importance of agriculture in the economy of the nation. Generally speaking, our farming people are ready to meet the contingencies of climate such as frost and snow, but I do not think they want their chins punched from all directions. Nor do they want a lot of government controls which would be the natural thing under subsidized farming.

Indeed I should like to commend the government for the position it has taken on controls. Controls do not cure inflation. They but contain it. At this time I want to commend the government for not putting the business economy of our nation in a strait-jacket where it would be subject to regimentation, to export and import controls, black markets and all the rest that goes with it. I should say to you, sir, that I am in the retail drug profession, and I went through the period when we had controls. I make bold to say that during the control period we were out of selling condition. You will remember we went quickly from an ordinary, very healthy, sane buyers' market into a sellers' market. It was not a question of getting customers or selling to them. The whole normal process of business was completely reversed. Let me give you a personal illustration. The retailer was not seeking customers. Rather customers were seeking the retailer. Similarly the wholesaler was not seeking the retailer. The retailer was seeking the wholesaler. As a personal illustration, I can say that when a traveller came into the store during the period of controls you went all out with him endeavouring to seek from him the goods that you so dearly desired. You would go up to him and say, "Here, sir, have a chair; have a cigar, have a stenographer"; anything to get out of him the goods you so badly needed. During that period we also had the rationing of goods. You could have some; I could not. That affected goods such as sugar, meat, rubber, gasoline, chocolates, and all the rest of it. I hope those days will not return.

The point I am endeavouring to make is that during that control period we were out of selling condition. Goods were hard to get; sales were easy to make, and as a result we became soft and inefficient. So let us be guided by that period. Let us keep those virtues of hard work, industry, enterprise, patience and persistence as the hall-marks of our national efforts in the days ahead. Let us hearken to the words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) who guided the productive energies of this country during the last war, and who has said that hard work, production and savings will bring us through this period of difficulty just as it did before. Let us pay heed to the words of the Minister of Finance, that it is an inexorable law of life that everything we get must be paid for. Freedom is not free; it was bought at a price, and we are going to have to pay the price to retain it.

I confess, sir, that when I hear the many requests for assistance that come from certain quarters of this chamber I become a little disturbed. It is not that we are not all anxious for the welfare of our fellow men, for old age pensions, health insurance and so on; but I become concerned that at the same time we do not kill by taxation the enterprise, initiative and industry which have made our nation what it is. I may be a little old fashioned in my thinking, but I still feel that those attributes of hard work, industry, production and saving are the beacon light in the destiny of Canada. Oftimes I feel that we are suffering from a disease in this land. It is not cancer; it is not polio; it is not heart disease. It is more insidious than any or all these. It so weakened one country that she was not able to defend herself in time of war. It is not the shortage of dollars; it is the shortage of work. Some people have fallen for the old idea, or the new idea, of shorter hours and more pay, when it seems to me that what is needed in Canada today is more work and more production to trade with the peoples of other countries. This week the house witnessed the spectacle of an hon. member rising in his place and piling high upon his desk volumes pertaining to the exuberant and vociferous demands made upon this government, demands that have to be paid for by the hard work and taxes of our people. Tonight I say to that hon. member that he omitted one book on that occasion, the most important book of all. I have that book with me; I have brought it from the hotel where I stay, where it was placed by the Gideons. I do not want to alarm hon. members but I do want to read the 19th verse of the 3rd chapter of Genesis, wherein it says:

> In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground.

That is God's law; it is nature's law; it is true, and immutable. How can anyone think he may change it? Unfortunately, however, there appear to be people going through our land, agitators, saying to young men and men who are not so young, "Do as little as you can; get as much as you can." I point out that this is contrary to those laws of virtue and industry that we learned at our mother's knee. We cannot hope to maintain the vigour and wealth of our country with any theory such as that. So to a certain section of this house I say that while some may sing siren songs of the pleasures of delight when we all receive more by doing less, tonight I bring a word that speaks for itself in this fashion. I am the foundation of all prosperity. I am the fount from which all blessings flow. I am the salt that gives life its savour. I am the friend of every young man and every young woman, and when he or she puts his or her hand in mine and keeps it there for a lifetime I will do more for that person than the richest parent. I am the sole support of the poor, and the rich who think they can get along without me lead ineffectual lives and fill premature graves. I have made this Dominion of Canada. I have laid its railways; I have paved its highways; I have set a standard of living unequalled in the world. What am I? I am work, the answer to this problem of inflation, the answer to the building up of the defences of this nation against any potential enemy of the future, the answer to the recreating of wealth destroyed by war, the answer to the building of a greater and finer Canada than hitherto we have known.

So I say to this chamber tonight, let us set the example in our own lives. Let us teach this to our children. If we pray, as I hope we all do, let us pray that management and labour may fuse their forces into a productive whole that will continue to build this great land with the same zeal and energy that the men and women of Canada have displayed in defending it. In this great land there is no other way for us to follow than to be constantly, continually, habitually and eternally optimistic regarding it. I recognize that there are some in the country who are apostles of doom and disaster, who can see nothing but trials and tribulations before us. Fortunately there are not many of that kind. We on the government side say the history of Canada has been made up of meeting challenges and difficulties, so the future is not going to frighten us provided we bring to it the industry, brains and initiative we all possess but may not be using to the full.

There is one thing more which was emphasized this afternoon by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). The crying need of the world today is unity versus antagonism, co-operation against rivalry. Above all we need unity in spirit among the nations of the world. Today the privilege of being a Canadian carries with it a great responsibility. A few years ago we were Upper and Lower Canada. Today we are one. Having done so much, is it not our duty to do more? The unifying power of our race is not exhausted. None can deny that in Canada we have enjoyed a period of prosperity unequalled in our history. As we face the future let us not forget that Canada's economic policy must march in step with the policies of those who are or may become our friends. It must be in the interests of Canada, but of a Canada which could not tonight, even if it wanted, remain isolated or insulated from the community of nations that today inhabit this small atomic world.

We must learn, Mr. Speaker, to get along together; to live together and to trade together. So, as I bring these remarks to a close, I wish to commend the government, our leader and our ministers, for the action that has been taken in building up the defence of our nation; in making our country strong; and likewise to emphasize that while we have these defence obligations we have other obligations to build somehow, some way, the attributes of decency among all peoples throughout the world and to work for that day when peace shall come and wars shall be no more.

> May dishonour blast our names
> And quench our household fires,
> If we or ours fail this land,
> This dear land of our sires.

Mr. Hector Dupuis (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, I too represent the best constituency in Canada. I want every member of this house to know that I shall not talk very long in this debate, but I thoroughly believe the arguments I shall presently advance. My remarks in English will be brief, because they are a summary of the more elaborate ones that I shall make in my own language. I request the indulgence of my English-speaking colleagues if some of my expressions sound queer and rather illiterate. It is due to my limited knowledge of your language. However, I shall do my best to be as clear as possible so that there can be no misinterpretation of my meaning.

During this speech I shall make some recommendations, and of course as I said my remarks will be longer in French than they will be in English. The main reason for my participation in this debate is to bring to the attention of the government the opinion of the average citizen, and his reaction to the proposed budget for the coming fiscal year, as well as the increased taxes it imposes. When I speak of the "average citizen" I mean the small merchant, the medium and low wage earner, who compose the majority of those in the urban constituencies. In a democracy a good government, such as this one, must take note of public recommendations or expectations. The same principle applies to every member in a party. We all agree, Mr. Speaker, that the chief worry of the classes I mentioned a moment ago is the constant increase in the cost of living and the overcoming of this problem. Some serious minded people suggest that price control be imposed, while others are of the opposite opinion. I have already expressed my views on this subject. In my opinion price control cannot be exercised unless wage controls are also established. Wages cannot be frozen at their present rate, especially in the case of unskilled labour and the so-called white-collar workers, because in the majority of cases these workers do not earn enough to make both ends meet.

I am not the only member who is of this opinion. I listened with a great deal of interest to a speech made by the member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette) the other day, in which he said the following, as it appears on page 1751 of Hansard of April 9, 1951:

> You cannot have price control unless you also have wage control.

On the same page the hon. member says:

> Does anyone in the house want control now all across the board on all commodities, control that will affect our exports and imports? Certainly people are not ready for such a situation. I noticed that the amendment moved this afternoon by the leader of the opposition is well guarded in its language. You heard it, and I will read it again. It is as follows:
> "This house is of the opinion that in view of the announcement made on Wednesday last of the greatest monthly increase in Canadian cost of living during the month of February to the disastrously high level of 179·7, immediate consideration should be given to the adoption of appropriate measures to hold down the cost of living and halt inflation."

The member for Cochrane added: "There is no mention of control there." The government, as well as everyone else, is well aware of the grave situation which is facing a large number of our citizens. I feel confident that every effort will be made to alleviate, as much as it is within the power of the government to do so, the privation encountered by so many people today. However, according to the declarations of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and other members of his cabinet, price controls are not advisable, for the very good reasons put forth in recent speeches.

I have heard a lot of criticism from members of the opposition. I have read thoroughly the address delivered by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), and scrupulously analysed the amendment he has proposed. This amendment reads as follows, at page 2053 of Hansard of April 16, 1951:

> That all the words after "that" to the end of the question be deleted and the following substituted therefor:
> "the proposals of the Minister of Finance are unsatisfactory because they will inevitably increase the cost of living for all and especially for those least able to bear it.
> This house condemns in particular, as inflationary, the increase by 25 per cent of the general sales tax and is of the opinion that the increase is unnecessary and unwise.
> This house further condemns the heavy increase in excise taxes on certain essential commodities and is of the opinion that much of the government's proposed huge increase in taxation is due to its own extravagance.
> This house regrets the failure of the government to take effective steps to deal with profiteering."

According to the hon. member, who is known as the main financial critic of the official opposition, all the taxes imposed to meet the estimates of the coming fiscal year are too high and improperly applied. Has the hon. member, for whom I have the greatest respect, made any suggestions as to the sort of taxes that should be imposed, or on what category or group of people in particular the burden should be placed? The opposition is reproaching the government for the immensity of the taxes the Canadian people will have to pay. What would these taxes have amounted to if the government had listened to the screams of anguish of the opposition and adopted their suggestion for the immediate regimentation of the reserve forces? Such a measure would have considerably increased our war expenditures.

We are facing a crucial situation and nothing must be spared which will assure the survival of democracy. But we must pay for this, and taxes must be levied. We may consider ourselves fortunate that we have now at the head of the country leaders who have not been panic-stricken and who have acted wisely in adopting measures required by the times. Should they be forced to ask for more sacrifices from the people, I am sure that this government will take this responsibility at the proper time.

The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), in his remarks, made this statement as reported at page 2053 of Hansard:

> I am not asking for a miracle. On the other hand negation is not a policy.

In this statement I agree with the hon. member. I would not dare to criticize the policy of anybody unless I had some better proposal to make. The remarks made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) himself are nearly all negative, as they contain only reproaches of the government or condemnation of their actions. The speeches of members of the opposition in general contain no constructive recommendations.

Some say that it is the business of the government to settle the administrative problems of the country. I say that it is the business of every member of this house to make any suggestions that he may think are for the good of the country. As I said a little while ago, I am going to make some recommendations. It may be too late for them to be applied to the budget that is now receiving our attention; but at the same time I think there is ground for study of certain suggestions I will make. For instance, has the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) ever considered the advisability of imposing income taxes on profits made on some transactions, such as on the sales of businesses? There is now such a tax in the United States and it has given good results. I am thinking of the case of taverns changing hands two or three times during the same year, each owner realizing profits ranging from $20,000 to $50,000. Why not tax such income? It is a profit. It is an income, after all. Why not tax it at the source as is done in the case of all salaried people? The same remark would apply to stock market speculators. They could also be taxed at the source, by taxing them indirectly, through the services of the broker, on the profits they realize on certain transactions. Although as I said a little while ago it may be too late for these measures to be put into force for the coming fiscal year, I sincerely believe that if such measures were put into force the government would probably be in a position, if not to lower the present rate of income tax at least to keep it at the present rate and not increase it.

One must bear in mind the fact that the employee cannot escape the payment of his income tax, which is deducted at the source and reported to the authorities by the employers. It has not been done only under this government. It has been suggested, I suppose, by great economists. I know it is a good way of collecting income tax. I am not in favour of the worker escaping payment of income tax. I am not suggesting that at all. I am just pointing out the fact that there are, in a way, two kinds of treatment: one treatment for one class and another treatment for another class. When we can reach people through such business transactions as those I noted a little while ago, I think the proposal I made would be worthy of the attention of the government.

I hope the government will give immediate attention to the plight of the state pensioners, among whom I would include Canadian National railway ex-personnel and also veterans. Every member of this house knows that these former employees cannot carry on and meet the actual cost of living with a pension that was fixed on the occasion of their departure several years ago.

I have a special recommendation of local or regional importance, namely, the abolition of the tolls on the Jacques Cartier and Victoria bridges, joining the south shore of the St. Lawrence river to the city of Montreal. The city of Montreal and the province of Quebec have already paid large sums to cover the yearly deficits, and I think it is now time to render justice to the citizens of this part of the country, especially those residing on the south shore, whose numbers have grown so rapidly in the last decade. I consider that the toll charged to them is discriminatory in a way, in view of the fact that in no other place in the province of Quebec is a passage fee collected for travelling on bridges. Some of the residents on the south shore are using the bridge several times a week, and some even use it many times every day; and I think that this is a kind of indirect tax which is charged them.

As I said before, Mr. Speaker, this is a summary in the language spoken by the majority of the members of this house. Before I finish my remarks in that language I want to say this. I would have given my serious attention to any proposal coming from any side of this house and tending to improve the present situation. I am not going to vote for the amendment, as it contains no such suggestions but rather merely expressions of blame against this government. As I said previously, although the situation in some quarters, in constituencies such as the one I have the honour to represent, is not flourishing, nevertheless it is not desperate. It is certainly different from that which existed in the thirties. I was an alderman at that time and a member of the executive of the city of Montreal.

They are not very particular in choosing their executive members there. In any event, I was a member of the executive for two terms and alderman for five terms. I went through the period of depression, and I saw a great deal of misery. I saw people almost dying of hunger, I would say. I have seen landlords receiving direct relief. I have seen business people getting out of business owing to the depression. Some people are trying to replace the word "depression", are trying to frighten us with that word "inflation", and are comparing the situation we have today with that of the thirties. At that time, with a budget of $55 million, the share of the city of Montreal for direct relief alone was $1,500,000 a month; and I repeat that this was just enough to save people from starving. But when we compare the situation today and we see the prosperity around us everybody will note the facts. Look at the provincial budget. I am thinking of the budget of my own province. At the time I am speaking of now, around 1935 and 1936, that budget was somewhere around $55 million. It is now over $200 million. Well, if that is a sign of depression—I know I am not an economist—but if this is not the sign of some prosperity, I do not understand the first word about business.

Mr. MacInnis: It may be a sign of inflation.

Mr. Dupuis: It may be a sign of inflation; it may be a sign of prosperity. If inflation exists today in some proportion I hope the time will change and that prosperity will come again, as I am quite sure that the present government—as they have always done—will take the necessary precautions to see that prosperity will be assured in the future. Mind you, I am not trying to get in the good graces of the government at the present time. I am simply expressing sincerely what I believe to be the right thing.

Taking into account the efforts made by the present government to overcome this difficult situation, I do not hesitate to give all my confidence to the cabinet, and by doing so I am reflecting, I am quite sure, the opinion of those whom I have the honour to represent in this house.

(Translation):

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I am not one of those who spend their time criticizing the actions of our government without even offering suggestions calculated to improve present conditions or any other situation. As was so well pointed out by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) the opposition goes so far as to brand even our best as very wrong.

I know perhaps better, at least as well as any other member of this house, the hardships that some of our people have to put up with, and there is not a shadow of a doubt that those new taxes are going to press hard enough on the whole of our people. One must realize however, as I already said in English, that we are faced with special conditions arising out of international circumstances beyond our control.

Our own survival is at stake at this time, Mr. Speaker, and it is a question of paying an insurance premium for the survival of our nation, of democracy, and of the freedom we all cherish.

It would have been preferable, I feel, if certain taxes had not been imposed. I must confess, however, that I have not many to suggest other than those I mentioned a moment ago and which I would like, if I may, to repeat in my own tongue.

In my opinion, it would be advisable to consider the possibility of imposing an income tax on certain real estate transactions or on the sale of business establishments because, as I pointed out earlier, I have known of businesses changing hands many times. The sellers were often able to make a profit of $20,000 to $30,000. In the United States there is a tax on such transactions. Perhaps it is too late to include such a measure in this budget. I feel, however, the government should consider the suggestion. It would mean an immediate source of revenue since the tax would be levied at the time these transactions are made. The government would undoubtedly draw substantial revenue which would enable a lowering of the tax on the income of the population in general or at least would allow it to remain at the rate it was before the decision was made to increase it. This is not a clever find I have made. I repeat that it is being done in the United States and I see no reason why it could not be done here also.

The same principle could apply to speculations on the stock market. I have not the time to refute certain arguments that have been advanced against such a step. The matter, however, deserves some consideration from our leaders. In any event, I make this suggestion with a view to alleviating as much as possible the burden which bears too heavily on the working classes and people with smaller means.

Do not think that I would, for one moment, speak or act like a demagogue. Far from it. But someone has to look after the underprivileged and alleviate their burden, if it is not possible to remedy the situation completely.

I am not saying the government failed in its duty in this respect, but one can never do too much and cannot take too great an interest in those people.

The rich, the wealthy and well-to-do can always find a way out of certain financial difficulties, but the underprivileged, abandoned to their lot, are unable to cope with them. I therefore deem it my duty to look after them. Once again, I know that it is the government's intention to alleviate, as much as possible, the burden that crushes those people.

As for the excise taxes being levied—and here I appeal more particularly to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott)—I wonder whether there is not still time to revise those which are collected on various goods. I do not blame the Minister of Finance, nor do I envy him the task of deciding where to get the revenue he needs; moreover, even if I tried my best, I could never find a popular tax, but I am just making a suggestion. I wonder whether it is still possible to change the tax levied on tobacco, and particularly on leaf tobacco, the kind smoked by poor people.

They cannot afford to treat themselves to a cigar, but these fine Canadians smoke Canadian leaf tobacco which they cut to suit their own taste. Yet, this excise tax may well double the price of leaf tobacco.

I share the views of my colleague from Rimouski (Mr. Rousseau)—although I am no abstainer—that alcoholic beverages should have been taxed instead. People who can afford to have a drink, to use a popular expression, are probably in a position to pay 15 or 20 per cent more or, in any event, enough to enable the Minister of Finance to abolish this excise tax on leaf and cigarette tobacco smoked mostly by people who cannot afford more expensive tobacco or the luxury of a cigar.

The excise tax on chocolate has also been abolished.

I remember that, some years ago, the distributors of soft drinks asked the government to remove the tax on soft drinks, claiming that the popular price was 5 cents, and it was embarrassing to charge a customer 6 cents for a bottle of soft drink, that it was absolutely advisable to return to a price of 5 cents a bottle. What happened? First soft drinks were sold at 6 cents a bottle, then at 7 cents. There you have it. The government did not levy any tax and those who profited thereby were the manufacturers and bottlers who made a profit of more than 40 per cent of the initial price at which they had promised to sell their product.

The same thing occurred in the case of the chocolate bar. We saw it shrink and I am in a position to say so because my son manages a store where these items are sold. The manufacturers wrote to us recently, to tell us: "No, we will not reduce the price of chocolate bars but we will add a small quantity of chocolate".

I am of the opinion that alcoholic beverages and chocolate bars are not necessities of life and that our good ladies and even gentlemen who enjoy them would gladly sacrifice a bit of chocolate in order to ensure the repeal of certain taxes which, in my humble opinion, are levied too heavily on things which are really necessary to life. I am not, in saying this, censuring the Minister of Finance or, for that matter the present budget, but I do feel that I am duty bound to bring the matter to his attention. Most people in my constituency are really relatively poor—at least they are not particularly well to do. I feel that in making this request I am truly fulfilling my duty towards them.

I have heard the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) ask our citizens to make sacrifices. Our people are undoubtedly ready to make sacrifices, but there is a limit to everything. We have but one wish: that the international situation, which is the cause of our present financial difficulties, may improve so as to relieve the sufferings of the underprivileged whom, I repeat, it is my duty to defend.

I would have spoken longer but for the rules of the house. However, in concluding my remarks I would like, if I may, to quote from an item published in the March 1951 issue of the Reader's Digest under the signature of Bernard Baruch. I was greatly impressed by this article, which is not at variance with the ideas expressed by the Minister of Finance. I quote:

> Today we are being asked to place our own valuation on freedom, in the things we are ready to give up, the taxes we will pay, the self-discipline we embrace—in how quickly we will do all this. Let us not haggle, clinging to petty profits and petty comforts. Should we price freedom too low, it will be taken from us.
> Unfortunately, when I urged total mobilization of America's military, economic and spiritual resources, there were too many who felt we should "wait and see". They hoped that something would happen to change the attitude of our enemies—those without and those within. Those without are Russia and her satellites. Within are the pressure groups, selfishness, cowardice, inflation, and above all, incompetence in the management of our affairs.
> The world is shaping up to a struggle between communism and individualism, between that system which feels the state should be the master and that system, ours, which feels the state should be the servant of the individual.
> I warn my fellow Americans that the first battle of the great Armageddon is taking place within our country—now. If our democracy, our government and the institutions founded under its constitution cannot control the conflicting and selfish interests for the over-all welfare, Armageddon will be lost here in our own country. How can our conscience rest easily when we so unflinchingly send our young men to battle and hesitate to send profits? The situation demands self-denial and sacrifice. Unless we practice these things we shall lose first the spiritual battle of Armageddon and the last will surely be lost—the physical one.

Mr. Speaker, I conclude by expressing the hope that the government will continue to direct their particular attention to the situation which I will not describe as tragic but as very difficult and which now imposes severe hardships upon my constituents. I know that heretofore the government has considered the welfare of this class of people and I hope that our leaders will not miss the opportunity to restore, as soon as possible, the necessary equilibrium in order that each and every one, no matter what social class he may belong to, may in spite of the many difficulties that beset us feel an ever greater happiness in this beautiful country of ours, Canada.

FLOOD CONDITIONS

OTTAWA AREA—STATEMENT AS TO HOLDING BACK WATER AT UPPER DAMS

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) put the following question to me:

Has the minister explored the possibility of using the dams north of Ottawa to hold back a greater head of water to alleviate flood conditions?

The answer is that the officials of the Department of Public Works, aided by outside consultants, have given a great deal of thought to this problem. To date they have found no way of doing more to alleviate flood conditions. I have in hand a comprehensive report and study concerning this question, which I propose to read.

The question of controlling the flow of the Ottawa river has been studied by the Department of Public Works for many years, in consultation with the two provincial power commissions operating the river and with the other industries, including lumbering, who utilize the river for navigation. The study has not only been carried out by our engineers; we have added thereto engineers who are fully familiar with the situation. We retain on our staff a consulting engineer who knows the situation particularly well and whose guidance has been followed for many years, as well as in the present situation. Any steps taken to guide and control the present floods were as directed by him.

On further going over the situation and analysing it thoroughly, it is agreed that no other course could have been followed that would have made flood conditions in the Ottawa area any less difficult. This opinion is shared by the officers of the power companies, of the two provincial power commissions and of the other services utilizing the river. In considering the question of the control of water at different dams, the first point always kept in mind is to alleviate flood conditions as far as possible, and the second is the storage of water to be used later by the different parties. In detail there are on the river between Ottawa and the headwaters dams both for power and for storage, as follows:

Dozois: built and operated by the Quebec Hydro Electric Commission. This has a drainage area of 3,000 square miles. At the beginning of the present freshet season this reservoir was completely empty, but was closed by the Quebec authorities on March 31, and has remained closed ever since. The flow into this reservoir during the past two weeks has exceeded over 20,000 cubic feet per second.

2. Rapid No. 7: operated by the Quebec government. This is a power and storage development. To date, with a limited outflow required for power purposes only and the main dam closed, it has not been completely refilled.

3. Quinze reservoir: controlled by the Department of Public Works. Drainage basin 8,900 square miles. At the start of the present freshet this reservoir was entirely empty, and on April 16 it was partly closed and only sufficient water permitted through this dam—approximately 7,500 cubic feet for power purposes.

4. Timiskaming reservoir: dam operated by the Department of Public Works. Drainage area, 17,000 square miles. At the start of the freshet this reservoir was entirely open. At the beginning of the freshet the run-off increased the water level with the discharge fully open and the lake rose seven feet. On April 17 in order to reduce the flood the dam was partially closed. This resulted in the reservoir rising over one-half a foot in one day, which would have filled the reservoir in a few days and resulted in a higher outflow than at present is being encountered. It was necessary to keep lake Timiskaming open, as by its own drainage area it went up one foot in one day, and with rises like this apparent it is certain that conditions on lake Timiskaming would be such that the sewage disposal and filtration plants of the towns of both Haileybury and New Liskeard, which always have to be watched, would have been flooded out.

From Timiskaming to Ottawa there are the following dams: 1. La Cave, under development; 2. Des Joachims, now fully developed; 3. Bryson, fully developed; 4.

Chenaux, fully developed; 5. Chats falls, fully developed; 6. Chaudiere, fully developed.

In the area covered by these six developments there is the run-off from approximately 17,000 square miles, which accumulates a discharge of approximately 145,000 cubic feet per second, none of which can be controlled at any of the dams, as there is absolutely no storage.

It is therefore evident that the whole situation so far as the vicinity of Ottawa is concerned was due to the inability to store any of the waters between Timiskaming and Ottawa, a distance of approximately 200 miles, and that therefore the major lakes, Timiskaming, Quinze and Dozois, had no effect on the flood that took place in the Ottawa river, but, on the contrary, assisted in retarding the flow.

All things considered, we know of no move that could have been made that would alleviate flood conditions in the area other than the ones that have been indicated and we are pleased to have had the co-operation of the Ontario and Quebec hydro-electric power commissions in order to give full effect to these measures.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, since I raised the question may I express to the minister my appreciation of this review of what has taken place. From my own experience I know of the close co-operation there is between the provincial authorities and that section of his department which handles this subject. I would point out, however, that with the construction of the large new power dams on the river, new problems are presented. I would strongly urge that a general review of the whole situation be undertaken, with a view to considering the possibility of an increase in the storage facilities at some points, to hold not only the water in the upper areas but also the heavy flow that comes below these dams.

I am sure that the report correctly interprets the situation, because I know that the officials of the minister's department work in the closest co-operation with those who are primarily responsible for the operation of these dams.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, I certainly will give instructions to my officials to make a survey and look into these conditions, because the results of the flood are terrible. I am personally acquainted with the conditions, because they happen to be close to me, and no one sympathizes more with the people in those areas than I do.

5. If so, what did they resell?
6. How much did they receive for it?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. Yes.

2.

Automotive equipment and parts	$276,386.74
Metals, other than scrap	1,936.50
Scrap metal and other scrap material	2,033.71
Machine tools	3,050.96
Aircraft and aircraft components	952.00
Sundry materials other than classification above mentioned (Consumer goods mechanical)	17,785.59
Total	$302,145.50

3. Answered by No. 2.

4. This information is not available, as the government has no record of where firms submitting tenders have purchased their stocks. In the period from February 1, 1947, to April 11, 1951, the total value of vehicle spares and equipment, both new and used, purchased from this firm, amounted to $3,485,916.78. It is, however, impossible to state what part, if any, of this equipment was originally purchased from Crown Assets Disposal Corporation, as it is understood that this firm purchased war surplus equipment not only in Canada but also in the United States and England.

The following table shows a break-down of the above-mentioned purchases:

(a) Vehicle spares (for all types of vehicles)	$ 761,398.24
(b) Spares for Sherman tanks	419,316.30
(c) Spares for universal carriers (a semi-armoured tracked vehicle)	2,297,788.49
(d) Workshop tools and equipment	7,413.75
Total	$3,485,916.78

CANADIAN NATIONAL TELEGRAPHS—NEWFOUNDLAND—REVENUES AND EXPENDITURES

Mr. Browne (St. John's West):

What have been the revenues and expenditures of the Canadian National Telegraphs, Newfoundland, for the fiscal years 1949-50, and 1950-51?

Mr. Benidickson: The Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

The revenues and expenditures of the Canadian National Railways communications department in Newfoundland are kept on a calendar year basis, and this information from the date of entrustment of operation, April 1, 1949, to December 31, 1949, and for the calendar year 1950, is as follows:

Revenues and expenditures of Canadian National Telegraphs (communication systems) in Newfoundland:

	Year 1949	Year 1950
Operating revenues	$ 515,632	$ 929,435
Operating expenses	745,923	1,142,395
Net operating deficit	230,291	212,960
Other income—dr.	8,990	72,142
Total deficit	$ 239,281	$ 285,102

The above figures, it will be noted, cover operating revenues and expenses. They do not include charges for headquarters administrative expense.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT—INTERNATIONAL CARTELS

Mr. Diefenbaker:

What action has the Minister of Justice taken respecting the report of the commissioner of the Combines Investigation Act, dated October 10, 1945, and entitled "Canada and International Cartels"?

Mr. Garson: In a reply which I made on December 5, 1949, in regard to action taken with respect to recommendations contained in the report "Canada and International Cartels", a summary was given of the position at that time, and I shall now restate the substance of that reply with the minor changes necessary to bring it up to date.

The recommendations made in the report "Canada and International Cartels" are set out in pages 66 to 69, and may be summarized as follows:

1. Particular attention should be given by the combines investigation commission to restrictive agreements based on patents.

The Combines Investigation Act was amended in 1946 to give powers to the exchequer court to issue remedial orders in cases of use of patents or trade-marks unduly to limit production or restrain or injure trade. In its inquiries the combines investigation commission gives particular attention to restrictive arrangements based on patents.

2. The establishment of official government records which would show from time to time any significant change in the degree of financial control which corporations outside Canada exercise over individual domestic companies.

Information with respect to this matter is compiled by the dominion bureau of statistics which, from time to time, publishes the result of its studies in this field.

3. More adequate provision for the initiation of inquiries by the combines investigation commission into restraints of trade and unfair trade practices.

Amendments made to the Combines Investigation Act in 1946 empowered the commissioner to receive and inquire into complaints respecting practices alleged to be offences under the act or under sections 498 and 498A of the Criminal Code. Provision was also made in the 1946 amendments to restore the power of the commissioner to initiate inquiries under section 12 of the act.

4. The building up of an effective organization under the Combines Investigation Act supported by sufficient appropriations.

The staff of the commission is now thirty-one, compared with an average of eight in 1945. Recruitment of several additional officers is currently proceeding through the civil service commission. Appropriations have increased from $61,000 in the fiscal year 1945-46 to $237,669 in the fiscal year 1950-51. Estimates for the current year are slightly in excess of the 1950-51 appropriations.

5. Support should be given by the government of Canada to the establishment of an international office to deal with international cartels.

Canada participated in the United Nations conferences on trade and employment which resulted in the Havana charter for an international trade organization. This charter contained provisions for dealing with restrictive business practices by cartels. The charter has not been ratified by the requisite number of countries to bring it into effect.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

QUESTION OF ASSISTANCE TO SEED GROWERS OF BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the serious situation in which the small seed growers of British Columbia find themselves, what action is contemplated by the government by way of assistance?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I wish to thank the hon. member for sending me a copy of this question just before I entered the chamber. Since I did not have time to examine into all the facts relating to the answer which should be given, I should like to take the question as notice and answer at a later date.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Friday, April 20, consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, the debate on the budget has been going on for some time. We have heard a number of speakers, and most of the addresses have been extremely interesting. All subjects can be discussed in the budget debate, except of course the $65 million wheat payment, on which discussion is prohibited. It is natural that both in the house and in the country there should be much interest in the budget, and it is only right that many hon. members should discuss it. It touches the lives of all our people; its effects are felt in all homes and all businesses across the country. It affects people's pleasure; it affects every phase and every walk of life. To some the budget means privation; to others it simply means the curtailing of some of their pleasures and perhaps a few of their necessities.

As I listened to the debate I noticed that most of the government members more or less praised the budget and picked out what they felt was of benefit to the government. Those in the opposition of course have criticized it, and deservedly so; to my mind it is open to much criticism. It does emphasize the fact that we are living in most strenuous times, as is indicated by the budgets of other countries—Great Britain, France, Italy, the United States.

We have of course the fighting in Korea, which again seems to have become intensified. We have the cold war all over the world, the war of nerves, which also seems to be gaining in momentum. In addition we have in the United States a sort of civil war of words. This is something which I think must give the people in many parts of the world some cause for worry. We in Canada have always been proud to be associated with the United States as we are today. But I think we realize, as do other countries, that world leadership is something which is more or less new to our friends to the south, and that perhaps they are not as experienced as they should be in the role of world leaders. We regret, of course, that the British commonwealth of nations, which in the last two wars was more or less the leader in war and world matters, today is not in a position to fill that role. I believe the people of Canada are willing to pay their full share to meet the needs arising from world conditions, but I also feel that we should like to know just where we are going. We have been disturbed over the situation in the United States during the last week, and the people of Canada hope, as do the people in many other countries, that world affairs will not be determined by political expediency in the United States, a country which should be giving leadership—we hope it will give it—in matters of this kind.

The amount we are asked for in the budget, $3,700 million, is an enormous sum of money. Of this, over $1,664 million is to be used for defence. We realize that large sums must be spent for defence. The part we are taking now in the Korean war; the part which we must take, and indeed are pledged to take, with regard to the Atlantic pact and Atlantic defence; the part we must take in developing the defence of our own country, and also the part we must take in carrying on the general services of our country—all these make us realize that the appropriation of large sums is necessary.

A moment ago I pointed out that people in other parts of the world as well are being heavily taxed. I do not suppose that any other people are carrying a heavier burden or are more heavily taxed than the people of Great Britain. I mention this fact, Mr. Speaker, because it has been disconcerting to read recently in some of the papers—not in this country but in the United States—comment to the effect that Great Britain is not carrying her load. It might interest hon. members to know that neither Canada nor the United States can compare with Great Britain in the matter of the weight of taxation which is imposed upon the people. I should like to give a few instances.

A low-priced car in Great Britain pays a tax of $1,180. The tax on gasoline in Great Britain is 50 cents a gallon, as compared with 13½ cents paid here in Canada. We feel that we are paying an enormous tax on cigarettes, and so we are; but in Great Britain there is a tax of 52 cents on twenty cigarettes as compared with 25 cents in Canada. One could go on giving instances which indicate the great burden these people in the old country are bearing at the present time.

Britain is raising $13 billion in three years for defence. When we are told that she is not carrying her load, we need only to point out that she already has four divisions in Europe, whereas we in Canada have no troops there at all. She already has over a division in Korea. In Malaya she has troops which have been fighting now for a considerable length of time. She has troops in Hong Kong, in Iran, in Egypt, indeed in all parts of the world. This will give some idea of the burden which is being borne by that country. Since we are being asked to raise this enormous sum of money, I think the chief concern of the people in Canada today is that the money may be fairly collected from those who are most able to pay. Our second matter of concern is that this money must not be wasted but must be economically spent, and, third, we hope that the government will be able to stop inflation.

In discussing this matter in his budget speech on April 10, the minister said, as reported at page 1797 of Hansard:

> In the months that lie ahead, perhaps indeed for several years, we shall face a test of nerves, of our readiness to sacrifice immediate interests for future security. This is the background against which the budget must be viewed.

Contending that his policies were anti-inflationary, he declared, as reported at page 1800 of Hansard:

> The essential principle in preventing inflation is to restrict the total of all expenditure, public and private, to an amount which can be met from our production and imports.

This may be sound economics, but it is unlikely to impress the average individual who thinks of inflation in terms of skyrocketing prices and cannot see how it will be checked by imposts such as the boost in the sales tax, which will hoist prices even higher and make it more difficult for families in the modest income brackets to secure the necessities of life. The theory is, of course, that private spending can be controlled by taxes heavy enough to balance the amount of money in circulation against the supply of goods available; but it does not hold water. The surplus cash raked in by the treasury is quickly distributed again in lavish government expenditures.

Some may be encouraged by the fact that the minister mentioned the need for restricting public spending as well as private. It is to be hoped that this was not merely an empty statement.

All Canadians realize it is imperative that the country rearm, and that this will involve tremendous expenditures, but the revenue from the new taxes should be earmarked strictly for defence, and all non-essential government expenditures should be cut to the bone.

Speaking of the sales tax, Mr. Speaker, I should like to indicate its effect not upon the people of Canada in general, but more particularly upon the people of my own province. I do not know whether it is generally known or not, but besides the federal sales tax, in New Brunswick we have a four per cent sales tax—not on essential foods, but on all other articles in general. Therefore this ten per cent federal sales tax becomes fourteen per cent in New Brunswick, and when you consider the tax on the tax on the tax, as was pointed out here the other day by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), the sales tax in our small province becomes something in the vicinity of twenty per cent. This is a burden which is very difficult indeed for our people to bear, and no relief of any kind seems to be in sight.

I should like to consider the tax on electric goods. I can best illustrate how this tax bears on the young people, as has been mentioned in this house a number of times, by reciting an experience I had over the week end. I happened to be in the city of Montreal, and I met a young man and a young woman from my own constituency, who had left their home in New Brunswick a little over a year ago. I asked them how they were making out. They are married and have a child. They explained to me that for the past year they have been living in two rooms, but that they had hoped to get better accommodation. The cheapest they could get that was suitable was $75 a month, and they said that they had planned to buy an electric stove, and they also wished to have a refrigerator and some household furniture. They had arranged to buy and pay for these different articles, but now they find that the price of the electric stove they wished to buy has gone up fifteen per cent. The refrigerator they intended to buy has gone up fifteen per cent. There is a tax on the furniture that they intended to purchase, and the budget which they had been operating on for the past year has now been knocked on the head, as it were, and these young people, like many thousands of others across this country, are very much concerned. They had hoped that they might buy these articles on the instalment plan, but the instalments have now been restricted by the government, and this also has upset their plans.

Another matter which the people are very much concerned about is the question of government savings. We are told time and time again that it is very difficult for members of the opposition to point out just how savings can be made in government administration. Not knowing all the facts about the expenditures of the government, it is very difficult indeed to point specifically to individual items. Last year an hon. member spoke about savings in government publications. That is something we can all see, because day after day and week after week, whether we are in this House of Commons or whether we are at home, we receive publications from the different departments of this government, publications which are too numerous for us to read. Most of them go into the wastepaper basket. I am satisfied that the hon. member who brought this matter before the house last year was justified in saying that it was nothing but a waste of money and an unnecessary expenditure. To my mind, Mr. Speaker, these publications are nothing more or less than pamphlets for the glorification of this government, and for propaganda purposes, and they could very well be done away with.

There is also the question of reduction in staffs. This matter has been discussed in the house. In the old days, days not so long ago, most staffs were here in the city of Ottawa. We had of course a postmaster, a man in charge of the customs and a few public servants scattered about the country; but today in every village and every town across this country there is a staff of government employees. I am not saying that they should be discharged, but there should be some investigation, as there has been in the United States, to find out if all these employees are necessary.

Last week I received a letter from a man in my constituency. He had applied for the war veterans allowance. It was a clear case. There was no reason why he should not be entitled to the war veterans allowance, but over a period of three months as many as four different government officials called on this man to make sure whether he was entitled to the war veterans allowance. This sort of thing is going on all over the country.

As I said a moment ago, we should look into the question of government employees and see if many on the staffs could not be cut down.

So far as transportation is concerned there have been many changes in comparatively recent years. I recall that in my own province twenty-five or thirty years ago we had ten or a dozen steamers plying up and down the Saint John river, for instance, and its tributaries. It was practically the only means of transportation. Today there is not a large steamer on the Saint John river. The work is all done by trucks. What applies to the Saint John river I am satisfied applies to many other rivers and lakes across the country. But we still have the same expense. There are dozens of lighthouses on the river and tributaries. I have been told by many who live up the Saint John river that practically the only boats they have there are little pleasure yachts, small tugs, and so on. It seems to me this is something which should be investigated by the Minister of Transport with a view to seeing whether some savings could not be effected.

On the question of radar, I remember that when we visited the national research council last year we were told that while radar had been used previously on large steamers, through invention and science they now find that it is possible to make cheaper radar sets which can be used on small pleasure boats and on small tugs. I understand they are also being used on fishing boats. It is likely that a great saving could be made if this question were investigated with a view to adopting safe and up-to-date aids to transportation and doing away with outdated methods.

I see the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. Carroll) in his seat, and I should like to make one or two comments on his speech of a few days ago—it has been referred to already by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis). The hon. member for Inverness-Richmond is very fortunate—indeed he is more fortunate than most of us from the maritime provinces, and perhaps for that reason he can look in a more detached manner upon our situation down there. A few days ago he said that the people of the maritime provinces were more or less to blame for the situation in which they found themselves.

Mr. Carroll: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the hon. member is following in the footsteps of the hon. member for Cape Breton South. I did not discuss the maritime provinces at all in connection with confederation and industries. My sole theme was the province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. Brooks: It is a queer thing to me if Nova Scotia is not a maritime province. What applies to Nova Scotia applies also to New Brunswick and to Prince Edward Island, or to any of the four maritime provinces. The hon. member was speaking about Nova Scotia, and he made light of the decentralization of industry. He said it would be foolhardy for anyone to stand in his place and say that governments or government policies could have anything to do with the decentralization of industry, and contended that it was entirely a matter for the provinces.

I agree with the hon. member that it is not possible for this or any other government to go to a large concern and say: you must send part of your factory down to New Brunswick, or Nova Scotia, as the case may be. We do not say that, nor do we believe it. But we do say, as was pointed out the other day, that before confederation the people of the maritime provinces were prosperous, and after confederation dozens, yes hundreds of industries, left the maritimes and came to central Canada. We contend that it was policies of the federal government which caused the loss of industries in the maritime provinces.

We are not asking this or any other government to force individual companies to send branches to the maritimes, but we are asking that freight rates, fiscal policies, and other matters under the control of the federal government be handled in such a way that it will be profitable for industries to disperse their plants and to go into the maritime provinces. It was the policy of the federal government which drove them out, and we believe a policy can be evolved which will send them back.

Let me point out some of the disadvantages of centralization. If the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) is in his seat, he will recall that for many years there was in the town of St. Stephen a soap factory. A few years ago Lever Brothers obtained what amounted almost to a monopoly of the soap industry in this country, with the result that the factory was closed and was moved to Ontario. This meant less purchasing power in St. Stephen. It meant a loss of business; it meant that those whose employment depended on that factory had to take their families away. That is one of the results of of centralization.

Then let me illustrate the principle of decentralization. Only last year it was decided to build a cement factory in my constituency of Royal, at a place called Havelock, with the result that today the Canada Cement Company is building a plant there. It will employ about three hundred persons. The village today has a bank and a theatre; it has enlarged its schools; the merchants are prosperous, and the farmers of the area have a market in which to dispose of their goods. That is what decentralization means, Mr. Speaker. As I said a moment ago, we had a bitter experience with centralization.

I should like to discuss for a few moments an item which appeared in the press a few days ago with regard to an interview given by a member of the Nova Scotia legislature who was paying a visit to Florida and reported in the Florida press. Had he been an ordinary visitor the press and the people of Canada would have disregarded it. However, since he was a member of the Nova Scotia government there was more inclination to take his remarks seriously. The press report states that Mr. Harold Connolly, on his visit to Florida, predicted the union of Canada and the United States within a quarter of a century. I believe I know as well as anyone the people of the maritime provinces, particularly those in my own section, and I would say that not ten per cent of them want Canada to become part of the United States. He went on to say, as indicated in the press report:

> The people of Canada have a greater affinity for the United States than for Britain.

I do not know where he gets his information. The report continues to quote him as follows:

> The people of these two countries speak the same language, think along the same lines . . .

In Canada we speak two languages, both French and English; and I am satisfied that if within twenty-five years we became part of the United States we would not retain those two languages; rather we would all speak one language, what might be called the American language.

I have referred to this matter because I feel that Mr. Connolly was talking through his hat—or perhaps he was affected by the extreme heat of Florida, in contrast with the cold climate of Nova Scotia.

Mr. Dickey: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, apparently the hon. member is quoting a recent press report. I am sure if he will read the explanation of that report, which has been given due publicity in the same paper, it will be clear to him—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think that is a question of privilege.

Mr. Dickey: Well, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member would like to speak in the debate, provided he has not already done so, he will have that opportunity at some time after the hon. member for Royal has concluded his speech.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): May I ask the hon. member a question? Does he know that Mr. Connolly denied that statement?

Mr. Brooks: I have not seen any report which indicated that Mr. Connolly had denied it.

Mr. Dickey: Read the papers, then.

Mr. Brooks: He may have tried to deny it; I do not know. However, I should be more inclined to take the view of Professor Love, of the university of New Brunswick, in the matter. A press report of the speech by Professor Love, delivered at Orono, Maine, on April 19, states:

> The determination of Canadians to retain a distinct national culture, and their hope of thereby providing a strong link between the United States and Britain, were expressed here today by Prof. Robert J. Love, who is head of the department of education at the university of New Brunswick and was addressing a group of students and educational leaders at the conference on Canadian-American affairs being held here under the sponsorship of the university of Maine.

Then the report quotes Professor Love in these words:

> "There were many influences of the United States on Canada, but we are distinctly Canadian and intend to stay so," he said. "We want to stay Canadian, not because we don't like the United States, but because we feel we can accomplish more, contribute more, on that basis." He went on to point out that one of Canada's particular contributions would be to act as a strong bond between the United Kingdom and the United States.

In my opinion that expresses the situation quite clearly as to how we feel in Canada.

In closing I should like to refer to a matter that particularly affects my constituency. In the course of this debate we have heard some excellent addresses on dairying in Canada. We regret the position in which the dairy interests of this country find themselves. This is so particularly in the valley of the Kennebecasis in New Brunswick.

An hon. Member: Where is that?

Mr. Brooks: In my constituency of Royal, one of the finest dairying counties in eastern Canada, and I think one of the finest in all Canada. There are three large butter factories in my constituency. There is the Sussex Cheese and Butter Company; there is the Millstream dairy, and there is the Harvey dairy at Hampstead on the Saint John river. The butter factory at Sussex had the distinction a few years ago of making more butter in one season than any other factory in Canada. That will give hon. members some idea of the extent to which our part of the country is interested in dairying. The town of Sussex, my home town, has been known as the buttermilk town.

What the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. White) and the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair) pointed out with regard to their constituencies is true also of our part of the country. Because of the high prices obtainable for dairy cattle, many farmers have been selling their herds, with the result that there is not as much dairying going on. Many young men who are purchasing farms with the idea of going into dairying find it almost impossible to buy dairy cattle today, because they cannot afford to pay $300 or $400 a head for them. A total of 47,000 were sent to the United States last year and, practically the same number the year before. Many thousands more will be sent this year, with the result that dairy herds will be considerably depleted in some parts of the country.

The dairy industry is suffering severely from these conditions. I should like to advocate what was advocated by the hon. member for Lanark, that something be done in this connection, that a floor price of 62 cents be placed under butter as requested by the dairying industry. I hope that the Minister of Agriculture and the government as a whole will give serious consideration to this matter, which is so important to dairy farmers of my constituency as well as to the dairying interests across Canada.

Mr. James Sinclair (Coast-Capilano): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this budget debate I intend to limit myself to a discussion of matters which were dealt with in the budget presentation of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). So far, various members have spoken of problems affecting their riding, which is a common practice in the budget debate. There are some problems in my riding which I should like to air, but I shall not do it at this time, for fear that the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) may be in confusion as to whether I am speaking as the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance or as the member for Coast-Capilano.

Mr. Fulton: A lot of us are confused when you speak.

Mr. Sinclair: I am going to do my best to enlighten the hon. member, if that is possible, during the course of this speech.

In his budget speech the Minister of Finance gave a comprehensive review of the economic position of this nation. He indicated the steady growth that Canada has undergone since the end of the war. He indicated the financial measures which the government feel they must take in order to pay for our greatly increased defence expenditures and to take part in the joint defence of freedom to which this country is committed.

I think the people of the country appreciate that the budget is a tough but realistic one. Actually I think they expected it to be much more severe. I think they appreciate that the Minister of Finance had laid a heavy load on the people of this country but it has been laid fairly. To my mind no better evidence of this statement can be found than what was contained in the leading editorial of the Toronto Telegram the day after the budget presentation. As hon. members know, the Toronto Telegram is the one true blue, unswerving champion of the Progressive Conservative party. This editorial starts off as follows:

> Budget lays Heavy but Even Burden
> As a budget designed to raise revenue on a fair basis to pay for defence costs that all recognize must be met, Mr. Abbott has done a creditable job.

Then they go on to analyse the various proposals in the budget, and they conclude with the following words:

> In laying a heavy burden on the Canadian taxpayer Mr. Abbott has judged that the country realizes the need for a strong defence, and in the main he has laid the burden evenly on everyone's shoulders.

Since the introduction of the budget various members of the opposition have criticized certain of the tax proposals. Those of us who sat in the budget committee knew long before the budget was introduced into the house from what direction these attacks would come. The C.C.F., of course, would criticize the corporation tax, that we were not soaking the companies enough. Both parties would recoil in horror from any increase in the personal income tax. They would decry our policy not to increase taxes on that luxury, liquor, and at the same time they would oppose our putting increased taxes on those necessities, cigarettes. They would call the cut in the tax on candy appeasement of the children. We knew that the tax on electrical appliances would be labelled by the opposition as a blow to the Canadian home. Above all, we knew that the two per cent increase in sales tax would never be referred to as a two per cent increase but as a twenty-five per cent increase.

We knew these things would come, because the function of an opposition is always to oppose all tax measures and never to suggest any alternative tax measures. Let me turn, therefore, to each of these items.

First, let me recall to hon. members that the task facing the Minister of Finance this year was to raise an extra $400 million to meet those defence costs which have been so thoroughly endorsed by members of this House of Commons. The primary purpose of this budget is to raise revenues; the secondary purpose of these tax measures is to curb unnecessary spending in order to make goods and materials more available for defence needs. In this task the minister has tried to spread as fairly as possible the load upon the Canadian people.

Let me turn first to the corporation tax. That, of course, was the field of main attack by the leader of the C.C.F. (Mr. Coldwell). At the end of the war we had an 18 per cent corporation tax, plus a 100 per cent excess profits tax. That was changed later to a flat 30 per cent corporation tax which was applied to all the profits of corporations. Later, as a measure of encouragement to small companies, we changed that tax to 10 per cent on the first $10,000 of profits, and to make sure that the country did not lose revenue because of this change we increased the tax on the bigger corporations to 33 per cent. That was the tax in effect on corporations of this country at the time of the Korean aggression. The baby budget last fall provided for an increase in taxes to meet added defence costs, one being an increase of 5 per cent in corporation taxes as well as a substantial increase in the liquor taxes. The corporation tax was then 15 per cent on small companies and 38 per cent on big companies, plus the 5 per cent tax which we collect for eight of the provinces, and in the case of Quebec and Ontario plus the 7 per cent tax which they levy. Now, again to meet still added defence costs, the minister has imposed a surcharge of 20 per cent on this corporation tax rate.

Why a surcharge? There are good reasons for a surcharge instead of another change in the rates. In the first place it leaves the existing tax structure unaltered. Whatever tax is payable under the old plan, in the end 20 per cent more is payable. The second reason I think is good psychology; it is that every corporation—and the same applies to individuals—in making out its tax return may have again impressed upon it the cost of the defence program, because this is a defence surcharge. If conditions in the world improve that 20 per cent surcharge can be lowered. If conditions get worse it may be necessary to increase it. We did not put the surcharge on the small corporations; but that now lifts the corporation tax payable in Canada to 50·6 per cent on gross profits in eight of the provinces and to 52·6 per cent in the two central provinces, where incidentally most of the corporations are located. This means that in Canada today we are taking more than half the gross profits of the corporations. It means in effect that the people of Canada are the major shareholders in every successful corporation. Of course if they do not make money it is their own money they lose, but we are now taking more than half the profits of the successful corporations of Canada.

The leader of the C.C.F. party asserts that we should be taking still more. He complains of rising profits, and suggests that a cut in those profits would mean a cut in prices. I am indebted to the editor of the Montreal Gazette for calling to my attention an excellent publication put out by the British Labour party entitled "This cost of living business." You know, over in Britain the socialists are in power, and they have the same problems as far as inflation is concerned as the Liberals have in this country. The publication to which I refer is not a government publication. It is not an official publication of the Labour party. It is a pamphlet turned out for the benefit of their supporters, so they may have some of the answers to give the people who are complaining about this high cost of living. I would recommend the pamphlet to every hon. member of this house, because it will show the difference between the thinking of the socialists who are in power and socialists who are not in power. You will realize, of course, that the British Labour government, like the socialist government in Saskatchewan, have learned some bitter lessons while in power. In Saskatchewan they learned those lessons through their boot factory and their blanket factory. In Britain they learned them through the ground nuts scheme in Tanganyika and the poultry scheme in Gambia. The portion of this pamphlet to which I want to direct particular attention, however, is the part relating to profits. All hon. members have heard the socialists in this country denounce the profit motive. They would work for production for use, not for profit. The socialists of Britain were no different until they got into power, but this is what the pamphlet says:

> Profits cater for the creation of reserves to pay for expansion and re-equipment, and the additional money manufacturers want to pay dividends to their shareholders. The more money firms put aside to develop new methods of production, the more consumers have to pay now for goods. But new equipment and better laid-out factories mean more efficient production, lower costs, and the possibility of lower prices in the long run. If the money to pay for this were not raised from profits it would have to be raised in some other way.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

Something most of us knew a long time ago.

> When prices are rising, and both production and sales increasing as at present, profits are likely to be relatively high and rising. This is not to say that all firms or all industries will be making profits. Most consumer goods are made by a fairly large number of firms, the profits of which vary between the leading and the less efficient firms.
> Profits tax prevents the accumulation of excessive profits. The proceeds of this taxation help to pay for food subsidies, social services and other instruments of community welfare.

Then what can be done in reference to limiting profits?

> Can we, then, cut profits?
>
> First, it has been explained that, to the extent that profit makes provision for re-equipment and new building, it is an element in increasing efficiency in industry which, in the long run, should make price reduction possible. This leaves then that part of the profit which is distributed to shareholders.
> A reduction in distributed profits could do little to reduce prices. They are a very small part of the cost of any item so, although there are very many excellent reasons for dividend limitation and profit control, their effectiveness as a means of reducing the cost of living is not one of them. Even if profits were eliminated altogether there would still be a cost of living problem.

If the leader of the C.C.F. does not want to learn from the experience of the Labour government in London, I have another suggestion to offer. It is a suggestion I have made in the past. I am always amazed that those who speak for the socialist party about business, business profits, corporation taxes and so on, are those who have had absolutely no experience with them. I would like to see the leader of the C.C.F. party put up the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) or the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Jones), both extremely successful businessmen, and let us have their views on whether or not we are taxing corporations enough. Let us have their views on whether it is possible for business to evade taxes or to ease the burden. I make it a point, of course, to talk to as many people in business as I can and get their reaction to tax changes, and I have spoken to the hon. member for Moose Jaw. I am sure he will not think I am abusing any confidence when I say he gave me a new wrinkle after the last tax change went through. He said, "Abbott is now the major shareholder in my company. He takes 50·6 per cent of the profits, and more than that he takes it in cash payable immediately. I am left with accounts receivable, stock on hand and the investment I put into the business."

The next point is this matter of the limit of 5 per cent, which the leader of the C.C.F. also criticizes; that is, that the surtax should not cut the profits of any corporation to less than 5 per cent of the capital employed. The reason for this is very simple. There are corporations in this country whose profits are limited by federal, provincial or municipal regulation. I refer to the group of corporations generally called public utilities. Their profits are limited; the rates they can charge are tied in with the profits, and when we levy a heavy tax rate on corporations like that of course we greatly reduce their earning power. That is a bad thing if at the same time we are expecting those companies to expand. Today, with defence needs what they are, we are expecting the power companies of this country to greatly expand their facilities for the production of electrical power. We are expecting these corporations to improve their transportation facilities. That requires more capital. They certainly are not going to get it from profits, because their profits are limited, and since we have increased the tax they have great difficulty borrowing in the open market. Who will put money into a corporation where the profits are so limited when he can just as easily put it into other industrial stocks which are making higher profits? That is the reason we have this safeguard that the surtax shall not reduce the profits of those public utilities corporations to less than 5 per cent.

The third point in connection with corporation taxation is this change in depreciation, this deferred depreciation. It is a direct consequence of the fact that we are now taking more than half the profits of a corporation. Once we do that we cross a psychological barrier and get into the field of excess profits tax thinking. The businessman thinks the government is taking more than half his money. Then, of course, he is an easy victim to those salesmen who try to load him up with every type of frill for his business, electric typewriters, fancy chrome fronts and all that sort of thing, with the thought that the government is going to pay for half of it out of profits and the depreciation will take care of the rest. It was to stop needless expansion of unessential industry at this time that the minister announced this plan, not to halt depreciation but to postpone depreciation on such items for four years. The choice is the choice of the individual businessman. If he chooses to go ahead, that is his choice; but he will get no depreciation on it until the four years are up. Curiously enough the British, in their budget presented the same day, arrived at almost the same device to halt needless expenditure in unessential business.

I should like to finish this corporation tax with just one other item for the leader of the C.C.F. party. Actually Canada taxes corporations much more heavily than does the Labour party in Great Britain. Until this budget the British had a tax of 30 per cent on distributed profits, that is dividends paid out. In the last budget, that was raised to 50 per cent. We, however, have this tax today of 50·6 per cent on all profits paid out or not. If they are paid out as dividends, they then become subject to the personal income tax which ranges from 15 per cent in the first bracket to 80 per cent in the top bracket. If the eventual recipient of those dividends dies, then we take another crack at it in the form of very heavy succession duties. On the other hand, if the corporation itself chooses to keep half of those profits in the form of adding to the capital, we charge them 15 per cent.

I turn now to the personal income tax and the 20 per cent surcharge. It was put on for exactly the same reasons as I mentioned in connection with the corporate tax. It would not alter the existing tax structure, but it would be a constant reminder to every Canadian that the defence of freedom is not free. There is a price that we must pay for these things. Of course, we expected an immediate revival of the exemptions bidding and criticism of our political opponents as we had later in 1949. We had the Tories bidding $1,200 and $2,400 in 1949, and we had the C.C.F. bidding $1,500 and $3,000 as exemptions under personal income tax. Those bids have been repeated. The only interesting thing about it is that the member for Hastings-Peterborough became a little confused and though a Tory he made the C.C.F. bid of $1,500 and $3,000.

I should like to turn now to the subject of the surtax and those exemptions. The most curious charge in connection with the surtax was made by the leader of the C.C.F. (Mr. Coldwell) and the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) when they said it was not progressive. This is not just progressive, it is violently progressive. We will take an example of $100 of taxable income in the first bracket and then in the top bracket. In the first bracket, $100 at the old rate of 15 per cent will take $15 out of the hundred leaving him $85 income. At the new rate, with 20 per cent surcharge added, he pays $18 tax. He is left with $82, so he has suffered a cut in income from $85 to $82, 3·5 per cent. Let us take $100 in the top bracket, the 80 per cent bracket. Under the old tax rate a man had $20 left. We increased the 80 per cent by 20 per cent to make it 96 per cent, so he is left with $4. In other words, the income he received has been reduced from $20 to $4, an 80 per cent reduction in his income. That is not just progressive, it is so violently progressive that, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) pointed out in his budget speech, we cannot go on with that level of surcharge. If it is necessary to raise additional taxes there will have to be a change in the base rate.

I should like to consider the commodity taxes now. To start off, of course, there is liquor. Hon. members generally, except the Conservatives, deplored the fact that we had not increased the tax on liquor. An expression used was that liquor was going scot-free. I want to tell you today that liquor is one commodity on which we have never reduced the taxation, even in the glorious days of the sunshine budget. Liquor was the first commodity we hit in the baby budget. Today a bottle of rye whisky which the distiller sells to the liquor control board for $1.10 costs the consumer $4.25, a 300 per cent mark-up on the manufacturer's cost; that is certainly not "scot-free". We have felt from an examination of our tax records that the point of diminishing returns has almost been reached so far as the liquor tax is concerned. It is aggravated by the condition that there is such a disparity between the cost of manufacture and the cost of sale, and when the actual manufacture is a fairly simple process. You always have the threat of widespread bootlegging and moonshining. It was for these reasons that in this budget liquor was left untouched.

If we had any doubts about how right our position was, it was certainly put at ease by a statement made by Premier Frost, who after all is the only Conservative premier in Canada today, and is generally regarded as the white hope of the party. In the legislature in Queen's Park, he had this to say about the liquor tax:

> My own preference would be in favour of the federal government making some suitable arrangements to vacate the liquor tax field, so that the provinces would not only have the problems but the revenues. Indeed, I now express the hope that the federal government will make a start by not imposing new taxes in this field.

Then he added later:

> The province of Ontario might be pushed into a $10 million deficit by further federal taxation of liquor.

Then later he added:

> I have expressed these views to the Minister of Finance and others, and have stated them publicly, and I take this opportunity of reaffirming my position.

Well, that was one of the reasons why the liquor tax was not increased.

I have had much pleasure in sitting as a listener during the last two dominion-provincial conferences. I think one of the great tributes which can be paid to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) is the harmony which now exists between the federal government and the ten provinces. It was for that reason there was no consideration at all given in this budget to moving into some of the joint fields in which we were during the last war, such as the amusement tax, parimutuel tax and gasoline tax. At the moment we are leaving those to the provinces. Mind you, this is not a tax matter so far as the provinces are concerned. They are in the business of selling liquor just as any other concern who is in business in Canada selling any commodity. They are appealing to us for tax relief in the same way as any other business group comes to the Minister of Finance and puts forward special pleas as to why their commodity should not be hurt so far as extra taxes are concerned.

There was another reason which I think would not have affected the thinking of the Minister of Finance but which is in the background as far as such members as myself are concerned. Suppose we had increased the liquor tax and Premier Frost, who is also the provincial treasurer, had had a deficit of $10 million: we might have been accused of deliberately dulling the lustre of the only good leader the Tories have in the field at the present time. We have preferred to leave that job to the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Thomson), who will do that job this year.

Taking candy as the next item, we had tangible evidence of the law of diminishing returns here. In the baby budget we imposed a 30 per cent tax on candy. The candy manufacturers were able to show through their sales, and the Department of National Revenue could see from the tax collections, that the tax was too severe in relation to the tax on other industries. They were suffering a steady loss of income. It was for that reason that the tax was cut from 30 per cent to 15 per cent. It has always been the intention of the Minister of Finance to spread the tax load fairly across all industries. If a mistake is made, it will be corrected, as we have corrected this.

The excise taxes are the next group, and I think there is fairly general agreement that the increase in tax from 15 per cent to 25 per cent on luxuries and semi-luxuries was necessary. There was, of course, a protest on the special 15 per cent tax increase on electric stoves, refrigerators and washing machines. Well, that tax was imposed, first of all, for the same primary reason as other taxes, for revenue. The second reason was to check spending on goods with defence content. The spending on these items has been amazing in the last few years. The Minister of Finance put on the record some of the increases in sales in individual goods, not dollar sales. Refrigerator sales, for example, last year were double the previous year and three times the year before. These articles, of course, are articles which do use a great deal of material which is extremely necessary for defence. We think of steel first of all. There is another one, though, copper. Some of you may have seen the quite striking advertisement appearing in most of the United States magazines this month, by the Anaconda Copper Company, the greatest primary producer of copper in the United States and one which generally does not advertise in consumer magazines. The advertisement is headed:

How many rounds can your kitchen shoot?

Then they go on to say:

It takes all the copper in your kitchen—in your refrigerator, range, washer, mixer, toaster—to make the ammunition a ·50 calibre machine gun fires in less than a minute.

This fantastic ratio of war to peace—one B-29 to 1,670 electric ranges, one tank to 47 refrigerators—is a problem that is straining every resource of the copper industry. Despite this enormous effort, it is impossible to provide enough copper, brass and bronze for our military needs and all our civilian wants as well.

The taxes on these things are regrettable but necessary. I think indirectly however this indicates a great rise in our standard of living when members here assert that it is the almost inalienable right of every young Canadian couple who get married to have an electric refrigerator, an electric washing machine and an electric stove. I do not think many members of this House of Commons started out in married life with those possessions.

Mr. Cardiff: Would you like to go back twenty-five years?

Mr. Sinclair: Now I come along to the sales tax. The minister, in his own presentation, brought it up by detailing expected revenues and showing that he was still $100 million short of meeting the extra defence expenditures which had been approved by this house, and therefore there was the remorseless necessity of increasing this basic sales tax. We did not change the base. That fact must be repeated. The sales tax today does not apply to food, fuel or building material. Each year we have widened that base. The minister put on the record the dominion bureau of statistics' estimate that only one-quarter of the expenditures of a low income family are today subject to sales tax. But other members, such as the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) for example, traced the change in the sales tax over the years—the steadily mounting sales tax—and inferred that it was owing to government extravagance. Let me also point out other things that have happened over the same years as the increase in the sales tax: Family allowances, $300 million; old age pensions, another $100 million; a national health program, $35 million. Those three items alone cost more than the $400 million which is raised today by the 8 per cent sales tax. I cannot help but think that the quotation from the minister on this point, as reported at page 1815, should be repeated in Hansard:

It is an inexorable rule of life that we can never really get something for nothing. Nothing is really free. Everything worth while has its costs. Tonight is the annual occasion when we count up the cost of our policies in terms of money. That cost is high, but failure to achieve our objectives of peace, security and financial integrity would involve infinitely greater and more painful cost.

The one suggestion that the hon. member for Greenwood had was that we could have avoided this increase in sales tax if the government would practise economy, if they would stop needless waste, extravagance and unnecessary expenditures. Early this session I made quite a long speech on this subject. The speech was prompted by the speech of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) out in Saskatoon, in which he said that he could save or lop off half a billion dollars from government spending, without affecting defence spending or necessary civilian services. In this house I repeated the challenge to him. I asked for the co-operation of every member of the house in indicating where the savings were to be made; because the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), as chairman of the treasury board, is more anxious than anyone else in this country to see such savings effected. Since that time I have been keeping a careful note here on my desk. Every time a Conservative member spoke, I listened for practical specific suggestions with respect to economy.

An hon. Member: And you did not get any.

Mr. Sinclair: I did get one. I got almost one from the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and today the hon. member for Royal, who spoke before me, made the second practical suggestion. He said that from his own knowledge in his own riding he thought that perhaps, because of changed conditions, we could do without some of the lighthouses on the Saint John river. When I spoke earlier, that was the very thing that I invited hon. members to do. They have the best knowledge of conditions back in their ridings, as to what facilities are no longer necessary, and what facilities have superfluous staff. I sincerely thank the hon. member for bringing forward the only tangible and specific economy suggestion mentioned by the Tory party this session. It is true that members of the opposition talk in resounding phrases about needless expenses for publications and travelling expenses. The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Robertson) the other night pricked the bubble of this claim with regard to travelling expenses made by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming). The hon. member for Eglinton pointed out that despite these economies, travelling expenses are up $8 million; but the hon. member for Northumberland showed that they were up $8 million entirely because of added defence and defence production expenses and because the Royal Canadian Mounted Police had taken over another province, namely British Columbia. The Tories talk about publications and publicity generally, but never specifically. A little earlier this session I put through the Farm Improvement Loans Act, and two hon. members asked: How do farmers know about this. They do not seem to know enough. We should have more publicity. The hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Cardiff)—

Mr. Cardiff: I am right here.

Mr. Sinclair: Yes; so I see. I said that we had not spent a great deal. He said, "You should be spending more on publicity." He is quite right and we are. When the Tories get down to specific instances, they find that the expenses are justified. So they content themselves with making these sweeping charges about extravagance, needless expenditures, Hoover commissions and half-billion dollar savings. There is one place where they might get any information they please about any expenditure the government has made, audited by the controller of the treasury, audited by the Auditor General; that is in the public accounts committee. That takes hard work, of course. You cannot go in on a fishing expedition, as some of them do—open the book on public accounts and say, "What does this mean?" They should have had all the data that they could receive from the minister by way of orders for returns, from the department by way of letters, and from their constituents by way of knowledge of the services before they enter public accounts committee to ask about items. But let us see just what is the attendance of these economy-minded Conservatives on the public accounts committee. They have ten members on the committee headed by the leader of the opposition. In the meetings so far they have had in attendance three members, three members, six members, four members, four members, three members, two members; and never once has the leader of the opposition bothered to attend a meeting of the public accounts committee. He prefers of course to speak back in Saskatoon about half-billion dollar savings. He prefers to make these resounding speeches about extravagance and needless expenditures but never once to mention one specific economy. As I said when I spoke earlier, I was looking for suggestions for economy which these Conservatives were making and here I have three solid pages of notes which indicate that almost every member over there, some time since this session began has made, not suggestions for economy but rather many, many suggestions to increase government expenditures. I see that my friend the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) is in his place. I think he is the only personal friend I have in the Conservative party. He made a great speech in this house just a couple of days ago, and in it he did two things. In the first place, he decried government savings as far as the civil service was concerned; they were paltry, he said—5 per cent. Economy has to start somewhere.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I spoke of the post office employees.

Mr. Sinclair: Yes, he spoke of the post office; that is quite true. Yet the post office is the biggest employer of labour in the government service. How are you going to make economies in the civil service if you do not do so in the post office which is the biggest employer? But while he wants to cut expenditure, and so save taxes, he says we are not doing enough in the Colombo plan and that, instead of spending $25 million, we should be spending $50 million. Fifty million dollars is one per cent on the present sales tax.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I did not say that, as a matter of fact. My hon. friend apparently did not realize that I made no such statement the other day. Some weeks ago, in the course of a speech, I suggested that this was one expenditure that would be part of the defence expenditures of this country. I suggested $50 million. The government decided on $25 million. I raised no objection in any way the other day.

Mr. Sinclair: That is just my point. While that speech was on the radio, the speech the other day was almost the same, with the exception that in the one on the radio the hon. member advocated $50 million, but in the house just inferred it. Again desirable, I agree, but these are expenditures which do not decrease the tax rate of the Canadian people; they increase the tax rate of the Canadian people. The Liberal members of this house are willing to advocate such things, but they are also willing to have the necessary taxes to get these things. The members of the C.C.F. also are very keen in advocating increased expenditures, but they do say the money can be found by soaking the corporations, or by running business themselves. Even the members of the Social Credit party have their solutions, and they tell us how money can be found. Only the Conservatives keep insisting on still greater expenditures in this house, but never suggest one means by which a specific saving can be made, except that the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) today suggested we could do away with certain lighthouses, and the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan), speaking as the national chairman of the Progressive Conservative party, opposed the St. Lawrence seaway last week. We Liberals do think that the St. Lawrence seaway, which will cost us half a billion dollars, is a necessary and worth-while expenditure for all Canada. But it was nice to have on record the fact that the president of the national Progressive Conservative association, speaking in this House of Commons, opposes officially the St. Lawrence seaway. That is one economy on which the Tories have agreed.

I now want to make a few remarks on propaganda. In the old days of parliamentary debate facts were countered by facts. It is true that some people shaded the facts, and some people quoted only the facts that suited them. But in the 1930's a new technique was developed by Joseph Goebbels, namely the technique of the big lie. Tell a big enough lie and tell it often, never quote facts, and in the end you will get perhaps the ignorant and the credulous to believe you. The Russians have picked it up. "Russia wants peace; Russia wants peace. The west wants war; the west wants war; the South Koreans and the United Nations are the aggressors; the North Koreans are defending themselves". Repeat it endlessly and you may bring convictions. The one essential in this is to hammer away incessantly on the big lie, never support it by facts. Ignore facts, hoping to get the credulous, the ignorant and the misinformed to believe you. Today in Canada, the national Progressive Conservative party has adopted the technique of the big lie. They are barren of policy, devoid of an appeal to the Canadian people, unhappy in their leadership—

Mr. Tustin: Nonsense.

Mr. Sinclair: —and so they have turned to this one great charge, "the government is extravagant; the government is wasting money; the government has needless expenditures"; but never do they come forward with tangible items saying: We will cut this out. Never do they restrain themselves from making other demands on the treasury, they make endless bigger demands. I think the Canadian people are too well informed to fall, as did the Germans and as have the Russians, for the technique of the big lie. I think they have a great admiration for the great job, and the courageous job which has been done in connection with the finances of this country, both in war by the Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley, and in the difficult days since the war by the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott).

It would have been a very easy thing in these recent years, since the Minister of Finance has had surpluses, for him to have done one of two things: to have cut taxes across this country to make a good fellow of himself—

An hon. Member: He did on the eve of an election.

Mr. Sinclair: —or, second, to have said yes to all those demands of the Conservatives for expenditures on Passamaquoddy and bigger subsidies on grain and hogs and cheese, and bonuses on gold, on floor prices for potatoes, on cheese and all the many things that they have advocated without ever mentioning the taxes to pay for them. Instead he chose to follow the path that any prudent Canadian, be he farmer, fisherman or businessman, has always followed. In good times, you pay off your debts. I think the most glowing tribute to the present Minister of Finance has not been said in glowing words in this debate but is found buried in the cold statistics of the public accounts. Page 50 of the public accounts shows the debt position of this country. Since 1867 to 1946 in only 15 years did we pay our way and have a surplus. The surplus in all those years totalled $300 million. Since the minister became Minister of Finance, in 1946 in the five budgets that he has presented every year we have had a surplus which has been applied to debt reduction. When he became Minister of Finance our net debt was $13,400 million. Today after reductions of five years of almost $2 billion—that means almost $60 million a year in interest charges saved—our net debt is $11,400 million. The people of Canada measure up that record of courage, that record of performance, against this Tory technique of the big lie, these continued, aimless charges of extravagance, waste and endless expenditures, and the position of the people of Canada today is the same as their position in June, 1949, when they gave such great endorsement to this government.

Mr. J. A. Charlton (Brant-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, taking part in the budget debate one hesitates to take the time of this house to repeat many of the things said previously, but in some cases they bear repeating many times. The previous speaker has seen fit to repeat many of the things that the opposition have been saying on the matter for the last week. Whether his hindsight is better than his foresight remains to be seen. So far as the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) is concerned, I should like to tell him that if he would like to go back forty or fifty years, when he suggests that many hon. members did not have refrigerators and electric stoves when they started housekeeping, and for that reason probably the young couples today should not desire to have these things, I do not agree with him.

He also accused the party to which I have the honour to belong of the technique of the big lie. People in glass houses should not throw stones. The Progressive Conservative party at least say the same thing in the House of Commons as they do outside.

Mr. Sinclair: George Valade!

Mr. Charlton: I wonder whether that can be said of many of the ministers of the crown in the past six months, because we have an instance of statements being made in the House of Commons when the education resolution was up for discussion some time ago, and the Liberal members all voted against that resolution, and one of the ministers saying outside that the government is prepared to give federal aid to education. Is that misrepresentation, or holding a carrot in front of the people on a stick?

Certainly the opposition is not the government. It is up to the government to bring forward a policy and to defend that policy. Certainly it cannot be said that the government has not all the powers necessary to control inflation; but what do they do? Next to nothing. "The time is not yet; not now, later. Wait and see". The whole trouble is apparently they have a wildcat by the tail and they can't let go. Neither are they trying to do anything to clip its claws.

In a radio speech last Tuesday evening, April 17, the Minister of Finance said that it was not price controls we need, but purse control. I consider it an insult to the Canadian people, Mr. Speaker, when the controller of their pocketbook tells them that they cannot spend money, but the government continues merrily on its spending spree. From the best information available it would appear that we are facing a further increase in the cost of living, even before the budget was presented to this house.

It is no exaggeration to say that the tax increases announced by the Minister of Finance will materially contribute further to existing difficult conditions, particularly on the lower income groups. In short, Mr. Speaker, it is no exaggeration to say that the actions of this government, as expressed through the Minister of Finance and the taxation measures he has selected, will certainly help the workingman in Canada to keep his head below water. It can have no other result. Certainly manufacturers are not going to absorb any portion of that extra tax, and as prices increase, taxes pyramid and the consumer pays. This has been proven in the case of cigarettes; the extra tax on cigarettes was three cents a package but the price increase was four cents. Gasoline and diesel oil are other examples of increases due directly to this budget. It is not common to see a man in work clothes smoking cigars, but the tax on cigars was not increased; it was increased only on pipe and cigarette tobaccos, products which the man in working clothes uses.

The special excise tax of 15 per cent for instance on stoves, refrigerators, washing machines and radios will make it that much more difficult for young couples starting up housekeeping. The tax on liquor was not increased. Most harsh of all, however, was the 25 per cent increase in the general sales tax, which will affect every citizen of this country. On June 4, 1940, the Hon. J. L. Ralston referred to the sales tax in these words:

> We realize that increases in indirect taxes disguise the burdens imposed by the war, but they are much more likely to distribute these burdens harshly and unfairly.

And Mr. Ilsley on April 29, 1941, said this:

> An increase in the sales tax has, I think, been fairly generally expected. At least there are evidences of a good deal of buying in anticipation of such an increase. This tax, while comparatively easy of administration and collection, and extremely productive, has marked defects as a fiscal instrument. After extended consideration we decided on balance against any increase. In coming to this decision we were not forgetful of the problems of agriculture, which would have been intensified had the sales tax been raised.

Later, on October 12, 1945, Mr. Ilsley made this comment concerning sales tax:

> I have been impressed also with the extent to which the sales tax is having a discouraging effect on the rapid and efficient modernization of our productive equipment.

Later in the same speech he said this:

> Particularly we should remove those taxes which imposed far back in the production process, increased costs out of proportion to the contribution which they make to the revenue.

Surely, after all that the supporters of this government have said about the general sales tax, the government will now reconsider its position on this announced increase. Added to the highest cost of living ever recorded in this country, these new tax impositions will cause almost unbearable distress on pensioners, and others in low income groups—those least able to bear added costs. Agricultural producers will be faced with higher costs at a time when production in certain commodities is already approaching a dangerously low level.

It has been said by many that food is too dear, and is the cause of the high cost of living. While food materially contributes to the cost of living, certainly the producer is getting only a very small percentage of the consumer dollar. The following is a short quotation from the Ontario Fruit and Vegetable Growers Association booklet, stating:

> The urban public, with little knowledge of the agricultural processes, is always prone to blame the farmer for rising food prices. For some unknown reason the farmer should be content with small profits or small wages so the so-called consumer may have cheap food.

It is, therefore, interesting to break down the consumer dollar in an effort to ascertain who gets the most of it. Figures available on canned fruits and vegetables afford an excellent illustration.

The canned fruit or vegetable content per ton of raw product used varies with the efficiency and the equipment of each processor. The final yield is also affected by seasonal factors which increase or decrease the turnout, that is to say, the average quality of the produce, the percentage of waste, the high or low water content, etc. By and large, however, the following figures are average for the canning industry as a whole, based on 1950 contract prices to producers and present consumer prices at Ottawa stores:

> Canned tomatoes: 28 oz. tin; yield 50 doz. tins per one ton of tomatoes, or 3½ lbs. of tomatoes raw weight per tin. Consumer pays 18 to 20 cents; producer gets 3·5 cents per tin.
> Tomato juice: 20 oz. tin; yield 100 doz. tins per one ton of tomatoes, or 1⅝ lbs. of tomatoes raw weight per tin. Consumer pays 11 to 12½ cents; producer gets 1·8 cents per tin.
> Sweet corn: 20 oz. tin or 14 oz. vacuum packed tin (both contain approximately the same amount of product); yield 50 doz. tins per one ton of sweet corn, or 3½ lbs. of sweet corn raw weight per tin. Consumer pays 14½ to 18 cents. The producer gets 3·1 cents per tin.
> Green peas: 20 oz. tin; yield 192 doz. tins per one ton of green peas, or ⅞ lbs. of green peas raw weight per tin. Consumer pays 15 to 21 cents; the producer gets 3·2 cents.
> Green beans: 20 oz. tin; yields 200 doz. tins per one ton of beans, or ⅝ lbs. of beans raw weight per tin. Consumer pays 14 to 27 cents; the producer gets 3·3 cents per tin.
> Peaches: 20 oz. tin syrup pack—yield 1600 tins per one ton of peaches, or 1¼ lbs. of peaches raw weight per tin. Consumer pays 25 to 28. Producer gets 5·7 cents per tin.

Variations in consumer prices depend on the grade—fancy, choice or standard. Further proof of this is found in figures taken from the United States Department of Agriculture, bureau of agricultural economics, appearing in the London Free Press of April 10, as follows:

> Like this for example. Using last December's prices, if the farmer gave away the wool in a $50 suit of men's clothing the suit would still sell for $40.50. If he'd give away the wheat in a 16 cent loaf of bread the loaf would still cost the consumer 13·4 cents. If the farmer gave away the beans in a 16 cent can of pork and beans, the can would still cost you 14 cents at the grocery store. For cigarette smokers—
> And these are American prices.
> —if the tobacco grower gave away the tobacco in a 20-cent packet of cigarettes, the girl behind the counter would still ask you for 17 cents to pay for that purchase.

Net farm income has dropped appreciably in the last year. Nearly 100,000 farmers and farm workers have left farms over the last three years. Why? Because of the uncertainty of farm income. This government, through the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), has permitted this condition to continue by failing to give leadership to agriculture. The penny-pinching policy of the Department of Agriculture, and failure to make adequate use of the Agricultural Prices Support Act, have cost the consumer of this country millions of dollars. All producers may not agree that the prices of food commodities may go too high. Butter did, because of the failure of the government to place the floor price high enough. Therefore production falls and prices increase.

The value of floor prices, if used wisely, is the steadying effect they have on production. It is a disadvantage to both producer and consumer to allow wide fluctuation in production, thence a comparable upward or downward movement of the consumer prices, depending on supply. Farmers cannot determine the year's output as can a factory owing to the dependence of the industry on the elements of nature. If the law of supply and demand were allowed to operate without some direction by producer organizations in co-operation with the government, it would inevitably follow that there would be low prices when supply exceeds demand, and high prices when the producer has little to sell. Price support could, in some degree, protect the producer when nature has been so kind. When production later proves insufficient to meet the demand, the reserve held in price support should then be released on the market. In this manner both producers and consumers gained something from the principle of price support. To support this statement I would like to quote from an article appearing in the Ottawa Journal of March 2, 1951:

Claims Price Floors for Producers Protected Consumers.

Without government price support, Canadians would be paying $1 a pound for butter and 80 or 90 cents a dozen for eggs, H. H. Hannam said today.

Support programs "have been of definite advantage to the consumer as well as the producer", the Canadian Federation of Agriculture president said in a speech before the annual meeting of the Ontario concentrated milk producers. Though price support programs for farm products have cost the government "a comparatively small amount", they have been of "definite advantage to the consumer as well as the producer." "If we had had no price support for butter and eggs, I am confident", said Mr. Hannam, "that the price by now might have been 80 or 90 cents a dozen for eggs and nearly a dollar for butter." Production would have dropped and products would have become scarce and prices of butter and eggs "would have been driven to the dollar mark."

The example of the last few months in the butter market should be sufficient proof that the floor price is too low. Cream producers of Canada through the dairy farmers of Canada and the Canadian Federation of Agriculture are of the opinion that it would require a floor price of 62 cents for butter to assure a reasonable supply for next winter and thus alleviate a repetition of the shortage and high consumer price of this year.

The whole dairy industry of this country is in a dangerous condition at the present time as explained so well by my colleague, the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair), earlier in this debate. Government policy has discouraged production. Government bulk trading contracts have not proved to be the Utopia the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) promised of them. I would like at this time to quote an editorial from the Ottawa Journal of March 15, 1951:

Weakness of State Bulk Trading

While the fixing of responsibility for the sorry ending of that Anglo-Canadian wheat agreement—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member cannot refer to the Anglo-Canadian contract.

Mr. Charlton: This continues:

—what is the basic lesson to be drawn from it? Overwhelmingly the folly and danger of state bulk trading; of trading by diplomacy.

When there is only one buyer and one seller a premium is from the first placed on sheer obstinacy. And when politicians have once taken up a bargaining position and clothed it in what the London Economist calls "sovereign majesty," it is far harder for them than for a multitude of private traders to recognize a mistake and lose face. "Prestige" becomes important.

Further: When a group of producers, whether wheat farmers—

[Mr. Charlton.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There should not be any reference to the contract, and I cannot allow this discussion.

Mr. Green: On that point of order, the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth (Mr. Charlton) is discussing state trading. Surely Your Honour is not ruling that there cannot be a discussion of state trading. I can understand how you might rule that there should not be a discussion with regard to the $65 million payment, but that is not what the hon. member is discussing. He is discussing the evils of state trading, and I submit he is quite in order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: As long as he is discussing state trading it is in order, but he should not refer to the British contract.

Mr. Charlton: The editorial continues:

Further: When a group of producers, whether wheat farmers, dairy farmers or manufacturers, ask or permit a government to do their trading for them, they put themselves into politics, mix politics with business, become beholden to the politicians who are doing their trading for them.

The wheat farmers of western Canada asked the government to sell their wheat for them, to negotiate its price.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I cannot allow a discussion of the wheat agreement.

Mr. Charlton: Mr. Speaker, I am not discussing the wheat agreement at all; I am simply discussing bulk trading. The editorial continues:

It was an unsound method of selling wheat, with the result from the outset inevitable. As the Winnipeg Free Press puts it:

"Bulk sale contracts are unsound contracts. No buyer will enter into such contracts unless the price is lower than the market. That was true of the—"

I shall have to skip that.

"This is the lesson that the loss will not have been in vain if the producers learn that the only guarantee of selling their wheat for what it is worth is the market."

Since these bulk contracts did not prove as Utopian as the Minister of Agriculture had hoped, he now, in his characteristic fashion, tries to find a scapegoat. While addressing the Canadian Federation of Agriculture convention at Calgary, which I had the privilege of attending, the minister's whole speech was one of defence, and I quote from the Calgary Herald of January 23:

British Pacts Could Be "Ridiculous"

J. G. Gardiner Outlines Canadian Trade Policy

"Every Liberal in the world believes that if we can maintain peace these agreements (British trade agreements with other countries) will very soon prove themselves to be the most ridiculous policies for promoting trade ever put into operation," Rt. Hon. James G. Gardiner, federal minister of agriculture told the Canadian Federation of Agriculture convention in the Palliser hotel this afternoon.

Defending government policy the minister referred to the history of commonwealth trading agreements to show that his government had opposed the idea of quota trading in 1936, but the Canadian government had already been committed by the Conservative government of Rt. Hon. R. B. Bennett.

His government had argued that such a plan was not suitable for a country such as Canada where agriculture could be expanded.

Until the second great war came the present government was not responsible for the plan but carried on "because no other plan was available." Canada had demonstrated that it could deliver greater quantities of food than it had been allowed under the British contracts but after the war other contracts with other countries were acknowledged.

The agricultural policies of the present federal government were actually those advocated by the government of Lord Bennett of Calgary when the latter was prime minister, Mr. Gardiner said in an interview.

In this all-out endeavour to extricate himself and his government the minister certainly had his wires crossed, as explained so well in the Winnipeg Free Press of February 10, a paper which by no stretch of the imagination could be said to be biased against the government. I quote:

Mr. Gardiner's Views

Speaking in this city a few days ago at the annual banquet of the Manitoba Liberal-Progressive Association, Mr. Gardiner, referring to bulk contracts remarked that he agrees with the views of the Free Press. "My friends of the Winnipeg Free Press" he said, "don't like bulk contracts. Neither do I. I have only one objection to the Winnipeg Free Press articles and that is they try to make you believe that I think differently to them on this subject." The only difference, he went on, was that he knew the history of this development and tried to place the blame where it belongs.

Mr. Gardiner's speech at Calgary on January 21 (the text of which is not to hand) explains his point of view in much more detail than his Winnipeg address. His argument is that the author of bulk trading, that is, government to government, or state buying and selling, was none other than Right Hon. R. B. Bennett. The Conservative party is the villain. The scene and occasion of the crime was the empire economic conference of 1932 where trade agreements with the United Kingdom were entered into by Canada, Australia, New Zealand and other members of the commonwealth.

Mr. Gardiner's argument is that he has been compelled, against his judgment, to engage in bulk trading because of two circumstances:

1. The empire trade agreements of 19 years ago and,

2. The British government will not trade in any other way.

On these grounds, Mr. Gardiner claims, he is compelled to do violence to the principles of trade which he regards as sound. There is, of course, no validity in Mr. Gardiner's first point. No bulk trading contracts were authorized by the empire treaties of 1932 and none were entered into by the Bennett government. Mr. Gardiner is confusing bulk contracts with quotas. What was done in 1932 was to adopt the principle of quotas—that is of restrictions upon total sales in the British market. Quotas and bulk contracts are as different as salt from sugar. Quotas are an extreme form of protection but, apart from this, do not interfere with private trade.

On the second count, Mr. Gardiner might reconsider his statement that bulk contracts are the only way in which the United Kingdom government will trade. Actually the United Kingdom has been buying all sorts of commodities other than wheat in large quantities. It has been buying lumber, copper, zinc, and many other items and in none of them has a bulk sale contract been regarded as essential. In all these purchases the British government has paid the market price—a point of great interest to Mr. Gardiner—thereby avoiding disagreeable claims by producers for compensation, such as are now being advanced with regard to the U.K.-Canada wheat agreement.

Producers were forced to take less than world prices by the government with the promise of assured future markets. Where are they? The cheese producers of Canada lost millions of dollars through government contracts. As a result of this, cheese production has been reduced to the lowest point in fifty years. Although cheese production is lower this year than last, we have never in Canada consumed all the cheese produced. What does the government propose to do with the surplus, however small it may be?

Mr. Speaker, I would like to make one suggestion to the Minister of Agriculture, and through him to the government, that I think would go far to (a) increase markets for the products of agriculture; (b) increase the quality of products now produced and thereby enhance the competitive position of Canadian agricultural products; (c) reduce production costs and bring to the original or primary producers a greater percentage of the ultimate consumer price.

I refer specifically to greater participation, made possible by government assistance and direction, in the field of chemurgic research. I read with interest what is being done in other countries and am alarmed at the slowness of Canada to participate in this work which has already proven so beneficial elsewhere. The Minister of Agriculture, in a speech in this house not long ago, referred to what had been done in the field of utilization of the soy bean in our economy. This is but one example of the tremendous advantages which can accrue to agriculture and the economy of this country by research in the fuller utilization of the products of the soil. I would like at this point to draw to the attention of this house the possibilities in other fields, and I quote from the report of the National Chemurgic Council of America:

Filberts Flavour Cheese

American cheese of superior flavour can be produced with the aid of chemical agents obtained from filbert nuts.

Aside from its importance to the nation's cheese industry, this development is particularly good news for Oregon, where filberts are already a surplus crop and constantly increasing yields are promised by many young filbert orchards.

The filbert chemicals used in treating cheese are known as proteolytic enzymes, which means they are substances that help to digest proteins—in this case, milk proteins. They were tested for their effect on cheese flavour because of the present trend toward manufacture of American or cheddar cheese from pasteurized milk, which produces milk cheese with less flavour and slightly different characteristics from those found in raw milk cheese.

Samples of cheddar were taken out of a commercial cheese vat after milling and salt was added. A measured volume of the filbert extract was added to each experimental sample and a similar volume of water to the control samples.

The regular processing and storage procedures were then carried out, all the samples being checked at regular monthly intervals.

At the end of four months, expert cheese tasters pronounced the cheese made with the filbert extracts to have much better flavour than all the other samples, including the controls. It was better aged. The control samples had a mild clean flavour which did not compare with the superior flavour of the treated samples. In addition to this improvement in flavour, the ripening time was substantially shortened, which is of economic importance because of the expense for storage rooms. It should be emphasized that no filbert nut flavour was transferred to the treated cheese by the filbert extracts.

Proteolytic enzymes have been isolated from many plants. The presence of a protein-digesting substance in the leaves and green fruit of the papaya tree (carica papaya) has long been known. The existence of a similar meat-digesting enzyme in the juice of the pineapple was first noted in 1891 by a Venezuelan scientist named Marcano. Figs, milkweed, lima beans, and the kernels of wheat also have been found to contain such enzymes. The work on filberts was prompted by a search for new uses for Oregon's surplus nuts.

As I stated before, the farmers are discouraged. With mounting costs and continued scarcity of farm labour many farmers are changing their programs to conform to the shorter work week in industry. This, however, is impossible for the dairy farmer, hence many are quitting that branch of the industry. The Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association has recognized the agricultural problem, and I quote from an article appearing in the Globe and Mail of March 9, 1951:

Rural Canada Hit Hard by Wage-Raising Trend, Weekly Papers Warn

Ottawa, March 9—A dangerous unbalance exists between the rural and urban economies of Canada, Prime Minister St. Laurent and members of his cabinet were warned today in a brief presented by the Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association. The brief, presented by W. E. McCartney, managing director, pointed specifically to the recent trend toward raising wages, curbing productive hours of work, and said that this placed an unfair economic burden on rural Canada.

The consequence of this trend is that milk production is down half a billion pounds in the last three years. The cow population has been reduced by almost a half million since 1945, while our human population has increased by one and three-quarter million in the same period. If this trend is allowed to continue, and certainly there has been no apparent move by the government to stop it, then production will continue to decline. Either the dairy industry must be placed on a profitable basis or supplies will be short with resultant high prices. Consumers are beginning to tell their children now that the beef steer, not the cow, is jumping over the moon. This is not a healthy situation for either the producer or the consumer, and I am sure the dairy farmers of Canada do not want extremely high prices. On the other hand if the government does not take some remedial action the dairy cow could quite conceivably be replaced by products made from cheap imported vegetable oils. A low price for a farm product is no advantage to consumers. They have to make up for it later on when supply drops off. The best example of this fact was the terrific increase in egg prices last year, following the refusal for two months by this government to place a floor price under eggs when the bottom dropped out in December 1949, and hundreds of flocks were sold off.

I should like to quote from a Canadian Press article appearing in the Globe and Mail of March 1, 1951:

Food Producers Merit Fair Prices, Gardiner Holds

Ste. Anne de Bellevue, Quebec, Feb. 27—Canadian Press—Agriculture Minister Gardiner said today that Canadian food producers have two primary objectives—to produce enough food for our own people and to sell at a sufficiently high price to encourage them to keep on producing.

New Zealand butter, which Mr. Gardiner said the government did not want to see brought into Canada, was laid down at Halifax at a cost of 40·4 cents a pound. The floor price in Canada was 53 cents. Canadian farmers could not compete with New Zealand butter. The butter dealers were selling the imported butter at 56½ cents a pound.

"The market price in this country must be comparatively high," said the minister.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) stated that the four and a half million pounds of New Zealand butter was laid down at Halifax for 40·4 cents per pound and sold for 56½, resulting in a profit of at least a million dollars which the government should have had in view of the maintained floor price of 53 cents. The government in effect subsidized a good share of that very juicy profit. In cases where a floor price is being maintained on any product and a short position is encountered, then the government itself, under such conditions, should import a sufficient quantity to satisfy the conditions, should import a sufficient quantity to satisfy the domestic demand. What did this government do? They closed the door on January 24 by order in council, placing butter imports under government control; but somebody had his foot in the door, because on January 27 it was opened again by the cancellation of the order in council. No reason was given or explanation offered; just cancelled.

In the event of a war, the food situation in Canada could be serious. In the case of most field crops, dependent on the weather of course, production could be stepped up in a year with sufficient help. The same would be true of poultry and hogs.

Dairy products, beef and sheep, however, would take nearly three years, even with the most stringent controls. I would urge the government, therefore, to make the necessary use of the Agricultural Prices Support Act. Incorporate within the act some formula upon which to base the floor price, thereby relieving the constant fear in the minds of the producers of our nation's food, and assure the production of at least our own domestic requirements.

Mr. S. R. Balcom (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, after such a friendly reception perhaps I should, in reciprocation, make my speech short so the members can get away before six o'clock. In my brief observation of events here. Mr. Speaker. I have noticed a disposition to invoke the blessing of the deity, and to call on powers other than those conferred by membership in this house. I may say that at this point I am in entire sympathy and accord with the feelings which prompt such utterances. Someone wiser than I once said that there is nothing new under the sun. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that thought must have occurred many times in the minds of hon. members as another new member launched forth on his maiden speech. This is particularly true in my case because Halifax constituency has been so ably represented by my predecessor, the Hon. Senator Isnor, and by the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Dickey), so I can add very little to what has been said before.

In the light of the present fast moving events it might be well to remind you that Halifax city, which is the centre of our constituency, was founded 202 years ago as a military outpost. No doubt there are some people who are unkind enough to suggest it is still an outpost of Toronto, perhaps, or Saint John. But had Halifax, the warden of the honour of the north, not been pioneered first, even the constituency of Springfield might still be a wilderness.

The riding is large in size, and has a population of roughly 150,000. Most of the people live along the coast line, for the sea is very important to their livelihood. It is a heavily forested area which supports a substantial lumber industry, and there is some farm land. Over 75 per cent of the population is concentrated in the Halifax-Dartmouth area bordering on the magnificent harbour which is the heart of the community. Despite the growth in industry, commerce, business and educational services, Halifax is never far removed psychologically from the feature that prompted its origin, namely the strategic value of its harbour. This port is, unfortunately, apt to be forgotten by the rest of Canada between wars, not intentionally but because we are far away from the more populous areas.

I need not remind you of its part in world wars I and II, and even as far back as the Riel rebellion and the South African war in 1899-1902, when Halifax sent a regiment of its own. I hardly need to assure you that it is ready to play its part again in strengthening our defences against aggression or, if the worst should come, active participation in the war for our way of life.

At this point, perhaps I should mention a misunderstanding that arose in connection with a statement attributed to our minister of health and welfare, the Hon. Harold Connolly. When speaking in Florida, he was misquoted by the newspapers.

Mr. Brooks: That is always the case when they say the wrong thing.

Mr. Balcom: He gave a denial to the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of April 21, stating that he had made no mention of union between Canada and the United States. The article reads in part:

> Anything might happen at any time, I said. Who could tell? As to the "affinity" matter, we were talking on the socialist government in Britain as compared with the democratic government in Canada. On this point I expressed the view that socialism would never take over the government in Canada and that in this connection Canada and the United States had much in common, both peoples preferring to live under a system of democracy.

I am sure most members in this house will agree with what Mr. Connolly has said in his denial, including the member for Royal (Mr. Brooks).

Mr. Brooks: Not in Florida, but in Halifax.

Mr. Balcom: Coming back to the strategic importance of the riding, the heavy concentration of naval and military establishments there creates serious problems in civic government. Tax-exempt property representing 50 per cent of our total assessment has to be serviced and protected as well as civilian establishments. The existence of such in any community is a problem. Add to that a personnel establishment that increases and contracts from time to time, and you have a heavy burden on city services.

The federal government has recognized its responsibilities in this regard by some payments already made in lieu of taxation of crown property. I note with satisfaction that measures will be considered during this session respecting federal grants to municipalities. The special position of Halifax and Dartmouth must be recognized and an equitable arrangement made regarding these obligations.

The burden of the speech from the throne and indeed most of the proceedings of the house to date have left little room for any but the most sober appraisal of our responsibilities here. The forthright account of events in the international field given by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) has shown the gravity of the situation confronting us. The part Canada will play in the drive for collective defence has been outlined. The magnitude of the commitments has been well described as "staggering".

The means of financing these commitments are rather painful and there has been heated debate on some aspects of government policy to that end. Nevertheless, I believe that the reaction to the budget bears out what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) said in presenting it, as reported at page 1798 of Hansard:

> . . . there are no great issues of principle dividing us . . . on the major questions of policy underlying my proposals we are all fundamentally agreed.

It is apparent that for many years we shall have to turn our energy from the constructive pursuits which we should like to follow. Our productive capacity must be devoted to an increasing degree to defence instead of primarily to improving the standard of living of our people. The need for physical defence is paramount but in our haste to this end we must be careful not to neglect other values fundamental to our well-being.

We have been informed that we may expect the report of the royal commission on national development in the arts, letters and sciences during this session. In Canada we have some peculiar problems in the field of culture and education, and the findings of this commission are awaited with much interest. The field is of the utmost concern; for, apart from its intrinsic importance, the heaviest strain of the next few years will fall upon our mental and spiritual resources. It is well known that the upheaval of war subjects the average individual to the lure of the "eat, drink and be merry" philosophy. It is equally so of a nation. In our preoccupation with defence let us not neglect the values which make our sacrifices worth while.

There may be some thought during this difficult period in the world's history that we should concentrate all our energies in holding back the flood of aggression. That is all very fine in itself, but it is not my view. The world conflict cannot be solved by setting aside the very elements that have made our civilization strong. Democracies must never stand still.

But even under the threat of war we must go forward with every plan to improve our way of life. For this reason I commend the undertaking of the government to provide pensions for those 70 and over without the means test; pensions for the needy between 65-70; and possibly aids to the handicapped. Of particular importance are the grants to our universities and I would stress those grants to our schools of social work which are contributing so much to the welfare of our people. I have hope that ample allowance has been made for these schools of social work in the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare. In terms of our total expenditures on welfare payments to individuals, an investment in training facilities is a moderate cost to ensure that these payments are well spent. The minister has always been generous in the provision of such assistance, and he is well aware of their contribution and of the desirability, or even the need, to have them function independently of the government.

I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that more people were unable to see the picture which was shown the other night in this building, when the work of the social worker was screened. The scenes were in British Columbia, but we might say that the picture that was shown there would be typical of all the provinces. British Columbia people should be proud that their province was chosen for the scenes.

Our Canadian pattern is made strong by all the complex forces involved in it. The active part played in our social life by voluntary groups cannot be overestimated, and we should be very thankful that these voluntary groups are so eager to work.

I would suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the world conflict today is between truth and confusion. We must not fail our conviction that we are on the right road to progress, that the ordinary men and women of this earth can find, in company with us, the right way to the future. We should maintain and strengthen all voluntary activities in Canada that serve to enrich Canadian life. Communism with all its vain promises and all its sordid performances cannot be answered by words alone.

Those of us fortunate enough to live in Nova Scotia want to say that we are ready at all times to stand with the rest of Canada and bear our share in times of stress. The right hand of the Dominion of Canada that reaches far out into the Atlantic ocean, we have borne the brunt of wars since 1605, in the days of de Monts and Champlain, and in Halifax since the arrival of Lord Cornwallis in 1749. But the fact of our being on the fringe of such a far-flung country and the fact of our being connected with the rest of Canada by a railway, the location of which was determined primarily by strategic considerations, have created some difficulties. Various measures have been implemented to mitigate the economic handicaps resulting from transportation costs, but many problems remain. The royal commission on transportation has taken cognizance of these matters peculiar to the various regions in Canada. We in the maritimes are particularly gratified that the report recognizes the validity of our objections to horizontal freight rate increases.

On another recommendation of this same report, there is not so general approval. I refer to the formation of a local advisory committee for our Halifax harbours board. Had we had such an advisory committee operating at this time, the unfortunate accidents which have occurred recently might have been avoided. We are still convinced that remote control is not in the best interests of our national harbours.

Normally, Halifax is a winter port, partially used during the winter, only slightly used during the summer when the St. Lawrence river is open, but totally used in an all-out war. Halifax harbour has untold advantages over any other Atlantic port—with commiseration to Saint John—as we have very little tide, no great windstorms; suitable docks, with more under construction; excellent anchorage; and "fair" railway services. I say "fair" because I consider that the Canadian Pacific Railway should be running over its own rails into Halifax or at least have running rights over the C.N.R. In no way is this a reflection on the excellent service given by the Canadian National Railways but the lack of competition is hurting not only Halifax but all of Nova Scotia.

The hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne) in the house last week drew attention to the rail and water services between the mainland and Newfoundland, and he stated that he had suggested to the president of the Canadian National Railways the desirability of operating steamships between Halifax or Montreal and St. John's. Since almost 40 per cent of the people of Newfoundland are in the Avalon peninsula, a great deal of the traffic to the island should be brought to St. John's by water from Halifax.

When Newfoundland entered confederation, it was arranged that the Canadian National Railways regard the boat haul from Sydney to Port aux Basques as a railway route. Although the merchandise has to be transshipped several times, rates are set on the basis that it is an all-rail route. This has meant the diversion of traffic which would logically go to St. John's via Halifax.

Merchandise, particularly heavy equipment, furniture, and the like, when it is routed in such a way that it has to be unloaded and reloaded several times, really calls for export packaging which is very costly. Freight for St. John's landed at Port aux Basques has to be carried 550 miles across the island over a railroad already busy serving its own area.

It is reported that the loss to the Canadian National Railways on Newfoundland operations during 1950 amounted to $3 million, exclusive of a subsidy of $1,250,000 on the coastal steamship operations. I would respectfully suggest that if the freight intended for St. John's and the Avalon peninsula were directed through Halifax, this deficit would be greatly reduced. This would not interfere with the freight which would, by reason of its destination, naturally be shipped through North Sydney. The fastest, the best, and the route that calls for the least handling of freight should be the one adopted and in respect to goods going to the Avalon peninsula, Halifax is the logical shipping point. I appreciate the efforts of the hon. member for St. John's West in advocating some such arrangements.

As you know, Halifax is not only a shipping port, but is also the home port of a considerable fishing fleet which sails to the nearby fishing banks, most prolific and least depleted in the world. The port has, too, a considerable stake in the inshore fisheries. A large proportion of the rural population who live along the coast line are dependent on the fishing industry for a whole or a part at least, of their livelihood. I am, therefore, keenly interested in anything that affects that group of people.

The announcement in the budget regarding certain tariff changes affecting fishermen's supplies will be good news to our constituents. The free entry of diesel engines used in commercial fishing operations and widening of the provision covering nets and lines to permit free entry of those of any material will assist in lowering costs of production.

One of the big problems of the industry is the development of a stable market. The resources are there, but it has not always been profitable to exploit them. The Canadian market for fish is not as extensive as it could and should be—and as we hope to make it. We have been dependent on foreign markets for both the salt and a good proportion of the fresh fish trade, so we have had to sell under heavy competition.

A great many things that the fishermen have to buy have carried a high tariff. After all the attention on trade restrictions in the past few years, I do not need to labour the difficulties of selling in an open market and buying in a protected one. It is, therefore, good news for my constituents that they are to receive relief from tariff on these very important items of equipment. The cost of gear is high and I venture to say it is subject to much greater physical hazards than any other form of industrial equipment.

Another reason for special consideration in the case of the fishing industry lies in the nature of the employment. It is hazardous and seasonal, and as most of the fishermen are self-employed or on a share basis in very small units, it is very difficult to make any provision in the way of unemployment insurance or similar form of protection against loss of income.

We are, therefore, going to press the government for consideration of another serious problem of the industry. It is the plight of the fishermen who have lost their nets and traps in the winter storms. The loss in equipment along the east and west coast of Halifax county takes on disaster proportions. Some fishermen have been completely put out of business. The prices of fishing nets, twine and ropes have soared, and we, in Canada, have very little control over this, as the raw materials come from other countries.

I would ask the Department of Fisheries to investigate the conditions in Nova Scotia and assist the fishermen to become rehabilitated. We can raise money for defence, and so we should; but let us not overlook the obvious. In an inflationary situation, where the crying need is more and more production by available manpower, re-establishment of these fishermen would be an investment with a huge return.

In listening to the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair) speaking the other day on the dairy industry, I could not help but compare the conditions under which the farmer works —any kind of farmer—with the fishermen who toil through the storms of the Atlantic ocean. Now, if I may ask your indulgence, I would like to quote here some prices received in Halifax by the fishermen for their fish. And perhaps while I am listing them you might recall what you paid for your last fish dinner. I shall quote only three species of fish, namely, steak cod for which the fisherman received 4½ cents a pound, haddock, for which he received 7 cents a pound, and sole, for which he received 8 cents a pound. These same fish sold in the Ottawa market on Friday as follows: haddock, 54 cents a pound, sole, 60 cents a pound and the lowly cod 44 cents a pound.

The fishermen have to go out in the cold Atlantic and risk the dangers of the sea, be away from their homes, and then come in and receive 4 cents per pound for cod. As a comparison in prices may I draw attention to the debate on Monday when the hon. member for Lanark, in speaking on the dairy industry and its troubles, said that the farmer could receive $400 for an old bull. I am not sure whether he used the adjective or not.

But perhaps it is in just such a contrast in the price of articles that compete for a similar market that the best hope of the fisherman lies. It is at the same time a justification for timely aid by the government. There are large unexploited resources right at our door. The potential development is well illustrated in the increase in volume and value in the past ten years. Since 1939, fisheries production has quadrupled in Nova Scotia in value.

It is refreshing to listen to a member give a frank speech and I would commend the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. Carroll) for his open exposition on conditions in our native province and for his stand in regard to the St. Lawrence seaway. I also appreciate the position of the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) and Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan) who appropriate a drum and beat it, may I say, well but selfishly.

In the matter of the St. Lawrence seaway, let us face the facts squarely and look at the project in the light of the benefits accruing to Canada as a whole. There are many imponderable factors in this undertaking. Providing a water route to the great lakes it will open up a larger market for our coal, steel and fish, as well as provide unlimited electrical power for some of our provinces.

I should be something less than honest if I did not acknowledge some misgivings, the fear that this may be one more factor in the centralization of industry in Canada. But anything that is to the general advantage of the whole country should surely have a favourable effect on all the parts. In any case, I am of the opinion that with the financial aid and full co-operation of the United States, the march of events makes it inevitable.

We have heard in this house many debates on decentralization. Naturally we in the maritimes want and need industries but we are conscious of the fact that more than wishful thinking is required. With our handicap of distance between the Atlantic and the central Canadian markets we must concentrate on production for which the raw materials are at our door, such as the iron and steel industry.

In a private enterprise system we cannot look to the government to direct the location of industrial establishments. Even in the awarding of defence contracts, regard must be had for the taxpayer and purchases made on the best possible terms. However, in the creation of new facilities, under crown direction or supported by public funds, the weight of long-range economic factors should be taken into account.

It may look cheaper to expand a plant in Toronto or Montreal, but if there is a solid foundation for development in the industrial areas of Nova Scotia, for example, the long term effects will be a reduction in costs. A stable and prosperous population in the outlying provinces is worth a lot in terms of national development.

The most obvious sector for action to this end is in the iron and steel industry. We have had assurance from the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) and from the president of the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation that the facilities at Sydney will be expanded. In addition to expansion of basic steel production, there is a great need for further finishing and fabricating in that area. There is a nucleus of steel-using industries in the New Glasgow-Pictou area; the Halifax Shipyards Limited and H.M.C. dockyard consume steel plate products, but we need more of the same. The base is there —by the judicious placement of new facilities where such are required for defence production, the economy of the area can be strengthened. At the same time the maximum use of resources, manpower and material, will be accomplished—and this is the ultimate assurance of our victory over the forces of aggression.

In conclusion, I am going to take advantage of this, my first opportunity, to say what satisfaction I have had in working with the members of this house. Perhaps it is not necessary for me to say that I have the utmost confidence in the government and its leadership. But I should like to emphasize how greatly I have been impressed by the ability of the three opposition leaders and by their work as well as that of their supporters, even though sometimes a little misguided.

The calibre of this house, all parties, and the work of this administration are in direct contradiction of the statement of Sir John A. Macdonald when he said, "Given a government with a big surplus and a big majority and a weak opposition, and you would debauch a committee of archangels".

On the contrary, the standards that are imposed on all parties by themselves are very high—they give assurance that the processes of democracy though sometimes appearing slow are in the long run most effective for human well-being.

Mr. J. H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I rise to say a few words in the budget debate. The hon. member who immediately preceded me voiced his opinion of the manner in which the government has been carrying on the affairs of the people. I am sure everything he said met with the unanimous approval of one hundred per cent of government front and back benches.

The hon. member made the further statement that Sir John A. Macdonald had said that a government with a large majority was not always the best thing for a country. Sir John A. Macdonald made very few mistakes, and in that assertion he was absolutely right.

Mr. Riley: You are jealous now.

Mr. Ferguson: The people will do all that is necessary when the next election comes. You will know that then.

Then the hon. member referred to a weak opposition. Let me assure the government there is no weak opposition in this house opposite them at the present time. The duty of an opposition is to criticize —

Mr. Riley: Is there any opposition?

Mr. Ferguson: —and the government will be criticized until such time as the people voice their opinion at the next election. At that time they will be guided by the criticism of the present opposition, so that the majority of the government will be cut to nothing—neither minus nor plus.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) has introduced a budget that received applause from members supporting the government. I consider the minister's budget as a most deceitful one, so far as the people are concerned.

Mr. Sinnott: Why?

Mr. Ferguson: You probably would not know if I told you anything about hidden taxes, but the majority of people in Canada are learning about hidden taxes. I do not know whether you smoke or drink, but if you do either you are paying the hidden taxes you don't know anything about.

An hon. Member: Louder.

Mr. Ferguson: Every package of cigarettes the smoker buys bears a stamp on which it is stated that the package contains twenty cigarettes.

An hon. Member: Why don't you roll your own?

Mr. Ferguson: I believe the government would be doing the right and courageous thing it if were to indicate on the cigarette package that there is a tax of 23 cents. It should say, "You are paying 23 cents tax."

Mr. Fraser: More than that.

Mr. Ferguson: What could be more deceitful, when the government puts on a two or three-cent stamp the value of the tax but not on cigarettes?

Mr. Riley: Will you put that in your platform?

Mr. Ferguson: When I am prime minister I won't attempt to fleece the taxpayer by heading a government that builds a building for myself and my successors, at a cost of half a million or a million dollars. Let me assure you of that.

Mr. Riley: If I could vote for you, I would.

Mr. Ferguson: I am sure you would. Now, there are a great many Liberals who vote for me in my own riding, on every occasion.

An hon. Member: There are always backsliders.

Mr. Ferguson: The reason I am speaking is that I believe hon. members on the government side should not be just rubber stamps. It is nearly time they voted according to their conscience rather than by rule of thumb.

Mr. Riley: Or rule of law?

Mr. Ferguson: What have we heard from the government with regard to old age pensions? I am not talking about pensions for the man who says that because he has reached the age of seventy, eighty or ninety years he is entitled to a pension. I am talking about the man or woman who cannot exist without a pension or a subsidy from the taxpayers. I am not talking about the man who is willing and able to work; I refer to those needy people of seventy years and over. What about the $40 on which they are barely existing? I venture to say some of them are not existing at all; they still have to look to charitable institutions and neighbours in order to exist—and that in this land of plenty!

What about the crippled people in Canada? We have been sitting here since the latter part of January, and I would ask what the government has done to help bedridden people. There are bedridden people who have been crippled for life who cannot provide for themselves. That is a blotch on the reputation of this government, yet we have the unanimous desk-thumping of the Liberal members. What about our shortages?

Where is the vision of the people who built this country? Can similar vision be found among the ministers of this government? What about the steel situation? We are selling now steel by the ton to the United States for $5 and buying it back at $100 per ton finished. What about the nail situation? Every time nails are mentioned there are laughs from the members of the Liberal party. But it is no laughing matter for a man who wants a roof over his head for himself, his wife and children. What about the cement situation? Has this government gone to the manufacturers of steel and told them that if they do not expand their plants, the government will?

I am a free enterpriser from the word go, but if I was a member of any government which did not lay down the law to the steel companies of Canada, which had not taken this action five, six or seven years ago, I would soon quit that party.

An hon. Member: Go back to cement.

Mr. Ferguson: This applies to cement as well. Keep the government out of business as long as you possibly can, but when you cannot avoid it get into business. First of all, any government represents the people. If private enterprise cannot cope with the situation, the government has the facilities to do so. I know that members of the Liberal party agree with my assertions. They know it is all too true.

In this modern day and age you cannot ask people to go into a home in the city or country without a hot water boiler to heat water for the children, for washing, for dishes, for clothes and so on. What do we find? When after great struggles a man gets a roof on, gets the doors on, probably gets a furnace in, he is faced with the fact that there are no hot water boilers available in this great banner province of Ontario in the Dominion of Canada. There are useless and unnecessary shortages brought about by another department which has shown a complete lack of foresight.

There is another department, the department of immigration. The minister is aiming for 150,000 people to be brought to Canada this year from the British empire and other foreign countries this side of the iron curtain. That includes men, women and children. If he gets 150,000, at least 75,000 will be children not able to work. The great majority of these people will not be able to speak our language and yet they are supposed to take up the slack created by those who have gone into the active forces by necessity, or who have gone to the United States to the extent of 50,000. Through the great efforts of this immigration department, and provided no more are needed for the armed forces, there will probably be an increase in the labour situation of over 12,000 people. If that is something to be proud of, I do not know what is. I say that that indicates the disgraceful lack of vision, a lack of perseverance, a lack of planning—

An hon. Member: A lack of intelligence.

Mr. Ferguson: A lack of intelligence, no doubt about it. This country should have at least 150,000 men and women who have reached the age where they are able to work and can participate in production for their livelihood in the Dominion of Canada.

We have in this country shipyards that are capable of building ships equal to any in the world. I should like to see some document containing a plan for the construction of ships in order to keep our shipyards busy from coast to coast. Every shipyard worker has a hand-to-mouth existence today. We sold ships to foreign countries at scandalously low prices; we could not get rid of them fast enough, and today we find ourselves with tremendous export markets, owing to the dire necessity of our customers across the sea, but foreign ships have to do most of the transporting.

With regard to the construction of naval vessels, all there is is a possibility or a hope. That is pretty weak stuff for a shipyard worker to look forward to in an effort to provide for his family in a great land like Canada. There has been absolutely no vision on behalf of this government.

An hon. Member: Nothing but chaos.

An hon. Member: Correct.

Mr. Ferguson: If there is no chaos in your opinion it is certainly not the fault of this government. It is the result of the perseverance of Canadian people who are of the right kind; it is certainly not through any guidance given by this government that there is not chaos.

The dairy farmer in my riding and all over Canada has been wondering into what he should sink his teeth in order to make a livelihood, in order to pay off the mortgage on his farm and keep pace with prices in Canada. There is a statistical department of this government which threatens him with a fine of $100 if he does not fill out all the silly forms supplied by that department.

An hon. Member: Did they threaten you?

Mr. Ferguson: Yes, they threatened me with a fine of $100.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Ferguson: The mounted police threatened me because I drew a cartoon showing how lackadaisical this government was. Every farmer will tell you that he does not know whether to grow wheat, produce hogs, poultry, eggs or anything else. It is a hit and miss problem, irrespective of the fact that the government has all these statistical records and knows absolutely where it is headed with regard to the need for all these commodities. But they have given absolutely no guidance, yet members of the Liberal party stand around with smirks on their faces. Let them go back to their constituencies.

An hon. Member: We are listening to you.

An hon. Member: How can we go?

Mr. Ferguson: I am convinced you will be going after I am through.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Ferguson: In resuming my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I shall be very brief; but in dealing with the last item I wish to discuss I think I will be able to point out clearly, if not to the members of the government at least to the people of Canada, that by its handling of this one matter the government has proven beyond peradventure that it has utter disregard for the value of the money that comes from the taxpayers, and that it is not carrying out the trust the citizens of Canada placed in it when the government was elected to power in 1949.

Everyone in Canada, irrespective of party, is in favour of a home for the Prime Minister. Everyone wants a home that will be in keeping with the position. The duties of the Prime Minister and those of the Governor General are entirely different; there is no doubt about that. The Prime Minister is one of the busiest men in Canada; but at no time has the Prime Minister of this or any other country been called upon to perform the duties or functions of the Governor General. Yet we find the taxpayers of Canada, having no more to say about it than simply voting this government into power, called upon to pay a bill which I estimate will amount to something like $800,000. When it is completed I think it will be found that I am not far wrong; probably I will be $100,000 short.

When this residence was conceived, considered and finally begun by this government, apparently no definite over-all price was fixed, taking into consideration the high costs of construction, furnishings, maintenance and so on. I contend that if the government could be so far out in interpreting the feelings of the Canadian people with respect to the edifice in the course of construction, to be known as the Prime Minister's home, they might well be out and are out on almost everything they have tackled on behalf of the people of this country. Most of us, through curiosity or of necessity, have passed the building which is to be occupied by the present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and those following him. None of us is so childish as not to know something about the cost of construction. That building today represents an expenditure of more than half a million dollars. We know something of what might be expected from the expenditure of a quarter of a million dollars on a residence. If the completed building is in keeping with the amount already spent it is going to cost the taxpayers tremendous amounts to keep it in repair and to maintain the furnishings. We talk about cutting expenditures in this country.

Mr. Fulton: Who does? Not the government.

Mr. Ferguson: The government is constantly talking about cutting expenditures, but makes no effort to do so. I do not like to bring up this matter of the Prime Minister's home, but it is something which is of interest to the whole country. It is something of which Canadians should be proud, but one can hardly be proud of anything so costly that it means our pocketbooks will be pinched in order to pay for it. Every member of this house must realize that there is not a more blatant, brazen case of flagrant squandering of public funds than has occurred in connection with this building.

I do not want to be mean about it. Never let it be said that Julian Ferguson did not want a home for the Prime Minister in keeping with the dignity of that position, but there is a great difference between a home in keeping with that position and a home the taxpayers cannot afford, and that is what we have today. Compare it with 10 Downing street, which has housed some of the greatest men the world has ever known, where in the past some of the greatest national ideas and ideals have been conceived, which has been occupied by some of the greatest brains the British empire has ever seen. I have never heard that building criticized as too humble or too cheap for the Prime Minister of England. But this government wanted to keep up with the Joneses to the south, where they have a population of 155 million—

Some hon. Members: Don't get excited.

Mr. Ferguson: I get so mad on this subject. It is too bad the men in charge of that project did not get a little excited, but they took things too easy. They came along and paid $150,000 for an old building which was almost falling down; another $200,000 to start the renovation; another $150,000 to furnish it, and so on. It is too bad they did not get excited about the trust the public had given them. In the back of my mind I think of people who need more than $40 a month in old age pensions. I think of civil servants, who gave service to Canada just as loyal and faithful as that of any Prime Minister we ever had, and who cannot exist on the pensions they receive. I think of the crippled people who cannot provide for themselves. I have in mind what is needed to carry on the defence of this country. Then I visualize the building we are now constructing at a cost of almost a million dollars. I cannot see there any desire on the part of this government to save. The gross mismanagement of that proposition is only in keeping with almost every other item that this government has tackled. You do not have to enumerate them all. This one will stand forever as a glowing example of the mismanagement of the Liberal government, at least for the year 1951.

Mr. D. A. Riley (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I would first like to say a word in congratulation to the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Balcom), who through his splendid speech this afternoon ably showed us that he is ready to follow in the distinguished footsteps of his predecessor, who has gone to another place, and take his place alongside the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Dickey), who has already set such a fine pattern in this chamber.

Mr. Knowles: The other place from which no traveller returns.

Mr. Riley: Some of them go elsewhere. While I am speaking congratulatory words, I should like to say something about the speech just made by the hon. member for Simcoe North. It was a stirring speech, and its forensic qualities left little to be desired. I only wish that other members of the official opposition would take it upon themselves to level such sound constructive criticism towards the government. If they did, I am sure that many of us on this side of the house would not hold such dim hopes for the survival of the remnants of that once great party.

This afternoon the hon. member mentioned what might be done if he were prime minister. I would point out to his party that they could do worse than select him as their leader. He personifies everything that could be wished for in the grand old traditions of Toryism. It is not for him to say one thing and mean another; not for him to pussyfoot around by saying they want price controls and neglect to mention wage controls, but for him to follow in the straight pattern set by Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Robert Borden, the pattern of real old Toryism.

I cannot help but add my congratulations to those already so well expressed to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) on the sound budget which he presented to this house on April 10. Having regard to the immensity of his task and the weight of the accompanying responsibilities, I cannot in justice to him wish him many happy returns. But I am able to say that the citizens of Canada, whose unqualified confidence he has enjoyed over these past years, are secure in a deep sense of continued confidence in his management of our fiscal policies.

Mr. Hatfield: You do not believe that.

Mr. Riley: The hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Hatfield) enjoys perhaps more than any other member in this house and the other citizens of the country, the fruits of his administration.

Mr. Knowles: You mean potatoes.

Mr. Riley: I should think the hon. member would be ashamed to go home and face the good people of Victoria-Carleton after making such sneering remarks towards any speaker on this side of the house.

We are presently experiencing a degree of inflation, with all its attendant evils. I would urge the Minister of Finance, and the economic advisers of the government, to make a renewed effort to devise some means whose effect might be immediate for the protection of that segment of our population which appears to be helpless in its efforts to combat the inflationary force in whose toils they have become enmeshed. Many of us, by stifling tendencies towards extravagant spending and by purchasing the minimum of our requirements, can, by voluntary self-sacrifice, keep delaying the day when the imposition of harsh bureaucratic controls, with all their attendant dangers, may become necessary.

Those in the lower salary groups with fixed incomes, such as clerks helping in retail establishments, married and with families, are not able to meet their obligations with prices at their present levels. There are many of those people, not only in my constituency but in most others across the land and more particularly in urban areas, who are not earning more than $20 or $25 weekly. By adding to this small wage the receipts from family allowances these people are not, with prices at their present levels, in a position where they can provide for their families even the bare necessities of life. With the retail price of beef ranging from 75 cents per pound upward, and even stew beef selling at 70 cents a pound, with eggs at 70 cents a dozen, butter at 70 cents a pound and higher, and milk selling at 20 cents a quart, flour at 8 cents a pound and bread as high as 13 cents a pound and higher, not to mention the exorbitant prices of fuel, clothing and accommodation, it is little wonder that so many of these people, working as they are over long hours and without benefit of union intervention on their behalf, are complaining bitterly over their difficulties.

Mr. Hatfield: Hear, hear.

Mr. Riley: I am afraid I would not hesitate to suggest that some of these people on small fixed incomes may even be employees of the member for Victoria-Carleton.

Mr. Hatfield: Oh, no.

Mr. Riley: Would you show us a schedule of your wages? I am afraid that in our efforts to effect a curb on prices, we are perhaps overlooking those citizens—

Mr. Hodgson: Cheap politics.

Mr. Riley: The hon. member who just passed that remark should blush with shame to do so, because I have heard him on the floor of this house resort to what he describes as that type of politics.

Mr. Hodgson: You have done a lot of heckling, too.

Mr. Riley: I am quite prepared to continue, and you may do all the heckling you want. I would not suggest that your teeth might fall out, because I believe they are your own.

Mr. Knowles: Is the hon. member addressing the Chair?

Mr. Riley: I shall do so from now on. I was addressing the hon. member because I was carried away for the moment.

I am afraid that in our efforts to effect a curb on prices up to now, we are perhaps overlooking those citizens who are beginning to class themselves as being in the forgotten estate. The imposition of price and wage controls at the present time would leave them as helpless as they are now because their present wages are hopelessly inadequate. This may sound like an exaggeration, but I would defy anybody, as the head of a family of three or four, with small children, and living in a city, in rented accommodation, to feed, clothe and house that family today on an income of $125 or even $150 a month. It just cannot be done. Because those whom I describe find it virtually impossible to move about in quest of more lucrative employment, some agency should be established by the government or otherwise whose duties it would be to assist these people to obtain a more equitable return for their services.

The last time I had the privilege of speaking in this chamber I expressed some considerable concern over the unemployment figures in my own constituency and in other maritime constituencies. Since then I have seen very real evidence of the effort which is being made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) to direct, wherever reasonable and feasible, a flow of defence work to industries in our eastern provinces. His appointment of responsible officers in his new Department of Defence Production to ensure continuity of this policy is being received with a sense of relief by our people.

I am also pleased at the interest which is being shown in providing work for the large drydock and shipbuilding yards in my own city of Saint John, where both management and employees as well as citizens generally are eagerly awaiting news of an extensive program of construction and repairs. I would imagine that perhaps this policy will even be enlarged upon after the Minister of Trade and Commerce reads the speech which was so ably delivered by my friend the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Ferguson). Up until now work has not been sufficiently steady in this industry to warrant our steel workers remaining in Saint John, and we have been in constant danger of losing them to other and busier yards.

I would call the attention of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) to the necessity for extending dock facilities on the eastern side of Saint John harbour. Since the completion of the Pugsley terminal a little more than a year ago, we have been left with excellent docking and loading facilities which cannot be properly exploited unless this new pier is extended at least to Reed's Point, so-called, which lies directly south of it. The recently-experienced congestion on the western side of our harbour has brought sharply into focus the necessity for completing this project. Until this extension is proceeded with, it will not be possible to lay railway tracks between the large new sheds and the face of the pier and thus make it possible to load lumber and other cargoes aboard ship without loss of money, time and effort.

Saint John harbour is one of the most important shipping points in this country, and I say that with due and humble apologies to the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. Balcom). As the present crisis develops, it becomes increasingly urgent that we make every possible effort to meet an emergency. When the broad general curbs were put on the expenditure of public funds for all but essential public projects, surely these curbs were never intended to apply to a pier for ocean-going vessels which is just as essential to our defence requirements as are jet fighters or field artillery. If the construction of this pier is not proceeded with at the present time, we may shortly be facing congestion of a most serious nature brought on by an emergency which hovers on the horizon. When the supplementary estimates are brought down, I sincerely hope that provision will be made therein for completion of this vital project.

I shall hold until a later date my appraisal of the report of the Turgeon commission on transportation, but references made to the seaway project in the course of this debate impel me to say that the finding of that commission in respect of the Chignecto canal leaves me with a cold feeling toward the St. Lawrence seaway. Like the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Richard), I am not opposed to this project; but it is difficult for us to become enthusiastic over it when the Turgeon commission, after but a cursory examination of only a small part of the evidence available, and that of a documentary nature, has so effectively shut the door on the arguments put forward in support of the Chignecto canal. That part of the report dealing with the canal has as effectively stunned a large section of our population in the Atlantic provinces as though they had been sandbagged.

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, tonight I should like to deal with three aspects of the current budget. The first aspect with which I should like to take issue is the fact that there is no increase in the tax on alcoholic spirits, while at the same time the taxes on many of the necessities of life have been materially increased.

If there ever was a luxury, it is alcoholic spirits; and those who consume them can certainly afford to pay an increased tax. If the tax had been increased on alcoholic spirits, it would have been possible to eliminate, or greatly to reduce, the increased tax which has been imposed on many of the necessities of life.

In this action I believe that the government is guilty of favouring those who can afford luxuries, at the expense of those who are struggling, against an ever-increasing cost of living, to feed, clothe and house their families.

The second aspect of this budget with which I should like to take issue is the fact that it contains no provision for halting the ever-increasing rise in prices. The increased taxes themselves add to the cost of living. Unless price control is immediately imposed, prices will continue to rise, and pensioners and others in the lower income groups will continue to suffer ever-increasing hardship and privation.

I believe that this persistent refusal on the part of the government to bring in price control is a callous disregard of the needs of the people.

The third aspect of this budget with which I should like to take issue is the statement made recently by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) that those serving in our armed forces overseas are no longer exempt from the income tax.

This is a complete reversal of the policy adopted by the present government during the last war; a policy which met with widespread and general approval by all of the people of this country.

In attempting to explain his action, the minister said he believed that no type of employment in this country should be exempt from income tax. That is quite satisfactory when applied to those of us who live and work in the comfort and security of Canada, but it is quite another matter when you are dealing with men who are daily risking their lives to fight our battles overseas.

I believe that those who serve overseas in our armed forces should be exempt from income tax. That is the very least we can do for these gallant men.

Now I should like to deal with a matter which is of vital importance to all Canadians, namely, the matter of a health insurance plan for this country.

One of the great needs of people today is to find some way by which the financial cost of sickness or accident can cease to impose a crippling burden of debt upon individuals and families.

When sickness or accident strikes today, one of two things usually happens; either the proper care and treatment are not given, because the financial cost is too high; or, if proper care and treatment are given, the family or the individual is dealt a financial blow, from which it may take many years to recover.

I believe that we cannot allow either of those conditions to continue any longer. Both can be overcome by a system of universal contributory health insurance.

It is obvious that if a health insurance plan is to be successful, it must receive the wholehearted support and co-operation of the doctors and dentists of this country. It must interfere as little as possible with the present method of administering to the health of this country, which has proved to be very satisfactory indeed. It should concern itself with finding some better method by which people can pay their bills for the medical and dental services which they do receive. Now, how can this best be done?

I believe that the system employed in Great Britain today is not satisfactory, because it has succeeded in lowering the quality of service to the individual. All services in Great Britain have been free, and the "something-for-nothing" aspect has caused those who really do not need treatment to flock to the doctor's office. They have done so in such large numbers that the time which the doctor or dentist can devote to any individual patient is so short that the treatment which any one patient can receive is, of necessity, superficial.

The "something-for-nothing" aspect of the British plan is, of course, a complete myth, because the full cost of the plan must be borne by the people, both in regular contributions and in taxes.

I believe that the best kind of plan for this country is that which has proved successful in Sweden and in a number of other European countries for a number of years. Under that plan, 75 per cent of the cost of treatment or hospitalization is met out of a health insurance fund, which is maintained by regular contributions from all of the people.

The other 25 per cent of the cost of treatment or hospitalization is paid by the patient, and this removes the "something-for-nothing" aspect of the British plan. It is sufficient to ensure that those applying for treatment really do need it. On the other hand, it is not so much as to impose a severe financial burden on the individual or on the family.

It is obvious, I believe, that the 25 per cent of the bill which the patient pays reduces the over-all cost of the plan by that amount, and the regular monthly contributions which the people pay are therefore 25 per cent less than they would be under a plan which pays for the whole cost of the treatment. The cost of the plan is also kept to a minimum, because only those who really need treatment apply for it.

The scale of fees which doctors and dentists would charge could be set up very easily through consultation with the medical and dental professions. The doctor-patient relationship will remain exactly the same as it is today. The only change would be that the patient would pay 25 per cent of the bill, and the doctor would submit his account for the remaining 75 per cent to the health insurance fund.

I believe that this type of plan will work, and that it will materially improve the health of the people by insuring that they receive the proper treatment when they need it, without imposing an undue financial burden either upon the individual or upon the family.

I believe that this type of plan should be studied by the government, and should be presented to parliament for its consideration at the very earliest opportunity.

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Riley) on his very well balanced speech. He spent about a minute and a half in praising the government and twenty minutes in a very pointed criticism of it. I think that is a fair indication—

Mr. Riley: Only suggestions.

Mr. Wright:—of the value of this government to his constituents. In a speech he made some time ago he criticized the government quite severely with regard to the distribution of industry in Canada, and he received—

Mr. Riley: It has been corrected now.

Mr. Wright:—very good publicity on it.

Mr. Riley: That has been corrected now.

Mr. Wright: Tonight he criticized them with regard to the unemployment situation, the high cost of living and low wages. I agree with him entirely in his criticisms. I think he should come over with us, here; we would welcome him on this side of the house. He makes some very valuable criticisms of the government.

Mr. Riley: If some of you fellows—about sixteen of you—were not with the party, I would be delighted to come over there.

Mr. Wright: I had not intended to enter the debate until I heard the speech of the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) this afternoon. He seems always to be able to provoke me into making another speech, and has done that today by quoting briefly from a publication distributed quite recently to all members in the house, and put out by the Labour party in Great Britain. He quoted from this publication to prove certain points with which I shall deal later. Before he did that however he indicated that some people, in making statements and speeches, are apt to shade the facts. He used that argument in an effort to justify certain publications put out by the government to make the people better acquainted with the facts.

But sometimes, even in publishing facts, such facts can be stated on one side of a case, and shaded to an even greater extent than if no statement had been made at all. I do not think the hon. member should have used the expression "shading the facts", when he was criticizing recommendations from this side of the house with regard to higher income tax. As a matter of fact the hon. member for Coast-Capilano gave the impression that the wealthier people in this country were retaining only $4 out of every $100 subject to income tax. He did not say, however, that the man who is receiving an income of $250,000 has over $50,000 left after he has paid his income tax. He did not say that there is kept out of his income $96 out of each $100 only when the income exceeds a quarter of a million dollars. In other words he still keeps $4,000 out of every $100,000 over the quarter of a million dollars of income; and I am sure he is not being hurt at all by that procedure. He still has a very good income remaining, and is in a much better position than the old age pensioner, those who are receiving widows' allowances and many other persons on fixed incomes in this country.

I think the hon. member for Coast-Capilano was perhaps shading the facts a bit when he quoted only one small portion from the pamphlet to which I have referred and which has been issued and distributed. It seems to me there are many interesting facts set out, and I should like to place on the record tonight some that the hon. member failed to place on the record this afternoon. He took only that part which suited his own argument.

The pamphlet is entitled "This Cost of Living Business," and covers widely the position in Great Britain in connection with the cost of living in and the productivity of that country. The hon. member for Coast-Capilano suggested that if those of us in this group were placed in a position where we had to bring down a budget we would tax corporations to a point where they would have nothing left for reinvestment, and there would be no capital expansion in the country.

I would bring to the attention of the house the fact that this party was organized in 1932, at a time when there was very little capital expansion, at a time when, because of the failure of private enterprise to make the necessary capital expansion and to develop the resources of the country, hundreds of thousands of people were without employment. One of the objectives of this group was to see that we stopped this boom and bust economy we have under free enterprise, so that we might have in Canada an expansion of our productivity which would give employment to all our people and would develop the resources of the country as they should be developed.

The government in Great Britain has increased the productivity of that country. In this pamphlet it states that productivity is increasing rapidly.

Mr. McIlraith: The hon. member has given the title of the pamphlet; would he place on record the names of the publishers? He will find it on the back.

Mr. Coldwell: The hon. member did that. He said it was published by the Labour party.

Mr. Wright: It is published by the Labour party.

Mr. McIlraith: The point I wish to establish is that it is not a government document; it is a party propaganda document.

Mr. Knowles: It is the same pamphlet from which the hon. member for Coast-Capilano quoted this afternoon.

Mr. Riley: Socialist propaganda.

Mr. Wright: It is the same pamphlet from which the hon. member for Coast-Capilano was quoting this afternoon.

Mr. McIlraith: That is right.

Mr. Wright: And it states that in 1950 productivity in Great Britain was about a third higher than pre-war, and that it went up between six and nine per cent in the first half of 1950. I would compare that with that statement of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) as reported at page 1803 of Hansard when, upon the occasion of introducing his budget, he said:

> . . . there has been no measurable increase in per capita productivity during the past five years.

He was referring to Canada when he made that statement. Great Britain, under a Labour government, has increased her productivity, and this pamphlet sets out how the increase was brought about. They increased it through organizing in their country working parties. These were parties which visited other plants where there were better methods, and they were thus able to bring back to their home plants new ideas. They increased their productivity by setting up Anglo-American productivity teams, whereby they brought teams of workers from the United States to some of the British factories to give the workers there some new ideas, and by sending working parties from Britain to the United States to see developments and different methods they had over there in increasing their productivity.

Then they increased their productivity by the formation of development councils who, along with management, were able to get together and to increase productivity in that country. Those are some of the methods used in Great Britain. Through them they were able to increase their general standard of living.

The pamphlet states further that between June 1945 and 1950 retail prices in Great Britain went up 21 per cent, which is quite an increase. It states that the increase is serious, but that it has been much greater in other countries. As a matter of fact retail prices in the United States went up 33 per cent during the same period, in Australia 36 per cent, and in Canada 38 per cent. Retail prices in Holland and other parts of Europe went up to a much greater extent. In Holland prices went up to the extent of 37 per cent, while in Italy the rise was 102 per cent, in Finland 233 per cent and in France 369 per cent. It points out however that the real test is what the real income of the people is, and to ascertain, after making allowances for higher prices, how much more goods and services they are able to use, per head of population. In Great Britain the amount of goods used was higher than before the war. An economic survey of Europe in 1949 published by the United Nations economic commission showed that of the western European countries labour Britain and labour Sweden tied for first place. In both these countries the level of real income in 1949 was 18 per cent above pre-war. The article continues:

> In Norway, another labour country, the increase was 17 per cent, in Denmark, 6 per cent. France's level was only 1 per cent above pre-war, Holland was still at the pre-war level, and Italy's level was 8 per cent lower than pre-war.

So that the British government were able and have been able to give their people a better standard of living than they were enjoying before the war. Since the war the money spent by the people of Britain on goods and services has been going up. In 1949 it was £8,400 million as against £6,790 million in 1946. Since 1946 clothes rationing has ended, and furniture, furnishings, household linen, washing machines, vacuum cleaners and television sets have been taken off the ration list and the consumption of these goods is much larger than it was before the war.

The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance did not go on to show direct controls in Great Britain had played a large part in maintaining this lower cost of living. About 60 per cent of the total spent by the nation is spent on things covered by price controls.

Mr. McIlraith: I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question? I am trying to follow his argument. He has taken a set of figures covering the period from 1946 to 1950 and then argues with regard to conditions in Great Britain now. Has he any figures that would bring the ones he is quoting up to date and which would deal with the sharply rising cost of living there, which perhaps is no sharper than anywhere else?

Mr. Wright: I have only the figures up to —

Mr. McIlraith: The hon. member seemed to be speaking about the present and the past in different parts of the same argument.

Mr. Coldwell: The hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) quoted from this pamphlet and the hon. member has a right to quote in rebuttal.

Mr. McIlraith: I was simply trying to clear up one point in his argument.

Mr. Wright: This pamphlet was introduced first by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano. The hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) has it in his hands. This brings the figures up to 1950 but it does not give the 1951 figures. I do not think they are available, but I think what is here proves my point.

Mr. McIlraith: The cost of living figures are.

Mr. Wright: The cost of living in Canada went up 4·5 points in one month and undoubtedly will show a rise in the future when the results of this budget are incorporated in retail prices. There is no doubt that some of the features in the budget will act against inflation in their long-term effect, but the short-term effect of the budget will be to create further inflation. You cannot increase the sales tax by 25 per cent, a tax which is imposed on a large proportion of the goods consumed in this country, without an inflationary effect. You cannot increase the excise taxes on other goods without the first effect being inflationary.

Some parts of the budget, such as that part wherein they have taken steps to prevent depreciation being allowed on certain types of construction for the next four years, no doubt in its long-term effect will be deflationary. As a matter of fact that is something which we in this group have been trying to bring to the attention of the government for some time. The accelerated depreciation allowed to industry by this government immediately after the war was inflationary. One of the major causes of the present inflation in this country was the tremendous amount of money spent on capital expansion. While a reasonable amount of capital expansion is absolutely necessary, it is possible to have too much especially for the production of non-essential goods.

This article shows that there is being used for capital expansion in Great Britain about 20 per cent of the total production. According to the figures given by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), if my memory serves me correctly, we are spending about 18 per cent of our total production in capital expansion. Only when we balance our capital expansion against the sale of goods will we have a balanced economy. There will have to be some planning of our economy if we are not to have the booms and busts we had in the past.

Because of certain measures introduced by the government immediately after the war in their decontrol policy and in giving accelerated depreciation on capital expansion we have the inflationary spiral in which we find ourselves today. That was one of the major causes. While I admit that certain parts of the budget are deflationary in effect, nevertheless the immediate effect is inflationary. I do not think that anyone who considers the budget as a whole can get away from the fact that it is inflationary.

As far as we in this group are concerned, we have always believed that we should set aside a certain amount of our national income each year for capital expansion. That is one of the first principles of this party. We agree that you cannot have your pie and eat it too. If the hon. member for Ottawa West would get a copy of Comment for March, 1951, published by the C.C.F., he would be able to get some idea of the policy of this group with regard to capital expansion. With regard to the slice of the Canadian pie, which is the total productivity of this country, it has this to say:

> The size of your particular piece will depend on these and other factors:
> (1) The size of the pie itself.
> (2) The proportion devoted to investment in capital goods.

And later on:

> The bigger the pie the more there is likely to be for each. Thus, we all have a stake in higher production. To get maximum production we must employ all our human and material resources. Nobody should be out of work and no factories should be idle. To make the biggest possible pie we must have the highest possible rate of productivity. This means both a full day's intelligent work each day by the members of the labour force and the best possible tools and equipment for the labour force to work with.

With regard to the reinvestment of capital, it states this:

Capital investment should be stabilized at an appropriate proportion so that we shall have continually increasing productivity in the years ahead. (The proportion was 18 per cent in 1950). It would be foolhardy to seek a bigger piece of pie this year if it means smaller ones in the years ahead.

It is essential that there be capital investment in any country. The basic policy of this group is that that capital investment should be planned so that there will be capital investment in new production and the bringing in of new resources over the years. That portion of the profits of corporations which is put back into capital investment for the production of necessary goods would never be touched by this party. It is absolutely essential that there be reinvestment in capital production. One of the things that we object to is a corporation coming into this country, investing in our natural resources, and then taking the profits which they make out of this country rather than reinvesting them in Canada. That is one type of profit which we believe should be taxed. The reinvestment of capital for the purpose of expanding production and developing our resources has always been a major plank in the platform of this group. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Ottawa West got me away from the matter I was discussing, but perhaps that is a good thing if it has removed any doubt from his mind as to the policies of this group with respect to capital investment.

Before concluding I should like to deal briefly with the development of the Saskatchewan river. We have had several speeches urging that at this session the government should bring down an item in the estimates which would indicate their intention of going ahead with the South Saskatchewan river project. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is in his place. He knows the province of Saskatchewan is very anxious to see this development proceeded with. They have agreed with him and with the P.F.R.A. officials to accept responsibility for their share of this project. One of the main reasons they are anxious to have it proceeded with immediately is the need for power in Saskatchewan. At the present time there is a real shortage of power. Owing to the rural electrification scheme introduced by the present government there has been a tremendous increase in the amount of power used.

At the present time that power is developed mainly in two ways, from coal at Estevan and from crude oil through plants in centrally located areas. Their whole system has been set up with the idea of eventually using power from two developments on the Saskatchewan river, the first on the South Saskatchewan and the second at Fort à la Corne, just below where the two forks of the Saskatchewan join, north of Kinistino in northeastern Saskatchewan. An amount of approximately $1 million has been placed in the estimates for this development this year, but that will not be sufficient to get the South Saskatchewan project under way. The dam is going to be largely of earth, and it is estimated that it will take seven years to complete that part of the project and approximately ten years to complete the whole program of irrigation and power development. The cost to the federal government is estimated at between $68 and $69 million and to the provincial government somewhere between $34 and $35 million. If we are only going to spend $1 million as provided in the estimates this year it will take about 70 years to get the dam built, and I am afraid most of us, including the Minister of Agriculture, will not be very much interested in the matter then.

In my opinion this South Saskatchewan development is only a small part of the total development of that river. I think it necessary that this be gone ahead with first in order to control the flood waters of the Saskatchewan, but there is a further development at Fort à la Corne which will supply almost as much power as the South Saskatchewan project. Then if we go down to the estuary of the Saskatchewan and Carrot rivers we find, according to a survey made by the P.F.R.A. during the last two years, between three and four million acres of the best land to be found on the continent of North America. This is not in use today because of flood conditions. We do not have the figures of just how much money would be required to prevent this flooding, but I doubt if it would be as much as we are going to spend on the South Saskatchewan project. I doubt if it would cost $100 million to prevent the flooding which takes place in that area. If this flooding could be prevented through dams further up the Saskatchewan which would hold back the water, and if that area could be placed under cultivation, we would have not 500,000 or 750,000 acres of new land that could be irrigated under the South Saskatchewan project, but probably 3 to 4 million acres of the best land on this continent. As a result production in that area would be greatly increased. Approximately two and a half to three million acres of this land lies in Manitoba and the remainder of almost a million acres in Saskatchewan. I am sure this is the largest single area of undeveloped land remaining in Canada, and it is probably one of the last large areas that can be opened up for development.

These are projects which should be developed. We all realize that with the present world situation we have to make large expenditures for defence; but if this country had maintained reasonable price controls we could have saved a large part of those expenditures. It is estimated that our defence budget this year will be approximately $1,600 million, and that in the next three years we are going to spend $5,000 million on defence projects. Anyone who will take the trouble to compare the prices we have to pay for equipment today with the prices we were paying in 1944 and 1945 will discover the startling fact that to buy airplanes and tanks today it costs the government approximately $3 for every $1 it cost in 1944. In other words if we had maintained some controls over prices and basic materials in this country we would have been able to get the same amount of war production for just one-third what we have to pay today. Then some of the money that could have been saved by reasonable controls in this country could have been spent on the development of new areas and the extension of railway lines, so that we would have been in a much better position to produce the sinews of war than is the case today.

I suggest to the government that while we are engaged in an effort to build a defence force that will work for peace, there are other projects which will also work for peace. The development of the food supplies of this country to the point where we had exportable surpluses that could be used to feed hungry peoples probably would be an even greater contribution to peace than our armed forces. Eventually we will have to realize that we cannot continue to have large areas of undeveloped territory while millions of people starve in the crowded countries of Asia. Only when we realize that and begin to develop our resources so that through their use we can supply some of the needs of the world will we be able to contribute effectively to peace.

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to offer some observations of a general nature on some statements contained in the budget speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). I believe it is fair to say that the good humoured appearance and manner of the minister in introducing his budget this year indicated that he did not find raising the necessary money a very difficult job. Anyone who examines the sources from which he is going to get his new taxes, $405 million, will see there are only half a dozen items from which he will get that large amount of money. It says something for the efficiency of the tax structure of Canada that such a great amount can be raised so simply.

The economic survey given by the minister draws attention, in my opinion, to the great influence which governments today have upon the direction and development of trade and commerce. Institutions like the wheat board, and legislation like the Agricultural Prices Support Act, the Fisheries Prices Support Act and the Agricultural Marketing Act, affect the prosperity of farmers and fishermen to a great extent. Controls and subsidies, taxes, duties and rates of exchange, can all be used by a minister of finance to bring about what he considers the best results for the people of this country.

It is startling to examine the figures given by the Minister of Finance in that respect. For example, he said that the action of the government in September, 1949, in altering exchange rates, had this effect: That the imports from the United Kingdom increased by 32 per cent; imports from countries other than the United States increased by 27 per cent; exports to the United States increased by 34 per cent; exports to the United Kingdom declined by 33 per cent. He said that trade was, in that way, balanced. I think we will all recognize that trade is a delicate thing when it is capable of such sudden and swift reversal. It happens that the way it went was all right, but if it had gone the other way the Minister of Finance would not have been in such good humour two weeks ago.

The remarkable increase in industrial activity in 1950, after the depressing start that we made last year, has resulted in increased earnings, increased profits, increased prices and, for the government, increased revenue. As the Minister of Finance would be the first to recognize, this increase was principally accounted for by the developments that took place last June when the North Korean forces invaded the south. It is remarkable how closely associated the country's prosperity seems to be with war. Of course, this is illusionary. While many people make profits out of war, those who are least able to bear the effects of war find that, as prices have gone up, their standard of living has been lowered. Whether this increase in Canada's prosperity would have occurred but for the Korean affair is very problematical.

The minister draws attention to the increased productivity in European countries, and shows how they have expanded their production considerably in advance of what it was in 1939. To some extent the productivity of those countries during the past year is also attributable to war preparation. It is due, in large part, to the cumulative efforts of the aid which was distributed through the Marshall plan to those European countries whose recovery was considered to be necessary and desirable. Arrangements for this aid were made with the object of preserving those countries from falling under the influence of communism. So far as the United States itself is concerned, the effects of the Korean war in economic and commercial affairs have been greater than here. In the United States they have introduced a measure of price control, and there is reason, I believe, to feel that it is going to be successful.

Although in his speech the Minister of Finance indicated an appreciation of the menace of Russia to the free nations of the world, the policy of the government during the past year has shown only a fraction of the anxiety and fear that seem to be actuating the people and the government of the United States. It seems strange that these two countries, side by side and possessing the same knowledge of the dangers threatening the free world, should view this threat in such a different manner. The United States has taken most extreme measures to resist this threat. They have introduced compulsory military service, and are trying to conscript youths as early as eighteen years of age, whereas in this country we are going along dependent upon a half-hearted recruiting campaign to get 150,000 men in three years. At the conclusion of it we shall have in proportion about as many men as Belgium had in 1949.

When the armies of North Korea invaded South Korea last June, a quick victory by the communists was prevented only by the rapid action of the United States which was the only country possessing sufficient trained men to go to the assistance of the hard pressed South Korean forces. Canada had no troops to send. Three or four days after this aggression had occurred, parliament adjourned without having made any preparations for Canada to play its full part. Although Canada sent three ships of war, and gave other material help, it was unable to provide the ground forces which were most needed in that crisis. By the time the special session was called in September, the situation had become more grave but the government seemed to view the situation with no greater sense of urgency or concern. It is true that at that time powers were taken to raise money, and we did vote a large amount of money. Power was taken to recruit a special force for service wherever the United Nations wanted it to be sent. But here we are, ten months after the outbreak of the war, and Canada today has only one battalion in the field and 6,000 men en route.

I noticed that in a speech at Toronto the other night the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) said that people in the U.S.A. were complaining that Canada was not doing its share, because it was only doing one-twelfth or one-sixteenth when it should be doing more. He said, how is it no one says Argentina or Egypt is not contributing an equal share? I think it is due to the important position Canada has been playing in world affairs. Because of its actual wealth and its potential wealth, more is expected of Canada today than those countries which he mentioned. Our own deficiencies are reasons which should make us thankful that we are a neighbour of the United States. We receive protection from the United States that I do not think we fully appreciate. I am quite sure that if the United States were not there with its powerful forces there would be nothing to prevent Russia from attacking us instead of looking for objectives in Asia.

Not only those living in Canada but the whole world, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs has repeatedly said, owes a great debt to the United States. If it had not been for the decisive action of the United States in June, what would the United Nations have done? I contend that without the leadership of the United States there would be no United Nations today. If it had not been for the action of the United States, Korea would now be under communist control, and it is quite feasible that communist forces would have since invaded Formosa or even Japan. Because of the magnificent leadership of the United States in world affairs, I think it was rather surprising that the Secretary of State for External Affairs should speak as he recently did in Toronto. Some country must take the lead in upholding the principle of international justice and morality. What nation is better qualified to do so than the United States which, for several years past, has been distributing largess to all the nations of the world with a lavish hand from its vast resources? What nation today could equal the vast efforts she is making to rearm herself and protect the other nations of the world against aggression? What nation can say that the United States is doing less than her share for the maintenance of world peace and the protection of the weaker freedom-loving nations of the world against aggression? There is no country so well qualified, for so many reasons, for the all-important task of world leadership. This is the role that the majority of nations have given to the United States today. The statesmen of other countries, whose contributions do not compare with those of the United States, I think should therefore refrain from publicly rebuking the United States for performing the duties which leadership of that nature requires.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs has complained about the criticism of Canada by people in the United States. He should remember that on at least three occasions in the past year the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. St. Laurent) did not hesitate to speak his mind quite frankly and quite firmly on subjects concerning the United States and on one occasion that I remember, whilst visiting the United States, the subject matter of his comments was of no apparent concern to Canada at all. If words have meanings, leadership implies followers who are filled with zeal and are loyal to the leader in the pursuit of those noble objectives of world peace and security and the social and economic progress of all the nations of the world. Such an attitude does not, of course, imply slavishness or obsequiousness. It seems to me that the discussion in Canadian forums, by cabinet ministers, of questions such as the unfavourable criticism of certain groups in the United States is of doubtful value. It certainly seems to be far from the traditional idea we have had of the art of diplomacy. It seems to me that we are copying the bad example of the Russians who, by their brazen, openly aggressive and even insulting tactics, have made diplomacy so difficult today. Canadian public men it seems to me should not adopt those tactics. It is regrettable if they do; but that they should consider it necessary seems to show our helplessness in these difficult times, and the necessity for our depending upon God's help in the work which we have in hand.

For the success of the lofty undertakings entrusted to the United Nations more than diplomacy and ability is necessary today. I know that it is probably quite trite to say it, but everyone recognizes that we need the great virtues of patience, wisdom, charity and humility, and that we need to put our trust in God more than in guns. But throughout it all we need perseverance, keeping in sight the final aims we have in mind.

I am encouraged to offer these comments by some of the observations made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in his speech in Toronto, when he said that foreign affairs are now the business of every Canadian family and the responsibility of every Canadian citizen. If such a statement applies equally to the citizens of the United States, I should like to hear his appraisal of the tremendously popular welcome given to General MacArthur on his return after his sudden dismissal from the high posts and the high offices which he has held because of the views which he had publicly expressed on the manner in which the Korean campaign had been carried on.

What are the aims of the United Nations? How many members of this house here tonight can tell what are the aims of the United Nations now in Korea? I do not believe anyone knows, not even my hon. friend the Minister of Veterans Affairs who represented Canada so well at the United Nations this year. But I should like to draw attention to the statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs at the United Nations general assembly on September 27 last when he laid down five objectives that the United Nations should have. The first three of them are as follows: First, a united and free Korea; second, assistance by the United Nations to the peoples of Korea in establishing peace and order throughout the territory of Korea; and third, a Korea not divided or disturbed by subversive communist elements directed from outside Korea.

Recent events seem to indicate a serious weakening in the resolution of the United Nations to attain these ends. Now no one hears any mention of a solution to the Korean problem at all that would require, for example, the aggressors to pay compensation for the damages and injuries they have inflicted upon the United Nations forces. Nevertheless, reparations of that kind seem to be imperative if international justice is to be respected. Those responsible for the conduct of the affairs of the United Nations should remember that it is desirable to have clear and definite aims and objectives. If these aims are always to be thwarted and negatived or neutralized by the fear of possible communist disapproval or action, then the work of the United Nations, in its most important aspect—the pursuit of peace and its maintenance—would be reduced to its lowest level. It would be better to reorganize the United Nations and proceed without the presence of Russia than always to have to submit to communist dictatorship and veto. For example, if Russia had happened to have judged the situation aright and to have been present at the security council at the time that the northern armies of Korea invaded southern Korea, I think that she would have been far more successful. It was only the absence of Russia from the security council that permitted the measures to be taken which resulted in the defeat of North Korea.

To one who comes from a country which owes the loss of its independence to the inability of finance ministers to balance its budget for a number of years, the ease with which the Minister of Finance accomplished his task is a source of great astonishment. I realize that Canada in the early thirties was also having its financial difficulties and its budget remained unbalanced for many years. But during the war the revenues increased and if it had not been for the extraordinary war expenditures, the excess of revenues over expenditures would have been great.

The potential wealth of this country is amazing. Under the very walls of this building the mighty Ottawa river flowing majestically to join the St. Lawrence is already, to the people of Ontario and Quebec, a great source of electrical energy and power and is capable of producing even greater quantities of electrical energy and power. The mighty St. Lawrence river could prove to be an immense reservoir of electrical energy; and in my opinion the wealth and production of those two provinces are closely associated with the fact that they possess within their borders this great source and cause of wealth. The growth and prosperity of Montreal, Toronto and the cities and towns adjacent to the hydroelectric developments are due in great measure to the availability of the supply of electrical energy. I should like to see the St. Lawrence waterways project become a reality. Yet I sympathize with the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) and the hon. member for Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan) for the anxiety which they feel lest the deepening of the St. Lawrence and the development of the canal system should spell further decline for the maritime provinces. It seems to be understood by them—and I believe their opinion is generally shared by the members in all parties from the maritimes—that the maritime provinces will decline in proportion as the central provinces improve their financial and economic position. This should not be so, and it should not be beyond the wisdom of the statesmen of this country to investigate the cause of these fears and dispel them. It is a remarkable thing to me, who came into confederation just a couple of years ago, to find that after 84 years of confederation the members from the maritimes rise in their places and speak of the mistake that was made as if it had been only yesterday. They feel so bitterly that today they question the advisability of this vast project which seems to be full of benefits for Canada as a whole.

I can only re-echo the sentiments expressed by the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Balcom) in his speech today, on which I also congratulate him, when he said that he could not see how something which was going to be of general benefit to Canada as a whole should be of disadvantage for any considerable part of it. It seems to me, however, that the government should take these matters into consideration seriously and do all in their power to alleviate the injustices of which the members from the maritimes complain.

It was remarked in the Turgeon report that the central provinces had no complaints or questions to ask about the freight rates that prevailed in Ontario or Quebec. That was a significant fact. It showed that it did not matter which way the freight rates went, Ontario and Quebec would be prosperous anyhow. I know that by union of Newfoundland with Canada the economy of Newfoundland has been seriously affected, and with a view to putting that economy on a sounder basis I have repeatedly drawn the attention of this house, and especially of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), to the promotion of agriculture in Newfoundland. I have tried to induce him to come down and visit us, but he has not yet found it convenient to do so. He is such an expert on such a matter that I believe it would be helpful to us if he did find it convenient to come.

I have great faith in Newfoundland. I think that it can produce a far greater share of the food and the clothing that it needs if agriculture is properly developed. Agriculture is a subject that comes especially within the duties of the federal government, and I do not think it is fair for the federal government to leave so much of the solution of this great economic problem to the greatly handicapped department of agriculture in Newfoundland. They have only one or two officials down there. They have not got the experts in all departments that the federal government has. I would plead with the Minister of Agriculture again this year that he come to see us and see for himself our possibilities, and see if he cannot give us greater help than we have yet received from the federal government.

Somewhat different considerations apply to the question of the fisheries. In the remarks that I made on the speech from the throne I urged the government of Canada to do in Newfoundland as they had done in Nova Scotia, namely, send a man down there to organize the fishermen. Well, I do not know whether the Minister of Fisheries (Mr.

Mayhew) took my remarks seriously when I spoke about what had happened in 1929 when the government of Canada engaged the Rev. Dr. Coady, the great co-operative expert, to go around Nova Scotia and organize the fishermen of that province. He did so, and the united maritime fishermen is the result. It is a very powerful organization today. Whether the Minister of Fisheries took me seriously or not, it appears that the premier of Newfoundland took the matter very seriously, because he has done the very thing that I recommended. He called a convention of fishermen. A delegation of 200 fishermen came to St. John's to a convention at the government's expense. He brought Dr. Coady from Nova Scotia to lecture the delegates on the benefits of co-operation, and on the advantages that would come to them if they would organize and market their products co-operatively and also buy their goods on a co-operative basis.

When I was speaking in the same debate I made some statements on the prices received by fishermen to which the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Carter) called attention the other day. It must have been fairly obvious to anyone who read my speech—and I am sure it was to the Minister of Fisheries—that when I was speaking about the prices paid to fishermen by the merchants I was not condemning all the merchants of Newfoundland. I was speaking only of course from information which I had gathered from those who had come to see me, and those with whom I had come in contact. But even then I found some fish buyers and merchants paying higher prices than others. I was criticizing those whose prices appeared to be unreasonable. Now a royal commission has been appointed in Newfoundland to investigate these prices and the fisheries prices support board is also doing the same thing. Therefore I think that further comment should be deferred until one or both of these bodies have reported.

On former occasions I have brought to the attention of this house the inadequacy of the financial terms that Newfoundland received on union, and I have asked the government to act in accordance with the terms of union and appoint a royal commission to go into that question in regard to Newfoundland. The term of union which deals with this subject reads as follows:

> In view of the difficulty of predicting with sufficient accuracy the financial consequences to Newfoundland of becoming a province of Canada, the government of Canada will appoint a royal commission within eight years from the date of union to review the financial position of the province of Newfoundland and to recommend the form and scale of additional financial assistance, if any, that may be required by the government of the province of Newfoundland to enable it to continue public services at the levels and standards reached subsequent to the date of union, without resorting to taxation more burdensome, having regard to capacity to pay, than that obtaining generally in the region comprising the maritime provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island.

That section gave a term of eight years within which this royal commission should be appointed; but it has been my opinion from the beginning that the financial terms have been inadequate. Since, sir, the commission of government left a legacy of between $40 million and $50 million, of which about half has now been expended in two years, and the government of Newfoundland has been depending upon a transitional grant of $6½ million and drawing about $12 million a year from the surplus, it will be seen that in another two years Newfoundland will be in serious financial stress again, and as only the other day one of the ministers in the provincial government, namely, the minister of natural resources, resigned and said that in his opinion the policy of the government was driving Newfoundland into financial ruin, I believe the government of Canada should soon give consideration to the appointment of such a royal commission.

The Newfoundland government has been working with feverish energy to try and induce foreign capital to come into the province, but apart from the development on the Quebec-Labrador frontier no foreign capital has yet been invested in Newfoundland. The government of Newfoundland, however, out of the surplus, has started four enterprises of an industrial nature. They are building a cement plant and two plants for the production of gypsum products, and near St. John's they are building a mill to treat birch. The initiative for the appointment of this royal commission, it seems to me, rests with the government of Canada, as the government will have to bear the reproaches of Newfoundlanders. I hate to think what Newfoundlanders will be saying in eighty-four years' time about what happened in 1949. I think the government of Canada should consider the question now and not allow it to become a running sore. The government should show its sincerity and interest in the new province, because the problem is a very serious one. We should not have to depend upon socialistic enterprise, in which I am sure the federal government has very little faith.

The Minister of Finance remarked that the action taken by members of the North Atlantic treaty organization to protect themselves had been a great and incalculable change for the better during the last year. The prolonged negotiations between the governments of Belgium, Holland, Luxembourg, France and western Germany in regard to the integration of the coal and steel industry terminated since the minister brought down his budget. I am sure however that he will agree that this arrangement is a matter of tremendous importance. There is reason to hope that the arrangement will mean lasting peace between these two countries, France and Germany, which have been at war so often in the last one hundred years. It seems to mean more than that; it means that these two countries will collaborate in the common defence of western civilization, which has been in such mortal peril during the last few months.

The underlying causes of these actions are due to the fear of communist aggression from Russia. There has been a general appreciation that there is no time to lose on the part of the western nations. They must unite in resistance to this hateful, inhuman thing which is opposed to everything that Christian men hold dear. The governments of western Europe and of the western world generally know the tremendous issues that are at stake —the dignity of man and the Christian conception of the importance of the individual, parliamentary government and freedom itself.

The preservation of this priceless heritage justifies the greatest sacrifices on the part of free men everywhere. For that reason members of all parties in the house have refrained from criticism of the government in raising the money necessary to carry out defence projects. Where we differ from the government is in the impact which this new tax will have upon the people of Canada. It is a principle of taxation that those best able to bear the burden should be the ones who would have to carry it. The very rich corporations, the very rich people should have to pay far more in proportion than those who are barely getting along, hand to mouth. It is a criticism which I think is justified, that in these few taxes, which seem so simple, imposed the other day by the Minister of Finance, he has given another boost to the rise in the cost of living. And, as the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Riley) has so well said, it is the people of low incomes who are going to feel most the effects of this new taxation.

The increased sales tax and taxes on stoves, refrigerators and washing machines will be felt most by those who are least able to bear the added cost. Today these items can scarcely be regarded as luxuries, in a country which has so much electrical energy as has Canada. To the harassed housewife, the mother of several children, it seems to me that the washing machine is a godsend; and to put a tax on that is simply to prevent her and her young family from having that advantage, and seems to be imposing a hardship on those who are least able to bear it.

We can only hope that the criticisms the minister has received from all quarters in the house in respect of putting on these taxes will have some effect upon him in the future. As he deemed it advisable two weeks ago to reduce the tax on candy from 30 to 15 per cent, we can only hope that he may come to the conclusion that, after all, perhaps it is better to put a little extra tax on liquor, or on some other articles better able to carry them than the ones I have already mentioned.

The minister has mentioned that we have two things in mind, two great issues, namely the pursuit of peace and the control of inflation. In the pursuit of peace the government should take care that the standard of living of which Canada has been so proud should not be allowed to deteriorate. There is grave fear that in its methods of attaining peace it may fail to control inflation, which we all fear so much.

Mr. J. S. Sinnott (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to take part in the debate tonight, which has been going on for the last week. I have listened attentively to all the speeches made thus far. I am somewhat abashed however in following the eloquence of the hon. member who has just preceded me. But after listening to him for forty minutes I must confess that I am more confused than when he started.

Mr. Harkness: You are always confused.

Mr. Sinnott: However, for those who did understand him, I understand it is a good speech.

Then, Mr. Speaker, I have listened to hon. members who have taken part in the debate thus far. I would refer first to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), who during the cost of living debate brought matters of public importance to the attention of the government, and dealt particularly with the rise in the cost of living. Then he proceeded to speak for about an hour and fifty minutes, at the end of which time we were still at a loss to learn from him what we should do to bring down the cost of living.

Then the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), the official critic, and a man whom I respect highly, proceeded to criticize the government for some considerable length of time. But again, at the close of his speech I was at a loss to understand his criticism.

Mr. Harkness: It is chronic.

Mr. Sinnott: The hon. member began his speech in this way:

> Mr. Speaker, we are living at a time so critical in the history of our country and of civilization that no one with any proper sense of responsibility should allow himself to be critical just for the sake of trying to score an advantage. Whether or not we are fortunate enough to come through this period without war, I suppose it is quite likely that history will look back to the spring of 1951 as a time of critical significance.

After making a statement like that, in which he said in effect that any member criticizing the government should offer some solution and know what he was talking about, I suggest the hon. member should have spent much less time than he did spend that day.

On page 2047 of Hansard of April 16, 1951, you find the hon. member for Greenwood reported as follows:

> How has this difficult situation arisen? Has it just "growed" like Topsy? Let me review it very briefly. After the unfreezing of prices and abandonment of subsidies which came after the last war, prices rose from 119 in 1945 to 123 in 1946, to 135 in 1947, to 155 in 1948, and to 167 in 1950.

At the present time it has gone up to 179.

An hon. Member: Disgraceful.

Mr. Sinnott: Disgraceful is right when you have not found any solution from a man like that who makes that kind of speech. Then he goes on to say:

> As I say, the government persisted in this technique, which was designed for a depression, long after it was made clear that there was a boom. As I have mentioned in this house before, the Winnipeg Free Press referred to this as the big blunder; while the Hamilton Spectator, in rather racy language, referred to it as the disastrous holiday-mood easy-money era that found politicians and economic pressure groups doing everything in their power to make inflation a permanent institution.

Previous to this parliament the policy of the Conservative party was to have all controls abolished. When those controls were taken off then the party seems to be divided as to whether or not they should all be put back on. There is no consistency whatever in their arguments.

Then I should like to refer to the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), whom I consider one of the brightest members of the opposition. After listening to him speak the other evening for forty-five minutes we were still at a loss to know just what suggestions were being made to the government to cure the inflationary trend. Then we go to the bright and would-be leader of the opposition, the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). Here is his contribution, as reported on page 1919 of Hansard of April 11:

> Mr. Speaker, I have sat here through the debate waiting to hear the answer to the question that the Canadian people are asking: what is the government going to do about the high cost of living? What is going to be done about inflation? What measures are to be taken? For two days this discussion has proceeded, and as yet there is no suggestion that anything effective is to be done to meet a situation that affects every home in the country. No proof is needed that inflation today is terrible in its incidence and effect. No one expects the government to do everything, but at least the people as a whole have a right to expect that the government will do something at this time.

I would say that that was a pretty sensible speech, but after following it over the next two or three pages I find that there is not one solitary effort made to tell the government what to do to bring down the cost of living. Then we heard from the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth (Mr. Charlton) but he made no suggestions. Then we heard from the flaming hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Ferguson), who gave one of his great oratorical efforts tonight. We are all pleased to hear his humour. In one breath he was saying that the government was all wrong, that there should be private enterprise, and then he was saying that the government should get out of business. How can you make sense out of two statements like that?

Mr. Cruickshank: It cannot be done.

Mr. Sinnott: I intended to say something tonight with regard to my own constituency, but with more important matters before us I shall leave that to another time. Just recently the government explored the possibility of Snow Lake, Manitoba, for the development of copper, zinc, lead, et cetera. I should like to draw to their attention the fact that in Springfield there is the possibility of developing another Sudbury in the production of lead, copper, zinc and lithium, of which there is one of the biggest deposits in the world.

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Sinnott: Before I get through you will have some explanation. During the cost of living debate I mentioned subsidies on the essentials of life such as bread, meat and milk. When I refer to those subsidies I must not forget to refer to the fair section of our house. The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) also said that these were the essentials of life, with which I quite agree. I mentioned those subsidies in order that during the next week or so the government might indicate some way in which they could be applied. However, up to the present time I have had no word from them.

Today the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) quoted from a pamphlet issued in Great Britain and which attempted to set out what was going on in Great Britain. On page 9 of this socialist propaganda they state this:

Britain's Imports

One big element in the cost of living, the prices we have to pay for imports, is outside the control of the government.

Britain has to import about half its food and many raw materials. Both food and raw materials are far more expensive than before the war. And prices have taken another steep rise since the outbreak of war in Korea. Some wool for example now costs nine times the pre-war price. Hides cost six times pre-war; cotton more than seven times pre-war. Within three months of the beginning of war in Korea the price of rubber rose 70 per cent, of tin 30 per cent, of U.S. cotton, 20 per cent, of zinc 20 per cent and of lead over 30 per cent.

Then on page 13 they deal with wages and salaries. When reference is made to wages and salaries I cannot help thinking of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and I cannot help thinking of the hon. member for gimme, gimme, gimme, gimme. It is a case of give me, give me, but give nothing back; get all you can out of the government, but do not attempt to show the government how they can get any money.

Mr. Sinclair: Is he the hon. member for Gimli?

Mr. Sinnott: He is the hon. member for gimme. This is what is said about wages and salaries:

What effect do changes in wages and salaries have on prices and the cost of living?

About 60 per cent of the value of the nation's output is the cost of wages and salaries.

Then we will go to another page. Remember this is published by the Labour government of Great Britain, by the socialist government, and yet we are often criticized by our hon. friends across the chamber. Here is what they say about the purchase tax.

Mr. Sinclair: That is the sales tax.

Mr. Sinnott: This is the tax about which the hon. member for Coast-Capilano has been ribbed about so much of late. They say that this purchase tax makes little difference to the cost of living of the working people. Then in section 5 they say:

In discussing the cost of living we have touched on many of the economic problems of our society. There is no such thing as a policy for the cost of living. Just as the cost of living is the result of a number of conditions in all parts of the economic system, so an attempt to control the cost of living involves a number of different policies applied to the key points in the system.

The government has a vital part to play in all this.

Mr. Johnston: What do you say about it?

Mr. Sinnott: Have you anything more to say before I continue?

Mr. Johnston: What are the Liberals doing about the cost of living?

Mr. Sinnott: This is what the government of Britain says:

But the government can only achieve its purpose in co-operation with the people. In the end it is the pressure of the government at one end, and of consumers at the other, that will really direct the economy in the way it should go. It is a long and difficult job, but not an impossible one.

Before I finish I may have something to say along the same lines. Now I go over to page 23, chapter 4:

Is it agreed that the greatest hope for lower costs lies in increased productivity and ending restrictive practices?

If our friends on the other side are all for controls they certainly are not of the same opinion as the Labour government in Britain. When I mentioned subsidies during the debate on the cost of living I had one thing in mind; but I left it open, because I am only a backbencher here, and I do not count for much. I have no say as to the final decision.

Mr. Johnston: It won't be long.

Mr. Sinnott: If the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) opens his mouth much wider it will blow up. By the way, Mr. Speaker, as far as I know he has not contributed anything to this debate so far. I am quite in accord with the hon. member for Hamilton West that something should be done about this inflationary trend; but in all the speeches we have heard in this house, both from the opposition and this side, there have not been many suggestions as to how government expenditure could be cut. I think the only hon. member to make a suggestion of that kind was the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Dupuis); and I think if the hon. member could go into the various real estate transactions that have taken place over the years he would find that the lawyers skimmed the cream off those. Just recently I read an article in a Toronto newspaper about a court case that had been adjourned six times, and the judge said the reason for all the adjournments was that the lawyers were making so much money out of real estate they did not have time for petty cases.

What I am going to suggest may not meet with the approval of everyone here, but I think it will meet with the approval of the hon. member for Hamilton West. I say that the essentials of life should be subsidized, such as bread, meat and milk. To pay for such subsidies money would have to be found; and while I am suggesting to the government that these subsidies should be paid I am also going to tell them where the money can be found.

The hon. member for Coast-Capilano was careful in his remarks today in dealing with the tax on liquor, but I am going to propose a tax of 2 cents an ounce on all hard liquor over and above the present tax, a tax of 1 cent an ounce on wine, and a special tax on beer by the glass.

Mr. Tustin: Would the hon. member tell us, for the sake of information, how much that tax would bring in during the coming year?

Mr. Sinnott: Sufficient, I would say, to pay the subsidy on all the milk and all the bread and all the meat consumed in this country, with money left over for the treasury. I am not an absentee when there is a drink around; once in a while I take one, if someone twists my arm, but too many men are spending their money foolishly on liquor and leaving their families at home without the essentials. Certainly this tax should be approved by most Canadian families.

An hon. Member: Rap the government.

Mr. Sinnott: Whether I rap the government or not I am sent down here to do my job. If I am supposed to be a yes man I do not want to be here at all. I do not follow the tune of my C.C.F. friends over there. When they get out of line they are whipped right back into line. The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) voted out of line just once. He was subjected to such a lashing by the whip that he never did it again. When the last vote was taken he whipped behind the curtain.

Mr. Thatcher: Where were you on wheat?

Mr. Sinnott: I was Johnny on the spot when the vote was taken. There is something that can be done. If the government would allow the people to keep something instead of taking it all away in taxes we would have plenty of production. Now, when I say what I have to say I hope it will be taken in a friendly way by the cabinet. However, what I propose to say, Mr. Speaker, is not what the opposition thinks at all. During the last war, with the taxation as high as it was at that time, labour in this country refused to work because most of their earnings were taken away by their employers at the end of the month.

Mr. Sinclair: By their employers?

Mr. Sinnott: Deducted from their salary by the employers for dominion government taxes.

After very careful thought I say that subsidies are necessary, but they are only temporary. They are only necessary temporarily for the simple reason that if you allow production to run its course it will overtake this inflationary trend. I have indicated the way in which the government could dig up some of the money, and since there are sixteen members of the cabinet I suppose they can dig up some somewhere else.

I propose now that, in 1951, the producers of this country be given a concession in their taxes to the extent of 75 per cent of the amount they produce over and above what they produced in 1950. In 1952 I would propose to give them a reduction of 75 per cent of what they produced over and above 1951. In 1953 I would propose to give them a reduction of 75 per cent of what they produced over and above 1952. This would give the producers of this country and the farmers of this country some incentive to go to work. When the producers of this country realize that they are at least going to have some remuneration for themselves if they produce more than they produced the year before, I am sure we will receive the co-operation of all the producers of this country, both in the factories and on the farm, and this inflationary trend could be stopped in that way.

Mr. Sinclair: That is right.

Mr. Sinnott: I am told by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sinclair) that I am perfectly right. I know, Mr. Speaker, that production and work is the only solution. I listened the other night while the member for Oxford (Mr. Murray) quoted the nineteenth verse of the third chapter of Genesis which says:

> In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground.

Mr. Speaker, he should have gone on a little further and said: If thou wilt not work, thou shalt not eat.

I have indicated that production is the only solution to this inflationary trend. If the government will only allow the producers of this country to take hold, and will show them a three-year program, I am sure that those who produce the beef and the hogs, those who produce the essentials of life, will do the job themselves.

(Translation):

Mr. Henri Courtemanche (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, after all those speeches dealing with the budget introduced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), certainly our Liberal friends, weary of all these criticisms, are wondering what now can be said against the the budget. It may be that I will add nothing new to this discussion. Nevertheless, I feel it is my duty, in times as serious as these, to express what I know to be the feelings of the people of Labelle constituency.

Moreover, I wish to state, officially and categorically, my opposition to such a budget, knowing as I do what great difficulties and responsibilities rest on those who, today, let the government impose such a heavy burden of taxes on the people, without proclaiming their refusal to approve the measure introduced, without proclaiming their refusal to follow the government in the nefarious road they are taking.

If so many speeches have been made against the budget it is because protests have come from every quarter.

It was not necessary for me to travel across the length and breadth of my constituency to find out the views of my constituents in this matter. The very first people I met, whether their political affiliation was Liberal or Conservative, all expressed the same opinion: this is a disastrous budget, a depressing budget, one which makes us consider the future with the greatest misgivings.

In any event, I have received very many letters that would have certainly enlightened me had there been any need for that. Certain people are really discouraged. Up to now, it was all they could do to make ends meet, in spite of all their sacrifices. But now the taxes they have to pay are going up constantly, as well as the cost of living. A large number of those who have families to provide for are most concerned about this situation. I can readily understand their misgivings.

In spite of all that, one of my constituents, probably trying to find something humorous in this rather than cry over it—I must say though that he is a bachelor—wrote to me about the budget:

> So far cartoonists have depicted the taxpayer as a man to whom the authorities have left only a barrel so that he will not be indecent. I rather think now that the new taxes will have done away with the barrel itself; we are being deprived of what little we had left. You will admit that that is becoming indecent.

With or without a barrel the taxpayer is in for a rough time. Some time ago the government tried to apply the policy known in the United States as a "soak-the-rich" policy. And the rich paid, so much so that there are hardly any of them left. And today we find that in trying to do away with the capitalists we have not done away with the very poor. On the contrary, overtaxing the rich has been harmful to a great many poor.

However, all that is ancient history now, since that well has run dry and it has been found necessary to turn to the man with a moderate income, a very moderate income, and even to the poor, to tax them on every little necessity they buy. For a good part of the day the worker and the farmer work only to pay taxes, to fill up the treasury. It is better not to try to figure out the amount of taxes we pay on any one dollar article, for the answer would leave us greatly discouraged.

Some may say: What about defence? I am all for the defence of Canada, but I am a little less enthusiastic about the defence of Korea. However, the defence of Canada or Korea does not imply that we should ruin our country. Some will say that our way of life, our institutions, our democracy are at stake. It is precisely because we must save all those things that we should not fight our enemy on the one hand and give him arms and munitions on the other.

By overtaxing the people, by refusing to take any steps to curb inflation, we are supplying arms and munitions to those we claim to be fighting in Korea or elsewhere. Inflation, let us never forget it, will always be a powerful weapon in the hands of our enemy. If the communists found it so easy to control China, it was largely due to inflation, to soaring prices. It is to be deeply regretted that our leaders do not understand that or act as though they did not understand it.

If it is really a matter of defending our country, the task surely becomes complicated, if not impossible, because of these tremendous imposts and of the fantastic rise in prices.

I beg permission to read extracts from articles on these new taxes, which appeared in two French-language weeklies. One is Notre Temps, the other Le Front Ouvrier, two publications aimed at two different classes of readers.

This is what Mr. Fernand Bourret writes in Le Front Ouvrier:

> The burden of war expenditures will be borne by the taxpayers, through the payment of all kinds of taxes. If the present basis of taxation were modified, it would be possible perhaps to lighten some people's burden, but in the main, however, the taxes made necessary by our war spending are impoverishing the country and reducing our standard of welfare.
> The freezing of prices might make it possible to relieve the pain caused by the high cost of living.

Such relief however would only be temporary, and the pain would again be sharply felt as soon as the analgesic had lost its effectiveness.

The high living costs due to heavy taxes, ever-increasing government expenditures, undue profits, combines and restrictions of all kinds which slow up production and keep prices from going down, can only be remedied through concerted efforts, especially as regards war spending.

Here is now the opinion expressed by Mr. J. T. Larochelle in Notre Temps. Let us see first what he has to say on the sales tax:

An important point the minister has not cared to stress is the pyramiding of the sales tax which is bound to occur in connection with a great number of commodities in current use. This tax is levied on raw materials, on the semi-manufactured product and finally on the finished product. Thus it is levied as much as three or four times (according to the number of taxable transactions) in greater amount every time before the product finally reaches the consumer. In most cases therefore the official increase from 8 to 10 per cent will, in fact, be much greater than suggested by the minister, the proportion varying according to the commodities.

In other words, we have a pyramid. And what a pyramid! That is why, a moment ago, we said it might be better if we did not try to find out the tax content of the dollar we earn and spend.

Although I do not necessarily share all Mr. Larochelle's opinions, here are the conclusions he draws in Notre Temps:

One must conclude that, in deciding upon new taxes, the Minister of Finance and the government have not taken into account the general interest and the economic conditions brought about by our military effort. Far from curbing inflation and the increase in the cost of living, they have levied taxes which, they admit, threaten to entail a large increase in the cost of essential goods. In the general calculations of the budgetary estimates, they have even speculated on an increase of approximately 5 per cent. The increase in taxes, like the rise in prices,—and the latter may easily climb by 10 per cent within a year,—entails no real sacrifice except for families already living on a small or moderate income, the very families that should be spared, while limited companies, whose profits are increasing and will continue to increase as a result of military contracts and inflation, are on the whole, being spared.

I do not agree with the author in the closing sentence of his article because I believe that, except in a few cases, limited companies, whose shareholders are very often people in the low income groups, people with small savings, will be very hard hit by these new taxes.

Be that as it may, these two responsible newspapers do not hesitate to condemn the budget brought down by the Minister of Finance. In so doing, they only reflect the opinion of both the urban and the rural population. There is no point in deluding ourselves: the people are angry, very angry in fact, because they feel let down by their own government. It is not surprising that in trade union circles there is talk of requesting wage increases which would inevitably bring about higher prices. But all workers do not belong to trade unions. Farmers, for instance, are not affiliated to any of them; yet the cost of living has dealt them such a blow that they wonder what the future holds in store for them.

One aspect of the budget, however, has not been sufficiently stressed. It is a provocative budget not only because of its harshness but also because of its presentation. The government raises taxes while claiming that it wishes to curb inflation. And once these increased taxes have boosted the cost of living still higher, the people are asked to economize on a larger scale.

I know that, during their election campaigns, the hon. members opposite are in the habit of making all kinds of promises they soon forget. I must also admit that quite often, and too often in my opinion, the electors do not hold it against them unduly.

Yet I feel that, where a new series of taxes is concerned, the people are not such good fellows, nor are they so naive. According to an old saying, the pill has been sugar-coated. That is all very well but it is quite another matter to give the impression that there is no pill at all and that both the coating and the inside are exactly the same. Since we are on the subject of pills, that is one the people will not swallow.

When he was told last year that taxes would not be raised the hon. the Postmaster General (Mr. Rinfret) expressed his gratitude to the Minister of Finance, stating openly that higher taxes would have increased inflation. It is utter nonsense today to try to make us believe that taxes are being increased in order to stop inflation. The Minister of Finance acts indeed, Mr. Speaker, as though he wanted us to experience the worst inflationary conditions.

Has any thought been given to the dire consequences of inflation, which the new taxes will help along? Has any consideration been given to the widow who thought she had no reason to dread the future and who finds out now that the value of the insurance she lives on has decreased by about 50 per cent. Have the disastrous effects of inflation on a multitude of thrifty people been taken into consideration? Has any thought been given to the fact that it would discourage saving? Apparently not, for after the imposition of all these taxes, surtaxes and overtaxes, people are being urged to save.

Of course I am in favour of saving. But one should not try to make the taxpayer believe that he must or can save with the budget of the Minister of Finance.

I know that the minister is surrounded and advised by learned experts and by economists with stacks of diplomas. I am afraid however that these learned experts, these distinguished economists do not come down often enough from their ivory tower. Their work is apparently limited to somewhat abstract calculations. I appreciate their learning. I would not dare contradict an astronomer who would tell me that the earth is so many miles from the moon. But there is someone who is able to contradict the learned experts of the Minister of Finance and I refer to the Canadian housewife who cannot be satisfied with mathematical calculations but has to do the buying for the family and realizes that her husband's earnings, though they may sometimes seem increased, are no longer sufficient to feed, clothe and house the family.

I wish the experts would spend a little time asking questions of the man in the street to find out how he reacts. Naturally, such is not their responsibility. And I know that some experts in England were offended one day when someone took it upon himself to blame them and tell them that their plans were not practicable. One of them replied that "he did not care whether his plans would work out or not." His job was simply to set them up. Having talked, a few days ago, with a few immigrants recently arrived from Great Britain, I got the impression that the British experts were leading their country to the very brink of disaster, if not to complete ruin.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to make it clear that the Canadian taxpayer has no intention of being led as the British people are being led and have been led for the past few years. If we had wanted socialism, we would have elected our friends of the C.C.F.; if we had wanted a receipt instead of a pay envelope, we would have elected representatives of socialism. This is not what happened, however, and as things stand at the moment I am afraid the C.C.F. will claim before long that the Liberals have stolen their platform. It is true that socialists have been said to be merely Liberals in a hurry. That was some time ago and it might be that today the Liberals, without hurrying, have nevertheless caught up with the socialists.

But let us come back to the budget and the new taxes. Have its repercussions on the provincial and municipal authorities and the school boards been considered? The premier of Quebec has already complained, and rightly so, that more than 77 per cent of all revenues in Canada were collected by the Ottawa government, leaving only 22 per cent to the provinces, municipal corporations and school boards. That situation has not been improved by the Minister of Finance when he devised those new taxes, and the way things are being done, this government in Ottawa is going to have a new monopoly on taxation.

We know that the centralists have not abandoned their projects or their schemes. Since they cannot succeed by constitutional amendments or by any such means, they are undoubtedly contriving to starve the provinces. What they say runs somewhat as follows: "We will not tamper with your rights; have no fear. We will be satisfied with depriving you of your income!" Now, of what value are rights without powers or sources of taxation?

Indeed, it must not be forgotten that taxation cannot be carried out indefinitely, without ill effects. If it is overdone as it was in the new budget, where will it lead us?

The Calgary Herald at one time published an article which reads as follows:

> Let us harbour no illusions about income taxes. They penalize industry, and penalize brains. The skilled, enterprising man who really contributes to the material welfare of society is being victimized. The greater his abilities and the more he uses them, the more money he has to pay the government.
>
> Under the present taxation system in Canada it does not pay to work hard, to be intelligent, to produce. Thousands of Canadians, in all income brackets, escape taxation in a way that is perfectly legal and honest; they work less than they could, produce less than they could, earn less than they could. They pay less taxes but, in so doing, produce less.
> The damage wrought by this behaviour is infinitely greater than that caused by any other attitude. Throwing people into prison is no remedy.

But what are we to say today, now that we have a surtax on income tax? A government supporter has stated that we should produce more. But who is going to ruin his health or neglect his family or forgo all leisure just to pay higher taxes? If the key to freedom is to be found in production, let us encourage and not stifle production.

If Isocrates were still alive he would surely repeat that those who make money are considered as criminals because they are more harshly penalized than real criminals.

To my mind income tax is the most harmful of all forms of taxation, because it stifles initiative and discourages those who are industrious and active. It is unnecessary, I hope, to repeat that this income tax is especially hard on people of low income. Gone are the days when only rich men suffered from this tax. Nowadays if one manages to stay alive and to dress in a half-decent way, one is sure to be the butt of the traditional April fool's joke perpetrated by the Minister of Finance, by the present incumbent as well as by those who have preceded him in that office.

This income tax surcharge cannot be justified. As far as its repercussions are concerned, they will certainly be disastrous.

But, some will say, it is luxuries that are taxed. Let us have a look at these luxuries. Washing machines, refrigerators, automobiles? Of course, they may, at times, be luxury items but generally they are daily essentials. For many people, a car is a means of livelihood. It is essential to a good many people. Now these items are taxed beyond all limits.

Cigarettes too are luxury items, according to the minister's experts. Personally, I do not think so, although I do not smoke. Whether we like it or not, this new tax will only encourage smuggling. Of course, the police will keep a closer watch at customs ports, but even then there will be more smuggling than ever before in the history of this country. We see in the papers that already important seizures have been made. But everybody knows that they represent only a very small part of the actual smuggling going on.

That may well bring about a large decrease in the government's revenues, in spite of the tax increase. But what worries me more is that our people are once again tempted to resort to fraud, illegal practices and dishonesty. In my opinion, that is even more serious than the rest. We have not forgotten the wartime black market, and we also know of a certain grey market in building materials. Let us not delude ourselves. Nearly everybody had a hand in the pie and nearly everyone has disregarded and defrauded our laws. Prohibition had disastrous consequences in the United States, not so much in loss of government revenue as on account of the deplorable state of mind it induced. Excessive taxes on cigarettes will inevitably have the same results. In Ottawa, in Montreal and nearly everywhere in Canada people are smoking more American cigarettes than ever before. We have no right to kill an industry and, more particularly, we have no right to prompt people to act illegally.

As far as the new sales tax is concerned, or rather the increase of the existing tax, it is what I would call an underhand tax, a too well hidden tax, which lets the customer believe that the shopkeeper is making an undue profit, when it is the federal government which taxes, one after the other, all the raw materials and finally the finished product. A pyramid, I said a moment ago, a pyramid which unfortunately reflects no great credit on our times. That 10 per cent tax will, more than any other, increase the cost of living. If the 8 per cent tax was a factor of the high cost of living, what will be the effect of that increase to 10 per cent?

And it is the same thing, sir, for all the new taxes or the tax increases contained in the new budget. Of course, taxes are necessary and new taxes always meet with criticism. However common sense should prevail and I think that this time the government has gone too far. The government makes a pretext of defence to go on a spending spree, to incur wartime as well as peacetime expenses which, far from strengthening our position, may very well weaken it to the point where our enemies will gloat over it.

The government wants to play the part of a great power and for that reason is inconsiderately taxing the people. Let us not forget the fable of the frog that wanted to be as big as the ox. The Minister of Finance could have been less exacting without endangering the defence of our country. On the contrary by not endangering our way of life as he is now doing the minister would have only strengthened the belief of the people in the value of the present system.

For all those reasons, I consider that the budget strikes a hard blow not only at the economy of the nation, but also at the defence of our country.

(Text):

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that if there is one thing that the budget and the proposals for raising additional taxes which have been laid before the house by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) revealed, and if there is one thing above all others which the reaction to the budget throughout the country revealed, it is the necessity at which we have arrived in this country of making a real and genuine effort to reduce non-essential government expenditures.

I am not one who lacks confidence in the Canadian economy, or confidence in the willingness of the Canadian people, and their ability to bear any proper load which may be placed upon them; but I say we have reached the point when the interests of the Canadian people and the welfare of the Canadian economy demand that, at a time when they are being asked—and properly—to bear the heavy load of defence expenditures, they should be relieved of the load of unnecessary and extravagant governmental waste.

It is true, with respect to the increases in taxes the Minister of Finance has outlined in his budget, and it is true with respect to the extra revenues the minister says he has to raise, that we have inflation, which of itself produces or, in the past, has had the effect of producing about twice the surplus for which the minister has budgeted over the years—and will probably do the same again this year. But that very inflation and the increased cost of living which it imposes upon the Canadian people make it essential that we reduce our expenditures so that those taxes which bear on the cost of living and which, in fact, increase the cost of living, will not be necessarily increased simply as the result of spending such as we find taking place at the present time in many fields, if we examine the details of the estimates for this year.

The burden of defence preparedness is another factor which makes it so much more essential even than it was in the past that we should reduce unessential expenditures. After all, last year the Minister of Finance told us in his budget speech of March 28 that we had at that time reached the limit of buoyant revenues, reached the point beyond which any increased expenditure would have to be provided for out of increased taxation.

That being the case, then how much more essential it becomes, when we are faced with a burden over the next few years of several billions of dollars of increased expenditures, that we should search for and find and insist upon the reduction of non-essential expenditures. The parliamentary assistant emphasized this point in his speech this afternoon. He emphasized the point made on March 28 last year by the Minister of Finance when, as reported at page 1216 of Hansard, he said:

> The conclusion then which I reach is that no minister of finance in the foreseeable future will have an easier task than I have, namely, that of covering about $2,400 million of expenditure.

In other words he was saying there that it is not foreseeable that in future years we will have a level of expenditure below $2,400 million. Mr. Speaker, $2,400 million is what the government was asking a nation of from 12 to 14 millions of people to undertake, apart altogether from defence expenditures, as the level of spending of the federal government alone.

This leads me to the point where I think we should accept the challenge which was issued in the past by the Minister of Finance and repeated this afternoon by the parliamentary assistant to suggest some positive way in which the government could make economies. I find it interesting to note that for the second time in this session the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sinclair) appears to be more concerned with showing how difficult it is to reduce expenditures and spends far more time pointing out why we cannot reduce expenditures than he spends in really trying to find out how we can reduce expenditures. Again I suggest that if he would bend the same energies to finding possible economies as he does to justifying the extravagance of the government we might hope for a more equitable burden of taxation on the Canadian people.

Since it is close to eleven o'clock and I intend to discuss some details in this connection I should like to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) will continue this debate tomorrow.

On motion of Mr. Fournier (Hull) the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, April 24, 1951

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

CANADA CEMENT PLANT AT HAVELOCK, N.B.—REFERENCE TO REMARKS IN DEBATE ON APRIL 23

Mr. E. W. George (Westmorland): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) is recorded on page 2273 of Hansard as having said:

> Only last year it was decided to build a cement factory in my constituency of Royal, at a place called Havelock, with the result that today the Canada Cement Company is building a plant there.

I am sure the hon. member wants to keep the record straight. It is quite true that the town of Havelock is in the constituency of Royal, but the Canada Cement plant is being built in my riding, which is the constituency of Westmorland.

Mr. Brooks: I would point out, Mr. Speaker, it is on the border of the constituency of Royal and the constituency of Westmorland.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

RECRUITING OF WOMEN FOR REGULAR AND RESERVE FORCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Has the minister's attention been called to a press dispatch carried in the Montreal Gazette this morning to the effect that his department intends to organize a women's division in the R.C.A.F.? If that is correct, will the minister indicate why these announcements are not made to the house rather than to the press?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first question, as to whether my attention has been called to this press dispatch, is yes. The answer to the second question, as to whether it is in accordance with the intention of the department, it is partly so, and I shall explain that in a moment. The third question was: Why are these announcements not made to the House of Commons rather than through press statements? Whenever it is possible they are made to the House of Commons. There was no announcement made through any press statement, but there was some intelligent speculation on the part of the press, based on an article in an R.C.A.F. publication, which was prepared even before the decision had been made to have some women in the armed forces.

My intention was to make a statement about this when the defence estimates came up for consideration. Hon. members will recall that the Prime Minister suggested on April 11 that this might take place on April 12, very nearly two weeks ago. I was prepared to make a statement on this subject at that time which would have prevented the intelligent anticipation of this by the press. Since the question has been asked, perhaps I might be permitted to make that statement now, because it is a matter of widespread interest. This is what I had intended to say on April 12:

Experience in the last war demonstrated that there were a number of jobs in the armed forces which could be filled very satisfactorily by women, but it was recognized that there were disadvantages connected with their employment in peacetime in relatively small armed forces. For one thing the career opportunities were not likely to be great enough to attract women having the necessary qualities of leadership to meet a large increase in the event of war.

For this reason following the conclusion of hostilities the women's corps in the Canadian navy, army and air force were not set up as part of the new peacetime forces.

But now, with the expansion of our armed forces, there is a real need for a limited number of women to carry out duties for which they are specially fitted.

In all three services there are a number of such duties which experience has shown can be done as well or better by women than by men. Clerks and stenographers are obvious illustrations. There is also a whole new group of occupations related to radar and communications. Ground control of ships or aircraft or anti-aircraft guns requiring the use of radar involves, in addition to the operators themselves, personnel to compute the course of the moving ships or aircraft. Moreover, today practically all non-operational telecommunications are carried on by teletype. Active and reserve units are hooked up in nation-wide networks involving the employment of large numbers of skilled personnel. A large part of this work can be very well done by women.

Further, in the event of a general war, manpower shortages would make it essential to employ women on an even larger range of duties in the armed forces for which it would be desirable now to have a relatively small nucleus.

Accordingly, we have decided to recruit a limited number of women for the regular air force and for the reserve forces of the navy, army and air force.

It is not expected that there will be separate corps or establishments for women at the outset. In a unit or formation they will fill a place normally filled by a man.

No women will be enlisted to do clerical work at headquarters. So far as possible we will continue to have this work done by civilians.

It is expected that recruiting will commence this summer.

RAILWAY ACT

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF AMENDMENTS —FREIGHT RATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport, arising out of a Canadian Press dispatch in this morning's Gazette to the effect that the railways have applied for a further fourteen or fifteen per cent increase in freight rates. Can the minister indicate whether the proposed amendments to the Railway Act will be introduced during the present session, or in any event before the board of transport commissioners disposes of the new application of the railways for a further increase in freight rates?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): The hon. member was good enough to send me notice of his question, but I received it just as I was coming into the house. The committee in the Department of Transport that is dealing with the amendments to the Railway Act has not yet completed its studies; therefore the government has not had an opportunity to deal with the draft legislation. I hope, however, that it will be possible to introduce the amendments during this session.

CATTLE

COMPENSATION FOR T.B. REACTORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. E. Cardiff (Huron North): I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture a question with regard to the cattle in my district that have reacted to the tuberculin test. The farmers have not yet been paid for the animals that have been condemned. It is now six months or more since the test was made. Many of the farmers had to replace the cattle and borrow the money to do it. Why has this money not been available?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I shall get the information necessary to answer the question, and will give the answer tomorrow or the next day.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION AT PRESENT SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Was the minister correctly quoted in a Canadian Press dispatch which appeared over the week end reporting him as expressing the hope that old age pensions would be dealt with at this session? Does that hope include legislation implementing the recommendations of last year's committee on old age security as well as any amendment to the constitution?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I can add nothing to what was said by the Prime Minister on February 5, during this session.

Mr. Knowles: In view of that answer, Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister? His answer to me on February 5 I well remember. Will the Prime Minister clarify for the house the statement he is reported to have made in Montreal over the week end? May I be permitted to put my question in this specific form: Did the Prime Minister's reported reference to the need of going slowly with regard to social security measures have any bearing on the plan recommended last year concerning which there has been some discussion at this session?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): None whatsoever, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles: Good.

PASSPORTS

REGULATIONS TO PREVENT ISSUANCE TO OTHER THAN CANADIANS

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): In the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister, in view of the announcement made on the radio today and in the morning paper with reference to statements of Benjamin Gitlow in the United States un-American activities probe. I wonder if the Prime Minister would give assurance that conditions which prevailed a few years ago, and which permitted Gitlow to procure a Canadian passport, although he was a United States citizen, do not now exist, and that such a thing could not now happen? Is there sufficient surveillance of applicants for passports so that this situation could not recur?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I do not know just what may have happened a few years ago but I know that for the last four or five years close attention has been given to tightening up the regulations with respect to the issuing of passports. I would hope that we have now closed all the loopholes that were discovered in the regulations which were in effect some years ago. I think that we now have pretty strict control, and the general indication is that in any case of doubt about an application the Secretary of State for External Affairs himself should be consulted.

CHINA

ARREST OF MISSIONARY SISTERS BY CHINESE COMMUNISTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jean Lesage (Parliamentary Assistant to the Secretary of State for External Affairs): On Friday last the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) asked me if the department was in possession of any information on the reported arrest early last week of further Canadian missionary sisters. I have made thorough inquiries, and find that there is no information to that effect.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Monday, April 23, consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, in dealing with this budget and the amendments to the motion now before us, I am sure that all members of the house—and I am confident I speak at least for all members of the official opposition—adopt as their basic approach to this problem the theme that essential expenditures must be met out of current revenues, which means by current taxes, and that therefore if high taxes are necessary, they must be imposed and will be borne by the Canadian people; but that when we are pressed as we are now—at least with respect to those in the lower income groups—to a point close to the limit of the load we can bear, then we must choose between luxuries and extravagance in government spending or higher taxes. In other words, as to those expenditures that can be eliminated, even though we might in normal times like to have them made, if they can be eliminated without interfering with essential services or construction programs, they must go.

In the light of that main theme, I find two main criticisms of this present budget. The first is that to increase taxes to the extent to which they have been imposed in the budget is unnecessary. It is unnecessary to increase taxes to this point; because the government has failed miserably in attacking this problem of reducing non-essential expenditures with any attitude of determination, and has failed almost completely, having regard to results, with respect to the elimination of unnecessary, unproductive and wasteful expenditures. The result has been that when we continue these expenditures at the present level and are faced with the necessity of increasing expenditures for defence preparedness, taxes are unnecessarily high. The second criticism of the budget is that the tax increases that have been provided are in large part inflationary.

Turning to the first head of this criticism in some detail, I would start with a question: How can this government, and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), who so readily asks the people of Canada to cut down on their luxuries and on their luxury spending—even taxes the people on what they spend on necessities through sales and excise taxes—how can they have the effrontery to continue at the present level their own enormous expenditures on luxuries and non-essentials? Let us look at some of the totals of government spending.

These totals that I shall give are all exclusive of figures for national defence and defence production. The tables are taken from the table which the Minister of Finance included as a supplement to the estimates which he brought down this year. We find that, leaving out civil salaries and wages and civilian allowances, and excluding national defence and defence production—the figures are taken to the nearest hundred thousand dollars—we have the following totals: Professional and special services for this year, $36,000,000 as against $24 million last year; travel and transportation, $13,900,000, an increase from $13,800,000; freight, express, etc., $2,300,000 as against $2,100,000; telephones, telegraphs, etc., $4,800,000, an increase from $4,600,000; printing of reports and publications, $3,900,000 as against $4 million; films, displays, advertising, broadcasting, etc., $4,800,000 as against $5 million; office furnishings, stationery and supplies, $11,200,000 as against $11,500,000; materials and supplies, and this is excluding land and buildings —apparently it is office materials and supplies —$39,400,000 as against $37,600,000, and for postage, $3 million in each year. The total, Mr. Speaker, is $109,900,000 for 1951-52 as against $105,600,000 for the last year. Therefore under nine headings alone we have an increase of $4,300,000 this year as against the estimates for a year ago. We are certainly not doing very well in our economy drive, about which the Minister of Finance has said so much.

I challenge anyone, Mr. Speaker, to show that these items that I have listed are all essential. I challenge anyone to maintain that we need the present level of spending on such items as special and professional services, travelling expenses, office equipment, advertising, publicity and displays. These are luxuries, a good part of which at least could be eliminated. I suggest very strenuously again that when the people are required to reduce their level of spending on what the government calls luxuries, although in many instances necessities are taxed—when people are being required to do that, then government as the first measure must reduce its own spending on these luxury items.

But speaking of challenges—and I said I challenge anyone to show that we need the present level of spending on these headings—I should like to refer to a challenge issued by the Minister of Finance last year in his speech on April 28, 1950. When he was closing the budget debate of that year the Minister of Finance used these words, as found on page 1991 of Hansard for that day. He was referring to the letter that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) had written to him suggesting the setting up of a commission to examine government expenditures in Canada and to suggest ways and means of eliminating waste and duplication. The Minister of Finance said:

> In his letter my hon. friend has suggested that there exists in the government service waste, extravagance, duplication of services and the like. I categorically challenge that statement; I categorically deny it. In my judgment there is no duplication, waste and extravagance.

Yet the minister in his budget speech this year, and in his baby budget speech last fall, boasted of saving. He says that he has saved $35 million this year. Well, Mr. Speaker, the question then is, if there was no waste, extravagance or unnecessary spending, how is he able to save any money at all? The minister has said that these savings which he is making are being made without interfering with efficiency and without impairing any necessary program. He says that he has made some savings, in spite of the previous denial that there was any room for saving, but he has saved only a fraction of what he could save, and his total saving amounts to 1.8 per cent of the ordinary expenditures of the government—that is, apart from defence and defence production—or, as was pointed out earlier by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), it amounts to 1⅝ cents on every dollar that we spend, apart from what we spend on defence.

The parliamentary assistant has repeated the challenge of the Minister of Finance. He repeated it in his speech yesterday, and I am reading now from page 2279 of Hansard:

> Early this session I made quite a long speech on this subject.

It is a pity that the results in measures of economy did not equal the length of the parliamentary assistant's speech. He went on to say:

> In this house I repeated the challenge to him. I asked for the co-operation of every member of the house in indicating where the savings were to be made . . .

I am glad to take up the challenge of the Minister of Finance and of the parliamentary assistant to suggest concrete savings, although I think we should point out that apparently the parliamentary assistant has not been as observant as he should be, because concrete suggestions have been made in the past. I can only assume that they have been ignored both by the minister and by his assistant.

Mr. Sinclair: Such as?

Mr. Fulton: Oh, I will come to them later. The parliamentary assistant knows them already, but I will come to them again for him in a little while. Just before doing so I should like to deal with another statement made by the parliamentary assistant in the course of his speech yesterday. He referred to a technique which he described as the technique of the big lie. I am using his words, Mr. Speaker; they are not mine. His words are to be found at page 2281 of Hansard. He suggested that in maintaining that the government is wasteful and extravagant in its spending habits the official opposition was adopting this technique which he so described, and he criticized us for what he alleged to be a failure to be specific. He repeated the unfounded and unjustified statement that no specific suggestions for savings have been made. All this, he said, amounts to the technique which he described—with an apparently intimate knowledge of how it works—namely the technique of the big lie.

Mr. Sinclair: I have listened to it so often.

Mr. Fulton: Well, you may have listened to it, but you practised it on this occasion rather successfully.

Mr. Riley: Don't be too hard on him.

Mr. Fulton: I refute absolutely the statements made by the parliamentary assistant so far as his criticisms of the official opposition are concerned. I say—and I will show—that none of his statements is borne out by an examination of the facts. So that in making his false and misleading assertions he has shown himself a master of the technique he was discussing, namely, the technique of the big lie.

If one analyses the facts one will find they show that we are not the only ones who are saying the government is extravagant and wasteful, although yesterday the parliamentary assistant sought to create the impression that everyone else in Canada is satisfied that the government is exercising the maximum economy, and that only the Progressive Conservative party accuses it of being extravagant. We are not the only ones who say the government has failed to reduce expenditures where they could be reduced. I refer to an editorial in one of the leading papers of this country, which has something to say on the point. Referring to the present level of non-essential or non-defence spending, it says:

> There will be distinct gain if, in paying the taxes, the public realizes how essential it is that the government should cut down on non-defence spending. Mr. Abbott had a great deal to say about economy, but the government's achievement here was only $35 million out of $2,036 million, virtually total failure.

Then it goes on to say:

> The choice is between necessary defence expenditures and an unnecessarily high level of non-defence spending—between the "pursuit of peace" and skyrocketing prices.

That is an editorial which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press of April 2, 1951,—a paper outstanding in its support for the government over the years—commenting on the budget and estimates for this year. So that the official opposition is not the only one that has been making this type of statement.

Secondly, examination of the facts shows that we have been specific in suggesting places where unnecessary expenditures might be eliminated. That was done last year. I myself did it in the course of the budget debate. It was done also in connection with the estimates last year, when we moved a reduction in the amount of an item. Hon. members will recall what happened on that occasion, how it was shown quite clearly that the government is not really interested in making a serious study to see whether or not expenses can be reduced. When we did move such a reduction, the impossibility of effecting savings by that method was demonstrated when the government called in all its members, put the issue to a vote as a matter of want of confidence, and defeated the attempt to reduce the expenditure on the basis of a want of confidence motion.

If the parliamentary assistant will examine the facts, and if he will be fair and honest in the matter, he will realize there have been several occasions—many occasions—when specific reductions have been suggested, but have been ignored or defeated by the government.

Thirdly, an examination of the facts will show that the parliamentary assistant is himself a past-master at the technique to which he referred; and so, incidentally, perhaps by association, is the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), in their habit of making, and repeating without foundation, the assertion that no reduction in expenditures can be made. That assertion was made by the minister on a couple of occasions at least last year, both in the spring and in the fall session; and the whole tenor of the speech yesterday by his parliamentary assistant was to the same effect, that the government is not guilty in any degree of extravagant waste or unnecessary expenditure and that the people of Canada know this fact.

But those statements are without foundation. If we look at some of the examples of government spending we can readily see places where savings can be made. First let us look at some of the increases in government expenditures and government service over the years. I have taken some of these figures from a book by Mr. Taylor Cole, in which appears a study he made and published in 1949 under the title "The Canadian Bureaucracy". In this instance, incidentally, the word "bureaucracy" is used in a non-derogatory sense, and simply as a descriptive word for the whole civil service and public employment set-up in the Dominion of Canada. It is a most impartial and excellent study, and one which contains a good deal of interesting and valuable information. When one compares the figures in Mr. Cole's book as to the number of employees in the government service on the various dates he mentions, with the figures for today, it is easy to see to what an unnecessary extent the government service has been expanded.

Let us look at the figures for some of the larger departments. These figures show that the Post Office Department in 1946 had 15,256 employees, whereas, according to the estimates for this year, it now has 17,877. I wonder what tremendously increased services are being given by the Post Office Department to justify this increase in staff of over 2,500 in about four years. Then we see that while in 1946 the Department of Veterans Affairs was able to render a satisfactory service with 12,830 employees, in 1951, when one would have thought the rehabilitation program and the settlement of veterans would be well under way and operating smoothly, the department has a staff of 14,295, or an increase of over 1,400.

The Department of Transport in 1943 was able to get along with 6,273 employees—and that, I would point out was at the peak of the war, when vast quantities of supplies, men and munitions were being moved as part of Canada's war effort. Yet in 1951-52 the estimates for that department show that they require a staff of 10,586, or an increase of more than 4,000 over the number they had in the war years.

In 1939, the latest figure given in Mr. Cole's book for this department, the Department of National Revenue operated with 4,415 men. We certainly realize that the government is collecting much more by way of taxation now than it was in 1939, but I do not see that the personnel of that department need have been expanded to the point where it now numbers 14,024. In other words the Department of National Revenue now has a staff more than three times as large as it did in 1939.

Let us look at the unemployment insurance commission, which carries 7,008 employees to administer the unemployment insurance fund. The administrative costs of the unemployment insurance commission for this year alone amount to $23,700,000. That is a most interesting figure. An examination of the estimates shows that the government's contribution for this year to the unemployment insurance fund is $27,500,000. The administrative costs, as I have said, are $23,700,000. These figures show that it is costing us practically as much to administer the fund this year as the government is contributing to the fund. It appears therefore that it requires a staff of 7,000 to look after the approximately 200,000 unemployed at the present time. In other words there is one on the staff for each 35 unemployed persons, and the cost of administration almost equals the annual contribution made by the government. I suggest that not only is that totally unwarranted, but there is very grave danger to the unemployment insurance fund if these high administrative costs continue at their present level.

To turn to a second phase of unnecessary government spending, one should compare the increases in the estimates this year with last year's level of expenditures. Take civil salaries and wages—again these are exclusive of defence and defence production; here we have an increase of $19,500,000. It must be observed in all fairness that there has been a substantial increase this year in the level of wages.

Mr. Sinclair: Ten per cent.

Mr. Fulton: The parliamentary assistant points out that it is ten per cent. I will not make a criticism of that increase, therefore, but simply place it on the record. Then we take civilian allowances, which show an increase this year over last year of $400,000. Professional salaries and special services, about which I shall have something to say a little later, show an increase this year of $2,600,000. Travelling expenses, exclusive of defence and defence production, show an increase of $144,000; freight, express and cartage, an increase of $220,000; telephones, telegrams, etc., $225,000; materials and supplies, $1,800,000.

Looking at those increases alone, we must note that they are increases in ordinary expenditures quite apart from defence and defence production in a year of great stress, and it is surely obvious that a general examination suggests that there is room for economy. Look at some of the specific items which indicate unnecessary expenditure. Let us take the national film board, which shows an amount this year of $2,602,000. Before I proceed I am going to suggest that it is not the primary responsibility of the opposition to do a job which is actually the government's job, that is, to go through the various heads of government expenditure and suggest where reductions can be made; however, the government having thrown out this general and rather meaningless challenge, and the government having failed to make any determined or successful effort to reduce unnecessary and wasteful expenditure, I accept the challenge. It is a pity that it should be left to the opposition to do the government's job, but that being the state of affairs imposed upon us and upon the country by the government, I think the opposition would be failing in its duty to the country if it did not accept the challenge and try to do for the people the job which the government should be doing for them.

Mr. Sinclair: It was not a challenge; it was a request for co-operation.

Mr. Fulton: It may be said of the items which I am going to mention that they are desirable heads of expenditure; and if we had lots of money, if we could afford them, if taxes were low, then it is true we might be able to indulge in some of these expenditures without objection. But when we have reached the point where we are now, with inflation and with the cost of living crushing people in the lower income groups, I suggest that the government must decide whether we are going to have savings on these items or are going to continue this unproductive, extravagant and wasteful level of present expenditure.

The national film board is a very nice thing to have around if you have lots of money. If we reduce it by half, we would save $1,301,000. Take all other government publicity and we find that if we can reduce the present rate of expenditures by only half we will save a further $3,054,000. Take the matter of printing departmental reports and other publications, another branch of publicity; if we reduced that by half we would save $3,058,000. Take the matter of office stationery and furnishings. Surely to goodness we must be fairly well along the road to completely equipping the government offices we have at the present time. But if we reduced this by only one-third of the amount the government proposes to spend this year we would save $5,853,000.

Take travelling and removal expenditure, amounting to over $36 million. The Department of National Defence shows a considerable increase under this item, but that does not account by any means for the total. If we saved only one-third it would amount to $12,103,000. Take materials and supplies—and here I exclude defence and defence production. Some materials and supplies are necessary; but do we need the elaborate and expensive and continuous and uncontrolled level of expenditure there is on this type of equipment? If we could save only one-sixth of what we are being asked to spend on materials and supplies, again excluding defence and defence production, we would save $6,556,000.

Next is professional and special services, which covers the payments made to special professional and technical employees outside the civil service. If we were to save one-third of this item it would amount to $12 million. The total savings by the modest reductions suggested under all these items would amount to $45 million in a year's operations.

If you look at the table which the Minister of Finance has included with this year's estimates you will find that ordinary expenditures, excluding defence and defence production, show increases in twelve categories as against decreases in only ten. If you include defence and defence production you will find there are increases in nineteen categories as against decreases in only three. That certainly does not suggest any very determined economy drive.

Going back to some of the specific items I have mentioned, in case it may be said that it is all very well to take a general list and indicate what might be saved, I intend to look at these in some detail. Take the matter of government publicity. The parliamentary assistant says that we speak about this in general and are not apt to go into detail. I suggest that the purpose of government publicity, if it has any purpose, is to sell legislation, to sell democracy by showing what democracy does, to publicize what parliament does in the legislation which it passes. Its purpose is not to sell ministers and Liberal policies. But that undoubtedly is one of the main tasks of the government publicity bureaux as they are set up in the different departments at the present time.

I repeat that the only justifiable purpose of government publicity is to sell parliament, legislation and democracy; it should not be used to help ministers vie with one another. That being so, the proper way to handle this would be as we handle other government services, by setting up one publicity bureau to centralize and control this work and the expenditures on it. Specific suggestions to this effect have been made on at least two previous occasions. I challenge the parliamentary assistant, the Minister of Finance or anyone else to show that if you did that and gave that bureau just half the present over-all total for government publicity you would not get a much better and more efficient job.

It is perfectly true that this might hurt some of the advertising firms which get the money now, and then take over the election campaign publicity for the Liberal party when the elections come round; but it would not hurt anybody else. It would provide legitimate government publicity, which is the only type of publicity on which public money should be spent. If further evidence is needed that government publicity has got out of all bounds, I would refer to a Canadian Press dispatch which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of April 21 and which reads:

> Publishers of 86 Canadian daily newspapers expressed concern over the growing volume of publicity releases from federal government departments.
> Handling of these releases was criticized in resolutions adopted unanimously yesterday at the concluding session of the Canadian Daily Newspapers Association annual meeting.

The reason for this unsatisfactory situation, Mr. Speaker, is that these publicity bureaux in the departments appear to be vying with each other to see if they can build up their minister as the next leader of the Liberal party.

Take the question of professional and special services. Without defence and defence production the estimates this year call for an expenditure of $26,676,000, an increase of $2 million over last year. With defence and defence production they call for a total expenditure of $35 million. Why, one may ask, is this huge amount being spent on professional and special services, paid to people outside the civil service when there are approximately 150,000 civil servants available to the government, 150,000 men and women many of whom are highly paid, and the vast majority of whom are extremely able and capable? Why then must we spend $35 million outside the civil service on professional and special services?

I suggest it is because it affords a very ready and pleasant medium of payment, outside the control of the civil service, to friends of the government. After all, we have had some examples of that. The parliamentary assistant yesterday brought into the debate the name of a gentleman who is at the present time a member of the house when he referred to the present Liberal leader for Ontario and said that he was the man upon whom they relied to flatten the present premier of Ontario.

Mr. Sinclair: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: What a hope!

Mr. Fulton: Of course, Mr. Speaker, I must say that in the matter of placing that hon. gentleman in a financial position to help him in this job, this government appear to have done the best they possibly could. You will remember that, as revealed in a return made to this house, that hon. member before he was a member of the house received for professional and special services the sum of $172,000 for legal work which he had done for the Department of Veterans Affairs.

An hon. Member: In one year.

Mr. Sinclair: Oh, no; not in one year.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Fulton: In one year and three months. The parliamentary assistant certainly must admit that they made a very good beginning for the hon. gentleman, so far as the financial aspect of the picture is concerned, by that payment for "professional services".

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Knowles: Proceed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I feel what I have said has been enough to satisfy any reasonable member that there are very many headings indeed under which government expenditure can be reduced, and many openings of which, if the government is determined and sincere in this matter, they can take advantage to reduce considerably the level of unessential expenditure and thus bring about a considerable and welcome relief from the burden on the taxpayers of this country.

Mr. Alan Macnaughton (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, if the times we live in were different, if there was not such a sense of urgency in the air, I would have asked the indulgence of the house while I spoke of the local problems and hopes of my own people, the 55,000 voters who make up the constituency of Montreal Mount Royal. But I know that I speak for my constituents when I say that this is a time for concentration on the broader and more urgent issues which now confront this nation and the world—rather than to dwell on the particular needs of any one local constituency.

My people are aware of what confronts them on the world scene. They are alert. They want to know about many things—the Atlantic pact, the cost of living, our defence program, our foreign commitments and how much they cost, the reasons for higher taxation. They want to know what they get in return for the moral and financial support they give to the system of government under which we all operate, and which costs like blazes in men, in materials and in money. I have tried to answer these questions, and in trying I have found a certain failure on the part of those of us in Ottawa to communicate fully the facts about where we are leading Canadians; about what we are trying to do, to safeguard their interests and to assure them reasonable security for the future, continued prosperity, and freedom.

I venture to embark on such considerations, as a new member representing a new constituency, a constituency which is so representative of all that is Canada today. Election to this house has placed me in the position of representing a complete Canada in miniature, a nation in itself, with 55,000 voters in twelve municipal districts, and with population ratios very similar to those of Canada as a whole. All income and social groups are represented in much the same proportions as you will find in the national scene. Mount Royal's minorities include Canadians of all racial origins, with all their individual idiosyncrasies. There are the sedate and wealthy residents of the towns of Montreal West, Hampstead and Mount Royal; up and coming St. Laurent with the largest housing development in the British commonwealth,—Norgate; St. Laurent, where two main language groups work side by side vying with each other in their efforts to create a progressive modern community. At other points in the riding you will find residential areas occupied by industrial workers and certain lower income groups.

When I look at the march of industry into Montreal Mount Royal, I sometimes wonder what the good brothers of the oratory of St. Joseph, that shrine perched on the mountainside, what they must think as they gaze over the vast area below. Here a few short years ago they looked upon green fields as far as the eye could see. Now all is vast housing projects, sprawling busy factories, swarming thoroughfares, whole new industries such as aviation, including Canadair, chemical research, foundries, printers, manufacturers, —nine great hospitals, several famous colleges, a myriad of churches and synagogues. Anyone driving through the riding of Mount Royal cannot miss the feeling of urgency, of progress, of modern Canada that underlies this thriving busy expanding segment of our national economy, my constituency.

(Translation):

When speaking of my constituency, it is only fitting that I should take advantage of this first opportunity to thank, in their own language, my 18,000 French-speaking electors for the trust they have placed in me.

I assure them of my entire devotion to their interests.

(Text):

In a battle of ideas such as presently engages mankind, a battle for men's minds in effect, the winner will be he who has the best ideas provided he gets his ideas across best, too. In other words, provided he can communicate his ideas to the people. It is essential, tremendously essential, that our leaders do not withdraw, do not separate themselves from the people. Rather, they must make extraordinary efforts to explain the why and the wherefore of their actions and policies. They must communicate with the people. Can we honestly say that we are winning the war of ideas? Are we concentrating enough upon communicating our concepts, our needs, our urgencies to those who look to us for leadership? My experience is that we are not.

Since the beginning of this session the government, with very commendable speed and refreshing frankness, has presented policies of great importance to this house. The thorny "manpower problem" was raised and answered with the greatest honesty by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). A detailed report on "foreign affairs" was made by the minister in charge. An expensive but integrated plan for "national defence" was presented and "stand-by emergency powers" enacted. The creation of a department of "defence production" is now a fact. It is ready to carry out the strengthening and expansion of a whole range of activities that support the defence effort. For unmobilized resources, however vast they may be, do not win wars. And now, the "budget." There is no doubt that the plans and policies of the government have been carefully thought out and carefully presented to this house.

But do the Canadian people understand and appreciate fully the reasons for these great plans—these plans which will almost certainly bring about economic, political and social changes in our normal way of life; these plans which may stay with us for years to come? Is the government doing enough to communicate the purpose and ideas behind the plans of these top-level decisions? While the country is aware in general terms that the world situation is very bad indeed, people do not know in detail what their own part should be. They have just been told firmly what they must do without, but they still, I submit with due respect, do not know in detail why.

Are we sufficiently informed as to the scope and limits of state planning? It is not enough to talk about emergencies without explaining them fully to the people. The question of communication is vitally important, because without public support for government policies the best-laid plans will fail. The Canadian people are not sufficiently informed of the intentions behind each aspect of government policy. Owing to this lack of general understanding, a whole series of questions is being asked throughout the country. The very variety of those questions points to the fact that the people do not see the end objectives of all this planning and regulation.

Many are disturbed in the first place, thinking that only lip service is given to responsible government. Some have even gone so far as to call it caucus or cabinet government. What guarantee is there that these emergency powers will not continue indefinitely? What of this creeping inflation which seems to be spreading, reducing the value of the dollar, slashing the value of accumulated savings, eating up the value of investments and discouraging personal savings and thrift? What of the mounting high cost of living, and the misery and hardship that result as a consequence? What of price control? What of the social services, old age pensions and security generally? What of the forty-plus age group, and those of sixty and over? What about the rights of labour under the new defence productive effort, and for that matter the rights of capital? Are the legitimate returns from efficient management and the investment of capital, which are so much needed for the expansion of our industry and development of our resources, to be denied? Surely we are now agreed that an excess profits tax, to quote the words of the Minister of Finance "blunts the edge of efficiency and invites waste."

What we are looking for is a way to tax excessive profits. But this whole matter has become so involved in misinformation it is almost an "excess-politics tax". What is to be the plight of that body of hardworking, intelligent, honest and generally thrifty people, caught between organized labour on one side and organized capital on the other side, and battered generally by a rising cost of living? Have we nothing to say to them? Have we no surcease to offer?

All of us in this House of Commons know that considerable thought is given to these problems. We know some of the answers. We know that a federal old age pension security scheme has been offered to the provinces, and is now under consideration by them. We know that the problem of small businessmen and the question of how small industry can be integrated in the over-all defence effort is receiving close attention. We know that procedure, looking to the channelling of defence production information to potential subcontractors, is being set up, and that the proper allocation of materials and military orders is being studied. We know that in the face of national danger the Canadian way is to gather round the government table and pool our ideas, resources and energies.

But do the people know this? Controls which are arbitrarily imposed and seem unreasonable meet public apathy and evasion. But if they are explained I submit the people will accept them with good grace. Even more, if Canadians are informed of the necessary objectives, they will themselves find ways in which to aid the government, and their initiative will often lead them to the objective faster than regulation can do it. This, then, is a plea for interpretation.

[Mr. Macnaughton.]

There is certainly one aspect of our national scene which, more than any other, needs interpretation at this moment. I refer to the high cost of living. It touches everyone. It concerns the people more than anything else. We are encountering a dangerous cycle of rising costs and rising prices. The housewife, who today has to spend 170 cents for what cost her 100 cents a few years ago, is obsessed with the difficulty of making ends meet on the average wage earner's income. One of the first things this government, and this whole parliament, might do is address itself to the defence of the buying power of the wage earner's dollar. Perhaps it is an exaggeration, but most of us will agree that we feel a fair wage today is twice what we are getting, and a fair price is half what we want to pay. Right or wrong, that is the way we secretly feel—that is all of us who have not the true facts by which to judge.

We know that taxes must be levied to maintain responsible government, and that taxes inevitably become interwoven in the price system. Possibly there is in the field of price determination some room for wider examination. The mark-up on sheer physical cost is one thing, but the mark-up on taxes included in the price structure savours of pyramiding and hence gouging the public. Thus, for example, if a new tax on a unit is one dollar, and if the mark-up on that dollar is another 35 cents, it savours of profiteering, pure and simple. I do not complain about the physical costs entering into an article, but I do think the government should step into the mark-up field and insist on fair play for producer and consumer.

We are all anxious to end this rising tide of prices, and it is the duty of the government to take whatever reasonable measures it can in an attempt to stabilize prices. It seems to me that, as a result of the Korean war, many prices have been deliberately increased in expectation of ultimate price control. This effort to establish a high price level is, to a considerable degree, responsible for rising costs. Unless this sort of thing can be avoided, price control may become a measure of last resort, and we shall bring on ourselves an economic strait-jacket. The Minister of Finance is entitled to our thanks for the sincere attempt which has been made to stop the rising cycle of prices. But if parliament cannot find something effective, then we are in for a great period of unrest.

In an issue as vital as inflation, policy must be right. But before we can halt the apparent deterioration of the purchasing power of the dollar in our pockets, we have to explain why it must be halted. Our failure to do so is perhaps the one really weak link in our otherwise strong defence chain. I agree wholeheartedly with the remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) when he said in this house, as reported at page 1762 of Hansard for April 9:

> The greatest contribution any Canadian can make to stop inflation is to avoid panicky buying and to produce as much as possible. All of us should be thinking in terms of working harder; of working longer hours, rather than shorter hours. There is too much of a tendency, it seems to me, for people to look to government for solutions to their problems. Governments can help and should help in dealing with inflation; but consumers, labour unions, farm organizations, and businessmen can do much by their own efforts to reduce the pressures that lead to higher prices.

Even the Montreal Gazette of Tuesday, April 17, in its leading editorial under the heading "Home-made Inflation" said in part:

> But it is also true that a high percentage of inflation is home-made, and is very definitely a domestic product.
>
> And it is largely a domestic product because Canadians seem to have made up their minds that they want more leisure for more money. Or if they do work longer hours, they expect a large premium for the effort.
>
> It might seem strange that this young country, reputed to be so full of vigour, should see fit to choose this leisurely way of living, for which so large a price must be paid in the depreciation of money values. But there is a growing favour for the mistaken belief that it is still possible to earn more without producing more.

Farther down the article reads:

> As Mr. Abbott pointed out in his budget address: "If we are to carry greatly increased defence costs without having a definite fall in our standards of consumption . . . we shall all have to work harder and longer."

In plain terms, Mr. Speaker, the national pie is only so big. If one pressure group succeeds in carving out for itself a larger piece than it is entitled to, then the rest of us will suffer. That is what has been happening to us, and the only way for us to get out of the mess is for all of us to concentrate on increasing the size of the pie so that we all get a bigger piece. The need for hard work and the importance of curbing our appetites must be continually reiterated if we are to lick inflation.

When orders such as "credit restrictions" and others of like nature are made, whether as a result of suggestions from the Department of Finance, the Bank of Canada or otherwise, then it becomes the obligation of the government to explain them and to see to it that the explanation is understood, right down to the grass roots of the nation.

Most people are having considerable difficulty in understanding just what credit regulations mean; and I maintain that if the government wants the co-operation of all the sensible Canadians in this country, then they must go out and explain down to the last detail, and give the very good reasons, the high purposes and serious objectives which induced credit restriction.

It is not good enough for some bureaucrat to wave a wand in Ottawa and expect that Miss Millennium will arrive on the next train from Utopia. To succeed, government policy must have the full co-operation of the people; but that co-operation will not be forthcoming until the people fully understand what is the end objective of that policy. In fact, it is the government's duty to the nation to make sure that all policies are fully understood—not only those in such vital issues as inflation, but those in all matters affecting parliament and the public. None of this is to say that the government is not doing a great deal better in this regard than many other governments. Such comments as I have made are in the hope only of further improving our lines of communication.

Today the government not only has the duty of formulating policy and seeing that it is carried out by an efficient bureaucracy, but the results of its own bureaux of research and investigation must also be made public and brought to the attention of the citizens at large. Hence, there is a great need, in fact an obligation, on the part of this or any other Canadian government to supply factual, unbiased and non-partisan information. Anything which lessens the vitality of this essential communication between the people and the government would appear to be opposed to the public interest.

This house will be disposed to give credit where it is due to the ministers for their comprehensive statements on broad policy. Yet if there is still such uneasiness in the country, further remedy must be sought. The place of parliament in the lines of communication between government and country is recognized; and it need not be emphasized here, of all places, that it is in part through hon. members themselves, in their addresses and personal meetings in their constituencies, that government policy reaches the grass roots. Accordingly, we receive a great deal of information; our desks groan under the deluge of reports and schemes. If we had more leisure most of us could boil down the spate of information on government activity and policy and use it to show our constituents just what the policy of the government was intended to be.

But lacking leisure, we need summaries and analyses; we need brief human statements of the intentions behind such and such a measure, couched in terms of the individual; then we in turn can go to our constituents. It is here, I think, that some criticism may be levelled against government departments, bearing in mind always that the capacity to make a succinct human statement is a gift capriciously bestowed or laboriously learned. It is lucidity we want today, not diffused brilliance. Given the tools of communications, most of us would use them effectively.

Now let us glance at other channels of communication open to the government; and a study should be made of whether they are being enlisted to the best advantage of the nation. As everybody knows, these channels are the daily, the periodical and the weekly press, the radio, eventually television, moving pictures, the advertising industries and also the publishing industry. Who will deny that these avenues for information are the largest and most effective in the country? It is most important that government information should always be available to these great groups.

First, of course, is the press. Here our prime contact is with the press gallery. This house and the gallery are like next door neighbours. We know a great deal about each other, and a common prudence sometimes checks our tongues. It is not very often that we here acknowledge the essential function of the press gallery in our system of government. All in all, the sense of responsibility of gallery correspondents is very high. While they may be hired in a private interest, they traditionally and rightly look upon themselves as servants of the public interest.

Meantime, all is not well so far as the volume of information emanating from Ottawa is concerned. The press relies much upon the big wire services. I am told that Canada's main news services have been forced to make adjustments which appear, at first sight at any rate, to amount to drastic curtailment. Thus, at a time of world crisis, the average Ottawa news coverage by the leading agency has been reduced from 8,000 words daily to 4,000, and the United Kingdom bureau has been sharply depleted. I cannot help but feel that the United Nations and Washington should have more full-time press representatives from Canada. The present number is incredibly small.

Do the hon. members in this house, or do the people, know that the estimated cost to Canada of participation in the "United Nations and specialized agencies" for the fiscal year 1950-51 will amount to more than $15 million? If we are justified in spending this amount of money, is it not important that the people should know what their representatives are saying and doing? How can we hope to have public support for Canadian foreign policy when we are not getting a balanced report, as seen through Canadian eyes, and prepared especially for Canadian consumption? As so many of the problems of Canada come from our efforts to meet a menacing international situation, international news, reported by Canadians for Canadian consumption, is very much our concern.

At a time when world affairs are in such a jittery state I would have thought it essential that the United Kingdom, the centre of commonwealth activities, Washington, the centre of North American and Pacific activities, and Lake Success, the centre of world activities, should have a great many more accredited Canadian correspondents reporting the news for the Canadian public. There are one or two outstanding exceptions to this general statement. The job being done by the correspondent of the Montreal Star at Lake Success proves what could and should be done.

It is encouraging to see that, although news coverage has fallen off badly in spots, the news coverage of the C.B.C. continues to hold its high standard and C.B.C. foreign representation appears to be healthily on the increase. The great success of the domestic Monday night C.B.C. program, where the correspondents quiz the ministers, is further evidence of the general public's need for information on, and its avid interest in, how the affairs of this country are being run and why.

In passing, a compliment is due also to another official agency partially in the news field. I refer to the reconstituted national film board. This board, by the high acceptability of its films and by the large number of its outlets, is doing a national communication service worthy of recognition. But I wonder how many know that the film board's movies are seen regularly in some 3,300 Canadian communities. Film board men are bringing useful films, information and advice on using them to workers in every field of Canadian life.

Another important medium of communication is the field of public relations. Are we doing a job in this field? No one will accuse the Department of National Health and Welfare of hiding its light under a bushel, nor should they do so because their work is both instructional and educational. But how many persons realize that in the last two years, through the initiative of the department, the federal government has been responsible for the construction of 27,000 new hospital beds, many of them in my own constituency, in a total of 40,000? I doubt if the people of this country realize the revolution which has been brought about, nationally speaking, in national health and public welfare owing to the initiative and research policies of the department.

Will anyone deny that the Department of National Revenue is certainly in need of public relations men to explain why the painful process of collecting taxes is so necessary to the just operation of our system?

Let me give you another illustration. I doubt very much whether the people of Montreal and district know how much the federal government, acting through the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, has done to assist housing in the greater Montreal area. I have been a constant critic of this corporation. I think its powers are too large and I think it should be brought under closer parliamentary supervision. But in fairness I must say that, upon inquiry, I find that "in the three years 1948-49-50 a total of 38,600 new housing units were completed in Montreal. Of this total, 14,500 were built with government assistance under the terms of the National Housing Act while another 1,600 units were built on direct government account for rental to veterans. Therefore over 42 per cent of all new housing units completed in Montreal in the past three years were constructed with government financial assistance or were built on direct government account."

"In dollar value the total amount of loans approved for Montreal under the National Housing Act in the past three years was $130 million while the total for the province of Quebec was $163 million. Direct government expenditure on new housing for veterans in the same period in Montreal totals $9 million."

And so it goes. The illustrations are legion and the wealth of information which should be brought to the attention of the citizens of Canada is almost comparable to the iron ore deposits in Labrador or the copper and silver deposits in the Yukon. All these little items of so-called local concern, small in themselves, but joined together, go to show the people of Canada that their money is being well spent. They create a feeling of justice and fair play and belief in our system of government. They prove that our government is not some colossus remote from the people, but is a collection of devoted, hard-working individuals, trying to do their best for the country.

One huge information service is to be avoided in the interest of an efficient operation. Inevitably it would become a natural target for partisan political attack and would be forced to operate constantly in a non-stable climate. I believe that the departments themselves should retain their information services in the interest of maximum efficiency. What we need is a traffic manager as it were, somebody to sift the available information and arrange for it to be disseminated, someone who would be responsible directly to the cabinet. He should have a small staff of recognized competence and the salaries scale available to his office should be such as to make this possible.

His functions and responsibility under the cabinet would be, first, to review all statements on a national policy level, thus making possible the uniform expression through a variety of spokesmen. This is the highest level of federal information. Second, he should counsel and guide the various departments and agencies on information policies, techniques and needs. Third, he should have an over-all responsibility to investigate and suggest the elimination of duplication in the various information services. He should conduct an annual survey of these operations and require periodic reports from them. Fourth, he should provide liaison with the several communication groups. An important function would be to sound out, seek and secure the active co-operation of existing private agencies, and in so far as possible, without government expense. Most of us recall the great service rendered to this nation during the war by private associations, professional groups and industry and it is reasonable to assume that they would co-operate fully in current non-partisan information programs for the general benefit of the nation. In this way also, we would avoid duplicating functions already performed by existing private organizations. Fifth, he should make public a yearly review of the information service as an additional aid and safeguard. Our traffic manager might be assisted by a non-partisan public relations advisory group chosen from recognized leaders in the field to serve without remuneration and to be available to the information manager for professional counsel. This suggestion is primarily a managing device to supply some measure of order in the present information service chaos and to establish standards of efficiency and economy.

Statements of national policy should be cleared through the office of our traffic manager but functional operations should remain in the departments where they can be most efficient. Under the general guidance of our traffic manager each department under the authority of its chief should undertake a survey of present information functions and practices with the purpose of eliminating waste, overlapping, duplication of activities, unnecessary publications and press releases. For the test should be public need. Once the basic survey has been made it should be kept current by less extensive surveys on a yearly basis.

Extraordinary efforts are made by the great corporations of Canada to keep the public informed of their activities and to be prepared to answer questions. The government of the country is by far the greatest business in it. Judged by the public relations efforts of big business the government lags behind. Clearly the government must not use the taxpayer's money to do propaganda for itself and try to perpetuate itself in office, but it is entitled to say what it is trying to do. Indeed, I contend that it fails in its duty if it does not.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, the speech just delivered by the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Macnaughton) has been very interesting and thought provoking. However, I am somewhat surprised and disappointed that he has reached the conclusion that the only thing wrong with the present government is its propaganda machine. Apparently he believes that it should have more and bigger propaganda.

Mr. Sinclair: We are too modest.

Mr. Abbott: Hiding our light under a bushel.

Mr. Green: I am afraid the facts are that the one activity in which they are superb is that of getting out propaganda.

Mr. Fraser: Too liberal.

Mr. Green: To come to my own views on budget policy, may I say that there are, in my opinion, and I think the opinion will be shared by most members in the house today, two vital problems facing the Canadian people and the Canadian parliament in this year, 1951. The first problem is preventing a third world war, and the second is halting the rise in the cost of living and preventing runaway inflation.

The budget must be considered in the light of its effect on these two great problems. In a free country perhaps the must effective way a government can deal with any problem is by framing budget policy to meet that particular problem. So today let us consider whether the Canadian Minister of Finance in 1951 has submitted to parliament a budget plan which meets these two problems as directly and as effectively as they could be met. To put it in another way, is the Canadian government giving leadership, or is its policy one of drift at a time when leadership is needed as never before?

To deal first with the question of the budget and the problem of preventing a third world war, it is true that the minister's budget provides a very large sum for defence expenditures. The figure will be found at page 1806 of Hansard, and it is $1,664 million out of an estimated expenditure for the fiscal year from April 1, 1951, to March 31, 1952, of approximately $3,700 million. This expenditure for defence purposes is an increase of $893 million over similar expenditures in the fiscal year which has just ended, but of course a portion of that increase is caused by the rising prices. But I should like to point out to you, Mr. Speaker, and to hon. members, the minister's own summary of budget policy, as it is set out at page 1807 of Hansard. This is the key, in my opinion, to his whole budget policy for this year, where he says:

> I am reluctant to believe that we must inevitably face budgets of $4 billion or more for any considerable succession of years. There is still a possibility that reasonable solutions of the present international tensions may be developed. In another year's time we should have a clear view of the prospects. I have, therefore, decided not to recommend any major reconstruction of our tax system this year but instead to meet our current requirements by a series of simple but adequate surcharges on several existing taxes and also to widen the coverage of our special excise taxes. I think that over the shorter run—

And those are significant words, "the shorter run".

> —this method of defence surcharges will produce the necessary revenue with the least difficulty and inconvenience.

Those words, too, are significant—"with the least difficulty and inconvenience".

> If our optimistic hopes are realized it will be easy to reduce these surcharges or to drop them entirely, but I want to add that if it becomes clear that we are in for a long pull at these high levels of expenditure some major changes in the existing tax structure may have to be devised. My tax proposals, therefore, must be regarded as an interim policy for the period of the current year.

That paragraph merits careful analysis. It implies that the problem of preventing a third world war may vanish overnight. It also implies that international tension may be solved at any time, certainly during the coming fiscal year. Unfortunately there is nothing whatever to justify this attitude. I wish with all my heart that there were, but there is absolutely nothing in the world situation today to justify that attitude by the Canadian Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). He is lulling the people of Canada to sleep; he is soothing them at a time when they should be aroused.

Furthermore the statements in this paragraph contain the admission that there is need for major changes in the tax structure of Canada, if we are in for a long pull. This forces us to consider whether or not we are in for a long pull. The minister has decided we are not, and he adopts deliberately a short-run plan. What is that plan? In effect it is to get the extra money with the least difficulty and inconvenience, not to the taxpayer but to the tax collector. The main way of getting it is by a surcharge on existing taxes, and widening the coverage of certain excise taxes. This 1951 budget is a tax collector's budget.

A further implication from the minister's speech is that a year from now perhaps—and there is nothing definite about it—Canadians will get a long-term budget policy which, I submit, is what they should have had this year. Here, clearly, is a policy of drift, not of leadership. Here we have a complete failure to realize the situation of Canada and her allies.

You see, Mr. Speaker, the policy of the free nations of the world today is quickly to become so strong that the Soviets dare not start a third world war. The policy is not only to become strong quickly, but also to continue strong until Russia decides that it is in her interests to co-operate.

Every party in the house approves of this policy. I believe every party in Canada, except the communist party, approves of it: it is the Canadian policy. It is new for us, just as it is new for the Americans. Our experience in two world wars was that we were thrown into them practically overnight, and concentrated all our energies on winning. Then when peace came, when the fighting stopped, we disbanded our forces and returned to our civilian occupations just as quickly as possible.

Today we are faced with an entirely different problem which is that, while at peace, we must become strong enough to win a war, and must continue in that condition. I believe the policy Canada and other free nations have embarked upon is a very difficult one, more difficult even than a full-out war policy. It is perfectly clear we must be strong and prepared all the time until the policy of the free nations succeeds. And remember, if and when that policy fails, we are right in the middle of a third world war.

Obviously this is not a short-run policy; it is a long-term policy. It cannot possibly succeed in one year or in two years. Even if the war in Korea were to end tomorrow—and we know how little likelihood there is of its ending for a long time, in the light of press dispatches of the last day or two—that would not finish the policy of being strong. The defence expenditures would still go on; we would still have to be prepared to defend our way of life.

The war in Korea is merely one attempt to prevent a third world war. Even when the war in Korea is won, that does not terminate the need for the policy of being strong. I hold in my hand the report of a question and answer interview of General George C. Marshall, Secretary of Defense of the United States. This appears in U.S. News and World Report for April 13, 1951. Incidentally I would point out that General Marshall is one of the greatest leaders of our generation; I do not believe his wisdom can be questioned by anyone. In this article, which bears the heading "Prepare For Ten Years of Tension", General Marshall was asked many questions, of which I shall quote only one:

> Question: Do you consider, then, that what people have got to do is to bear in mind the over-all picture constantly instead of some little lessening of tension in Korea or perhaps some other part of the world?
> Answer: Put it this way; the best we can hope for, as I see it, is a prolonged tension rather than an all-out war. What we hope and pray for at the present time is that, as between the two, it might be a prolonged tension rather than war, during which we can build up our strength and our resources, get organized in western Europe, which General Eisenhower, supreme commander in Europe, is trying to do—get straightened out, we hope, in the Far East—but that's the best hope at present. If we should get a complete agreement with the Soviets we would be perfect fools to relax our military strength until we had evidence of good faith.
> Unfortunately, the tendency already is to relax.

The reference there is to the United States.

> That's what we have to fight against.

Further on he states that he believes the free nations are in for a period of ten years of tension. Canadians were entitled to have a long-term budget policy, but instead they have been told by the Minister of Finance to wait a year. That is bound to bewilder them and cause apathy; it is bound to bring about a failure to realize that the problem of preventing a third world war is a long-term one.

We have here once more a policy of drift and indecision, just as we have a policy of drift and indecision about raising a force for Europe. In the speech from the throne we found these words:

> Progress has been made in the organization of an integrated force in Europe under the North Atlantic treaty organization. The supreme commander, General Eisenhower, has recently visited Canada to consult with the government and the chiefs of staff. You will be asked early in the session to authorize Canadian participation in this integrated force as part of our program for national defence and security.

The session has now been going on for practically three months but we have not yet had any statement as to when this force is to be sent to Europe. There are no troops available to send. It is perfectly clear that the men who were raised for the special force will be needed to reinforce the brigade which has gone to Korea. The preparation of forces for Europe will take months. Yet the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has said that 1951 is the dangerous year; that this is the year in which we must make a great effort if we are to prevent a third world war.

There is also drift and indecision about establishing an effective reserve army. We rely in Canada for defence from hostile aircraft on reserve anti-aircraft units. The city of Ottawa depends upon a reserve unit to defend it from hostile air attacks, as does my home city of Vancouver. In both cases those units have just skeleton forces, totally and completely unable to defend their respective cities. If we are to raise any large numbers of troops we must do it by means of the reserve army. Although this session has gone on for three months we have had no statement yet from the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) as to how he proposes to raise a reserve army. He carefully refrained from dealing with that subject when he spoke earlier in the session and nothing has been said about it since by him.

We have a policy of drift and indecision too in connection with Canada taking part in a Pacific defence pact. The other day the President of the United States announced that there was to be a Pacific pact between the United States, Australia and New Zealand. When we questioned the minister of external affairs about Canada's part he said that the pact was only for the western Pacific. Apparently the government is not interested in such a plan.

Let me point out that if this policy of being strong is to succeed it must be extended to cover the Pacific area as well as the Atlantic. There is not much use stopping a war in the Atlantic if a first-class war can break out in the Pacific. Although Canada is a nation on the Pacific and has several thousand troops now crossing that great ocean to take part in the Korean war, she is not participating in this new defence pact for the Pacific. I think it is a disgrace.

Furthermore, there are two other examples of drift and indecision on the part of this government, one being the failure to crack down on profiteering. Not one move has been made to check profiteering, and very little has been done to halt rising prices. These are just examples of the indecision and drift of the government. The fact of the matter is that this government is so firmly entrenched and has such a large and meek majority that the ministers have become smug and self-satisfied. They have neither the will nor the vision to work out a long-term budget policy. So much for the budget and the prevention of a third world war.

I come now to my second question, that is, the cost of living and inflation. Certainly this is a vital problem. Since the outbreak of war in Korea Canadians have seen some interesting and disturbing things happen. First of all, they have seen prices and the cost of living rise steadily. I have here a clipping which sums up these increasing prices very neatly. It is a dispatch from Edmonton dated April 10 and quotes Hon. W. C. Woodward, a former lieutenant governor of British Columbia, who I think is as good a merchant as this country ever produced. This reads:

> Woodward (Yes) Urges Stop Buying
> Edmonton, April 10—(CP)—The way to bring prices down is for people to stop buying, Honourable W. C. Woodward of Vancouver, president of Woodward Stores Limited, said Monday in an interview.
> "That may be a surprising statement for a merchant but that's the way I feel about it. There is no reason for these high prices."

Canadians have seen their government threatening to put on controls, but not doing it. Surely the government either should have put on controls at once or made a definite statement that there were to be no controls. Instead they said that they would not put them on now but might put them on a little later if the people were not good. The result was that right down the line from the manufacturer to the retailer prices have gone up in an effort to be prepared for the time controls are brought in. There has been unfair profit making across this country since the outbreak of war in Korea. Just two weeks ago a Gallup poll was held in which this question was asked: Do you think there is much profiteering (unfair profit making) going on in Canada now? Three out of every four persons who answered that question said that they thought the Canadian people were the victims of unfair profiteering. I think it could be more fairly described as unfair profit making. There is no doubt that that has been going on and unfortunately the ministry must accept a large share of the blame for what has happened because of their indecision in dealing with the question of controls.

There are other startling things the Canadian people have seen in this intervening period. They have seen the value of their government bonds drop below par although it was understood throughout the country that that would never be allowed to happen. They have seen the value of their savings and their insurance cut drastically. Pensioners of all kinds are being squeezed, unions are being forced to demand increased wages, and white-collar workers once again are trapped and helpless to meet the situation. It seems to me that there has been an utter failure on the part of the members of the Canadian cabinet to realize the tragic suffering there has been throughout the country. Private members of the Liberal party realize that condition because we have heard them raise it on the floor of the house time and again, but I do not believe that members of the cabinet yet realize the suffering there has been, and which is still going on today.

We were told that the budget would meet the problem of the increasing cost of living and inflation. Everyone expected budget measures designed for this purpose. Instead what have we got? We have a slapping on of extra taxes of the type which are most easily collected, obviously with no definite policy in mind to halt the rise in the cost of living or to prevent the spread of inflation. In fact in some ways the budget is actually forcing the spread of inflation, throwing oil on a fire which is already burning much too briskly in Canada.

I have several criticisms to make of the budget. First of all may I refer to the increase in the sales tax from 8 per cent to 10 per cent which is an increase of 25 per cent in the tax itself. As hon. members know, the sales tax is imposed at the manufacturer's level. It pyramids of course. At each turnover there is a profit mark-up, and that mark-up includes a mark-up on the tax. It hits the poor harder than the rich. The sales tax takes no account of ability to pay. There is no exemption for lower incomes as in the case of the income tax. It is bound to increase the cost of living, and it is directly inflationary. I have very good authority for the statement that the sales tax is inflationary, no less an authority than the Minister of Finance himself. When he delivered his baby budget speech on September 7 of last year he said, as reported at page 423 of Hansard:

> In selecting the particular measures to recommend to the house we have tried to take no action that would cause any significant increase in the costs of the day-to-day essential items of consumer expenditure. For this reason I do not propose any change in either the rate or the application of the general sales tax . . .

He did go on to say that the sales tax was not as bad as it was pictured, but there was his definite policy just six or seven months ago.

Mr. Abbott: That has nothing to do with inflation.

Mr. Green: Let us read again what he said. It is as follows:

> In selecting the particular measures to recommend to the house we have tried to take no action that would cause any significant increase in the costs of the day-to-day essential items of consumer expenditure.

Mr. Abbott: What has that to do with inflation?

Mr. Green: It has a great deal. It is because of the increasing prices that we are getting inflation.

Mr. Abbott: I think my hon. friend is confusing cause and effect.

Mr. Green: The minister is confusing the hard time the people are having with government policy. Today there is amazement across the country at the reversal of the attitude of the Minister of Finance in the short period of six months. I believe that the criticism of the increase in the sales tax is universal; it is in practically every leading paper in Canada regardless of political allegiance. I suggest to the minister that it is not yet too late to drop the increase in the sales tax. To do so would probably start a movement of prices downward. Nothing would do more to raise the morale of the Canadian people, and their attitude is of the first importance in fighting the battle against inflation. Probably there is nothing the government could do which would go farther toward solving the problem than to change its mind and cut out the increase in the sales tax.

I realize that the result would be a loss of $105 million estimated revenue for the present fiscal year, but the minister is budgeting for a surplus of $30 million. Government revenues are buoyant and will continue so because defence preparations are bound to continue. The minister has consistently underestimated his surpluses. In the baby budget speech of September of last year, when he had only six months of the year left, he estimated a surplus of $15 million. As things turned out, he had a surplus of $203 million, almost thirteen times the amount of his estimate. He certainly is not a very good estimator. There is no need for a surplus under present conditions.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Probably he does it deliberately.

Mr. Green: As the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) says, it may be that he does this pessimistic estimating deliberately.

Mr. Abbott: No, that is not true.

Mr. Fraser: He cannot figure figures.

Mr. Green: Perhaps he cannot figure. That may be the answer.

Mr. Abbott: That may be the answer, yes. I have always felt that prophecy was difficult.

Mr. Green: If it turns out that there is a prospect of a deficit of $75 million or a lesser sum, then expenditures can be cut further than contemplated during the present year. I cannot think of a stronger incentive for saving by the government.

The question of saving brings me to my next criticism of the minister's taxation policy. There is absolutely no incentive in the budget to the individual to save, and savings by Canadians could do a great deal to halt price increases and prevent inflation. The fact is that people have simply been unable to save because of rising prices. When the minister dealt with that question, as reported at page 1799 of Hansard, he did a bit of whining. He said:

> Personal spending increased more than personal incomes, resulting in a decline in net personal savings out of current income. This decline in new savings amounted to about $270 million, or a drop of about 30 per cent.

Then he went on to point out the need for saving. He made a great plea to the Canadian people to do more saving. Where they were to get the money for saving he did not explain. At page 1803 we find these words:

> There is also urgent need for a higher volume of new saving, to cover the increase in capital investment which is in prospect, and to restrain the rising trend in consumer spending. This is certainly one of the best ways of reducing the intensity of competition for the use of labour and materials, and so reducing the upward pressure on prices.

Then he went on to say:

> The money saved can be used to buy Canada savings bonds, or to pay off the mortgage on his house or farm more rapidly, or to speed up the repayment of other debts, or to increase his savings in any other form that suits his individual circumstances. The important thing is to achieve an increase in aggregate savings up to a level at least equal to the new capital investment which we shall have to make this year.

One would have thought there would be contained in the budget policy some incentive to the people to save, but there is nothing whatever. In fact, the budget makes savings practically impossible. Mr. Speaker, inflationary conditions abroad in the world today call for a reward for saving. I thought the position was made very clear by Mr. James Muir, the president of the Royal Bank, in his annual statement to the shareholders in January of this year. Mr. Muir is quoted as saying:

> The most powerful weapon in the fight against inflation is generally supposed to be a stiff increase in the income tax. But the test of efficiency must be that any income tax increases shall penalize spending and reward saving.

[Mr. Green.]

He explains that further by saying:

> . . . equity and efficiency alike demand the exemption from income tax, wherever possible, of the bona fide saving of the public. In its simplest form, this might include the limited exemption of insurance premiums and of net purchases of savings bonds over the year.

With inflationary conditions today, increased insurance is a necessity for all family men. Mortgage payments have been assumed by our young couples that would have terrified my generation. When we see them taking on mortgages of $8,000 or $10,000, all these tremendously high figures, we wonder how on earth they are ever going to be able to pay them off. The time has come when there should be some budget policy designed to reward these young couples, and anyone else, who will save for purposes such as paying off a mortgage or purchasing a reasonable amount of insurance. This is one instance where a long-term budget policy would have been of great benefit.

My third criticism of taxation policy is directed against the levying of the 15 per cent excise tax on necessities, particularly stoves and washing machines. The tax is not being imposed on stoves using wood or coal. If a person happens to use electricity, gas, or oil for cooking, then the tax is payable on a stove of that type. I think it would have been wiser for the minister to exempt stoves of all kinds up to a certain value. Then, if people wanted to buy more expensive stoves, let them pay the excise tax. You see, you cannot turn the clock back and force everyone to use a coal or wood stove. I am told that in greater Vancouver there are over 86,000 homes using gas, electricity or oil, and 40,000 using all other kinds of fuel. To put a tax on these electric, oil and gas stoves as well as ordinary washing machines is merely increasing the cost of living. I believe that should not have been done.

This brings me to the fourth point. The minister could have made up any loss by increasing the tax on liquor. There has been no increase in the tax on liquor, although everyone in the country who drinks expected —I do not happen to be one of those people, but certainly all my drinking associates in the house expected—that there would be an increase in the tax on liquor. There would have been very little protest. The minister gives as his reason that liquor is already highly taxed. He proceeded to tax cigarettes and tobacco to the tune of $35 million a year. It is amusing to read his statement of last year in introducing the baby budget.

Mr. Mayhew: Have you any vices that we could tax?

Mr. Knowles: Don't answer, or they will do it.

Mr. Green: I am afraid that the government can tax anything, so I am not going to answer that question. The minister's statement regarding liquor and tobacco taxes last September 7, is found at page 423 of Hansard. He said he was increasing the tax on liquor last September, and then went on to say:

> I am not proposing any changes in tobacco taxes, which are already very high.

So we had the same reason last year about tobacco that we are getting now about liquor. I thought last year that he was bringing the liquor tax up to the level of the tobacco tax. Liquor certainly should have been hit in this present budget before cigarettes and tobacco, but instead liquor has been protected. Unfortunately, that leads to talk across the country that the liquor interests have the ear of the government, and rumours of this sort. It is a bad thing to get opinions of that sort abroad.

Mr. Abbott: I am sure the public do not believe that.

Mr. Green: The minister might be surprised how many of the public do believe it. The minister made a great mistake in not increasing the tax on liquor.

Finally, on this problem of the cost of living and inflation, I believe that the house and the Canadian people should protest the proposal of the government to amend the British North America Act so that the provinces can levy an indirect tax on sales up to three per cent. That proposal has been set out, of course, in the appendices to Hansard. This would enable the provinces not only to levy direct taxes, as they can do at the present time, but also to levy indirect taxes. This is the price the provinces are demanding for paying 50 per cent of the old age pension of $40 per month for the aged from sixty-five to sixty-nine inclusive. What will that tax mean? It is certain to force prices up, certain to spread inflation. It will make it that much harder for our senior citizens to live. I do not know how they get along now on $40 per month. The real need today is for an increase in that basic payment of $40.

The provinces are not directly concerned with the fight against inflation. They are not very likely to worry a great deal about inflation. I am sure the minister has found that because he complained about them at page 1803 of Hansard, of April 10, 1951, and pointed out how much expenditures by provincial governments had been increased. He went on to say this:

> Having regard to the impact of defence on construction materials and skills I must again urge the provinces and municipalities to review particularly their capital and construction programs in the light of the general public interest.

This is to be a hidden tax. The provinces will not have to disclose it to the people who buy. Of course, that is the very worst kind of tax possible. It certainly will not bring down the cost of living or curb inflation. I suggest that it would be far better for the dominion to set up a contributory pension scheme under which Canadians would pay as they earn, and then draw benefits as of right at sixty-five without a means test, and let the provinces add to the figure if they wish to do so.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I say that there is little that is inspiring in the budget policy. Once again the government has lost an opportunity to give leadership to the Canadian people—to give them a clear view either of the challenge which faces Canada or of the ways to meet that challenge successfully. Yet all the time the communists drive on relentlessly toward their goal of world domination. They are not working on any year-to-year basis. I suggest that the government should realize, before it is too late, that these two terrible problems which are faced by the Canadian people and, of course, by the Canadian parliament, can only be solved by aggressive leadership.

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour for me to speak following the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). I have known him for a long time. He is one of the popular members of the house. He always prepares his speeches with great care. By the way, may I say that he was one of the members of the civil service committee some years ago, when I came to know him well. Since then we have been good friends.

Mr. Green: We had a happy time on that committee.

Mr. Pouliot: We had a great time together. My hon. friend was one of the most helpful members of the committee.

I regret, Mr. Speaker, that I am obliged to disagree to a certain extent with my hon. friend. He spoke about young couples who assumed mortgages amounting to $8,000 or $10,000, and he said that they must have great confidence in the future. Indeed, they must; and they are right to be confident in the future. Probably the reason why they assumed such heavy responsibilities is that they had never heard any of the depressing speeches made by my hon. friend. If they had, they would not assume such responsibilities in connection with a home.

An hon. Member: They would not get married.

Mr. Pouliot: Perhaps not. Perhaps if they took my hon. friend seriously, they would wait a long time before saying the final "yes". I am fond of the hon. gentleman; but as we are in an era of fundamental freedoms, when the fundamental freedoms or human rights are talked about so much, we may differ. He spoke of the policy of drift and indecision followed by the government and quoted a speech made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) last year. He referred to some statements that were made by him at the time. Until then the policy of the government had been different, and the government had not embarked upon a three-year policy for spending $5 billion for defence preparations. I am sure that policy was undertaken partly on the advice of my friend the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra contained in the forceful speech he made last June in answer to mine with regard to the Korean affair. When I protested against the expedition to Korea, I remember that my friend the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) and a new member from Quebec said that I was all wrong, that we should defeat the communists on their own territory in Korea, that Canada should send a large expedition there and that we should have armies in all parts of the world. That has been the policy of the hon. gentleman for a long time.

Mr. Green: My hon. friend is stretching that quite far.

Mr. Pouliot: No. Even today my hon. friend complained that the expeditionary force to Europe is not ready, although thousands of our boys have been sent to Korea. I prefer what was said the other day by the financial critic of the opposition, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell). I heard him well, and I was satisfied to hear him express such a view as the one he then expressed, not because he repeated what I had said but because he showed some courage in saying it. He said that it was the view of many people in Toronto that the troops we have in Korea should be brought back to this country. But I will not pursue the matter further. I will however tell my friend the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra that from the start he has been speaking like General Crerar and General MacArthur.

Mr. Green: I am in good company.

Mr. Pouliot: When they hear of war, these gentlemen are like hounds at hunting time and they think of pursuing the enemy. I think a great deal of hounds; some of them are splendid and are extremely helpful in hunting game. But in this instance I say to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra—and I say the same thing to my other gifted friend, the hon. member for Lake Centre—that in the language he used in the house he has spoken like General Crerar and General MacArthur: We must defeat the enemy at all costs. It costs money. Here you are. You cannot complain about it.

Mr. Green: It costs a great deal more if the enemy defeats us.

Mr. Pouliot: Perhaps. But I do not speak of the budget of China or that of Korea. I speak of the budget of Canada. Both my friend the hon. member for Quadra and the hon. member for Lake Centre, and some others on the other side of the house, have been insistently declaring that we were not doing enough, that we should do more and more; and here we are. We are spending more money, and that money must come from the pocket of the Canadian taxpayer. The result cannot be otherwise. The last men who can be heard to complain about the increase in taxation are my hon. friend and all those who have insisted on these military achievements. I am not a pacifist; but at the time this policy was embarked on I was afraid of precisely what my hon. friend is complaining of now; but he has been insisting on it all the time.

We have a North Atlantic pact. He must be satisfied with it inasmuch as he did not say much about it, except that we are not fulfilling our duty, that we are not sending troops now to Europe under General Eisenhower. This is what he said, and I heard him very well. He accused the government of following a policy of drift and indecision because they have not enough men to send there. It costs money to send more men there. It may be in the three-year defence plan, but it will cost more money, and it will entail taxation. My hon. friend is too bright a lawyer and too able a politician not to realize that fact. He must be the first one to realize it. I would say that he and my other gifted friend, the hon. member for Lake Centre, must realize it.

Mr. Green: It is in the defence expenditures.

Mr. Pouliot: Yes, it is in the defence expenditures; but it can be done only at the proper time. If my hon. friend insists on doing more, the Canadian people will have to pay more, and they will have to tighten their belts accordingly. My hon. friend knows it. I do not expect to convince him, because I know he is sincere and that he has very deep feelings about it, and I respect his views. Although I sincerely believe in the freedom of thought in this house about political problems, I have the right to disagree with it, and moreover I have the right to tell him that he is illogical, and that he should praise the government for taxing the Canadian people for the expenditure that he has been calling for. Instead of accusing the government of indecision and drift, telling them that they have not yet established a policy on that, he should say to the government: I congratulate you on defending this country, on sending troops to Korea, and I hope that you will soon send that expeditionary force to Europe. But I have never prepared the speeches of the hon. gentleman and I am sure that he will not use my suggestions for his next speech.

He spoke of the reserve army. We have a reserve army in this country. He complained that we have a small number of reserve aircraft and anti-aircraft reserves.

Mr. Green: Anti-aircraft.

Mr. Pouliot: Yes. If we had sent no expedition to Korea our reserve would be much stronger. My hon. friend must remember that during the war I insisted on mobile units. He did not speak about it today. He must remember that at the present time in a country the size of ours, with more than three thousand miles of land between two oceans, the best defence is the air force. He knows that. The air force has made tremendous progress here in Canada, and it is still progressing all the time under the able direction of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) and of the intelligent brass hats. They are not all bright, but some of them are. My hon. friend will admit it and that is defence.

Mr. Green: I always thought they were bright.

Mr. Pouliot: He should have congratulated the government on the progress that has been made by the R.C.A.F. since those days when we heard about emergency measures to be taken.

He said that there was no statement from the Minister of National Defence about the increase of the reserve. Let him wait for the estimates, and the minister will come with his estimates in the near future, and he will give all the required information to the hon. gentleman; but he is hard to satisfy, and I wonder whether the explanations that will be given to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra by the minister will be found satisfactory by the hon. member. But, sir, I am an optimist; I hope so.

What was it the hon. gentleman said about the Pacific pact? He wants a new defence pact, but unfortunately he did not explain with what countries we should unite in the Pacific. We already have close association with the United States, and there is Mexico south of the United States. What else is there on the western side—

Mr. Green: Australia, New Zealand and the United States are to be in this pact.

Mr. Pouliot: Yes, but my hon. friend knows that that pact is in the making and it is not completed yet. According to dispatches which have been published widely in the press, some dominions in the Antipodes are not so strongly in favour of the pact. I did not telephone to the legations of the dominions to know what was the view of the governments concerned, but I read it in the press.

I have heard my hon. friend say four or five times that Canada should sign a Pacific defence pact. With whom? With Japan? We have no peace treaty yet with Japan. The treaty is in the making. With Chiang Kai-shek or with the Chinese communists? It would be pretty difficult to sign it with the communists. And then, who else? The Philippines? They are under United States domination. Oh, well, my hon. friend knows about that.

Mr. Green: They are an independent country.

Mr. Pouliot: Yes, so it is, but we know what it is. We know Mr. Romulo, and we know the Philippines. Would my hon. friend be satisfied to have the Philippines in the Pacific pact? Canada and the United States are already united; we are allies. We would have what? Japan? Is he ready to admit Japan now?

Mr. Green: Australia and New Zealand.

Mr. Pouliot: It is not certain that they will accept.

Mr. Green: Oh, yes.

Mr. Pouliot: That is the point. My hon. friend says "yes", but he has not read the papers recently.

Mr. Green: Yes, I have.

Mr. Pouliot: Yes, but he needs only to look at the press and he would not be so sure as that. We could go hand in hand to the high commissioners of Australia and New Zealand and ask them about the views of their governments, and my hon. friend would be surprised at their answers. But perhaps they would say: We are diplomats; we do not tell the secrets of state to Canadian members of parliament.

Would my hon. friend include Japan in the Pacific pact? Would he take Chiang Kai-shek and the Chinese nationalists?

Mr. Sinclair: No answer.

Mr. Pouliot: And France for Indo-China, or Viet Minh or Viet Nam?

Mr. Sinclair: No answer.

Mr. Pouliot: It is a very difficult matter. There are of course the beautiful south sea islands with luxurious vegetation, fruit, dances and all the charm of life. Well, they are not yet in the picture, but if my hon. friend wishes to take a trip there I will go with him, and I will ask those people if they are ready to join in the Pacific pact? But there is nothing I enjoy so much, Mr. Speaker, as to see a beaming expression on my hon. friend's face. It took me a long time to make him smile, but now that I have succeeded I am proud of myself, and I consider that it is quite an achievement. Well, sir, we will go together to the south sea islands and—

Mr. Green: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pouliot: We will participate in a debate before these people, and we will ask them if they want to join a Pacific pact, and if they do, it will be unanimous.

Mr. Knowles: Bon voyage!

Mr. Pouliot: We will take the hon. member with us.

Mr. Sinclair: Take him along, too; it would speed up the session a lot.

Mr. Pouliot: I am more serious than my hon. friend may think when I mention these facts. At the present a Pacific pact is impossible. Would my hon. friend cross the earth to Australia, to the Antipodes, to Australia and New Zealand in case of an emergency? It is the end of the world for us; and they have not yet decided to come in. China is a huge power; we are not officially at war with them. But they are supporting the communists whom we are now fighting in Korea. They are outside the pact. Now Japan can be admitted to the pact, but only—and my hon. friend will realize this—only after the country is officially recognized and a treaty is duly signed with them. That treaty is not yet signed, and my hon. friend knows it. What is the use of speaking about that?

When I think of the seriousness of the situation, and the ability of the hon. member, and realize that he knows the story, I conclude it is because he is like MacArthur and Crerar and Lake Centre—they want to fight; they want to fight the world.

Then he said there had been no halt to profiteering. It was an observation punctuated by no other argument. He just mentioned it, and mentioned things he said were taken for granted. This time he just mentioned the fact, and did not insist upon it. Perhaps there is some profiteering or, as he says, some profit making. But the denial of profits is the old socialist theory we heard explained in the house by Mr. Woodsworth and his associates a long time ago. I agree with the hon. member that profiteering is wrong.

The other day I listened to an excellent speech by the hon. member for Lake Centre. I told him it was one of the best he had ever delivered in the house. What is his suggestion about that matter? The suggestions offered are very few.

Mr. Sinclair: More money to Colombo.

Mr. Pouliot: Yes, more money to Colombo; human rights and fundamental freedoms!

Mr. Sinclair: More money for that, too.

Mr. Pouliot: Yes, yes—because there are many people who are interested in the defence of human rights and fundamental freedoms—with the exception of the hon. member, of course, who receives only his parliamentary indemnity. Those people are much better paid than we are to pronounce those words, ad infinitum. They are well cared for.

Then, I made note of one sentence in the hon. member's speech, which, to me, was a jewel—but a false jewel.

Mr. Sinclair: Paste.

Mr. Pouliot: The hon. member said that the ministers have become smug and self-satisfied. I see here the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier).

Mr. Green: All the ministers.

Mr. Pouliot: Yes, all of them. But the two I have mentioned are two members of the cabinet who are now in the house. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to look at the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Public Works and to say whether they are smug and self-satisfied. They may be self-satisfied, because they advertise good politics. But "smug" they have never been. My hon. friend should know his native tongue better than to use that word when referring to gentlemen who are so informal, so human and so easy of access as those gentlemen, who are members of the cabinet. And I say that of their parliamentary assistants, too.

Mr. Green: You will be in the Senate, if you don't look out.

Mr. Fulton: He will be director of the bureau of publicity.

Mr. Pouliot: He has not yet been named and may never be.

Mr. Fraser: They want it reorganized.

Mr. Pouliot: What the hon. member wanted was a long-range budget policy—meaning by that more taxation. And what does he mean by long-range? He spoke of ten years of tension, advertised by General Marshall. I agree that General Marshall is a great man. Does he mean that in the life of the country ten years is long-range? Surely it is not that.

Then the hon. member said that since Korea disturbing things had happened, that prices had risen, and that we have no price controls. Well, I will ask the hon. member two questions: First, is the hon. member, who represents an important constituency in the great city of Vancouver, ready to support the control of wages?

An hon. Member: No answer.

Mr. Pouliot: Answer?

Mr. Dickey: No answer.

An hon. Member: Silence.

Mr. Brooks: Are you?

Mr. Pouliot: Now, that being answered satisfactorily—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pouliot: —I will ask another question of the hon. member.

Mr. Green: Write them all down; there are so many I cannot remember them.

Mr. Pouliot: Oh, there was only one.

Mr. Green: Put them on the order paper.

Mr. Pouliot: No; it was a simple question. There was nothing complicated about it. I know that my hon. friend wants clear situations and I will ask clear questions.

Mr. Sinclair: Yes, or no.

Mr. Pouliot: No, he may answer with frills, if he wishes. I would be greatly enthused if I were to have an answer.

Then, the first question, which was so ably and so pointedly answered, was: Is the hon. member in favour of the control of wages? I would repeat that question to the constituency of Vancouver-Quadra, and say that their distinguished member of parliament has said in the House of Commons that he is in favour of the control of their wages. I should add that he has not said it; I have added that.

Mr. Sinclair: Lost his tongue.

Mr. Pouliot: Is he in favour of lower wages?

Then, having spoken about low things, lower wages, I shall now speak about higher things and ask the hon. member if he is in favour of controls at the top price. This is a simple question, you will understand.

Mr. Green: From a simple man.

Mr. Sinclair: And to a simple man.

Mr. Green: Yes, to a simple man, also.

Mr. Pouliot: Well, "from a simple man" and "to a simple man" was not an answer to my question. But I see the hon. member has not lost his voice, and that he is able to answer me.

Now, having got his well-expressed views about the control of wages I would like him to tell us if he is in favour of establishing controls, with prices at the top?

An hon. Member: No answer.

Mr. Pouliot: And I see that his second answer is just as conclusive as his first one.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when young people who want to get married listen to speeches of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra I want to be there to try to lessen the depressing effect of his speeches, and to remind those young people that Canada is a great country, and that there must be no doubt about it.

Another thing my hon. friend said solemnly—and he seemed very much worried about it—was that Canadian bonds had fallen below par. He was very much concerned about that. I am sure that like everyone the hon. member has at times visited brokers' offices or bucket shops and has seen how things are done there. He knows that when Canadian bonds are sold they are sold at a premium, and he knows that when they are redeemed they are redeemed at par. In the meantime there are fluctuations in the market price of a point or two or perhaps only a fraction of a point. Anyone who reads the market page in the press will realize that my hon. friend was not as serious about this as he usually is about other matters.

Then he referred to the increase in the sales tax and he became quite persuasive in asking the minister to drop this increase. I have never been enthusiastic about the sales tax, but on the other hand I realize that the government has been listening to the recommendations of the hon. gentleman to spend a lot for defence and so on.

Mr. Sinclair: The Pacific pact.

Mr. Pouliot: The Pacific pact. It is unfortunate, but we must pay for these things. The hon. member referred to the surplus as being thirteen times larger than what the minister expected. The reason is obvious. Perhaps because of the emergency, but in any event the businessmen of this country showed great activity and the increased business created this surplus. This is a simple explanation by a simple man to an hon. gentleman who is well versed in economics.

He says that the budget makes savings impossible. Savings are always possible. I admit that we have not got all that we wanted from the government. My hon. friend did not get his Pacific pact or the sending of Canadian troops to Europe. He may get both of those things in due course. There are other matters that have not been settled, but which I hope will be soon, like pensions for the old and so on. These will cost money. If the old people and the blind are receiving only $40 instead of a larger amount it is because of the insistent demands by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, the hon. member for Lake Centre, and an hon. member from Quebec that we go to war. We have to pay for all this.

The hon. member quoted Mr. Muir, president of the Royal Bank, who wrote a very nice article which was sent to all of us. I read it with interest and profit. The hon. member should read not only speeches by Mr. Muir; he should also read the reports of the annual meetings of all the chartered banks and the large insurance companies. I am sure he will enjoy them very much.

I shall not say anything more because I have covered the ground to a large extent. I am not familiar with shorthand, but I did take some notes and I have answered some of the points that were raised. I am glad the hon. member is still in such a good mood and I hope we will remain friends. Let me tell him that in times like this it is a good thing to have an experienced pilot at the head of the government. With due respect to his chief, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), for whom I have great regard, I am sure that all parties are ready to trust the Prime Minister and his cabinet in the difficult circumstances with which we are faced.

If my hon. friend considers the matter as objectively as I am sure he can, he will realize that the problems before the government are tremendous. I do not think any members of the government are smug. I see the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) who is neither smug nor self-satisfied. I can say that of all members of the cabinet. They are just good Canadians who are trying to do their best to serve their country. They are trying to help the constituents of my hon. friend, my constituents and the constituents of any other member.

If my hon. friend uses his talents for the better and offers constructive criticism he knows not how much it will be appreciated by his own constituents. I am sure if he had complimented the Minister of Finance upon the budget he would have received thousands of letters from his constituents saying, "All right, Howard, go on, you are on the right road". He would be on the right road to a political conversion.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) would go on for another five or six minutes, as I was enjoying him, as I always do. I have great respect for my hon. friend, as he has for everybody. He proceeded to give the hon. member a dressing-down. Since there are one or two functions during the dinner hour I wonder if you would mind calling it six o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): Hon. members will realize that it is not up to the Speaker to declare whether it is six o'clock. Not having unanimous consent, I cannot declare it six o'clock.

Mr. Hansell: I noticed the other night that when the chief government whip did not want a vote he asked the house to adjourn at a quarter to eleven. I can go on if I must, but it means that there will be a three-hour break from six to nine o'clock before I can continue my speech. I can talk along this line for another six minutes if necessary.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Personally I have no objection, but not long ago we asked for the same favour and were turned down by a member of that party.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): Is it the pleasure of the house that I call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

CANADIAN-MONTANA PIPE LINE COMPANY

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 117, to incorporate Canadian-Montana Pipe Line Company—Mr. Bennett—Mr. Dion in the chair.

Sections 1 and 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Capital stock.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Chairman, I think this is the clause in which I am particularly interested. The last time I spoke on this particular bill I desired certain information in which I know the people of my riding are interested, I would even go further and say in which the whole of British Columbia is interested. As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, I did not think it would be necessary for me to say anything on this particular section, because I am sure there are some of my colleagues in British Columbia who are interested in gas and pipe lines just as I am. The main reason, Mr. Chairman, for my interest in this particular bill is that I want to tie it in with the whole gas and oil picture in Canada. It is true that this particular bill more or less concerns what we might call a branch line, but on the other hand it is a main line. That may not sound particularly clear, being a branch line and yet a main line, but on the other hand the gas situation is so vital, not only to our province but to the whole Dominion of Canada, we must look at the whole picture and not merely make it a sectional issue.

I do not want to weary the committee, Mr. Chairman, but possibly you are not as familiar with the argument I commenced so I had better reiterate what I said. As a matter of fact, I thought one of the Alberta members might discuss this bill. I understand that some of the Alberta members are not at all in accord with the policy of their government in connection with the distribution of gas.

Mr. Prudham: Speak for the province of British Columbia.

Mr. Cruickshank: The minister says to speak for the province of British Columbia. I am glad to note that at least the minister has committed himself and is interested in the gas situation in his native province, an excellent province. I am surprised the minister has not spoken before in this house to explain what a magnificent province it is, the potential wealth of the province and how it could thus be developed, not only to build up his province into an even greater province but also to build the rest of Canada. I believe I have won the minister over to my side, that the building of Alberta will also build up Canada, in spite of the government that they have in Alberta—for instance the member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw), I am sure, does not agree with the policy adopted out there in connection with the distribution of this great wealth that they have. This wealth, Mr. Chairman, is not merely the wealth of Alberta, but it is also a part of the great heritage of this great dominion of ours.

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps I should inform the hon. member that we are now discussing section 3, and he should make his remarks relevant to the item.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Chairman, I shall try to confine myself to the section.

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps I should read the section to the hon. member. It reads:

> The capital stock of the company shall consist of five hundred thousand shares without nominal or par value.

Mr. Cruickshank: I am glad that you brought that to my attention, Mr. Chairman. It was the very point, I am sure, the minister from Alberta had in mind. This is the very section for which I was looking. It is section 3 in Bill L-1 of the Senate of Canada, an act to incorporate Canadian-Montana Pipe Line Company. Under "Capital Stock" it says that it shall consist of 500,000 shares without nominal or par value. This is the very section to which I was referring, Mr. Chairman. That is of value and importance to more than the province of Alberta, a great province, although I am sure the hon. member for Red Deer will agree with me that it is not as well administered as it should be. Now that I have the support of the hon. member for Red Deer and the minister from that province on this very section, it enables me to clarify the argument I intend to advance at greater length.

I do not want to weary the house on this particular bill, and certainly not on this section, but when we are going to share the wealth we have in this great dominion and this province with our great neighbour to the south, we must have a certain amount of protection. As I understand it, and I shall be glad to be corrected, Mr. Chairman, if I am wrong, the desire of this particular company in securing a charter—charters, by the way, should be very valuable things and given careful consideration in this chamber—is to export gas to the Anaconda Copper Company. I understand the original intention was to export for a limited period to more or less tide the company over an emergent situation as a defence measure. Incidentally that company, in conjunction with ours, is doing wonderful work in preparing for any eventuality in defence. They require this gas for that purpose. Originally, I understand, they wanted this fuel for a period of five years. I am not a member of the committee but I understand from evidence given before the committee that it has now developed they want it for a twenty-five year period. The sponsor of the bill can correct me if I am wrong. I am quoting the evidence of the president of the company, Mr. Corette, I believe his name is, as to the twenty-five year minimum. As I understand it, under that particular section of the charter this could be extended to the lifetime of the gas supply, and that is all the more reason why a great deal of attention should be given to this section 3, the amount of the capital stock of the company. If gas from our great province is to be exported indefinitely to the United States, there must be safeguards, safeguards not only for Alberta and British Columbia, but, under this very section, safeguards for the whole Dominion of Canada.

The other day I was speaking—certainly this comes under section 3, Mr. Chairman—of those who are financing the company. We have not had the privilege of having that explained to us. Who is financing it? I want to know where these funds are coming from, Mr. Chairman. Surely, the question of funds comes under the heading of "Capital Stock." I asked where these funds were coming from. Were they to buy these shares of the capital stock? Were those stocks to be disposed of in Canada or in the United States? I asked how they were to be payable, whether in Canadian or in United States funds. These are some of the questions I asked in connection with this particular bill. Surely it is in order, Mr. Chairman, to ask who are going to build this particular pipe line, and if they have had experience in this particular form of work. When we have an issue of stock to that extent, surely we should have information as to why we are to issue stock to that extent and to indicate that the people who are issuing it have the capital behind them to the extent of 500,000 shares without nominal or par value. We should have that information. As I said, we should know where they are getting the funds, what the terms are, and the experience they have had in spending these funds. Then there is the matter of whether steel is available. The other night we were informed by one of the ministers that the steel was available. Of course I have no doubt that that is correct, and that the steel is available. Those of us who have not been privileged—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. What the hon. member is saying does not relate to the clause under discussion which concerns the capital stock of the company. I will ask the hon. member again to relate his remarks to the clause under discussion.

[Mr. Cruickshank.]

Mr. Cruickshank: Very well, Mr. Chairman. I will just ask one or two questions in connection with this particular section; then possibly I could confine the rest of my remarks to one of the other sections. In order that the sponsor of the bill will answer me on this particular section, I should like to have it on record that, with respect to the capital stock consisting of 500,000 shares, without nominal or par value, I would require to know where that stock is to be disposed of. Then as you say, Mr. Chairman, it would probably be far more in order if I confine my remarks to the following section.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Shaw: Before it carries, may I say to the hon. member for Fraser Valley that certain of his early remarks were predicated upon one of the most fantastic suppositions that I have ever heard, namely, that I am in disagreement with the oil and gas policy of the government of the province of Alberta. However, I shall not go beyond saying that just at this point because I fear that I would be completely out of order.

Mr. Cruickshank: I accept the apology, Mr. Chairman.

An hon. Member: Whose apology?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Bennett: There are three companies interested in this pipe line: the Union Oil Company, the Montana Power Company and the McColl-Frontenac Oil Company of Canada which is well-known in our country. These three companies are large and substantial organizations. The preliminary financing for this pipe line is being undertaken by the Montana Power Company which has been in the public utilities field for about seventy years. Any additional moneys which may be required will be financed by these three companies. I think that answers the question asked by the hon. member for Fraser Valley.

Mr. Cruickshank: That answers that question, Mr. Chairman. There is more to follow.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Head office and other offices.

Mr. Green: I believe an amendment to clause 4 was moved in committee, Mr. Chairman. Will you please tell us what that amendment is and whether it is now included in that paragraph.

The Deputy Chairman: As I see it here, the amendment was to subsection 2 of clause 4 which now reads as follows:

The company may, by by-law, change the place within Canada where the head office of the company is to be situate.

Mr. Cruickshank: No, that is not it.

The Deputy Chairman: That is the only amendment I see.

Mr. Green: The words "within Canada" are added. Is that the change?

The Deputy Chairman: Yes. The words "within Canada" are the two words by which subsection 2 was amended.

Mr. McCulloch: In clause 3 I think there was an amendment to the effect that $10 was to be the par value of the stock.

The Deputy Chairman: I cannot agree with the remarks made by the hon. member for Pictou, because clause 3 is not amended according to the bill I have here.

Mr. Green: I think perhaps what the hon. member has in mind, Mr. Chairman, is that a resolution was passed providing that for purpose of payment of fees, these shares would be considered to be of a certain par value. I do not believe there was an amendment to this section itself.

Mr. McCulloch: I think the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra is right.

Section 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Powers of company.

Mr. Green: I believe there was an amendment to clause 6. Would you read us the terms of it, Mr. Chairman?

The Deputy Chairman: The amendment applies to line 30, which now reads as follows:

. . . and other gaseous or liquid hydrocarbons provided that the main pipe line or lines of this company either for the transmission or transportation of gas or oil, shall be located entirely within Canada.

Shall the clause as amended carry?

Mr. Sinnott: With regard to clause 6, may I say that a few days ago I had an opportunity of saying a few words on this pipe line bill. At that time I said that I believed that we should here in the House of Commons support an all-Canadian pipe line. As I see it, this clause says:

The company, subject to the provisions of any general legislation which is enacted by parliament, relating to pipe lines for the transmission and transportation of gas and oil or any liquid product or by-product thereof, may

(a) within the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia or outside Canada construct, purchase, lease, or otherwise acquire, and hold, develop, operate, maintain, control, lease, mortgage, create liens upon, sell, convey or otherwise dispose of and turn to account any and all interprovincial and/or international pipe lines, for the transmission and transportation of gas and oil including pumping stations, terminals, storage tanks or reservoirs and all works relative thereto for use in connection with the said pipe lines; and buy, or otherwise acquire, sell, distribute or otherwise dispose of gas; and as an adjunct or correlate to pipe lines for gas to have similar powers and facilities for pipe lines for the transmission and transportation of oil and the acquisition and disposal of oil; and own, lease, sell, operate and maintain aircraft and aerodromes for the purpose of its undertaking, together with the facilities required for the operation of such aircraft and aerodromes; and own, lease, operate and maintain interstation telephone, teletype and telegraph communication systems and, subject to the Radio Act, 1938, and any other statute relating to radio, own, lease, operate and maintain interstation radio communication facilities;

That is paragraph (a).

Mr. Knowles: What bill was the hon. member reading from?

Mr. Sinnott: This is Bill N-1 of the Senate.

Mr. Knowles: I am sorry; the hon. member is reading from the wrong bill.

Mr. Sinnott: The section that I was reading is identical with the section in the bill which is before the committee.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member has been reading clause 6 (a) of Bill N-1, to incorporate Border Pipeline Corporation, which is not identical with clause 6 (a) of Bill L-1 which is before the committee at the present time, although it has the same import. I am merely drawing attention to the fact that the hon. member was reading from the wrong bill.

Mr. Cruickshank: It is the same general legislation.

The Deputy Chairman: I imagine the hon. member will have to wait until the other bill comes before the committee. Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Sinnott: No, it shall not carry. Section 6 (a) is exactly the same as the one which I have just read. It reads:

The company, subject to the provisions of any general legislation relating to pipe lines—

Do you want me to go over it again?

Some hon. Members: Dispense.

Mr. Sinnott: I appreciate the help of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and admit that he was on the bit so far as the bill is concerned. I was reading from section 6 of Bill L-1, which is identical with what I was talking about. At the present time the people of Canada own vast quantities of oil and natural gas. The sponsors of this bill would export that natural product from this country. In other words, they would permit those who come into the country and invest a few dollars to take away our natural resources and leave the people of this country penniless. That is something that I, and the hon. member for Fraser Valley, will not stand for. We believe that the natural resources of Canada should be developed for the people of Canada before any of those resources are exported to anyone else. If we maintain that principle in this parliament then we will not allow anyone outside this House of Commons to have anything to do with the bill which is before us at the present time.

This is something which is vital to every Canadian. Unless we endeavour to expand our facilities and develop the natural resources of this country, Canada will never be any more than it is today. Therefore I say, Mr. Speaker, that before any gas or oil is exported or taken to any United States point such as Superior, Wisconsin—it would have been much better if the pipe line had ended at Fort William—before any gas or oil is taken any place outside Canada the needs of Canada should be satisfied. That should be done before any part of the United States or any place else has the benefits of those facilities.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member will realize that this clause does not relate to exportation. Section 6 concerns the powers of the company. The sidenote reads:

Power to construct and operate pipe lines; power to hold land.

And everything is within Canada. It does not say anything about exporting outside the country.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Carried.

Mr. Sinnott: It does not say "within or without Canada"?

The Deputy Chairman: There has been an amendment to subsection (a), line 28. Therefore, it reads:

. . . provided that the main pipe line or lines either for the transmission or transportation of gas or oil shall be located entirely within Canada.

Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Sinnott: No. Section 6, paragraph (a) of Bill L.1 reads:

Within the province of Alberta and/or internationally outside Canada construct, purchase, lease, or otherwise, acquire and hold—

[Mr. Sinnott.]

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That has been amended.

Mr. Sinnott: I maintain that we in this House of Commons are wasting our time on these bills. These bills should have the consent and the consideration of the province of Alberta before they come here. If Alberta has consented to the export of these commodities then we should pass our legislation later.

On the title.

Mr. Knowles: Before the title carries may I make one request in respect to these bills that appear on our files? I hope that you, sir, will permit me to make this request at this time. When these Senate bills are put on our files, they are placed there in the order in which they arrive, of course, but without the House of Commons number imprinted on the bill. On the other hand, if we send down to the table, or down to the distribution office, for a copy of the bill before the house, we get it with the House of Commons number stamped on the top of the bill. I am sure that many hon. members have difficulty in finding bills by the Senate numbers when after all what counts with us is the House of Commons number. I wonder whether arrangements could not be made for the House of Commons numbers to be stamped on the Senate bills before they are put on the files under our desks.

I notice that you, sir, are pointing to the fact that that number is there on the individual copies that we may get, but it is not there on the copies that are on our files. It did not happen tonight, but it does happen sometimes that a bill is passed through this house before some hon. members even find it. I think it is a reasonable suggestion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: I hear "hear, hear" from across the way. Perhaps it can be looked into and carried out for the convenience of all hon. members.

The Deputy Chairman: I think there is merit in the suggestion just made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I shall call the attention of the proper authorities to this suggestion.

BORDER PIPELINE CORPORATION

The house resumed, from Friday, April 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. Robinson for the second reading of Bill No. 118, to incorporate Border Pipeline Corporation.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): When I was making my introductory remarks at the time this bill was last before the house I said that we in this group were opposed to this bill particularly on two grounds: First, because it was intended that this pipe line would be built with private capital; and second, because, according to the information we had, this company does not intend to pursue an all-Canadian route from the commencement of the pipe line through to the coast before it comes to United States territory.

I had also brought the attention of the house to the fact that we did have some support from other quarters of the house, and that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson), and the former member for Vancouver Centre, had shown an identity of purpose and interest in the principle of publicly-owned pipe lines.

Before proceeding I should like to quote from the remarks of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson), particularly as I see the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) is in his seat at the present time. At page 2808 of Hansard for April 30, 1949, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni had this to say:

> There is a very important principle involved. Last night I was protesting against what appeared to me to be a tremendous lack of vision on the part of the directors of our Canadian National Railways. That railway system is in the business of providing transportation and moving freight, whether it be in the form of coal, oil, gas or any other form.
>
> The Canadian National directors are allowing this pipe line method of transportation to be laid all along their right of way. It will be in the hands of private corporations and this tremendous freight which is originating in this north country is going to provide corresponding profits. I sincerely hope that the volume of traffic will be such that the profits will be large.
> I think the Canadian National directors—I would not say the Minister of Transport—have been remiss in their duties and have shown an appalling lack of vision in not having investigated this proposal very carefully. I for one, and I am sure this would apply to other hon. members, would have been glad to approve the capital required to put in these pipe lines which would have provided a tremendous amount of freight revenue.
> I am tired of voting money to defray deficits. I should like to see the Canadian National look into this matter carefully before they permit private companies to lay transportation lines for gas and oil on their right of way. They and the Minister of Transport should look into the possibilities of this form of transportation being provided by the Canadian National system.

I am quite willing to follow the advice of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni in connection with a venture that presents opportunities for profit. I am quite sure if the hon. member for Comox-Alberni says that this is a profitable venture, there can be no question about it: it is a very profitable venture.

Then in the part of his speech I read he uses the expression "appalling lack of vision". Those are the words he used. They are strong words. If we understand correctly, the word "appalling" means horrible, and when coupled with the other words it would mean a horrible lack of vision, or a frightening lack of vision, or a terrible lack of vision, or a paralysing lack of vision. There, again, I think the words of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni can be accepted by all members in the house who are getting tired of seeing American capital come to Canada and pick the cream of Canadian investment and development.

That is obvious, from the literature that is being distributed at the present time by these various companies. I am not going into that matter at full length this evening, because I wish to deal with our general approach to the problem of public ownership of pipe lines. But I do wish to bring this one pamphlet to the attention of the house. This pamphlet which I received in the mail informs me of the opportunities for making money by investing in oil or gas pipe lines. It states that the investment of a few dollars will soon return a great many dollars, and it illustrates that a few cents invested today means hundreds of dollars tomorrow. This company, in its brochure, sets out the following table:

Name of Company	1947 Low	1950 High
Atlantic Oil	·22	$3.30
Central Leduc	·15	3.85
Federated Petroleums	·23	6.10
National Petroluems	·12	3.10
Pacific Petroleums	·84	8.25

Mr. Fulton: What are they going to do in 1951?

Mr. Herridge: Then it goes on to say:

> Had you only invested a mere $100 in the above shares you could have cashed in handsomely—realizing from $800 to $2,500 on your investment in little over three years.

My point is this, that if those profits are to be made in oil or gas, it is about time the Canadian people made them through publicly-owned corporations. And if those profits are being made they are being paid out of the pockets of the people of Canada at this time.

While I was deeply interested in the fact that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni gave such strong support to the principle of public ownership of pipe lines, I was a little disappointed in another direction in the house. The hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) has been an ardent fighter for an all-Canadian route. Everyone gives him credit for his off-the-cuff, his on-the-cuff and his in-the-cuff speeches. But, Mr. Speaker, I am disappointed in this respect that, after having the support of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, he does not come along with us and give us his support of the principle of public ownership of pipe lines.

I know he has thought about it. From his attitude on other questions which come before the house I know he has thought about it. He is a progressive friend of mine, and I would say that I am still hopeful. I believe the hon. member for Fraser Valley is just about to emerge from the cocoon of capitalist inhibition.

The hon. member for Fraser Valley has been greatly assisted by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott), who makes a rather dramatic approach at times when he talks on these questions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Herridge: I appreciate the blasé manner in which he can accept applause, without even turning a hair. I understand the hon. member for Springfield is now generally known throughout Manitoba as the Cruickshank of Manitoba. But we would like him to take another step, and not only support an all-Canadian route, but say that these pipe lines should be publicly owned, and that the profits from them should go to the Canadian people. We are not suggesting that that is socialism; it is a form of public ownership.

Mr. Sinnott: It is a service.

Mr. Herridge: Yes, it is a service which should be given by the Canadian people to the Canadian people.

And I am pleased to note that the efforts of the small group in this corner of the chamber are having some effect. I remember when the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) used to sit at the other end of the chamber, and he voted time after time against public ownership. He was to be found with the private enterprisers. I have been informed —I am not quite sure about it, from personal experience—but I have been informed that recently in a committee which dealt with public ownership of pipe lines, and things of that kind, he has been putting forth some very strong arguments in that connection. I wish to mention in that respect that the hon. member for Kamloops has, since he voted against public ownership of pipe lines, moved down to this end of the chamber, and he now sits beside the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis). I am sure the personal contact and personal intimacy with and the fatherly advice he has received from the hon. member for Cape Breton South is having its influence. Next time this matter comes to a vote I expect to see him standing shoulder to shoulder with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

We in this group stand for the principle of social ownership, generally. As hon. members know, our policy is based, in principle, on a program known as the Regina manifesto. In that program the third plank is known as social ownership, and deals with the necessity of social ownership of certain things in this country for the advantage of the Canadian people.

Mr. Laing: In agriculture?

Mr. Herridge: Certainly not. I shall deal with that later. The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Laing) says "agriculture". Apparently he has not been reading the C.C.F. program, or he does not understand it, because he would not be saying that. I expect to hear later from the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Laing) because I understand he has had a speech germinating for about six weeks.

We in this group believe that there is a place for a certain amount of planning in our economy. This idea was first put forward in 1932 and 1933 by the C.C.F. when it was first formed. At that time members of this party were looked upon with great disfavour, considerable misunderstanding and some horror by those who had nothing to do previously with the study of economics. But a wider and wider section of the Canadian people are beginning to realize just what we are advocating.

We submit that free enterprise, even under capitalism, has to be modified if the needs of the Canadian people are going to be met. That is obvious. How can we say that we are moving in a period of free enterprise when we see government, because of conditions and circumstances, more and more entering the field of public investment and so on? When you see the lords of Bay street coming to Ottawa on their hands and knees, these tycoons of the gold mining industry, seeking aid and subsidies for the support of gold mines, we should remember they are the same people who reply to the ordinary working man who asks for a subsidy for bread and milk, "My dear fellow, you must stand on your own feet; you must earn your own living." These things indicate the changing Canadian conditions. I am not opposed to subsidies for gold mines, I am simply pointing that out to illustrate that we are not in a totally free economy at this time.

There is no particular virtue in socialism for the sake of socialism. It is not because we have a doctrinaire conception that we advocate these things. We advocate them because we believe that if we are going to have a democratic and peaceful transition to a state of society with all possible advantages, when there will be returned to the great masses of workers and producers a just share of their production, it must be done by evolutionary and democratic methods, step by step, as a result of experience.

It was because of that belief that the Regina manifesto was drawn up and presented to the Canadian people as a program. These are policies that are in keeping with Canadian tradition, Canadian psychology and Canadian circumstances. I am relating what I say entirely to the question of public ownership of pipe lines.

We in this group believe generally that our next move in the economic field—in fact we believe we are moving into a mixed economy that contains certain types of ownership—is one that should consider public ownership first of all. In the federal field we propose public ownership of railways, water transport and, we hope, gas and oil pipe lines. In the provincial field we advocate public ownership of power production, public services and things of that type. In the municipal field there will be locally owned power plants and possibly public distribution of milk, bread and things of that sort.

An hon. Member: What about eggs?

Mr. Herridge: Easter has gone by and we have no eggs. We believe also in co-operative ownership at all levels. At the national level there would be co-operative marketing of the agricultural production of this country, credit unions, administrative and legislative organizations and things of that type. Then in the provincial field there would be co-operative organizations which would be closer to the people. At the local municipal level there would be the consumers' store, local farmers organizations and credit unions.

We believe that there is a field for considerable private ownership. If private ownership renders a service to the community without exploitation, without the improper development of natural resources, and without monopoly, we believe it can still perform a service for the country.

An hon. Member: What about hardware?

Mr. Herridge: Small hardware stores, not branch hardware stores. We are opposed to monopoly in all its phases when monopoly means operation without necessary control by the government, whether federal or provincial. Obviously we must have some form of monopoly. You cannot operate a vast telephone system efficiently without a certain amount of monopoly, and the same applies to other distributing agencies, such as those having to do with power and so on. We are not opposed to monopolies as a development within capitalism simply because they are monopolies. But we are opposed to monopolies because of their effect.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It would appear the hon. member is going far afield.

Mr. Herridge: I am simply illustrating the advantages of public ownership of pipe lines. If Your Honour will have patience for two or three minutes I think you will see I am quite in order. Every child in Canada is entitled to an education to the extent of his talents. Every adult is entitled to employment at satisfactory wages or salary throughout his working days. Every invalid is entitled to security. Every older person is entitled to a pension that will provide security with comfort.

We say that if a monopoly, whether it be a pipe line, a bus line, a mining monopoly or any type, is willing to operate or develop the natural resources of this country, conserving them under principles laid down by a government having the interests of the people at heart; if that monopoly is willing to pay a rate of taxation to provide a necessary standard of living and the things I have just mentioned; if that monopoly is willing to charge a fair price for its commodities or services: then we say that there is no particular virtue in socialization.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The principle of the bill concerns the construction of a pipe line.

Mr. Herridge: There is no object in socialization for the sake of socialization, and if a monopoly is not able to meet these terms then we say it should be socialized. I am sure that that would have the support of the great majority of the Canadian people if they were informed of the facts.

I shall deal now with the question of an all-Canadian route. Another objection we have to this bill is that the company will be made up largely of United States capital. I do not blame United States people for wanting to invest in pipe lines if they have the opportunity, because that might be a good thing to do. In my opinion they cause considerable difference, and a different effect on the community and the economy. The investment of local capital means that you have people reinvesting their profits in the community, in the province or within Canada. They are taking an interest in the country. They have a personal stake in the country. They are living with the people who are working in their plants or factories, and these profits are reinvested from year to year in the country. So far as foreign investment is concerned, there is a complete loss to Canada of the total profits exported from this country each year from these operations.

We believe, Mr. Speaker, that Canadian capital is preferable in all these ventures. We also believe that the people with capital in Canada have been very shortsighted in allowing outside capital to come in and take advantage of the opportunities to make these developments. As I said before, the reinvestment of profits from Canadian capital in the Canadian economy simply means that, while we may disagree as to the justice or adequacy of the distribution of the production of the company, there is no loss to Canada as a whole. The total wealth produced remains within Canada.

Our second major objection is that this company does not intend to build an all-Canadian route. This matter concerns many people in British Columbia. The legislature of British Columbia has expressed itself in favour of an all-Canadian route, and so have farmers organizations and boards of trade. If I had the time I could have quoted this evening, from the Nelson Daily News published in my own district, a report of the meeting of the associated boards of trade of eastern British Columbia at which the delegates expressed great concern over the fact that gas or oil may be piped to the United States prior to reaching the Canadian coast. I could also quote the Ottawa Citizen and other papers but time does not permit me to do so this evening.

There is no question as to the value of these developments to Canada. Their value is recognized so far as the power possibilities are concerned, so far as employment is concerned, and their great value so far as revenue is concerned. There is no question that a route through the Kettle valley is feasible. We were told the greatest lot of boloney on a previous bill. We realize now that it was boloney. Prominent engineers questioned the feasibility of the route because of sliding ground and so on and made the whole thing appear almost impossible to us. As a result of cross-examining the engineers who are going to build the Trans Mountain pipe line we know that from their point of view the Kettle valley route is an easy one, and presents no construction difficulties.

Therefore there is no argument whatever either from the financial or from the physical point of view against the building of a gas or oil pipe line from its source straight through the Kettle valley to Vancouver prior to entering the United States. We feel very strongly about this matter, and I wish to move, seconded by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Jones):

> That Bill No. 118 be not now read a second time but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house further consideration of this bill should be deferred until the house has been assured that the route of any pipe line built by the proposed company will be laid out so as to serve Canadian requirements before any such pipe line leaves Canadian soil.

In view of certain remarks made by the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham), I want to draw to the attention of the house the opinion of the Liberal members of the legislative assembly of Alberta with respect to the export of gas from that province. I should like to quote briefly from a Canadian Press dispatch of April 3 found in the Nelson Daily News for April 4. It reads in part as follows:

> The bill permitting temporary export of natural gas to Montana for essential defence production yesterday received second reading in the Alberta legislature. It now must pass the hurdle of full-scale debate in committee before receiving third reading and royal assent. Several opposition speakers expressed concern over undesirable factors which they said export might create . . . "Who is going to benefit chiefly from our export of gas?" asked H. J. MacDonald (Lib.-Calgary). "The Alberta government gets a yearly revenue of about $75,000 in royalties. McColl-Frontenac apparently gets $10 million. Anaconda gets cheaper gas. Do we get a trade advantage equivalent to the value of our gas?"
> Mr. MacDonald said export would permit the Montana Power Company to look after the needs of Anaconda with Alberta gas and reserve its own dwindling supplies for its 33,000 residential and commercial consumers.

I mention that to indicate the tremendous profits that are being made by these companies in the piping of oil and gas to the United States without consideration for Canadian requirements and Canadian consumers. Again I say that I hope that we from British Columbia, who have been continually fighting for an all-Canadian route by amendment of these bills to include a clause that an all-Canadian route shall be built, will be successful in the present case. To date we have been successful in the case of three other bills. I hope that other members of the house will realize that our arguments are valid and are not merely placed before the house to take up time. There are no financial difficulties in the way. There are no physical difficulties in the way. We believe it is not only the duty of members from British Columbia but the duty of members from all sides of the house to stand up and fight to preserve Canadian oil and gas for the use of Canadians first before their export is permitted from this country.

On motion of Mr. Hodgson the debate was adjourned.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being nine o'clock the house will now resume the business interrupted at six o'clock.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank hon. members of the house for their courtesy in calling it six o'clock as early as seven or eight minutes before six. It simply meant that I did not have to introduce my speech and then put it off for a period of several hours. We are now continuing the debate on the budget. Budget night usually is a big night, but why it should be a big night I do not know because the budgets that are introduced into this house in reality are designed to perpetuate a false economic system. Yet somehow or other budgets become glorified in the minds of the people. The present monetary system under which this government and its predecessors have operated is what I call an iniquitous system. In the first place it is a debt-creating system. It is a debt and taxation system. It is a system which imposes burdens upon the people. It is a system which reduces the purchasing power of the people. It is a system which impoverishes the people, and it is a system which, carried to its conclusion, takes away the right of the people to private property. Now, why such an iniquitous monetary system should be crowned with such glory and honour is beyond my comprehension. Yet, it is so crowned.

Some of us have been sitting in this house now for a great many years. I know when I first came down to this august chamber I was inspired. I felt I was sitting in the seats of the mighty. When the budgets were brought down, surrounded with all the pomp and glory that usually accompanies budgets, I sat rather awe-inspired. I recall, not many years after I entered this house, a previous finance minister, Mr. Dunning, brought down what was publicized as his "Mayday budget," because it was brought down on the first of May. The galleries were filled with people. The press galleries were filled with press representatives. We sat in our seats, and the chamber was fairly well crowded.

At last, the minister of finance, Mr. Dunning, entered. He was applauded. I looked at him. He was dressed in his best bib and tucker. He had on his morning coat and striped trousers. He had on his winged collar and pearl-grey tie. There he stood, in all the glory surrounding this thing we know as finance. He brought down his budget. The people listened almost spellbound. What they listened to, I do not know. I do not think they knew either. This was in what was known as the hungry thirties, and I think they were waiting for some good news. When the budget was all summed up, the only relief he was able to give the taxpayers of Canada was that he took the sales tax off gopher poison.

Now, that is the record. The other night a similar scene was enacted here. As I went to dinner at around six o'clock, the people were beginning to gather in the corridors. The constables were keeping them in line. When I came down to the chamber at approximately eight o'clock at night, the galleries were crowded with people. My telephone rang several times during the day because people were inquiring whether I could get them special tickets for the gallery. The crowds were here. We were all in our seats. I do not know why we were here, but we were here anyway. The clock struck eight. No finance minister appeared. We began to break the tension by singing a few ballads. At last, about five minutes after eight, the hon. gentleman, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), entered upon the scene. Great applause from all over the house accompanied his entrance.

My thoughts went back to one or two court trials that I have attended in my lifetime. I recall the prisoners being brought up from the cells below, stumbling in. The prisoner is placed in the prisoner's dock. He is about to hear the verdict of the jury, guilty or not guilty, and the sentence pronounced by the judge. I could not help thinking how similar the scene was on a budget night to that scene in the courtroom. Here were the people crowding to get in the galleries. I have never heard yet of prisoners, who thought perhaps they were guilty of their crime, desiring with all their might to get into the prisoner's dock to hear what their sentence was going to be. Yet that night we had the people in the galleries and the pressmen, and the minister was applauded. What for? The people were there to hear what their economic sentence was going to be for the next twelve months. What had they done to deserve this fine, this penalty? Had they committed any crimes? I fancied I saw some war veterans there who had fought for their country. Had they come now to receive their reward at the hands of those who managed the affairs of this country? I imagined I saw mothers there who had perhaps given sons in battle for the freedom of this country. They were all there, ears wide open, waiting to hear the penalty for their crime. After all, that is what a budget is under this present iniquitous economic system of debt and taxation.

Mr. Speaker, let me ask this. What is the purpose of an economic system? Has that ever been answered by any finance minister this country has ever had? What is the purpose of an economic system? I believe the purpose of an economic system is to allow men to enjoy the fruits of their labours. If that purpose were fully realized men could enjoy the production of the good things of the earth. If that purpose were realized, men could enjoy the good things that roll off the assembly lines or come from our factories. If that purpose were realized, men could enjoy the fruits of a modern scientific age, art, music, drama, and what have you. To obtain those things should be the purpose of an economic system. But the financial policy of this government is not designed for that purpose. The economic policies of this country are designed for everything else but the purpose for which an economic system exists. This government is more concerned with keeping this debt-creating, iniquitous financial system solvent and more concerned with the entrenchment of its vicious powers than it is over the welfare of the people. I do not think I could put it in any better words than those used by the leader of this party in the speech he gave a few days ago. As reported at page 2059 of Hansard, he said:

. . . the Minister of Finance is obliged—

"Is obliged", mark you.

—to administer a financial and economic policy that compels him to be a petty dictator, because it forces him to put a much higher value on statistical figures than upon human flesh and blood.

Let us see what has taken place over the years. Many speeches in this debate have touched on the apparent shrinkage in the value of the dollar. Might I emphasize my remarks by pointing out one place in which that shrinkage is extremely evident today. Some years ago the government floated loans. They encouraged the people to buy bonds. They told the people that those bonds would always be worth 100 cents on the dollar. Even though they might be valued today at 100 cents on the dollar, we all know that that 100 cents will not buy what they used to buy when the bonds were bought. What happened was that honest people bought bonds with honest dollars. Now those honest people are obliged to sell their bonds for dishonest dollars. A dollar is dishonest if it does not purchase the same amount of goods when it is spent as it does when it is earned. For instance, honest pensioners receiving pensions in those days now find their dollar depreciated in value. They cannot buy much more than half what they could buy in 1939.

Let me draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker, an illustration or two which will perhaps bring the matter a little bit more forcibly to the attention of the house. Suppose an industry should enter into an agreement with its employees for the institution of a pension scheme. Suppose the agreement was that, if the employees paid contributions into this pension scheme, they would receive $50 a month on reaching retirement age. Then suppose that when the workers reached pensionable age and were entitled to $50 a month, the industry should pay them only $25 a month. Suppose the industry should say, "that is what we are paying you; we do not care what the agreement said." What do you suppose would happen in a situation like that? The industry or company, as the case may be, could be brought to trial and severely penalized. Yet that is exactly what happens today, only it is the government, through its financial policy, which is the culprit.

Then again, suppose labour should contribute to a pension fund a million dollars a year, for instance. I may say that this is another illustration. Then suppose it was discovered at the end of five or ten years that the company had stolen or misappropriated half a million dollars a year. What do you suppose would happen? The officers of the company, as the case may be, could be jailed for robbery or embezzlement. The financial policies of this government have exactly the same effect as that which would follow if the officers of the aforementioned company had stolen half a million dollars. That is what happens today, only the government, by its financial policies, is the robber.

Let me use another illustration. I know that we all talk of dollar values and that sort of thing; but if the government does not know how to manage the financial affairs of the country, they are responsible for the depreciation in dollar value. Suppose there are two farmers—and this is a homely illustration—who are neighbours. Suppose one man gets a crop and the other man does not, and the man who does not get a crop goes over to his neighbour and says, "I have not any winter potatoes this year. Could you let me have a supply?" The farmer who had a crop would say, "Why yes, I will let you have your winter supply of potatoes. I will give you ten sacks. You can repay me the ten sacks some other time." His neighbour thanks him very much, and takes the ten sacks of potatoes. The next winter the farmer who did not have a crop the winter before now has a nice crop and he goes over to his neighbour and says, "Neighbour, I want to pay you back the potatoes that you gave me a year ago". Then suppose when they unload the potatoes, instead of finding ten sacks there in payment for the potatoes borrowed the winter before, he finds only five sacks of potatoes there. What would you say to that? What would the farmer say to that? I know it is just a homely illustration, but the fact of the matter is that the financial policy of this government has the very same effect. What would you say to a farmer like that?

An hon. Member: Throw him out.

Mr. Hansell: You would say, "Throw him out". You surely would. That is what the people are going to say one of these days about this government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hansell: I said that this was indeed an iniquitous system. It is an iniquitous system because it is based upon a false premise, namely, the assumption that the system in itself is self-liquidating whereas in fact it is not. I wish hon. members would understand this. I wish those in charge of the financial policy of this country would understand it. The only way money comes into existence and gets out into circulation is through direct creation by the banking system. Nobody disputes that. And that is done by way of loans. Every bank loan means an expansion of the credit of the country, and every loan means that new money comes into existence. But every loan must be repaid. And every loan is repayable at an interest. Since all money is a statistical creation, it is impossible to pay the interest unless the interest is also created. To assume otherwise is one of the false premises upon which the present financial policy of this country is built.

The minister assumes that the system is self-liquidating, and it is not. The fact of the matter is the minister might just as well say that we can pay back a $5 loan with $4. It just cannot be done. And then I read what the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance said in his speech the other day. I have not read his entire speech, but I have an analysis of it in the newspaper. Here are the headlines: "Budget tough but realistic, Sinclair's reply to opposition." How the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance could say that it is realistic to say that $4 will pay a debt of $5 I do not know. He must have to stretch his imagination a long, long way.

Mr. Lesage: Or stretch his dollars.

Mr. Hansell: My hon. friend says, "stretch his dollars." That is right. We surely have to stretch the Abbott dollar today. If we wanted to buy what it used to buy a few years ago we would have to stretch it a long long way. You talk about rubber money. If there was ever a day when there was any rubber money in existence it is the Abbott dollar of today.

About this false premise, Mr. Speaker; the Minister of Finance can be pictured as attempting to do something like this. This is a very homely illustration. Let us suppose that we have a thousand gallon tank filled with one thousand gallons of water. Beside it is an eleven hundred gallon empty tank. I can see the Minister of Finance on top of the thousand gallon tank.

Mr. Fraser: Don't let him fall in.

Mr. Hansell: He is pumping the water out of the thousand gallon tank into the eleven hundred gallon tank. He is pumping and pumping and pumping. At last he gets the thousand gallons of water out of the one tank into the other tank, and he still has space for another hundred gallons. He continues to pump and pump. At last he peels off his coat and then he pumps some more. That is the sort of thing that the parliamentary assistant to the minister calls being realistic. Yes, sir, he takes off his collar and his tie and he continues to pump. We ask him what he is doing, and he says: "I am trying to get another hundred gallons into that tank", but the tank from which he is pumping is already dry. We say: "But you are working on a false premise. You cannot do that." He says: "Oh; what do you know about it?" And he pumps again. He works himself into such perspiration that he peels off his trousers and shirt. I see him on top of that tank in his—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Hansell: I fancy the minister wears shorts.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Hansell: If the taxes continue some of the consumers of this country will have to go without them pretty soon. There he is on top of this tank pumping and pumping. Is that the sort of thing we call being realistic? We laugh at the illustration. I laughed at it myself when it popped into my mind, and then I saw about 265 M.P.'s all gathered around looking up at him, and I heard a few say: "Why, the guy has gone nuts." And there were about—I have forgotten the ratio —about 196 of these fellows saying: "You know, that is one of the greatest men in Canada." Others say: "He is nuts. He must be." The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) says he does not know it. That is all.

This afternoon I heard the speech of the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Macnaughton), who said that the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) should send some public relations men throughout this country to explain to the people why the painful process of collecting taxes is necessary to the just operation of our system. What we need, Mr. Speaker, is public relations men to go out and tell the people that the painful process is necessary to the operation of an unjust and iniquitous system. After seeing the Minister of Finance pumping, what we need are public relations men to go out and explain to the people how they are being pumped.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that some will answer and say, well, we are not so worried; you know, it is a funny thing but the Liberals are elected all the time. I know that up until now they have been. Perhaps it is because of the weakness of the opposition's appeal—I do not know. It may be that the people are not aware of what is happening. Simply because the Liberal government is elected it does not justify the error that exists in the present monetary system. I read an item which I clipped from somewhere, but I do not know where I got the little paragraph. But it is something that hon. members would do well to keep in mind; and this is what it says: "The greatest danger to democracy is the belief that there is virtue in error when multiplied by votes". I saw that in a clipping somewhere, but I do not remember where I got it. However, it is something worth retaining in one's mind.

Mr. Sinclair: Beauchesne?

Mr. Hansell: The greatest danger to democracy is the belief that there is virtue in error when multiplied by votes. And I say this in closing, that until the people are aroused as to the terrible consequences of such an iniquitous and devilish financial system, they will continue to suffer the economic stringencies imposed upon them against their will, a policy which will ultimately lead to destruction, war and world slavery.

(Translation):

Mr. Lomer Brisson (Saguenay): Mr. Speaker, this is the first time I have the honour of speaking in this house. I owe this high privilege to my electors who entrusted me with the pleasant duty of representing here Saguenay county, the most beautiful constituency in Canada. I might be tempted to let its attractions and wealth go unmentioned since they have become so outstanding on the American continent, but I cannot help review the physical and human forces which ushered in this glory and are destined to attend and support it, while dutifully restraining and assimilating it.

Who would have believed, twenty or even ten years ago, that this district would be the meeting point of some of the greatest financial wizards of the American continent? Who would have thought that as one of their main arguments in support of the St. Lawrence seaway, politicians would point out that it would facilitate the shipping of iron ore from this district to American steel mills? Who would have imagined that this land of Cain—so it was called in a recent national film board release—would become the hope of the Canadian nation and a source of anxiety to the opponents of democracy?

The Saguenay, it might seem, has just discovered where its destiny lies and has proclaimed, in the face of the world, its right to existence. Conditions in Canada have, so to speak, steeped it in profound humility for four centuries. But the longer its sufferings, the more shining will be its supremacy, provided however—let us not forget this—that all concerned co-operate to give it a crown worthy of its virtues.

Saguenay county, Mr. Speaker, is that huge area of 374,950 square miles, the boundaries of which are: to the south, the river and gulf of St. Lawrence, for a distance of approximately 700 miles from Tadoussac to Blanc Sablon; to the east, the strait of Belle Isle and Newfoundland's Labrador; to the north, Ungava bay and Hudson strait; to the west, Hudson bay and James bay. Its area is equal to more than half the area of the province of Quebec and to one tenth the total area of Canada. Its geological crust, one of the oldest in the world, assumes shapes at times rugged, at times varied, at times freakish, sometimes uniform, but always spectacular.

Its climate, which is some degrees lower than that of the Quebec district, up to Sept-Iles, gets gradually cooler as one progresses northward or eastward. According to the 1941 census, this territory had a population of 28,856 inhabitants. In the 1951 census this figure will probably be close to 40,000 and it is to be expected that it will double within a few years. May I then be permitted to express a wish. I would like the Canadian parliament, in giving the province of Quebec more adequate representation, to divide this constituency into two parts and to call the new division St. Laurent. This would serve a double purpose. It would recall two identities most dear to the hearts of all Canadians, the St. Lawrence river and the present Prime Minister, the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent.

From a historical point of view, Saguenay county has nothing to envy the rest of this country. In Bergeronnes, my native parish, there is a monument which recalls the Basque fishermen who came here in the thirteenth century to hunt sea-lions. Other relics corroborate this fact. The discoverer of Canada, Jacques Cartier, knew of the fact and Samuel de Champlain, the founder of Quebec, christened some rivers, as his chronicles indicate. Louis Jolliet held a seigniory there and today a search is going on for the burial-place of that distinguished resident. Moreover, in the early days of the French colony Tadoussac was the favourite meeting-place of the fur-traders. And the village of Tadoussac has preserved one of the oldest chapels in the country.

Saguenay county, Mr. Speaker, is also the county of water power. Nearly all its countless rivers have waterfalls which, if they were all developed, would produce enough power to supply the needs of American and Canadian industry. I shall mention only a few of the most important ones: Portneuf, Bersimis, Outarde, Manicouagan, Ste. Marguerite, Magpie, Romaine and St. Augustin.

It is also a fisherman's paradise. The privileged few who have had the opportunity of tasting the salmon of the Moisie river know what I mean. Trout is plentiful in its lakes, which are noteworthy for their number, their size and their colours. As for the St. Lawrence river, it supplies all the varieties of fish; caplin, smelt, halibut, cod, lobster, etc. The people east of Sept Iles, with the exception now of the people of Havre St. Pierre, depend almost exclusively on fishing for their livelihood. Unfortunately, fish have not been too plentiful these last few years and the market has been unsteady. In 1949-50 the federal Department of Fisheries understood the plight of these fishermen and provided a substantial grant for which I thank the authorities. However, these people should be entitled to unemployment insurance benefits.

Furthermore, my constituency is a hunter's paradise. Who is not familiar with the mink, the beaver and the moose of the north shore, with the deer which gambols so graciously on Anticosti island, with the sea-lion of La Tabatière where Mr. Louis T. Blais, of Quebec city, operates a plant for the extraction of seal oil, the only plant of its kind in the province of Quebec. Moreover a few hundred migratory birds live on these majestic islands which extend from the Mingan archipelago down to Blanc Sablon.

Besides these rivers, lakes, islands, hunters' and fishermen's paradise, there are deep and delightful bays with sandy beaches where trim villages are located. Tadoussac bay, where each summer the Canada Steamship Lines bring thousands of American tourists, is undoubtedly the best known, but there are others whose captivating charm lingers with the visitor. Seven Islands bay, for instance, one of the most beautiful, is large enough to harbour the whole British fleet. For all those reasons I have no hesitation in stating that Saguenay county is a tourists' paradise.

Saguenay is first of all a lumber country. Many of our most powerful lumber companies have set up mills and camps in that part of the country since the beginning of the last century, such as the Consolidated Paper, at Les Escoumains, Portneuf and Anticosti; the Donnacona Paper, at Sault au Mouton and Papinachois; the Anglo Pulp, at Forestville; the Quebec North Shore Paper, at Baie Comeau, Franquelin and Shelter Bay; the St. Regis Timber, at Godbout; the St. Lawrence, at Trinity Bay; the International Paper, at Pentecote; the Gulf Pulp, at Clarke City. Those companies cut more than a million cords of wood each winter and employ thousands of lumbermen. At Baie Comeau, the Quebec North Shore has one of the most modern newsprint plants in the world; this plant supplies the Chicago Tribune.

The Saguenay region is now dotted with mines. The Quebec Iron and Titanium Corporation located 200 million tons of titanium at Havre St. Pierre, near Allard lake, and built a 27 mile railroad to link the mine with Havre St. Pierre. As early as 1950, the company shipped 100,000 tons of ore to Sorel.

At Knob Lake, in northern Quebec, the Labrador Mining and Exploration Company located 281 million tons of iron ore. A 357-mile railroad will soon be built between the mine and the harbour of Sept Iles. The Iron Ore Company of Canada hopes to be able in 1954 to ship 2,500,000 tons of ore to the steel mills.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the constituency of Saguenay is the land of the hardy pioneer who often settles on land very hard to clear. There live resourceful farmers who make the best out of what is often poor soil, provident merchants who have to build up supplies so as to meet the demand for many months and who patiently wait for incoming mail. It is the country of the confident lumberjack, who is not afraid to leave his home for months; of the stout-hearted fisherman, who has to get up in the middle of night to gather what the sea feels like bestowing upon him; of the sturdy seaman who fearlessly faces raging waves miles from shore to carry materials and supplies. There we find the unselfish mother who courageously gives her country eight, ten, twelve or even fifteen sons and daughters; the indefatigable doctor who has to make the best of any means of transportation at his disposal so that the lives of his patients can be saved. It is the country where the missionary epic has been written—one should read about it in Father Garnier's book "From dog-sled to airplane"; it is also the country of the undaunted bishop who must summon up all the resources of his mind to build up an episcopal town out of thin air. The heroic apostolic vicar must face all kinds of perils to help his flock. Thousands of French-Canadians are happy to work there. It is the country of hundreds of Acadians who came from Magdalen islands and from centres in Acadia and who have kept their ancestral traditions, not to mention hundreds of people from Newfoundland who are a credit to their native country. Finally, it is a country where hospitality is proverbial, where nothing is to be denied to the first caller, where different races as well as capital and labour compete in a friendly manner, where hundreds of Indians live in fine reserves with all due respect to His Majesty.

I congratulate the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration for the splendid residential school he has provided for the new Indian reserve of Sept Iles. The school will be blessed next summer. I congratulate him also for the bill he has introduced in this house with a view to improving the conditions of the Indians. I earnestly hope that the recommendations of the Canadian episcopate regarding the education and hospitalization of those Indians will receive full consideration. I wonder also why we could not prohibit their consumption of liquor outside the reserves, since they are not allowed to use liquor within the reserves.

[Mr. Brisson.]

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, I should like to be able to convey to my English speaking colleagues some idea of the beauty and the resources of my constituency. But my knowledge of that language will not permit me to do so. For that reason I invite them to visit my constituency and I feel sure that their visit will substantiate all my claims in respect to it.

(Translation):

In that country of unrivalled beauty, why is it that tourists have barely gone farther than Tadoussac? Since fish and game are plentiful, why cannot hunters and fishermen earn their living? In that country of vast water power, why are there so few small or large industries, and in that forest land only one newsprint industry? Lumbermen flock to this district by thousands and work there six months at lumbering operations, but why will they not settle there permanently with their families? In that mining district why is it that, with the exception of Sept Iles and Havre St. Pierre, people hardly benefit from the present developments? The inhabitants are vigorous people, but the sick are deprived of the benefits of modern technical developments. Why are we still without a technical or high school, and why must we send our children outside so that they may get proper schooling? Why are trade relations so difficult with the outside world? How is it that there is hardly any increase in population? In a country where people are so hospitable and so generous, why is it that, in many cases, the inhabitants of neighbouring villages hardly know each other? Why are strangers reluctant to visit there? Why is it so difficult to organize a diocese with its proper institutions? Why is it so hard to foster a regional spirit and to develop all the social works and cultural attainments that flourish elsewhere? In short, why is this constituency, blessed as it is with unlimited potentialities and having a history four centuries old, still in the cradle as far as its real development is concerned? Obviously, there are many reasons, but among the main ones, and I say so without hesitation, is the isolation which, even in this, the twentieth century, prevails in that district. I feel I am expressing an opinion which is deeply rooted in the hearts and minds of the vast majority of my constituents. This frustration sometimes leads to exasperation. I cannot resist the temptation of quoting a few lines from a letter I received recently from an elector of my constituency:

The bridge is coming, but water flows under the bridge and beside it, at a time when one is sorry to be on the shore because we are so isolated. There is no road, no crossing . . . no way out.

Speaking from my own experience and from that of others, how much evidence I could bring in support of this argument since I am a bona fide son of that district and the representative of that constituency. Could it be then that the government of this country have failed to do their duty?

Has not the Department of Public Works been spending millions in the Saguenay district, in the past few years, for the construction and repair of wharves? This year, the amount set aside for the construction of wharves at Tadoussac, Sept Iles and Havre St. Pierre will stand at about $2 million. Does not the same department grant generous subsidies for the construction and repair of retaining walls in my constituency? I congratulate the member for Kamouraska (Mr. Masse) for having placed on the order paper a resolution, in order to call the government's attention to the erosion problem on both shores of the St. Lawrence. I support this resolution since it concerns the entire length of my constituency.

Has not the Department of Transport, for its part, built powerful and solid lighthouses to make navigation safer? I will mention but a few: Portneuf, Pointe des Monts, Ile aux Oeufs, Iles Cawee, Ile au Perroquet, Pointe Natashquan, Cape Whittle and Table Head. Does it not, moreover, generously subsidize the Clarke Steamship Company in order that it may operate an excellent freight and passenger service between Montreal, Quebec, and Blanc Sablon, as well as the Compagnie de navigation du Bas Saint-Laurent, which operates a similar service between Rimouski or Matane, Forestville and beyond to the intermediate ports, as far as Sept Iles? Does not the government, moreover, spend considerable sums of money to build modern airports, such as those in Baie Comeau and Sept Iles? Has not the Compagnie de téléphone du Gulfe Saint-Laurent, ever since it acquired the telegraph and telephone system in the Saguenay, also spent considerable sums of money in order to improve the service?

On the other hand, the Post Office Department is doing everything possible to ensure efficiency in transportation of mails on the north shore, by ship, plane, truck, dog-sled, etc.

But, hon. ministers, even though I thank you most sincerely for this assistance on behalf of my constituents, you know that it is insufficient. Every day I have occasion to ask you for a new wharf, a new retaining wall, a new airport, a new extension of the telephone system, a better steamship service or, more frequently, an improvement in the mail service. You can be sure that all those requests are legitimate and necessary, and I earnestly hope that they will be granted.

But, in my opinion, the real problem lies elsewhere. Better water and air transport between the north shore and the rest of the country will lessen the problem of its isolation, but it will not solve it. Because of its climate,—and the same goes for the rest of the province of Quebec—water and air transport will always be extraordinary means of transport. Let us admit it frankly, Saguenay county suffers from isolation in this twentieth century, simply because it has a road which is hardly practicable over a distance of 135 miles, from Tadoussac to Baie Comeau, and it has no railway.

Could it be that the provincial government has forgotten Saguenay county in its road-building program, when the claim is heard all the time that the Union Nationale has given everything to the province of Quebec! Will they do something about it soon, as they say they will? Will the revenues derived from the mining rights in New Quebec be enough or do they rely on their new tax on gasoline? Be that as it may, the problem is urgent and unfortunately the provincial government of the Union Nationale is slow in solving it. If that road had been built a few years ago, Saguenay county would have surely benefited more from the new developments in New Quebec.

Should I be talking about a second trans-Canada highway in the Saguenay when so far there has been no agreement between the federal government and the Quebec government as regards the original project? It might be a good thing if the federal government, the Quebec government and the Newfoundland government got together to consider the possibility of linking Newfoundland to the mainland, by building a dam over the strait of Belle Isle which separates Blanc Sablon and Newfoundland over a distance of only nine miles. Commander Beaugé has already mentioned this possibility. This project would also have a considerable and beneficial effect on the weather on both shores of the St. Lawrence, and would also constitute a valuable contribution to national defence in case of war. Let us not forget that during the two last wars, the enemy aimed their devastating projectiles at both shores of the St. Lawrence. Was that not the kind of protection the United States authorities had in mind when they built naval bases at Longue Pointe de Mingan, on the north shore, at Goose Bay, in Labrador, and at Gander in Newfoundland, during the last war?

What I really wish to ask the federal government tonight is to consider the possibility of building a railroad in the Saguenay region. The problem is directly under its jurisdiction. The member from Charlevoix (Mr. Maltais) is to be praised for placing a resolution to that effect on the order paper, early in the session. Railroads have helped the development of western provinces and strengthened our federal union. The Saguenay region could therefore also benefit in every respect from the construction of a railroad. At one time, many reasons could be given to prove the project impracticable: sparse population, lack of natural resources, technical difficulties, etc. Today such obstacles fade away in the light of the enormous development that is taking place in Ungava. If it is worth spending millions to build a railroad that will carry iron ore from Knob Lake to Sept-Iles over a distance about equal to the distance between Murray Bay and Sept-Iles; if, for the same reason, it is found advisable to complete the St. Lawrence seaway, is it not also worth spending a few millions to ensure the happiness and the well-being of the local pioneers and of the miners who will bring out this iron ore? Is it not true that the building of a railway is the only way to make available to the Canadian people the wealth and the wonders that are plentiful in that region, and would it not be the proper way to provide its population with a standard of living in keeping with our Canadian way of life? I leave this problem with the government because I am sure it will be considered with the greatest care as well as all other matters that make for a prosperous Canada.

Obviously this may not be the proper time to raise such an important question, because of the huge war expenditures with which we are faced at the present time. Under those circumstances, one cannot help regretting that constant threat of destruction we have to face when there are so many wonderful things to be accomplished at home.

It is then our duty to avert the danger by strengthening our internal peace so that we may pass it on to the world, for we must not forget that international peace, like personal and national peace, can be achieved only through great sacrifices. If our country enjoys peace today, it is because our fathers made common sacrifices to build confederation, because the two great races making up our country gave up a certain pettiness in order to work towards appropriate ideals; because both capital and labour agreed to mutual sacrifices in the general interest; because the government provides social security benefits, thereby returning to the less fortunate certain taxes levied on the citizens. Let this same spirit prevail in our attempts to solve also the constitutional problems facing the ten provincial governments and the federal government, or in the closer co-operation of the two elements of our country if we wish to be soon unfettered and free. Instead of overstressing racialism and national sovereignty, nations should make greater efforts to practise charity and universal brotherhood, if salvation and not destruction of our civilization is to be attained. The Colombo plan surely came out of that principle; let us warmly congratulate the Canadian government for the generous contribution it contemplates.

In conclusion, I will express two wishes: that our government should send an ambassador to the source of peace, the Vatican, and that our very distinguished Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Hon. Lester Pearson, should continue to work for peace at the United Nations.

Mr. Leon Balcer (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, during the present budget debate, we have heard many references to inflation and the high cost of living. However, I feel I must deal again with the subject tonight; one need only talk for a few minutes with the man in the street or the Canadian housewife to understand readily that this is a most acute national problem.

Newspaper headings may deal with important international events, such as the war in Korea, the disagreement between Truman and MacArthur, or between Attlee and Bevan, but in every Canadian home, the main subject remains the same: How to keep on feeding, clothing and housing a family on the daily earnings, since the dollar is now worth no more than fifty cents.

The Canadian taxpayer cannot but turn to the government, which is, to a large extent, responsible for the situation.

It might be said that there is inflation elsewhere and that all democracies have to face it. But inaction on the part of others does not justify the indolence which has characterized the government's approach to this problem.

As a matter of fact, the government took no worthwhile steps to prevent this increase in the cost of living and, now that the index has gone beyond 179·7, not only does the government fail to act in order to curb the rising trend but it adds more or less justified taxes to the already heavy burden of the taxpayer.

I said that the government made no serious effort to curb inflation. As an example of that inaction, I shall only say that since the war in Korea, the government's non-essential spending has reached extraordinary proportions. May I once again quote figures which other members of my party have already mentioned in the house? For instance, travelling and transportation expenses amounted to $4,700,000 in 1939 but in 1949-50 they totalled $23 million; then, publicity for the different departments cost $624,000 in 1939 but today it comes to $6,828,000.

It is obvious that the government, while constantly asking the people to economize and to stop spending, does everything but practise what it preaches.

It must be admitted, it is true, that recently the Post Office Department announced a big economy drive. But for the sake of economy people are being deprived of an essential service. It was decided to limit mail deliveries, a self-supporting service. It is not so much an economy as a reduction in the efficiency of a service. The only savings this government was able to make, on a budget of more than $3½ billion, was to reduce the efficiency of a service without reducing its cost to the taxpayer. Some postmen will lose their livelihood and those who keep their jobs will work longer hours and carry heavier loads.

It must be admitted that as an economy measure, this formula is a bit shabby.

I said a moment ago that the government obstinately refuses to take the necessary and practical means to stop this steady increase in prices.

During the last few months, the cost of living index has gone up at a really alarming rate. As a matter of fact, whereas it had risen by 3 points from January to April 1950, it rose by 7·2 points from January to March 1951, or one month less.

Who can remain indifferent to such a state of affairs? Certainly not the government. I blame it for not imposing price controls where they would bring down prices or, at least, stabilize them to some extent.

Of course price controls would not solve the whole problem. Inflation will not disappear overnight, but we should not hesitate to impose them if they could alleviate this serious situation to any extent.

We are told that most people do not like to see their economy directed by a bureaucracy. That is quite possible, but people are ready for that sacrifice. The unusual number of cards requesting price control which every member here has received in his mail for several weeks is evidence of that fact. Moreover the big labour unions of this country have asked the cabinet to bring in controls, but the government has ignored those representations.

Another means, and a very specific one, which the government should not hesitate to take in order to check inflation would be to put an embargo on the export of beef to the United States. The price of meat, beef especially, has reached a record level in the last few months and the export of beef to our neighbours to the south is one of the main factors of that runaway rise.

That kind of export can only send our prices to a level higher than the one we can afford, for it should not be forgotten that the average wage rate is considerably lower here than in the United States. As long as our beef will sell here at the price paid by our neighbours to the south, our workers will have to do without beef. Our production of milk and butter being reduced as a consequence, the price of these products will reach prohibitive levels. It is astounding to think that in a country such as ours butter sold for 85 cents a pound a few weeks ago.

In that regard may I urge the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to see to it that his department set a minimum price of butter of at least 62 cents, so that there will not be a shortage next year as happened last month. In fact, by setting the floor price of butter at a lower level than 62 cents, the government discourages the dairying industry and so paves the way for the same shortage which caused the price to reach 85 cents.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I doubt very much that the new budget will have any other effect than to increase inflation. Undoubtedly the defence of our country requires considerable sums of money, but we must not forget that if our economy is ruined by inflation, we shall be at the mercy of our enemy. Before going out to fight for democracy we must make sure that it is established on a durable basis in our country.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) must necessarily balance the budget and of course he must raise the money required for the defence of our country. These last few years, the government announced outstanding surpluses; it must not be forgotten however that in each case they were due to increased revenues and not to reduced expenses.

It is much more difficult to go in for rigid economy when there is a surplus. Everybody knows that as one's income grows, it becomes practically impossible to refrain from spending.

Moreover, those excess revenues will eventually lead the government into committing itself to extraordinary and unforeseen expenditures. Therefore, I believe that the government should do its best to refrain from helping inflation, by avoiding such expenditures, as well as any taxes which are not strictly required to balance the budget, for taxation bears more heavily on the small taxpayer. It is well to remember that the Canadian dollar today is worth 50 cents, or only half as much as in 1939. It is true that production and salaries have increased, but one must not overlook the problems which face the head of a family who earns, for example, as does the average worker in my county, a little over $40 a week, and who wants to give his children not luxuries, but merely milk, at 18 cents a quart, meat at $1.00 a pound, not to mention rent, shoes, clothing and education.

Even if the head of a family had dreamed of buying his wife a washing machine by saving his full salary for five weeks, his dream would have quickly vanished with the new tax levied on those articles.

Nobody would complain if luxury items were the first to be taxed. Unfortunately the Minister of Finance has a strange notion of luxuries. I think he should ask the Canadian housewife who spends a whole morning cooking for the family, or doing the week's laundry in her washing machine, if these are luxury articles.

In view of the already high prices asked for such things as refrigerators, stoves and washing machines, we cannot help feeling that the new tax on those items is far too heavy.

[Mr. Balcer.]

Finally, I must protest against the fact that the government apparently wishes to protect the liquor industry. If a commodity can indeed be classed as a luxury it is that one. Experience has shown that despite all increases in the price of liquor, sales have boomed. Besides, people were expecting a tax on liquor. Indeed on the eve of the budget liquor stores were stormed by people anxious to stock up. We all know that fancy prices are hardly a deterrent to people who want their liquor.

At all events, a tax should have been levied and the minister's explanations in that connection are both lame and obscure.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I doubt very much whether the budget, and in fact the whole government program, can help curb inflation, which the Canadian people have the right to expect and are earnestly requesting. I sincerely hope that the house will support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), as I propose to do.

(Text):

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before the question is put to the house I wish to make a few remarks, although it is not my intention now to make remarks that I shall make later on the main motion. As to this amendment, I wish to indicate that I believe its purpose is appropriate in view of the general effect of the budget that has been presented. It has already been said on a number of occasions—and I do not intend to repeat those arguments at the moment—that this budget bears most heavily upon those who are least able to pay any added taxes at this time. Instead of attempting to encourage saving or to ease the pressure on those who are already finding it extremely difficult to meet the greatly increased cost of living, the taxes have been so imposed that they will bear most heavily upon pensioners, upon those on smaller fixed incomes and generally upon those with the least ability to pay. That is particularly true of the sales tax which has been increased by 25 per cent of the amount previously levied. It will bear heavily on those who are already finding prices much too high on the things they need for their daily life.

Then, for reasons which have not been explained satisfactorily at any time since this budget was introduced, taxes have been imposed upon things that can only be regarded as necessities, such as stoves, refrigerators and things of that sort which today we are encouraging people to buy because of the increased rural as well as urban electrification throughout the whole of Canada. In addition to that, there is the fact that automobiles can no longer be regarded as a luxury by many of our people. In many communities today it would be impossible to carry on the ordinary occupations of the people unless many of them had automobiles in which to get to work. As a number of hon. members will know, as a result of the suddenly increased activities of defence plants many workers are driving fifteen, twenty and twenty-five miles a day to work, and some of them more. To them the automobile is a necessity. If, therefore, there were to be increases in taxes, those increases should have indicated some recognition of the difference between an automobile that is a utility, an automobile that will serve the purpose of being a conveyance to those who must have it for that purpose, and an automobile that can properly be regarded as a luxury. Therefore the whole taxing scale should have had some recognition of that fact. Go right through the budget and the same is true. There is no recognition of the fact that today the burden of the increased cost of living is bearing most heavily on those on smaller incomes, and particularly those on fixed incomes or on pensions. For that reason the surtax should not bear as heavily on those who will have the greatest difficulty in meeting those other obligations. For that reason I believe it is appropriate that the surtax should start at a higher level than that indicated in the budget. For that reason I propose to support the subamendment.

(Translation):

Mr. Charles Cannon (Iles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this budget debate, I wish, first of all, to congratulate the Minister of Finance on his excellent work.

His budget distributes with fairness to all taxpayers the heavy burden of taxation. Of course, taxes and especially new taxes are never popular. Most people realize, however, that these taxes are rendered necessary by our rearmament. In the present international situation, the expenses to be made in this connection are the price we must pay for our freedom, for the preservation of peace and of our way of living.

In general, the budget was well received by the people. Having received no protest from my constituents in this regard, I am inclined to think it has met with their approval. On the whole, the criticisms levelled against it are unjustified. The budget, it is said, is not based on the taxpayer's ability to pay. Criticisms in this connection are directed mainly against the increased income and sales taxes. The increase in income tax, as of July 1, being 20 per cent of the present tax, is certainly based on the individual's capacity to pay. Those who, up to now, have only paid a small tax, will now pay a slightly higher tax and those who were paying a heavy tax, will have to pay even more. The new tax certainly takes into account the people's capacity to pay, since it is based on the present tax, which in turn is calculated on the taxable income after deduction of all personal exemptions to which the taxpayer is entitled.

The government is also being blamed for increasing the sales tax. It has been said that it strikes too heavily at the low income group. As stated by the Minister of Finance in his remarkable speech, the sales tax does not apply to all necessities of life. There are numerous exemptions. Ninety-five per cent of foodstuffs are exempt. All fuels and building materials are free from tax. I believe it can be said that two-thirds of the average Canadian family's expenses are not affected by the sales tax. According to a recent survey made among people earning less than $3,000, only one-third of the total revenue is spent on goods subject to the sales tax. It is therefore incorrect to say that the sales tax is unfair and backward.

Our opponents object to the 15 per cent tax on gas and electric stoves, as well as on mechanical refrigerators and washing machines. They feel sorry for young married couples who will have to pay more for these articles. I think that their sympathy is out of place. These are luxury articles and under present conditions I believe the government did well in taxing them. The percentage of newly married couples who bought these articles, even before the new taxes, was comparatively low. As far as I am concerned, I had been married several years before I could afford the luxury of an electric stove and refrigerator; in rural districts and especially in my constituency of Iles-de-la-Madeleine, these articles are rather scarce.

Opposition members also claim that corporation taxes are too low. Right now, the two taxes on corporation profits, the federal tax and the provincial tax, absorb more than 50 per cent, 52·6 per cent to be exact, of a corporation's net profits. If the tax were to be increased further, its effect would be to discourage the investment of foreign capital in our province, a capital we badly need to develop our natural resources. The ones to suffer would be the worker and the farmer.

Indeed, if new industries are not established, if the existing industries are not expanded, that will mean so many new jobs that will not be created, so many unemployed who will not find employment and, with the resulting drop in the worker's purchasing power, the farmer will inevitably be affected since the price of agricultural products will necessarily have to drop. There are, therefore, as regards corporation taxes, certain limits which it would be dangerous to exceed.

These taxes, as I indicated earlier, are not popular. In proposing them the government has had to choose the least of many evils. The house knows, Mr. Speaker, that no government likes to impose new taxes. It is an unpleasant duty which they have to perform and which they do not relish any more than do the taxpayers who have to pay, among whom may be found, let us not forget that, the ministers themselves who impose these charges.

This duty is thrust upon them by the international situation and by the fact that free peoples find themselves obliged, much against their will, to arm themselves and to combine these armaments in order to resist communist aggression which, ever since 1945, when we thought the war had ended, has not ceased to attack and enslave free people who were in no condition to defend themselves. This went on until the United Nations called a halt to it by going to the defence of Korea.

People who are sincere and as well informed as are the members of this house know that our own government, as well as those of our democratic allies of the second world war, had but one desire: to put an end to the armaments race, to enjoy a long period of peace, to reduce taxes and to develop our resources for the welfare and the prosperity of our people. Our government gave evidence of its peaceful intentions when it demobilized as soon as possible and sold the war material, the equipment and even the buildings it thought were no longer needed for national defence.

Therefore I regret, Mr. Speaker, that during this debate the government should have been taken to task for selling war material it thought would no longer be required. I am sorry too that speeches were made in this house to extol peace—as if we were not all in favour of peace—with the cynical suggestion that people are willing to pay taxes for peace activities but not for war purposes.

I mention this in passing, Mr. Speaker, because my impression is that talking like that in this house is an easy way of becoming popular with those who do not consider the situation fully, but it certainly does not help the people to accept the necessary sacrifices which we must absolutely impose upon ourselves to save from communism our liberties, our institutions and even our religion. Let us not forget how the Roman Catholic religion was persecuted in the countries behind the iron curtain. We must be realists and understand that unfortunately it is not by speaking in praise of peace that we will prevent the communists from attacking us.

Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of Finance presented his budget he told us he had two main objectives: the preservation of peace and the control of inflation. He told us about the steps to be taken to achieve this last objective, but he also said that the government was not ready at this time to set up price controls.

The Prime Minister, our respected leader, has explained the motives upon which the government based its decision. I have listened with great interest to these explanations. However, I feel I must call the attention of the government and of the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) in particular to the serious effects of this decision not to impose controls, however sound it may have been, on the fishermen who constitute 85 per cent of the population of my constituency.

The cost of living has gone up in the Magdalen islands too, even more than elsewhere because of the higher cost of air or sea transport, the only way the islands can be supplied with many of the necessities of life. Fishing tackle, boats, engines, nets, fishing gear, gas and motor oil, are all a great deal more expensive. On the other hand, the price of fish is coming down and fishermen are in a difficult and very special situation.

True, the cost of living has gone up throughout the country, but for most Canadians higher costs have been at least partly offset by wage increases or, in the case of farmers, by higher prices for their products. But not so for the fishermen of the Magdalen islands. The high cost of living, combined with low prices for their fish, is almost unbearable for them and the oldest industry in Canada is in a most critical condition as a result.

Petitions signed by almost all fishermen on the islands have been sent to both the federal and provincial ministers of fisheries and their deputies. The preamble of those petitions is identical. I shall read it to the house, because it indicates the state of mind of the petitioners.

Whereas for the last few years and especially since 1945 the fishermen's condition has become so critical that their industry is expected to collapse from one season to the other. Every year an increasing number of fishermen quit their trade to earn a better living elsewhere. The fisherman cannot earn a living when his costs are greater than his income. This is very often the case since the cost of living has been increasing and the price of fish has had a tendency to decline;

Whereas the cost of living has increased at a more alarming rate here than elsewhere because of transportation charges which have doubled and even tripled during the last decade;

Whereas fishing gear has become a luxury because of its exorbitant price, making it impossible for fishermen to renew their tackle, so much so that they are now obliged to give up their trade or to operate at a loss;

In the islands, three types of fishing make up the main and practically only industry of the ten thousand inhabitants: lobster fishing, mackerel fishing and cod fishing. Since the end of the war, the price of the gear necessary for these types of fishing has doubled and even tripled, whilst the price of fish has declined instead of going up with the rest. Thus a lobster cage or trap which formerly sold for $1.25 now costs $2.75. A mackerel net has increased from $18 to $45 and the cod trawl has doubled in price. Everything used for fishing, from rubber clothing to gasoline, has greatly increased, while the price of fish has decreased as follows: lobster, 3 cents per pound; cod has gone down to about 2¼ cents a pound and mackerel in the same proportion;

Whereas the lack of balance caused by the rising prices of fishing gear and the decrease in the price of fish greatly affect the fisherman's budget and also the economy of all the islands;

Whereas the fishing trade, while the oldest of the country, is still the least remunerative;

And whereas the fisherman believes his trade important enough to warrant the authorities' interest so that he may enjoy a living standard comparable to that of other Canadians . . .

The fishermen then request from the provincial government insurance on fishing gear and a subsidy on fishing boats.

As for the subsidy for fishing craft, the federal government's order in council P.C. 1919, dated May 22, 1947, empowers the Minister of Fisheries to pay fishermen subsidies of $165 per ton for the building of fishing craft not less than 55 feet long. This order in council authorizes the payment of these subsidies for the fishermen's benefit through fishermen's loan boards to be set up by the provinces.

As there are, as yet, no such boards in the province of Quebec, our fishermen cannot benefit from these loans. I have already mentioned this matter in the house when I suggested, in my speech of September 28, 1949, which is reported at page 325 of Hansard, that the provincial government set up the required organization so that the fishermen of the Magdalen islands might benefit from these subsidies.

I am happy to say that following correspondence and interviews between the federal and provincial ministers of fisheries, the federal government is now considering an amendment to the order in council so as to reduce to 45 feet the length of fishing craft eligible for the subsidies; this would meet with the views of the Quebec provincial government, which is in favour of building boats shorter than 55 feet, the length provided. I am also told that the government of the province of Quebec will establish the necessary organization so that these federal subsidies may be paid to the fishermen of Quebec province, as they are already paid to those of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia.

The building of larger ships would be a great boon to the fishermen of Quebec province in general and to those of Magdalen islands in particular. With such ships, fishermen could go further offshore, make longer trips and bring in larger hauls. I am sure that is the best solution to the fishermen's difficulties. These changes, when they come, will be a fine example of federal-provincial co-operation.

The brief presented by the fishermen to the federal government requests:

(1) a support or floor price in line with the present cost of living;

(2) price controls on essential fishing gear and

(3) extension of unemployment insurance to fishermen.

Let us study these requests one by one.

As far as price support is concerned, there is a federal organization known as the fisheries prices support board. I have had several interviews with this board and with its technical adviser.

In order to stabilize the price of fish, the board is authorized to fix a floor price. If fish is sold at a lower price, the board is empowered to pay the fisherman the difference between the floor price and the actual selling price.

I have had long interviews with the Minister of Fisheries as well as with the deputy minister and their technical advisers. I take this opportunity to thank them for the time and attention they have been so kind as to give the problems of my constituents.

There would of course be two ways of fixing a floor price, either before or after the fishing season.

I asked, Mr. Speaker, that the price be set before the beginning of the fishing season. In other words let the government guarantee the fishermen a certain minimum price fixed in advance. After the matter was thoroughly discussed and the effects of such a policy carefully considered, I was told that if the government fixed a minimum price and guaranteed to pay the difference, if the buyers paid less than that price, the effect would be to disorganize the fish market. In fact, the buyer would naturally be inclined to pay a very low price and the fishermen would not have much to gain in asking more, for both would know that the government would pay the difference. It would be practically impossible for the government to protect itself against the buyers in such a case.

Furthermore in setting up a guaranteed minimum price before the marketing season the government would hinder the marketing of fish products on the ultimate markets. In fact, these buyers knowing that the government would pay a subsidy to the fishermen to compensate them would also be tempted to pay less for the products offered to them. Such subsidies would also cause us difficulties with many countries with which we have trade agreements. The paying of subsidies would stop the exporting of our fish to many of those countries, particularly the United States, because subsidized commodities are subject to embargo and high duties.

I therefore think it would not be practical to set up in advance a minimum price for fish.

The only solution would therefore be for the prices support board to make a payment to the fishermen at the end of the season if the prices received were not sufficient to ensure them an adequate return.

Obviously, Mr. Speaker, the federal government cannot make rules for the special use of the Magdalen islands. If the fisheries prices support board sets a minimum price for cod, mackerel, lobster, and so on, the price applies to all Canada, Newfoundland included. Before establishing a price, the government has to know the size of the catch in Newfoundland and the price it has fetched. The government knows the price that applied in 1950 to all parts of the country with the exception of Newfoundland where complete statistics on the catch and on the prices have never been kept. The fisheries prices support board is now making a survey of the situation in Newfoundland. As soon as the government has the figures concerning the amount of fish caught in Newfoundland and the prices which prevailed, it will decide upon the advisability of fixing a minimum price for 1950, and, if applicable, will determine the amount.

I urgently request the Minister of Fisheries to seriously consider the situation in which the fishermen in my riding find themselves, when the question of support prices for fish comes up for discussion.

According to the information I have, the fish prices support board has not yet exercised its powers to set floor prices for fish and to make payments to fishermen. I respectfully suggest to the minister that the time has come for the board to exercise those powers.

I hope, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that the survey which is now being made in Newfoundland by this government will warrant setting a floor price for fish and that the first request of the fishermen will be granted. If the price paid in Newfoundland happens to be higher than that paid in the Magdalen islands, let the former be set as the floor price, and let the difference be paid to the islands fishermen.

The second request in the brief of the fishermen deals with price controls on fishing gear. It is unfortunately impossible to put a ceiling on prices of fishing gear without imposing general price controls, and, we all know, the government is not yet ready to take this step.

However, the budget does contain provisions to help the fishing industry. One will permit free entry of diesel engines for ships used exclusively in commercial fishing. The other will enlarge the scope of provisions already exempting from customs duties fishing nets and fishing lines, so that they will cover nets or lines manufactured from any kind of material.

The dominion government is also doing its share in keeping the price of fishing gear as low as possible, by exempting it from the sales tax.

In its issue of April 10 last, Le Devoir published interesting figures showing the difference between the price of fishing gear in 1944 and 1950.

I have checked the list and found that the following items are exempt from tax: rope, lath for lobster cribs, lumber for boats, hand fishing lines, fish nets, barrels used for the salting of fish and motors used in fishing boats.

Among articles used solely by fishermen, only rubber boots and clothing as well as motor oil and gas are subject to the sales tax. I will make representations in order to have those articles exempted from the tax.

Thirdly, fishermen request unemployment insurance benefits. As early as last spring, one year ago, I made representations to the unemployment insurance commission and the Department of Labour in order to bring fishermen under the act. The unemployment insurance commission began a nation-wide survey to secure the necessary information and data before reporting on this request. I understand that the report is in preparation and hope that the government will be able to include fishermen in the benefits of this legislation which has already been extended to lumberjacks.

If it is not possible to apply it immediately to fishermen who are not employed on a salary basis, I suggest that it be extended at least to salaried fishermen's help. That would be a first step in the right direction.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the government and in particular the Minister of Fisheries will take these requests into earnest consideration.

I felt it was my duty . . .

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, in extending—

Mr. Speaker: Order. On a point of order, the leader of the opposition.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, there has been an indication of the willingness of the house to extend time for the hon. member, but I think we should know how many more pages he is going to read before we extend it any further.

Mr. Cannon: I have just a few lines left.

Mr. Drew: The hon. member has read seven pages since he indicated he was about finished. I think we should know how many more he is going to read.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): How many more do you want?

(Translation):

Mr. Cannon: I would like to tell the leader of the opposition that I have finished. I felt it was my duty to state these requests during the debate on the budget, since they express the will and the desires of almost all my constituents.

(Text):

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall continue this debate, and after the vote we shall take up the budget resolutions.

It being ten minutes after eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS SECURITIES TRUST

Mr. Balcom:

1. Of the $1,327,122,892.41 assets, as shown in annual report of the Canadian National Railways security trust, what is the estimated present market value?

2. What amounts, in the way of expenditures, if any, are charged against this trust fund?

3. What is the nature of the charges?

4. What amount is paid to the firm of George A. Touche & Company, accountants, for services rendered in connection with this fund?

Mr. Benidickson: The Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. The amount represents prior indebtedness to government by system companies and has no market value.

2. Nil.

3. See answer to No. 2.

4. The Canadian National Railways securities trust is a corporation comprised within the Canadian National railway company, and the audit of the national system includes the securities trust.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. How many cases of alleged domestic combination in restraint of trade have been investigated under the Combines Investigation Act since the first day of January, 1950?

2. (a) Have any reports of investigations under the said act been made by the combines commissioner to the Minister of Justice since the first day of January, 1950; (b) If so, respecting what commodities?

3. How many complaints of alleged injurious restraints of trade have been received by the combines investigation branch during the said period?

4. What prosecutions, if any, arising out of any investigations that have taken place since the first day of January, 1950, have been initiated or launched?

5. Have any actions been taken in the said period by the Minister of Justice or the combines investigation branch in the exchequer court to impeach any patents? If so, how many of such actions have been taken, and against whom?

Mr. Garson:

1. (a) Inquiries into two industries, commenced prior to January, 1950, have been continued and are in advanced stages. Of these, one comprises six distinct and major branches and the other comprises two distinct and major branches.

(b) In two additional cases commenced after January, 1950, preliminary reports were made to the minister to the effect that the evidence obtainable did not definitely indicate a combine but the situations would be kept under surveillance. One of these related to the sale of bread in a maritime province, and the subject of the other cannot be disclosed without danger of prejudice to further inquiry.

(c) In one additional case commenced after January, 1950, extensive hearings were held and an interim report is under preparation. The subject matter cannot be disclosed for reasons similar to those above mentioned.

(d) In addition to the foregoing, there are a large number of matters commenced after January, 1950, in various preliminary stages of inquiry, but it is not known at their present stages which or how many of them will lead to formal investigation.

2. (a) Answered by No. 1; (b) answered by No. 1.

3. Seventy-five, none of which was a formal application under section 11 of the act. Some such complaints were bare assertions of the existence of a combine, and many others indicated no substantial evidence. These complaints were all examined, and, where the evidence submitted or obtained justified, they have been carried into various stages of inquiry or investigation. In addition to these seventy-five cases, trade in many other commodities, in respect of which no complaints were received, was examined upon the initiative of the commissioner.

4. No prosecutions have been initiated or launched with respect to matters arising out of inquiries subsequent to January 1, 1950. Prosecutions since January 1, 1950, have been taken with respect to an alleged combine in the distribution and sale of flat glass in Ontario and Quebec; with respect to an alleged combine in the bread-baking industry in Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, and with respect to an alleged combine in the manufacture, distribution and sale of wooden matches throughout Canada. These prosecutions arose out of investigations completed prior to January 1, 1950.

5. No. Two actions commenced prior to January 1, 1950, are now on appeal in the Supreme Court of Canada.

STEAMSHIP SERVICES—BRITISH COLUMBIA COASTAL WATERS

Mr. Pearkes:

1. What companies are engaged in the carriage of freight and/or passengers in the coastal waters of British Columbia?

2. Which of these companies operating in the coastal waters of British Columbia receives subsidies from the federal government?

3. What are the amounts of the subsidies paid to the respective companies?

[Mr. Garson.]

4. What is the gross revenue of the companies in receipt of these subsidies?

Mr. Benidickson:

1. No complete official records are available. Many of these companies operate under provincial charters.

2. (a) The Canadian Pacific Railway, for the operation of the Victoria and west coast-Vancouver island service.

(b) Union Steamships Limited, for the operation of services between Vancouver, northern British Columbia ports and Queen Charlotte islands.

3. (a) $100,000 per annum; (b) $345,000 per annum.

4. It is not the policy to disclose financial information which is provided confidentially by companies operating subsidized services.

GOVERNMENT ANNUITIES

Mr. Catherwood:

What is the total amount of government annuities purchased by the people of Canada during the years 1949 and 1950?

Mr. Gregg:

Amount of annuity contracted for:

Calendar Year	Individual Contracts	Group Registration Certificates
1949	$3,956,357.00	15,234 *
1950	3,807,253.00	12,965 *

* These figures represent the number of new employees registered under group contracts during each of the calendar years 1949 and 1950. The amount of annuity which will ultimately be purchased by these employees cannot be determined at this time, since it depends on length of service with their company, age, and amount contributed on their behalf during the period of employment. The average amount of annuity already being paid under group contracts is approximately $500.

Mr. Lesage: Return tabled.

RAILWAYS

ALLOCATION OF BOX CARS FOR MOVEMENT OF WESTERN GRAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport, on a matter which has been up before. Today I received several strong representations from several towns in Saskatchewan, asking whether the minister is in a position to say what has been done since he last reported on the question of the securing of necessary cars to move the wet and damp wheat. The situation is very serious in certain places where the elevators are congested and marketing is at a standstill.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): The hon. gentleman was good enough to advise me that he would ask this question, and I have prepared a statement which I think covers the position as of today.

On April 9, when I placed on Hansard a summary of the situation as it was then, I stated that the last date for which data were available was April 6, and that indicated an unfavourable balance to Canadian lines of 10,805 box cars. On April 13 there were 18,129 United States box cars in Canada and 28,620 Canadian box cars in the United States, leaving an unfavourable balance of 10,491, or a reduction of some 300 cars from the previous report. One week later, on April 20, there were in Canada 18,882 United States cars, while Canadian cars in the United States had dropped to a total of 26,315, leaving an unfavourable balance of only 7,433. This indicates, therefore, that between the height of the unfavourable balance of 18,000 in early March to April 20 there has been an improvement of some 11,000 cars.

As to the problem of the movement of grain in western Canada, the committee to which I referred during the discussion of my estimates held a meeting early this week, and it gave to the situation full consideration. I was advised this morning by the deputy minister of transport that grain is moving rapidly from the head of the lakes to eastern Canada, and that at the end of this month it is expected that 27 million bushels of grain will have moved. In other words, we shall be ahead of shipments by that amount over last year, in that at this time last year navigation had not yet opened.

The situation in Vancouver is not quite as favourable as the chairman of the wheat board would like to see it, and that is without doubt the most pressing problem at the moment. We have, however, the assurance from our two major railways that an improvement should take place within the next few days, as more and more box cars are being diverted to grain traffic. From 350 to 400 empty box cars are moving west from the east each day, and that will continue until the full quota necessary to move the wheat crop is on western lines. My last information indicates that there are nearly 45,000 box cars in western Canada at the present time, which is still some 4,000 less than last year. Some three weeks ago, however, the figure stood at 9,000 cars less than last year.

The box car shortage in the western United States has eased up considerably, and Canadian cars will now return directly to western Canada. This will also contribute to improving the situation generally and relieve the railways of a long haul in the movement of empty cars from eastern Canada.

Consideration is also being given by the railways and the wheat board to the operation, if necessary, of special trains on branch lines when there is sufficient traffic to warrant their operation. In any event, I can assure the house that every aspect of the problem is being carefully looked into by the committee to which I referred, and any measure which will help to improve the utilization of box cars in western Canada will be taken.

Mr. Argue: May I ask a supplementary question? Is it the opinion of the minister, on the basis of the information he has, that the situation will improve to the extent that all of the 1950 crop may be moved off the farms?

Mr. Chevrier: The report which I have made indicates that a great deal of progress has been made, and beyond that I would go no further.

Mr. Fraser: I should like to ask the Minister of Transport a question. In order to keep this grain moving by water, what steps are being taken to eliminate the constant delays on the Lachine canal such as we have had since the canal opened this season? Ships were tied up—

Mr. Chevrier: Any repairs which have been made to the locks on the Lachine canal would not in any way impede the movement of the 27 million bushels of wheat to which I referred a moment ago.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Fraser: A number of ships were held up for many hours this month in the Lachine canal owing to power break-down. I should like an answer.

Mr. St. Laurent: You are not asking a question; you are making a statement.

FLOOD CONDITIONS

TORONTO ISLAND—INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I direct a question to the Minister of Public Works? In view of the disastrous flooding and erosion at Toronto island and the federal interest in Toronto harbour, will the Minister of Public Works indicate what assistance the government is prepared to render there to withstand the onslaught of high water eroding the shore?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): This is the first time that I have heard of the situation in Toronto. Be assured that I will look into it and do my best for that grand city.

Mr. Graydon: You had better come down this week end.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

NEWSPRINT INDUSTRY—EFFECT OF GOVERNMENT CONTROL ON POWER OF INQUIRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I direct a question to the Minister of Justice? Will the placing of newsprint under government control, as announced a few days ago by the Department of Defence Production, affect in any way the right of the combines investigation commissioner to inquire into that industry if he wishes to do so?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): My hon. friend has given me no notice of this question; therefore I had better take it as notice and bring down an answer tomorrow.

CATTLE

COMPENSATION FOR T.B. REACTORS

Mr. Robert McCubbin (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Agriculture): Yesterday, the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Cardiff) asked the Minister of Agriculture a question which I should like to answer at this time. The question is:

I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture a question with regard to the cattle in my district that have reacted to the tuberculin test. The farmers have not yet been paid for the animals that have been condemned. It is now six months or more since the test was made. Many of the farmers had to replace the cattle and borrow the money to do it. Why has this money not been available?

[Mr. Chevrier.]

The answer to this question, Mr. Speaker, is that all claims that have complied with departmental regulations have been paid. There was a short delay during the month of March, as the amount of money that was in the estimates to pay for t.b. reactors ran out along about the end of February, and until the supplementary estimates were passed at the end of March, no money was available during that month. But all these cheques went out the first part of April, so that the money will be in the farmers' hands long before now. There are still some sixty-five claims in the county of Huron that have not been paid, but as soon as they comply with the regulations they will be paid.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

VISITORS IN GALLERY—STUDENTS OF LACHINE HIGH SCHOOL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Edgar Leduc (Jacques Cartier): May I be permitted to inform the house that we have seated in the gallery 120 students from Lachine high school? I do not know their party affiliations, but I do know that they are among the best pupils in Lachine and vicinity.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Tuesday, April 24, consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think it is fair to say that those who criticize this budget do so in no spirit of hostility to the government because it is called upon to levy greatly increased taxes.

Mr. Cruickshank: Is that the big lie?

Mr. Drew: Every hon. member knows that Canadians, along with the people of every other free nation, must spend large sums to strengthen their defences now and in the years ahead. We know that greatly increased expenditures must be made for that purpose. What we have criticized, and what we have really hoped the government might still reconsider, is the fact that this budget will do nothing to hold down the cost of living, but that on the contrary it will increase the cost of living by the very way in which the taxes are levied.

In the course of this debate the attitude of the government has been very largely that all is well, that there is no need to do anything about the cost of living or the inflation we see taking place day by day. The interesting fact is that no one has come forward from or on behalf of the government to answer in any way the analysis of the budget made by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), and others who followed him in the debate.

It should be remembered that just before the budget was introduced a motion was brought before the house calling for consideration of the increased cost of living. At that time it was said on behalf of the government that it was unfortunate that the motion had been made at that particular time, because the budget which was to be introduced on the following day would indicate the measures the government intended to take to control the cost of living and to deal with inflation. Therefore we looked for something in the budget which would vigorously and directly tackle this major domestic problem. Instead of that, the budget indicates no positive action by the government to deal with the rapidly rising cost of living and with the inflation which goes hand in hand with it.

In many of the discussions which are taking place outside the house it is noticeable that there is not the same concern about inflation in some quarters as there is in others. There is no doubt about what people on pensions, people on small incomes and the average worker think about the cost of living at this time. There is no doubt about the seriousness of the problem confronting every housewife in Canada today. Nevertheless there are arguments put forward which indicate that there are others who do not take the same attitude.

It is necessary for us to remember that there are people who do not mind inflation. It is necessary for us to remember that there are people who appear to benefit temporarily by inflation. Perhaps there are some hon. members who are aware, and who may have acted upon their awareness, that during a period of continuing inflation there are apparent gains to be made in the stock market, and there are similar gains to be made which are not so openly disclosed day by day—simply through the artificial process of increasing prices.

For the time being those who realize these apparent benefits do not object seriously to inflation—that is, so far as it affects activities of that kind. What is necessary for all of us to remember, however, is that ultimately no one benefits by inflation, because either we go on endlessly to the point where money is degraded to the extent that it has very little real value, or the inflation is halted; and that at the point at which it is halted those who apparently benefited must, like everybody else, pay the penalty of the inflation in what they hold, whether it be in the form of property, investments or otherwise.

For that reason there is no person who in the end really benefits by inflation. But as representatives of the people the important thing for us to remember is that no matter how many persons may seem to benefit temporarily, the overwhelming majority of the people in Canada and in other countries are not in a position to take advantage of any of the devices by which some of the impact of inflation can be avoided. They are the ones who suffer; they are the ones who are the least able to suffer.

It is because of that fact that there is no other subject, even including national defence itself, which calls more urgently for consideration than the inflation which is now taking place, with its inevitable result, a constant increase in the cost of living. There is however this fact that we must also remember when we consider national defence. It was pointed out by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton). Speaking in the United States not long ago, he referred to the difficulty there would be in meeting some of our defence requirements because of the increased costs that are developing day by day. As inflation increases, our ability to produce the machines, weapons and equipment for defence is lessened in exact proportion to the amount of inflation that has taken place.

Therefore we are dealing not only with the plight of the majority of Canadians who are attempting to meet obligations in their own homes and in their lives from day to day, but with the vitally important question of defence, upon which the future security and perhaps the very survival of this country as a nation is going to depend.

It is with that approach to the seriousness of the question that I put forward the arguments I shall present, in the hope that even at this stage the government will be prepared to reconsider some of the inflationary taxes it has announced it intends to impose. Already there has been reference to the famous statement of Lenin, that to create revolution you need only to wreck the currency of a country.

Mr. Abbott: "Debauch" is the word he used if you wish to be accurate.

Mr. Drew: The truth of that is obvious, because in countries where currency loses its value—and may I say it has lost its value, and completely lost its value, in countries where there were ministers of finance just as confident as the Minister of Finance in this country, and just as over-confident in their assertions of their own ability to meet the problem—in those countries, with a long history of government behind them, they have seen the value of their currency disappear entirely. In many of those countries there has been revolution and a spread of communism, for no reason other than the fact that the fertile soil was prepared to receive the argument that the system which had permitted conditions of that kind was not a system worth preserving.

When I argue, and I am sure when others do, that every possible step should be taken to protect the living standards of our people, we are arguing both for steps which will assist our people to meet these tests that are going to continue for many years, and also for the one thing which will preserve confidence in this system which we are trying to preserve by the vast expenditures we are pouring forth on defence.

That being so, we must approach this whole problem with the recognition that everything that is done to save and protect our currency, everything that is done to hold down the cost of living, is not done simply for the comfort and benefit and happiness of our people, vitally important though that may be, but also because it is part and parcel of the vast struggle which is taking place today throughout the whole world against the threat of communism.

When we were told that the budget was going to deal with these things, it was not only the members of this house who thought that they would be hearing some important announcement. As usual, reports had gone out over the wires—from supposedly reliable sources, as they are described without any name being attached—indicating the important steps that were to be taken by the government to deal with this problem. But instead of dealing with the problem, the government has actually aggravated it by following a course which in itself is inflationary, even if the inflationary trend had not already been apparent.

The budget is inflationary, and the Minister of Finance has made it clear that there were other methods that could be employed. He has made it perfectly clear to the members of this house, and through this house to the people of Canada, that this is only a stopgap, and that if this whole condition continues, other devices will be employed. I suggest that the situation has already been reached where those other devices should have been employed and when other taxing methods should have been applied.

There are many ways in which this budget is inflationary. One of the important ways in which it is inflationary is that there is a clear indication that this budget is intended to produce a larger surplus than the surplus indicated in the formal announcement of the Minister of Finance. When some question was raised in regard to this by the hon. member for Greenwood, the Minister of Finance said—I am not quoting the exact words, but I feel sure he will agree this is their effect—"Of course you are forgetting the debt retirement."

One of the principles of the preparation of a budget is that the members of the house should know exactly the purpose for which they vote money. If the intention is to have a certain debt retirement, then that should be indicated in the budget. Certainly members of this house will support the idea of debt retirement, and certainly members of this house will support every sound measure when it is put forward and properly explained.

The Minister of Finance does not answer in any way the unchallenged statement that there has been a huge miscalculation, reaching many hundreds of millions of dollars, by simply saying to the house, "We had a surplus, but we applied it on the debt." If there is to be debt retirement, then it is for the members of the house to say there is going to be debt retirement, and how much it should be. Anything else simply means that the budget statement deceives the representatives of the people. No matter how worthy the declared object may be, that in no way lessens the incorrectness of a course of that kind in preparing a budget for this house.

It is obvious also that the Minister of Finance is budgeting in the belief that this inflation is going to continue. In his budget statement he bases his tax estimates on a gross national product for the coming fiscal year of $20 billion. There could not be such a gross national product in this coming year unless there is further inflation.

Mr. Abbott: Oh, rubbish!

Mr. Drew: The Minister of Finance knows perfectly well that while there is going to be a very large increase in the gross national product from increased production, there is no contemplated expenditure on increased production in this country that will take up the increase that would bring us up to $20 billion. The Minister of Finance has admitted perfectly frankly that a large part of these surpluses was made up of apparent increases in tax collections because of the effect of inflation, and it is obvious that the minister is contemplating that possibility in the months ahead.

Let us come to the question of price control. Some members of the government outside this house have rather appeared to seek commendation by statements that they do not intend at this time to introduce price controls. It is not necessary, therefore, to examine this situation from the point of view of what the government itself has stated. The fact is that the principle of price control has been established in this house by this government and not by anyone else.

It was the government itself that stated that it was preparing to impose price control. The government did so when the emergency bill was introduced last September. The stated purpose of the wide powers in that bill was to be able to deal with the effect of the special expenditures that were to be made on defence. Then we come to the bill that was introduced and which became law during the present session, the Emergency Powers Act. The minister who takes the credit for drafting that bill, who informed us that he was responsible for the drafting, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), stated that the extremely wide powers in the bill were for the purpose of price control.

This, then, is no longer an issue so far as the government is concerned. The government has established the principle. The government surely cannot tell us that the intention behind the Emergency Powers Act is not to introduce price control when it got that bill passed by this house with the statement that it was. That certainly would be improper and beyond the point that one could easily contemplate, even with this government.

It should be remembered exactly what the Minister of Trade and Commerce did say in regard to this measure before it came to the house. He is reported on page 185 of Hansard of February 8, 1951, as saying:

> At its last session, parliament enacted a measure authorizing the government to control prices of materials where shortage is caused by defence purchases.

Do not let any member of this government suggest that someone else has introduced the subject of price control here. That is what the minister said in a speech before the bill was introduced to the house. Then the minister went on to say:

> Up to the present time, defence purchases have not been of sufficient volume to be in themselves responsible for shortages, although prices of steel and other war materials have been kept under close observation. Obviously a more comprehensive price control bill is needed for any effective control of the Canadian economy, and it is such a bill that you will be asked to consider.

These are the words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the man responsible, according to his own statement, for the drafting of the bill. His explanation is that the wide powers were necessary so that there could be price control where government buying forced up prices artificially. The principle being established, the question therefore, is only, when? After all, the government with its majority is in a position to carry out a principle it has established. It is in a position to carry out the purpose for which this bill was introduced, according to its own statement, and members of this house have the right to say: If that was the purpose of the bill, then carry out the purpose. Whether or not the bill was properly drafted, it was drafted for this purpose, and there is an obligation to the people of Canada to carry out the stated purpose of the bill passed by their representatives in this house.

When we say that flexible price controls should be placed on those things which are artificially in short supply because of government purchases, we are simply saying to the government: Do what you said you were going to do first of all last September and then in February of this year. If you are not going to do it, tell the people you are not going to do it, and repeal the bill you passed for that purpose. If you do not do that, if the government is unwilling to carry out its stated purpose, then of course the whole situation is different. If the government does not intend to use the Emergency Powers Act as it said it was going to, then the act in its present form should be repealed immediately, because the support of the members who voted for it would then have been obtained under false pretences.

Inflation can be tackled in other ways than by price control, and that has been said by every speaker on this side of the house. Certainly the first way to tackle inflation is by production which will meet both civilian and defence requirements. When we speak of flexible controls, we mean those controls which, with all the experience gained during the last war and in the years afterwards, this government is able to apply temporarily, in the simplest possible way to meet the artificial situation created by heavy buying of certain types of commodities or products.

Just as soon as production has been stepped up to meet both defence and civilian requirements, those controls should be removed so that we can get back to the normal interplay of prices in that area. After all, that would appear to be what was contemplated by the Minister of Trade and Commerce when he introduced the bill in the very words he used when he explained what was going to be done.

What I suggest is that the government must not give undertakings of this kind and then not carry them out, because it is not just a question of whether or not it has lived up to its undertaking. When the government says that certain things of this kind are going to be done, immediately there is inflation by invitation, and there has been inflation by invitation. The Minister of Trade and Commerce put it succinctly when he said that those who would be affected had made arrangements accordingly, and he added: In other words, they are all set. He was telling the house and the people of Canada that there had been inflation by invitation to a point where those who would be affected were all set to meet the situation to their own advantage. Perhaps he was wrong, but if he was wrong he is the one who is responsible for the statement and not any other member of the house. He, after all, is the minister who is supposed to have the most information with respect to this particular subject.

I said there were other ways of meeting inflation. They have been mentioned in this house before. There are other ways than production. Immigration is one of them. There will be an opportunity to discuss immigration in detail on other occasions. The subject has been referred to in the house, however, and certain comments have been made about our immigration methods. I simply want to say at this time that the government is not seriously tackling the question of immigration. The government has not set up the kind of machinery to handle immigration that indicates any real belief in immigration to this country at this particular time. It is simply going through the motions to the extent that will make it possible to say that it is doing something to meet the situation.

If the members of the government think that they are really tackling immigration at the present time, then they should examine some of the other methods now being followed in London and elsewhere by other countries and by other legislative jurisdictions to encourage immigration. Others are doing it in such a way as to make it possible for the immigrant to believe that we really want him in this country. Arrangements are set up by others so that an immigrant can come into one building and get everything in that building from his medical examination right through to his passport and the exchange of his money into Canadian dollars. This government has not yet really given evidence of a desire to do the thing that would in itself be the most anti-inflationary thing that could be done, namely, to build up our productive capacity by inviting to this country the skilled brains and skilled hands of people of good character who will take part in employing the vast resources of Canada for the common defence of civilization.

Then we come to the question of cutting non-defence expenditure. The government has not said very much this time with regard to that. In fact not a member of the government has really met that subject since the debate started. The only statements that have even attempted to deal with this question have been statements that cannot be taken as authoritative so far as the government is concerned.

Mr. Abbott: I took about twenty minutes to talk about it.

Mr. Drew: I said, since the beginning of this debate.

Mr. Abbott: Since the beginning of the debate.

Mr. Drew: Certainly when the debate started was after the budget was presented.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Abbott: You pays your money and you takes your choice.

Mr. Drew: There is no use trying to split hairs about this.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Drew: The Minister of Finance knows perfectly well that there was no debate in this house on the budget until the budget was before the house. Supposedly he and his officials were the only ones who knew what was in it until it was read in the house on that night.

Mr. Fulton: He did not say anything in the twenty minutes, anyway.

Mr. Abbott: The first speaker does not count. I think that is right.

Mr. Drew: No, the first speaker in this case counted a lot, because the first speaker was the man who started this whole thing off on the wrong course, and we are still hoping to correct it. These demands for the cutting of non-defence expenditure are constantly made, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Sinnott: Turn around the other way.

Mr. Drew: Everything is all right with the world when we hear that voice.

The statement that non-defence expenditures can be cut is frequently met by the meaningless reply that nothing is put before the house which would indicate how that could be done. Well, yesterday the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) gave many examples, up to the point when his time ran out, where expenses could be cut very substantially. I am prepared to say that I do not believe there is a single member of this house who does not know many places where expenditures could be cut, from his own observations here and in other parts of Canada. But we were given certain examples, and in a debate of this kind it is only possible to give a limited number of examples. Let us take another example of the sort of thing which does lend itself to possible economies without in any way weakening the strength of this country in these critical hours. Canada has become conference crazy as far as this government is concerned. Last year we sent delegations to 168 conferences. Undoubtedly some of those meetings were very important. Certainly the conferences connected with the activities of the United Nations were important; the Colombo conference was important, and so were a number of other conferences attended by our representatives. But I wonder how important to the government and the people of Canada was a conference described as the international congress of chocolate and cocoa manufacturers, which was held at Lausanne last year. There are many excellent candy manufacturers in this country who would receive great benefit from attending a conference of that kind, and doubtless did; but as the representatives of the people, we have yet to hear in this house of anything of importance gained by Canada through the delegation which attended that conference.

Mr. Pearson: There was no delegation.

Mr. Drew: And I do not know that we have heard anything of what was gained by our attendance at the international congress of psychiatrists at Paris, or the meeting of the directing council and sanitary conference of the Pan-American bureau at Ciudad Trujillo. There was another conference which undoubtedly was an important matter to Canada's survival on which we should hear a report at the earliest opportunity; that was the Washington conference of the society of vertebrate palaeontology and the palaeontological society. These are simply a few.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: I thought for a moment the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) was going to say a word, and I am sure most hon. members will be very anxious to learn what advantage was gained from these meetings, in these critical days.

Mr. Pearson: I was just going to say there were no delegations at those conferences.

Mr. Drew: Then I feel sure the minister will take the first opportunity to correct the recent statement to that effect. But I will not change in any way the statement that this government has gone conference crazy, and that it could save large sums of money by confining its attention to those conferences which may be expected to advance the interests of Canada and the Canadian people in important fields, where some measurable benefits may be expected. Sometimes it is only by such illustrations as this gathering of chocolate manufacturers and so on that we can see how far this tendency to attend conferences really goes.

An hon. Member: Well, they have nice trips.

Mr. Drew: They have very nice trips, but these conferences can be curtailed and brought within reasonable limits. This government can do what any big business would do at the present time in the face of changing economic conditions and the necessary readjustments in its internal activities. Any business of any size in this country, called upon to readjust its internal organization on a scale even remotely approaching what this government is called upon to do, would call in experts to see how they could improve the efficiency, the cost accounting methods, and bring about economies within that structure. For that reason we have pressed for the setting up of a commission to examine the whole business structure of the government; and we shall present another motion in the hope that at this time, confronted with these greatly increased expenditures, the government will take steps which should have been taken long ago and which have been taken with great advantage in other countries in the past few years.

Then, Mr. Speaker, we come to the form of some of the increased taxes. No one is suggesting that there is any such thing as a painless tax. No one is suggesting that the cost of defence can be carried without a very heavy burden being accepted by the people of Canada. But the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) has himself indicated that there are alternative devices which could be employed, and that if the present serious situation continues he is ready to employ them at some stage. One of the things everyone is finding it extremely difficult to understand is why this government imposed taxes on electrical equipment such as refrigerators, stoves and things of that kind, when there is every reason to encourage the use of these articles, as long as there is an adequate supply of electricity. They reduce the human effort required; they make the hands employed in that work more productive and capable of doing more and other work as well, which they cannot do if they have to use other types of equipment. The very efficiency of this type of equipment is one reason why its use should be encouraged rather than discouraged. Certainly it is not a luxury.

Then we come to the corporation tax. I do not suggest that the government could have avoided large increases in some of these taxes, but what I believe should be emphasized and re-emphasized, is that the imposition of heavy corporation taxes does not relieve the small taxpayer of the payment of taxes simply because they are imposed upon corporations. The sooner everyone in Canada realizes that increased corporation taxes simply mean increased prices the better it will be for all Canadians, and the greater demand there will be for economy.

There is nothing cynical, nothing improper about that. Many of the large companies in Canada making some of the largest actual profits operate on a relatively narrow profit margin. I do not say that applies right across the board, but many companies operate on a relatively narrow percentage margin. If they are to stay in the black—and that is of interest to every Canadian who has insurance, bank deposits and all the other things that base their security on investment in these corporations—then they must pass on taxes of that kind. Therefore it is the little fellow again who pays, and no one should suggest that the public is being relieved of any burden because these taxes are imposed on corporations.

Then we come to the tax I think most objectionable, and which even at this stage I believe the minister would be well advised to withdraw; that is, the increase in the sales tax.

In yesterday's Windsor Daily Star there is a report of a statement made by an official in the United States who is in charge of price control over there; I refer to Mr. DiSalle. While I am not suggesting for one moment that he is in a position to state what Canadians will do or should do, it is not without interest that he has expressed an opinion which is based upon experience in this field, and with close contact with Canada. In the Windsor Star of yesterday he is quoted as follows:

> However, he said, the dominion—

That is, the Dominion of Canada.

> —will be obliged to impose direct controls when the full impact of defence buying by the Canadian government hits the economy of the country.

We have been told over and over again that it is hoped that if controls in the United States are a success, the need for similar controls here will be diminished. Mr. Speaker, the greater the success of those controls in the United States, the greater the need for similar controls here. If controls are effective on the other side—and it is most difficult to believe that they will not be substantially successful in view of the men who have been placed in charge of that work—then there would be a highly speculative pressure on supplies in Canada, by those who are trying to buy supplies of that kind in the United States. That is something that has happened before, and it will happen again. Therefore as we see the effort being increased to improve the measures of control which have been established in the United States, it becomes more and more necessary that at least the preliminary steps be taken here to put into effect whatever flexible measures of control or otherwise the government may decide on, as soon as they possibly can.

Let us now examine this increase of 25 per cent in the sales tax. There again we have one of these rather difficult decisions to make. We have the statement by the Minister of Finance that it is not a regressive tax. We have the positive statement by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) that it is a regressive tax. There is no shading between the two. They are both definite. We must therefore make the choice as to which one we think is correct.

Mr. Abbott: What is a regressive tax?

Mr. Drew: I would assume that the Minister of Finance would know what a regressive tax was. He used the term, and I would assume that he knew what it meant.

Mr. Abbott: I was wondering whether my hon. friend knew.

Mr. Drew: After all, the Minister of Finance is charged with this responsibility. If he thinks it is not a regressive tax, then for two reasons at least we must recognize the need for impressing him with the effect of a tax of this kind, in the hope that reconsideration may still be given to the position which has been taken. The first is the fact that this tax has been generally regarded, and with reason, as the tax which most unfairly bears upon the small taxpayer who is least able to bear the burden. Some attempt has been made to create the impression that the sales tax really does not affect the ordinary householder very much. The Minister of Finance explained that it did not affect a long line of foodstuffs and things of that kind. That is quite true, and for a good reason. When so much of the supplies of that kind finds its way to the market direct from the farmer, it would be extremely difficult to impose a sales tax on many of those foods. We see lettuce, celery, tomatoes, apples and food of that kind being sold along the highways. It would be a most difficult tax to apply and therefore it is not applied. But that does not mean for one moment that it does not apply to things that go into the household. More than $100 million on boots and clothes is raised by that tax under the present budget; and most of the other things are things that directly affect the living of the people of this country. It is a tax which should not be imposed in the first place, if it is avoidable; and having been imposed and maintained at 8 per cent for some time, it should certainly not at this time be increased by another 25 per cent, when the people on whom it will bear most heavily are already finding so much difficulty in meeting the high cost of living.

But there is another reason why all of us should examine the effect of this tax, and I would in all earnestness urge the Minister of Finance to reconsider this one tax, no matter what else he does. A committee of this house met last year for many weeks to consider old age pensions. That committee brought in a report which, so far as it goes, will undoubtedly receive the unanimous support of this house. There was not unanimity with regard to its recommendations, because there were those who thought that it should have gone further; but that aspect we can disregard for the moment. There is that report which, so far as it goes, I believe is supported unanimously in this house. It called for increased old age pensions at the age of 70 without a means test.

Contrary to the recommendations or the obvious intention of that committee, it has been proposed by the dominion government that the provinces, in order to meet this obligation, should acquire the right to impose a sales tax up to 3 per cent; that is an indirect tax. That proposal is a break with tradition and requires an amendment to the British North America Act. I believe that particular tax should not be passed by this house in any event. No matter what can be said for the sales tax imposed by the dominion government on a uniform over-all basis, a sales tax by the provinces should not be adopted as a device for meeting this or similar obligations, for two important reasons.

First of all, there is the fact that it constitutes a serious threat to the uniform living standards of our people. In the second place, it constitutes a serious threat to our constitution itself. Do not let anyone suggest here that, because an amendment may be approved, this makes it any more satisfactory from a constitutional point of view. This country, with all its difficulties, has carried on extremely well under a basic constitution which was adopted in 1867, when conditions were far different from what they are today. At that time the indirect field was taken exclusively by the dominion government and the provinces were entitled to tax in the direct field. It is true it was not stated that the provinces had that field exclusively. Until 1917, however, it was always accepted as a traditional thing that there would be no invasion by the dominion government of that direct tax field. That acceptance was borne out by the then minister of finance, Sir Thomas White, who expressed his regret that the government should invade a field that was so clearly a provincial one, and who expressed the intention to leave that field as soon as it was possible after the end of the first world war. Whether or not the dominion government could possibly go out of that field is certainly open to real question today. But whether it does or not, let us not get into worse confusion, at a time when we need to settle these tax problems, by getting the provinces into the indirect field and leaving no traditional foundation whatever for our tax system.

When the dominion-provincial conference met in August 1945 and in the succeeding meetings of that conference, it was pointed out that one of the things which should be done at the earliest possible date was for the dominion government and the provincial governments to consider the whole tax structure in Canada with the idea of simplifying it at the dominion, provincial and municipal levels, so that it would bear most evenly and easily upon the people, at the same time clarifying once and for all the taxing rights of the provinces, the municipalities and the dominion government, so that the power of taxation would go hand in hand with the power of administration and legislation. That has not been done, and it has not been done for one reason and one reason alone, namely, that the dominion government did not carry forward the recommendation that was made at that time. Although it was not done—and nearly six years have passed—I still urge that this subject be tackled now, and a review of our whole tax field be examined with the dominion, the provinces and the municipalities. I know there are those who say that the municipalities are the creatures of the provinces, and that therefore they do not need to sit in on that. I think they should sit in, because, in fact, the provinces were largely the creatures of the municipalities in the first place. It was the early municipalities, settled in different parts of eastern Canada, on the west coast and on the Red river, that laid the foundation of Canada as a nation. They have their traditions and their experience. They can contribute a great deal, because it is in these municipal councils that you find the bedrock of democracy itself.

Certainly with that possibility and with that hope I do not think that this parliament should consider an amendment to the constitution at this time, which would start something that it would be very difficult to unscramble afterwards. This is not the first time that this subject has been considered in this house. It came up before in 1936. Fortunately in 1936 common sense prevailed, and they did not go ahead with this very wrong idea.

One of the things that were emphasized at that time, and one of the things that should be emphasized now, is that these taxes, which would be imposed indirectly by the provinces if there is an amendment of this kind, would be imposed at the very time when a lot of these other inflationary taxes are going to be encountered. Remember, this is a different tax from the dominion general sales tax. The only similar thing about it is that it is a bad tax and invisible. But it is very different in its impact and in its effect, because it is a tax on the accumulated price of the article. The tax is a tax on the cost of the article itself and on all other taxes that go into it; and they do, because the tax is a tax on the price which is made up of the dominion general sales tax, of the municipal taxes on the factory, on the store, on the taxes paid by those who have shipped and handled the goods, on the income taxes of the company and everything else. All these taxes are wrapped up in the price on which this 3 per cent will be charged. It is a vicious tax and should not be contemplated now or at any other time.

[Mr. Drew.]

But what is worse, it is a tax which will divide this country at the very time that we are trying to elevate the living standards across Canada and find ways of assisting those provinces which are not so fortunate as others in their revenue resources. We would be doing something that would aggravate the difference. As an example, it has been definitely said that the province of Ontario has no intention of imposing this tax. It has been said that some of the other provinces have no intention of imposing this tax. In Prince Edward Island the voters will not be able to decide on this issue tomorrow, because both parties have said down there that they will not impose it, but this government has given very startling examples of how quickly promises of that kind can be forgotten. Where this tax would be imposed would be in those provinces which already are finding it most difficult. Those provinces which need extra revenue at this time would impose it, and consequently the cost of necessary things for the home would be higher than they would be in the provinces where the living standards are already higher.

Then there is another feature which has not been mentioned so far as I know in the discussion of the subject, and which I think does need to be borne in mind. It is this. This can be made a most effective barrier to trade between the provinces; not only is there the fact that it would raise difficulties as between provinces, but there is a device for which this tax could be employed to differentiate between products of one province and another. A tax could be imposed by a provincial government, which would impose this sales tax on articles coming into the province, and specifically state that the tax would not apply to articles made in that province. That would create a most unfortunate situation, and one which would lead not only to friction between the provinces but also to something which would approach the evasion of taxes which you sometimes see on the international border. I mention that for this reason. This tax is made in fact a condition of bringing in old age pensions. In a statement made in this city on April 21, as reported by the Ottawa Evening Citizen, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) said that, as soon as agreement was reached in regard to this amendment which would provide for the imposition of this indirect tax in the provinces, the government hoped to go ahead with old age pensions. Now, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Martin: I just heard what my hon. friend said. If he said, as I understood it, that the old age pension program depended upon the three per cent proposal he is entirely at fault, in error.

Mr. Drew: If I am at fault, I am only at fault in relying on the Citizen, and I have found it very reliable. This is what the minister is quoted as saying:

> As soon as agreement is reached the federal government will lose no time in presenting to parliament a resolution requesting the United Kingdom parliament to pass the old age pensions amendment.

Now, the only old age pensions amendment that we are really closely concerned about, or that the United Kingdom parliament will be concerned about, is an amendment to the constitution which would permit the imposition of this tax.

Mr. Abbott: No.

Mr. Drew: Of course it is. There is no question about the other, because agreement is already reached on the old age pensions. It is agreement on the amendment which will permit the imposition of this tax that is still creating difficulty.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, is anxious to be accurate in the statement that he is making to the house now. I am sure that if he will examine the record of the offer that was made by the dominion government to the provincial governments at the conference, and all of the correspondence which has taken place since, he will see that at all times there has been a very clear understanding that the old age pensions amendment is not contingent upon the sales tax amendment, and that the sales tax amendment is not contingent upon the old age pensions amendment.

Mr. Drew: Then, Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Minister of Justice if he will state now unequivocally that the old age pensions can proceed without any regard to the sales tax.

Mr. Garson: Certainly.

Mr. Abbott: Of course.

Mr. Garson: It has never been any other way.

Mr. Drew: Yes, it is.

Mr. Garson: No.

Mr. Drew: I am making the speech.

An hon. Member: You have had an answer.

Mr. Drew: I take the answer, and I accept the answer; and having accepted the answer I now say that I hope there will be no further consideration given to the introduction of a tax which is not necessary and is vicious and improper and would be divisive to the whole of Canada.

An hon. Member: Get back to the script.

Mr. Drew: We have now a very hopeful answer, because the problem that has been raised, the real problem raised, was the problem in regard to this sales tax. The provinces have not at any time raised any question about wanting to get ahead with pensions at seventy without a means test. And I hope that without further delay everything now will be cleared up to get an amendment before this house and before provincial legislatures so that people who need this pension will get it at the earliest possible date.

And I hope, what is more, that, in view of the statement now made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) will either introduce a motion into this budget for this increased old age pension or immediately bring in a supplementary estimate which will cover it. No matter who else may be misled by the actions of this government, there is one group of people they must not mislead, and that is the old people of this country. Those people are the people who have not still the working power to adjust their living conditions, to cope with the events of these serious days.

Mr. Abbott: Yes, yes.

Mr. Drew: And, far from this being the time when no one should consider dealing with old age pensions, because of national defence, this is the time above all others when the program of old age pensions approved by the committee last year should be brought into effect with the least possible delay.

Mr. Abbott: Yes, yes.

Mr. Drew: Certainly these pensions, promised by this government in 1945, should not wait much longer in 1951. These pensions should be paid; because, however necessary they were before, they become more necessary every day now, when the cost of living goes up, and when these people are, according to official reports, in want and distress because of the inadequacy of the pension they are receiving.

Do not let anyone say that this is a tax for old people; do not let anyone say that this is an appeal to emotions only. The old people are the people who deserve the most, and they do not deserve the sarcastic comments of the Minister of Finance such as he made just now.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, I must really object. I have made no sarcastic comments. I have made no comments at all. Later on in this debate I expect to put him right on the assertion that the two amendments were tied together. That is all I have to say.

Mr. Drew: I have heard these comments of the Minister of Finance right here this afternoon. My hearing is good.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend is making an assertion unfounded in fact.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: He is not snickering now.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, there is one particular reason above all others why this should be proceeded with, and without delay—and we now have an indication that it can be done without delay, because we have had the clear and unequivocal statement of the Minister of Justice that they do not need to impose this vicious tax in order to provide money for this.

Mr. Garson: Now, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Abbott: Oh, let it go.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend will identify the author of the inaccurate statement which he has attributed to one of the ministers of the government—if he attributed it to me I would like to correct it.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I was just referring to the statement of the Minister of Justice, which I hope is accurate, and that is that he has made an unequivocal statement that it is not necessary to impose this vicious tax in order to give old age pensioners the money they desire.

Mr. Garson: No; on a point of order, I did not make any such statement, and my hon. friend is—

Mr. Drew: What!

Mr. Garson: What I said was this, if my hon. friend would listen—

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I will let Hansard speak for itself.

Mr. Gardiner: A question of privilege.

Mr. Drew: And that is not a point of order.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The leader of the opposition has the floor, and a question can be asked only with his permission.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Garson: On a point of order.

Mr. Drew: I have the floor.

Mr. Garson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Drew: You heard Mr. Speaker say that I had the floor.

Mr. Speaker: The Minister of Justice is now rising to a question of privilege—not a point of order.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, the leader of the opposition has attributed to me a statement which I have not made.

Mr. Speaker: Then the minister should rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Drew: That is right.

Mr. Garson: My point of privilege is this, that the point I made a few moments ago was that from the very beginning the federal government offered to the provincial governments at this conference—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Drew: No, no, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: When the Minister of Justice is speaking on a question of privilege, he should be allowed to do so, but he should state his question as briefly as possible.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, my point of privilege is this—

An hon. Member: The third time.

Mr. Abbott: Listen, and you will know what it is.

An hon. Member: The Minister of Finance will deal with it.

Mr. Garson: —that the statement which my hon. friend the leader of the opposition has attributed to me, to the effect that the sales tax amendment is not necessary to raise revenue, is not correct. It may be necessary on the part—

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Speaker: Order; I do not think the minister should be allowed to amplify it at this time. He cannot debate it at this time.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think the Minister of Justice should take this opportunity to debate it. He will have an opportunity later on to do that.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to debate it—

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I would point out that Hansard will show what the minister said; and it can stand there, now that he has raised the point.

Mr. Garson: Well, I make the point of privilege that I have heard and deny the statements now attributed to me.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker,—

An hon. Member: Here is another one.

Mr. Speaker: The Minister of National Health and Welfare has the floor.

Mr. Martin: The hon. member was quoting from a statement I made. I know he would not knowingly misrepresent it. Would he afford me the opportunity to point out what was said?

Mr. Drew: No, I have accepted the statement of the Minister of Justice in regard to what he said.

Mr. Martin: No; I do not wish to interrupt—

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to rise while you are on your feet, sir, but I wish to point out that I made a statement in regard to agreements under consideration, and the reference was to a report in the paper which referred to two agreements. The minister made a statement and I accepted that statement, and said so—the statement of the Minister of Justice. I accepted it, and Hansard will show what was said. Therefore there is no question of privilege arising.

Mr. Martin: I am sure there is. I do not wish to get into an argument with my hon. friend, but I wish to point out that he referred to a statement that I had made in answer to a question put to me by one of the gentlemen of the press. He went on to say that I had stated that unless the three per cent amendment was also admitted we could not possibly have an old age pensions measure. It is true that I take issue with that statement. Having quoted that statement I think that, in fairness to me, either I should be allowed to say what I said or my hon. friend should quote me in extenso. It is only one line, but I simply said it would be convenient to put the pensions and the sales tax amendments through at the same time, but if agreement were possible on the old age pensions and not on the sales tax, the pension amendment would not be held up.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, you will notice that I accepted that statement. I then accepted the more emphatic statement of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson). Now the Minister of Justice is seeking to qualify the statement which the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) appears so anxious to have on the record. So I do hope the two ministers will clarify the position between the two of them.

Mr. Garson: On a question of privilege, I repudiate the suggestion that there is any attempt to qualify the remarks of the Minister of National Health and Welfare because my remarks were not relevant to his statement.

Mr. Abbott: Let us get on with the budget debate. What has old age pensions got to do with it?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, that comment of the Minister of Finance should not pass unchallenged. He says, "What has old age pensions got to do with it?" Old age pensions have a great deal to do with this budget because one of the places in which increased old age pensions should be provided for is in this budget, if the government has not its tongue in its cheek in regard to pensions at this time.

Mr. Abbott: I said that was to be a contributory old age pensions plan.

Mr. Drew: This budget will in itself create pressures that did not exist before it was introduced. It is perfectly obvious, however, that once introduced and the taxes applied, as they automatically are applied under our tradition at the time of the announcement of the budget itself, no matter how wrong some of these taxes may have been it must be recognized that they cannot be taken off at this moment and that we must put up with some of them until a later date. But this increase of 25 per cent in the sales tax can be stopped as quickly as it was put on. I earnestly urge upon the Minister of Finance consideration of the removal of the increase, no matter what else he may believe could be done to meet this situation.

The people of this country want a feeling of confidence; they want a feeling of security; they want a feeling that they can meet their daily needs in the days ahead in order to have the spirit that we need in this country, to meet all the problems of defence which lie ahead. It is because of that, that I once again urge the Minister of Finance to reconsider his decision on this 25 per cent increase in the sales tax and to announce its withdrawal in the interests of production, as well as in the interests of the people of Canada who need some restraint on the rising cost of living at this time.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I had not really intended to take any more time of the house in this budget debate because, unlike the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), I endeavour to avoid repetition as much as possible. I shall try not to take quite as much time now as he has taken to elicit the points he wanted.

Mr. Drew: Or as you took before.

Mr. Abbott: That is quite right; I took an hour and fifteen or twenty minutes to outline both what I conceived to be the economic position of Canada and the budgetary proposals which I had to make. I went into considerable detail as to the measures which the government had taken and was taking to counteract the inflationary forces which apparently exist in Canada and in most of the rest of the world today.

There are one or two points which the leader of the opposition raised this afternoon to which I should like to reply briefly. A great deal has been said about the fact that the revenue for the last four or five years has in each case greatly exceeded the estimate which I made at the time of my budget forecast. Some suggestion has been made that that was deliberate. I admit of course that the results have exceeded the estimates, but I most certainly deny the allegation that those estimates were deliberately underestimated. I and my officials have always tried to make the best estimates possible and to make them responsible estimates.

Over-optimism in the case of a Minister of Finance, whether it relates to revenue or expenditures, I think is a fatal mistake. I have no crystal ball, nor does anyone else in this house or in any other parliament possess one. I would point out that invariably I have indicated the basis on which my estimates have been made. Any estimate of revenue in a tax structure such as ours must be based on an estimate of what your gross national product is going to be for the year. You could estimate pretty accurately what your existing tax structure will yield if you knew what your gross national production is going to be. My estimates have invariably been based on those estimations and the house has been fully informed as to the basis on which they were made.

I well recall, I think it was two years ago, that the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) asserted in his reply on the budget address that he thought I was being over-optimistic. He was wrong. I was unduly pessimistic. I have been pessimistic in each of the five years I have presented a budget.

I have been in pretty good company. Just the other day I was reading what Mr. Gaitskell, the chancellor of the exchequer, said when he brought down his budget on the same day I brought down mine. He said:

> The results of 1950-51 are, at first sight, somewhat remarkable. My predecessor budgeted for a surplus of £443 million; in fact the surplus was £720 million.

Hon. members who follow these things may recall that the original budget estimate in the United States last year was for a deficit of $5 billion. In January, I think it was, Mr. Truman brought in a revised budget message in which he estimated—that is just a couple of months ago—that there would be a budget deficit of only $2.7 billion. Now I am informed that it is expected that at the end of the fiscal year in the United States on June 30 they will have a surplus of some $3 billion.

Coming a little closer to home, I suppose we could not have a better test of accurate estimating or responsible estimating than that made by our larger provinces, in particular the province of Ontario where my hon. friend served with such distinction for such a long time. Take what happened in Ontario during the last three years. In 1948-49 they underestimated their revenues by 21.2 per cent—I think that was the last year my friend had anything to do with that province—and they underestimated expenditures by 16.2 per cent. In the same year, I confess, I underestimated our revenues by four per cent, as against Ontario's 21.2 per cent, and I estimated our expenditures just about right because I was only $1 million out.

In 1949-50 I underestimated revenues by 4·2 per cent and expenditures by 2.5 per cent, whereas in Ontario they underestimated their revenues by 13.6 per cent and their expenditures by 9.4 per cent. In the year now current I underestimated revenues by an all-time underestimation of 16.3 per cent, and expenditures by 9.3 per cent. Ontario kept up its record of underestimating its revenues and expenditures by 9.8 and 9.3 respectively, and the same pattern is followed throughout all the major provinces. I would point out to the house that the sources of revenue of the provinces are very much less liable to fluctuation than our own highly progressive personal and corporation income tax rates. I offer this as no particular excuse. My officials made honest estimates of these revenues, and, far from being ashamed of the result, I am proud of it. Any nation with a funded debt, as we have, of some $15 billion that does not make some real reduction in that debt during prosperous times such as we have enjoyed during the last five years is, I think, never going to effect any reduction. I have not the slightest excuse to offer and I take some pride in it.

Mr. Fleming: Might I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Abbott: Certainly.

Mr. Fleming: If that purpose is so laudable—and I think we would all agree—why does the minister not consciously budget for a surplus?

Mr. Abbott: I have budgeted in every year for at least a modest surplus. Of course in the last two years, with expenditures of $3 billion plus, an estimated surplus of $40 million or $50 million is in effect budgeting for a balance. In 1948, at the peak of the post-war inflation, I budgeted for a very substantial surplus, as the house will recall, and made virtually no tax reductions. I am stating the position. I am stating that under conditions of high employment and increasing gross national production, such as we have enjoyed during the last four or five years, it is inevitable that revenues will go up. So much then for this alleged deliberate underestimating of revenues.

My hon. friend made some reference to attempts to cut expenditure, and he indulged in his usual generalities that there were all kinds of places the government could cut expenditure if it would just go about it. I speak from considerable experience on that subject. I am not going to repeat what I said in my budget speech about the deliberate, conscious and, I think, effective effort at reducing expenditures this year. Something has been said about the reduction in services in the post office, that it was initiated as a sort of spectacular thing which everybody would see, and would be evidence that the government was reducing expenditures. As I think someone pointed out the other day, the post office is the largest employer of civil servants in the government service.

During the war we eliminated the second delivery a day in urban areas. It seemed to me that was one of these frills that one might eliminate at a time like this. The Post Office Department was agreeable and that was done. A storm has been raised about it. I have not heard any member in the opposition suggest that it was a wise thing to do. My good friend, the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), who is one of the most vehement critics of extravagance, said: Oh well, you should not have eliminated this postal service. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that there is only one way to reduce government expenditure, and that is by eliminating functions or activities. Out of our total budget of $3,700 million odd, if you eliminate defence transfer payments, old age pensions, payments to veterans, interest on the public debt, and so on, there remains about $500 million that is paid out for salaries and wages, purchase of materials and all other government services.

That is the field in which you have to effect your reductions. That includes all construction activities aside of course from defence, and it is in that field of $500 million that we achieved this year a reduction from last year of some $35 million notwithstanding the increase in costs through civil servants' salaries and all the other things that go with it. Therefore I am prepared to say, speaking with full knowledge of what I am saying, that there has been a real and successful effort to cut down on less essential government expenditure. If any hon. member opposite who wants any other service eliminated will make a specific suggestion such as the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) made the other day, that we eliminate some lighthouses on the Saint John river, I can assure him that these suggestions will receive the most earnest and careful consideration.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that it was not only the Saint John river. I said that investigations should be made all across Canada for that purpose.

Mr. Abbott: We will certainly be very glad to look into the matter to see if we can dispense with some of these services, and not only on the Saint John river. I am not going to discuss this interesting thought about flexible price controls that my hon. friend has put forward. He is very careful of course to refrain from any mention of wage controls. I noticed yesterday, when the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) was making his excellent speech, that when he asked my friend, the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), if he would be in favour of imposing wage controls there was no response.

Mr. Green: I did not answer any of his questions.

Mr. Abbott: That is quite right. I have already made my views pretty clear as to why I do not think the immediate imposition of over-all price, wage and other controls is desirable at this time. I must say it gives me a certain amount of quiet amusement to see the leader of the good old Conservative party posing as an advocate of a controlled economy, but I suppose I can be forgiven that.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I would point out that the Minister of Finance will find in Hansard that what I was referring to was a statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) in which he had referred to price controls, and price controls exclusively. I was pointing out that I hoped he knew what he had promised, and that he would do it.

Mr. Abbott: I was just referring to my hon. friend's sort of general advocacy of controls as a cure for the inflationary situation in which we now find ourselves. As to the general criticisms of the budget, let me say at once that none of them came to me as any surprise. I knew perfectly well that ringing speeches would be made in the house about the evils of the general sales tax. I remember that ten years ago I had occasion in the house, in connection with another matter, to quote something I had read, that some people who think they are thinking are only rearranging their prejudices. I think that applies to a good deal of the criticism I have heard here and elsewhere about the so-called general sales tax in our tax structure today. I dealt with that matter at some length in my budget speech, and I am not going to repeat now what I said. I will say that anybody who stands up in this house and says that we should not increase the sales tax really should tell me some place, other than liquor, where I can get the extra revenue.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Excess profits tax.

Mr. Abbott: I realize the political advantage of suggesting increased taxes on liquor. I understand these things just as well as anybody else, but I gave the reasons why I thought that at this time it was not either desirable or productive to increase the tax on liquor, which was increased last September. I am sure that the leader of the opposition's successor, Mr. Frost, will agree entirely with the stand that I have taken on that point. In fact he has publicly said so.

Finally the hon. member made some reference to the desirability of increased production. Before I speak about that, may I add that I am not going to deal with the criticism of the tax imposed on refrigerators, stoves and washing machines. In my budget speech I stated why I felt it was necessary to put a tax on these articles at this time, and I am not going to repeat the reasons now. We have to remember that these moneys have to be raised from the people of Canada. In the situation we are in now I do not consider that, with the tremendously increased consumption of these particular articles, it is unfair or unjust to impose a special tax at this time. Other than that, I do not propose to add to what I said in my budget speech.

As to the question of increased production, I think that is really the key to the solution, so far as a solution can be found domestically, of the problem of the inflationary forces that exist today. I have said before and I say again that I do not think anyone in this country—and that goes for all of us—should contemplate working less than he does now. Speaking generally I believe we should all recognize that whatever hours we are working now we should continue to work. I am not suggesting that wage adjustments should not be made; but any attempt to shorten the hours we work, with rare exceptions where greater efficiency might result, must cause some diminution in production and additional demands for manpower. So I really feel that every Canadian should seriously consider whether, conditions being as they are today, he would be justified in asking that he work shorter hours. I am profoundly convinced of that, and I am glad of this opportunity to voice my views.

As far as the budget itself is concerned, I was faced with the problem of an outgo of some $3,700 million to $3,800 million. As I said in my budget speech, I felt that we should take in at least that amount, and in consultation with my colleagues I endeavoured to spread the burden as fairly and equitably as possible. I am not so conceited as to believe that I have omniscience, or that it might not be possible to make some improvements, but I believe that on balance the budget, while a tough one, is fair; and I am satisfied to leave the verdict on that with this house.

Mr. Donald Smith (Queens-Shelburne): Mr. Speaker, I shall not detain the house very long. I do desire, however, to make my contribution to this debate; and since this is the first budget debate in which I have taken part I should like to take advantage of this opportunity to offer my sincere congratulations to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), not only on bringing us this budget but on those he has brought down since he has been in that high office. I know when I make this statement I am saying what is in the minds of the people of my constituency.

I should like to remind hon. members of the high standard that has been set by other finance ministers, particularly those from my own province of Nova Scotia. One of the earlier finance ministers in our history was Right Hon. W. S. Fielding, who by the way represented the riding which I am now trying to represent. Mr. Fielding was minister of finance in Sir Wilfrid Laurier's cabinet. Then I need only mention the name of Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley to further remind hon. members of the high calibre of the ministers who have come from Nova Scotia, and to indicate the high standard which is being maintained by the present minister.

I am sure it was most pleasing to my people to note that the fishing industry has been given some consideration in the budget this year. I refer in particular to the free entry of diesel engines, which will be of some assistance to those fishermen who use larger boats in which diesel engines permit more economical operation. Then the free entry of nets and lines of any material, while it may not seem like much help, will be of real assistance to our fishermen in Nova Scotia, so I am sure they will all appreciate what has been done for them in this budget.

In recent budget speeches documents have been quoted indicating the rapid growth of our economy. I believe it is only natural that some parts of Canada should have been in a position to participate in that growth to a greater extent than others. The rate of such growth depends on many factors, not the least of which is the presence of natural resources of one kind or another. Hon. members of this house who had the privilege recently of visiting northern Manitoba I am sure came back with a much greater realization of the importance of those natural resources. Many years ago men of courage and vision made a great contribution to the economy of this nation when the presence of high grade ore containing many metals was discovered. As a result of these discoveries, at Flin Flon today, for example, over 2,500 men are employed in mine and smelter, bringing out of the ground and refining some $40 million worth of precious and base metals, of which I believe today the latter are of more real significance than the former, particularly in terms of national defence.

When we think of natural resources we should also keep in mind the importance to the development of Canada of the gas and oil discoveries in Alberta and elsewhere. I believe we should consider the mineral developments in British Columbia, northern Ontario, Quebec and Labrador, whose iron ore deposits will play a most important part in our industrial development. If we had read or heard of a nation whose resources had been developed during the last ten years or so as have those of Canada, and which had made the economic and political progress this nation has made, I am sure we would be of the opinion that there was a nation with a future. It seems to me that we in Canada do not quite appreciate the future that lies ahead. There appears to be a lack of understanding of our potentialities. Discussions with students of history, economists, engineers and others who have given some thought to this matter can only lead one to the opinion that in the not too distant future Canada will not only be the leader of the middle powers, as she is now, but the leading country of the world; and it is a fact that even now, because of the ability of her leaders, Canada is giving leadership to the democratic world.

That causes me to say this, that we should not, through narrow thinking, fail to do those things which would promote this growth, or do those things which would hinder this great development. This is a time for vision, for faith and for hard work, as was so ably put the other day by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Murray). To those who were not in the house that evening, and have not read that address, I would suggest that it is quite worth while.

I believe the construction of the St. Lawrence waterway will be an important step in our national development, and I believe we should get along with it with all speed. There are those from the maritimes who hold the view that this project will harm the economy of those provinces. I do not hold that view; I agree with the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. Carroll) that it can be a real benefit to the industrial and economic life of the maritimes. As someone has said, prosperity is an atomic reaction, by which all links of the chain must be affected. Our ports of Saint John and Halifax will not only hold the business they now have; following the construction of this inland waterway I believe we can look forward to a great expansion of port activity coincident with our national growth. As has been pointed out, the development of the St. Lawrence waterway can provide the means for an expansion of the markets for Nova Scotia coal by placing it on a more competitive basis with Pennsylvania and Virginia coal, the producers of which in the past have opposed the St. Lawrence waterway because of their fear of the competition of Nova Scotia coal. In view of the present great need for power, because of its relation to national defence, and because of its importance to national expansion, I am prepared to support the St. Lawrence waterway.

As far as possible I believe this waterway should be self-liquidating. I believe the users of the power should pay for the power development, and those who use the canals should pay for them by means of tolls. At the same time the maritimes should insist that such developments as the Passamaquoddy power project, the St. Mary's project and others be vigorously explored. Without such power development in the maritimes we shall not be in a position to attract desired industries. With it, industries would naturally be attracted to the maritimes by the cheap power which would be thereby produced. I think that we in the maritimes should also insist that there should be no reduction in expenditures for public works and aids to navigation, things which are so essential to the fishing industry which I believe is on the threshold of greater expansion.

I further believe that the subsidy on feed grains from the west should certainly be continued. I also believe that, if the west give their support to this development, a project such as the South Saskatchewan river project should receive full consideration.

Transportation costs have been held to be a factor responsible for a lack of industrial development in the maritimes. It is hoped that action will soon be taken to implement the recommendation of the royal commission so that the handicap of unjust freight rates will no longer be a factor. I think that we in the maritimes are actually prone to forget that, having the Atlantic on our doorstep, with all-year-round harbours, we have a position that is helpful with regard to exports. It was because of this favourable factor that the newsprint industry in Nova Scotia has been such a great success.

We all know that in order to develop industries in Nova Scotia or anywhere else risk capital must be provided. Past experiences have demonstrated the success with which capital has been invested in Nova Scotia industries. Reference has been made previously in this debate to the industry in Truro operated by Stanfield's mills. I could also mention the Moirs factory in Halifax. Stanfield's and Moirs are names that are known from coast to coast. Then there is the Simms company in New Brunswick which makes brushes and—as we certainly now know—brooms. It is a firm which has made quite a success. Those are just a few illustrations to show the people in this country that this can be done.

I do not expect government-owned and operated industries to be set up in our province. That is the socialist way, with its regimentation and its bureaucratic mismanagement. Nova Scotians should do their own encouraging of capital to come into the province. Capital was encouraged to come into my own constituency where the Mersey Paper Company, Limited, has operated for over 20 years. This newsprint industry changed completely the economic life of my home town and county, and it has had a great effect on the economy of the whole province.

Anyone who cries out that we are going to the dogs in Nova Scotia should look about him before making such a statement. Let him take a look at the lumber industry. Let him take a look at the fishing fleet: not only the number but the size of the boats has increased a great deal during the last two years. There are new plants established all over the province, some of them small and some of them extremely large. The herring industry is a new one in our province; herring are cured and exported to the United States. It is an industry which we did not have until just a few years ago. The swordfishing industry is one that is expanding on our coast. The incomes of the fishermen may not be equal to those of people engaged in other industries, but for the fisherman who is ambitious and willing to work and take the necessary risks, his earnings are sufficient to make his way of life a happy one.

Notwithstanding the fact that Nova Scotia is third among all the provinces in dollar value of defence contracts awarded, I believe that we should, however, receive more preference than we do at present. I should like to give one example. In the town of Shelburne there is a company known as Ven-Rez Products, Limited, specializing in classroom furniture and office furniture. That is a factory that was set up after the war by two young veterans. Their product is of the highest quality, and has given every satisfaction. They have successfully developed a market for their product not only in the maritimes but in other provinces. Because of their insistence on maintaining quality they so far have been unable to meet price competition when tendering on defence orders, although the difference in quotations has been very little indeed in some instances. It seems to me that in cases of companies like that, there should be some system of allocation so that they could participate in some of these orders.

I should now like to say a few words in connection with refits and repairs to naval ships. During the last war a yard in my home town of Liverpool, known as Thompson Brothers, enjoyed the distinction of being one of the most important bases in the east for the refitting of minesweepers, corvettes and other naval ships. A large and well-equipped plant was built up, the full peacetime use of which has not been found possible. A certain amount of this kind of work has been carried on, as well as the manufacturing of oil burners and oil tanks. But with the steel situation as it is, the latter has had to be severely curtailed.

In recent months one naval minesweeper was refitted on a lowest-tender basis. This demonstrated the ability of this yard to do this work economically, quickly and well. A recent return, in answer to an inquiry of mine, reveals that 34 such ships are being repurchased from civilian owners; and such ships will no doubt require work done on them. However, Mr. Speaker, it will be considered unfair to the maritimes if this type of defence work is undertaken in those provinces already obtaining such a large proportion of defence orders. I would therefore urge that every consideration be given to this and other Nova Scotia yards, as a demonstration of the government's desire to decentralize defence industry wherever practical and possible.

Mr. G. M. Ferrie (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say how pleased I am with the budget. It does not do all I would wish it to do, and I will have something to say about that matter later. All those on my left are doing just exactly what they did a little over a year ago, crying: Doom, doom, doom; our trade is gone; farm products will be worth nothing and there will be a great mass of unemployment. The situation has now turned out to be just the reverse.

Here and now I wish to say that in my opinion there is no inflation. A third of the people, who were slaves to society—the farmers and the fishermen—are now getting a fair share of the economy of the country. Why do I say this? The farmer or the fisherman —and there are both in my riding—takes his product to the market and the buyer tells him what he will give him for it. Every other industry tells the consumer what he will pay for the product. Very seldom does the fisherman or the farmer have a seller's market.

This is the only time since 1929 that the farmer has had a fair price for his products. Some of these prices may seem to the people to be out of line; but when you consider the prices that were paid to the producer in 1932, you can readily see why we have such a feeling amongst the people that there is an inflation.

Let us take a few of the basic commodities and compare their prices as of 1932 and 1951; but before going into the figures, I should like to state that in the United States of America, in February, the government there set the retail price of beef at the highest price between December 15, 1950, and January 15, 1951; and that price is still holding good. That price controlled our market in Canada. Prime beef, at that time, was 58 cents to 61 cents a pound by the carcass; that is for prime beef in the United States. We seldom have that class of beef to ship out of this country. The beef that we generally ship out they call good, and down there it was bringing 55 cents to 57 cents a pound for the whole carcass. That means our red ribbon beef. What we call the blue was 52½ cents to 58 cents, and the common was 48 cents to 51 cents. I wish to bring to the notice of the house that this was certainly a control put on all animal products except pork, because the price of veal was set and the price of lamb was set at the same time in the same way.

The reason that the price of pork was not set was that there is an act in the United States which states that no control may be put on unless the price of a farm product is up to parity, and at this time pork was not up to parity, and it has not reached it yet. We have beef products under control as I have just stated. We have hides under a control; we have butter and milk under control.

The leader of the C.C.F. party said that they have been asking for controls ever since 1948. He also said that he wanted to have a roll-back in prices. Does he want a roll-back in prices of foodstuffs? To what year? Surely he does not want to go back to any time in the 1930's, for instance, when all the farmers in Canada were going behind. Maybe those in eastern Canada were not going behind so much as those in western Canada; but the whole farming population was in distress during that period. Let us take for instance the difference between 1932 farm commodity prices and those of 1951. Let us begin with eggs. The wholesale price of eggs in February 1932 in the west was 9 cents a dozen. In February, 1951, the wholesale price was 35 cents a dozen in the west. In 1932 hogs were $3.08 a hundred. Today they are $22.50, a rise of 730 per cent. For the same period the wholesale prices of other commodities were as follows. I am not going to put the whole list in. I shall give a few of the outstanding ones. In February, 1932, butcher steers were worth $3.22 a hundred. In February, 1951, they were worth 29 cents a pound, making an over-all increase of 900 per cent. Lambs of 100 pounds were worth $3.64. Today they are worth 32 cents a pound, making an increase of 879 per cent. Here is an outstanding example, and I hope that those people who are looking for controls will think a little bit about it. Let us compare wool with lamb. In 1932 wool was 7 cents a pound and I should like to ask any hon. member if he would like to raise sheep to receive 7 cents a pound for wool. Today wool is worth $1 plus a pound, making an increase of 1,420 per cent. I would ask those people who are advocating controls to take a look at what happened not only in 1932 but in 1935 to see how the farmer was progressing and to see who was getting the benefit.

It is well that we understand that farming is still Canada's greatest basic industry and that if we Canadians are to continue to enjoy an over-all level of prosperity we must guarantee to the farmer not only price stability but economic price parity with all other industries. However, such guarantees, in the light of past experience with tariffs and customs regulations to protect the manufacturer and industrial worker, high prices and wages, can only be effective by guaranteed floor prices and subsidies, when necessary.

Canadian agriculture never did, until recently, receive and enjoy price equality with other industries and workers, having to sell at world price levels while buying in a highly protected market, where wages and prices were far above the average world level. It is only through everlasting and nation-wide co-operation, including the government, that the present high level of economic equality can be maintained for agriculture.

We have been able, through the past eight years, by good salesmanship on the part of our trade and commerce and agricultural departments, to market all our surplus farm products, with only one small exception, namely, eggs, at the highest general price level ever received by the Canadian farmer.

But that may not always be, and that is when stabilized prices are needed, if the whole broad Canadian economy is not to suffer a serious setback.

Our experience during the war years has clearly demonstrated the value of subsidies and floor prices. They have given to agriculture a degree of economic stability never before enjoyed by the Canadian farmer, or perhaps by any other group of farmers in the world, and every man, woman and child in this nation of ours has benefited by that stability.

With all our great gold, iron, copper, zinc and other minerals, with our vast oil resources, with our extensive industrial and manufacturing industries, farming is still the greatest of them all and without agriculture the others would be pretty weak and wobbly. There is one outstanding fundamental, which not only applies to the army but also applies to the industrial worker—the army travels on its stomach and so does every other individual.

Why is farming so healthy and has been for the past eight years? Largely because our national government gave ear to advice and accepted assistance from our grain pools and farm organizations generally, who have made sound recommendations, to which, in most cases, our government has been agreeable.

In the view of some people, our farm prices have not, during the war and post-war years, been high enough, while another set of Canadians have protested that the prices of farm products at the consumer level have been too high. I wish to say here again that unless the farmer is prosperous and is making a fair profit nobody else has a good standard of living.

Mr. Speaker, let me say that there is only one way that you can reach an ideal in this world, and that is to work toward it. There are two things, I think, that the people of this country are more interested in than anything else. The first is peace and the second is to get rid of communism.

Both these can be accomplished if the working people of Canada will put their shoulder to the wheel. This, in my opinion, is a wonderful opportunity for the union leaders of Canada to come forward and say to the people and to their government, "While this crisis is on, which affects our homes and every one of us, we will work fifty hours a week, for the same rate of pay, and we will raise the production of this country beyond anything that has ever been seen in our history."

This is the kind of patriotic spirit we need in the leaders of all our labour and agricultural organizations and all the people involved. In this way we can have our guns and also our butter. And I am sure the people of Canada would be only too willing, after the crisis is over, to say that there will be a forty-hour week across the depth and the breadth of the country.

I want to say to the member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the leader of the C.C.F. party, that I cannot understand why he, as a representative of the farm population of western Canada, would want for one minute to have controls imposed on his farmers. I want to emphasize this point to him, that the first to suffer under controls is the farming population.

I will give you just one illustration, and I think he should do some real studying. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) made a statement in this house on control of the price of hides. How much has this control cost the livestock producer of Canada? When he is through figuring that out, I think he will forget, or want to forget, all about controls.

I would also like to bring to the attention of the C.C.F. party that controls may be just around the corner but no one who values his liberty will seek to advance that evil day. Workers and trade unions should be particularly concerned to avert what is at least a public misfortune and what could prove to be a calamity, for price controls are inseparable from wage controls and from that freezing of employment which is the same as what in other climes is called slave labour.

The hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair) made a good speech the other day with regard to the dairy cow and butter, but I would like to bring to his attention and that of the house that the dairy cow has kept pace with the increase in population. This country has made wonderful strides in dairying since 1915. I should like to place on record the following figures showing the advancement in each province, the millions of pounds of butter which have been produced in that period, 1915 to 1950, a table of which I will hand to Hansard, if I may.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles: Where is it from?

Mr. Ferrie: The table is as follows:

*Preliminary

I hope this statement will show to the people of Canada that it is well worth their while to take care of the dairy cow. I think our duty as members of this house is to try to convince the people that dairy products are still a great part of our national livelihood and that the cow will produce a good profit if well taken care of. Favourite communist tactics are to go around telling the people that such things are not worth while. It was done systematically in our north country, even while many farm homes were on relief and every morsel of food was precious.

We in Saskatchewan realize what benefits the people of Ontario and Quebec have had out of electricity, made possible by their abundant water resources.

The South Saskatchewan river dam would change the whole standard of living in Saskatchewan. It would keep the young people on the farm. It would put many thousands more acres under cultivation, for, as an irrigation project, it is of primary importance. The cropland brought under full cultivation will bring with it increased production, with greater security for permanent settlement. Such production would, in the ordinary course of events, increase income, lessen the cost of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and, in due time, increase the density of settlement in a vast area. The history of irrigation indicates that these results are obtained.

With increased settlement of a stable character there would be increased purchasing power created and a demand for manufactured goods. This dam, constructed to supply, as its primary objective, increased agricultural production, has the secondary objective of the development of electrical energy.

This would give us one real city, the city of Saskatoon, which would be able to develop light industries and would take care of a lot of ore from the north, if the city has cheap power. It would help to cheapen all the power to the farms all through the province, and thus bring down the cost of production.

There is $1 million to be spent this year. Some people would think that this sum is small considering the total cost but, as every reasonable thinking person would know, ground work must be completed first. This is not costly work but it is doubtful if more could be accomplished in one year than the negotiating and the laying out of this large project. The job started will increase at a faster rate when heavy construction will have to be done.

While the spending of large sums of money for defence is necessary, the development of the country, with a corresponding increase of wealth and people, must also be undertaken.

Mr. Speaker, I said in the first part of this speech that I am pleased with the budget, but it does not do all that I would like to see done. There is no provision made in the budget for relief to local self-government. This sales tax attacks the municipalities, who are not profit-making corporations, in the same way as it attacks profit-making corporations.

The municipalities—the government of the country just the same as the federal government—are rendering service to the people, doing a lot of development work and carrying a lot of social services, which are rendered directly to the individual. If it is impossible to take the sales tax off such things as the machinery bought by the municipalities, then the government should give a grant in lieu of this tax to every municipality in Canada of 1,000 inhabitants or more.

I give you one illustration. A municipality would buy a caterpillar tractor, a bulldozer and a hydraulic scraper, which would cost from $15,000 to $20,000. This tax would add to the cost another $1,500 to $2,000. There is no doubt in my mind that if there are any bodies in this country which need relief from the heavy burdens they are shouldering they are the municipalities of Canada.

In closing, I would say that I would like to see more done for the youth of our country. Youth is the foundation of our country and our greatest asset. People will have to have food, and more food, to the end of time, and youth should be trained to realize that they should stay on the land. But capital must be found whereby youth can establish itself. In my opinion, there is no reason why the facilities of the Veterans Land Act cannot be carried into civilian life, to the benefit of the whole country and the world.

Mr. Auguste Maltais (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to take part in this debate, but after listening to the excellent speech by the hon. member for Saguenay (Mr. Brisson) in which he advocated the need for a railroad on the north shore, I consider it my duty to give him some support. As there has been a ruling that texts should not be used in the House of Commons I shall have to be brief as I have no text. However, I shall continue my remarks in the French language.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, the request made last night in this house by the hon. member for Saguenay (Mr. Brisson) is not new, since it dates back to 1916. That was the dream of Sir Rodolphe Forget, who built part of that railroad. I would like to put on record a motion which was placed at my request on the order paper, at the beginning of this session. It deals with the purchasing and improving of that railroad. I quote:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the competent authorities should give early consideration to the advisability of (a) purchasing the railway communications between Quebec and St. Joachim; (b) improving the line between St. Joachim and La Malbaie, in the county of Charlevoix; (c) extending the said communications into the county of Saguenay, by way of Clermont, county of Charlevoix, in order to facilitate the development of the immense resources of Ungava, to make the district more accessible and to provide a railway system for that important part of Canada in a national emergency.

To establish clearly the geographical position of this railway, I should point out that the district of Charlevoix is east of the city of Quebec. The present railway leaves Quebec, crosses the municipalities of Chateau Richer, Ste. Anne de Beaupre, famous for its shrine, Beaupre which boasts a paper mill and a distillery, reaches St. Joachim, continues to petite riviere St. Francois, crosses Baie St. Paul, linking the parishes of St. Hilarion and St. Urbain, passes through St. Joseph de la Rive and from there to St. Irenee, Pointe au Pic, Murray Bay and finally Clermont.

The district of Charlevoix has a population of close to 40,000 whilst the district of Saguenay, as the hon. member for Saguenay pointed out yesterday evening, has a population of approximately 35,000.

It might be well to put on record what Mr. Meighen thought of this railway in 1916, when speaking in the debate. At that time, naturally, approximately 85 per cent of the Charlevoix railway was built. Construction had been started by individuals and assistance from the government had been sought in order to complete the railway. Here is what Mr. Meighen said, as reported on page 4014 of Hansard for 1916:

(Text):

When they sit by, therefore, and see their hopes being dispelled by the destruction year by year of the money that has already been spent by private enterprise to reach them, it is no wonder, particularly when they are being called upon to pay their share in connection with other railway projects, that they feel that they have a claim to some recognition at this time. What I want to emphasize is this: These people have a claim that differs entirely from other districts, in that millions of money have gone in there and that that money is being gradually sunk, being almost literally washed away by the river St. Lawrence and by the other corroding acts of time. The longer we wait the more we shall have to pay at some time in order that that district may get the service to which it is entitled. If the population is there—and those who ought to know say it is—and if the population is sure to come—and those who ought to know say it will come—then there will be vindication, there will be justification of this measure. Let us now look upon the matter in the broad way in which we ought to look upon it, even in a time like this.

I wish also to put on record what Sir Wilfrid Laurier said in the same debate.

The usefulness of the railway has been recognized by all governments.

And again:

It is true we are living in strenuous times, and that perhaps now is not the most propitious time we could choose; it is true also that we should be as careful as possible about launching into new enterprises. Unfortunately, this is not a new enterprise, and for my part I should like to see it completed.

(Translation):

Following this discussion, the house then passed an act authorizing the government to purchase the Charlevoix railroad and also that line running from Quebec to St. Joachim. The Canadian National then used this legislation to purchase the railroad between Clermont and St. Joachim. What remains to be expropriated now is the part belonging to the Quebec Railway, running from Quebec to St. Joachim, over a distance of about 30 miles.

More than two million people travel on this part of the railroad each year. In 1950, close to 450,000 tons of freight were shipped over that railway line.

Naturally, this is a rather complex problem and the Canadian National cannot be blamed for improving a railway section not linked to its main system. If we look into the possibility of building a railway on the north shore, where part of the road already crosses the county of Charlevoix, it would be important that the government use the powers provided for in the 1916 legislation in order to expropriate the Quebec Railway so as to increase as much as possible the benefits obtained by the operation of this railway.

It is not difficult to understand why the Canadian National shows an operational deficit on the Murray Bay service since the better part of the revenue is acquired by the Quebec Railway which operates the train over 30 miles through the most profitable part of the district.

I am now concluding my remarks since I firmly intend to introduce the same resolution during the next session and to discuss it at length. I am sorry that during this session circumstances and parliamentary procedure with which I am unfamiliar have made this impossible. The resolution itself is only postponed and I hope until such time as it comes up again the government will seriously take up the matter.

Mr. A. Phileas Cote (Matapedia-Matane): Mr. Speaker, since yesterday, the budget debate seems to have become a first-rate French-speaking contest; I shall therefore speak in my mother tongue.

We are asked, under the present budget, to approve additional taxation which will require us Canadians to pull in our belts to the same extent as our cousins in England. Present conditions offer at least one advantage; it is that we are placed on an equal footing with them. Let us hope that they are as happy as we are about the turn of events.

Let us also hope that the money the government will derive from these taxes will not serve exclusively to kill human beings and that we will become no more hysterical on this side of the Atlantic than our British cousins. For if we are to judge from their attitude our friends over there have kept their heads as well as our money. To my point of view, this does not indicate that people in the most vulnerable country are panic-stricken or that there is either an imminent or a remote danger that we shall witness the end of the world.

This attitude on the part of our friends in Great Britain should mitigate somewhat the hysteria which has overtaken far too many people on this side of the Atlantic. This hysteria, in fact, has done little to promote the cause of peace in our world; should it not be held in check, it may well not only jeopardize the cause of peace but, there and then, the future of the civilized world. I do not think that our crusade in Korea will constitute in the history of mankind a page which will be a credit to our modern Caesars. In spite of the rather dark prospects in Europe, it is not so sure that the efforts made will be necessary and if they should be that they will necessarily be successful. Nor would this be, for practical purposes, an epic in the history of the world.

Therefore, we might be well advised to examine, and examine most carefully, the proposals put forth, before taking a header in boiling water, or rather in boiling oil, since that is, in my opinion, the true purpose of the feverish preparations going on on both sides of the barricade.

It would then be possible to analyse, from all its angles, a problem that may soon prove to be insoluble in this era of the atomic and germ bombs.

After such an analysis, it might not be so chimerical to hope that by clothing, feeding, housing and caring for those we wish to liberate—and let us not wait four years to do so—our century may become the era of the humble people without anyone resorting to the atomic or germ bombs.

Such a political trend might make it easier to provide funds for the welfare of our own people, here in Canada. For in this country, as in Europe and Asia, some people would certainly be less inclined to serve an ideology other than democracy, were democracy itself to give them less cause for criticism or even, simply, for doubt.

I, for my part, am of the opinion that the saying "the spirit is willing, but the flesh is weak" truly applies not only outside of Canada, but within our very borders.

There is no point in deceiving ourselves. We must admit that there are some people in this country who have been expecting since 1945 the benefits supposedly accruing from the beneficial legislation of 1944: reconstruction and social welfare legislation.

Farmers, fishermen, workers, merchants, the whole population indeed, and especially the people of Quebec in these various spheres of activity, have been waiting ever since 1945. But, like sister Ann, they have seen nothing coming in so far as the implementation of these measures is concerned. I will be told that Ottawa is still waiting for permission from some legislatures to proceed with the plans set forth in 1944.

I will be told also that legislation concerning family allowances, unemployment insurance and various kinds of pensions has already given the desired results.

[Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane).]

But I am sure, as I was in 1946, that the most efficient way to oppose the false prophets either in this country or elsewhere is—but allow me at this point to quote what I said at page 79 of Hansard, March 19, 1946:

> The nations, aware of the fact that the inescapable realities of our time make it imperative for them all to reorient their thinking with regard to their respective sovereign state authority in relation to world wide sovereignty, will, I hope, establish a universal government.
> As far as Canada is concerned, I am sure such an achievement presents no difficulty because, fortunately for our times, we have here in our Canadian government, statesmen who are not afraid to tackle new responsibilities in correlation with rights based on functional contributions.
>
> Such a universal government would provide social peace, as well as national security. It would accelerate free trade and ensure full employment. Full employment, in turn, would bring about better education, better medical care, better housing and more food. With social security at home, no country need fear for its national security, as long as similar conditions prevail all over the world and particularly in the neighbouring countries.
>
> And to ensure a better distribution of wealth, which is, of course, the best safeguard against aggression, it would implement international monetary agreements, provide a proper administration of stabilization funds, international banks or at least clearing houses.
> But, most of all, I firmly believe that the most important factor to co-ordinate and consolidate all elements conducive to peace is a world-wide unity of purpose. Such a unity can be reached only if all the peoples consider the world in its true perspective and from the same angle. Such an achievement can only be reached through public enlightenment. Before loving one's neighbour as oneself, one must at least know him. Thus people must be made to know each other, to respect one another's property, to understand one another's way of living and in return expect to be known better, understood better, liked better, through a professional job of international communications, incorporating all kinds of vehicles of information.

I will not make so bold as to offer here a panacea for the world's ills, but neither will I make a show of false modesty by hesitating to express my views in this debate, to all practical or impractical purposes, in the interest of this country and of its people. I am all the more confirmed in this view by hearing and seeing in action some of those who have taken upon themselves to correct the vices of others in the national or international sphere, a most thankless business indeed.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): May I, in conclusion, suggest to the commoners in this house, whose duty it is, both on the national and the international levels, to set the course of our policy, keeping in mind what might be achieved, for example, by a universal government equipped with legislation, the observance of which would also be entrusted to a universal force—consider for instance how much the humanization of mankind might be furthered through education rather than coercion, through amenity rather than austerity—may I say: social security and national security, yes, they are necessary; but not necessarily through war and austerity.

He said: Tomorrow we shall take up the budget resolutions.

Mr. Fleming: Which one will be taken first? Under which act?

Mr. Abbott: I am not quite sure, but I think probably the Excise Tax Act. Frankly, I had not anticipated that the debate would conclude this afternoon. It will be either the resolutions with respect to the Excise Tax Act or the resolutions respecting the personal income tax. I would hope that hon. members would be prepared to discuss either group.

Mr. Graydon: The non-controversial ones?

Mr. Abbott: Yes.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 6.10 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, April 26, 1951

The house met at three o'clock.

CONFERENCES

COST OF CANADIAN REPRESENTATION—REFERENCE TO REMARKS IN DEBATE ON APRIL 25

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Yesterday during the debate on the budget I raised certain points with regard to Canadian representation at a number of conferences; and as reported at page 2373 of Hansard I said:

> But I wonder how important to the government and the people of Canada was a conference described as the international congress of chocolate and cocoa manufacturers which was held at Lausanne last year.

Then further on I said:

> And I do not know that we have heard anything of what was gained by our attendance at the international congress of psychiatrists at Paris, or the meeting of the directing council and sanitary conference of the Pan-American bureau of Ciudad Trujillo.

Later I referred to the Washington conference of the society of vertebrate palaeontology and the palaeontological society. At that point I noticed that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) was about to rise, and I mentioned that fact. Then, as reported in Hansard, the Secretary of State for External Affairs said:

> I was just going to say there were no delegations at those conferences.

It is possible that there is some distinction in the use of words which is in the mind of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but certainly the thought conveyed to my mind, and I know to others, was that this statement was incorrect as to the fact that Canada had attended those conferences. I therefore should like to refer to the report of the Department of External Affairs for the year 1950, issued over the signature of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. At pages 82 and 83 I find that Canada was represented, according to the official statement of the department, at the conferences which I have just mentioned.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if I may, I should like to add a word on the question of privilege raised by the hon. gentleman. If my intervention yesterday gave the impression, as it might well have done, that there was no Canadian representation of any kind at these conferences, I was entirely wrong, and I apologize to the hon. gentleman and to the house for giving that impression. It is quite true that, with regard to these four conferences, there were individual Canadian observers at two of them and individual Canadian representatives from departments of government at the other two. In that sense, Mr. Speaker, Canada was represented at those four meetings; and I am extremely sorry to have given the wrong impression by my intervention yesterday.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

That the name of Mr. Weaver be substituted for that of Mr. Maybank on the standing committee on public accounts.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, to obtain the information asked in part 1 (c) in the three questions which appear on the order paper as Nos. 4, 5 and 6, would require detailed examination of something over 12,000 files. I propose therefore to answer the three questions subject to this reservation, and I would ask that with the reservation the questions be declared answered.

Mr. Speaker: Questions 4, 5 and 6, asked by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Balcom), are answered, subject to the reservation made by the parliamentary assistant.

BUTTER

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT AS TO FLOOR PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture. Is he in a position to say when we may have a statement regarding butter?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I am still hopeful I shall be able to make a statement tomorrow.

REFERENCE TO STORAGE FIGURES GIVEN IN RETURN TABLED APRIL 12

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture. A return, sessional paper 159-A, having to do with butter held in storage and sold by the government, was tabled in my name on April 12, 1951. In this return it is stated that the total sales for January and February, 1951, amounted to 17,696,793 pounds, whereas total individual sales, according to the figures set out in the return, total 18,653,620 pounds. Will the minister find out why there is that discrepancy between the actual figures and the figures given?

Mr. Cruickshank: The rest melted.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I shall look into the figures, and give special attention to the alleged discrepancy.

KOREA

RETALIATORY MEASURES IN THE EVENT OF BOMBING FROM MANCHURIAN BASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has Canada, as a participant in military action in Korea and as a member of the United Nations, been consulted regarding the announcement that enemy air bases in Manchuria will be attacked if the Chinese communists use heavy air power against United Nations troops? If so, will the minister make a statement in this connection?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the important point raised by the hon. member, I would say that so far as the government is aware, no announcement on the subject has been made. The hon. member is presumably referring to a report in this morning's newspapers which is attributed to a spokesman for the United States delegation at Lake Success.

Mr. Coldwell: That is right.

Mr. Pearson: However, I am very glad to have this opportunity of making a brief statement of the government's position in regard to this matter.

Some five months ago the government informed the United States government, in response to an inquiry from that government—they brought the matter up—that, though a strong case could be made under international law that the United Nations commander in chief had the right to retaliate against any air attacks launched from Manchuria, we considered it important, as indeed did other governments, that no military operations take place outside Korean borders without specific authority from the United Nations.

Since that time various aspects of the Korean operations have been the subject of discussions in Washington, as indeed I have indicated previously in the house, among representatives of the countries having forces in Korea.

So far, however, the Canadian government has received no request for concurrence in any proposal to authorize United Nations retaliation upon enemy air bases outside Korea, probably for the very good reason that there has been no massive enemy air bombing from Manchuria. If there is such air intervention, for the consequences of which the Chinese communists would have to bear full responsibility, it is our view that those countries with forces in Korea, and participating in military operations there, should be consulted in regard to the implications of that action—that is, air bombing—and in regard to any retaliatory action which may be required to meet it.

However, it is of course possible to visualize a situation where immediate retaliatory action, without consultation, might be unavoidable in pursuing enemy bombers back to the Manchurian air base from which they came. The decision on the spot to take such immediate retaliatory action would presumably be based on overriding considerations of military security.

In any discussions regarding more general retaliatory action against Manchurian air bases, the decision to authorize such action would, as we see it, have to balance very carefully local military considerations against the risk of precipitating a further extension of the war and the effect of such an extension on the security of the United Nations forces in Korea, and the accomplishment of United Nations aims there.

Mr. Graydon: Is there any continuing conference of representatives of nations whose forces are engaged in Korea, through which these matters can be cleared at very short notice; or do they have to go through the long procedure of conferring among the governments of the various countries?

Mr. Pearson: No; the representatives of governments contributing forces to the Korean campaign meet almost daily in Washington, and on a level high enough to make it possible to get a decision almost immediately in respect of these matters.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

UNITED STATES BASES IN NEWFOUNDLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. T. Stick (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. A report from Washington last night stated that an agreement has been concluded in connection with the American bases in Newfoundland, and will be announced shortly. Would the Prime Minister care to make a statement in the matter at this time?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I thank the hon. member for having sent me this morning notice of his intention to ask this question, which refers to negotiations still under way with the government of the United States. I do not think it would be proper for me to make any statement today, but I hope to be in a position to do so early next week.

HOUSING

QUESTION AS TO LOANS UNDER NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Resources and Development. In view of the increasing reluctance or outright refusal of Canadian insurance companies to make loans for house building in many localities under the National Housing Act, has the government considered entering the housing field where necessary and providing the total National Housing Act loan, as it is empowered to do under the act?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): I thank the hon. member for having given notice of his question. I can only say that the whole problem of housing is receiving the active consideration of the government. The decisions made will be announced from time to time.

Mr. Thatcher: Does the minister realize that many Canadian insurance companies in most parts of Canada are not lending money under the National Housing Act?

Mr. Winters: I am aware of the development in that field.

IMMIGRATION

REPORT AS TO TREATMENT OF PERSONS COMING TO CANADA FROM EUROPE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. A week ago I asked a question arising out of a statement which had been made by John Fisher, the well known C.B.C. commentator, with regard to the treatment of immigrants. The day before yesterday Mr. Fisher is again reported to have spoken in Toronto to the effect that he is still healthily hot under the collar over the way immigrants are treated when they arrive in Canada. I should like to ask the minister whether he has made any investigation with regard to the statement made by Mr. Fisher to the end that any bureaucratic injustices to immigrants will be done away with, if such action is justified by the investigation.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): As the hon. member has said, this matter was drawn to the government's attention a week ago today. We attempted to get in touch with Mr. Fisher to ascertain the basis of his complaints, and succeeded in doing so only the day before yesterday, by telephone, when he promised to write us and let us know the details. His letter was received this morning, and I would prefer to wait until tomorrow to make an answer.

Mr. Brooks: Can the minister state at what port the immigration station in question is located?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): The first report which appeared in the Toronto Telegram referred to Moncton. The Telegram got in touch with our immigration officer at Moncton to ask for his reaction. As a result, Mr. Fisher sent a telegram to our office at Moncton apologizing and stating that he had not intended to refer to him but rather to the inspection at Montreal. It is that port we are now discussing.

NATIONAL CAPITAL PLAN

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to ask the Prime Minister if the final report of the national capital planning committee is ready.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I understand that the report is being completed and will be ready for presentation at a function which the chairman of the federal district commission is now arranging. I cannot indicate just what the details of the arrangements are, but I know that simultaneously with the publication of the report he is arranging for a meeting of one of the advisory boards of the federal district commission.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will that meeting have to take place before the report is tabled?

Mr. St. Laurent: I understand that Mr. Greber is about to come over, or is on his way over, and that all that is being co-ordinated to take place at the same time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PERSONNEL OF INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE SECTION OF DEPARTMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, of which I have given notice. I might explain that in the ordinary course of events this question could be put forward conveniently as a question on the order paper, but in view of the fact that the budget resolutions are being discussed I am putting the question in this way. I should like to know the number of employees in the international conference section which was set up last year to deal with invitations to international conferences, and the name of the official who heads that section.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The international conference section of the Department of External Affairs is a branch of the United Nations division and reports directly to the under-secretary. It consists of a foreign service officer, two clerks grade IV, and a stenographer. Subject to correction, I think the name of the foreign service officer is Mr. Hardy. If that is not the correct name, I shall be glad to give it to my hon. friend later.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): In view of the fact that a week has passed since the date on which the Prime Minister expected to be able to table the report of the royal commission on arts, letters and sciences, will he indicate when we may now expect it?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I stated subsequently that I had been too optimistic. I have been informed that there are some difficulties in connection with the translation and printing of the report, and the latest information I have is that we may not have it until about May 14.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM FOR THE PRESENT SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): In view of the fact that the budget debate has now been completed, will the Prime Minister indicate to the house the legislation that the government proposes to introduce during the present session?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I should not like to attempt to do that without notice. A substantial legislative program is indicated on the order paper, and before that is disposed of by the house there will be several other items added. I should not like to attempt at this moment to give anything like a complete indication of what it may be necessary to deal with during the course of this session. As early as we can find it convenient to do so, we will make as complete a statement as possible.

Mr. Drew: As a supplementary comment I would point out that while the press reports may be entirely speculative, there have been some comments about the possibility of not carrying forward an extensive legislative program during the current part of this session but deferring it to the autumn. It is with such a possibility in mind that I express the hope that we will proceed with the legislative program with some knowledge of when the various measures will be coming up. I was thinking particularly of the possibility of the early introduction of old age pensions legislation, in view of the statement made yesterday by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson).

Mr. St. Laurent: I can assure the leader of the opposition that just as soon as we have cleared the matter of the text with the ten provincial governments there will be an address submitted to this house and to the other place to seek the constitutional amendment required. With respect to the speculative stories in the newspapers about an adjournment of the house, to proceed again in the autumn, I can assure the hon. gentleman that I was as much surprised as he was to see that in the newspapers, because it was something which had not been given any consideration by the government.

BUSINESS FOR FRIDAY, APRIL 27

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. L. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): I should like to direct a question to either the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) or the house leader, the Minister of Public Works. In view of the fact that a large number of members are going to Toronto tomorrow afternoon to acquire some culture, would the government be willing to indicate what will be the order of business tomorrow when everybody is away?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): We are living in the hope that the budget resolutions will carry today. I am holding back the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) from travelling to Toronto, so that he can conclude his estimates and take up one bill.

NEWSPRINT

PRESS REPORT OF ADDRESS DELIVERED IN NEW YORK BY CONTROLLER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Defence Production. Has the minister's attention been called to a report in today's press of an address made in New York by Mr. Fowler, the newsprint controller, in which he is reported to have taken a stand against any price ceiling on newsprint being established by the United States? May I ask whether Mr. Fowler was expressing Canadian government policy in taking that stand?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): I am sorry I have not seen the report, but I presume that if Mr. Fowler made such an address he was speaking in his capacity of president of the Canadian Pulp and Paper Association. He had no authority, so far as this government is concerned, to state that as a policy, as an officer of the government.

Mr. Knowles: May I just point out that in the newspaper report Mr. Fowler is referred to as acting in both capacities, as president of the pulp and paper association and also as the government newsprint controller.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Dion in the chair.

EXCISE TAX ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Excise Tax Act and to provide:

1. That the rate of the general sales tax be increased from eight to ten per cent and that the rate of sales tax on those articles at present subject to four per cent be increased to five per cent.

2. That the excise tax on goods mentioned in schedule I of the act, and on furs, that are at present subject to the rate of fifteen per cent be increased to twenty-five per cent.

3. That the excise tax on candy, chocolate, chewing gum and confectionery that may be classed as candy or a substitute for candy, be reduced from thirty to fifteen per cent.

4. That there be imposed, levied and collected an excise tax of fifteen per cent on the following goods when adapted to household or apartment use:

(a) stoves, hot plates, grills and other appliances when adapted wholly or in part for cooking and when designed for using other than solid fuels;

(b) washing machines operated by electric or other power;

(c) electric, gas or kerosene refrigerators and freezing equipment and complete parts therefor including coils, condensing or compressor units, motors, cabinets, boxes, evaporators and expansion valves.

5. That the excise tax on cigarette papers and cigarette paper tubes be repealed.

6. That the excise tax on the following goods be increased by the amounts shown:

(a) for each five cigarettes or fraction of five cigarettes contained in any package, three-quarters of one cent;

(b) for each ounce or fraction of an ounce of manufactured tobacco, including snuff but not including cigars and cigarettes, contained in any package, three cents;

(c) for each ounce or fraction of an ounce of Canadian raw leaf tobacco when sold for consumption in Canada, three-quarters of one cent.

7. That the sales tax on the following goods be repealed:

(a) cortisone;

(b) adrenocorticotrophin (ACTH).

8. That any enactment founded upon this resolution be deemed to have come into force on the eleventh day of April, nineteen hundred and fifty-one.

The Chairman: Order. The house in committee of ways and means to consider a certain resolution, Excise Tax Act. Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No. I take it we are dealing with paragraph 1 of the Excise Tax Act resolution. So far as the rate of the sales tax is concerned, I do not propose to reiterate the remarks which I and others have made, but in view of the strong feeling about it I want to ask one general question. The minister made the ingenious argument in his budget speech that it did not affect people very much. I do not think we would get a majority for that view anywhere in the country except in this chamber. In view of the fact that it is proposed to increase the rate of tax by twenty-five per cent, from eight to ten, or from four to five, as the case may be, I should like to ask whether any consideration has been given to the possibility of increasing the exemptions under the tax in order to try to offset the burden of the added cost of living which will fall on so many people as a result of the addition to the tax.

Mr. James Sinclair (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Each year when the sales tax is reviewed by the budget committee consideration is of course given to the base of exemptions as well as to the rate of tax. Each year has seen that base extended, and some years quite measurably. For example, that was the case in 1949 and 1950. This year, when we are faced with the problem of raising extra revenue, of course conditions are not quite as favourable as usual to expanding the base, but consideration was given. There are one or two small exemptions this year from the sales tax involving drugs, but that is the only broadening of the base.

As to the hon. member's comments about the part of the family income spent on goods which are subject to sales tax, I have here an analysis by the dominion bureau of statistics giving a break-down according to the various income classes and categories of expenditure. It is not the sort of table that I can read, but if it is of any interest I can have it put on Hansard.

Mr. Low: Would you put it on Hansard?

The Chairman: Has the hon. member permission?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Sinclair: The table is as follows:

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The parliamentary assistant referred to one or two highly specialized commodities. I take it his answer is that the matter has been considered, and that it is not proposed to do anything further to broaden the base of exemption.

Mr. Sinclair: That is right.

Mr. Fleming: I wonder if the parliamentary assistant has with him information as to the amount realized by way of sales tax on such staple articles as clothing and shoes?

Mr. Sinclair: I am informed there is no break-down that way at all. The tax is levied at the manufacturer's or wholesaler's level, whichever is more convenient, and the tax is paid on all goods that are subject to sales tax—clothing, shoes, and so forth; but the Department of National Revenue does not keep separate records of such goods.

Mr. Fleming: I wonder how the department can perform its function in connection with the preparation of the budget each year, or advise the minister or the budget committee as to what steps should be taken with reference to expanding the exemptions from the sales tax, unless there is a break-down indicating the amount levied on various staple commodities. We all know that clothing of practically every kind is subject to sales tax. Boots and shoes are subject to sales tax. The clothing that all of us are wearing in this house this afternoon has been subject to sales tax if produced in Canada. I must express some surprise that it is not possible for the government to acquaint the house with the amount realized from this tax on staple necessities of that kind.

It is because the tax applies heavily, and will hereafter apply more heavily, to staple necessities of life that we in the opposition have been so firm in our denunciation of this increase. At a time when inflation and the soaring cost of living have laid burdens upon people of slender means which under present conditions they are simply not able to bear, the imposition of an increased burden of this kind on the very necessities of life is worthy only of denunciation at the hands of members who are vigilant to do their duty in the face of the difficulties under which so many Canadians are labouring today in making ends meet.

I have mentioned the clothing that we wear, the shoes on our feet. There are many other necessities of life the cost of which is going to be severely increased as a result of this further imposition by way of sales tax. I gave a simple illustration the other day, the scribblers, pencils and things of that nature that school children are going to have to buy. In some municipalities these articles are provided by the boards of education at the expense of the local taxpayers. What justification can there be for the federal government to increase impositions of that kind on such necessities, the cost of which is borne either by the parents of school children or by municipal taxpayers who have to provide the means out of which boards of education purchase these necessities? What justification can there be for the federal government to tax local governments in that way? It seems to me that a government at Ottawa that proceeds on that basis has chosen a course that cannot be condoned by the House of Commons.

This present budget resolution, perhaps above all budget resolutions that have provoked a storm of public protest, stands out as the one which has provoked the greatest measure of protest and consternation throughout the country. Others, of course, share the unenviable distinction of this resolution in heaping further burdens upon the shoulders of those who can barely stagger along now in view of the soaring cost of the necessities of life. This has the peculiar distinction of being the one which perhaps more clearly than any other offends against all the rules of budgeting that should be followed at a time like this. That is because it applies to consumers, since there is very little choice with respect to many of the commodities to which the sales tax applies. So many of those commodities, according to any civilized standard, any Canadian standard, cannot be regarded as anything but the accepted necessities of life.

This is the kind of tax that was denounced in a general election campaign ten years ago by the late Mr. Mackenzie King, who went up and down this country calling it an iniquitous tax. Yet this is the tax which in this year 1951 the Minister of Finance has chosen not simply to continue, but to increase by a further twenty-five per cent. We know things change in the Liberal party. We know they have changed drastically when we recall what was said on the subject of the sales tax by previous ministers of finance. I am sure I need not repeat the pertinent reference to the sales tax made by the late Mr. Ralston in his budget speech in 1940, the first year of the war. I am sure I need not repeat what was said on this very subject by Mr. Ilsley in wartime, and again in peacetime, in 1945. Faced with the need for increased revenue, they deliberately and purposely declined to increase the sales tax. The need for revenue was very great in the years of which I am speaking. The government claims that its need for revenue today is great. Some of us might feel more certain that the need is genuinely great if the government were not so averse to permitting any effective scrutiny of the estimates of expenditure they have asked the house to vote. Having tied the hands of the house, having prevented the house from conducting any really effective scrutiny of the estimates of expenditure, the government has deliberately invited suspicion in this house and throughout the country as to whether these gigantic increases in taxes really are necessary.

In any case, whether any increase in taxation is necessary, this is the last place it should have been imposed. If the government seriously appreciated the problem of inflation, if it understood how inflation hurts Canadians from coast to coast in trying to meet their family budgets from day to day, one would have expected a resolute effort to be made to reduce this tax which does so much to increase the cost of living. Those of us who three years ago had to sit through the agonizing experience of the special committee on prices will have some recollection that a good deal of evidence was presented to show that prices were rising and imposing a very heavy burden upon the average Canadian family just because the government was applying taxes of this kind. And those taxes, including the sales tax, are not applied only to luxuries, if you please, but in many cases to commodities which under any accepted Canadian standard are basic necessities of life. In the face of all that, however, the government chooses not to reduce the tax or even to leave it at its previous high level, but to increase it. The present minister has chosen to disregard the words of, and ignore the course followed by, his predecessors, Mr. Ralston and Mr. Ilsley. In the war years and in 1945 the need for revenue was greater, as far as finances were concerned, than is the need of the minister today; none the less they deliberately refused to increase this tax.

It was not that the tax was not easily collected. As a matter of fact, in his budget speech of 1945 Mr. Ilsley referred to the fact that the tax was very easy to collect. Therefore it is the kind of tax that might be expected to appeal to a minister of finance who was not concerned with anything more than the ease with which he and his tax collectors could put their hands into the pockets of the people and withdraw the needed revenue. Those previous ministers, faced with that problem, chose not to increase the sales tax. The present minister, faced with a similar problem, nevertheless now comes forward with a proposal that the tax be increased by a thumping twenty-five per cent. I say there is no justification whatsoever for this budget resolution. I should have thought this would have been one opportunity for private members supporting the government in this house, concerned as they surely must be with the problems being faced by Canadians in trying to meet their family budgets, to rise in their places and say: We cannot support an increase in the sales tax when we know what further burdens it is certain to impose upon Canadian families.

We will listen attentively for some evidence that the pleas of the people, particularly those of small means who by the tens of thousands in all parts of this country are barely keeping their heads above water in the face of the soaring costs of the necessities of life, have made some impression upon the private members in this house who support the government.

What does this mean? The tax does not mean just 10 per cent. We have been faced before with this question of what this tax really does mean in terms of what the consumer must pay. It is levied on the producer or manufacturer because that is where it is easiest for the government to collect it. That is the one reason why this tax is imposed at that stage of the process by which goods are fabricated and made available to the consumer. It is easy for the government to collect. It is easy to administer. It is easy to enforce. They are not dealing with so many people at that stage of production and marketing. For that reason the tax is imposed at the source; and there it is carefully hidden. But as you know, Mr. Speaker, every time a commodity passes from one hand to another the tax acts like a snowball. It attracts mark-ups at every stage. I am not going to inflict upon hon. members the example I have given previously, but you will find in a simple case where the commodity passes through only three hands, from producer to wholesaler, who adds his 10 per cent mark-up, from wholesaler to retailer, who adds his 50 per cent mark-up, and then directly into the hands of the consumer, that the tax previously amounted to not 8 per cent, but 14·4 per cent, when the consumer had to pay it. Now the tax is 10 per cent at the source, and in that simple illustration by the time it reaches the consumer it amounts to 18 per cent, which is a nice round figure. If this afternoon this house approves this budget resolution and it becomes law, this house is not increasing the tax on these necessities of life simply by 2 per cent. In even the simplest case it is increasing the tax by no less than 3·6 per cent. That is the simple situation. We are invited by this government, in the simplest case, the case that costs the consumer the least, to boost a tax on the consumer up to 18 per cent.

Anyone who is looking around seriously for reasons why the cost of living is high today cannot fail to stop in the first place at this sales tax. The Minister of Finance can talk until he is black in the face about this international phenomenon of inflation, but he cannot change the basic fact that this government is the big factor in creating inflation in this country today. Anyone in this house who is looking about seriously for a means of reducing the soaring cost of living to make it a little bit easier for people to meet their budgets will start right here. He will begin by refusing to support this iniquitous resolution, this tax that is doubly iniquitous because the proposal is to increase a tax that sixteen years ago Mr. Mackenzie King denounced up and down the country as iniquitous. What would he say today, sixteen years later?

In 1935, sir, the problem was not one of high prices. The principal problem in 1935 was one of low prices to the producer. It would have been relatively an easy matter then to say, if Mr. Mackenzie King had chosen to do so: Oh, well, this does not add very much to the cost of living; this does not take very much out of the pockets of the people, because prices are so low. What is the situation in 1951? If this tax was iniquitous in 1935, then this increase is an infamous proposal to put before the House of Commons and the people of Canada today a 25 per cent increase applying to so many things that are basic necessities of life.

It seems to me, sir, that this resolution is as clear a test as this house is likely to face, at this or any other session of parliament, as to just how serious each individual member is on this subject of concern for the lot of the Canadian family in meeting its budget in the light of the way the rising cost of living has torn that budget to shreds and tatters in hundreds of thousands of cases. Here is a simple test every member of this house will be called upon to face. I hope there will be full opportunity given and taken, when you call finally for a vote on this particular resolution in this committee or elsewhere, for members to indicate—every one on his own personal responsibility, regardless of whether or not he is a supporter of the government—whether he is really serious in expressing his concern for the problem faced by the average Canadian family with respect to the high cost of living today. I believe, sir, that to a degree rarely existing in this House of Commons, every member is on trial this afternoon, placed there by this first resolution.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. Sinclair: I should like to answer the hon. member immediately on one point which he raised. The bulk of his speech is exactly the same as he delivered in the debate on the budget, perhaps with a little more volume.

Mr. Gibson: The needle scratches more.

Mr. Sinclair: Yes, as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni says, the needle scratches more. I only wish, however, that his historical facts could match either his eloquence or his volume. He made reference to the late Mr. Mackenzie King, and his views on the sales tax. I have here a record of the sales tax in Canada. I note, for example, that when the Liberal party went to the country in 1930 the sales tax was one per cent. When R. B. Bennett went to the country in 1935, after five of the most difficult years Canada has ever known, and in which the cost of living was a terrific problem because there were so many tens of thousands who had no income—unlike today, when they are enjoying the highest employment and highest income they ever had—Mr. R. B. Bennett, who was not only prime minister but minister of finance, had increased the sales tax not by twenty-five per cent but by a walloping five hundred per cent. When the Tories left office in 1935 the sales tax had risen to six per cent. Well might Mr. Mackenzie King in those days have said that such an increase was iniquitous.

Let us compare what has happened—

Mr. Fleming: He was not talking about the increase, but about the sales tax itself. He called it an iniquitous tax. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would indicate what the Liberal party has done in sixteen years in office about this iniquitous tax.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Sinclair: I sat quite patiently while my hon. little friend was working himself into his usual temper, waiting until he finished. I would point out that I do not regard the hon. member as an authority on what Mr. Mackenzie King thought in 1935. I would rather refer to one of the Liberal members. In any case, any prime minister who saw that one per cent sales tax, which was after all imposed in good times—1927, 1928 and 1929 were good years—

Mr. Fulton: The depression started in 1929, caused by the Liberal government.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member for Kamloops has neither his facts nor figures right. The depression did not hit Canada in 1929. We were a full year behind the Wall street crash.

Mr. Fleming: You were not born then.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member, as usual, is trying to bolster up his argument by these continual interruptions, although other hon. members sat patiently while he was making his speech. As I was saying, R. B. Bennett increased the sales tax from one per cent to six per cent, a five hundred per cent increase, at a time when there have never been so many Canadian families faced with a great problem in attempting to buy any commodity, and at the same time the basis of that sales tax was far broader than the one today.

As the hon. member points out—his arithmetic is correct here—we have been in power sixteen years. The sales tax has gone up from six per cent to eight per cent, and now to ten per cent. But many other things have happened since so far as government expenditures are concerned. Let me just detail some of them. I see the member for Victoria-Carleton smiling broadly. We brought in family allowances, and it cost $300 million. The Tories in those days opposed the measure. They still will not face the fact that revenue is necessary to make this great transfer payment.

Mr. Fraser: The Tories did not oppose family allowances. What are you talking about?

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member knows that when that act came before parliament there was only one who opposed it.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member was here, just as I was here, and we remember the introduction of the bill. We remember that the Tories opposed the resolution, and that the member who is now the leader of that party, but was then premier of Ontario, said he was opposed to this iniquitous legislation which he would fight in every court of the land. We recall the attitude of the Conservatives when the resolution was introduced. When they saw the general feeling in the country towards the measure, they quickly climbed aboard the bandwagon, as they usually do, and said we were doing the right thing but in the wrong way.

Mr. Fulton: If that is the case, why does the hon. member continue to assert that this party opposed the measure? He has just proven that is a wrong assertion by the statement he has made.

Mr. Sinclair: At the resolution stage they opposed it.

The Chairman: Order. The parliamentary assistant has the floor.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member has just said that at the resolution stage they opposed it. At first he said that they opposed family allowances, seeking thereby to indicate that they opposed the whole measure. By his own words he has proven himself wrong.

The Chairman: The hon. member may rise on a point of order or a question of privilege, but the parliamentary assistant has the floor.

Mr. Hodgson: Is the parliamentary assistant not out of order in bringing this subject up at this time?

Mr. Sinclair: I know how sensitive the Conservatives are on this matter. I have not yet had the member for Kamloops explain the change of heart that his present leader had.

Mr. Ferguson: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, may I ask what right the parliamentary assistant has to wander all over the Dominion of Canada and discuss every subject in the world? Why does he not pin himself down to the subject in question? If he does not do so, it is the privilege of every other member of this committee to discuss matters in the same manner as he is discussing them. He is making a political speech on this question, and he knows it; and he has no more privileges than we have.

Mr. Sinclair: Anybody who has just listened to the hon. member for Eglinton knows what a political speech he was making. I am trying to show—and if the hon. member for Simcoe North will listen carefully, he will find this out—some reasons why the sales tax has been increased over the years, and that the increases by this party from six per cent to eight per cent and now to ten per cent have been for some good social security measures which have to be paid for. Today in Canada we have 5,200,000 people gainfully employed. Less than half of those people pay income tax—2,200,000 in all.

Mr. Knowles: Why?

Mr. Sinclair: My hon. friend asks why they pay income tax. If he had his way, of course, there would be no income tax.

Mr. Knowles: Just a minute. They pay no income tax because their wages are too low.

Mr. Sinclair: As to not paying income taxes when the wages are too low, may I say that one of the hon. members sent me notice of a question he was going to ask me on the income tax resolutions, namely, to put on the record the income tax exemptions in Britain, in the United States and in Canada, and to compare the actual tax paid by a family man earning $3,000—that is, at $1.44 an hour—with two children. When the income tax resolutions are before us, I will put that information on the record.

The reason I mention the fact that less than half the wage earners of Canada pay income tax is to show that these social security measures which are enjoyed by all the people of Canada must be paid for in some measure by all the people of Canada. We have had this increase in sales tax which has gone in part to pay for these desirable social services which the Canadian people want, which they show, broadly, that they want, and which hon. members of the opposition are always anxious to criticize as being too niggardly. As the Minister of Finance said when he presented the budget, this is the day of reckoning. The hon. member for Eglinton waxed extremely wrathy about this twenty-five per cent increase in the sales tax. I would just remind him of the fact that when his party was in power and had to do things, not just talk about them, they increased the sales tax in those extremely difficult days by five hundred per cent.

Mr. Coldwell: I do not want to get into a political argument, particularly as between the official opposition and the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance; but I want to say that this tax is wrong in principle and is a vicious one in that respect. When I say it is a vicious tax in that respect, I am only repeating what Mr. Mackenzie King said in 1934. It is true that when the Liberal party went out of power in 1930,—

Mr. Ferguson: It is too bad they did not stay out.

Mr. Coldwell: —in the Dunning budget of that year the sales tax was reduced to one per cent. It is perfectly true that during the next four or five years the sales tax was increased to six per cent. But since then it has been increased to eight per cent and now to ten per cent. It is a specious argument to say that in those days, because people had little income, the tax of four per cent or six per cent bore less heavily on them than it does when there is a higher income across the country. Let me point out this fact to the hon. gentleman. While it is true that in those days there were several million people in Canada who had no income and who were suffering acutely under the conditions that then existed, today there are many thousands of people, such as old age pensioners, those on veterans pensions, people on fixed incomes,—

Mr. Adamson: Canadian National Railway pensioners.

Mr. Coldwell: —and persons who have been retired by the railways, by the banks and by educational institutions, who contributed throughout the years to superannuation funds and who today to my certain knowledge are unable to make ends meet with the pensions upon which they are called upon to subsist or to exist, whichever way you care to put it. There are also, on the farms and in the cities, other thousands of people whose per capita income is so low that they are unable to live decently. As has already been said, these are taxes that are placed on certain basic necessities of life. It is all very well for the minister to say that it does not affect foods and some other things. But such things as clothing, boots and shoes, certain household necessities, equipment and so on are basic necessities of life. The tax is to be raised, not twenty per cent as one of the hon. members said the other night, basing it on what the tax will be in the future; but basing it accurately on what it is now, it is increased by twenty-five per cent.

This tax is an iniquitous one. You have only to go back to the time referred to by my hon. friend and read some of the criticisms that were made in the house at that time by Colonel Ralston—who at that time was the financial critic of the Liberal party—and by other members of the party, both in the house and outside of it, in order to realize how times have changed and how the tune of the members of the Liberal party has changed both here and in the country, in regard to the principle of the sales tax.

During the budget debate I made a proposal which I should like to get considered. In that debate I said that we know the government are going to impose this tax. We know that they are going to impose it. The majority in the House of Commons is such that we know perfectly well that nothing we can do can stop anything this government wants to do.

Mr. Hatfield: Too much power.

Mr. Coldwell: Such is the government's overwhelming majority, even if a few hon. members had the courage to vote against the government.

An hon. Member: Which they have not.

Mr. Coldwell: The government has such an overwhelming majority that it could not be defeated. I believe, however, that a vote on this particular paragraph should be called and that we should have an opportunity of voting on it. I do not believe, as has been claimed on occasions in the past, that the resolution must be voted on in its entirety. I say that we should have an opportunity to vote on this resolution clause by clause, and that on this clause in particular all hon. members should have an opportunity of voting. The hon. member for Eglinton is perfectly right. It is not only a matter of what the tax is and what this increase in tax means in tax, but it is a matter of what it is when it is pyramided after the several profits have been added on to the original cost plus the tax. As reported at page 2054 of Hansard, I said:

> We object, and always have objected, to this tax on principle, but since it is going to be imposed anyway we urge the house to provide that the ultimate consumer shall pay only the tax on the first or manufacturer's price.

Or on the producer's price or first cost. If we did that, the government would be getting all the tax that the people are paying. They get the ten per cent tax anyhow. But in the meantime other persons, who handle these goods, and put a mark-up on those goods, are putting a mark-up on the taxes so that the tax pyramids. I took a conservative estimate the other day. I said it would go up to thirteen per cent or more. I took mark-ups that were low. I am quite sure that the hon. member for Eglinton, when he talks about eighteen per cent as he did this afternoon, is much nearer the mark than I was in the budget debate. Therefore I think that we should make the strongest possible protest against the imposition of this sales tax on necessities of life. If the government wants to put a sales tax on luxuries it could put it on other things. We mentioned alcoholic liquors the other day; but there are lots of other things besides alcoholic liquors upon which luxury taxes, and high luxury taxes, could be imposed. We could put further taxes on things like jewelry; we could put further taxes on such things as expensive silverware, and high-priced clothing—all that kind of thing—

An hon. Member: Can you get anything cheap?

Mr. Coldwell: —and exempt the lower priced clothing. Indeed, as we suggested in the debate, the government might designate certain articles as utility commodities, and relieve them of this kind of tax, as was done in some other countries during the war and in the immediate post-war years.

I look back over the last twenty years or so and remember the discussions on the principle of the sales tax. I remember the speeches in the house and I remember them in the country; and I think if we could dig up this afternoon—as it would have been easy to do, had we had the time—the advertising put out by the Liberal party in 1935, or again in 1930, when it took such tremendous credit for reducing the sales tax to one per cent, and told the country it was a step toward wiping the sales tax out altogether, and in 1935 when it denounced the increased tax—

Mr. Hetland: What about the C.C.F. government in Saskatchewan?

Mr. Coldwell: I am glad my hon. friend mentioned that. The sales tax in Saskatchewan of two per cent—

Mr. Hetland: Three per cent.

Mr. Coldwell: Wait a minute—two per cent—was put on by a Liberal government.

Mr. Hetland: During the war.

Mr. Coldwell: I beg your pardon.

Mr. Hetland: During the depression.

Mr. Coldwell: Before the war. And let me say to my hon. friend that it touched a large number of necessities that have since been relieved of that sales tax. It is true that today, because of the invasion of provincial revenues by this federal government—

An hon. Member: Where?

Mr. Coldwell: All right, all right, now—

Mr. Gibson: You raised it 50 per cent.

Mr. Hetland: And now you want indirect taxation.

Mr. Coldwell: Well, the noisy interruptions show when something hurts.

Mr. Sinclair: It sure does.

Mr. Coldwell: You hear squeals only when something hurts.

Mr. Martin: Why squeal, if it doesn't hurt?

Mr. Coldwell: Well now, it is true that in Saskatchewan the tax was put on by a Liberal government. I do not mind saying—

Mr. Ferrie: May I ask a question?

Mr. Coldwell: Just a moment. You can ask it when I have finished. I do not mind saying this, that I do not like the sales tax, whether it is put on by a federal government or a provincial government.

Mr. Ferrie: You are saying that because you have it.

Mr. Coldwell: And I am not defending any government for putting on a sales tax. The criticism I make is made of the principle of the sales tax generally, by whatsoever government it is put on. And let me point this out to hon. members, when they point to the tax in Saskatchewan, that it was a Liberal government that put it on.

Mr. Ferrie: You promised to take it off.

Mr. Coldwell: And the C.C.F. took it off on a wide range of necessary articles.

Mr. Brooks: What about New Brunswick?

Mr. Coldwell: Liberal governments in this country, or governments in which Liberals have predominated in coalitions, have put on sales taxes, or are putting on sales taxes of three per cent, or are seeking a new right to put them on. So let us have no more of this nonsense. Let us discuss the matter from the point of view of principle.

Whether the tax is put on by a Conservative government, a Liberal government, a C.C.F. government, or any other government, the principle is wrong. I never have changed my mind on that; I have never changed my opinion; I have never changed what I have said publicly in that respect—and I do not intend to change what I have said in that respect, wherever I happen to be speaking.

So I hope there will be an opportunity to vote on this paragraph; and I hope that hon. members who feel as I do and who are anxious to help the people who sent us here, and to consider their welfare and their needs, will not lend themselves to the imposition of this tax, which is going to affect so adversely so many thousands of people in this country.

I am quite sure of this, that I am not alone in this respect. Seldom does a day go by but what I get on my desk a letter from an old age pensioner, a letter from a veteran, a letter from a widow or a letter from some other person who tells me of the hardships they and their families are suffering today from high prices throughout the country.

I am proud to say our record is clear in this respect. From the beginning we have opposed this inflation; and I am not going to lend my vote to placing a further burden on the people who are least able to afford it. Let us try to vote this proposal down now.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, to bring this matter to a head—and I do not think there is much difference of opinion on this side of the house as to procedure—as a procedural motion I move:

That the committee deal with this resolution paragraph by paragraph.

Mr. Sinclair: This matter was dealt with two or three years ago, on the question of procedure. We have here one resolution to amend the Excise Tax Act. Hon. members can vote for it or against it, but for convenience the resolution is moved in this form. The Minister of Finance made a speech on this point some two years ago in which he stated that this is one resolution, to be adopted as one resolution.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I should like to speak on the point of order raised by the parliamentary assistant, who takes the view that the motion before us is one motion, to be taken in its entirety. In other words, he has in mind the entire section headed, "Excise Tax Act", which appears in Hansard at the bottom of page 1815 and continues on into page 1816; and he says that this must be voted on at once.

I would point out that I cannot agree with that position, namely that it has to be taken as one resolution, because there is a citation that spells out clearly the right of the committee to take separately the separate parts of a resolution which includes more than one proposition. Citation 379 in Beauchesne, second edition, states:

A motion which contains two or more distinct propositions may be divided so that the sense of the house may be taken on each separately.

Those words in Beauchesne are taken directly from page 298 of the fourth edition of Bourinot. I shall not reread the words, because they are taken verbatim from the earlier author. Surely the committee realizes that when this matter was discussed two or three years ago the decision of the house was made after the vote had been taken, and after the government had been beaten.

The decision made by Mr. Golding, who was in the chair at that time, was that we had the right to vote on the paragraphs individually. It was only because the government appealed that ruling by Mr. Golding, and then pulled in its majority to vote down the ruling, that the contrary decision was made by the house. I submit the decision brought about by the vote was a wrong one, and that Mr. Golding, with the long experience he had had in the chair, was perfectly right in the decision he made. We should stand by the citations given us by the authorities I have named and by the decision made by the then chairman, now Senator Golding, on that occasion, rather than by a vote of the house which was actuated by motives which were clear to all.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I join with my hon. friend in supporting the propriety of these sections being voted upon separately. The citation to which he refers reads:

A motion which contains two or more distinct propositions may be divided so that the sense of the house may be taken on each separately.

If that were not so then the house would simply be in the position of an automaton carrying out everything the government wanted done, whether certain things contained in a resolution were acceptable or not. Surely parliament is not to be emasculated in that way. The section of the resolution in question reads:

1. That the rate of the general sales tax be increased from eight to ten per cent and that the rate of sales tax on those articles at present subject to four per cent be increased to five per cent.

Then the next section provides for an increase of the excise tax on goods mentioned in schedule I of the act, the increase being from 15 per cent to 25 per cent. The next section provides that the excise tax on candy and so on be reduced from 30 to 15 per cent.

If the proposition were accepted that the house could not vote on these items individually, no matter how many in the house were opposed to No. 1, the purpose for which parliament exists and this committee is constituted would be entirely denied. After all, rules are made in order to expedite the fullest possible discussion consistent with the exigencies of parliamentary debate. The citation has never been changed. The need for such a citation and the propriety of the course being followed of each item being voted on individually is clear from a mere consideration of what the result would be if such were not the fact.

Parliament would be placed in this position. The government could place in its motion five or six items that were acceptable and one item that no hon. member in the house would accept, and yet the committee would be denied the opportunity of saying whether each particular section was proper and whether any particular section was not proper. In other words, if the contention of the parliamentary assistant be correct, we are in the position of simply having to take everything that the government hands out without the opportunity of voting on those things that we believe are not proper. I submit that ordinary reason and ordinary common sense supports the citation to which reference has been made.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, I want to support a contention put forward by the two hon. gentlemen who have spoken on the point of order, and I am not going to take any great length of time in doing so. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Lake Centre have put forward good reasons why the committee should be allowed to vote on section 1 of the resolution separately from the rest. I support the leader of the opposition in his motion and suggest that if the government does not allow the committee to vote on section 1 it is because it is afraid to have such a vote taken. In fact I am going to go so far as to accuse the government of attempting to evade the issue and making it impossible for individual members of the Liberal party to vote according to their convictions.

These members will be able to go home after this session and say, "I could not vote for the amendment that was moved by the opposition because it would have meant a vote against the other taxes that were included in the resolution, but if we had been allowed to vote on just the sales tax, I would have supported the amendment." That is what every single one of them will say. I am accusing the government that if they do not allow this to be voted on as a separate item they do so because they are afraid to allow the members of this committee to vote as their conscience directs them.

The Chairman: I think I have heard enough to permit me to give my ruling. After hearing the reasons given by different members I must say that I agree with the motion moved by the leader of the opposition that each item should be voted on separately.

Mr. Martin: There is now no motion that we should deal with this item by item; there was no motion before the chair.

The Chairman: The committee is master of its own rules.

Motion (Mr. Drew) negatived: Yeas, 40; nays, 63.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: I do not know what all the laughter is about unless it is from some of the Liberal members who were here before the last election and remember the occasion when the Minister of Finance rose to a point of order after having been beaten on a vote. My point is that the citation dealing with the matter before the committee makes it clear that a motion which is a complicated question can be divided into its several parts on motion of the house, but—

Mr. Martin: Is the hon. member referring to citation 379?

Mr. Knowles: I am going back of citation 379 to where Dr. Beauchesne got his authority, to page 298 of Bourinot, fourth edition, where it states:

> A motion which contains two or more distinct propositions may be divided so that the sense of the house may be taken on each separately.

I am asking you, sir, to read the whole of page 298 and to note the fact that so far as complicated questions are concerned, the matter can be put to a vote, but so far as a motion containing distinct propositions is concerned, there is no reference to putting it to a vote of the house. The motion before us now is not a complicated question; it is a question with several distinct propositions. You only have to look at it to realize that.

The first proposition has to do with increasing the general sales tax. The second proposition has to do with the tax on furs. The third one has to do with the excise tax on candy, the next one with stoves, washing machines and refrigerators, and so on. There are several distinct propositions. I submit that, as it is not a complicated question but a motion with several distinct propositions, the vote just taken does not apply and I as one member of the house have the right to ask that it be considered proposition by proposition, and I so request.

Mr. Martin: I was going to raise a point of order while my hon. friend was speaking but I thought I had better not interrupt him in case he might raise something that was altogether new. What my hon. friend is arguing now is something he should have argued before the motion of the leader of the opposition was put. The committee has just decided that we shall not vote upon this matter item by item. That is a decision of the committee.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I submit, even as the Minister of Finance submitted several years ago, that taking that vote was out of order. I remind you, sir, that the circumstances are distinctly similar, and I hope we get the same treatment as the Minister of Finance got on that occasion. On that occasion there were several propositions before us in what was called one motion. The proposition to which we objected, as I recall it, was an increase of 25 per cent, I believe, in the tax on electrical appliances. There were also some reductions in the same motion to change the excise tax. I think they had to do with bills for electricity. At any rate the situation was on all fours. With some portions of the proposal we agreed and to some portions we objected. We called a vote on that occasion on clause 1, I believe, of the proposition. This was before the last election when we had a much better parliament, so far as the people of Canada were concerned, in that it was more evenly divided

When the vote was taken there were more members present on the opposition side than on the government side, and the opposition won. As a matter of fact one or two members on the Liberal side of the house stood up and voted with us in opposition to that tax. The motion was defeated. Mr. Golding, who was in the chair, showed a great deal of courage throughout the whole proceedings on that day, and declared the motion lost. Then the Minister of Finance began to get a bit agitated as to what was to happen. The late Ian Mackenzie came down and whispered a few things in his ear.

Mr. Abbott: No, I handled it all myself.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Knowles: The Minister of Finance cannot deny that the late Ian Mackenzie whispered something in his ear. I do not know what it was.

Mr. Abbott: That was a case where I went entirely on my own. I must correct my hon. friend.

Mr. Knowles: All right. Out of respect to the late Ian Mackenzie it might be better to put the full blame on the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Abbott: He probably would have been able to think of a better one.

Mr. Knowles: I am sure he would have. I am sure if he had had his full way in the matter he would have suggested that the committee rise and report progress. He would have dealt with the matter in some other way, but the Minister of Finance got up and challenged the right of the committee to take a vote on the question, and that was after the vote had been taken. We had a long debate similar to the one we are having now. Chairman Golding, now in the other place, stood his ground, and said that the vote was perfectly proper, and that we had the right to vote on these items one at a time at the request of any member. He agreed with the citations we read and, as I said, he stood his ground. Whereupon the Minister of Finance appealed the ruling, the Speaker was called in, the bells rang, and of course we lost the vote. All of us will remember the tremendous ovation that was given to chairman Golding when he came back to the chair for having stood his ground. Just as the Minister of Finance thought on that occasion after the vote had been taken that he had been wronged, I submit that we have been wronged. What is before us now is not a complicated question, which is governed by the second paragraph on page 298 of Bourinot, fourth edition, but rather the type of motion that is governed by the third paragraph on that page.

The Chairman: Order. I think the point of order should have been taken before the vote.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I ask for fairness. The Minister of Finance did not raise his point of order before the vote was taken when the question was before the house two or three years ago.

Mr. Abbott: Let us get this straight, Mr. Chairman. My hon. friend's recollection is substantially accurate in reciting the circumstances under which I raised the point of order on the occasion referred to. There was one resolution which included a number of proposals with respect to taxation changes. For purposes of convenience, they were being taken one by one. Whether or not a good many of the members on this side of the house were at the ball game on that day, I recall that a vote was put on one of the items. I then realized that a grave impropriety had occurred. I raised the point of order that there was only one resolution which could be voted on, and that was the resolution which included all these items. The chairman, our good friend Bill Golding, ruled against me. I appealed his ruling and the members were called in. Although, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has indicated, we did not have the majority we have today, the house upheld my point of order. That is fair enough. It was established at that time that, where there is one resolution as there is here, it must all be voted on together. Incidentally there is ample opportunity to vote against particular proposals when the sections of the bill are before the house, but in this case it is on all fours with what happened before. I was proved right before and the chairman wrong. The house upheld it, and that is the rule that is being suggested now.

Mr. MacInnis: I should like to say a word on this matter. Before doing so I should like to admonish the government not to override members of the house just because it has a large majority. We have all been sent here to deal with matters that affect the people of Canada. The Minister of Finance says there is one resolution before us and that it must be voted on as one resolution. Mind you, that is with the chairman of committees in the chair and the house in committee of ways and means. The Minister of Finance would be equally justified in making the same statement when the bill comes before the house. With the chairman of committees in the chair the minister could say: Here is the bill. You must vote on it as one bill or not at all.

Mr. Abbott: Oh no; it is considered section by section.

Mr. MacInnis: Here we have section after section. Let me read them to you. I know that the minister dealt with each one separately in his budget speech. He did not lump them together. There is no relation between them. The first one is to increase the rate of the general sales tax from 8 to 10 per cent. The next one has to do with the excise tax on furs, and other goods mentioned in schedule 1, and is to increase the tax from 15 to 25 per cent. These are different things altogether. Suppose there was included an increase in the excise tax on liquor such as many members of the house would like to have. Almost every member of the house would be in favour of such a tax, and yet in order to support it hon. members would also have to support the increase in the general sales tax. The thing does not make sense. I again plead with the Minister of Finance not to force members into having to take such action. Certainly I will not take it without an appeal to the Speaker.

Mr. Abbott: I want to correct my hon. friend on one point with respect to the resolution and the bill. As he knows, when a bill is before the house in committee of the whole it is perfectly open to him to move an amendment to any section of the bill. The section of the bill which provides for the particular tax that I think is being discussed here, the sales tax, is and always has been open to amendment when the bill is under consideration. In my submission that does not apply to the general resolution covering the entirety of the government's financial proposals.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Do you say it is open to amendment?

Mr. Abbott: If a private member can move an amendment to— he cannot move an amendment to increase a tax.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He cannot. You said he could.

Mr. Abbott: I understand the desire is not to increase the sales tax but to make some other change in it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, if the minister is right in saying that in committee we can move to amend any of these sections, then all objection certainly would be removed. I am glad the minister says that, because that is exactly what we are trying to get. The minister has now spoken officially for the government. If he is prepared now to allow us to move to reduce the amount of this sales tax when the bill comes before the house—not add to it, as he said—I will join with him and say parliament certainly won a victory today.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend is too old a hand for that. The minister does not make the rules of this house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is what he is trying to do now.

Mr. Abbott: The minister was saying that any amendment to any section, which is in order, can be moved when we are in committee on the bill. My recollection of the rule is that any hon. member who moves to reduce a tax contained in the bill must propose an alternative tax which would produce an equal revenue. That is my recollection; I am speaking without having checked it up. Any amendment which is in order under the rules of the house can be moved when we are in committee of the whole on the bill; but I understand we have had a vote on this.

Mr. Martin: I rise to a point of order. If the motion made by the leader of the opposition is to be taken seriously this discussion is certainly out of order. The hon. gentleman moved the very question now under debate, a question of substance, as to whether or not we would vote on this matter item by item. The chairman put that motion, and the committee voted against the proposal. Surely that should end this discussion, and I submit this with great respect.

Mr. Knowles: On that point of order may I remind you, sir, that before you put the motion of the leader of the opposition you said, after having listened to the arguments some of us had advanced, that you agreed we had the right to consider these paragraphs one by one.

The Chairman: I said I agreed you had the right to move the motion.

Mr. Knowles: I cannot argue with you, but I am afraid that is not my recollection. I for one felt at that moment that a terrible procedural wrong that was done two or three years ago had been righted. I draw your attention in this respect to page 298 of Bourinot, fourth edition, where it is said that complicated questions are subject to a vote of the house if one wishes to divide them. But this is something different. I underline the point that a motion containing two or more distinct propositions may be divided so the sense of the house may be taken on each proposition separately. With regard to that sentence there are no qualifying words which say it is subject to a vote of the house. On the basis of that I ask your ruling on my request that we deal with paragraph No. 1 of the excise tax resolution by itself.

The Chairman: The hon. member has made a statement I think I should correct. I agreed that the motion should be put to the committee, and I did so. The committee is master of its own rules, not the chairman. The committee has given its decision, and the chairman has nothing further to say.

Mr. Fulton: On a question of privilege affecting the rights and privileges of all members of the house, I wish to raise a related matter in connection with the vote which has just taken place in committee. I refrained from raising this question until this moment because I did not wish to interrupt the argument on the point of order; but I observed, Mr. Chairman, as I am sure you and most other members of the committee observed, that after you had put the question to the committee and had asked for the yeas and nays, two members of the government entered the chamber from behind the curtains.

I raise this as a question of privilege since it is a practice to which I think attention should be called and on which a ruling should be obtained. I know perfectly well there was a majority of more than two for the government, so their presence or absence did not affect the outcome; but I feel that it would be an extremely dangerous precedent to have established if ministers or private members should be permitted to wander into the house or committee at any time during the course of a vote, and have their vote recorded. I refer you to citation 67 at page 25 of Beauchesne, second edition, which reads:

> If a member was not present in the house when the question was put by the Speaker, he cannot have his vote recorded.

Then section (1) of standing order 58 reads:

> The standing orders of the house shall be observed in the committees of the whole house so far as may be applicable, except the standing orders as to the seconding of motions and limiting the number of times of speaking.

The procedure being as set out in the rules, I submit that the votes of the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue should not have been counted.

The Chairman: I agree that no hon. member should vote unless he has heard the question put.

Mr. Knowles: I am still asking for a ruling. I am asking for a vote on paragraph 1 of the excise tax resolution.

The Chairman: As I said, I have no ruling to give, since the committee itself has made its decision.

Mr. Knowles: Then I appeal that ruling to the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I just want to be clear on what I understood the minister to say a while ago, that when these resolutions are incorporated in bills—

Mr. Abbott: The bills are based on the resolutions.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is exactly the point I am making; and when paragraph 1, for instance, comes before the house providing that the rate of the general sales tax shall be increased from 8 per cent to 10 per cent, the minister said it would be possible for any member of the house to move an amendment reducing the amount of that sales tax, provided he suggested a substitute tax. That was what the minister said. If that be correct it would enable any hon. member to move that the amount which would be lost by reducing the sales tax to its former level might be obtained by a tax on liquor. If that is what the minister said, then I know how my vote will be cast when this matter comes up.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend has hearing as good as mine. I said I did not make the rules of the house, but my recollection was that if a member moved to reduce a tax he must at the same time propose some alternative. I do not know whether that is right or wrong, but whatever is the correct rule will govern. My saying it does not make it so. I may be a minister of the crown, but in that respect I have no greater authority than any other member of the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is that the minister's understanding?

Mr. Abbott: That has always been my understanding of the rule, but the rule will govern. I do not make the rules.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): If we still have a moment I should like to make one remark. It really has nothing to do with the rules, but I just want to raise the question whether what is happening today has anything to do with fairness and common sense. It is perfectly clear, as far as I can see, that there can be no earthly reason for not wanting to vote these seriatim other than that the government does not wish to give us the chance.

The Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but that question has been decided by the committee. A ruling has been asked, and I have given my ruling.

Mr. Speaker resumed the chair and the chairman of the committee made the following report:

A vote having been taken to the effect that the excise tax resolution should not be considered item by item, I ruled that it was not open to a member to ask that it be so considered.

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows:

The question before the house is an appeal from a ruling given by the chairman of the committee of ways and means. He reported that a vote having been taken to the effect that the excise tax resolution should not be considered item by item, it was not open to a member to ask that it be so considered.

Those in favour of confirming the chairman's ruling? I believe the house understands that it is not for me to make a ruling.

Mr. Fleming: On a point of order: With respect, sir, what you have just read, it seems to me, is the reverse of what the ruling was.

Mr. Fulton: With respect, a question of privilege was also raised in committee to the effect that the vote was invalid because of objections that were taken—

Mr. Speaker: Order, I cannot consider that. That question must be decided by the committee.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, with respect, the chairman of the committee at the time said that the point of privilege was correctly raised.

Mr. Martin: No, he did not.

Mr. Fulton: Yes, he did.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is not within my power to review what took place in the committee. I understand that there has been an appeal from the chairman's ruling.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask, Mr. Speaker, that you read the ruling again?

Mr. Speaker: I shall be very glad to do so. In my opening remarks, I said that it is not within my province to decide this question. An appeal from the chairman's ruling is not to the Speaker, it is to the house. I do not know whether members understood that when they appealed the ruling.

Mr. Knowles: On a point of privilege, I recognize that the matter is not debatable at this stage, and I shall not transgress that ruling, but I think as the one who appealed the ruling it may be in order for me to say that I am not satisfied with that report. However, I am satisfied with what Hansard will record to be the discussion leading up to the appeal that I made.

Mr. Drew: I think that what would be helpful at this stage would be to know exactly what it is we are voting upon. I must add to that, Mr. Speaker, that I am really unaware of what it is we are now voting upon.

Mr. Knowles: Without introducing any argument may I say, as the one who made the appeal, that in my view what we are voting on is a member's right, on the basis of a citation which I read from Bourinot, fourth edition, to the effect that a motion which contains two or more paragraphs can be divided—

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Knowles: Yes, that all the various paragraphs of a motion—

Mr. Martin: May I seek to help the chair. I think what happened was this. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) made a motion that we consider the matter before the house item by item. That motion was defeated, whereupon the hon. gentleman—

Mr. Knowles: It was out of order.

Mr. Martin: —whereupon the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) got up and argued the merits of the question.

Mr. Knowles: Claiming my right on the basis of the citation.

Mr. Martin: He argued the merits of the question. After he had finished his argument, I rose and said that I did not want to interrupt my hon. friend, but he was clearly out of order because the house had already decided the very question he was seeking to urge the house to adopt. Then the member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) spoke, as well as several others. I rose again and said that surely the motion had been proposed by the leader of the opposition and had been dealt with. If that motion was to be taken seriously the whole subsequent discussion was out of order. The chairman then said, "Yes, that is my position." The member for Winnipeg North Centre said, "I appeal your ruling."

Mr. Fleming: A very unfair presentation, and inaccurate.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The chairman of the committee of ways and means has reported that a vote having been taken on the motion that the excise tax resolution should be considered item by item, and the vote on the said resolution having been in the negative, the chairman ruled that it was not open to a member to ask that the resolution be considered item by item.

Mr. Knowles: I appealed against the propriety of that vote.

Mr. Speaker: Those in favour of confirming the chairman's ruling will say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it, and I declare the ruling of the chair confirmed.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The house divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the chairman be confirmed? And the ruling was confirmed on the following division:

And the house having resumed in committee:

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: The house again in committee of ways and means.

Mr. Knowles: With respect to the resolution now before the house—and I take it we have to accept the ruling that has been made, that it is one resolution—I wish to move an amendment. I move my amendement on the basis of citation 500 in Beauchesne, third edition, and also on the basis of a similar amendment moved on March 22, 1948, after a similar occurrence to that we have just been through. On that occasion the amendment was allowed. It was voted down, but nevertheless it was allowed; and I have worded my present amendment in precisely the same form.

I move:

That clause 1 of the proposed resolution be deleted and that the following be substituted therefor:

"That it is expedient to introduce a measure to impose an additional tax on spirituous liquors to the extent necessary to maintain the balance of ways and means."

The effect of that amendment is I am sure quite clear. By deleting paragraph 1 of the resolution before us we reduce the income that it was proposed by the Minister of Finance to raise, by increasing the sales tax. Therefore since it is necessary for me to propose a tax that will maintain the balance of ways and means, I propose that whatever that amount was should be raised by an additional tax on spirituous liquors.

Mr. Sinclair: In previous years similar motions have been moved. They have always been ruled out of order, when they were moved in such general terms. Every other tax resolution moved at this time is couched in specific terms as to what the rate of taxation will be. It is not specific enough for the committee to accept a blanket amendment such as that now offered, which states only the purpose of increasing the tax on liquor. I know, because of action taken in previous years, that it cannot be in order.

Mr. Knowles: On the point of order raised by the parliamentary assistant, I should like to read the citation and the previous amendment which I drew to your attention when I was on my feet before. Citation 500 of Beauchesne, third edition, reads:

Though it is the function of the committee of ways and means to impose rather than to repeal taxes, examples of the repeal of taxation effected in this committee are to be found upon the journals. Proposals for the variation or modification of taxation can therefore be made in the committee, but these proposals must be grafted upon the financial scheme submitted by the government, and must not affect the balance of ways and means voted for the service of the year. Amendments, therefore, can be proposed to substitute another tax, of equivalent amount, for that proposed by the government, as, for instance, a proposal to substitute probate and legacy duty on real property as an alternative for an inhabited house duty, the necessity of new taxation, to that extent, being already declared on behalf of the crown.

Again that citation which appears in Beauchesne, third edition, was taken by him from pages 543 and 544 of May, thirteenth edition. As I indicated before, the last time we had an incident like this was on March 22, 1948. I need not rehash now what we went through at the earlier stage of that event because we have done it all over again today. The discussion was then resumed in committee on what was then declared to be of necessity one complete resolution. An amendment was moved by the member for Winnipeg North Centre—I had forgotten I had moved it, but Hansard reminds me that I did—and on page 2490 of Hansard of March 22, 1948, I am reported as follows:

I therefore move, seconded by my deskmate, the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson):

That clause 1 of the proposed resolution as amended and clauses 2, 3 and 4 be deleted therefrom, and that the following be substituted therefor:

"That it is expedient to introduce a measure to impose taxation upon excess profits to the extent necessary to maintain the balance of ways and means."

The motion I have submitted today is in precisely the same form, is in the very same language. Since that other one was allowed by Mr. Golding, who was then in the chair, I submit that it should be allowed on this occasion.

Mr. Sinclair: There is a much more recent decision than that. Only last year the hon. member's deskmate, the hon. member for Melfort, tried to move a similar motion which was ruled out of order. In fairness to all other hon. members they should know exactly what increases this will mean in the tax on liquor. Is it going to mean two per cent, 50 per cent or 100 per cent? Surely this committee is not going to vote on a blanket proposal? If the hon. member had wanted to really move such a motion I think he should have made a little preparation and found out from the Department of National Revenue just exactly what percentage of increase in the liquor tax would be necessary to offset the loss of revenue through the removal of the sales tax.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I think that what has just happened is of more than passing interest. The Minister of Finance is the particular minister to whom the parliamentary assistant is subordinate. A short time ago the Minister of Finance stated that his understanding was that a motion which called for the elimination of this sales tax and provided an alternative method of finding the money would be in order. The question is: Who is speaking for the Department of Finance? I think what we have seen now suggests a reason why the Minister of Finance should be conducting this procedure at this time.

Mr. MacInnis: I just want to direct attention to the fact that the parliamentary assistant has said that a certain thing happened in this house but he does not produce evidence to show that the motion or amendment moved at the last session by the hon. member for Melfort was similar to the one moved today. We have only his assertion that such is the case, but you have before you as a precedent the amendment proposed in 1948 by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre which was allowed by a chairman who in my opinion knew the rules of this house pretty well.

The Chairman: I would like to have had more time to examine this question, but in my opinion the amendment is in order and I shall put the question.

Amendment (Mr. Knowles) negatived: Yeas, 37; nays, 75.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, now that the vote has been taken I should like to say a few words on section 1 of the resolution. I am unalterably opposed to the general sales tax, including the 25 per cent increase proposed in section 1 of the resolution, for five specific reasons. I am not going to repeat the arguments I put forward during the budget debate, but I do intend to outline again the five bases upon which I have taken my position.

I am opposed to the general sales tax and the increase proposed in section 1 of the resolution because this tax increases the cost of living burden upon the lower income groups of our Canadian people. That group of people are already overburdened by a heavy cost of living which is continually increasing.

In the second place, I am opposed to the tax because it pyramids prices and makes it necessary for consumers to pay more in increased prices than is collected by the government in the form of revenue. I have already presented evidence by authorities who have investigated our Canadian sales tax and who show that often the consumer has to pay as much as 40 per cent more in increased prices than the government receives by way of revenue. This is iniquitous taxation; it is what the hon. member for Eglinton refers to as infamous and I do not support it for one moment, as I have shown already by my vote.

The third reason why I am opposed to it is that the sales tax is inflationary. In times like these it aggravates a condition of inflation that is already very serious. On numerous occasions during the past several months the government has been asked by the people of Canada to take action to curb inflationary pressures. They had every reason to believe that the government would take such action during the present session. They looked to the budget as one place where relief perhaps could be given, but instead of any relief from inflationary pressures the government now proposes to impose a tax that is definitely inflationary, and there is no one who can prove that it is not.

The reason that I am opposed to the proposition of an increased sales tax is that the general sales tax is a hidden tax. I have always been opposed to hidden taxes because they take away from the taxpayers of the country any means by which they can gauge the effectiveness of the administration. There is only one way by which the ordinary taxpayer can judge whether a government is efficient and that is by the level of taxes. That is the barometer, and unless that level or barometer is plainly visible the people have no way whatever of knowing about the efficiency or inefficiency of the government. I am suggesting that one of the reasons why this government has attempted on several occasions to convert perfectly visible taxes into hidden taxes is that they want to hide inefficiency, and there is no one who can possibly present a case to disprove that statement. If so, I should like to have them try.

All information about the effect of the imposition of the sales tax has been hidden as well. The government has never attempted at any time to investigate the effect of the incidence of the sales tax upon the economy to show whether or not there are adverse effects. We have called for it time after time in the name of the people. Ever since I came to this house in 1945 in nearly every session I have pleaded with the government to appoint some sort of commission to investigate the effect upon the Canadian economy of the incidence of the various taxes they are imposing so that we can see what these effects are, and if they are adverse take action to remove these taxes and to correct the situation. I am asking that the Department of Finance, which is the proper department to do the job, should immediately appoint a commission to make a thorough investigation of the whole hidden tax situation. Let the country know exactly what are the effects of the imposition of the sales tax and other excise taxes.

The fifth reason why I am unalterably opposed to the imposition of this tax is that in many ways it increases the cost of production. However the argument may be presented, the fact remains that certain articles of machinery and certain tools used in the process of production, the many automobiles that are used in the process of production, the trucks that enter into the process of production, the clothing worn by labourers in producing things, and I could go on and name a number of other things, are affected by this tax. Therefore the prices of these articles will be increased if this imposition is passed and made law. That will inevitably increase the cost of production and further add to the inflationary situation in this country.

These are the five important reasons why I feel that it is unwise and iniquitous for the government to propose an increase in the sales tax particularly at this time when the people of the country are crying out against the terrible cost of living, when hundreds of thousands of our people, with all their backlog of wartime savings melted away, are just beginning to feel the pinch. People with children going to school cannot possibly get the vitamins and the food required to maintain the health of their children simply because of these iniquitous hidden taxes. I have had some experience with sales taxes, and my experience was not a very happy one. I administered the sales tax in the province of Alberta when I became provincial treasurer there, and I might state for the information of hon. members that after some little experience with it I decided it should be abolished. I did abolish it in 1937, and I have been opposed to such taxes ever since because I know something about what they do to people and how difficult this type of impost is to administer.

I sat and listened to the crossfire that took place when my friend the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was speaking. Certain members to my right and across the floor accused the Saskatchewan government of imposing a sales tax. They spoke as if that was every reason why the Liberal government should be supported in increasing the sales tax. Let me point out that there is quite a difference between the two taxes. The so-called sales tax imposed in the province of Saskatchewan is not properly a general sales tax at all. It is an ultimate purchaser's tax which is imposed at the consumer level as a straight percentage of the retail price to the consumer. When the consumer purchases the item he knows exactly what the cost ex tax is and he knows what the cost with tax is. That is an ultimate purchaser's tax. I am surprised that was not mentioned in the crossfire that took place because it is certainly an entirely different situation.

I think it is somewhat of an act of salvation that the provinces have not the right to impose sales taxes at the manufacturer's level. I am very happy that they have not. Certainly the people of Canada ought to be able to know exactly what they are paying in the form of taxes. If a system can be worked out at any time by which people will know when they buy an article how much they are paying in actual cost and how much they are paying in actual tax, I think it ought to be done. Such a system should be introduced.

I have taken part in the proceedings this afternoon with my vote. I have done all I can in a constitutional way, and so have my colleagues, to eliminate this vicious thing in order to protect the Canadian people who have not asked for this tax and in fact have demanded that it be not imposed. As I say, we have taken every constitutional means within our power thus far, but I am suggesting that, in spite of the overriding attitude and power of a power-drunk government, there is a remedy, and the opposition can apply that remedy. I suggest that we can prevent the government from putting this thing through. All we have to do is to fight and be ready to stand up here and talk this thing out. If the sixty or more members of the opposition will get their fighting clothes on and each one of them make a forty minute speech or two against it, we can at least hold this thing up until the people of Canada have a chance to tell the government that they had better remove the iniquitous thing or get out and let someone else come in who will do a decent job for them.

If we have any intestinal fortitude on this side of the house that is exactly the sort of thing we will do. I suggest that is the remedy we have to apply against a party and a government that would override the wishes of the people as wantonly as this government does. I know my party are quite ready to do that very thing. As far as we are concerned it is the only remedy left to us. We are proposing to speak just as often as we possibly can, and if the opposition will band together I believe we can keep the government here until next Christmas and prevent this thing from being passed.

Mr. Lesage: I am not going to participate in any filibuster this afternoon, but since the committee has decided that the resolution should be voted upon as a whole I would like to make a few remarks about paragraph 4, which provides:

That there be imposed, levied and collected an excise tax of fifteen per cent on the following goods when adapted to household or apartment use:

(a) stoves, hot plates, grills and other appliances when adapted wholly or in part for cooking and when designed for using other than solid fuels.

The purpose of this paragraph, of course, is to tax electric and gas ranges and stoves. Wood and coal stoves would not be taxed, I suppose because they are considered as necessities and not as luxuries of any kind. But there are also on the market combination stoves and ranges, using coal or wood and gas, or coal or wood and electricity. There are also coal or wood ranges or stoves with burners for gas or electricity. There are also coal or wood ranges with two-burner gas or electric attachments built into the cooking top. I am afraid the words "wholly or in part" in paragraph 4 would mean that the entire combination coal or wood and electric or gas stove or range would be taxed, even though the coal or wood portion might be considered a necessity for heating homes.

I believe that only part of the value of these combination stoves or ranges should be taxed. I believe also that when we speak of electric or gas attachments, only the value of those attachments should be taxed, and the wood stove itself should not be taxed. There is a precedent for this. On December 2, 1940, during the war, amendments to the Special War Revenue Act were adopted putting a tax of 25 per cent on "the following: electrical or gas appliances adapted to household use; stoves, ranges and heaters". Subsequently there was an administrative ruling of the excise division of the Department of National Revenue which provided that for combination stoves or ranges such as I have just described the tax would apply to from 25 per cent in certain circumstances to 66⅔ per cent in other circumstances of the value of the whole stove or range, according to the importance of the electrical or gas part of the stove. It provided also that when it was an attachment the tax would be levied upon only 10 per cent of the total value of the stove and attachments. That was done, I am sure, to follow the principle that coal and wood stoves were a necessary part of the heating system rather than a luxury, and should not be considered a luxury. I wonder if the principle followed during the war in that instance will be respected under the new legislation, and I would like the parliamentary assistant to enlighten me on that point.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member was good enough to warn me that he was going to raise this matter. The wording of the resolution provides for exactly the same type of division of taxation in the case of combinations as was done in the war years. When the bill is brought down the hon. member will see that on a combination stove of this kind the tax will be paid on that part of the stove which is the electrical attachment, and so with other combinations.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to raise a couple of questions with the parliamentary assistant. I do not think it is clear to the people of this country or to the members of this house whether these taxes are cumulative. We now have the sales tax raised from 8 per cent to 10 per cent. We also have the tax on certain articles increased from 15 per cent to 25 per cent. Would the parliamentary assistant be good enough to explain if that tax of 25 per cent is first imposed on the value of the article, and then the 10 per cent put on top of that. If that is so the amount of revenue raised will be much higher than would be the case by the two per cent increase we are talking about. As I understand it the goods that come under schedules I and II of the Excise Tax Act are liable to this tax of 25 per cent, and of course that includes a great range of articles. I do not know whether the parliamentary assistant tabled a list of those articles today; I missed what he said at the beginning of the session. Was a list put on Hansard?

Mr. Sinclair: I would be quite willing to put it on Hansard, as was done in the last two years. The question is whether we should duplicate in Hansard what will be in the bill.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I am not asking that it be done, but the list does include a great number of electrical articles, golf clubs, fishing rods, cameras, phonographs, and so on. If I am right in my assumption, an article which cost $100 and was subject to a tax of 15 per cent would then cost $115. The 8 per cent on that would raise it another $9.20, bringing the total to $124.20. Of course that total would be greater now that the taxes are 25 per cent and 10 per cent. I see the parliamentary assistant shakes his head. Section 80 of the Excise Tax Act says that these excise taxes shall be levied. Then section 86 says that there shall be levied a sales tax, now to be 10 per cent. In the introductory section, section 85, this is the definition of sale price:

"sale price" for the purpose of calculating the amount of the consumption or sales tax shall mean the price before any amount payable in respect of the consumption or sales tax is added thereto . . .

Then we come to the duty paid value:

"duty paid value" shall mean the value of the article as it would be determined for the purpose of calculating an ad valorem duty upon the importation of such article . . .

So when an article comes in it pays the duty, then it pays the sales tax on top of the price plus the duty. I think that is right. In regard to an article manufactured in Canada that has the excise tax rather than the customs duty charged to it, is the 10 per cent charged on that?

I have one more question before I sit down; the parliamentary assistant might as well deal with both at the same time. In regard to tea, coffee, and cocoa, which I think are regarded as necessities just as other items of food, are these subject to customs duty and in addition to sales tax?

Mr. Sinclair: I shall answer the points in order. The sales tax and excise tax are applied on the same basis. The excise tax is not applied to the cost of the article plus the sales tax. There will be an amendment in the act which we are bringing down as a consequence of this resolution, in which it is clearly spelled out what the sale price will be. These taxes are not cumulative. So far as the duty on tea, coffee, and cocoa is concerned, if the hon. member will wait until the customs tariff resolution is before the committee I shall have the answer. The sales tax applies on tea, coffee and cocoa.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): On the duty-paid value?

Mr. Sinclair: On the duty-paid value.

Mr. Quelch: I believe I shall discuss the whole resolution at once, and not merely a section or two at a time. The thing that puzzles me, and I think it is puzzling the people of Canada, is that ever since I have been in the house the Liberal party has bitterly denounced the policy of inflation as being a dishonest policy, as being a policy which steals the savings of the people without disclosing it. And now the government has adopted this policy. They have adopted this policy as a means of bringing in a greater amount of revenue. As a result of this policy there will be an increase in the price of many commodities, and to that extent the policy is inflationary. True, it will bring increased revenue to the government, and no doubt the government hopes, as a result of the increase in prices, that there will be a reduction in the demand for goods from current income. Even though there may be a reduction in the demand from current income, the minister knows very well that it may not necessarily mean a reduction in demand because, instead of that, people will save that much less. People will also use their savings of the past in order to finance current expenditures.

I noticed a press dispatch in the Ottawa Journal of April 24 which is headed "Inflationary trend seen in new taxes bank review says". It reads:

The current "Business Review" of the Bank of Montreal says that the new taxes provided in the federal budget will doubtless supply funds for soaring defence expenditures, but it finds in them possible inflationary influences.

It adds: "To point out these difficulties is not to suggest that practical alternatives were readily available."

The analysis says in part: "In theory it is possible to limit or reduce the level of consumption, in real terms, by budgetary measures operating on the incomes and spending propensities of individuals in the mass.

"But in practice the actual results may be greatly modified by public reaction and the bargaining power of organized groups. For example, the new surtax on incomes will, at midyear, have the initial effect of reducing the take-home pay of that proportion—probably less than half—of the working force now on the income tax roll.

"To some extent the increased tax is as likely to be met by a reduction in savings as by diminished consumption. Moreover, the likelihood of the restraining effect of the tax being in large part offset by subsequent additions to take-home pay is considerable.

"The new indirect taxes—i.e., the increased sales tax and the specific excise taxes—are, in an economic sense, designed as a penalty on spending. The imposts will emerge as increases in the prices of the articles affected, with the possibility of the increases in many instances being 'pyramided' by the mark-ups applied by intermediaries between manufacturer and consumer.

"Beyond the range of necessities it is, of course, the option of the consumer to refrain from purchasing the affected articles. But in any event the higher prices will in due course be incorporated into the cost of living index, which is not only the reference point to which basic wage rates are contractually tied in some industries, but which is also a significant symbol indicating, in the eyes of the public at large, the degree to which demands for higher pay are automatically justified . . .

"In the ultimate analysis the effectiveness of budgetary measures as a curb on consumer spending depends on the willingness of the public to permit its spending to be curbed rather than to seek compensatory pay increases."

As is pointed out there, as a result of the increase in the cost of living, the result will probably be a demand right across the country for an increase in wages, which will still further increase the inflationary pressure in this country. I would agree, perhaps, that in so far as a long-term policy is concerned, the budget resolutions may tend to reduce purchases by increasing the cost of living; but whatever the long-range policy may be the immediate effect is to increase prices by an amount at least equivalent to the amount of the sales tax or excise tax. The actual amount of the increase will be greater than the amount of the sales tax because it will be pyramided in mark-ups.

I wonder if the parliamentary assistant would admit that the result of this policy will be to tax the savings of the people in the lower income groups and in the moderate income groups? It will not be a tax on the savings of the people in the higher income brackets, because they will have enough current income to meet the current costs of the goods they buy. But there are many people in the lower income groups who cannot meet the cost of living from their income, and who will therefore have to use their savings. In reality this is in part a hidden tax on the savings of the people in the lower income group.

I see it is six o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Quelch: Just before six o'clock, Mr. Chairman, I had been pointing out that for many years now the government has been warning of the dangers of inflation and stressing the fact that a policy of inflation is a policy of dishonesty, a policy under which in reality the savings of the people are filched away. I therefore deplore the fact that the government has now come to the conclusion that it is necessary for them to adopt that same dishonest policy which they have so severely condemned in the past. I quoted from the current review of the Bank of Montreal, which showed clearly and unmistakably that the result of this present budget policy was bound to be one of inflation, or at least that it had highly inflationary tendencies and would probably lead to an all-round increase of wages, which would mean a still further increase in prices.

I also pointed out that one of the most unfortunate results of this policy is that people in the low income groups are not able to meet the present high cost of living out of their current income and therefore, where they have any savings or any capital, they are drawing on those savings or on that capital in order to supplement their income for the purpose of meeting the high cost of living; and of course they are having to pay these taxes out of those savings. Hence this policy of the government actually is a concealed tax on the savings of the people in the lower income groups. It will not affect the savings of the people in the higher income groups to the same extent, because they will be able to live on current income; but the people in the low income groups who are fortunate enough to have savings will have to utilize them and then pay these taxes.

Many people across the country are wondering how it is that the government is still refusing to take any direct action to control prices. I have come to the conclusion that the government is not interested in reducing prices for the simple reason that they realize that the higher prices go, the higher will be their revenue at any given level of taxation; that is to say, they can get an increase in revenue without increasing taxation so long as they allow prices to rise. In that way they get more revenue and let the people blame industry for the increase in the cost of living instead of themselves accepting a large part of that responsibility.

I think it is generally understood that in normal times high taxation will cause demand for goods to fall off; and as you have demand falling off, unemployment increases and prices fall. That is the orthodox idea and that is, I think we will all agree, what happens in what you might call normal times. But these are not normal times. Already they have been referred to as times of emergency. We therefore realize today that any slackening in internal demand will be taken up by increased external demand and that therefore, instead of demand falling off and unemployment increasing, external demand will take the place of internal demand and keep demand high, and the inflationary pressure will continue even with the increased prices for goods.

How long can we expect this situation to continue? The government appears to look upon it as a temporary situation, or perhaps I should say they hope that it is a temporary situation; because the Minister of Finance stated that perhaps next session they may have to bring in other measures.

What is likely to be the future situation? There are one or two alternatives. The cold war may continue. If the cold war continues, it means we are going to have continued high expenditures for defence. The Minister of Trade and Commerce I think made that quite clear when he spoke. So long as we continue to have high expenditures for defence, there will of course be a heavy demand for materials manufactured in Canada. In addition, so long as this cold war continues there will be, for food produced in Canada, a heavy demand by members of the North Atlantic treaty and also by various countries in Asia that we are obliged to support under the United Nations organization. If therefore we are going to continue to have the cold war for the next five or six years, we are going to continue to have inflationary pressure.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I have considered the matter carefully, and I entertain doubts as to whether the hon. member should, while discussing this resolution, go into the matter of the opinion of the government on what it considers to be a short-term taxation program. The rule is that remarks must be strictly relevant to the resolution. On looking over some of the citations on the subject in Beauchesne's, I saw one, citation 489, third edition, to the effect that a member was declared out of order because he was discussing the branches of the main line of a certain railway company which was then under discussion in committee. I think the hon. member is now going much farther than the member mentioned in the citation, when he was discussing branches of the line when expenditures for a certain railway company were before the committee for study. I should like the hon. member to consider that citation 489, Beauchesne, third edition, seriously and govern himself accordingly.

Mr. Quelch: Yes, Mr. Chairman. I will try to make myself clear in the future, because it is quite evident that I have not done so heretofore or you would not have made that observation. What I am trying to show is that the taxation that is being brought down in this budget—especially excise taxes—is causing an increase in the cost of living; that, as the result of increased taxation we would normally expect demand to fall off, unemployment to increase and prices to fall; but that, owing to the international situation, even though internal demand falls off, external demand is increasing, and will therefore take the place of internal demand and consequently we shall no doubt continue to have a high demand for the goods we are producing. On that basis I quite agree with the minister—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. If the hon. member pursues that subject, in my opinion he will not be addressing his remarks to the resolution that is now before the committee.

Mr. Quelch: I will pick up the resolution, read it section by section, and comment on it. Then at least I shall be in order, because I understand that at the present time the whole resolution is before the committee and not any one section. Section 1 reads as follows:

> That the rate of the general sales tax be increased from eight to ten per cent and that the rate of sales tax on those articles at present subject to four per cent be increased to five per cent.

It was suggested that that tax should be eliminated; and the parliamentary assistant, among others, suggested that any time we advocated the elimination of a tax we should suggest an alternative. When the leader of this group spoke he mentioned that as an alternative there could be an increase in the tax on liquor. The Minister of Finance has argued that if we have an increase in the tax on liquor at this time we may very well reach the law of diminishing return. Well, if we reach the law of diminishing return, so far as liquor is concerned, would that not be a worth-while objective? Is the government going to take the stand that it wants to increase the consumption of liquor in this country? Would they not actually be doing something for the welfare and health of the people of Canada if, as a result of a tax on liquor, there was a reduction in the consumption of liquor in this country?

Therefore if an increase in taxation in this regard would have that result—and I am not saying that it would—but if such an increase in taxation would have that result, namely that it would reduce the consumption of liquor, then I would say we would be achieving a worth-while objective. Then, again, if the minister thinks an increase in the price of liquor would reduce the demand for it, and feels that in order to maintain the revenue from that source he would like to have an increase rather than a decrease in consumption, I suggest all that would be necessary would be to maintain the price of liquor at the present level and then increase the water content in each bottle. A person would still be able to buy a bottle of liquor for the same price—but perhaps it would be a bottle with less kick. Some might say it would be less effective—but there, again, it is a matter of opinion. It might have less effect upon the person who drank it but the person would remain more effective than if the water content had not been increased.

I take the odd drink, but it would not worry me very much if such drinks were eliminated entirely. But I have seen strange consequences as a result of an over-indulgence in liquor. My mind always goes back to the last war when, one day, coming back from the front line, I came across one of my platoon commanders very busily shooting at a bath-mat. I know what he thought he was doing: he thought he was shooting rats. I was afraid he might mistake one of my feet for a rat, so I went in the other direction. But the strange thing was that the next day that man did not remember having shot at imaginary rats; he had forgotten all about it. But he was having a fine time with his hunting expedition on rats—I suggest he would have been no worse off if he had not been able to get that liquor so as to indulge in his hunting spree. Some people are not satisfied with shooting rats; they go after pink elephants. If we were to put more water in the liquor they would probably be satisfied with mice, instead of elephants. I do not think it would be detrimental to the country if an increase in the taxation on liquor had the effect of reducing consumption. Indeed I believe it would be a good thing and would be beneficial to the country. The man with money, who wanted liquor, could still get it; people with less money would probably drink beer, and perhaps they would be better off. But it certainly does not worry me at all when the minister argues that an increase in the tax on liquor would curtail consumption, because I believe that would be a beneficial result.

Then the next paragraph in the resolution states:

> That the excise tax on goods mentioned in schedule I of the act, and on furs, that are at present subject to the rate of fifteen per cent be increased to twenty-five per cent.

I understand this includes radios, household electrical appliances, cameras, cosmetics, cars and the like. I believe the minister has referred to most of those articles as being articles of luxury. I do not know whether the females of the species would regard cosmetics as luxuries: indeed I think a lot of them would regard them as an absolute necessity. I have no doubt in some cases they are a necessity.

An hon. Member: Watch out.

Mr. Quelch: After all, the aim and objective of many women is to catch their men, and certainly they could be more effective in hunting their men if they had cosmetics. I do not see why we should make it more difficult for persons in the low income group to get their men than it is at the present time.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, I feel really that I must categorically deny the accusation which has been levelled against the women of Canada by the hon. member.

Mr. Quelch: We all know the hon. member for Hamilton West would be absolutely exempted from anything I have said.

Then, on the question of cars: surely no one in the house—certainly no person from western Canada, and no person familiar with farming—would suggest for one moment that an automobile is a luxury, so far as the farmer is concerned. In the majority of cases it is a piece of equipment that is absolutely necessary—unless the farmer has a truck he can use instead of a car.

Even the income tax officials recognize that cars are essential equipment, because they permit a depreciation allowance to two-thirds the value of the car as deductible expenditure for income tax purposes. And the hon. member for Battle River suggests to me this question: Why should the farmer's wife ride in a truck?

Mr. Wylie: Let the hon. member for Hamilton West answer that.

Mr. Quelch: And what about the working man who resides several miles from the city, and has to drive several miles to town so as to engage in his work? To that man a motor car is absolutely essential so that he may go to his job. Certainly the minister cannot argue, in the light of those facts, that a car is a luxury. It may be used as a luxury by some people; but to other people it is a piece of equipment that is absolutely essential to the jobs in which they are engaged.

Then, of course, those who use cars as a luxury would be able to buy them, despite the amount of the tax. It is the people in the lower income groups who will find it difficult to buy new cars, in the light of these taxes. No doubt some people will argue, "Well, people in lower income groups should not buy new cars; they should buy old cars." I am sure there are many hon. members who at some time or other have bought an old car, and have realized that old cars are not always the cheapest things to buy. Sometimes it is cheaper to buy a new one, because tremendous repair bills may pile up so that an old car becomes a liability rather than an asset—and people on low incomes are not in a position to afford heavy repair bills.

I know as a matter of fact farmers often find it is actually cheaper to trade in machinery after a few years; it is cheaper in time saved and cheaper from the standpoint of saving repair bills.

Then the fourth paragraph is in these words:

That there be imposed, levied and collected an excise tax of fifteen per cent on the following goods when adapted to household or apartment use:

(a) stoves, hot plates, grills and other appliances when adapted wholly or in part for cooking and when designed for using other than solid fuels;

As has been pointed out, while this does not include stoves that burn coal or wood, it does include electric stoves and gas stoves. Many houses are designed so that only gas or electric stoves can be used in them. Therefore it would be a hardship to people starting up in houses of that kind if they have to pay this tax on that type of stove.

Then the paragraph includes washing machines operated by electric or other power. I cannot understand how the Minister of Finance can possibly in any way regard a washing machine as a luxury. Wealthy people do not use them; they send their washing out, or at least most of them do. I suppose some of them use washing machines. But people who do their washing at home must have washing machines; I think all will agree on that. We do not expect them to use the washboard in these days. Because of this provision, and this additional tax, it will be more expensive for them to buy washing machines. Perhaps the minister wants people to stop using soap, because some of the ingredients of soap can be used in munitions.

The next paragraph reads:

(c) electric, gas or kerosene refrigerators and freezing equipment and complete parts therefor including coils, condensing or compressor units, motors, cabinets, boxes, evaporators and expansion valves.

I can easily understand how many people would regard a refrigerator as a luxury, but on the other hand a refrigerator is a necessity in homes without basements if they are to eliminate spoilage. With the present high cost of food people cannot afford to have their purchases spoil and therefore a refrigerator is a necessity. Wartime houses have been built without basements, and certainly with a climate such as we have here in the summertime a refrigerator is a necessity if there is no basement. In western Canada many people live nine, ten, fifteen or twenty miles from town and they have to buy from week to week. In hot weather they find it hard to keep their food without a refrigerator. I admit we have done it in the past, but in those days prices were not as high as they are today.

Apparently the Minister of Finance feels that the people who want these things should be prepared to wait. How long should people wait for these things? Is there any likelihood that prices will fall in the near future? During the last war and after the last war the people of Canada were asked to co-operate by refraining from buying these things I have referred to, things that were perhaps not considered to be absolutely essential. The Minister of Finance asked the people to stop spending their money on these things, to put it into bonds, and then later when prices had fallen and the goods were in more plentiful supply they would be in position to buy them. Many people co-operated with the government. Here is what the Minister of Finance said, as reported on page 1800 of Hansard of April 10, 1951:

We in Canada have already done a great deal. As I have said on previous occasions, this is not a matter in which government policies alone can provide a complete solution. It is a matter which requires the fullest co-operation of all sections and groups, in which every person has a part to play.

As I was pointing out, in the past many people did co-operate with the government. Those who co-operated by refraining from buying these things are the people who got it in the neck. The people who said, "Oh, to heck with the government, I am going to buy a new refrigerator or a new stove or a new car," probably were able to buy forty per cent cheaper than they could today. The people who took to heart what the government was saying, that they should refrain from buying these things; those who said, "All right, we will co-operate, we will wait until they are more plentiful," found after they had waited two or three years that prices have continuously risen. Some stepped in at that time, but others kept on waiting and some are still waiting. Now they have either to continue waiting or if they want to buy, they must pay the already high prices plus this fifteen per cent excise tax.

How can the government expect co-operation from the people when they break faith in this way? Those people who listened to the government expected the government to play their part in keeping prices down. But those people who refrained from buying at the request of the government are now faced with greatly increased prices, plus this additional tax.

The people who are probably the hardest hit, the people for whom the Minister of Veterans Affairs should feel especially concerned, and I am sure he is, are the veterans. I recall how at the end of the last war the Minister of Finance referred to the fact that after world war I there had been inflation, prices had gone up and the veterans coming home had to pay greatly inflated prices for the things they required. The former minister of finance, Mr. Ilsley, said that they did not intend to allow that situation to develop after the second world war. He said that they were not going to have the war veterans coming home and being faced with inflated prices.

What happened? The Minister of Veterans Affairs is probably aware of the fact that many veterans who wanted to buy land were advised by the Department of Veterans Affairs to wait until prices fell before buying land and equipment. In some cases they advised the veterans to wait for two years and in the meantime to work on farms to gain experience. What happened? In those two years, from 1946 to 1948, the price of a John Deere tractor increased from $1,800 to $2,800, and the price of land also soared. The result was that those veterans who had been advised by the department to hold off buying land and equipment had to pay 30 or 40 per cent more for what they wanted. In many cases the grants under the Veterans Land Act were swallowed up by the inflation that had occurred. I am sure that the government must feel deeply concerned about these men who could not help themselves.

Not even satisfied with that, apparently they are going to make the men in the armed services who are overseas pay income tax. However, I would be out of order if I discussed income tax at the present time.

I should like the parliamentary assistant to deal with the point as to whether or not these taxes are in reality a tax upon a large proportion of the savings of the people in the lower income groups who are not able to meet the high cost of living out of current income and are having to draw upon savings. This has been going on to quite an extent. I notice the February 1951 issue of the Canadian Statistical Review, at page five, states:

> The increase in consumer expenditure was the principal factor accounting for a decline of four per cent in personal saving, from $802 million in 1949 to $769 million in 1950. If changes in farm inventories are deducted from the saving figures, a much greater decline in the rate of saving is indicated. Thus, personal saving, exclusive of changes in farm inventories, was $604 million in 1950, compared with $875 million in 1949, which represents five per cent of personal income in 1950 compared with seven per cent in 1949.

As the situation deteriorates still further it means that not only will people not be able to save as much, they will actually have to draw upon their savings to meet the current cost of living, if they are lucky enough to have savings. We all know that there are many people who have already liquidated their savings. I know from personal experience and contact with many people that today they are cashing their bonds and various other capital assets in order to meet current expenditures. In other words, they are living on capital rather than on current income.

As a result of this resolution they are now going to have to pay an additional tax on the savings they spend. I think the minister should deal with that point because it is a very undesirable feature.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, before I deal with the more serious aspects of this resolution, perhaps I should assure the hon. member for Acadia that the women of Canada are not concerned about the tax on cosmetics.

An hon. Member: The gals are.

Mrs. Fairclough: I doubt that, my friend; I doubt that. If all the cosmetics on the counters of all the drug and department stores in the Dominion of Canada were removed from those counters, the women of Canada would not be very greatly concerned.

Mr. Gibson: They might not look so good.

Mrs. Fairclough: I think they would still look good to the men of Canada. As a matter of fact it has long been a matter of conjecture as to who gets whom, and I think at times that the women probably feel that a few cosmetics might not be amiss in the men's sections—

Mr. Cruickshank: They taste very good.

Mrs. Fairclough: —of department stores and on the drug counters.

Mr. Cruickshank: It would take more than that to wake up some of those fellows.

Mrs. Fairclough: I think probably the hon. member is right, but I do not think it is confined to any one section of the house or of the nation.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mrs. Fairclough: However, Mr. Chairman, I must put in a word for the women of Canada and say that regardless of whether or not cosmetics exist, regardless of whether or not they are taxed, the women of Canada will still be happy in this country. To turn to more serious aspects of the resolution, I was impressed with the question this afternoon of the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet with regard to the tax that has been placed upon cooking equipment. He made quite a point about the difference between coal and wood stoves, and electric and gas stoves. Unfortunately I am not aware of the conditions that exist in the whole of Canada but I know that in the cities, particularly the larger ones, a great many apartment houses and practically all of the newer homes are simply not equipped to take any kind of cooking equipment other than gas or electric.

Mr. Fraser: They have no chimneys.

Mrs. Fairclough: As my friend says, they have no chimneys capable of taking the outlets necessary to wood or coal stoves. Therefore any tax placed upon a piece of electric or gas equipment is directly discriminatory against those women who are forced to buy equipment that must be connected to gas or electric outlets. I submit they are in the majority in the Dominion of Canada when you consider the size of the large cities and the many apartment houses, and old homes which have been converted into multiple dwellings, in which this is the only type of cooking equipment available to them.

The hon. member made quite a point of the fact that coal and wood stoves serve a dual purpose, that in addition to being cooking equipment they were also heating equipment. That may well be, but after all we cannot all eat cold food, we cannot all eat raw food. If these people are going to raise their families so that they will be healthy, if they are going to supply their men with the kind of meals that will fit them for a place in the production lines of this nation, they have got to have cooking fuel, and in a great many places today the cooking fuel is either gas or electricity in a large majority of the homes. I contend that the imposition of this tax upon any one class of cooking equipment is discrimination against women who are forced by circumstances to buy and use that particular type of equipment.

I was surprised to hear the parliamentary assistant say this afternoon that the increase in the sales tax had been deliberately imposed to levy a tax upon those people who would not under ordinary circumstances pay tax on their incomes because of the exemptions they ordinarily enjoy by reason of married status and the children they have. When I say I was surprised, I do not mean that I was surprised at the idea because I had rather thought that was the case all along, but I was surprised that the parliamentary assistant would admit it. I was surprised that he would admit that the government would impose an additional tax upon people who admittedly, by the government's own standards, do not earn enough money to maintain their families and pay a tax on their incomes.

Mr. Fraser: A tax on the poor.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mrs. Fairclough: My hon. friend can laugh but that is true.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): I am not laughing at anything the lady said, but I am laughing at the insinuation that you are the poor people's party.

An hon. Member: Cheap stuff.

Mr. Casselman: Smart boy.

Mr. Fraser: Just because you represent St. James street—

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Never saw it.

Mrs. Fairclough: I cannot recall that I made that assertion, nor can I recall that my hon. friend made that assertion. It is one that has been handed to us by the hon. member, and on behalf of myself I accept it. I think I know just as much about the problems of the poor people of this country as any member of this house, if not more.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mrs. Fairclough: Yesterday in this house I had occasion to agree one hundred per cent with the hon. member for Mackenzie when he said, as reported at page 2388 of Hansard:

> This sales tax attacks the municipalities, who are not profit-making corporations, in the same way as it attacks profit-making corporations. The municipalities—the government of the country just the same as the federal government—are rendering service to the people, doing a lot of development work and carrying a lot of social services, which are rendered directly to the individual. If it is impossible to take the sales tax off such things as the machinery bought by the municipalities, then the government should give a grant in lieu of this tax to every municipality in Canada of 1,000 inhabitants or more.

During the afternoon and early evening we have heard a good deal of argument in reference to the impact of this tax on the families of this nation. The argument put forward so far has dealt largely with the increased cost of clothing and the various supplies required in a home, but I should like to direct attention to the fact that municipal costs are likewise paid largely by the homemakers. Every cent of the sales tax on supplies purchased by a municipality is paid out of real estate taxes or in rent, which has a direct relationship to real estate taxes, by those in this country least able to pay. No doubt hon. members are well aware that it has long been the contention of the association of mayors and reeves that the sales tax should be remitted on supplies purchased by municipalities, whether those supplies are machinery, hospital supplies, articles required by boards of education, or whatever they may be. In whatever category they may fall they are paid for by the people of the municipalities through increased real estate taxes.

I am sure hon. members have followed, as I have, the reports in the papers during the last couple of months. There may be some municipality in some obscure corner of this country that has lowered its taxes this year, but if so I have not noticed it. Almost every municipality has increased its tax rate to a substantial extent. This in turn is reflected in the amount that must be paid by the ordinary home owner to maintain his home before he even starts to buy food or clothing or any of the other things a family needs. To use a word that has been used already this afternoon and evening, this is an iniquitous tax. I can do no more than beg the minister to withdraw this tax before it is too late, before the people of this country suffer to an extent beyond their endurance.

Mr. Fair: I believe this house is indebted to the hon. member for Acadia for the light he has thrown on the effects of the budget proposals which are now before us. I believe many hon. members did not realize what would be the result when these various changes are put into effect. It seems to me that the Minister of Finance and his advisers should hang their heads in shame when they appreciate the effect this will have on the common working people of this country. Perhaps it is all right to sit in this chamber, to eat in our restaurant up on the sixth floor, to live at a big hotel here or in another city, and charge plenty for a day's work or for a half hour's work; but compare that with the conditions under which the little fellow has to live and the pay he draws for a full day's work. I believe these things should be taken into consideration before we proceed further with the budget proposals.

Many say the people like taxes. That is not the case; but apparently a lot of people go to sleep when election day comes around, because they keep putting the Liberals back into office. Then they have to pay heavier taxes and live on reduced earnings. But when the next election comes around they put the Liberals right back in, as I believe they have done today in Prince Edward Island. I do not know why they do it. If I were a Liberal and had to support a thing like this budget, which many of them including the hon. member for Mackenzie do not believe in, I would get out of the Liberal party and stay out for good. Section 4 of these proposals reads:

> That there be imposed, levied and collected an excise tax of fifteen per cent on the following goods when adapted to household or apartment use:
> (b) washing machines operated by electric or other power.

When the parliamentary assistant replies to the questions which have been asked I should like him to make clear whether this "other power" is man power or woman power, or whether it is confined to gasoline engines and electricity. I ask that because we sometimes find that when these taxes are being collected those who may be seeking advancement in their positions may interpret things in a way parliament did not mean when the resolutions were being considered. I should like that matter cleared up when the parliamentary assistant is replying.

Mr. Bryce: This budget leads me to believe more than ever what I said in the house some time ago, that the Liberal party of today is not the Liberal party of yesterday. When I was a boy the Liberal party protected the rights of the poor people, but this budget certainly does not do that. This increase from 8 per cent to 10 per cent is far too much. I was surprised at the remark of the parliamentary assistant that people could use the scrub board for a while longer.

Mr. Sinclair: I did not say that.

Mr. Bryce: Well, those may be my words but what you said had the same meaning. My wife had to use a scrub board, and I do not want my daughter to have to use it.

Mr. Gibson: Why not? It won't hurt her.

Mr. Bryce: The government of Manitoba has given us electricity, which we have been expecting for over twenty years. We promised the people there that they would get the appliances, and they made deposits on them. Now they are going to have to pay an extra 15 per cent. Is that a square deal? I have so many letters coming to my desk every day asking about these things, wanting to know what the Liberal government is thinking about. You are going to find out when you go back to the country the next time.

Mr. Blackmore: Don't worry about that; they will be elected again. That is all they worry about.

Mr. Bryce: It seems everyone wants to speak now that I have the floor. If everyone else wants to get after the government I will sit back and enjoy it. I want to say to the parliamentary assistant that the government should not put that 15 per cent tax on stoves and the other things that are necessities today. If you go back to the wood and coal stove, do not think you are being progressive, because that is a backward step. When you teach girls domestic science, you do not teach them on a wood stove or a gas stove, you teach them on an electric stove. You show them how to wash clothes in an electric washing machine. I appeal to you to put the excise tax back where it was, because it was heavy enough, and take the fifteen per cent off these appliances that the womenfolk of this country need.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I feel that the parliamentary assistant would like to be answering some questions. I know he is most desirous of answering a number of questions that have been asked of him, so I shall not make any lengthy speech at this time. I am most surprised that the members on the government side have not had something to say about this addition to the general sales tax. If ever there was an unjust and unconscionable tax to be imposed at a time of inflation, it is this additional two per cent. It is insidious and is resorted to because it is hidden. It has already resulted in an increase in the cost of living. It has done so in the case of gasoline and clothing. Shoes are going up, and all because of the fact that the government has joined in the merry-go-round of self-created inflation, its own home-made variety, by adding an extra two per cent. There is no amount of explaining that can get away from the fact that this tax is adding to the cost of living in this country, whatever the brain trust that advises the government may say. They find it an easy way to advise the government to take this means. I am not going to quote what other finance ministers have said, but I do point out that, at a time when the cost of living is going up as never before, the government adds to the speed of the merry-go-round by a sales tax. It does add to the cost of living. It does not affect those whose income is over $3,000 a year to the same extent that it does those whose income is under that, as the member for Hamilton West pointed out a moment ago.

There are a number of matters on which I desire information from the parliamentary assistant, and I am sure he will be able to answer because the dominion bureau of statistics has furnished some information in this regard. I should like to ask him how many dollars a year the ordinary family, covered by and comprised within the computation made in arriving at the cost of living, will have to pay in sales tax this year by reason of the addition of two per cent. I am speaking of the family with an income under $3,000 per year, for after all they are the ones that are generally taken into consideration in arriving at the index figures connected with the cost of living. I have endeavoured to compute this, and I think it comes to about $39 for a family per year.

Then, take the other items. How much will it cost such an ordinary family in respect of those goods covered by section 2, the excise tax on goods mentioned in schedule I? What will the cost be to this ordinary family, which I believe comprises four and a half persons, the average number that is taken into consideration in connection with the index number? How much will it cost them in respect of paragraph 4, the fifteen per cent excise tax on stoves, hot plates, grills, washing machines, refrigerators and the like? If we have that information we then have some idea as to the effect of these taxes. Certainly, these taxes are not going to be anti-inflationary. Their purpose can only be to secure revenue, their result a reduction in the ordinary standard of living among those in the lower income tax brackets.

I am going to give the minister an opportunity, before I say any more, to furnish the committee with this information because I am sure he has it all available. After all, before taxes such as these would be imposed by the cabinet, there must have been information secured from the bureau of statistics. I therefore give the parliamentary assistant the opportunity I know he is looking forward to of furnishing this information.

Mr. Johnston: Just before this item passes—

Mr. Fraser: Let us have this information first.

Mr. Sinclair: I do not want to take up more time in this debate than is necessary, but I have a fair list of questions here which have been asked. First of all, however, I should like to reaffirm the position so far as sales tax and income tax are concerned. In the last year or so I have read back the budget speeches of every minister of finance since the end of the last war. I believe they have all faced this problem. Every minister of finance has agreed that the income tax is undoubtedly the fairest tax, and from the point of view of the lecturer in the classroom that it is the only fair tax. There is, however, a great difference between an academic discussion on taxes and the actual application to an issue. Every country has found there is a very practical limit so far as the application of income tax is concerned.

I am not going to quote any economic authority, but I am going to quote my little Scotch friend the hon. member for Selkirk. Three or four years ago he put a remark on Hansard which shows so well the reaction of people to an excessive income tax. You will remember that during the last war we had an income tax scale much heavier than we do now, and we had much lower exemptions. The income tax laws were beginning to be applied to farmers. My friend protested very bitterly about the extension of income tax to them, and told how a farmer in his riding had given up dairy cows and was going to continue as a wheat farmer. This farmer had said, "I willna milk cows for Ilsley"; that is the very effect of an aggressive income tax. In my own riding during the war we saw its effect in the form of absenteeism in the shipyards. Once a man's income got to the level where extra work put him in a high bracket, he said it was not worth while working. They have certainly had that same experience in Britain.

Some of you will recall that last spring I had the opportunity of going around Europe in connection with the collection of war debts. I was quite impressed with a talk I had with the minister of finance of Belgium. The Belgians have recovered more quickly than any other European people. They have worked very hard. He said that one of the incentives they had given the people to work hard was a low income tax rate. The people who worked overtime got most of the extra money, and spent it on consumer goods which were taxed. It is true that the Belgian government got more revenue by means of much heavier excise taxes and sales taxes than the British had. In Britain they have a very heavy income tax rate. When a man did have a little money left after income taxes, he found there was nothing on which he could spend it. He could not buy more food because it was rationed, more clothing because it was rationed. He could not get extra material to extend his house, because it was in short supply. A government is faced with the hard fact that, if it cannot rely solely on corporation and income taxes for raising revenues which it needs, there is a very practical limitation.

During the last two or three years hon. members will recall that there has been no absence of suggestions from opposition members for more Pacific pacts, more Colombo plans, and for bigger national defence expenditures; all those things have to be paid for. Turning to the practical point of diminishing returns, as to not just taxes but productivity throughout this nation, it can be fairly quickly reached and it would be reached overnight if we tried to impose the entire load of taxation on income tax. Since this country has had both income taxes and indirect taxes, we have had to try to maintain this almost even balance between our collections of direct tax and our collections of indirect tax.

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Sinclair: I have plenty of answers here, if the hon. member will just bide his time. There has been talk here by the lady member for Hamilton West implying that I said that the sales tax was our method of taxing the poor. The sales tax is paid by all those who buy those materials. The income tax of this country has of course a direct relation to our tax program. I have here a table which I intended to put on the record when we were discussing the personal income tax. It is one showing that this country has higher income tax exemptions than have the other two countries with whom we can reasonably compare ourselves, namely, the United States and Great Britain. Here in Canada we have income tax exemptions as follows: for a single man $1,000; for a married man, $2,000. Perhaps I should go right across the board. For a single man, $1,000 in Canada; $600 in the United States and $319 in the United Kingdom. That is at $2.90 to the pound. The United Kingdom will show one or two other provisions which I will mention when I come to the table. Exemptions for a married man: in Canada, $2,000; in the United States, $1,200 and in the United Kingdom $551. Children receiving family allowances are given exemptions of $150. If they are not in receipt of family allowance, they are given exemptions of $400. There is no family allowance in the United States. Children get a $600 exemption. In Britain, whether the child receives family allowance or not, he receives an exemption of $203. The family allowance in Britain is taxable. The British allow a further exemption of 20 per cent on earned income.

I want to give a specific example. I said a little earlier this afternoon that today in Canada we have 5,200,000 people gainfully employed, of whom only 2,200,000 pay income tax. That is because of these high levels of exemptions. I will take the example of a man earning $3,000 a year, because that was the figure mentioned by one of the speakers.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, may I raise a point of order, and I do not do so in any vindictive spirit. I would just like to have things clear. A short while ago, when the hon. member for Acadia seemed to you to get a little bit beyond the scope of the Excise Tax Act, Your Honour insisted that he get back to the discussion of that act. The parliamentary assistant is now getting completely away from the Excise Tax Act resolution.

An hon. Member: It is a question he was asked.

Mr. Knowles: Just a minute. The parliamentary assistant is discussing the Income Tax Act. I should just like to know whether that procedure can be construed as being in order, so that the rest of us can enter into the same discussion, or might it not have been better if the parliamentary assistant had withheld what he is now giving, as he said he intended to do, until we came to the other measure?

Mr. Sinclair: If I may speak to the point of order, I should like to say that I am not discussing income tax proposals. But the hon. member for Hamilton West, in her remarks, mentioned the income tax exemption and—

Mrs. Fairclough: No.

Mr. Sinclair: —that I have made the statement that the sales tax was our tax on the poor.

Mrs. Fairclough: I said nothing at all about income tax exemptions; but inasmuch as the parliamentary assistant has mentioned the matter, I should like to make a remark on his assertion that the exemption is $150 for children where their parents receive the family allowance. That is not the case. The $150 is allowed where the parents are eligible for family allowance, whether or not they receive it.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I think the point of order raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is well taken. I heard the parliamentary assistant premise his remarks by quoting some assertion made by the hon. member for Hamilton West and I thought he was replying to that. Now that this misunderstanding has been cleared up by what the hon. member for Hamilton West has just said, I will have to ask the parliamentary assistant not to discuss this broad picture of inflation or the cost of living, and not to refer to income tax on the excise tax resolution.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, I greatly regret that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre saw fit to raise this point of order. After all, we are discussing the question of the expediency of passing these measures. "Expediency" is a fairly broad word, and it applies fairly well all over the economy. I submit that the parliamentary assistant was completely in order because he was endeavouring to justify the application of this sales tax, having regard to the ability of those in the lower income brackets to pay, in comparison with that of those who pay income tax. I cannot see how we can more fully be discussing the "expediency" of the measure than by doing exactly as he has done. I submit to Your Honour that any attempt to limit too strictly discussion with regard to the expediency of this measure will render the discussion a complete farce.

The Deputy Chairman: I think the hon. member should realize that there should be just one ruling with regard to any one measure and that the ruling should apply to every hon. member. A moment ago I called the hon. member for Acadia to order because he was taking too broad a view of the resolution and going outside it. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has now raised a point of order which I have just ruled was correctly raised. I shall therefore have to insist that this rule be observed. The hon. member refers to the expediency of the measure. The resolution reads:

> Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Excise Tax Act and to provide: Paragraph 1 . . . .

And then specific provisions are set out. That is what is to be considered, and the remarks must be strictly relevant to each paragraph of the whole resolution which is now before the committee, on the various items which are to be amended or repealed or whatever the case may be.

Mr. Sinclair: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, because there will be opportunity under the personal income tax resolution to discuss this matter. I shall confine myself now to answering questions which have been raised by various members opposite.

The hon. member for Acadia spoke at some length about liquor taxation. I should like to point out what has already been said by the minister, what was said by myself on the budget speech, and what has been said by Premier Frost, namely that as far as liquor taxation in Canada today is concerned, we have come to the point of diminishing return. He asked whether we were interested in the control or the handling of the liquor business. The federal government is not in the liquor business. The control of liquor is in the hands of ten provinces. But when Premier Frost, speaking in the budget debate in the provincial legislature, said that any increase whatsoever in liquor taxes would result in the province of Ontario having a $10 million deficit this year, you can see that the point of diminishing return has been reached. There is some more than that, though, in connection with liquor, because it encourages the breaking of the law, bootlegging and moonshining; and as Premier Frost pointed out, the problem of enforcement was a provincial matter.

As to the suggestion that this act should replace the sales tax, during the dinner hour the national revenue people made a rough calculation. It would need a 300 per cent increase in our present scale of taxation on liquor, the highest we have ever had, a scale of taxation we have never cut back even from the last war, but which we raised in the baby budget last fall. As I say, it would require at least a 300 per cent increase in liquor taxation, provided there was no diminishing return. That is, our tax would be at least $36 a gallon. That shows how impractical a suggestion like that is with regard to finding the necessary revenues.

Mr. Diefenbaker: How many gallons does that take into consideration? In arriving at $36 a gallon, I am interested in knowing how many gallons that would be.

Mr. Sinclair: National revenue do not charge on the type of products sold at the stores. They charge $36 a proof gallon; that is, a proof Imperial gallon. The ordinary quart sold at the liquor store is not a real quart. It is one-fifth of a quart less.

An hon. Member: A dollar a gallon.

Mr. Sinclair: It is not the federal government. It is the provincial government that do it as a business operation. This is no conflict in taxation between the provinces and the federal government. The federal government has a right of taxation here. The provinces are in the liquor business. It is, after all, taxation on their business to which they are referring.

Mr. Adamson: Does not the federal government enforce the 30 per cent underproof?

Mr. Abbott: No; only during the war.

Mr. Adamson: Has that been washed out? Then provincial governments could sell whisky that was not 30 per cent underproof?

Mr. Abbott: Yes.

Mr. Sinclair: The liquor controllers meet each year and decide on a common national policy in that respect.

Mr. Fraser: How many gallons does that take into account when arriving at the $36 per gallon?

Mr. Sinclair: Last year the revenue from liquor taxes was $61 million. To raise another $125 million would require, in effect, $36 a gallon tax, instead of the present $12 tax.

Then, to go on to the next point, the matter of the tax on cars, washing machines and refrigerators. Hon. members across the way seem to be trying to leave the impression that the only reason we are taxing them is because they are regarded as luxuries. They are not luxuries. The Minister of Finance and the government are faced with the problem of raising an extra $400 million, and faced with the problem of placing that tax load on the Canadian people as fairly as possible.

I said when I spoke last week that, so far as this particular paragraph is concerned, referring to power washing machines, refrigerators and electric stoves, they are goods with an especially high content of materials needed for defence, not only steel but copper. I put the striking analysis of the Anaconda Copper Company on the record, as well, to show the essentiality of those materials.

The Minister of Finance also mentioned the amazing rate of spending on these items. On the point raised by the hon. member for Battle River with respect to washing machines operated by electrical or other power I would say that the intent of that is that it is mechanical power.

Then the hon. member for Lake Centre asked a series of questions as to the actual amount of tax paid by the low income family. At the beginning of the session I placed on record an analysis made up by the dominion bureau of statistics respecting goods in various categories, and showing family purchases over a variety of incomes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: But that does not answer my question. Has the parliamentary assistant any record or has he secured any record from the dominion bureau of statistics setting out how much the increase in the sales tax, as shown in the first paragraph of the resolution, will add to the cost of living of the average family with an income under $3,000? I have reason to believe that that information is in the possession of the parliamentary assistant. That is what I am trying to find out—how much the general sales tax will increase the cost of living of the average family he has used as a model, and in respect of which the cost of living index is arrived at. That information must be available, and I think it would be most interesting if it showed exactly the degree to which the sales tax will impinge upon those in the small income tax brackets.

Mr. Sinclair: Well, I think the table I put on record today shows that picture. Perhaps it does not show it in exactly the way the hon. member wants it. What the hon. member asks would not be a matter for the Department of National Revenue, but rather for the dominion bureau of statistics, with its sampling of average families of various income groups across the country. That is not the type of work done by the Department of National Revenue.

Mr. Diefenbaker: But there must be some collaboration between these departments.

Mr. Sinclair: I will endeavour to have that information ready when the Excise Tax Act bill is before the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And also, the information on paragraphs 2 and 4—those three paragraphs.

Mr. Sinclair: Yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Because it will show directly, as a result of the examination by the bureau of statistics, how much these new taxes are going to interfere with the standard of living of those in the low income tax brackets, who have nothing left today. They are the people who, more than anyone else, are directly affected by this injustice of imposing a sales tax at this time.

On the one hand you have a government with a realization of the cost of living going up, at a rate never before equalled, and on the other hand you have a government adding to the fires of inflation by adding a sales tax on necessities at this time.

Mr. Chairman, for the life of me, I cannot understand what justification there is for this tax at the present time. I shall ask the parliamentary assistant a simple question: does he in any way suggest or does the government suggest that the imposition of this sales tax at the present time, and also the excise tax on stoves, washing machines, electric or kerosene refrigerators, and so on, is going to contribute anything to meet the onrush in the increase in the cost of living? Will this do anything like that? If it will not, then it is one of the most serious things the government could possibly do at this time. They are actually creating their own internal inflation by the taxes they impose.

Then I hear the parliamentary assistant talking about Colombo. That apparently is one thing that is referred to by him to account for all the extra taxation. The government announced in January that $25 million was going to be voted for Colombo—part of our defence requirements; that, in effect, is what it is. The $25 million is to be used for the purpose of containing communism, and seems to be the one thing my hon. friend keeps returning to, with monotonous regularity, to explain all additional taxes.

Mr. Knowles: Is he for or against it?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will ask that question: does he believe that $25 million should be given under the Colombo plan? I ask that because for the last several days, over and over again, he has referred to it.

Mr. Sinclair: And the reason I have referred to it is that I not only believe that $25 million should be given, but I am willing to support the tax necessary to pay it. I am unlike the hon. member who goes on the air and says we should be giving $50 million to Colombo, and then comes to the House of Commons and opposes all the tax measures which are necessary to pay for this project.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, as a matter of fact no one had spoken of the $25 million contribution by Canada to the Colombo plan when I spoke on the radio. It was only after I had suggested an expenditure should be made, in consequence of the experience you and I had recently—it was only after that that the government announced the $25 million; and I agreed that that was sufficient for the purpose. Never did I mention $50 million after the government decided to advance that amount of money, after playing with the problem from September last until we, on our side of the house, felt it was one thing that should be done. And then the government finally decided that it was going to make a contribution.

An hon. Member: You said in Quebec it should be made.

The Deputy Chairman: May I suggest that we return now to a discussion of the excise tax?

Mr. Gibson: May I suggest that when the parliamentary assistant is having figures prepared he might also have prepared the expenditures of the average family on tobacco and liquor.

Mr. Sinclair: This table which I indicated contained a breakdown of expenditures of families at different levels for these items of tobacco, alcoholic beverages and the like. And when I say I am trying to get that information, I must say I do not know that the dominion bureau of statistics can break down figures in that way for the groups suggested. However I will suggest it.

Then, hon. members have talked a great deal about the pyramiding effect of a sales tax like this at the manufacturer's level. I cannot help feeling that there is an implication that all the retailers and businessmen are taking shameful advantage of the consumers—which I do not believe. I would like to hear some of the retailers in the house, people with practical knowledge, state whether or not they pyramid the tax or whether their markup is the cost of doing business. There again, we know that with different items there are different markups. One of the closest markups is in clothing and one of the largest markups, as two hon. members over there should know, is in household appliances. The application of the two per cent increase in the sales tax at the manufacturer's level manifests itself in a different way if there is a ten per cent markup, as in clothing, or a 50 or 100 per cent markup, as in furniture and household appliances.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, I think the parliamentary assistant is going to have a rather difficult time in convincing the people that this extra tax is not going to materially raise prices. The people who buy these things are going to be the best judges. A while ago somebody said that the ratepayers of the country had voted in the Liberal government. I have not much sympathy with those people who would put in a government like this. I would say that all those who voted Liberal deserve just what they are getting.

A while ago the parliamentary assistant said that the reason they did not increase the tax on liquor was that it had reached the point of diminishing return. I think almost everyone in this house will agree that that tax should have been increased instead of the tax on some other things. The parliamentary assistant said also that they did not want to encroach upon provincial jurisdiction. I think both these reasons are exceedingly wrong.

In the first place the federal government is already taxing liquor so there would be no question of their getting into that business —they are already in it. It is just a matter of degree, a matter of how much further they want to go with a tax on liquor. Apart from its use for medicinal purposes, if there ever was a luxury, the use of liquor is one. I think it is safe to say that with all the taxes that have been put on liquor there has been no sign of a lessened consumption. The provincial governments have used this tax as a successful source of revenue. I am just speaking from memory, but I think Alberta got something like $12 million and there was an increase in consumption. This shows that there is a field here for increased taxation by the federal government.

Then it was said that taxation on liquor had reached the point where it was encouraging bootlegging. That is not a very good argument. The government has increased the tax on tobacco and cigarettes to the point where it has caused a material increase in bootlegging and blackmarketing. Yet you hear no suggestion from the federal government that they are going to eliminate these taxes—I am not suggesting that they should —in order to stop bootlegging. I am just pointing out the impracticability of suggesting that they have reached the point of diminishing return with liquor but not with tobacco and cigarettes. I noticed in the paper the other day that Ontario is having an exceedingly difficult time in curtailing bootlegging and blackmarketing of cigarettes, and only yesterday the papers stated that British Columbia was facing the same problem.

I have not heard of any greater difficulty in the bootlegging of liquor now than there was before. Yet all of a sudden there is this surge of bootlegging and blackmarketing of cigarettes. I think the argument of the government that they could not raise the tax on liquor because it had reached the point of diminishing return and would increase bootlegging and blackmarketing is not very well founded.

I think the people generally who consume these articles would far rather have the tax increased on them than have an increase on the tax on these other things which enter into the ordinary necessities of life. The idea of taxing washing machines! The parliamentary assistant says that that is the only way they can get revenue. That is not the only reason the Minister of Finance gave when he was giving his speech. If I remember rightly he gave as a reason, first, that they had to get revenue and, second, that they had to save material for use in rearmament and so on.

That reminds me of the last war when they began to raise the price of automobiles. It was said that one reason for doing that was to save material so that it could go into the manufacture of armaments. When we suggested that the proper way to handle it was by rationing the government replied that they could not do that. The same thing applies today. If we need the metal which goes into washing machines, refrigerators and automobiles so urgently for war purposes, the proper thing to do is to ration these articles and treat everybody fairly.

This is not a fair tax because those with large incomes are going to get automobiles, washing machines or refrigerators when they want them. An extra $50 or $60 on a washing machine or a refrigerator, or another $200, $300, $400 or $500 on an automobile will not amount to a row of beans to those in the higher income brackets. But it is of material importance to the housewife who needs a new washing machine. Perhaps the parliamentary assistant knows of cases, but I never heard of a housewife buying a new electric washing machine if she did not need it pretty badly.

We are told that there is to be no tax on those that are operated by hand. I doubt if any of them are being made, although there may be one or two. The country is becoming electrified so rapidly that only electrical machines are used. If not electrical, then the gasoline machine is purchased. I do not think anyone would suggest that a farm wife will buy a washing machine as a luxury.

One thing that has amused me all down through the years that I have been here since 1935 is that I have heard it said repeatedly that the fairest tax was the income tax. I do not think I have heard anyone say this session that the income tax was not the fairest tax. If that is so, and I believe it is, we should look to that field, and in saying this I am bearing in mind what the parliamentary assistant said a moment ago about discouraging production and all that sort of thing.

The very fact that the exemption on income tax is set at $2,000 for married persons indicates that we consider that everyone having an income of less than $2,000 is not in position to pay income tax and maintain a decent standard of living. With the present runaway inflation that $2,000 will not buy $2,000 worth of goods, it will buy only a little over one-half. The parliamentary assistant pointed out that this tax was to raise money. If that is so, why try to get blood out of a stone, why try to get money out of those people who are less able to pay income tax? The exemptions from that tax clearly indicate the position. When you look over the income tax field you find that the greatest amount of revenue is obtained from those people with incomes between $3,000 and $8,000. Certainly everyone will recognize the fact that nowadays an income of $3,000 does not keep a family in a position where they can live in luxury.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I heard the hon. member discussing income tax.

Mr. Johnston: I am speaking directly about the excise tax.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member will realize that this matter was ruled out of order a moment ago. May I at this point impress upon all hon. members that standing order 58, section 2, reads:

> Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

The words "strictly relevant" might be interpreted in different ways, but may I again call the attention of hon. members to citation 489, for instance, of Beauchesne, third edition, which reads as follows:

> In committee of supply, on the 22nd May, 1931,—

Mr. Johnston: We cannot hear you, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: I am reading citation 489 of Beauchesne, third edition, as an illustration of what was meant at that time by strictly relevant to the item under discussion. The citation reads:

> In committee of supply, on the 22nd May, 1931, while a resolution was in discussion for an expenditure of $6 million for construction and betterments of Hudson Bay Railway and Terminals, a member was ruled out of order by the chairman for discussing the question of railway branches to the Pacific coast by a Peace river outlet. The chairman based his ruling on standing order 58, section 2, which says that "speeches in committee of the whole must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration." An appeal was taken to the house but the ruling was confirmed on division.

I think a certain amount of latitude is always permissible. When a matter as complicated as the one comprised in this over-all resolution is before the house, I can understand how difficult it may be for whoever takes the floor to confine his remarks strictly to the discussion of the resolution as a whole, but I will ask the hon. member to co-operate with the chair. I know that is what he wants to do. I am not addressing my remarks only to him but to all hon. members and I ask them to confine their remarks—

Mr. Blackmore: We cannot hear what you say.

The Deputy Chairman: I hope it will be possible for the acoustics of the house to be improved because, at the moment, I am speaking with sufficient volume that I should be heard at the end of the chamber. If the hon. member cannot hear me now I am very sorry. What I am saying is that all hon. members should co-operate as much as possible in order to expedite the business, and should confine their remarks to the resolution under consideration.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, for the benefit of the committee, in view of the fact you have drawn our attention to standing order 58, section 2, which reads: "Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration", will Your Honour tell us what specific item or clause is under consideration?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Excise.

An hon. Member: The Excise Tax Act.

The Deputy Chairman: When I say "item or clause" as referred to in the standing order, the hon. member will realize that what is meant by that is not necessarily a clause merely of two lines. As a matter of fact the item before the committee now is a resolution of eight paragraphs. That is what is before the committee.

Mr. Knowles: Isn't it absurd?

The Deputy Chairman: That is what is meant by the standing order.

Mr. Blackmore: May I draw Your Honour's attention to the fact once more that the item we are discussing is expediency?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That has been ruled on.

Mr. Blackmore: May I read what we are discussing?

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Blackmore: "That it is expedient"—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member has drawn this matter to my attention before. It is true that this resolution, and all resolutions, start with the wording "that it is expedient to introduce a measure", but what are before the committee are the subject matters of the whole resolution. These are that the rate of the general sales tax be increased, that the tax on candy and so on be reduced, and so on. These are the subject matters which are now before the committee.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry not to bow to your ruling but this is a rather important matter. May I read—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Blackmore: The steam roller, is it? Let me read what the dictionary says with regard to "expedient". The definition is "advantageous", "suitable", "as to do whatever is expedient", "is expedient", "it is expedient that he should go". Now, Mr. Chairman, when you come to discuss expediency with reference to all these items which are listed you have a field as wide as the whole economy of Canada. I just cannot see it in any other light. I have no desire to spread the whole discussion out too far, but certainly I do not see how in the world you can limit any reasonable discussion on this item of expediency.

The Deputy Chairman: I want to thank the hon. member for his kind remarks. I should like to point out to him, however, that the resolution starts with the word "resolved". If some hon. member should decide that what we are now discussing is the word "resolved", proceed to indicate what the word "resolved" means, go into all the details of resolving into something, then deal with the word "expedient", and then with what the word "measure" could mean, we would cover a great deal of territory, and would not have time to discuss the various details of the resolution. I want to study the remarks made by the hon. member for some other occasion, but at the moment I think that the hon. member will be satisfied with the ruling I have made, and which will apply from now on.

Mr. Graydon: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I should like to have a ruling on one matter. Does the chairman not make any distinction between a resolution and the clauses in that resolution? He has already ruled by the citation he has read that the discussion should be limited to the clause in question. I cannot see how he can make a valid ruling when he takes all the clauses, puts them in one resolution and says that is a clause.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member was not in the house this afternoon when the matter was discussed as to whether or not the paragraphs of the resolution were to be discussed separately or as a whole. The decision was made by the house that they were to be discussed as a whole. Therefore what is now before the committee is not eight items or eight clauses. It is one resolution with eight paragraphs. Therefore there is only one item so far as the committee is concerned, and that is the whole resolution.

Mr. Graydon: Mr. Chairman, the problem that has been raised was raised by yourself in the citation that you read. I was here and voted this afternoon, contrary to what the chairman said, but he has now said that the discussion must be confined to clauses which of course is entirely contrary to what the vote this afternoon decided.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member will understand it must be strictly confined to the clause or item.

Mr. Graydon: But you did not say "item" until now.

The Deputy Chairman: I said "item" and I read the rule. Some other hon. member has also read the rule. The rule says—and I am going to repeat it:

> Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the clause or item under consideration.

The item before the committee now is the excise tax resolution.

Mr. MacInnis: I accepted what happened here this afternoon—

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. MacInnis: I am raising a point of order. We have got into such a tangle over procedure that we really do not know where we are. I could take a group of unlearned and inexperienced people anywhere who could carry on a meeting in better form than this. I point out to you, sir, that we are not discussing one resolution. Read the resolution as it appears on page 5:

> Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Excise Tax Act and to provide—

Then it goes on to set out paragraphs 1, 2, 3, 4 and so on. Each of these is a separate resolution and should be dealt with as such. However, we have decided not to do that, so we had better go on and take them together.

Mr. Low: I think I heard you say a moment ago, Mr. Chairman, that you would like to study a little more carefully what was said by the hon. member for Lethbridge.

Mr. Rinfret: On another occasion.

Mr. Low: And perhaps on this occasion as well. I am sure the chairman of the committee is well qualified to look over everything that has been said this evening on this matter of procedure without any help from the Postmaster General. I would like to point out, however, that we are at the resolution stage of the bill. On any resolution preceding a bill or series of bills the thing discussed is the principle involved in the introduction of the bill or series of bills. What we are discussing, therefore, is the principle of the introduction of bills or measures to give effect to the budget proposals. Whether or not it is expedient to bring those in at this time is the principle we are discussing; and I contend that the hon. member for Lethbridge is interpreting the point correctly when he says that the whole principle turns on the word "expedient". That is why we are discussing it. If that were not the principle why have any discussion at all? The question is whether it is wise to introduce measures of this kind into the economy of this country. We are taking the position that it is not expedient; that is, it is not wise or necessary. I contend that if you look over the whole matter as it has been presented to you this evening you will be in a position to render a wise decision.

The Deputy Chairman: From some of the remarks made this evening a certain theory arises which I should like to look into more carefully before giving my own opinion. The hon. member for Vancouver East, however, suggested that we might make better progress if we were to reconsider our decision and study this resolution seriatim instead of as a whole. Of course the committee is the master of its own procedure. Though it came to a certain decision on this point at five o'clock this afternoon it is always open to this committee to reconsider its position and the manner in which it wishes to study a certain resolution, at a later time even the same day. I am in the hands of the committee, but if it should be considered in the light of the discussion we have had for the last two hours that it would be preferable to study this resolution paragraph by paragraph, I am quite willing to hear opinions on the subject.

Mr. Johnston: We are taking longer to discuss matters of procedure than to discuss the resolution itself. I could not hear clearly what you said at all times, Mr. Chairman, but I did notice you reading something out of the rule book. I thought in the vote we had a while ago we decided to throw out all the rules and be subject to the steam roller of the government.

It amazes me how this government gets around things. Whenever they get in a tight spot they always seem able to extricate themselves. I could not help noticing the satisfaction on the faces of both the Minister of Finance and the parliamentary assistant when, in discussing these taxes, they came to the reduction from 30 per cent to 15 per cent in the tax on candy. Of course they did not go on to show the house how this was going to reduce the price of candy, and actually it has not.

An hon. Member: It has.

Mr. Johnston: It certainly has not. Go up to the parliamentary restaurant and buy some candy; you will see whether prices have come down.

An hon. Member: Ten cents a pound.

Mr. Johnston: Why, the chocolate bars were so small already that you could hardly find them in the package. Then they went on to point out that they had taken the tax off cigarette papers, and wasn't that a concession. This thing would be laughable; it would be all right for those on the other side to laugh at the suggestions coming from this side, if it were not such a tragic affair for those who have to exist on meagre incomes. They will have to bear the brunt of the jesting in this house. It is all very well for the Liberal government to say that maybe next year they will be able to alleviate the situation; it is no laughing matter to those trying to eke out an existence on an old age pension of $40 a month, or those on fixed incomes. Or take those who have jobs and are getting perhaps $125, $135 or $150 a month. As the hon. member for Battle River says, a good many of them are getting less than $100 a month. This tax means a great deal to these people.

Mr. Blackmore: It is a weeping matter to them.

Mr. Johnston: I often think one of the best remedies would be to compel members of parliament to live on the incomes these people have to live on, if it were possible to do that. Then it would not require any argument in this house to convince the government that they should go easy on these taxes, particularly as they apply to those in the low and middle income brackets. I am not suggesting that those in the higher income brackets should not pay more in income tax. I think they should, and I would agree to an increase in the rate of income tax to take the burden off those who must buy the items listed under the Excise Tax Act. But the government has decided not to do that. The only thing I can hope is that when the opportunity presents itself the people will give their answer in the only way at their disposal.

Mr. Fraser: It does not matter how you take this resolution, whether you take it as one or whether you take it item by item; it is pretty hard to take, especially this two per cent increase in the sales tax. They sweeten it up a bit by a reduction in the tax on candy and chocolate bars, but I notice that according to the last item they have to give a little free medicine with it. By that paragraph the sales tax is removed from cortisone and ACTH. I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant whether combination coal and gas or combination coal and electric stoves are taxed. I have some other questions to ask, so he can make a note of them and answer them all at once. What was the total amount raised by the sales tax on cigarettes during 1950? What is the estimated revenue from the sales tax on cigarettes for 1951? What was the total excise tax, apart from sales tax, derived from cigarettes in 1950? What is the estimated revenue from the excise tax on cigarettes for 1951? What will the revenue be from the increased sales tax on cigarettes? What will the total tax be, including sales and excise, under the new rate on a package of twenty cigarettes and a package of twenty-five cigarettes?

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Chairman, I believe this is the time for me—

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Chairman, I should like to get the answers to those questions.

Mr. Cruickshank: While the parliamentary assistant is looking them up, I am going to talk.

Mr. Fraser: I think I should have the answers first.

Mr. Sinclair: I am in the chairman's hands, but it has not been the practice to answer everyone as soon as he asks a question. I would be on my feet half the time. I have taken a note of the things about which other members have asked, and I try to answer three or four at a time. So far as combination stoves are concerned, as I explained to the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet this afternoon, combinations will be taxed in the same way as they were during the war, on the combination content. If the stove is fifty per cent electrical and fifty per cent coal and wood, then the tax will be assessed on that fifty per cent, and that will be spelled out in the bill.

So far as the sales tax is concerned, as I explained a little earlier, the sales tax records are not kept separately by items. The sales tax is levied on all goods, except those mentioned in schedule III, and there is no sorting out. The excise taxes are separated into the different categories, and we do keep records. So far as cigars, cigarettes and tobacco are concerned, last year the excise tax on cigars was $2·7 million; on cigarettes, $69·4 million, on tobacco, $11·2 million; on raw leaf tobacco, $108,000.

Mr. Fraser: Now, that is the excise tax?

Mr. Sinclair: That is the excise.

Mr. Fraser: All right, what about the sales tax?

Mr. Sinclair: As I explained a little earlier, we do not keep separate categories for the sales tax.

Mr. Fraser: I know, but the minister's department would have a record of the sales tax from the different manufacturing companies.

Mr. Sinclair: The sales tax is reported by the tobacco companies, and is lumped together; the sales tax on cigarettes, cigars, cut plug and smoking tobacco is a single item. There is no division. We could ascertain from the national revenue records the amount of sales tax paid by each of the tobacco manufacturers. Actually, in the Excise Tax Act, there are these separate categories of taxation on cigars, cigarettes and tobacco.

So far as the last question is concerned, the excise tax and duties now imposed on a package of twenty cigarettes amount to 23 cents.

Mr. Fraser: That is at the present time?

Mr. Sinclair: Under the new rate.

Mr. Fraser: Then, on top of that there would be the sales tax?

Mr. Sinclair: The sales tax is on the manufacturers' cost and would not be on the retail selling price.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Chairman, I am glad I have not gone to the Queen city before, because I have learned how to carry on next Tuesday. Apparently, you can talk for forty minutes on expediency, and I shall remember that next Tuesday.

Mr. Blackmore: I am glad I taught it to you.

Mr. Cruickshank: I am glad that Alberta has at last come to the fore, and will help me.

Mr. Blackmore: I shall be glad to answer your insinuation if you will put it plainly.

Mr. Cruickshank: You help me on the pipe lines next Tuesday, and I will help you on expediency tonight. I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant what tax has been collected on margarine since it has been legalized, I shall not say purified, but legalized within Canada? What is the estimated total revenue from margarine during the current fiscal year? Will the parliamentary assistant look up for me—I do not expect him to have all the answers right before him even if he does come from British Columbia —what revenue is going to be gained in total from the increased taxation on cigarettes, including this twenty-five per cent increase in the sales tax? Will he also give me the estimate of the revenue lost if they had increased the liquor tax. I have heard—of course, I might be accused of being wrong and of making irresponsible statements—that we would lose revenue because we would lose our sales to the bootleggers. I have had no experience, Mr. Chairman, with bootleggers, but I should like to know what authority there is for the statement that we would lose. Certainly the experience of the western province in which we have fishermen, loggers and workmen does not bear that out. There, a tax on liquor which would equal the cigarette tax has never proven to diminish the sales. Wherever good money is made—and in the province of British Columbia we pay the highest wages—I defy the parliamentary assistant to substantiate his claim in that connection. I do not think it is correct. I am not going to enter this argument about the tax on refrigerators, stoves, and so on, but I do not believe I can justify to the people of my riding the increased tax on cigarettes without an increased tax on liquor.

Mr. Chairman, I am not a reformer. My province probably has the poorest liquor laws of any province in Canada. I believe it is a sad day, however, when we have to admit that the reason we are not going to tax liquor is because of the diminishing revenue. I was not in favour of another resolution before this house to have sweepstakes, but if we have to depend upon liquor for our revenue I see no reason why we should not have sweepstakes in Canada. I am delighted to see that attention is being paid to Premier Frost. I believe he is the premier of Ontario. If my memory serves me well, the same attention was not paid to previous premiers in that province. Apparently it is because Premier Frost does not agree with a tax on liquor that we must not tax liquor. Well, Premier Frost had better try to run his province as the province of British Columbia is run. As I understand it, there are two provinces that demand this. No, I am wrong about that. I must correct myself. That is a hidden tax that Ontario and Saskatchewan want, as I understand it. The one is a socialist province and the other is a capitalist province of Canada. I understand they want this hidden tax.

I shall have to watch myself or I shall be called to order. If I am called to order, it will be the first time. I do not want to be called to order. I am speaking to expediency now. I just want to go on record definitely as being opposed to the policy of no increased tax on liquor. I do not think the parliamentary assistant has as yet given any reasonable explanation as to why liquor should not be taxed to as great an extent as are cigarettes. Mr. Chairman, may I say that I heard the most charming member we have in this house defending cosmetics. Even if she comes from Hamilton, I think I know as much about cosmetics as she does. I have tasted all the different brands there are. I enjoy it, even in Winnipeg. But I am not going to speak any more with regard to this matter.

As I said, I am going away tonight. I am giving hon. members fair warning, and I hope they have good luck tomorrow night between eight o'clock and nine o'clock when I am not here. I may say that I attended to that matter before I left.

How the government can possibly expect the people of Canada to accept this policy, I do not know, when the only argument they can use is that Premier Frost favours it. Premier Frost must be extremely flattered. I hope he is waiting to meet me tomorrow morning. He must have been extremely flattered to know that just because he wants this liquor money, we are obliged to increase the sales tax by 25 per cent. If they would tax liquor as it should be taxed—and not this 300 per cent that the parliamentary assistant is talking about—and if they would regulate their liquor laws, I do not think he needs to worry for one minute about the people running to moonshine. I will admit that possibly the parliamentary assistant, not having had the experience of living in the province of British Columbia as long as I have, is not familiar with the situation. But the time when moonshine—

Mr. McIlraith: He will get old soon enough.

Mr. Sinclair: I am getting old.

Mr. McIlraith: The parliamentary assistant is just like the hon. member in that respect.

Mr. Cruickshank: If he has to live in Ottawa too long, or as long as some other parliamentary assistants, no doubt he will. The time when this moonshine liquor became such a great detriment to what you may call legitimate liquor, as even the boys over in the ivory tower will know if they know anything about it, was when rationing was in force—when people were allowed a 12-ounce bottle of liquor a month, and that is all. That is when moonshine was in its heyday. Any man who knows anything about loggers, and I want to apologize to the loggers for mentioning them, or anyone who knows anything about the purchase of liquor when high wages are available to all, knows that that is the time when bootlegging and moonshine came on, and that it was not on account of high taxes.

I have had the privilege of travelling in possibly as many countries of this world as any of these gentlemen who prepared this budget, but there was this difference between us. Most of the travelling I did was at my own expense and not at that of somebody else. I therefore know something about conditions. If a man wants a bottle of liquor, he is going to buy it, and he is going to pay the tax. When conditions are as favourable and people are as prosperous as they are now, it is all poppycock to tell me that they are going to cut down the consumption of liquor because we put on a reasonable tax. Mind you, there is no increase in the tax at all. I do not believe it would be practical, unless you want to prohibit the consumption of liquor, to put a tax of 300 per cent on it or to put such a tax on anything else. But as yet no justification or satisfactory explanation has been given for the failure to increase the tax on liquor. As I say, I am not going to go into the matter of frigidaires, but there are certain items, subject to this 25 per cent increase in tax, which nobody can say are not necessities of life in this day and age.

I do not have to stage any filibuster on expediency tonight, so I shall not take up any more time. But I want to state definitely, Mr. Chairman, why I voted for the budget as of course I did. It was a vote of confidence in this government; and I happen to be a supporter of this government. It is also a matter of expediency. When I look over at the opposite side, how could I possibly do anything else but vote confidence in this budget, as a matter of expediency? But I am not going to try to justify to my riding the fact that no increased tax was put on liquor, as a result of any of the arguments put forth so far in defence of that policy, when at the same time there is this terrific increase in the tax on cigarettes. Cigarettes are the only thing that might possibly be classed more or less as a luxury. Liquor definitely is a luxury.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member is going to miss his train if he does not watch out.

Mr. Cruickshank: The parliamentary assistant would be sorry if I did, would he not? May I say that there is a difference between being dumb and being stupid. There is a big difference.

An hon. Member: Which are you?

Mr. Sinclair: I am both.

Mr. Cruickshank: One of my parliamentary assistants says "are you an expert?" Another of my parliamentary assistants says, "both". In order that the matter may be clarified and may be clear to all, I will tell you the difference between being dumb and being stupid. It is a simple matter. If you are dumb and are highly educated, you are stupid. That is the difference.

I will not take up any more time. I know that I cannot change this policy at all. But I wanted my views to be definitely on record. I have not the time tonight, but if I had I would not have Webster, as hon. members opposite have. I would have had Oxford before me, because there is something so responsible and so typical of the definition that I have given that springs from Oxford, that I should like to have had my—what is the word I am trying to find? I have not my Oxford here so I cannot refer to the particular word I want.

In all seriousness, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I do not think it is anything for the people of Canada to be proud of to say that we, with all the resources we have, with the one and only tax that is fair to all, namely the income tax, cannot make the necessary provision for financing and that we have to do as is being done, for two reasons, namely, because we are afraid that the moonshiner and the bootlegger will flourish or that Premier Frost cannot finance the province that the people of the rest of Canada have carried on their backs ever since confederation.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I agree one hundred per cent with what has been said by the hon. member for Fraser Valley. I find it exceedingly hard to understand the explanation made by the parliamentary assistant for not imposing a tax on alcoholic spirits. It seems to be based on an idea that the tax on liquor has reached the point of diminishing return, and that idea seems to be based on a statement made by Premier Frost with regard to the situation in Ontario.

If that is the case, there must be in Ontario some indication that the consumption of liquor or the sale of liquor has been diminished by the latest tax that was applied to it, namely, the one imposed last September. I think that the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, on investigation, will find that not only did the sale of liquor in Ontario not decrease since the imposition of the last tax in September, 1950, but that it has actually gone up since that time. I can see no indication at all that the tax return from the sale of alcoholic spirits has reached the point of diminishing return. I can see no reason why that tax should not be applied. I would like to hear a fuller explanation from the parliamentary assistant as to how the Department of Finance has arrived at the conclusion that the tax that can be obtained from alcoholic spirits has reached the point of diminishing return.

Mr. Sinclair: I cannot do more than repeat what has been said by the Minister of Finance in this respect. Our tax on liquor is a tax which has never been cut back. During the war it was the first tax to be increased, and increased sharply. In the period since the war we have not cut back the tax on alcoholic liquor at all. The first tax we hit in the baby budget last fall was the tax on liquor, followed by that on corporations. The baby budget was the first of our defence budgets.

The breakdown I put on the record last week gives hon. members some idea of the rate of taxation on liquor. When a bottle of liquor which is sold by a distiller for $1.10—and that includes the profit, and the cost of operation of the plant, and the land tax, and all the ordinary local taxes faced by any manufacturer—retails for $4.25 across the country, bearing in mind the combination of the federal tax and the amount put on by the provincial liquor control board, you have some idea of the very heavy present taxation on liquor.

The fact that Premier Frost made that statement before the budget was brought down serves to confirm the fact that the Department of National Revenue had come to the conclusion that we were getting pretty close to the limit, in terms of taxation on liquor as related to other taxes. Of course that is always the relationship we must keep in mind. The question of the enforcement of the law was one brought up, not just by Premier Frost, but on other occasions by other provincial leaders.

I think some hon. members are confusing the situation as it applies to cigarettes and to liquor. The manufacture of liquor is a comparatively simple operation. When there is too great a disparity between the actual cost of manufacture and the sale price, there is a natural incentive for illegal manufacture. On the other hand there is not the same opportunity for the illegal manufacture of cigarettes. The problem we have to contend with in that instance is the one of smuggling from the United States.

In view of the fact that liquor taxes have never been cut back, were the first to be increased last fall, and the fact that it is the belief of the Department of National Revenue that we were reaching the limit of taxation, so far as revenue from liquor was concerned—even without confirmation from Premier Frost in the Ontario legislature—we decided not to raise the liquor tax at this session.

Then, the hon. member for Fraser Valley referred to margarine. I would say that margarine is one of the few food products we tax. There is a ten per cent sales tax on margarine. Then, the other questions I had anticipated he would ask, the duties on imported edible oils, I shall deal with when we come to the customs tariff item.

The hon. member asked for information showing the revenue produced by the increase in the taxation on cigarettes and tobacco. On cigarettes, in a full year, the increase will add $26 million of revenue, and in the fiscal year 1951-52, $21 million. As hon. members know, receipts lag behind the period on which the tax is imposed. Then, on tobacco in a full year it will be $17 million, and this year $14 million.

Mr. Cruickshank: I have another question.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar.

Mr. Coldwell: I have listened with a good deal of interest to the statement by the parliamentary assistant that liquor is now bearing a tax sufficiently high. I say to him and to the committee that, in my opinion, if the tax on liquor is high, then the sales tax on the necessities of life, so far as the great masses of the people are concerned, is more oppressive than any tax on liquor could possibly be.

I think the hon. member for Fraser Valley is quite right when he says that those who wish to drink liquor will buy it, no matter what the cost. I believe that was clearly demonstrated during the war, as to some extent he pointed out. I remember being in Edmonton and being told that those who came in on a Saturday night from the Alaska highway, and wanted to buy a bottle of liquor, were prepared to pay bellboys as high as $40 for a bottle of it.

Consequently I do not follow the argument made by the parliamentary assistant or the minister. Indeed, I would read a description of another budget, which I think would be of interest, and which objects to the increase in the high cost of living:

> Meanwhile, the profiteers escape, the excess profits tax is reduced. No attempt is made to tax the huge fortunes accumulated during the war, and every year it will become more difficult to make an inventory of such fortunes and compel them to contribute to the public revenue. By passing the conscription law parliament declared that every man's life was at the service of the state. Surely if that is right, it is even more certain that every man's fortune should be at the service of the state. Still more is it true that the state should have the right to take at least a share of fortunes accumulated by men out of the very necessities of war, by men who were safe and comfortable at home while young Canadians were suffering and dying in the trenches. The government lets these accumulators of fortunes go free, while it taxes the veteran on his clothing and his boots.

Who said that? Well, here it is—"The Liberal Point of View," June, 1920. And the budget? The Drayton budget of that year. These are current comments on the proceedings of the parliamentary session of 1920, put out by the national Liberal committee, 115 Sparks street, Ottawa; Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, M.P., Liberal leader.

Mr. Ferguson: Would you mind reading that over again?

Mr. Coldwell: No, I shall not read it over again.

Mr. Ferguson: I am afraid they did not hear it.

Mr. Coldwell: They can read it in Hansard tomorrow. It just serves to reinforce the point of view some of us on this side of the house have been expressing in regard to this matter. The budget we are now discussing is a negation of everything the Liberal party preached in the days before 1935. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that I think a short time ago you made a very useful suggestion, which the government did not accept, when you proposed that we should take up these budget resolutions clause by clause, instead of dealing with them as we have been doing tonight.

As the hon. member for Vancouver East has pointed out, the manner in which this has been discussed would discredit a meeting of people who had no idea whatsoever of parliamentary procedure. Here we are in the parliament of Canada, with the rules of debate set out in various volumes on the table and in our desks—and we get nowhere.

I think we should try to do, what it was decided this afternoon, in fact, that we would not do, and that is to discuss the proposals now before us, point by point, rather than run all over the lot. Let us decide each thing as we go along; otherwise I am sure we shall get no further tonight than we have gone at the present time.

Mr. Hatfield: I want to protest against the sales tax, and the tax on necessities such as stoves and refrigerators, and other appliances required in an apartment house. I would point out to the parliamentary assistant that last year New Brunswick imposed a provincial sales tax of four per cent and the increase in the dominion sales tax will bring that other tax up to about six per cent. With the wholesaler and retailer markups on the four per cent tax, the retail price of many necessities of life is up about 20 to 25 per cent, in some cases up to 50 per cent. There are tremendous markups, both wholesale and retail, on articles such as drugs.

The parliamentary assistant talked about a bottle of liquor costing the store about $1.10, whereas the consumer had to pay $4 for the same bottle. That is a tremendous profit. Let the provincial governments reduce their profits. A few years ago we thought it was an awful thing for a government to be selling liquor, and I do not think they should today. The four per cent provincial sales tax in New Brunswick brought in a revenue last year of $7,500,000. This increase in the federal sales tax will increase that tax on the people of New Brunswick and I want to protest against it.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Chairman, to increase the cost of refrigerators and articles of that kind to the purchaser by increasing the sales tax is in my opinion nothing less than scandalous. The extravagant spending by this government reminds me of a true story I heard some years ago. Two prospectors discovered one of the first producing mines in the Kirkland Lake district. They were brothers and I am sure that any mining men in the house will recognize these men when they hear the story. They sold out their interest to an English syndicate, each man receiving around $200,000. As these brothers admitted to me years later, they were not used to money and they squandered it quite quickly. Each of them bought a Cadillac car; one built a race track near Niagara Falls while the other tried to farm up in the frozen north.

One day the two brothers and another prospector, a co-discoverer of the mine, were proceeding down the main highway from Kirkland Lake in one of the Cadillacs.

The car was well oiled and, according to the brothers, all the men in the car were well oiled. They approached an old farmer carrying two buckets of water. As the Cadillac approached he stood dumbfounded at the side of the road and just as they passed him he threw up the buckets of water and said, "Go to it, you fools".

When I think of the extravagant spending of this government I am reminded of that story of the two prospectors who had so much money that they did not know what to do with it. Unfortunately in the last two elections the people of Canada have been something like this farmer. They have simply thrown up the buckets of water and said, "Go to it". But the day is coming when the farmers and all the voters of Canada will not just throw up buckets of water, they will mark their ballots as a token of the fact that they realize that this government is building houses that are costing hundreds of thousands of dollars too much and is squandering the people's money and actually depriving the public of refrigerators.

I think of the young married man who cannot afford to buy a house and who must move into an apartment. If this man had a home in the country he might have a hole in the ground where he could keep his food from decaying or rotting, but apartment dwellers must of necessity have refrigerators which must be supplied by themselves or by the owner. You cannot run out to the backyard of an apartment and pick up kindling and some firewood. It is not likely they are living over a coal mine like the people in Edmonton, and the result is they must buy electric stoves and electric refrigerators.

Undoubtedly the parliamentary assistant will take all the credit, if there is any credit due, for the raising of these large sums of money which will be necessary if we come to an all-out war. The former minister of finance certainly took all the credit for the financial brains he had behind him, for all the theatrical people and the moving picture celebrities who helped, for the greatest advertising agencies in the world which put on a campaign to raise money for the war. Yet one great almighty man, the minister of finance of that time, stuck out his chest and said, "Look, I did it all with my little hatchet".

The other night the parliamentary assistant made a speech and he waved a piece of paper around trying to explain why his department did this or did that. I believe he certainly would like to take all the credit in the world, if there is any credit due to the government. In my opinion there is not very much credit due.

The government says that they cannot tax liquor. A few moments ago an hon. member mentioned that people had paid bootleggers up to $40 per bottle, and during prohibition days in New York were willing to pay $25. In Toronto, in the King Edward hotel or the Royal York hotel, you find people paying $8, $10 and $15 a bottle. When the legal places of sale and the cocktail bars close, people who want liquor go out and buy it from bootleggers and are ready to absorb the increased price. I believe the man who wants liquor will be prepared to pay a higher price at the legal places of sale. I believe the people who want cigarettes are paying the increased taxation right here in Ottawa.

I think every effort should have been made to keep down the cost of essentials to the home owners and to the home seekers. A fraction of a cent or one or two cents on cigarettes is not a great deal to the individual, but when it is all lumped together a tremendous burden is placed on the people of Canada by this excessive sales tax. There are people who do not want to debauch themselves with liquor or who smoke with moderation, and yet they are having to pay much more for essentials. Liquor is not an essential, it is a luxury.

I cannot conceive how the parliamentary assistant can stand up in this House of Commons and say that they have fully considered the question of increasing the tax on liquor, and yet they placed increased taxes on refrigerators and other essentials. The two things just do not go together. The parliamentary assistant may flourish a piece of paper in the air, but no matter how much he may try to explain what the government has done, I do not think he can successfully explain it to the people of Canada. I am positive that at the next election the voters of Canada will assert themselves in no uncertain terms. They will show that their eyes have now been opened and they will no longer throw up two buckets of water. They will mark their ballots accordingly to express their disapproval of this government.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It has just been brought to my attention that this afternoon an amendment was moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre suggesting the imposition of an additional tax on liquor. That amendment has been disposed of. Therefore no similar amendment can be moved again, and I do not think it is in order to discuss the question of the imposition of a liquor tax again.

Mr. Thatcher: Mr. Chairman, I think I could make quite a case for the retailer tonight but I am afraid it might fall on deaf ears.

Mr. Sinclair: Oh no.

Mr. Thatcher: Therefore I will not make my plea in that direction. There is one thing about this debate that I have rather enjoyed today. Usually the parliamentary assistant has been able to rush his measures through with great rapidity. He has been very capable in doing that. I remember him giving me advice some years ago. He said: You know, if you want to play rough you will get played rough with. I think the parliamentary assistant has had that experience today. He started out to do a pretty fair job this afternoon, and then he tried to get a little rough with my friends to the right of me. I think they have reciprocated in kind this evening by holding up this resolution.

Be that as it may, everybody will agree that the excise taxes on refrigerators, washing machines and stoves are unfortunate. I suppose we need revenue for the war. Nevertheless it seems strange to me that taxes should be imposed on these items and not on oil burners, for instance. It would seem to me that oil burners and coal stokers can be classed as luxuries much more than stoves, refrigerators and washing machines. I do not know whether hon. members realize just what the effect of this tax is going to be. It means that today on these three items we have first of all an excise tax of 15 per cent, and then a sales tax of 10 per cent on top of the excise tax.

Mr. Sinclair: No, no, the same base.

Mr. Thatcher: Then in four provinces I believe we have a provincial tax of 3 or 4 per cent, and on top of that in some cities there is a city tax. That is going to mean that altogether there will be a tax of roughly 30 per cent. I want to tell the house that these taxes are coming at a particularly inopportune time because in the past year the prices of these items have gone up anywhere from 15 to 20 per cent.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Thatcher: The hon. member should have a pretty good idea. To give the house an idea of how the prices of some of these appliances have been affected, nine months ago the price of a 6 cubic foot frigidaire, which is one of the most standard lines in Canada, was $269. Today after the tax it is going to be $345.75. Part of that increase is due to tax and part of it is due to price increase in the commodity since Korea. Another refrigerator, the 7 cubic foot McClary, was $319 at the time of Korea, $349 before the budget, and now it will be $399. A Beatty gas engine washing machine was $179.50 at the time of Korea, $219.50 before the budget, and $235.85 after the budget Therefore I say that the point of consumer resistance has almost been reached. I think the minister is going to find that he will not get $16 million because the prices are so high today that consumers simply will not be able to buy.

Maybe that is what the minister wanted, but I think there are going to be difficulties. Of course the retailer is going to be hurt. Of course the consumer is going to be hurt, and I say that the manufacturer is going to be hurt. Some hon. members may have heard the radio announcement the day after these taxes were made known indicating that the Connor Washing Machine Company in Hull had laid off several hundred men. I took the trouble to write to some of the manufacturers to find out what they thought of these taxes. Of course they are concerned. If the government intends to give them defence work to replace their sales of these appliances then they may be all right, but if the government does not give them defence contracts I think there will be serious unemployment in all these industries.

For the last year I have sat in this house and heard the Minister of Trade and Commerce get up time and again and tell us that there was a terrific shortage of steel, that pretty soon we were not going to be able to get this item or that item. I can tell the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the house that from my experience in the hardware and appliance business nothing is short that I know of. There are lots of these items, and the prices are getting so high that consumers simply cannot buy them.

There is one other matter I should like to draw to the attention of the house so far as these appliances are concerned. As I said a moment ago, the domestic market is being drastically curtailed by rising prices and these taxes. There are going to be many less appliances sold in the coming year. At this very time when the market is being curtailed, United States imports are coming in at a much greater rate than in the past. To illustrate, let me take refrigerators. In the whole of last year $1,500,000 worth of refrigerators came in from the United States, $1,500,000 in twelve months. In January of this year $1,200,000 came in in one month. That means that because the United States manufacturers are more fortunate in getting steel than our own people they are able to enter the domestic market which is already curtailed. Therefore I say to the minister respectfully that if these taxes are necessary he should at least make sure that the manufacturing companies are given defence contracts or they are going to be in difficulties. The only reason I can think of why the government thinks it is necessary to impose these taxes is that perhaps in the year before the next election we will have another sunshine budget with the government reducing taxes, giving the money back to the people, and then calling another election.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, you are an optimist. I should like to say a word about a point which the hon. member for Lake Centre put to the parliamentary assistant in the form of a set of questions. My hope is that the parliamentary assistant will look into that phase of the matter and give us a little more explicit answer on a later occasion. The hon. member for Lake Centre raised the question as to how much the cost of living of an average family—he defined an average family as a family having an income of less than $3,000 a year—would be affected by the increased taxes set out in the Excise Tax Act resolution now before us. I think the parliamentary assistant had difficulty understanding the question at first. When he did get it he was not sure that his department would be able to provide the information.

May I point out, as has been indicated previously in this debate, that before we had the budget debate the house was engaged in a debate on the cost of living. It was suggested to us by the government that debate was inopportune at that time, that we should wait for the budget, that the budget would deal with the problem. That seems to me to suggest that before taxes of this kind were imposed the government should have considered their effect on the cost of living. Maybe the government is prepared to defend that effect, but at least they should have been prepared to tell us what the effect is. The hon. member for Lake Centre referred to the average family as being a family with something less than $3,000 a year. I am afraid the average family in my constituency has considerably less than that to live on during a year.

I do know that the cost of living index is worked out on the basis of what has happened to the cost of a basket of goods and services which in the base period of 1935-39 cost $1,453 a year. As the parliamentary assistant knows, at that time the bureau of statistics took a certain basket of goods and services which added up to that figure. Now they ascertain what those same goods and services cost at today's prices.

This means that each increase of $14.53 per year in the cost of living of an average family means an increase of one point in the cost of living index. The hon. member for Lake Centre did some rough figuring of his own before he spoke tonight, and said he thought the taxes set out in this act would cost the average family around $39 a year. That is the sort of figure I think the Department of Finance should have obtained before it imposed these taxes. If it did not, then it should now obtain it and tell us what the figure is before we vote on this resolution. If the hon. member for Lake Centre is correct and that figure is around $39 a year, or we will say $40 or $45 a year, right there you have the basis for an increase of three points in the cost of living index. It may take a little time for that increase to be reflected in the index issued by the bureau of statistics, but it will be felt by our people right away. If the parliamentary assistant is not able to deal with that phase of the matter tonight I hope he will go into it very fully before we get back to this resolution on another occasion. I have not had a chance to look at the table he said he put on Hansard today. Certainly I will look at it when we get Hansard tomorrow, but I doubt if that table answers the kind of question put by the hon. member for Lake Centre, and which I am putting in a slightly different form now.

Another comment I wanted to make about the sales tax, which is covered in one paragraph of this resolution, is that it seems to me the parliamentary assistant let the cat out of the bag this afternoon. When complaints about this tax were being made from this side of the house the parliamentary assistant pointed out, as I remember his figures, that there were in Canada some 5,200,000 wage earners, of whom only 2,200,000 pay income tax. His point, and in fact I think he said it quite clearly, was that we need a tax of this kind so that other group of 3,000,000 wage earners would be taxed to help pay the cost of such social services as family allowances and old age pensions.

I wish to draw to the attention of the government two points which respect to that admission by the parliamentary assistant this afternoon. On the one hand it is an admission that these taxes will be borne heavily by people in the lower brackets. The Minister of Finance tried to make a great deal, during the course of his budget speech, out of the argument that because so many things did not bear the sales tax the people in the lower brackets pay that tax on only a limited percentage of the goods they buy. Well, the parliamentary assistant cannot have it both ways. He cannot say on the one hand that the poor people do not have to pay this tax, and on the other hand that they are applying the tax so the people who do not pay income tax will pay their share of the cost of social services such as old age pensions and family allowances. The fact is that they do have to pay it.

The other point I wish to make is that it seems to me this is practising deception. The government makes a great deal out of the fact that it has certain exemptions with regard to the income tax below which people do not have to pay that tax. I say they would be far better off if there were no sales tax whatsoever, even if the exemptions were lowered, so people would be taxed according to their ability to pay instead of being taxed at these high levels on the necessities of life without regard to their ability to pay. I submit that it is practising deception to say these people are exempt from the payment of income tax and then turn around and impose taxes upon them in this way, which the parliamentary assistant said today was the purpose of this sales tax.

I do not like jumping around in this resolution from paragraph 1 to paragraph 4 to paragraph 7, and so on.

Mr. Abbott: Why not jump around You are easy to follow.

Mr. Knowles: I do not like it because, as was said here earlier this evening, I cannot imagine any group of people in the back woods, getting together for the first time to hold a little meeting, who would discuss their affairs with less attention to parliamentary procedure than this house is showing tonight. Any group of people who got together to discuss a proposition which had eight major sections, three of which were divided into subsections, even if they had never heard of May, or Beauchesne, or Bourinot, or any of the rest of them, would have decided on the basis of common sense to discuss that proposition paragraph by paragraph.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): But they would not be afraid of a vote on the sales tax.

Mr. Knowles: I think the hon. member for Greenwood is right on the beam there.

Mr. Abbott: My friend can vote against it when the bill is brought in.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Knowles: The whole point is that the government does not like to have votes on these individual clauses even when, as was the case this afternoon, they can win those votes. Of course this whole absurd practice began back in 1948, when on one occasion they were caught short in the house and lost a vote. However, since this committee has decided by a majority vote to do things in the most absurd way possible I have no option but to obey the will of the committee and jump all over the place.

Now I am going to jump down to resolution No. 4. I want to register my protest, along with others who have spoken today, against this tax being imposed on such basic necessities as electric stoves, electric washing machines, and electric refrigerators. I hope the parliamentary assistant enjoyed reading the editorial in this evening's Ottawa Journal, in which he is referred to as Grandfather Sinclair. If he has read the editorial I am sure he blushed at the picture it painted of him when it said that while he is still a young man he would like to suggest to the young people of today that they start life not with the things regarded today as necessities but with the limited conveniences our grandparents had a generation or two ago. Surely if it is the aim of the government to cut down the purchase of things that have a steel content it would have been far better to do it on a rationing basis rather than on the basis of imposing these increased taxes, which have the effect of increasing prices as the hon. member for Moose Jaw has just indicated. On another occasion, as a matter of fact, I will introduce another amendment to this omnibus eight point resolution. My amendment will deal with this paragraph 4. It seems to me that an alternative might be suggested which would be much better than trying to raise $16 million in this way.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I shall just take a moment longer. In keeping with the absurd procedure we are following today, let me jump down to No. 7. This is one that we all welcome. As a matter of fact, one of the reasons that we wanted to follow the sensible practice of taking this resolution up one item at a time is so that we could vote unanimously for some of the ones of which we approve, and at the same time register our opposition to the ones to which we object. With respect to No. 7, I am sure we all welcome the repeal of the sales tax on cortisone and ACTH.

Mr. Wylie: What is the other word?

Mr. Knowles: You will find it spelled out in full in the resolution. Can the parliamentary assistant tell us what the situation is with respect to drugs generally? What drugs are free from the sales tax, and what drugs or medicines are still subject to the sales tax? A reference was made earlier this evening to the effect of the sales tax on municipalities, and one member who was discussing that matter referred to the fact that hospitals should get some relief from this tax. I was under the impression there was some relief for hospitals, but would the parliamentary assistant spell it out, particularly with respect to drugs and medicines, and also the situation with respect to hospitals?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Before the parliamentary assistant answers that, could I ask him to deal with one other thing in connection with item No. 7? It is represented to me that there is another drug called prostigmine, which is a specific remedy for myasthenia gravis. I am informed by competent medical opinion that this drug is somewhat of the same character as these others and is a remedy for a terrible, obscure and otherwise incurable disease. It is very expensive and I am hoping possibly it may be entitled to consideration the same as these other two.

Mr. Sinclair: I can assure the hon. member that it will certainly be given consideration. In matters like this, of course, the department must be largely guided by the advice of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

So far as the question asked by the member for Winnipeg North Centre is concerned, I would point out that schedule III of the Excise Tax Act shows the exemptions from sales tax, and the various drugs and hospital equipment, artificial eyes, limbs and parts thereof are listed. I will put it on Hansard if that is desired, but is it the practice to repeat in Hansard the things that are in statutes?

Mr. Knowles: What I would like to know is, does the word "drugs" in the way the parliamentary assistant has used it include all drugs and medicines or even a substantial group of medicines?

Mr. Sinclair: It mentions specific medicines and drugs—insulin, radium, which is not a drug, liver extract used exclusively in the treatment of anaemia; articles and materials for the sole use of any bona fide hospital certified to be such by the Department of National Health and Welfare, when purchased in good faith for the use of the said hospital and not for resale.

Mr. Bryce: Is penicillin still taxed?

Mr. Sinclair: Penicillin has the sales tax on it.

Mr. Thatcher: Can the parliamentary assistant state whether a capital gains tax has been considered in lieu of this particular one we are discussing? It seems to me that might bear on the people who could afford it in a little easier manner. If a capital gains tax has been considered, what are the reasons which made the government decide it would not be advisable at this time?

Mr. Sinclair: Naturally, in raising this extra money, every possible avenue of taxation was carefully explored by the budget committee. The United States has a capital gains tax, in the administration of which they have encountered certain problems. In view of their experience and our own system of taxation, it was not thought practical to introduce such a system. We have always regarded the best tax as being a tax on income rather than a tax on capital.

As I pointed out earlier, our whole tax policy is along the lines of the British system rather than the United States system. The British have not got a capital gains tax, although one year they had the income tax rate so high in the upper brackets that in some instances they actually took more in taxes than the person had in income. That was done only once, so far as I know.

Mr. Thatcher: The main reason being cited against it is the fact that it did not work in the United States?

Mr. Sinclair: No, that was one of the reasons. The tax was very carefully considered. It seems to be a popular form of tax to advocate, especially with people who have no capital themselves. Actually, the effect on expansion and improvement of industry in a young and growing country is a matter, considering not only that we are taking 50·6 per cent of the profits and taking them as was pointed out in cash payable immediately, that had to be carefully considered. It did not seem to fit in with our tax program.

While I am on my feet may I express my own regret that when the hon. member was speaking he did not state his views on the charges that have been made by the leader of the C.C.F. that the sales tax is pyramided by people who are retailers. In view of his experience, I am sure he could have been very helpful to us in that respect.

Mr. Coldwell: Does the hon. gentleman deny that sales tax is pyramided?

Mr. Sinclair: We had a very long discussion—

Mr. Coldwell: I was very moderate in my estimate.

Mr. Sinclair: We had a very long discussion on this point in the budget debate last year.

I put the position which I believe is taken by most businessmen in this country, that the markup put on by a wholesaler for his cost of doing business or a retailer for his cost of doing business is not a rule of thumb percentage just slapped on. I suggest that neither the leader of the C.C.F. nor I have had any experience whatever in the actual technique of applying that. It was for that reason I was anxious to hear from the hon. member for Moose Jaw what the actual practice is, whether it is as I think it is that the retailer's markup has a relation to his cost of doing business and is not a rule of thumb thing which he puts on the price to him of the goods, which price includes sales tax. I think we would be very happy, since our knowledge is academic, to have heard from someone with practical experience.

Mr. Coldwell: It is rather unusual to ask individual members of the house to give information which should be forthcoming from the officials of the house.

Mr. Abbott: On business practice.

Mr. Coldwell: I think the minister and his assistant should be able to answer questions of that description as well as any other. Mr. Chairman, it is eleven o'clock.

Resolution stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): In preparing the outline for tomorrow I had to proceed by a process of elimination. I had in mind that we should take up the estimates of agriculture, but that was not acceptable. I wanted to proceed with the gold bill, but that did not meet with the general wish; neither did the consumers' credit bill. I had to drop the resolution concerning the Judges Act, and the Aeronautics Act. I now have a very limited field. I hope that what I announce will have unanimous approval. Tomorrow we will try to complete the study of the estimates of the Department of Transport. Then there is on the order paper Bill No. 196, respecting the Hamilton harbour commissioners. I know that the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) is anxious to have this bill amended. Then we have the resolution in the name of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) concerning the Veterans Business and Professional Loans Act. I understand that is to include in the benefits of that act more veterans than those that now have them. Then there is Bill No. 198, to amend the Customs Act.

Mr. Casselman: Is there not anything else on the order paper?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Oh, yes; but I could not ask hon. members to agree that we should bring those things up tomorrow.

Mr. Coldwell: I was just going to say this, Mr. Speaker. I do not usually make a suggestion of this sort, but we are faced with this situation.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Suggestions are always welcome.

Mr. Coldwell: There are some 150 members who are going to Toronto tomorrow. A small number of us will be left here. It seems to me that some consideration might be given to closing at six o'clock tomorrow instead of going on until eleven.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Coldwell: What I am thinking of is the fact that there will be so few of us here, inasmuch as there are others who will be going home for the week end. Only a few of us will be left here. I do not think it is fair to those who are left that we should have the responsibility of dealing with these matters; and I do not think it is fair to those who are going away tomorrow to do something which may be of interest not only to them but to the country, that they should be deprived of the opportunity of dealing with these matters. I am just making that suggestion.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I will make no promise or threat. I shall be guided by the progress we make tomorrow.

Mr. Casselman: Is that not a threat?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): To myself. If we make progress, and by progress I mean if we complete the transport estimates—and we have had four sittings on them now—

Mr. Casselman: Two long and two short.

Mr. Knowles: That sounds like a rural telephone number.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): And if we complete this small bill and the resolution, so that we can bring in this help to veterans, at six o'clock I certainly would consider that suggestion made by the leader of the C.C.F.

Mr. Coldwell: That is quite a large task.

It being five minutes after eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, April 27, 1951

The house met at three o'clock.

IMMIGRATION

REPORT AS TO TREATMENT OF PERSONS COMING TO CANADA FROM EUROPE

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I promised the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) to make a statement concerning comments reported in the Toronto Telegram, and supposed to have been made by Mr. John Fisher. Those comments were contained in articles on April 18, 19 and 24.

We have made investigations, and Mr. Fisher has furnished us with a statement which it is understood summarizes his remarks. It indicates that the immigration set-up as he observed it, first at Moncton and later at Montreal, is not geared to consider the tremendous human factor involved. He intimated that there was some delay at Moncton while the medical officer was located; that physical conditions at Moncton were, to use his word, deplorable; that there was a further delay at Montreal, where they arrived after midnight, and that there was lack of personnel familiar with foreign languages to meet incoming immigrants. He ended up his statement with this remark:

> May I report again that no immigrant was beaten, pushed or cowed, but that they were not given that extra welcome which should go to any citizen coming to this land. The very human factors of excitement or emotion were apparently not considered.

The T.C.A. aircraft carrying Mr. Fisher, along with sixteen other returning residents, ten non-immigrants and fourteen immigrants, arrived at Moncton airfield at 8.40 p.m. on April 15. The fourteen immigrants consisted of nine British, three Germans, one Ukrainian, and one Lithuanian. Moncton is an emergency airfield that is used infrequently. There is only one immigration officer on duty, and he completed his immigration examination of the passengers in one hour and twenty-five minutes. This included the medical examination and the time taken to locate the doctor, who of course is not employed on a full-time basis. Hon. members will understand that this was a landing made at Moncton by an aircraft which was ordinarily intended to land in Newfoundland, but could not do so because of weather conditions.

As Mr. Fisher remarked, the building conditions at Moncton for the reception and examination of immigrants are not satisfactory. In this connection I should like to read from a letter which has come to us since from the resident manager of Allied Aviation Service Company at Moncton, in which he says:

> I would like to say here that the immigration officer in charge at Moncton has done all possible in his power to assist in every way the immigrants aboard these international aircraft, and all examinations are carried out in quick but quite efficient manner. It is true that the facilities here are not the best, but a new waiting room is at present being constructed, and when completed should be an asset to this station.

As a result of the report that the complaint was made with respect to the immigration officer at Moncton, Mr. Fisher wired the immigration inspector at the point in the following words:

> Newspaper made bad mistake, because my blast at immigration red tape for immigrants concerned Montreal and not Moncton. Sorry your name erroneously involved. Your statement to paper perfectly correct. Regards.
> John Fisher

There was no further examination of passengers on this plane by the immigration service at Dorval, because it had already taken place at Moncton.

With respect to the linguistic qualifications of immigration personnel at Montreal, in addition to English and French they are able to converse in Italian, Swedish, Danish, Norwegian, Estonian, German, Polish, Greek, Arabic, Chinese, Yiddish, Ukrainian, Spanish, and have a working knowledge of Russian and Dutch.

Concerning Mr. Fisher's complaint that the reception of these immigrants lacked warmth, there is no question about the desirability of extending a welcoming hand to new Canadians, and this is being done as far as possible by departmental personnel and voluntary agencies; the Department of Citizenship and Immigration is operating a very useful settlement service for immigrants —not available to immigrants in years gone by. There is, however, a limit to the extent to which provision can be made for services of this kind. This service is available at seaports where time between arrival of vessel and departure of train permits such reception. Hon. members will appreciate why similar arrangements are not feasible at airports, such as Dorval, or at border ports. The distance between Montreal and Dorval increases the difficulty to voluntary agencies in providing services at Dorval. Furthermore, air passengers are usually anxious to have their immigration and customs examinations completed rapidly so that they may proceed to their destination with as little delay as possible.

Respecting the handling of the particular flight on which Mr. Fisher was a passenger, in accordance with the policy of the department each immigrant was interviewed by an immigration officer to find out if he needed help, assistance or information. This took place while the baggage was being unloaded from the aircraft, and the acting district superintendent of immigration at Montreal reports that the interviews were completed within five minutes.

Examination of prospective immigrants overseas and at Canadian ports of entry is necessary. The first is conducted to reduce the possibility of hardship on the immigrants themselves, which would result from rejection on arrival in Canada. The second is necessary because it is in Canada that landing or entry is granted.

Summed up: Mr. Fisher absolves the immigration officer in charge at Moncton, but says that facilities there are unsatisfactory. As I have said, better facilities are being constructed. Moncton is the point in Canada at which the only immigration examination of the passengers took place. At Dorval the examination of passengers related solely to customs—immigration officers participating only to the extent of offering advice and assistance. None of the customs or immigration officers at Dorval recalls any difficulty during the customs examinations and immigration interviews.

Like Mr. Fisher, I believe that we need more people in this country, and not only are we encouraging immigration but we are also helping and assisting the immigrants in becoming established.

We appreciate any criticism of this kind so that we may make our facilities better and larger.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I thank the minister for the very full report he has given. I join with him in expressing the hope that these officials will always be courteous and considerate, and will receive immigrants with that welcome which after all is of great importance to those coming to Canada for the first time.

Mr. Coldwell: May I ask the minister a supplementary question? Has he at any time received complaints about Gander in this connection? About three months ago a gentleman who was coming to Canada from London told me of the difficulty experienced by a lady entering the country in making herself understood because the immigration official had an inadequate knowledge of French. This gentleman, whom I know very well, said that he did the translating in order to help out the lady. Has the minister had any complaints of that description?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): We have had some complaints with respect to the facilities at Gander, and there have been discussions with the Minister of Transport with respect to that. I am quite sure that improvements are being made. I have not had any complaint with respect to language difficulties, because we do our best to provide personnel that is trained as far as possible in the important languages with which we would ordinarily have to deal.

BUTTER AND CHEESE

STATEMENT AS TO POLICY FOR THE COMING YEAR

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, on previous occasions I have indicated that I would make a statement today with regard to policy respecting cheese and butter for the coming year, and I wish to make that statement now.

With respect to cheese, the Ontario Cheese Producers Association has organized the Ontario cheese producers marketing board, under provincial legislation, which is prepared to undertake the marketing of the production of Ontario. The cheese producers have represented that they should receive at least 30 cents a pound for cheese.

It has been decided that it would be advisable that the producers and the trade be encouraged to market their own cheese. The government has agreed to cover the risk of carrying and marketing cheese up to twenty-eight cents a pound by agreeing to have the agricultural prices support board arrange for the taking over of all first grade Canadian cheddar cheese at a price of twenty-eight cents per pound f.o.b. Montreal, plus storage charges from the date of storage to the date of delivery to the board. The board reserves the right to specify the time of delivery, which will be not later than January 1, 1952.

Then with regard to butter, the government has been asked to establish an incentive price under butter for the dairy year 1951-52, beginning May 1, 1951.

The experience of the past two years has convinced us that it is better to maintain a floor price rather than an incentive price. It would appear that the floor maintained through the year 1949-50 of 58 cents a pound basis No. 1 creamery solids, Montreal, would have proven a reasonable floor to have maintained over a period of years and that incentive to produce would be effective if the time were extended to two years.

It has, therefore, been decided to ask the agricultural prices support board to arrange that the dairy products board of the Department of Agriculture will be prepared throughout the dairy years 1951-52 and 1952-53 to purchase butter at 58 cents a pound basis No. 1 creamery solids Montreal.

The dairy products board will continue the policy throughout that period of distributing butter obtained during the high production summer months through the trade during the low production winter months at prices which are considered fair to the consumer.

The creamery butter carried in storage on April 1, 1946, was 5,400,000 pounds; April 1, 1947, it was 15,400,000 pounds; April 1, 1948, it was 8,400,000 pounds; April 1, 1949, it was 12,700,000 pounds; on April 1, 1950, it was 27,900,000 pounds; and on April 1, 1951, it was 9,900,000 pounds. The increases and decreases during this period were influenced by importation of butter and the manufacture and sale of margarine.

The government has asked the dairy products board to make a survey of the carry-over as of December 1 in each year, and, if it is found that there is not sufficient butter to carry the consumers through to April 1 with a normal carry-over, that the board negotiate with those countries whose butter is admitted to Canada on arrangement at a preferred duty for any amount required to be distributed through the trade on the same price arrangement as Canadian butter.

It is expected that this policy will result in the farmer receiving a fair return throughout his high production summer season and that the consumer will be assured a fair price during the high cost winter season.

Mr. Charlton: Does the minister mean that in case of shortage the dairy products board will purchase butter from the countries in which it is available?

Mr. Gardiner: That is the intention, yes.

OLEOMARGARINE

QUESTION AS TO CUSTOMS DUTIES ON IMPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I wonder if I might ask the Minister of Agriculture a question related to the announcement of the floor price for butter—which, I might say, I am sure will not meet with the approval of the dairy industry.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member may ask a question.

Mr. Argue: Can the Minister of Agriculture assure the dairy industry at this time that recent reports in the press to the effect that the tariff on margarine coming into Canada will be removed are incorrect?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): That is not a matter which comes directly under my department. The matter of granting permission for margarine to come into Canada under any duty rate, or in any manner whatsoever, really comes under customs, and I do not know what the intentions are with respect to amendments there. Amendments of the act that come under the Department of Agriculture have certain provisions which will affect the matter, but the real question is dealt with under customs.

Mr. Argue: Then may I direct my question to the Minister of National Revenue, Mr. Speaker?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): There is nothing in my tariff proposals relating to margarine. If my hon. friend had taken the trouble to read them he would have seen that there is nothing there.

Mr. Knowles: We have to take them all at once, after yesterday.

An hon. Member: Read them separately.

IRRIGATION

INQUIRY AS TO COMMENCEMENT OF SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER PROJECT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture, arising out of a report in the last issue of the Financial Post to the effect that the South Saskatchewan irrigation project will be commenced this summer. Can the minister state whether that report is correct, and if so, whether construction work will commence this year?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think the question can be best discussed when my estimate on that item is before the house.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION—CORRESPONDENCE WITH PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Prime Minister whether he will at the earliest possible day, and if possible Monday, table the correspondence between the government of Canada and the governments of the various provinces respecting the matter of the old age pension amendment, and also the question of the indirect tax. According to the press there has been some recent correspondence.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): There has been some correspondence. I discussed with the Minister of Justice a couple of days ago the question of tabling what we had. I understood from him that he was in telegraphic or telephonic communication with some of the premiers, and that he preferred to have answers from them rather than table only a part. I can assure the hon. member that we are anxious to place that correspondence before the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Because it has been referred to in the press.

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes, but the press frequently scoops the government, you know.

HAMILTON HARBOUR COMMISSION

AMENDMENT AUTHORIZING PURCHASE AND OPERATION OF AN AMUSEMENT PARK

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 196, respecting the Hamilton harbour commissioners.

Mr. Green: Will the minister explain the bill?

Mr. Chevrier: I wonder if I could make the explanation in committee? If there is any objection I will do it now, but I would rather do it in committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1— Short title.

Mr. Chevrier: Early in 1950 the Hamilton harbour commissioners requested the government to amend their present act so that they could conduct amusement, recreational and other facilities on their lands in the city of Hamilton. At that time they forwarded to the Department of Transport a resolution passed by the city of Hamilton asking that the commission's act be amended so that they could take over and administer the filtering basins bathing beach lands, subject to easements for municipal services, and the land to be used as a public bathing beach.

The Hamilton Harbour Commissioners Act was passed in 1912. Under that act they were given the powers that are usually given to similar bodies authorized to operate harbours. I do not think there has been an amendment to the act since, but in view of the fact that there was no authority in the act of 1912 to provide for this particular operation it is necessary to amend the act in order to give the commissioners the required authority. That is what the bill seeks to do.

Bill No. 196 seeks first of all to give to the commissioners powers to conduct amusements, recreation grounds, playgrounds and bathing beaches on certain lands therein set out, and also to borrow money for that purpose. Of course the other provisions of the act will remain in effect. There is also a clause in the bill which extends the provisions of the 1912 act relating to jurisdiction to the present bill. It is a very simple amendment. Similar authority was requested on one other occasion by the Toronto harbour commissioners who some time ago decided they would like to operate certain facilities for recreational purposes. They have done so, and I am told quite profitably. The city of Hamilton seeks the same advantage and facilities. I would think this is a very simple measure which would obtain the consent of the house.

Mr. Green: I understand from the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) that the authorities of the city of Hamilton are very anxious to have an amendment of this type put through. I also understand she has been discussing the bill with the minister, and apparently approves the terms. Therefore the official opposition has no objection to the bill.

Mr. Chevrier: It is true that the city council has requested this amendment. I have a letter to that effect. I also know that both members for Hamilton have evinced a great deal of interest in the bill.

Mr. Coldwell: I presume that the land is now used as a sort of public recreation ground, and possibly there are some bathing beaches open to the public. I notice that the bill authorizes charges to be made by the commissioners for the facilities. Has any opposition to this proposal been brought to the minister's attention, particularly with respect to the charges being made for the facilities? I am not opposing the bill. I ask the question only because I think we should know whether there is any opposition, particularly whether the ground of the opposition is that the charges would deprive persons of the opportunity to use the beaches who are now able to use them free.

Mr. Chevrier: With respect to that, I have no evidence of any opposition. On the contrary I would think this would be a very excellent thing. So far as the powers are concerned the commissioners have the right to make a charge, but I should think they would use their discretion. If they follow the practice that is followed in Toronto, as I understand they intend to do, then I think it will be operated in the interests of the public with no charge, or only a very nominal charge.

Mr. Coldwell: That is a very satisfactory explanation. I am glad the minister has heard of no opposition to this step. It seems to be acceptable to the citizens of Hamilton, and that was the only interest I had in asking the question.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 and 3 agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Knowles: By leave.

Mr. Chevrier moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals—

493. To provide for the payment during the fiscal year 1951-52 to the Canadian National Railway company (hereinafter called the national company) upon applications approved by the Minister of Transport made from time to time by the national company to the Minister of Finance and to be applied by the national company in payment of the deficit (certified by the auditors of the national company) in the operation of the Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals arising in the calendar year 1951, $1,280,000.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I think I should explain that some time ago a motion was made to refer three of the votes, 493, 501 and 495, to the committee on railways and shipping. They have been dealt with there and are now returned to the house. I wonder if we could not dispose of them now. Item 493 is the Prince Edward Island car ferry deficit vote; item 495 is the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships deficit vote, and 501 is the maritime freight rates vote, all of which have been considered by the committee on railways and shipping.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it the pleasure of the committee to carry these three items now—493, 501 and 495?

Items agreed to.

Pensions and other benefits—

503. Railway employees' provident fund—to supplement pension allowances under the provisions of the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railway Employees' Provident Fund Act so as to make the minimum payment during the period January 1, 1951, to March 31, 1952, the sum of $30 per month instead of $20 as fixed by the said act, $14,250.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When discussion on this subject was adjourned on April 13 I had brought to the attention of the minister the whole question of Canadian National Railways pensions. In answering me on that occasion, and following certain questions asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the minister said the matter was receiving the careful consideration of the government. Then he went on to use these words, as reported at page 2036 of Hansard:

> I have to say that the government thus far has not been able to recommend or direct the Canadian National Railways to increase the basic pension upwards until such time as the matter of its own civil servants receives similar or adequate consideration. Then there is also the question of other groups that are in the same position as that of the Canadian National pensioners.
> Mr. Diefenbaker: Which are they?
> Mr. Chevrier: There are other groups affected by inflation. There are a number of them. There are the pilots, other pension groups, the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railway employees, the provident fund group and, as the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs says, the old age pensioners themselves. It appears to me that this question cannot be disposed of piecemeal, and that until such time as it is possible to find a solution for the whole problem the government does not feel disposed thus far to direct the Canadian National Railways to deal with a portion only of the problem.

I rise again at this time to bring to the attention of the minister the need of doing something on behalf of the retired employees of the Canadian National Railways, and also on behalf of those who are at present employed and who come within the ambit of the pension system. At the risk of repetition I say the basic rate is $25 per month, which is being received by hundreds of pensioners and which no one today can seriously contend is a fair and reasonable basic pension. That amount was fixed in 1935. Since then the cost of living has increased by almost 100 per cent, and many of the former employees of the Canadian National who are in receipt of that basic pension find themselves unable to carry on. That is also true of those who have retired within the last few years. Among railway employees everywhere across this country there is a demand that the Canadian National Railways do something about a pension system that is inadequate and ineffective. Something must be done, and without delay.

The answer given by the minister does not meet the situation. There is no reason at all why these pensioned employees of the Canadian National Railways should be placed in the position today of trying to get along on $25 a month. According to reports, over 7,000 former employees receive less than $40 a month, including 1,700 who receive only the basic pension of $25. I realize that an amendment is being considered at the present time, in agreement with the provinces, which will permit the assumption by the dominion of complete responsibility for old age pensions, and making provision for a pension at seventy without a means test. These two plans, the present Canadian National Railways plan and the prospective old age pension scheme, should be worked in together, to render the pension system more equitable.

My second suggestion is that something be done about rewriting the pension fund rules and regulations. As they are now constituted they do not meet the case of many needy individuals. The strict interpretation of the rules with respect to seniority and continuity of employment deny to many a fair and reasonable pension. I point out that these rules are unjust to the railway employees who are veterans of world war I, who joined up immediately upon demobilization in 1918 or 1919. These men are given no credit for the time they were in the armed forces, and as a consequence many are denied the pension to which they would have been entitled had they made contributions for the period during which they were in the armed services. I make an appeal particularly on behalf of those who have been discharged from the service of the Canadian National Railways by reason of their approaching the age when they are required automatically to retire.

There is another aspect of the matter to which I wish now to refer, and I do so with some diffidence. I first called attention to this question in 1947, and throughout the years have contended that the $25 a month is unreasonable and cannot be justified. Today private corporations are setting up pension schemes. I can well understand that when the government decides to bring in an overall pension plan for the retirement of aged people the difficulty will be to bring the national plan in line with those that are now being introduced by private corporations. Recently I was very much disturbed when, having brought this matter up, I received a great deal of correspondence—I mean just that—from railway employees, and also from retired employees who are now living on this meagre pension. In no instance did any one of them say that he did not wish action taken before parliament and everything done that could be done to interest the government in taking the necessary action.

I have here a copy of the record of the debate when I brought the matter to the attention of the minister on July 2, 1947. At that time the minister pointed out the difficulty of doing anything, and gave little or no hope that the basic pension of $300 per year would be increased. After the matter had been brought to the attention of the house again by myself and by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I was astounded to find the president of the Canadian National Railways placing on the records of the railway committee the very letter that was forwarded to me, and to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, by the chairman of the Order of Railroad Telegraphers. I cannot understand that. I am surprised that the chairman of the order gave permission to the president of the railway to use that letter, which was written to me personally.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, the letter was written not only to the hon. member personally but also to the president of Canadian National Railways, to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and to me.

Mr. Knowles: No.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, I have the letter here. Copies were sent to the minister, and the president of the Canadian National Railways, but that letter was directed to Mr. John Diefenbaker, M.P., and then at the right, Mr. Stanley Knowles, M.P., and to no one else. At the end of the letter there is a note that copies were sent to Hon. Lionel Chevrier, Minister of Transport, and Mr. Donald Gordon, president of Canadian National Railways. Surely a letter like that should not have been placed on the records of the railway committee. Since it has been, and since over the years I have advocated the need for something being done for the Canadian National Railways employees, I am going to make a reference to this letter now so that I may be in a position to give my answer to it. With the consent of the committee, instead of reading the letter I should like to put it on Hansard, because the minister has a copy of it. Have I the consent of the committee?

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. member leave to place the letter on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The letter is as follows:

THE ORDER OF RAILROAD TELEGRAPHERS

Canadian National Railway System Division No. 43

Winnipeg, Man.
April 12, 1951.

Mr. John Diefenbaker, M.P.
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Mr. Stanley Knowles, M.P.
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Gentlemen:

It has come to my attention that you asked some questions of the government in connection with C.N.R. pensions, and I would understand that it is your intention to ask further questions before the special committee, probably next week.

I wish to assure you, on behalf of the C.N.R. employees, that your interest in this matter is very sincerely appreciated, and we know the sincerity of your desire to improve the condition which we know only too well to be very bad indeed.

However, I would like to give you an outline in brief of the situation as it is at the moment.

Through our general chairmen's association we have been trying for some years to effect improvements, but have met with no success or encouragement until quite recently.

At our annual meeting, held in November, 1950, we had the pleasure of having Mr. Donald Gordon, president of the C.N.R., to address a joint meeting of our association and the representatives of the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway Employees. The combined meeting represented practically all organized labour on the C.N.R.

At our request Mr. Gordon spoke on the subject of pensions and told us that he realized that our present pension plan is inadequate and outdated. He promised to set up a committee of railway officers to meet with a corresponding number of representatives of organized labour to undertake to revise the existing rules.

He fulfilled his promise and set up a committee of high ranking officers. We, on our part, selected a committee of labour representatives drawn from the Canadian and international unions.

Negotiations have been carried on by the joint committee in a very co-operative atmosphere, and we have now reached the stage where certain concrete proposals are being considered, and the proposals have just been submitted to actuaries for their report and advice as to the cost to employer and employee of the various plans which are now under consideration.

It is expected to take at least six weeks to get a report from the actuaries, and following the receipt of that report it is intended that we proceed as rapidly as possible to revise the pension rules.

I feel very sure that we are finally on the way to completing a very satisfactory revision of the rules, and that it will not be delayed any longer than is absolutely necessary.

One of our prime objects is to improve the status of those who are now on pension, and we have reached tentative agreement on what can be done to improve their situation, but our plan is dependent to a great degree on the action of the government in regard to the institution of an old age pension at age seventy without a means test, and we earnestly solicit your continued support of that project.

As I said previously, we appreciate your action in asking questions and your interest on behalf of the employees whom we represent. I wished to give you the facts in the matter and to say that I doubt that our interests would be advanced in any way by pressing the government or the railway officers for additional information at the present time.

I fear that pressure exerted now might result in hurried decisions which would not be as satisfactory as those we hope to reach by negotiations now in progress.

It would be appreciated if we could continue the present negotiations to a conclusion along the lines on which we are working.

If the conclusions reached are not satisfactory we will then hope to have the privilege of calling on your good selves and all our other friends in the house for such assistance as is necessary to reach a satisfactory solution of our problem.

In all fairness I cannot do other than say that I believe Mr. Gordon and his officers are doing all that is reasonably possible to co-operate with us in our present efforts, and the fact that this revision has been so long delayed is not the fault of the present administration of the railway.

I should have stated that I was elected to act as spokesman for the committee which was set up by the Canadian and international unions in matters pertaining to the revision of pension rules, so that you may regard this letter as being from the elected representatives of the employees.

Again thanking you for your interest on our behalf, and trusting that you will find it possible to comply with my suggestion that you do not press the matter too much at this time, I am,

Yours very sincerely,

A. A. Hutchinson,

Chairman,
General Chairmen's Association,
Canadian National Railways.

Having placed the letter on Hansard I now point out that, in effect, it says negotiations between the railway company and the Order of Railway Telegraphers have started. It says that a tentative arrangement has been discussed, and then this follows:

I fear that pressure exerted now might result in hurried decisions which would not be as satisfactory as those we hope to reach by negotiations now in progress.

I do not know what that means, but if it implies that bringing the matter before parliament on behalf of people who cannot speak in parliament will be detrimental, then I strongly take objection to any such view being expressed.

Finally, it deals with a meeting that took place, and it says this:

It would be appreciated if we could continue the present negotiations to a conclusion along the lines on which we are working.

If the conclusions reached are not satisfactory we will then hope to have the privilege of calling on your good selves and all our other friends in the house for such assistance as is necessary to reach a satisfactory solution of our problem.

In all fairness I cannot do other than say that I believe Mr. Gordon and his officers are doing all that is reasonably possible to co-operate with us in our present efforts, and the fact that this revision has been so long delayed is not the fault of the present administration of the railway.

It is not for me to enter into that discussion. I have no views on that, but I do say that from July, 1947, until November, 1950, nothing has been done to meet the situation of these pensioners who find themselves unable to carry on. The letter concludes:

> Again thanking you for your interest on our behalf, and trusting that you will find it possible to comply with my suggestion that you do not press the matter too much at this time, I am,
> Yours very sincerely,

I mention that paragraph, too, Mr. Chairman. I believe in doing everything I can on behalf of Canadian National employees who are, as I believe, unfairly treated, or any other group. When I received that letter, naturally I was impressed by it, and naturally I was only too glad to co-operate. But for the life of me I cannot understand why, having written that letter, the chairman of the order saw fit to allow the president of Canadian National Railways to place it before the railways and shipping committee. That is something I cannot understand, and I leave it there.

In view of the instructions given in that letter, and the publicity that was given to those instructions—it is the first time in my experience in the House of Commons I have ever known of a lobby in reverse—I no longer wish to press this matter. I would be the last one to appear to do anything in parliament that would be detrimental to those who deserve justice in the matter of pensions. I never knew before that anything detrimental could be done to employees who are in any way connected with the government of Canada by having their complaints brought before parliament.

However, having said that, I still press for the need of an immediate revision, and an increase in the basic pension without delay; for I have letters on my desk—as the minister must have—from employees of the Canadian National Railways all over this country who are between sixty-five and seventy and who, because of the fact that they received low wages in positions such as sectionmen, porters and the like, find themselves today, after years of service, in a condition bordering on destitution. Their case deserves attention without regard to whether or not other classes should be considered, as they should, and civil service employees as well. Surely those pensioners of the Canadian National Railways, receiving, as they do, less than any other employees of government—because they are employees of the government—have a proper and just claim to the consideration I have asked on their behalf on this and previous occasions.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

To sum up, I ask the minister whether even now, instead of waiting until the old age pension legislation may be brought before parliament—and normally it will not be introduced before next February or March—something can be done to meet the needs of those former employees who are receiving less than $40 a month.

Second, I suggest that the rules and regulations of the pension fund be revised. They have not been revised for years. In 1947 I brought certain clauses to the attention of the minister, but as yet nothing has been done in that regard.

Some of the employees in the lower income brackets who have contributed to the fund would like to make withdrawals for certain needs that are most demanding at the moment. I would appreciate it if the minister would give consideration to allowing those who wish to withdraw their contributions to do so—thereby of course denying themselves the larger pension which they would receive were they to allow those amounts to remain in the pension fund—instead of their being held as they so often are today.

At the expense of reiteration I make this appeal. As one travels across this country one meets former employees of the Canadian National Railways who ask that parliament do something about this matter. They are in the age group of sixty-five to seventy, and, in the face of the rising cost of living, they receive a pension which is inadequate, and which is out of keeping with the services they rendered and the responsibilities they discharged over the years, and also with their standard of living and the maintenance of that standard of living.

Mr. Knowles: The issue before us at the present time is the plight of retired Canadian National Railways employees whose pensions are hopelessly inadequate. I hope that the discussion of this letter, unfortunate though it is that it was tabled by Mr. Gordon, will not take us away from the seriousness of the issue affecting the men concerned. However, since my name has been mentioned in connection with this matter by the hon. member for Lake Centre, and since the letter, bearing, as it does, my name, was put on the record in the railways and shipping committee, I feel that I should say a few words about it.

In passing, I dare to hope that this whole incident in relation to Mr. Hutchinson's letter may turn out to serve the cause well. Certainly it has drawn wider attention than we have had before to the plight of Canadian National Railways pensioners, and it has also served to underline the fact that the problem
